The third truth must be obvious to every member of Parliament. Canadians have called for change and they have called for change based upon goodwill, change based upon reaching out, change based upon open arms, open minds and open hearts. As a member of Parliament from Montreal, I saw this reality with my own eyes, particularly during the unity rally in our city.

The fourth truth is that the Prime Minister of Canada keeps his word. The Prime Minister said he would introduce measures to declare Quebec a distinct society and to offer a constitutional veto and Canadians know that they can count on him to do exactly what he promised to do. He is a man of his word and he has done it. Now we must move forward to close the gap, to bridge the gulf that seemingly divides.

This resolution is not about every person or every province or every political party demanding to get its own way. This legislation is about Canada and Canadians finding a better way.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Comme en 1982.

Mr. Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Oh, oh.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Pendant des années.

Mrs. Finestone: This resolution is about Parliament showing leadership by saying we will take another step in finding understanding. We will take another step in recognizing the reality of Canada. We will demonstrate that we are determined to keep faith—

An. hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Finestone: Listen, do you guys want to have a fight?

We will demonstrate that we are determined to keep faith with both the heritage and the potential of our wonderful country.

We recognize that Quebec is a province with a legal system that is not based on common law, but on the civil code. It is the home of a diverse population of anglophones, allophones, and a majority who are French speaking Canadians who are also diverse. We will not just talk about good intentions. We are building trust by acting on those good intentions. This measure before Parliament is based on the reality of Canada.

Unfortunately, as all Canadians know, anything proposed by the Government of Canada will never go far enough to satisfy the Parti Quebecois or for that matter the Bloc Quebecois. Equally unfortunate, anything proposed by the Government of Canada will never go far enough to satisfy the Reform Party. Those people will never be satisfied.

Thank goodness this debate is not about keeping those people happy. This debate is about keeping Canada together. This debate is about satisfying the people inside and outside of Quebec who understand that the me generation has passed and the we generation has arrived. It is no longer about cutting the best deal for yourself. It is about reaching the best solution for the future of our country. It is about building the new Canada. It is about standing proud and tall for the maple leaf. Canadians from coast to coast to coast must rise above their differences and realize that there is so much more that unites than that which divides us.

[Translation]

We have experienced many problems throughout our history but have always found a way to resolve them, for we understand that compassion is far more humane than conflict.

We understand that tolerance is far superior to intransigence. We understand that allowing our fellow citizens to reach their full potential does nothing to diminish us. Canadians know that we cannot build a big country on small minds.

• (1250)

[English]

Canadians know we cannot build a big country on little minds.

[Translation]

Canadians are not expecting miracles, nor are they looking for heaven here on earth. But they are entitled to expect that the Parliament of Canada will do its utmost, will take the right actions, will adopt the appropriate principles, in order to recognize the modern reality of Canada and to show its true commitment to strengthening the ties among the members of Canada's diversified population.

[English]

I hope that Quebecers and non-Quebecers alike will urge members of Parliament from all parties to keep the big picture in mind. I hope they will urge members of Parliament to take meaningful and realistic steps toward progress.

Canadians are people of moderation and modesty. From time to time we are also a people of passion. We try always to be people of principle, of fairness and of optimism. Throughout their history Canadians have overcome their differences and succeeded beyond the wildest dreams of the founders of this nation. We did it in the end after much reflection by appealing to the better side of our nature as human beings and by acting on the better side of our nature as citizens.

Recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, providing a new constitutional veto and bringing government closer to the people are the vital and important issues. Those are the proposals which the government is moving to turn into reality. What is at stake is keeping our word, keeping faith with the dreams of Canadians, re-energizing our national unity and revitalizing the very best country in the world.

When political discourse becomes invective, when rhetoric over reality becomes overheated, it begets intolerance, instability and fear. When political leaders target identifiable groups—and we have had more than enough of that—when they blame specific communities, they are offensive and they fuel exclusion, anger and resentment. They are a blot on the good name, the goodwill and the respect we have built for our society both here in Canada and around the world. When bigots like Pierre Bourgault and his ilk spew their invective, they show that they have no place in our caring society.

I know that the vast majority of Quebecers reject those exclusionary, racist remarks and recognize that we as Quebecers, including some of you on the other side, are all welcome, we are all included and we are all equal, with equal rights, and that our vote will be respected. We too have contributed beyond measure to the growth, development and well–being of all Quebecers.

I want this understanding of the fair sharing in Quebec to be appreciated. I am a Quebecer. I am proud of my difference. I am not better, I am not worse, I am just different. That is what makes me distinct and that is what makes all of us distinct in Quebec. The environment has formed us in many ways.

I call on all Canadians to join with us in recognizing that despite our diverse geography from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, our many cultures and the aboriginal peoples of our two official languages, we are one country. It is by extending our hands of welcome to one another, by rejoicing and appreciating our differences and our diversity that we grow and prosper. It is through our civility and the unity of all Canadians that we ensure a bright future for our children, for our community and for our country.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my speech—in the hope that the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, who is my deskmate, will do me the honour of going along with my line of reasoning—by proposing that we try to imagine what it would be like if we had André Laurendeau, Lionel Groulx, Hubert Aquin, Robert Bourassa and Claude Ryan sitting in opposition.

I named these people, because each and every one of them, at some time or other, has been involved in the process of constitutional review, in different ways of course. I, myself, have been very interested in the process of constitutional review. It has enabled me to pursue my studies. The process of constitutional review arose from the 1960s idea that the Constitution had to be reviewed.

I would say that, for Quebec, the process of constitutional review between the 1960s and now has had two main thrusts. The first, I believe, applies to the entire Quebec family. Both the provincial Liberals and the slightly more nationalist folks acknowledge that reviewing sections 91 and 92 on the devolution of power is what counts in the constitutional review.

This is particularly true, because, as you will remember, in the early 1960s, with Jean Lesage, there was a movement in English Canada to patriate the Constitution and give it an amending formula, because the 33 Fathers of Confederation had not thought of giving it one. Jean Lesage and Jacques–Yvan Morin, and others after them, felt sections 91 and 92 had to be reviewed first, before the question of patriating the Constitution was dealt with. This then is the first thrust, which remains extremely important today, and, obviously, we can see we are a long way from it with Bill C–110.

The second and possibly the most important thrust—and that is why I referred to the man who, in a way, is like the father of the Bloc Quebecois, namely André Laurendeau, who, you may recall, was elected to the National Assembly in 1944. André Laurendeau took up the challenge of Prime Minister Pearson—to whom some people do not hesitate to liken our current Prime Minister—and quit Le Devoir in the early 1960s to co–chair the Laurendeau–Dunton commission.

This royal commission is no doubt the true testament to Quebec nationalism. For the first time in a constitutional document—and I am referring here to the preliminary report tabled in 1965, commonly called the white paper—André Laurendeau and his fellow members of the commission urged English Canada to recognize the co–existence of two nations in Canada. There is a sentence in the white paper that is a important as it is short, on which I wrote my graduate thesis, and I would like to quote it today. André Laurendeau was truly a visionary when he said: "Out of disappointment will come the irreparable".

Of course, the irreparable is Quebec's sovereignty. Around 1965, sovereignty was in a latent, embryonic state in Quebec. Now, 30 years later, 30 years after André Laurendeau tabled his white paper, we are debating a bill introduced by a Liberal government, which will not even recognize Quebec as a nation. That is what is so tragic in all this. No constitutional talks can take place without first recognizing that, in this country, we have two nations, which are equal in fact and in law. We must work to ensure that these two nations can start talking.

For those who belong the same school of thought as I do, the best way to open a dialogue is, of course, sovereignty or a sovereignty–partnership formula. Those from another school of thought, whom I respect and who won the October referendum, think that something can be worked out within the federal system. There is something that I cannot figure out about federal strategists. We cannot begrudge the current Minister of Justice. He is a rather nice man, a distinguished mind, a rising star in the Liberal camp. We cannot hold a grudge against him for not fully grasping the finer nuances of the constitutional debate.

How can the Prime Minister, who has been a member of this House since 1967—long before you, Mr. Speaker, became a member, if I am not mistaken—who has been a key player and a key witness in this constitutional review process, think that some Quebecers will be satisfied with an administrative bill that will not, of course, be entrenched in the Constitution, and that only offers a possible right of veto.

• (1300)

A veto is, of course, important. We used it when Jean Lesage was tempted to accept the Fulton–Favreau formula requiring the unanimous consent of the provinces, and when Robert Bourassa was also tempted to accept the 1971 Victoria Charter, which is different from what we have before us today and which is sometimes compared with what is being offered today. As you may recall, Victoria would have given back to Quebec all of its powers over language, as the Pepin–Robarts Commission did a little later.

How can anyone on the side of the government majority think that any Quebecer—whether on the Daniel Johnson team, on the Jacques Parizeau team, or with any lobby in Quebec—will say yes to a proposal like this one?

The government has put itself in a very awkward and unenlightened position, in my opinion, by forcing the loyal opposition, one of the best oppositions this government has ever known, to say no. I know that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will understand that the minimum requirements for reviewing the Constitution cannot be any less than what was proposed in the Meech Lake accord.

As you know, the Meech Lake accord contained five minimum requirements. Personally, I would never have voted for the Meech Lake accord, because, even though it was a bare minimum, it did not provide the essential, namely Quebec's recognition as a nation and, more importantly, it did not provide any additional power to Quebec, while also being tragically silent on the language issue.

But let us presume that everyone is acting in good faith and is trying to engage in a dialogue. How can the Prime Minister and his team possibly think that Bill C–110 is sufficient, considering that the five conditions included in Meech were an absolute minimum?

Meech also sought to ensure that the Supreme Court played a role in a balanced Canadian federation, and therefore, to restore that balance, Quebec must be represented by judges who reflect its civil law tradition.

There was also the idea, which is probably the most important one for us but is also important for English Canada, that the federal spending power had to be clearly defined, since a number of experts agree that there is a direct link between the use of that spending power by the federal government and the current deficit.

I respectfully submit, out of respect for the past, that if those whom I named were here now, including Claude Ryan—and I do not know how he is perceived by this government—none of them, and they all sought to protect Quebec's interests and future, would agree with Bill C–110. I hope the government reviews its position and comes up with something more substantial, so as to launch a true dialogue.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): I am pleased to speak this afternoon on this three–part initiative of the Prime Minister.

The first part is to provide a regional veto to the four regions of the country, in addition of course to the veto the provinces already have. This initiative will also acknowledge Quebec as a distinct society and will, of course, be in line with the government's indication of its intent to step up efforts to reduce duplication. Today we have seen the Minister of Human Resources Development take the first step in that direction since the Prime Minister's announcement.

Of course, long before the Prime Minister's announcement, our government had already begun these initiatives and, since we became the government, a number of administrative agreements have been signed with all of the provinces, Quebec included, but of course there have been very few of those since the separatists came into power in Quebec.

I would like to start by stating my position for you within this debate at this time. As a number of hon. members are aware, I am a Quebecer by birth, who represents an Ontario riding. I have served at the municipal, provincial and federal levels, and have been in office at one level or another for over 19 years now. I am one of those who voted for the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord. I will vote for Bill C–110 and the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, which is fully justified.

We heard certain separatist members complain that the Meech Lake accord had not been adopted and denounce the fact. Yet, some of them—in particular their House leader—had voted against the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord. Other separatists say they have resigned themselves to making do without it, often forgetting that they had campaigned and voted against the Charlottetown accord.

In a few days, if I may make a prediction, if these people do not understand more than they do today, they will vote against Bill C–110, against distinct society, confirming in so doing they are not interested in progress and do not want Quebecers to improve their situation. They want no such thing, they simply want to build up an empire for themselves and act as emperors, but they will never succeed in doing so.

Members opposite, the Bloc members and to some extent, I am sad to say, certain Reform members—I repeat to some extent, because they do all think like this—seem to be wanting to put an end to our country as we know it.

Why is that? We live in a country that, four years out of five, has been described as the best in the world by the United Nations. Members opposite are shaking their head, saying it is not enough. I personally heard the opposition leader saying Canada was a kind of experiment which had failed from his point of view. According to whom? While even the United Nations cannot find a better place in the world, members opposite want us to emulate another country. Which country will we imitate? Even the UN has not been able to find it yet. But the members opposite claim that this is all worthless. They say they have a better solution.

As I said, I live in Ontario, I am a Franco–Ontarian by adoption, even though I was born in Quebec. I am still a French Canadian. I must tell you that the way the members opposite refer to the rest of Canada which they call "English Canada"—I heard the member for Maisonneuve use this phrase today in his speech—is a real insult to my constituents. I have told you repeatedly, this expression is insulting.

When francophones outside Quebec showed up for a demonstration they had dubbed "Poof, the francophones!", mimicking the member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, it was in part to denounce the fact that we, the one million francophones, such as the member for Nickel–Belt, myself and all the others who live elsewhere in Canada, were called English Canadians.

This is the way the members opposite want to portray Canada: an entirely francophone Quebec and the rest of Canada completely anglophone. This is the way they look at it and its is wrong.

The member for Argenteuil–Papineau, who is in front of me, knows full well that when we go to the shopping centre in Hawkesbury, the people we can hear speaking English probably come from his riding. In our area, anglophones are by definition Quebecers from the Harrington and Lost River areas, who come to shop, and francophones are Ontarians.

That is our reality. Does the Bloc talk about these million Quebecers whose first language is not French? Does it talk about Franco–Ontarians and francophones outside Quebec? Bloc members say that we have disappeared. They said: "Poof, the francophones outside Quebec!" No, the Bloc members will not make us disappear. They will not.

The worst insult I heard in all my career in this House came the day when the leader of the Bloc Quebecois went to Acadia to tell Acadians that he would build schools for them when Quebec became a different country. What an insult for Acadians, who have survived and grown for 200 years in this country. And how pretentious of the Leader of the Opposition, who thought he could go to Acadia to tell Acadians a thing or two. Well, they fixed him. They told him to go back home. That is what some Acadians said, rightly so, and the members opposite know it. And Franco–Ontarians told the member for Rimouski—Témiscouata and the others: You do not want to have anything to do with us francophones outside Quebec and your words prove it.

[English]

Why does United States have twice as many people of francophone origin than Canada and virtually none of them speak it any more?

Could it be that Canada has been a country where the French language has been able to develop quite well and that the reverse was true in the United States? Could it be as well that we as francophones living outside Quebec, and I am one of them, have been able to have our language develop because there is a critical mass of francophones in my country known as Quebec? Yes, that is the reason.

And today, if we were in Louisiana and we were 60 years old and more, we would be speaking French to each other. If we were in Louisiana and we were 40 years old, we would say a few words in French. And if we were 20 years old and someone would talk to us in French, we would say: "What?"

That is what happened in Louisiana; the French language survived for 200 years only to disappear with the television era. But that did not happen in Canada. I still speak French to my children and they will speak French to their children. Why? Because we stayed in a tolerant country, a country where both languages and both cultures were able to develop and a country—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 1.15 p.m., pursuant to the order made earlier this day, it is my duty pursuant to our Standing Orders to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of second reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45, a recorded division stands deferred until Monday, December 4, at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment.

Shall we call it 1.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 1.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.) moved that Bill C–241, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (child support payments), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in the House today to speak to my private member's Bill C–241, an act to amend the Income Tax Act so that child support payments are not taxable as income for the recipient. As well, it includes child support payments within the meaning of earned income for the purposes of child support deductions.

It is important to ensure that a tax free child support payment to the custodial parent is initiated and that a more appropriate and limited tax credit is equitably distributed to child support payers. I do not suggest what the specific credit should be. I believe it more appropriately falls within the purview of the Minister of Finance.

Bill C–241 is an issue which is very important to me and one with which I have been associated for a number of years. It became clear to me that the taxation of child support payments was a significant concern to many people in the riding of Nepean and to individuals across the country. I continue to receive letters from many people who are experiencing great difficulty as a result of the existing tax laws.

On February 23, 1994 my Motion No. 14 was placed on the Order Paper, deemed votable, debated and adopted on May 30, 1994. The motion at that time read:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Income Tax Act so that child support payments are no longer considered taxable income for recipients.

However, the government of the day has still not responded to the motion.

The 1994 budget recognized perceived inequalities in the tax treatment of child support and committed itself to exploring ways to improve the system to ensure, first and foremost, that the needs of children are met. However, as of this date, as I said, the government has still not moved on it.

The Minister of Justice indicated his intention to address the issue of child support guidelines and enforcement. I will be looking forward to hearing from him. Bill C–241 only asks for changes to the treatment of income tax for child support which falls under the purview of the Minister of Finance.

The current tax treatment of child support payments makes a very complicated issue out of one that should be as straightforward and as simple as possible. It is most important that it is children who now bear the immediate consequence because the current system is not providing the effect it was designed to produce. If the current policy is not changed it is the children who will go on paying the consequences every day, not just in some cases and not by accident but deliberately because of our failure to redesign an outdated tax mechanism.

This is not just a tax issue but one of wider social justice that affects the well–being of Canada's children and of Canada's future.

The tax treatment of child support payments allows a payer to deduct the full amount of the payment from his income while the recipient must include the full amount in hers. The policy has been criticized as discriminatory to women because it places an unfair tax burden on the custodial parent, and the custodial parent is usually the woman and the one who is responsible for the children.

How this situation evolved can be partially explained by historical changes in the patterns of the lives of men and women in Canada over the past half century. The current tax treatment of child support was initiated in the 1940s, probably just after World War II, and reflects the social realities of that time.

There are historical reasons for the bill. From 1940 to 1992 there have been significant changes in society and government policy which lead to the question of whether or not this tax policy also requires revision.

When the current policy was developed it was designed to provide relief to the taxpayer burdened with both a post–war increase in taxes and the obligation of spousal and child support. The father was typically the sole wage earner and the primary taxpayer in the separated family. It was logical at that time that tax relief be targeted to him.

In the current reality both parents are considered individual within our tax structure today. Even those who do not pay taxes file their own tax returns to have access to benefits delivered through the income tax system. Most lone parents also have paid work and pay taxes on their own earned income whether or not they receive support.

The labour force participation of all women has been steadily increasing, including women with children. In 1988, 62.2 per cent of women with partners and a child under five years of age were in the labour force and 73 per cent for those with children aged six to fifteen years. With lower fertility rates and a later age of first birth, women are spending more time in the paid labour force. This allows women to establish some earning power before interruption for child birth and care.

The labour force participation of women who are lone parents is also increasing. In 1988 the rate was 51 per cent for those with children under five and 72.3 per cent for those with children six to fifteen.

While women are increasingly participating in the labour force they are still concentrated in lower paying and less secure forms of employment. The wage gap is narrowing extremely slowly. Canada is not narrowing the gap as quickly as many other industrialized nations. For example, women's relative wage in Canada in 1990 was 67.6 per cent of men's, compared with Australia at 87.9 per cent and France at 81.8 per cent.

Due to changing economic conditions most families now require the labour force participation of women. Even for two–parent families two incomes are needed to maintain a single household. Upon divorce family resources are often inadequate to continue to meet children's needs as two households must be maintained.

Most lone parents continue to be solely or primarily responsible for the financial needs of children. One of the key reasons for this phenomenon is the high rate of default on child support awards, estimated in the province of Ontario to be disgracefully around the 75 per cent level.

There have been numerous policy changes since 1940 which have had a significant impact on the situation of women, families with children and lone parent families in particular. In 1970 the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women documented women's economic and social disadvantage in Canada for the first time. Since 1976 there has been a federal policy commitment to examine the impact of programs and policies on women. This was reinforced when the charter of rights and freedoms came into force.

Better research and data collection as a result of this work continues to identify and describe the feminization of poverty and its direct relation to the unpaid work involved in raising children and other tasks related to human maintenance.

There has been decreasing support for families with children through the tax transfer system over the past two decades. For example, the value of deductions and credits for children as a proportion of income has been steadily reduced. The reduction of the number of tax brackets to three and other changes to deduction and credits have all had an impact on families and on the tax treatment of child support.

Divorce law has evolved from a system based on fault to a no–fault system. Under the no–fault system there is an increasing tendency for support orders to focus on the children with the expectation that women, even those who are not in the labour force, will become self–supporting in an unreasonably short period of time.

There is growing political support for the plight of lone parents. Provincial governments are trying to crack down on non–custodial parents, usually fathers, who are not making their support payments to their children. Growing welfare rolls have spurred the search for alternatives and particularly the need to make fathers responsible for their children.

The women's movement, in combination with economic and policy changes, has reinforced women's need for and right to both paid work and a sharing of family responsibilities. My previous comments highlighted several significant changes in Canadian society from the forties to the nineties. Individuals and families are in very different situations today than in the forties. Given these changes it is timely to ask whether our tax policy on child support is still meeting the original goals of providing tax relief to the tax burdened and encouraging the payment of child support.

My bill is intended to bring the tax treatment of child support payments into the context of the world we live in today. I am cognizant of the increasing levels of child poverty. Any and all changes considered must focus on this fact as the guiding principle.

• (1325)

The general consensus is that the non–custodial parent benefits from the current tax policy, not the children. Presently the total child support award rarely specifies the total needs of the child and the specific amounts needed to compensate for the tax owing on this amount.

Actual evidence on the current levels of child support demonstrates that average support payments are low and would rise considerably with the introduction of guidelines based on actual expenditures on children. If the support award is not high enough to meet the children's needs, it cannot compensate for the tax owing. In practice the tax system further reduces the already inadequate amount available for the children.

Even if a support award is adequate to meet the children's needs calculating the gross up, which is the amount set aside for tax purposes, and deciding how to split any tax saving are extraordinarily complex.

In the Thibaudeau case the Federal Court of Appeal ruled invalid under the charter of rights and freedoms the requirement that the parent who has custody of a child include child support payments as income. Since the decision did not deal with the deductibility of child support by the payer, it left in question how the tax will be paid on income directed to child support.

Following the finding of a Federal Court of Appeal, the attorney general asked that the Thibaudeau decision be suspended while an expedited appeal was brought before the Supreme Court of Canada. On May 25, the supreme court handed down its decision and supported the existing provisions.

The result of the appeal, the court ruled five to two, was that it is not unconstitutional to require the custodial parent who receives child support payments to pay the taxes on that money. However the question of taxation of child support was not totally resolved by the supreme court decision.

Madam Justice Beverly McLachlin of the supreme court was one of the two dissenting judges in that decision. She wrote in her dissenting opinion:

> The impugned taxation scheme imposes a burden on separated or divorced custodial parents which it does not impose on separated or divorced non–custodial parents.
> The custodial parent must include child support payments from which she gains no personal benefit. The non–custodial parent may deduct support payments from his taxable revenue.
> The inequality between the custodial and non–custodial spouse is exacerbated by the fact that the latter enjoys an automatic and absolute right of deduction of support payments from personal income, while the former's ability to offset the increase in her taxes by obtaining an adjustment of support is unpredictable.
> Not only must the custodial parent request any adjustment from the court but it is not always certain that the court will correctly assess the tax impact or will award a sufficient amount to enable the recipient to discharge her additional burden.
> The logic of a deduction inclusion scheme is further called into question by the fact that our society strongly encourages women to obtain financial self–sufficiency and, in pursuit of that essential objective, to increase their income. The higher the income of the custodial parent, the greater will be her tax rate and the more she will be penalized by the requirement of including the amount of child support in computing her own taxable income.
> One of the premises on which the logic of the deduction inclusion scheme rests, that custodial parents are generally subject to a lower tax rate than those who pay the child support, is less and less in accord with present reality and undermines the importance our society places on women attaining financial self–sufficiency.

If we take families in which the husband, the wife and the children remain as the family unit, when the husband gives money to the wife to support the children she is not taxed on it. Nor is he given a deduction. The way it is set up is unfair to the whole family unit.

Following the Thibaudeau decision the government stated its intention to announce a comprehensive approach to reforming the child support system including guidelines to determine the amounts, the tax treatment of payments and the enforcement of child support orders.

Let me refer to why the current system is not working. According to research done by Karen Cooper and Ellen Zweibel on the current system of deduction inclusion, there is a gap between tax theory and family experience. The deduction inclusion as designed is expected to produce an overall tax savings for the ultimate benefit of the children in divorced and separated families. Custodial mothers have made it clear the current system undermines their ability to support their children and increases their vulnerability to poverty.

Fathers from the highest income group obtain the most tax savings when paying support to custodial mothers who have not yet fully entered the job market. Little or no overall tax savings accrue when separated parents are either both low income earners or are both moderate income earners. In a minority of cases, the provisions can even have an opposite effect.

SCOPE, which is an Ottawa based support group for custodial mothers, in its report to the parliamentary task force examining the current system of taxation of child support payments, described how the current system is impacting on the lives of custodial parents. I will quote from the submission:

> How they have had to apply for bank loans, borrow money from friends and family, cash in RRSPs, or have been subject to collection proceedings from unpaid taxes.
> However, if the non–custodial parent doesn't make full child support payments, the custodial mother must still pay a portion of the partial payment in income tax—Although she cannot meet all the children's budgeted–for expenses from the partial support payment, what she does receive shrinks even further because of the income tax burden. How, after struggling for months and years to get by without full support payments, when they do manage to collect the support arrears, the tax owed on those arrears is often greater than they would have been if the amount had been paid on time.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women in its submission to the same task force stated:

> In summary, the government's main policy justification fails custodial mothers and their children. Rather than providing greater resources for children, the current tax policy puts greater pressure on the custodial mother. First, she must bargain with the non–custodial father and/or his lawyer for an income tax "gross–up". There is no guarantee the income tax "gross–up" will be included: in some cases he does not have enough tax savings to pay a "gross–up"; in other cases, he may not agree to it or the judge may order a lower amount.
> Whenever the custodial mother is unsuccessful in getting a fully tax–augmented child support award, she must stretch her already limited budget to cover the income taxes. When the non–custodial father makes only a partial payment, the custodial mother is left without enough funds to meet the children's budgeted needs and yet the already insufficient amount she received is still further reduced by income taxes. For those important reasons, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women strongly recommends repeal of the current inclusion/deduction provisions.

In summary, the movement to reform the income tax treatment of child support has been ongoing since the 1970s. It received significant attention in the 1990s for a number of reasons. The work of the federal–provincial–territorial family law committee which over a period of almost four years oversaw original research on child support in Canada, reviewed the research results and consulted widely with Canadians representing custodial and non–custodial parents and with experts in the child support area.

My previous motion I mentioned earlier in the House of Commons has essentially raised the visibility of the issue. The Thibaudeau case has further brought attention to this matter.

The parliamentary task force was headed by the Secretary of State for the Status of Women who is in the House today. I comment on the good work she and two of our colleagues on the task force did in their travels across the country, holding round table discussions. The input they received was heart rending, emotional and traumatic. This has further raised the profile and the importance of the need for change.

It is my hope that the debate in the House of Commons today will once again move this issue to the forefront. To quote C. Brock Chisholm from a speech in Washington, C.D. in 1945:

> The most important thing in the world today is the bringing up of children.

Designing fairer, simpler systems of providing tax relief is essential in order to respond to the needs of children whose parents live apart. We must remember this as we draft the laws which impact on our children. Their welfare must determine our priorities.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C–241 on behalf of the official opposition and I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for having put this bill forward for this House to consider. I might add that it is unfortunate that it cannot be voted on.

Such is the will of the members. Her intentions were commendable, but at the same time, this goes to show how the government, by refusing to make this bill a votable item, is really only paying lip service to the idea behind it. The hon. member ought to be commended for her good intentions, but this goes to show at the same time that this government does not care too much for her initiative.

Bill C–241 is in my opinion very positive from the point of view of its title, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, child support payments.

Interestingly enough, of all the forms of child support, the one that immediately comes to mind is, of course, alimony. There has been a debate on this issue, as we know.

In Quebec, I can think of Mrs. Thibaudeau's case. This lady took her case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada to try to make the point that the parent, generally the mother, who has custody of the children after a divorce, should not have to declare a portion of the amount received for child support on his or her income tax return, because, for the non custodial parent paying support, this amount is exempt from tax, it is deductible.

There are more women than men in this situation, since, as we know, 85 per cent of single parents facing this kind of situation are women.

We must also remember something else. In spite of the debates in this House on child poverty, as well as the laudable initiatives of members from all parties to make life more comfortable for children, one out of every five children in Canada lives in poverty. This is a serious problem.

The government often boasts about our country being the best in the world. Yet, one Canadian child in five lives in poverty. Children are not the only ones living in poverty. If they are poor, it is because their parents, their mother or their father are poor. Poor children are not all orphans. Their families are in very dire straits.

The measure proposed by the hon. member is interesting, because the person who has custody would not have to declare the money received for support, thus making it tax exempt. We, the official opposition, are in favour of that.

However, when we listen and talk to people, and when we have debates in this House, we realize that we have to be careful. That initiative must be part of a comprehensive strategy, because, taken separately, it might incite judges to take into account the fact that the spouse who pays for support can no longer deduct that amount for tax purposes, and thus lower the level of that support. We must ensure that the person receiving support payments is not penalized by getting considerably less money.

This proposal must be part of a comprehensive policy. We must avoid any boomerang effect and ensure that we do not end up penalizing the person in charge of the family. That would defeat the purpose.

In Canada, we used to have family allowances. Now we have child tax benefits. I find it deplorable that people who work, unlike in Quebec, cannot benefit from tax deductions for children.

Many parents in Quebec believe that, and rightly so. They want some incentives to have children. They are looking at the government for measures to help them take good care of their families, while we are in a situation, as everyone knows, where the population is aging, the birth rate is dropping, a larger segment of the population is becoming more impoverished and the social inequities are growing because of various economic considerations, which I do not have time to list in the ten minutes I have. We have very few measures which encourage young Canadians to have a family.

We are considering this motion the very same day the Minister of Human Resources Development is introducing changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to further restrict eligibility to UI benefits for new claimants or people who have not been working for a very long time, without taking many measures to really create jobs. Everywhere we look, there seems to be an impending threat, not only a perceived threat, but in some areas, a real one.

In Ontario, the government is thinking of increasing tuition fees and of decreasing education subsidies. We see in the end that the young people in particular—and I remind the House that I am the BQ critic for training and youth—feel like they are continually caught in a stranglehold. Under such circumstances, how can we blame the young people who choose to wait to have children, since their economic situation is becoming increasingly difficult?

I congratulate the hon. member for Nepean for a very praiseworthy motion. However, I cannot help but notice that the government, especially this past week, has been considering motions, resolutions and even a bill on such issues as the distinct society, the veto, and so on. I can see the hon. member opposite is serious and well intentioned. In reality, I deplore the fact that Parliament seems to become more and more a place for lofty speeches, for rhetoric, and I contribute to that by making one myself today, a place where the government seems less and less willing to do anything but look for ways to cut its spending, more often than not on the back of the disadvantaged.

Who are the disadvantaged? Often they are single parents, women, who represent a large percentage of the population, as well as children, since one in five children lives in poverty. I do not see anything in this motion that will correct this situation. It is a good measure, but we can see that there is a lack of willingness to do something on the part of the government.

I hope the government will soon leave the rhetoric aside and start looking at positive ways of encouraging young people and others to start a family. In spite of that, I do not want to be seen as being too strongly in favour of pro–natalist measures because women have the right to decide for themselves if they want children and how many. I do not question this fundamental right, but it is a question we must ask ourselves from a social viewpoint. We must take the necessary measures and soon.

I am a baby boomer, I am 48 years old, and here is what might happen to some of us.

• (1345)

If there are not enough young people entering the labour force, paying taxes and contributing to private pension plans, the people coming after us may not receive a pension. This may even happen to us, as we see that old age pensions, for those who are now under 65, are among the measures being considered. If we do not have enough children and if these children do not start life in a secure environment so that they have an incentive to continue improving our society, I fear the worst.

[English]

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–241, an act to amend the Income Tax Act with respect to child support payments.

I wish to commend the member for Nepean for her persistence and her efforts in support of this bill we are debating today. The issue of child support payments and taxation has been festering for many years without an adequate response from either this government or its predecessor.

One parent families are a result of a breakdown in marriage in a family. To put this into perspective, in 1991 300,000 Canadian parents received child support. The total bill was some $1.65 billion. It involved some 35,000 children in support and custody cases. Further, statistics indicate that 95 per cent of the custodial and single parents are mothers.

The Reform Party has recognized the need to fundamentally address this issue. Our family task force, which I chair, carefully considered and developed our position on child support payments and taxation in addition to addressing some other related issues.

Our motivation for developing a position on this issue is the function of our concern about the family and recognizing the need for strengthening it for this generation and future generations of Canadians. We believe the family is the fundamental building block of our society. The family is the fundamental institution that transfers and protects our values and culture. The family provides our society with the necessary stability needed for our prosperity and measured progress.

Parents and children are the basis for the family. Children can in no way be considered apart from or distinct from their parents. Children exist through and thrive on the relationship that exists between a mother and father. Thus the well–being of a child is directly related to the continued shared responsibility. I believe this broader picture of the responsibility of both parents for their children must be considered if a positive solution is to be found to child support payments and family relationships are to be strengthened.

As I mentioned before, the Reform Party has developed a rather comprehensive position on this issue. We addressed the issue of taxation, the level of support through guidelines, and enforcement and compliance with maintenance orders.

On the issue of taxation, child support payments should not be considered earned income subject to taxation. The current tax regime in paragraph 56(1)(b) of the Income Tax Act does exactly that. Where else in the tax system does such an approach exist? Child support payments are the fulfilment of an obligation of parents to their children regardless of family status. It is money directed from a parent for the well–being of his or her child. The money that is received for child support is not earned income. The federal government should therefore not tax these payments as though they were income.

This can be illustrated by contrasting child support payments and alimony. Child support payments are intended specifically for the children and not the mother. Alimony payments, on the other hand, are payments received as income for support of the divorced spouse. This distinction is a crucial one, one that must be recognized.

The effect of the tax system is compounded by the deficiency in the court system. The levels in support awards do not adequately reflect and meet the needs of the custodial parent and children, or perhaps the non–custodial parent.

With these considerations in mind, the Reform position, like Bill C–241, calls for revision of paragraph 56(1)(b) of the Income Tax Act that would strike payments received for child support from being considered as earned income and therefore eligible for taxation.

The Reform proposal would also redirect revenues collected from the taxation of the non–custodial parent to those single–parent families and dual parent families and the children most in need through a complementary increase in the federal child tax benefit, which is to say it is directed to those in need.

These positive and proactive measures will strengthen the circumstances and conditions of single parent families. They will also address the inequity the current tax regime promotes in the tax treatment of intact and separated families.

There is a broader issue of the current level of taxation that all Canadian families face. The reality is that the current tax burden upon the Canadian family is unjustifiably excessive and onerous. A 1994 study on families and taxation found that the average family composed of two or more persons paid 46 per cent of their cash income to various levels of government.

Families cannot now survive on a single income. In 1967, 58 per cent of families were supported by a single income. In 1994 that figure has been forced to an historic low of 19 per cent, and it is not by choice. In a 1994 survey of family attitudes, 52 per cent of respondents agreed with the statement that it is not possible to support a family on one income any more. The same survey stated that 40 per cent of parents agreed that if they could afford to they would stay home with the kids, that they work because they need the money.

Recognizing the needs of families and the pressures they face, Reform has developed another positive and proactive measure that will address the broader issue of taxation faced by Canadian families. The simplified tax proposal will provide some tax relief for Canadians, simplify the taxation system through the elimination of deductions, exemptions, and tax incentives, and in general promote more economic freedom for families. In particular, our proposal will provide a generous tax exemption for children to account for expenses parents incur in raising children. Such a provision will be particularly important for low income earners and single parent families.

A second important issue related to child support payments in addition to taxation deals with a process for administering the issue of child support payments. Families and marriages often break down under acrimonious and adversarial circumstances. Many parents then resort to an adversarial court system. The current system essentially pits one parent against the other. This is not in the best interests of the parents and it is certainly not in the best interests of the children involved.

Changes to the current system are urgently needed. The Reform proposal addresses this issue. We advocate the implementation of unified family courts. An important part of this proposal is the front end process of mediation and conflict resolution. The unified family court would also resolve the blended jurisdiction of family law, such as child support, custody, and access. Presently, jurisdiction for family issues is divided between levels of court at both federal and provincial levels. The development and implementation of the unified family court would better facilitate all aspects of family law by incorporating them under one roof.

The Reform proposal also addresses the issue of guidelines to determine the level of support awarded. When a family and marriage break down, courts are left to determine what the level of payments for child support should be. However, the problem has been, as my colleague has said, the inconsistency and sometimes unfairness of the level of support awarded. Such inconsistency is unfair to all concerned. To address this inconsistency, our proposal is based on well established legal principles of demonstrated need and ability to pay.

In practical terms, Reform advocates the establishment of nationwide guidelines that will take into consideration the income, taxation, and parenting cost implications for both custodial and non–custodial parents. Nationwide guidelines would have the effect of standardizing the level of support awarded. In doing so they will do much more to ensure fairness for those in the situation.

There is the issue of enforcement and compliance with maintenance orders. The present circumstances are abysmal. For example, in Quebec 25 per cent of non–custodial parents default in paying child support. The phenomenon of default is in part a function of the adversarial system I discussed earlier. A system that perpetuates acrimony and anger is a system that will fail.

Reform's proposal addresses the issue of enforcement across provincial boundaries. We propose the use of the national registry. We will pursue studies to see if this could be co–ordinated through the income tax system. A registry of this type would improve the access to information and effective response desperately needed to improve compliance and enforcement of maintenance orders.

The principle and concept of Bill C–241 is well founded, but more needs to be done to concretely tackle the root causes surrounding issues of child support. Although this bill addresses the issue of taxation, it does not consider this issue of the level of support and the crucial aspect of enforcement and compliance.

The time for action has come. To foster the stability and prosperity for the next generation of parents, children and families, we need to start by reinforcing and strengthening decisions made in this present generation.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me applaud the time, effort and extensive research that has been focused on women, on their families and particularly on the children of our country by the very important work that has been done by our colleague, the member for Nepean, in keeping the government focused on the true needs of Canada's children.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the two speeches by the opposition parties. It gives me a great sense of hope that we will make the kind of enlightened decision that we have been working very hard for over the last number of months. We hope that when the changes are brought forward we will receive the kind of support for the interest and time that we have spent to find the right solutions.

With respect to my friend from Nepean, I think the children of this land can thank her and I thank her for bringing this really important and timely issue to our attention today.

I share the concerns of the member for Nepean that Canada's child support system must be improved. In the spring of 1994, following the decision in the Thibaudeau case, which I think came down in May, our task force was organized, on the road and listening to groups by the end of June or the beginning of July. The government named this small task force to hear the views around this very complex and emotional question.

My colleagues, the member for Winnipeg Centre and the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, and I spent hundreds and hundreds of hours in a very emotional setting hearing the views of parents, both men and women, grandparents, divorced fathers, divorced mothers, leaders of the legal profession, the accounting profession and those who were impacted, such as those in the social services and health network.

The stories of these single parents, the child support payers and those parents in the intact families were so heart rending that one was moved to wonder how the family had been able to cope with the well–being of the child in many cases.

We saw over 550 people. We received over 500 briefs. The information and views that were expressed shaped the report which I brought to cabinet from this task force on child support. I know, my cabinet colleagues know, and in particular the ministers concerned know that we need to present reforms.

However, this is not an easy country to govern. It is vital that we have co–operation and collaboration. We have been working on that. I can guarantee that we will have that commitment to change for the support system. We have been working very hard, constructively and co–operatively over these many months. We have practically completed crafting the right and fair balance in the final analysis for the well–being of the children of this country.

While the government has been very pleased to receive my colleagues' suggestions for improvements to the taxation of child support payments, we must also remember that a system of child support involves a number of elements. We must recognize the necessity of reforming the system as a whole, not just piecemeal. That means considering much needed changes to the amount awarded for child support and the method used to enforce those support orders. Some of these issues fall, as members well know, under provincial jurisdiction.

In addition to fair taxation for child support payments, the parents need a more equitable and simplified system for determining those child support awards. Under such a system, awards could generally be higher through more realistic guidelines to the courts based on the real cost of child rearing and the shared ability of both parents to pay. The variation in award levels in similar family circumstances could therefore be greatly reduced. Frankly, many of the inequities could also be eliminated.

Compliance with court ordered support payments also needs to be improved. It is a sad fact that approximately 60 per cent of support orders are not obeyed. I find that totally abhorrent in the interests of the children and also because it is an abuse of our legal system. That means many single mothers in Canada receive no support payments at all for their children. The cost to society is unfair as many of the families have to resort to welfare. That is unfair for the rest of country.

Our government is committed to bringing forward a comprehensive policy solution which will address each aspect of the child support equation: awards, enforcement, and the taxation of child support payments. We recognize that the taxation of child support payments is perceived as unfair. The rules give a tax deduction to the payer, usually the father, while the custodial parent, usually the mother, pays taxes on the payments and he or she, as the case may be, also bears the partial cost of those supports.

This whole issue is seen as accentuating the problem of poverty particularly among single mothers and is seen as unfair to intact families. We also recognize that some changes are necessary in the complete package.

This government is close to completing its work on child support reforms. We propose to introduce guidelines to increase the award levels. We will put forward a program to improve the enforcement of support orders. We are also completing our review of the tax treatment of child support payments. Our objective is to reform the system for child support so that it is fair, consistent across the land and reflects the best interests of the children wherever they live.

The second facet of Bill C–241 consists of amending the Income Tax Act so that it includes child support payments within the meaning of "earned income" for the purposes of the child care expense deduction.

Allow me to explain the rationale behind the provisions of the Income Tax Act with respect to the child care side of the issue, particularly with regard to child care expenses. The purpose of the child care expense deduction is to recognize for tax purposes the child care expenses that taxpayers must incur in order to earn income, to attend a recognized educational institution full time, or to take a vocational training course.

This deduction is a way for the tax system to acknowledge that these taxpayers have a lower capacity to pay taxes than other taxpayers who have identical incomes but do not have child care expenses. With the changing definition of family and because there are families of a variety of shapes, notwithstanding that we must have that fairness principle in there and recognize that the family is the basis of society.

In a sense the child care expense deduction is a recognition of the contribution to our own future as a society through our children. Under this deduction the income used to pay for child care expenses is not taxable.

Including child support payments in the definition of earned income for the purpose of a child care expense deduction would be a precedent that would make it difficult to deny the same treatment to persons in receipt of income from other sources.

All of this information regarding the current tax system is to say that we need to examine changes to the taxation of child support in a comprehensive way. We need to look at not only the tax side, but also review the issue of enforcement and award levels. Any changes must be done in concert one with the other.

Our challenge is to produce a package of changes in the tax rules, in the setting of awards and in the enforcement of support orders, as I have said, that is fair to all concerned and reflects what is best for our children. The government is acting to meet this challenge. We expect to announce specific changes very shortly. While I admire the intent of the member for Nepean and I agree with her wholeheartedly on the need for these changes, I simply remind this House that we need complete change and that we must get it right.

Most important, when we are pursuing options to change the tax treatment of child support, we must consider only those options that go to the root of the problem. Unfortunately, the member's bill also includes additional changes to the taxation of child support which regretfully make it impossible for the government to support her bill without reservations at this time.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in the House today and speak to Bill C–241 brought forward by the hon. member representing the riding of Nepean.

I was disappointed to hear the previous member speak on behalf of our government. She was speaking of the great intent of the finance department and saying that we must get it right, that we have to take time. Today in this House new legislation for employment was tabled. Sometimes we have to redo legislation. It is very important that we move on this and I do not want to see us delay. We need to move quickly to amend the Income Tax Act so that support payments for children are no longer considered taxable income for the recipients.

Children are our most valuable resource, the most precious asset of our country. I am in favour of investing in their future. All people must realize that by investing in our children we are investing in our own future. Failure to do so will cost us dearly.

Very often the causes of child poverty have been linked to family breakdown. Whatever the causes of child poverty it must be addressed. Principle 2 of the UN Declaration on the Rights of the Child states:

> The child shall enjoy special protection, and shall be given opportunities and facilities, by law and by other means, to enable him to develop physically, mentally, morally, spiritually and socially in a healthy and normal manner and in conditions of freedom and dignity. In the enactment of laws for this purpose, the best interests of the child shall be the paramount consideration.

Child poverty in Canada is disgracefully high. More than one million children in our country live in poverty. These poor children have many unfair obstacles in the path of their lives. Many children of poverty will suffer more illness than other children. They will require more emergency food assistance and they are more likely to become drop–outs from our schools. These unfortunate children through no fault of their own can expect to have a shorter life span. These facts are unbelievable, sad, disgraceful and, I am sorry to say, true.

I call on our Prime Minister, our cabinet and all members of the House to focus on one of the greatest tragedies in the country and one of the greatest tragedies of this century: the neglect of our greatest resource for the future, the children of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my hon. colleagues to look deeply into the hurting faces of some of our young children living in poverty and recognize their hurt. While I do call on all members of the House to focus more on child poverty in this country, I gratefully acknowledge that progress is being made in some areas.

Today the Minister of Human Resources Development introduced a new employment system for Canadians. A family income supplement provides basic protection for low income families. Employment insurance claimants with children and a family income under $26,000 will be eligible for insurance benefits that top up and reflect their family circumstances. The family supplement will be better targeted to low income families and will deliver a larger benefit for those families who are most in need. This is a real step in the right direction.

In most cases Canadian tax laws have created inequities between the payers and the recipients of child support. What other country treats the taxation of child support in this way? The husband contributes money toward the welfare of his children while he is married and the wife is not penalized by additional tax burdens during this period. Therefore, why is there a difference between a parent paying for household necessities while living with their spouse and a parent who is living separate from their spouse who is still paying for the same household necessities? Child support payments are simply a continuation of a father's obligation to support his children when he is divorced. They certainly should not be taxed.

The motion gives us an opportunity to make a significant difference in a meaningful way which will affect the lives of many children in Canada. The average child support order covers less than half of the cost of raising a child. Therefore, it is not fair or just to tax back a large percentage of support payments which are meant to clothe and feed our children. We as legislators in the House of Commons must stand up to introduce further measures of justice and fairness in our tax system, particularly as they relate to the future of our children.

Loving parents will take desperate measures to care and provide for their children. Sacrifices are continually made by mothers. These desperate measures can be very costly to the mothers, to the children and to our country in the long run. Scars can be left on the parents for a long time. Scars of many kinds are left on the children.

I again congratulate and thank the hon. member for Nepean for a commitment to this very important bill. I ask all members of the House to support the bill. It is a bill upon which we should move quickly.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I recognize there are only a few minutes left in the debate. I have spoken previously on this matter. I do not want to repeat what I said at that time, but I do want to reinforce what my hon. colleague has just said.

The poverty of children costs us. As we look for ways to contain the cost of our medical system without reducing the quality and access to care, we have to remember that poor children are four times as likely to become seriously ill and to die. As we seek to keep children in school to improve our ability to compete on the international stage, we have to remember that poor children are four times as likely to drop out of school.

Poverty costs us all. That is why I want to make this point. I have no question that we are going to implement the measure proposed in the bill, to not make child support payments taxable in the hands of the custodial parent. I simply urge the government to recognize that this measure will generate substantial amounts of revenue for the Government of Canada. We have to make the commitment to direct that money explicitly to alleviating the poverty of children.

In 1991 the House adopted a unanimous resolution to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. We are halfway to that target. In fact, the rate of child poverty in Canada has increased rather than decreased. It is now 1.4 million children in Canada who are living in poverty, compared to one million when the House adopted the resolution.

When we generate more revenue from taxing child support payments, as they should be taxed in the hands of the income earner and not the custodial parent, that money should go nowhere but to the children of Canada.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): moved that Bill C–234, an act to amend the Criminal Code (facsimile advertising), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C–234, which I am presenting today, is aimed at preventing the transmission by facsimile of unsolicited advertising for the sale of goods or services to an individual or a company.

The concern I will be addressing applies also to electronic facsimile, electronic mail and even to Internet.

With your permission, I would like to make two points. First, as this House knows, but those watching us may not know this, because this bill is not a votable item, debate on this bill will be over in one hour at the most and there will be no legislative follow–up to my remarks.

However, and this is my second point, the concern I am raising is very real and therefore should be given legislative attention in the near future. In this sense, our debate this morning will get people thinking and ultimately, perhaps, as I would hope, lead to the House adopting in due course legislation that meets the need.

What need? As you know, before I became a member of this House, I had another job. I was in business and I had a fax machine. In the morning, I would collect the faxes received during the night. There were those that had come from Europe, because of the time difference, with their day starting earlier than mine. There were, however, others that had been sent locally and had nothing to do with my company's business interests. I was getting what is commonly known as electronic junk mail.

If it were only occasionally, we could ignore it; if there was only a little bit of it, we could forget about it. But it is a regular happening, and the number of pages printed—at my expense or at the expense of the businesses receiving them, because it is their paper they are printed on—is far from few.

We have to understand the forces at play. The fax machine is an inexpensive way to reach anyone anywhere in the world very quickly. When it is used for telemarketing or advertising, anyone anywhere can flood us with advertising we may or may not need, generally not.

This sort of thing cannot be left strictly to chance. In the area of telephony, as you will recall, overzealous telemarketing has been regulated by the CRTC. Now, companies wishing to call numbers in series must follow the regulations it has established. The situation is not the same with regard to facsimiles.

Faxes have environmental and other disadvantages. A lot of paper is used needlessly, but environmental damage is not the only problem. There are also commercial disadvantages: while your fax machine is receiving unsolicited messages about things in which you are not interested and using up reams of paper in the process, your real clients are unable to communicate with you. You yourself cannot use your own fax machine to communicate with your business interests. There is a conflict between your interests and those of the companies that want to market their products without necessarily asking for your permission beforehand.

Allow me to quote from an Industry Canada document called Privacy and the Canadian Information Highway, which deals with the intrusion of the information highway on privacy: "Citizens may also want to be protected from unwanted communications as a result of purchasing goods on the electronic highway". I am not talking only about faxes, but also about electronic mail and transmission through the information highway.

The document goes on to say: "Disturbances or intrusions by telemarketers or targeted advertising mail is a privacy nuisance that concerns many Canadians. There is already junk' fax, with solicitations over our fax machines for everything from coffee service to holiday trips". Should controls target marketing schemes that result from separate or related purchases, for instance, junk E–mail that follows a purchase of a Caribbean holiday with offers for a next trip?

If so, how? What rules should govern the collection and use of information about what people buy or other personal information transactions? How should these rules be balanced with the opportunity to be made aware of goods or services that people might want and need? The problem is not only the amount of time and paper used by your fax machine in receiving messages from outside parties, but also the fact that some businesses may use your or your company's own consumption profile to transmit targeted, unsolicited ads using your own resources, and may even paralyse your own operations in the process.

There is another aspect: fraudulent advertising. A recent investigation by the Montreal Urban Community Police Department on the First Nations Investors Group uncovered an almost $500,000 rip–off of some 20 residents of the Montreal region. According to police, the suspects recruited their investors mainly through electronic advertising, in particular by sending faxes directly to management consulting firms. Swindlers sent their targets faxes painting an enticing picture of the investment opportunities.

The advertising, in the name of Venture and Financing International Corporation, claimed to offer loans at attractive rates for financing residential or commercial buildings, or 1 per cent less than the rate in effect. Without going into details, this business fraudulently collected $500,000 by using the fax numbers of a highly targeted clientele.

Other uses however may be more desirable, for example, receiving your daily newspaper by fax. It is now possible for a publisher to send his readers, his subscribers, a daily newspaper either by the information highway—on the Internet—or by straight facsimile.

In fact, we know of a publisher who has 300 subscribers at $250 each a year. Mind you, this is very clever; there are no printing fees and no distribution fees, since the printing takes place at the receiving end, on the fax, photocopier or printer of the recipient.

[English]

I recall something that happened in Calgary. A computer specialty outlet refers to fax ads that zip through its machines as annoying junk that usually goes into the garbage. In its experience at least 10 sheets a day of irrelevant news has to be sorted. That is a problem. These things have to be sorted. They cannot just be looked on as junk. It must be sorted because in between these junk mail items could be real messages for business purposes.

From this same source cited by the Calgary Herald, some companies go nuts about fax firms, complaining advertisements invade their fax machines, tie up their lines and use their paper.

Furthermore, a spokesman from AGT says the Alberta phone company has no control over what travels across the lines and bears no responsibility for its customers. In this dimension there is a problem in Calgary, but it is not the only place.

In a law firm in Toronto a late night junk fax once consumed 99 pages of a lawyer's fax paper before the machine ran out. There is an added concern here. If the machine does run out of paper, not only is the paper spoiled but the machine is incapable of receiving additional faxes that could be most important for operations. The machine had been paralyzed by an outside party the company had no business with. The law firm complained that there was no way of contacting anybody to complain.

Some advertisements arrive daily just in case they were missed the previous day and become a major headache for any business. To add to the frustration, even if the offenders can be identified there is no way the offenders can be asked to stop.

There may be some hope somehow, somewhere. The CRTC is apparently under way to get authority to restrict junk faxes this fall. We are at the end of this fall and I do not know where it is at this point. A new national telecommunications act will come into effect. The CRTC unfortunately is still in a state of considering ways to exercise that control. It is not a matter of controlling and regulations; it is a matter of having the technological means to do it.

Bell Canada, which has also received floods of complaints, asked the CRTC to be allowed to disconnect those who make an abusive use of junk faxing. Bell defines this kind of junk faxes as "unsolicited material promoting the sale of goods or services where there is no business relation between the person sending the material and the one receiving it and where this has been going on for over six months".

• (1120)

Bell Canada's proposal is to suspend service for five days to anyone sending junk facsimiles to the same telephone number more than twice in the same month. After suspending service for these reasons three times, the company would consider terminating service permanently.

As you can see, there is a problem. And this problem does not affect just one municipality here and there. It is from coast to coast. Telephone companies are aware of the problem, but they do not have the necessary means of coercion to act on it. The CRTC is reviewing the issue, but does not see how it could be resolved through technology alone.

So I hope that my remarks will have alerted the House to the problem, to how extensive it is and to the need to take action, not in three, four or five years, but as soon as possible. That is my wish.

[English]

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–234, an act to amend the Criminal Code, facsimile advertising. The purpose of the bill is to make it a Criminal Code offence to send unrequested advertisements by facsimile transmission.

The hon. member opposite clearly believes that unsolicited advertisements received by fax can be a nuisance for many people, organizations and businesses, particularly when the advertisements are long, numerous or repetitive. They use up expensive thermal paper and clog up the fax machine which is then not able to send the important messages that need to be sent and so on.

I am sure every member of the House can relate to this and would join in agreement with that problem. However, while unsolicited facsimile material can be a real nuisance, sending it is in my opinion not conduct that should be sanctioned by criminal law.

Bill C–234 proposes to make sending these faxes a criminal act. I cannot agree that making the abuse of a fax machine a criminal offence is an appropriate response. The purpose of criminal law is to contribute to the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society. It has long been recognized that criminal law plays an important role in protecting our social values, but there are other ways of protecting these values.

The abuse of a fax machine and a facsimile transmission is a problem that would be better dealt with using less intrusive, less coercive means and more positive approaches. Although I agree this kind of abuse is a nuisance I cannot get myself to agree this conduct is to be treated with the heavy hand of criminal law.

The past few years have seen a growing concern in the legal community and in society generally with the overcriminalization of our society and of our laws. It may be useful to go back to established principles that may prove to be relevant to the issue at hand. These principles could guide our nation in making a determination as to what ought to be made criminal and what ought to be regulated using less stringent means.

A 1982 report entitled "The Criminal Law in Canadian Society" outlined the policy of the Government of Canada with respect to the appropriate scope and basic principles of the criminal law. A clear statement is included in the report:

> The criminal law ought to be reserved for reacting to conduct that is truly harmful—Criminal law should only be used when the harm caused or threatened is serious, and when the other, less coercive or intrusive means do not work or are inappropriate.

With that view, with those lenses and regarding those words of advice and direction, does the act of sending unrequested advertisements by facsimile transmission seriously harm people or organizations? We will all agree it is an annoyance, but is it harmful to the point of requiring this be made criminal with all the attendant consequences like criminal records, problems getting into education and problems obtaining employment? Certainly not in my view. It may be a nuisance or an inconvenience, but I doubt there is ever any serious harm done. Does the act of sending unrequested advertisements by fax so seriously contravene our fundamental values as to be harmful to society? Of course not.

Therefore it seems clear this conduct does not fall within the proper scope of criminal law. If the criminal justice system is to remain an effective mechanism for the protection of social values it is important that it not be overburdened. We all understand that our court system is overburdened today. Caution is therefore appropriate in creating new criminal offences. That caution makes me conclude that it would be inappropriate for the House to use such a blunt instrument as criminal law.

I raise another concern with the bill. It proposes to make the sending of unrequested advertisements by fax a punishable offence. Any person found guilty of committing this offence would be liable to a fine not exceeding $200. At first glance this small fine does not seem to constitute excessive interference with individual liberty and freedom.

However, we must remember, especially in the House and especially today with what we know to be true in the country, that subsection 787(2) of the Criminal Code provides that if one fails to pay a fine the court may order the defendant to be imprisoned for a period of up to six months. In effect, this offence is potentially punishable by up to six months imprisonment. This would be unjustifiable state interference with individual liberty. I seriously doubt that making it a criminal offence to send these faxes is truly necessary to achieve justice and to protect Canadian society.

I must also express my concern with respect to the current wording of the bill. It does not clearly define the limits of the offence. For example, the bill would prohibit the sending of unrequested facsimile communication advertising for sale any goods or service. Unrequested by whom? Do the words "advertising for sale" make it a crime to try to sell something? Is it all right to try to rent something or whatever else? These words remain entirely open to interpretation. It is also unclear who exactly is responsible, the employer, the employee or both.

I repeat my concern. The fundamental principles of individual rights and freedoms demand that criminal offences be very clearly defined. The bill is open to a range of interpretations and yet proposes to create a new criminal offence. Criminal law cannot operate in such an arbitrary manner. The bill as it stands is not clearly drafted and would make punishable many actions and situations not criminal in nature.

I express my sympathy again with the sentiments of the bill. Most of us have experienced firsthand that receiving unsolicited commercial facsimile transmissions can be a nuisance. However, as I have explained today, the bill raises several fundamental concerns. I am convinced it is inappropriate to create a new Criminal Code offence prohibiting the sending of unrequested advertisements by facsimile transmission to individuals or companies.

Criminal law is not the appropriate instrument to deal with this nuisance. Criminal law must only be used when it is clearly necessary to achieve justice and to protect the full interests of society. It may be possible to identify more appropriate and less intrusive means of dealing with this problem, which I might be able to support, but I cannot support the creation of a Criminal Code offence for the purpose stated in this private member's bill.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. She touched on some very important concerns raised by the bill. I agree that the inconvenience caused by this kind of advertising is significant and will become more significant. However, I question whether the Criminal Code is the appropriate instrument to deal with this nuisance. Basically that is what it is, a costly nuisance. Ought we as legislators to be creating a criminal offence out of what basically is a nuisance? I do not think we should be.

If this matter is going to be dealt with, it ought to be dealt with under the Communications Act. That is the proper area where we should be looking at restricting this kind of advertising, if that is the wish of Canadians.

For the information of those who are watching this debate I would like to read exactly what the bill states. It is very clearly covered in clause 1:

> Every one who sends to a person or organization through a telephone network an unrequested facsimile communication advertising for sale any goods or service is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and is liable to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars.

We saw what happened when the government attempted to curtail the advertising of cigarettes and tobacco products. From my understanding that was turned back because it violated freedom of speech and so on. Would this fall into that category as well? It may or may not, but it is certainly a question that would have to be addressed.

How would this affect advertising? Would this apply to the Internet as well where there is no costly intervention? As the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill pointed out, reams and reams of paper are consumed by those who are not interested in this kind of advertising. What about the Internet? It seems that it may in many ways be replacing the fax machine. Would this apply to the Internet? According to my understanding of what I just read in the bill it would.

We have to ask whether businesses are willing and prepared to create a negative attitude toward their product by antagonizing those very people they are contacting by advertising their goods and services. Are they willing to do that? In other words, are the pressures of the free market system not adequate to keep this thing from getting too far out of hand, the whole idea of seeing reams and reams of advertising they want nothing to do with on the fax machine in the morning?

Eventually there is going to be a backlash to this if it gets beyond a certain point. The advertisers will see that it is harming their product and the image and the profile of their company. Ought we not leave this kind of matter in the hands of the consumers who, when they are fed up with this kind of thing, will surely let the sponsors of the advertising know where they stand on it?

What about the benefit? Surely there has to be some benefit derived from this kind of advertising, otherwise they would not be doing it. Should we deny the people who are receiving some benefit from this advertising by introducing this legislation?

I do not have much more to say about the bill. The hon. member from the government side covered it very adequately. I can dispense with my concern about it falling into the area of the Criminal Code. The bill should come under the Communications Act.

We should let the market forces deal with this kind of issue. If we as legislators are to look at this kind of practice, it should not be criminalized. Simply sending advertising over the telephone lines should not be a criminal offence. If it is to be prohibited at all, it ought to be done under the Communications Act.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to rise to speak to the motion but I think the member for Portneuf is to be congratulated in the sense that he has certainly isolated a problem of the modern age.

I have encountered that problem in a way everyone in the House of Commons has experienced it which is directly related to the business we do. In my constituency office there have been occasions where my fax machine has been jammed for an hour or so receiving about 30 pages of talking points on some piece of government legislation. The irony is I would have already heard that information from caucus debates but occasionally, staff members in the ministries get a little carried away and send us more fax material than what we really want. I see some members are very sympathetic to this point and I am sure members of the opposition have the same problem.

I quite agree with the earlier speakers that this is not something which is best addressed by amendments to the Criminal Code. When we do get into the business of in any way limiting freedom of expression, freedom of publication and freedom of speech by the use of the force of law, we run all kinds of dangers with respect to a fundamental liberty.

In the case of the use of facsimile machines for sending junk mail, as the member for Portneuf said, who defines whether it is junk mail or something else? He did not attempt to cover the question of facsimile transmissions received that contain pornographic material or deliberate untruths. If we attempt to regulate this it is very like pornographic material. There is a blurred line that we can never be sure of where we invade into the area of genuine freedom of expression.

Similarly I reject the suggestion of the member for Portneuf that the CRTC should get into this field and come up with some kind of regulation that could be imposed on the distributors of this type of junk mail by facsimile machine. The reason is similar to that of putting it in law as a Criminal Code offence. We run great perils as a society when we give arm's length bodies control over how we express ourselves.

The CRTC after all is an unelected body. It is a body that is at arm's length from government. It is a body that is at arm's length from the people. It is very dangerous to give it any more power than it has already. I have to say I am not a great fan of the CRTC. I feel in many respects it is out of touch with the communication needs of the country. It indeed needs to be reviewed.

For myself, the solution to the problem is to come from the marketplace. The solution is essentially technological. We will see some bright inventor or perhaps some industrial giant develop a code system. An individual's fax machine will have a secret code which, when it is contacted by an external fax machine, will not permit reception unless the code is given by the sending fax machine. I am fairly confident this is on the horizon.

I have some interest in the whole question of communications intelligence. I can say with some authority that a great deal of research has been done in Canada, the United States and Britain in the communications security establishments which exist in those countries on the whole question of the security of facsimile transmissions and all kinds of electronic transmissions. The possibility of having a password or code on a receiving machine is very much within the realm of an immediate possibility.

The idea is very similar to call display on a telephone which is a relatively recent innovation of the telephone companies. Call display can be bought from Bell Canada, as can the option of not having call display. With that option, a person's identity is kept secret and nothing appears on the call display when phoning another person. That same technique could be used on a facsimile machine. A secret numerical code could prevent a facsimile machine from receiving a transmission.

This will all come from market forces which, as the member for Crowfoot suggested, are to be key in this. It was mentioned that we are now in the era where copies of newspapers will be delivered electronically to fax machines. It will be perfectly useless if a newspaper is going to be in competition with every other newspaper for a fax machine. The only way the delivery of newspapers by fax will work is if the newspaper can respond to a secret password on a fax machine.

In the end it will be market forces. It will be technology that will solve this problem. I congratulate the member for Portneuf for bringing the matter forward because this is the place where the issues of the day must be debated. We must show that we are au courant with the issues of the day and bring solutions to some of the problems which confront us from time to time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Since no other member wishes to speak on the issue and since the motion is not a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired and the item is dropped from the Order Paper, pursuant to Standing Order 96.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think you might find a disposition to suspend the sitting until noon, when Government Orders would proceed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the wish of the House to suspend the sitting until 12 p.m.?

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.44 a.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11.58 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BALKANS

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.) moved:

That this House take note and welcome the recent Dayton peace agreement and the international community's continued efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans, and Canadian support of these efforts by participation in a multinational military implementation force (IFOR) under NATO command.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the announcement on November 21 that the leaders of Bosnia, Hercegovina, Serbia and Croatia had reached a formal agreement on peace has provided a glimmer of hope not seen in the Balkans for a long time.

After four years of bitter fighting, internecine strife and degradation, we have seen the parties come together to try to effect a peace settlement. It is now time for all of them to step out of the shadow of war. They are not there yet. A lot of work has to be done. Although we have an agreement on paper, the challenge is to ensure that the agreement is properly enforced.

A NATO led peace implementation force authorized by the United Nations will be the key to the next stage of the peace process. Its most important job will be to ensure compliance among the warring parties on the ground with the military aspects of the agreement. Without this force, the agreement runs a serious risk of collapsing.

Our task today is not to debate a possible Canadian involvement in the Balkan peace implementation force. Our task today is to debate the nature and the form of that commitment. Canada is by no means legally bound to send any troops to assist NATO in a given mission. Nothing in the NATO treaty legally binds us to such a contribution. However, we have a moral obligation to participate in this newly expanded NATO operation and this new operation will demonstrate the relevance of NATO in the post cold war era.

In the white paper published last spring following the consultations of the joint parliamentary committee on national defence and the foreign affairs committee, we made a commitment to continue our involvement in NATO. We believe that we have an obligation when all of our allies in NATO are agreeing to participate in this force to be there with them, shoulder to shoulder. The question is to what degree. Those are the views we would like to have from members today.

This is another example of how the government, led by the Prime Minister, has reverted to an earlier tradition of allowing Parliament to participate in the whole decision making process on how troops are deployed and how our foreign policy obligations are engaged.

We have had a number of debates in the last little while and I believe today's debate will be most significant.

Over the last four years, Canada has played a significant role in the international community's efforts to deal with the war in the former Yugoslavia. These efforts have been carried out primarily through the United Nations and NATO.

Canadian military personnel have helped prevent the conflict from spreading to other parts of the region and from becoming even more brutal. They have also helped save countless lives by assisting in the delivery of humanitarian relief supplies and by preventing more massive assaults on civilian populations.

As always, our personnel have served with courage, dedication and professionalism.

[English]

Canada has a dedicated, professional and devoted armed forces. All Canadians know that and respect and appreciate them.

With the peace process now moving into a new phase, we believe that Canada should be there. The Canadian forces, contrary to the remarks of some of our critics, are ready to serve in that implementation force.

I need hardly remind members of the expertise and the experience of Canada worldwide in peacekeeping missions since 1947. We have an impressive record by anyone's standards.

Today I have two particular functions in the debate. The first is to briefly remind members of the great contribution Canada has made to peace operations in Yugoslavia in the last few years. That is what leads us to continue the march toward peace by becoming involved in the implementation force.

Second, I believe I am obliged to provide members with some information on the proposed implementation force.

[Translation]

Canada has taken a leading role in efforts to bring about a peaceful end to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia and to provide relief to its victims.

In September 1991, Canada led the call for the UN Security Council to deal with these issues.

Canada also responded favourably to UN requests for Canadian Forces personnel to be deployed as part of a peace operation in the region.

Our military contribution was a mix of many elements of our land, sea and air combat capability.

• (1205)

On land, our contribution came to include a battalion group in Croatia, a battalion group in Bosnia–Herzegovina, a logistics battalion on the Dalmatian Coast in Croatia, as well as military observers and personnel for various headquarters positions.

[English]

Canada has contributed to NATO operations in the air, on the ground and on the sea in the no–fly area over Bosnia–Hercegovina. Our ships have been off the Adriatic coast. Canadians have been in the various headquarters of the United Nations and have been involved with some NATO forces that have been deployed.

The mandate has evolved over the last four years. I will leave it to some of my colleagues to fill in the details of the great contribution that Canada has made in trying to stabilize the situation in Bosnia.

Canadian troops opened up the Sarajevo airport in 1992. Canadian troops were among the first to participate in the protection of humanitarian convoys in the fall of 1992. Canadians were the first to deploy in the former Yugoslavian republic of Macedonia in what has been the only example of a successful preventive deployment by the UN. Canadians were there when they were asked to become involved.

Who could forget what Canadians did in the spring of 1993? Troops were sent to the tiny enclave of Srebrenica which was besieged by Bosnian Serb artillery and troops. They held out for months and months. They were followed by our Dutch friends in NATO before that terrible event occurred this summer which precipitated the outcry of people in the world and the international community that forced a change of tactics, a change of strategy, to become more robust in dealing with the flagrant disregard for international order. It spawned a very important initiative by the British Prime Minister in July in London and subsequently led to the American organized peace effort which has resulted in the peace implementation of today.

The United States has to be congratulated for the role it has taken in bringing the parties together, in overcoming so many differences and in getting us to the point where we can at last see a long term peace which is not too far ahead of us, provided we do the right things.

Canada has been in a number of operations. I will continue to refresh the memory of members. The Canadian Hercules aircraft was the lifeline into Sarajevo, Operation Air Bridge. I was in the cockpit of one of those planes when suddenly enemy radar fixed on us. As a civilian I was really scared that day, but the Canadian pilots in that plane said: "Don't worry, they are just testing our mettle. They won't dare shoot us down".

Every day for months Canadian air crews participated in bringing in needed supplies. It was the only flight into Sarajevo. It was ships of the Royal Canadian Navy that enforced the embargo, enforced the sanctions off the Adriatic coast. I had the opportunity to be on HMCS Iroquois, one of our destroyers in that area, to see the kind of work they did in successfully capping the flow of arms and other strategic goods into that country.

Finally, Canada also has been involved in reconnaissance work with Aurora patrol aircraft. Canadian crews have been on the NATO AWACS providing information and Canadians have been involved in Operation Deny Flight.

Canadians have been there. They know the terrain. They know the circumstances. They know the people. They know the culture. That is why it is logical for Canadians to be part of the international effort led by NATO to try to bring some order to this very difficult situation, to enforce a peace, to make sure the peace plan is implemented properly.

That agreement is very impressive. It has three elements to it which cover constitutional, territorial and military issues.

[Translation]

Constitutionally, Bosnia will remain a single state, whose boundaries will be those already recognized by the international community. It will be made up of two entities: the Muslim–Croat federation and the Bosnian Serb republic.

• (1210)

It will be a loosely structured union, whose presidency will alternate. The central government will be responsible for foreign policy, trade, customs, monetary policy and so on. The agreement is generally in keeping with the land division agreed to by the parties, that is to say 51/49 per cent in favour of the federation.

As far as Sarajevo is concerned, Bosnian Serbs are to transfer to the Bosnian government control over the suburbian areas north and west of the city, thereby joining the city to the area controlled by the federation. A corridor 8 to 15 kilometres wide will link the safe area of Gorazde and Sarajevo.

[English]

On the military side, all foreign forces except UN troops are to withdraw within 30 days of the formal signing of the agreement, which will be in Paris later this month. This is a provision requested by the Bosnian government and it does include Croatian government forces. The agreement also calls for the withdrawal of all heavy weapons to barracks behind a four–kilometre zone of separation within 120 days.

Although the Bosnian–Serb leadership was not involved directly in the Serb negotiations, it was reported that the terms of agreement had been accepted. We see some nuances to that acceptance now playing out, but a deal is a deal and this deal will be enforced by the NATO led troops that will be sent.

This is an historic agreement, but future conflict cannot be ruled out. Let us not fool Canadians. This is a dangerous place. There are ambiguities in the peace accord and old antagonisms will not disappear overnight.

We believe that the NATO led peace implementation force is critical to the peace process. I would like to share with my colleagues a few details about the force.

NATO has already agreed and started to deploy the advance parties to its force, with the agreement of all parties concerned. By deploying these troops now, NATO will be in a position to start deploying its main forces very soon after the UN security council passes a resolution authorizing NATO to proceed with the implementation of the military aspects of the peace plan. I should state, to clear up any ambiguity which may arise in press reports, that there are 11 Canadians among the advance troops. These Canadians are among the hundreds which are seconded to NATO and, therefore, are obliged to be part of NATO operations.

There will be some Canadians on the ground, if not at this moment then very shortly, but within the context of the NATO commitment which is ongoing and to which we are a signatory under the NATO treaty. I emphasize that it is not the implementation force contribution that we are debating today.

The plans for the force have been debated. They have been provisionally approved by the North Atlantic Council and they will be given final approval after the security council resolution has been passed. This plan calls for 60,000 people to be part of the forces. It will be divided into three main divisions: the British, French and American command areas.

It is very crucial that we understand the objectives of the force. They are to ensure compliance with the military aspects of the peace agreement. In particular, the withdrawal of forces to the respective territories is set out in the agreement and the establishment of agreed lines of separation of those forces.

Second, UN forces currently deployed must be withdrawn. Third, other non–military tasks arising from the peace accord must be carried out. The UN, the European Union and the Organization for Security and Co–operation in Europe will join in carrying out civilians tasks.

[English]

This is an operation that will conduct its duties under chapter VII of the UN charter, which allows for the use of all necessary means to fulfil the mission, in other words, robust rules of engagement. I assure the House that the Canadian government will have the final say on all rules of engagement being used by Canadian forces.

Canada has contributed a lot in the last seven days to the development of these rules of engagement. In particular, I pay tribute to our military staff, led by the Chief of Defence Staff John de Chastelain, who last week with his NATO colleagues in Brussels hammered out the rules of conduct and the rules of engagement which reflect Canada's concerns.

I do not have to paint a graphic picture here. We have had considerable experience in difficult situations in the last few years. We have learned about the application of force, when it should be used, to whom and in what circumstances. I am pleased to say that those experiences were taken into account in the development of the rules of engagement for this protective force.

About 40,000 of the 60,000 troops will be provided by the United States, Great Britain and France. The Russians are also making a significant contribution. It is not just all the major powers. Middle powers like Canada will also be playing a role. Every one of our allies, except Iceland, which has no armed forces, will be participating.

Among the non–NATO nations, as I have indicated, Russia will be there. A Russian brigade will operate in the American sector under a Russian commander, who will report directly to the supreme allied commander of Europe, General Joulwan, an American, rather than through the NATO chain of command. Russia has also offered an engineering and mine clearing brigade, which will operate outside the NATO led implementation force.

Who could have imagined about six or seven years ago, certainly not ten years ago, that we would have Russian troops deployed in Europe serving in the cause of peace under an American commander? The world is certainly moving in the right direction. Our friends in Russia should be congratulated for putting aside any concerns they have and being committed to peace and involved in such a way in this effort.

I would add that the implementation force will serve to test NATO's ability to carry out new types of missions requiring co–operation between its own forces and other forces, such as Russian and eastern and central European forces. This co–operation will be an invaluable first step in establishing an effective European security system for the post cold war era.

Like all peacekeeping operations, this one contains an element of risk, which will depend on the parties' desire to comply with the peace accord. The rigours of winter and the poor condition of the roads in the region represent other dangers.

[English]

I know the critics will ask what this will cost. It will not be cheap. It will cost $10 billion Canadian for this entire operation to be put in place. Funding arrangements have yet to be settled, but it seems likely that participants will cover their own deployment and maintenance costs. Common funding will be reserved for common facilities such as the force headquarters, which will amount to about $200 million American.

Canada will be required to cover its share of the common funding cost even where it is not to participate in the force. At a minimum, this will come to about $20 million. The cost of participation will depend on the nature and size of the forces. That is why we are anxious to hear about the feelings of members of Parliament who are in touch with their constituents and know the degree to which they want Canada involved in this operation.

We are currently considering options that would cost in the range of $20 million to $50 million. However, do not believe anyone who says this is a done deal. The fact is that we want to get the feeling from Parliament before cabinet decides on Wednesday as to the actual number of people we will deploy in this particular force.

At the moment the plan calls for the replacement of the NATO implementation force with non–NATO forces after 12 months.

A senior officer will be appointed to co–ordinate the civilian aspects of the peace plan, which will include economic recovery, humanitarian assistance, refugees, elections, human rights, arms control and disarmament.

Upon request, force commanders may assist the United Nations and humanitarian organizations in such activities as maintaining public order, clearing mines and transporting rations. However, their prime responsibility will be the military aspects of the accord.

[English]

In the very limited time available, I have tried to provide the House some information on the force as it is presently being constituted. We obviously look forward to the views of individual members of the House before we make the decision.

• (1220)

From a philosophical point of view, the government thinks Canadians understand that our interests and values as a nation depend on world stability, on a stable international order. That is why we have made such a firm commitment over the years to promote international peace and security. The foreign policy and defence reviews conducted in 1994 confirm this commitment. This commitment is shared by all parties in the House. Indeed all parties were generally in agreement with the direction of Canadian foreign and defence policies in those two reviews in 1994.

We cannot shut our eyes to parts of the world where instability and conflict have taken root. Even if we are not directly affected by events taking place far from us, we will, over the longer term, feel less safe if we ignore them. This is a lesson history has shown us a number of times this century.

Hence Canada's passionate defence of multilateral institutions, such as the UN, and its active participation in peacekeeping operations. We know the importance of working with our allies and with like–minded countries to promote international peace and stability, whether in Europe or in other areas of the world.

[English]

We have a well deserved reputation for being there when it counts. Just look at our peacekeeping record. If Canada is to continue to play an effective role on the world stage, it is critical that we maintain that reputation, which means contributing to international efforts aimed at enhancing global security.

I believe the conflict in the Balkans represents the gravest threat to international security in that area since the second world war. We have spoken of the dangers of this conflict being allowed to engulf Europe. Without the United Nations presence in Bosnia and Croatia and in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, it is not inconceivable that hundreds of thousands of more people would have died, that atrocities would have been committed in a greater number than those already committed, that Europe would have been inflamed from the Aegean to the Alps. That would be a precursor to a large European war, a war that would inevitably have dragged in other nations around the world for their own interests.

As we are at the dawning of the 21st century, no civilized nation can allow that kind of conflict to continue in one of the most civilized parts of the world. It is bitter irony that 50 years after the conclusion of the second world war the Canadian Parliament is having yet another debate, as it did 60 some years ago, about participating in a major European operation.

We have been there while the war in effect has raged all around us. Now we have a peace accord, which has its weaknesses, but it is the only peace accord we have. We have to make it work.

It is fine for us as Canadians to pound our chests and yell from the hilltops about world peace, world stability and world security, but unless we are prepared to do something about it as Canadians and put our money where our mouth is, to commit our own resources and commit our own people, then I think our cries ring somewhat hollow. As a founding member of NATO and a major contributor to the alliance over the years, Canada is expected to participate in this historic mission.

I note our friends in the Reform Party are saying we should not go. They are somewhat reticent about this involvement. This party supported our continuation in the NATO alliance. When we make a deal with people, when we have a friendly alliance, we do not walk out on them when times get tough. We do not renege on our commitments. I do not believe Canadians want the government to renege on our commitments, to turn our back on 50 years of co–operation, 50 years of success in building an organization that contributed over that period to peace and stability in Europe.

Any contribution Canada will make will be modest. I have talked about a price tag of maybe $20 million, $50 million or $60 million, depending on how we decide on the actual figures for deployment. We believe Canadians are prepared to pay that price. We will be involved in the British sector with Pakistan. I believe Holland is in there. The Czech republic will be there. In fact the British government has asked Canada to provide the headquarters.

What better compliment for Canadian involvement than that one of our major allies, who will be providing the overwhelming number of troops in that sector, has such respect for the Canadian men and women in our armed forces that they want Canadians to head up the brigade headquarters. That is a great compliment and it is something the government will certainly consider. I would like to hear the views of the members in the House about that involvement.

We have options of supplying an infantry battalion. We have options for a signal squadron. We have options for artillery. All those kinds of deployments can be made. We want to hear the views of the members of the House to see if we are in accord, as we think we are, with the views of Canadians and we are willing to make this commitment.

At a time when the public, the media and others are closely examining the Canadian military, we must recall that it is an indispensable national institution. It is a reflection of this country.

[Translation]

It is a reflection of our Canadian culture and its tradition of two official languages.

[English]

The military is also an instrument through which the country can achieve its objectives both at home and abroad. We saw that this weekend when we saw the crew of HMCS Calgary come to the aid of a distressed ship off our Atlantic coast and the heroics of a member of the helicopter crew. I hate to inform my friends in the House that it was a Sea King helicopter. They actually do work. That master corporal went back time and time again on the end of a rope in storming seas to a listing ship with desperate people. He pulled them up one by one and took them to a waiting ship. Those are the heroics of the men and women who serve in Canada's armed forces.

We heard about that this weekend because it is a significant contribution, but every day men and women of the armed forces serve proudly both in Canada and outside Canada. What do we hear? We hear the negative complaints. We hear the petty criticism of administrative lapses, which occur in any large organization. We hear talk about terrible morale. I would say the morale of all Canadians has been affected in the last few years, because we are having to deal with a difficult financial situation, a difficult global competitive situation, getting our own house in order, and we are also having to deal with a national unity issue that once again is preoccupying us.

Canadians are somewhat introspective. They are perhaps not having morale problems but are somewhat concerned. That also goes in the armed forces. Any organization that has had a salary freeze for the last couple of years, whose catch–up to the normal public service increment was also caught in that freeze and is something we are trying to deal with, obviously will be affected.

Perhaps more than anything else that contributes to any morale problems we have in the armed forces is the incessant criticism day in and day out by armchair critics, many of them in the House of Commons and most of them in the Reform Party, who are attacking the men and women in the armed forces and the job they do. That is unconscionable.

We have one of the best armed forces in the world. We have men and women who put their lives on the line. They will put their lives on the line for anybody. They do not care whether those people hold separatist beliefs or whether those people hold Neanderthal philosophical beliefs like those of the Reform Party. They will put their lives on the line for a free and democratic society. That is what we have in the Canadian Armed Forces. Those men and women, I assure the House, will be ready, willing and able to serve in this force.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the defence minister's final flight of oratory hardly befits this morning's debate in my opinion. This is the third debate held in this House on the participation of Canadian troops in Bosnia under the aegis of the UN.

As you know, in February 1994, the defence minister said that he had a duty to provide as much information as possible to MPs and to Canadians on Canada's participation in peacekeeping missions, and to truly inform people of all relevant implications.

As in the two previous debates, the Bloc can only recognize and support Canada's participation in peacekeeping missions. As the defence minister emphatically pointed out, Quebeckers and Canadians who are members of the Canadian armed forces have frequently been honoured for their role in peacekeeping missions. I think everyone agrees here that they do their job to the best of their knowledge, and that they do their utmost to ensure the success of these missions.

They also have expectations of their own. The defence minister said earlier that it is important, in this debate, to hear what the public and the military have to say through members of this House. It seems clear to me that, during such a debate, certain rules should be clarified. Throughout my presentation, I will refer to comments made by the minister.

On November 23, the Prime Minister said, after meeting with Mr. Boutros–Ghali, that Canada had a duty to participate in the peacekeeping effort, following the Dayton agreement, adding that such participation, including the number of troops to be sent, would have to be determined. This morning, I expected the defence minister to provide more details on what the government and his department have planned.

I was briefed by National Defence officials, whom I want to thank, and was told that there were a number of scenarios which cost anywhere from $2 million to some $70 or $75 million, and which require the participation of 50 to 3,000 troops in the international NATO–led implementation force. This morning, I thought the minister would suggest a specific scenario which, in his opinion, reflects what the public is prepared to support as regards such missions, and what our forces can do.

The minister said that we must fulfil certain commitments made to NATO. Indeed, whenever NATO participates in missions, its members must provide 1,000 troops. Is that a minimum or a maximum? Do we send 1,000 combat troops, or can we send military personnel for various tasks? The minister should have been a little more specific since, in a debate such as this one, he not only informs members of this House, but also the public at large.

I did not hear anything in his speech about the direction we might take. Later on in the debate, I will suggest a few avenues to the minister which may be of help to him.

In his speech, the Minister of National Defence quite justifiably listed all of Canada's military contributions from the onset of the conflict during the summer of 1991, throughout 1992, the opening of the Sarajevo airport, Canadian forces' participation with NATO aircraft, all of the Hercules transport flights, participation in the Adriatric embargo, and so on.

I say justifiably, because Canada has indeed made an extraordinary contribution to this conflict, and has always been equal to the task in traditional peacekeeping missions: to civilian population monitoring of humanitarian convoys, assistance, food shipments, food convoys, communications, etc. For anything connected to traditional peacekeeping, as the minister has said, Canadian expertise is recognized throughout the world. There is no problem in this regard; our military does an outstanding job and everybody acknowledges it, including the people of Canada and Quebec.

However, I see this type of mission as a radical turnaround. We will now be governed by chapter VII of the UN Charter instead of chapter VI; this allows far more latitude for interventions, military or otherwise. According to U.S. Secretary of Defence William Perry, once the NATO contingent is in place in Bosnia, if we run into any difficulties in implementing certain provisions of the Dayton peace accord, we will just implement them by force, and we will respond in kind to any attack.

Now this has absolutely no connection with the peacekeeping missions in which Canada has been involved in the past. This is a totally new ball game. The Bloc Quebecois and the people of Quebec and of Canada have concerns about the change in the nature of our mission.

In the same vein, I would like to add that perhaps making comparisons is unwise. Unfortunately, the minister focussed on the attractive aspects of peacekeeping missions, listing results achieved by the Canadian army and Canada in a number of peacekeeping missions, results that cannot always be readily measured. There are, however, some things that have to be looked at when playing under different rules. When the minister referred just now to Canadian participation in the discussions on the rules of engagement under chapter VII, I would have liked to hear him specify what those rules of engagement will be if Canada does commit under NATO auspices to taking part in this new peacekeeping mission to implement the Dayton accord.

From logistics or linguistics point of view, it struck me that the mission now being organized under NATO is not called a "peace mission" but rather "peace enforcement mission".

Going back in time a bit, as I recall, the Americans' mission to Somalia was also labelled "peace enforcement". We cannot ignore the fact that this additional connotation of "peace enforcement" on top of the traditional "peacekeeping mission" bears some similarity to what happened in Somalia. Far be it from me to go back over the unfortunate events involving the Canadians, the Belgians and even the Americans, but as soon as things started to heat up, the U.S. pulled out and left Canada, Belgium and other countries holding the bag, which led to major problems, unfortunately.

I think, and it is also the position of the Bloc Quebecois, that the change in mandate must be made very clear. The last time NATO organized a mission under the auspices of the UN dates back to the war in Cyprus.

You may think my analogies are a bit far fetched but the fact is that nothing in the Canadian military's experience in peacekeeping missions has prepared us for the kind of participation to which we are committing ourselves or was ever approved or accepted by the people of Quebec and Canada.

I think it is important to say this and to be prepared to consider all eventualities. In any case, the Dayton agreement divides certain territories—Bosnia, Croatia and Serbia—and was signed by representatives from Bosnia, Serbia and Croatia.

One of the problems in Bosnia around Sarajevo is that the so–called chiefs of Pale, Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic, the military chief, did not sign this agreement. Only yesterday we saw on the news that Mr. Mladic, the military chief heads a group that is opposed to the Dayton agreement. For at least two years they thumbed their noses at the UN's resolutions, brought their heavy weapons near the perimeter of Sarajevo and then withdrew them after a number of air strikes, playing cat and mouse with the UN. Now an agreement has been signed and these people are still there on the outskirts of Sarajevo. In fact, the self–styled Bosnian Serb Republic headed by Mr. Karadzic has so far been very inconsistent in its acceptance and has always been rather hard to pin down.

Another argument which casts some doubt on the security of the mission and I believe amplifies certain problems is the fact that the UN set up a war crimes tribunal. Recently, eleven judges from six different countries took part in the proceedings and convicted Mr. Mladic and Mr. Karadzic of war crimes.

Based on international opinion, various experts in diplomacy or international law or crimes against humanity suggest that peace will not have a chance until these people have been convicted.

As far as I know, those people who were at the root of the conflict in Bosnia never accepted the Dayton agreement and are already preparing to sabotage the process. I do not think it will be very pleasant or even easy to impose anything at all, because I do not see this as a peacekeeping mission but more as a mission to impose peace.

I think that in this House, parliamentarians have a duty to make it clear to the public and to other parliamentarians that this means a change in what the extraordinary reputation of Canadian peacekeepers is built on. It will be a different application.

A previous change has unfortunately produced the kind of incidents we saw in Somalia, and I think it is a shame they were allowed to happen.

My second point is the economic considerations. I think we all agree, and perhaps this is less true of members of the third party, that Canada has a duty to take part in these peacekeeping missions, to deal with the conflicts that arise in various countries throughout the world.

I think it is important to tell the House and the public what all this costs. The public realizes that when the government says: "We have soldiers, they need practice, we have equipment we use", all that costs money. However, in the past three years, in 1993, 1994 and 1995 which is now drawing to a close, we were $517 million over budget in Bosnia, which includes humanitarian aid and military spending as well.

This morning, the minister mentioned that costs might vary from $30 million to $50 million, depending on what the government decided. I found this hard to believe, because at the height of Canada's participation we had around 2,100 soldiers with the peacekeeping forces in Bosnia and Croatia and we were over budget. In other words, it cost more than would normally have been expected, about $170 million per year more over a period of three years, for a total of $517 million.

And now the government wants to either maintain or reduce Canada's participation, at a cost of say 30, 50 or 70 million, and if they send up to 3,000 soldiers, we are talking about $75 million. When at the height of Canada's participation, it cost us an additional $170 million for 2,100 soldiers, then how can it possibly cost $75 million for 3,000 soldiers? I find it hard to follow the calculations of the Minister of National Defence, and I think some clarification is in order. In fact, it should even be incumbent on the government to provide this clarification. It must be more precise.

When we decide to participate in these missions, guided by our suggestions or those of the Reform Party, and the government says that we will meet our commitment to NATO and provide, say 1,000 soldiers, it should tell us exactly how much more that will cost. I am not talking about costs pertaining to soldiers in the regular forces who are already getting their salary. Not those costs. But we must clearly stipulate the additional costs that can be expected. What is also needed is a clear indication of the duration of the mandate and the rules of engagement over which, as the minister said earlier, Canada would have the last say, but I would have appreciated some further indication from the minister.

As far as Canadian aid is concerned, I would like to refer to a statement by the Minister of Foreign Affairs who said that Canadian aid might not necessarily be military. We have seen no indication of this option in the approach taken by the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of Foreign Affairs said that we could, for instance, take part in certain humanitarian missions through funding or by receiving immigrants. We know that since the beginning of this conflict in 1991, nearly 250,000 people have died in Bosnia and nearly 800,000 are trying to leave to get away from their wartime experiences and tragedies in their own families, with many killed or wounded. And there are also quite a few people who were maimed as a result of bombings, mines or sniper fire.

Bosnia greatly needs all kinds of help, but we in the Bloc wonder if our armed forces' ceaseless efforts are still needed. I can tell you that about two weeks ago at CFB Valcartier in my riding, the soldiers coming back from peacekeeping missions in Croatia looked a little tired. Some of them were on their fifth mission, others on their fourth or third, and I can tell you that a number of them have experienced psychological problems, family problems, all kinds of problems.

Once again, we are being asked to step up our effort because, as the defence minister said earlier, Canada has been continuously involved since 1992. We must keep in mind that this is a European conflict and that the international community could never accuse Canada of not participating, sometimes beyond its capabilities in terms of human and financial resources, and of not doing more than its fair share.

We in the Bloc are not calling for a definitive pullout. Not at all. What I insist on, however, is that the government should think very seriously about all the implications and disclose them without any restrictions to Canadians and to Parliament.

I would like to get back to the statement made last week by the defence minister, that Canada would send troops unless the Americans got involved. Last night, I heard some Americans arguing that Congress had not yet agreed to send 20,000 and 25,000 American troops. As far as I and my Bloc colleagues know and understand, if the American effort is not approved by Congress, I seriously wonder how the famous Dayton agreement can be fulfilled.

It is a little akin to debating whether Canada should participate without clearly defining what kind of support we will provide. Should we send a fighter squadron, as suggested by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, an engineering battalion to repair roads, or a communications platoon? None of these options was suggested by the minister. I think it would have been an excellent opportunity to tell the people: "Yes, Canada participates in peacekeeping missions in line with its means and human resources".

As I pointed out earlier, I think that our soldiers are exhausted from all their missions, even if the white paper and the special standing committee's report call for increasing the number of land forces members. This has not been done yet. Recruitment is under way, but these people are not ready to leave now. I think we should take a different approach or limit ourselves to the 1,000 troops required under the terms of our agreement with NATO, and perhaps participate as observers or communications people, for example.

Before we make this decision, however, I have trouble understanding how the Prime Minister could tell Mr. Boutros–Ghali beforehand that we would send troops, that there was no problem.

Then we will figure out how much that will cost and what kind of assistance will be provided. And how long will we stay there? Well Mr. Boutros–Ghali indicated that commitments could be for six months, twelve months or three years, depending on how long the conflict lasts. That is another question mark for the public as well as for the military personnel involved and for members of Parliament. How long will the Canadian contribution in Bosnia be for? If the government decides on a twelve month commitment, as requested by NATO members, but the conflict has not been resolved after twelve months, will we do as usual? Two days before renewing the agreement, we will hold a short debate and say: "Let us extend for another six months or twelve months. We will figure out how much all this costs after".

I am far from being certain that this is what the public expects. I think it is high time that the government, and DND in particular, be more specific. We Bloc members agree with a Canadian and Quebec contribution to peace missions intended to protect values and traditions, but these contributions must be defined. In addition, our troops need a mandate clearly stating what they are expected to do and for how long, and the public should know how much it costs to uphold the principles and values Canadians believe in.

To conclude, regarding the geopolitical context and the Dayton agreement that was signed, we should be reminded of what Justice Deschênes, from the international court dealing with war crimes, whom I quoted, said; let us not forget that Mladic and Karadzic were declared war criminals. I do not think that Canada did anything about it or very little.

Are we going to pacify the region forcibly and then negotiate with these criminals? That is assuming that all Bosnian families who were the victims of the atrocities inflicted by these individuals will just forgive them and forget all that happened. That a bit much to ask.

I know of a member of the Croatian army who was also found guilty of war crimes. He was recently promoted in the army.

Again, I doubt that the population, on either the Serb or the Bosnian side, could put up with that. Consequently, peace will continue to be threatened. The international community and NATO should ensure that the sentences given out in these cases are carried out. Otherwise, several observers, and I agree with them, feel that peace will remain precarious as long as justice does not prevail.

In conclusion, before making a decision, the government should clearly explain all the political, financial and human implications relating to the rules of engagement mentioned, but not specified, by the minister. I think the time has come to discuss these rules openly before a decision is made.

Therefore, the Bloc recommends that the government set a specific duration for such missions. If, as a NATO member, we are asked to stay for 12 months, then we commit ourselves for 12 months and, in doing so, we avoid problems such as the recent hostage–taking incidents in Visoko, Tuzla and Gorazde. As some will remember, this was the Cobra mission. Since that mission is now completed, we are somewhat ahead in terms of training some troops that will be sent to Bosnia. I think that if we decide to go there, we should, and the minister talked about facilitating the withdrawal of peacekeepers, provide for the withdrawal of these troops at the end of their stay.

We should at least plan the withdrawal of our troops, so that it is not improvised, as was the case last spring or during the winter, with the hostages.

Finally, I would suggest, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, that Canadian troops be more specialized in what I call the traditional type of involvement in peacekeeping missions, which include activities such as monitoring, as well as communications and humanitarian operations. If we decide to participate in such missions, we should concentrate on such activities, given, as I mentioned, our limited human resources. We should also avoid breaking the Canadian tradition of excellent and extraordinary participation in peacekeeping missions. I do hope that Canada will never become an expert in peace enforcement missions.

Finally, it is always very satisfying to actively protect the values and principles that Quebeckers and Canadians hold dear. But let us not forget that we must first help our own people, and work with them. if we want to be able to continue to help populations in distress abroad.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before resuming debate, today our deliberations are guided by Standing Order 43, whereby members now will be entitled to 20–minute interventions with 10 minutes for questions or comments.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Are there questions and comments on the hon. member's presentation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): If we refer to Standing Order 43 we would find that in this case the minister under whom the motion stands today and the next speaker have unlimited time and are not subject to question or comment.

As I understand, there are no questions or comments to the last speaker. To each speaker here forward there will be a 10–minute question or comment period available to all members.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that points out something very obvious. This is supposed to be a debate. We are supposed to be able to ask questions. We are supposed to be able to ask the minister questions. Obviously the orders are set in such a way that we will not be able to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Far be it from me to engage in any debate but these rules were made by the membership. If members wish to change the rules or ask for unanimous consent to ask questions, those opportunities are always available every day in the House of Commons in this 35th Parliament and all previous Parliaments and hopefully in future ones.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. No decision has been made but we will send troops. Parliament is here to inform Canadians, to talk about the issues, to have answers to the questions. What I hope to do today is talk about the process we are undergoing right now, the criteria the House should follow and some of the pitfalls we possibly can go into.

It is not for me to say anything about our peacekeepers. We have done a lot of backslapping here. We agree our peacekeepers are the best. We are proud of them and we would say nothing negative about our peacekeepers or our Canadian forces when they get over there to do a job. We are proud of them and we should say that loud and clear because we mean it.

We have gone through the process of take note debates before. I believe this is a democratic fraud, an illusion of consultation, a red book promise. We know many of the decisions have already been made. We know the leaks to the media have not been accidental. We know we will not get to vote on the issue. We know in the following weeks we will hear that there was a full, democratic debate in the House and that the full democratic debate was the basis on which the decision was made.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs have announced a number of things regarding this issue. This is not peacekeeping; this is peace enforcement. We are using combat troops, not with the UN but with NATO. This is not part of the NATO mandate. This is not a NATO member that we are going to the defence of. This is quite different than the mandate for NATO. Let us not let the spin doctors turn this into a NATO, non–NATO, not participating with our partners debate. This debate is to get information for the Canadian people so they know what we are getting involved with.

When Mr. Mulroney decided we should go to the gulf war, everyone was absolutely abhorred the decision had been made without consulting the Canadian people. But how an election changes things.

A week ago Friday we sent a letter to the Prime Minister asking for three things. We wanted the proposal. What is the proposal so that we can discuss it? We want a full briefing, a full debate in the House and a free vote, three relatively straightforward requests. We did not even get the courtesy of an answer to the letter. We have had answers in the House that there will be a full debate; we would have all the details, maybe even a vote. We have gone through it. What a laugh the briefings were. I will get to that in a few minutes.

What is wrong is there is no true debate, no details for the proposal and we did not hear any this morning from the minister. There has been no adequate briefing, no chance to consult with Canadians. I was with 800 Canadians in one place on Saturday night. It would have been great to consult them on some of these issues.

There is no vote, let alone a free vote. It is not open, transparent and honest. The decisions have already been made. We can listen to the media talking about the decisions yesterday.

The government believes the opposition is basically an inconvenience, keep us in the dark. Obviously the backbenchers will go along with what they are told and with the speeches written for them. The spin doctors will say we are not supporting NATO, but this is not a NATO mandate. Let us get that right off the table now. Let us not make this a partisan political thing. Let us make it what is good for Canada. That is what this should be all about. That is why we need the information to debate and discuss. This whole sham we are going through is wrong and the minister knows it. He knows the information is not on the table for us to see.

What sort of things should we have discussed? We should have looked at some criteria. What kind of criteria? The last two speakers talked about the cost. This is not hard, cold and heartless; it is reality. Canadians are losing their health care. They are having difficulty educating their children and they have other problems, and we hear in our briefings that the cost may be between $2 million and $70 million. That is an accurate estimate. Now we hear in the House that it may be $50 million or $60 million. We already have made an investment of $600 million and ten lives in this area of the world. Let us talk reality here. Let us talk about what this means.

Let us look at some of the estimating that has been done. We estimated $22,000 for 1995–96 in foreign affairs for the Haiti mission. We now have requested another $67 million. Twenty-two thousand dollars for the Haiti mission in the estimates. Everybody must have known that was wrong. Let us get some estimates. Let us talk about the cost. It is a real issue.

What about the length of the mission? NATO says 12 months and we are out of there. The Prime Minister said last week that 12 months is not very long, maybe we will need three years. Maybe we will need 30 years as we did in Cyprus. How long will we stay if NATO leaves?

We also need to look at the record of 12 months in any place. Let us talk about Cyprus—30 years. Let us talk about Somalia. How successful were we in 12 months there? Let us talk about Haiti. We now have Mr. Aristide talking about taking another three years as dictator. Let us talk about the deterioration in Haiti which is ongoing. Let us talk about the duration of this mission and what we hope to accomplish.

Let us talk about the command. We have a hint that the minister knows quite a bit about it. I hope he does. In our briefing we were told that when NATO leaves it will be turned over to a group. Will we be part of the group? These are the questions Canadians want answered.

What about the mandate? What is the job we are to do? Obviously if the minister does not know we will tell him today. We will shoot to kill. We will be mean junkyard dogs. That is what the U.S. defence minister said. What does that mean for our troops? Can we really fight force with force? Is that how we get peace? Has it worked throughout history? Let us look at that.

Let us talk about the escalation of the threat to world peace. Let us talk about Germany, Russia, the Turks and the U.S., their involvement over many years. This civil war started in 350 B.C. We must look at history if we want to understand it.

What about our commitment to allies? We talked about that. This is not a defence mission. This is not the protection of an ally. This is something totally different.

There are many criteria which need to be discussed and we must get honest and non–partisan answers to these questions.

What about the threats? Let us look at Sarajevo. They will take a city with 120,000 Serbs in it and say "get out". What does that say? How will we handle that in a peace sense?

Let us ask questions about elections. There are thousands of refugees. There is a scorched earth policy and houses are being destroyed. There is no infrastructure and they are to hold elections within one year? How will they have a democratic election? What role will our NATO troops play in the elections? We need the answers to those questions and the Canadian people are asking the minister for those answers.

What about the refugees? How will we get them food, shelter and infrastructure, the basics of life? How will we handle the emotions? They have seen their children, grandparents and other relatives killed. They have seen their daughters raped. How will the NATO troops handle those emotions?

What about the stability between the Croats and the Muslims? What about the potential for a Croat–Serbian war? We need answers. We need to ask those questions in a non–partisan manner.

What about the American policy of rearming the Muslims? How do we rearm one faction while ignoring the other two factions? How will that help to create peace? How will arming that faction give more stability? Those are the questions we have to ask.

What about the war criminals, a gigantic moral dilemma? What will our NATO troops do when a little kid tugs on their tunics and says: "That guy over there killed my parents and raped my sister. What are you going to do about it?" We need to talk about what we are to do about it. We need to tell our troops what they are to do about it. We need to know what that means. How do we deal with those human rights areas?

Will the combatants simply wait for the year and then hope they all leave? What is the real commitment of the Americans? If I were an American looking at this, I would say that I know my troops are targets. An American GI is worth a lot more than anybody else. That is the big power. They have an X on them the minute they go somewhere.

Let us look at the background. Let us look at what Vietnam did to the U.S. psyche. Let us look at Beirut, Lebanon, as soon as the suicide bombers came. Let us look at Somalia where a dead marine was dragged through the streets and it showed up on the front page of every American newspaper, what impact that had on the American psyche again. What about Haiti?

The minister must tell us what happens if the Americans decide to leave. It is a lot different when we are on the ground and starting to go through this kind of thing. Will Canada stay if the Americans leave? Is this possible? How will this work? We need answers to these questions and we will not get them in the House because the minister will not respond.

The question for us is whether Bosnia is worth dying for. That is what the Americans are asking. Would the minister send his son or daughter into this conflict? Does it pass the mother test? We have to ask those questions. We should be talking about those in the House.

In conclusion, the government has refused to provide detailed briefings. The government has chosen to rule by decree. We cannot in this party honestly support or reject this process. How can we support or reject when we do not have the adequate information or opportunity to get answers for these issues? If this were an honest approach and we got honest answers, we could give an honest answer back. If we talk about it from a strictly military sense, the next speaker on our behalf will talk about why militarily we are not equipped to say yes.

I am talking about the big Canadian picture. The method was wrong. The decision is totally the government's. I never want to hear the minister pontificate again that we discussed it, had a democratic free debate in the House and are part of the decision. We are not part of the decision. The decision is the government's. They had better remember that. The government will be responsible. It cannot hide behind this parliamentary phony sham we are going through today and have gone through before.

The government actions are the same old–style politics. Liberal, Tory, same old story: Ottawa knows best; we do not need to inform or ask the people, we will just set it up in Parliament so that it looks like it is democratic.

The government can send our troops, and I hope the minister is right. I hope there will not be a disaster. I hope not one Canadian will be killed. I hope the NATO mission is a big success and Bosnia has permanent peace. But how much better would we feel in the House if we had been part of and heard the answers and looked at the commitment, looked at all this in a non–partisan way where we had an open discussion, where we had the House full of members. The reason it is not full of members is they know this is a sham.

I hope the war criminals are brought in. I hope for Canadians that nothing goes wrong with this mission. This is a government decision. The decision has been made and the government must live with that decision.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his presentation. I am left in some doubt as to what he was proposing in particular.

First I want to clarify the record. The hon. member said they do not have enough information in the third party. If my understanding is correct—and I am not sure if the hon. member was there—there was a briefing on Thursday. I do not know how long it went on, but I understood from at least two members of the third party that they were happy with the briefing.

At the briefing it was presented what Canada's role might be. They were given 15 options of some of the things we may be able to do, what the command and control arrangements were. I would have thought there was enough information there to provide the basis, with further learning and research, to come to the House in a debate with at least four days' warning to provide some useful input.

I am not really sure where third party members are coming from. I am very serious about this. For the last week they have been complaining that morale is not good enough to participate. I can only assume they received irate telephone calls from members of the Canadians forces, because that does not now seem to be part of their presentation. I am not really sure where they are on that issue.

On the issue that they are not being included, we have had countless debates in the House, and he knows that no decision has yet been made on the troops that will be committed. I do not know if he expects that the third party and the opposition can go over to Brussels and meet. In our system of democratic government it is the ministers of the crown, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who go and meet with their counterparts in the NATO countries and the partnership for peace countries. There is no built–in system, other than corresponding with the minister. Have they ever heard of letters? Have they ever heard of meetings in the minister's office?

We have today this special presentation, a debate. As parliamentary secretary—and I am sure I am speaking for my colleague, the Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs—I want to hear from the member and from other members who speak from the third party, the opposition party and our own party. We have this debate today to find out what the opposition parties want to do. Give us some proposals. Help us. That is why we are having the debate, not to hear the sort of rhetoric we hear: we are not really sure what we should do, sitting on the fence, maybe we should and maybe we should not.

This is a golden opportunity. It is the first time in 45 years NATO will do a peacekeeping job all on its own, with the approval of the security council, with the possibility of participation of partnership for peace countries, with the involvement of Russia, our old cold war ally, under a system that should cause so much excitement and so much possibility for fertile imaginations and learned debate.

I am very disappointed at what the hon. member had to say. What would he like to do?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I guess the member obviously did not listen to the Bloc member either. The Bloc member said the same thing: we do not have the details.

The briefing was a laugh: it might cost between $2 million and $70 million; we do not now what the mandate will be; we do not know who will run the show after NATO leaves.

We need to know the cost, the exact budget. We need to know the mission. What is the mission all about? We need to know who will be in command. We need to have something to debate. We have not been given any information. The briefing is a laugh.

We know the government has made up its mind, just as in the past. It has the information, which is why we ask for it. Check out the letter to the Prime Minister to see what we asked for. Two weeks ago we outlined exactly what we want. We want a free vote in the House. We do not want a bunch of parrots. We want a free vote where people can consult with their constituents and come here and say exactly what they think, based on the facts, not based on a bunch of stuff that spin doctors turn out. I am sick and tired of the spin doctors. I am sick and tired of how the government tries to turn it and put the responsibility on the third party.

• (1325)

Mr. Collenette: What do you think? What do you want?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): You know what we want. We have said we want the criteria, the details.

Mr. Vanclief: We want the same.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): I do not really think I can add any more to what the members do not understand.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to invoke Standing Order 43(2) so that Liberal members from here on in will be sharing 20–minute speeches, 10 and 10.

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I heard reference to the initiatives put forward by the Mulroney government when it sent troops to the Middle East a few years ago. I wonder whether in fact he preferred that approach to the approach being taken by our side whereby we are involving all sides of the House before any action actually occurs.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, what difference is there whether the decision is made in a caucus room or a cabinet room and then put out that way or whether we come here with the decision already made and for show only listen to the opposition members saying whatever they have to say, which is not important anyway, and the government members saying what in fact the government wants them to say? The government will pick on something like NATO: "They do not want to be part of NATO", or "They are not for our troops".

We are proud of our troops. They have done a great job. But let us not keep asking them to do the impossible. Do not tell me that another member will disagree with that, because another member in our party will look at it from the defence standpoint, as the defence minister should. I said I was looking at it from the big picture. I said we should look at it from the NATO involvement, the countries, the history, the mandate, the criteria and so on. Our other member will look at it simply by asking whether we can continue to ask the military to do the impossible. That will be the question he will deal with.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken said he was looking at it from the bigger picture. When he sat down after his second last comment he said he had nothing further to add. I might say that he had nothing to add in his entire speech.

If the member is looking at the broader picture, if he is looking at the history of it, heaven help history students. We know what has happened in world history when people have failed to come together and unite for a common, humanitarian, good cause. We have had world wars started from this very part of the world. Are we to stand by and let them go to it again? Are we to put the world at risk and all those young people in the free world today coming up in the future in the armed forces? He wants to know what the cost of this will be. What is the cost of it if we do not do it? That is the question that has to be asked.

When we are debating these things on the floor of the House of Commons, let us look at the broader picture. I welcome the invitation to look at the broader picture. But if we are to look at the broader picture we have to understand what has happened along the road in history itself.

When we were over there as a defence review committee we met with a Croatian mayor, a Bosnian mayor and a Serbian mayor. Each of them had a solution and everything was different. Today, the peaceful world, the world that wants peace among humanity, will have to go in there and lay the groundwork. We talk about starting governments up. Of course we have to start putting governments in place. Nobody will walk away from something when things are going well. However, it takes courage and determination on the part of united countries and the United Nations to move in and do things when the going gets tough. It is the same thing as debates in the House of Commons. We do not sit in our seats and listen when the going gets tough. We get up and add our points.

I want to look at the broader picture. I compliment the government, I compliment NATO and I compliment the UN for showing the guts and the courage they have. In doing so they are supporting every young person in this world who may end up in a broader conflict. Yes, let us look at the broad picture. Let us look at the cost of this war. Also, let us consider the cost of not doing anything at all.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the member for saying it a different way. We need to debate this in the House. We need to look at all the issues. But we are not doing that. That is the problem.

The real issue is about talking to the people. I have talked to the Croatian communities. I have been invited to the Serbian communities. I have talked to them. I know what the people are saying. They are saying: "Give us the facts before you write the blank cheque". That is the point: "Give us the facts before you write the cheque".

Would the member who just spoke send his grandson or granddaughter to this conflict knowing what he knows today? That is the question.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, where some of my colleagues have criticized and given the member for Red Deer a hard time, I would like to compliment him. I see a change in attitude in the Reform Party. In the past it criticized our peacekeeping forces and was afraid to involve them in peacekeeping situations. At least today we are hearing from the Reform Party that we have the best peacekeepers in the world. I am very pleased that members of the Reform Party have evolved to the stage where they now see the importance of peacekeepers in the world.

My hon. colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has outlined the options of our participation in the international force which is being assembled to bring peace and stability to Bosnia. It is those options I hope we will debate today.

I would like to take us through a foreign affairs perspective. I would like to give a little broader analysis of the question before the House which underscores the importance of Canadian participation in this effort from a foreign policy perspective.

The suffering of thousands of innocent persons in the former Yugoslavia has deeply affected us all. Persons have been driven from their homes, subjected to ethnocultural cleansing and too frequently killed. These developments deeply offend Canadians' humanitarian values and sense of justice.

Who can forget the tragedy of Sarajevo and the suffering of the people in that city, under siege for over three full years, one of the longest sieges in European history? Against this backdrop of conflict and human suffering, Canada and the international community were asked by the United Nations to provide peacekeepers.

As a country committed to multilateral peacekeeping and the effectiveness of the UN, Canada responded. Canada responded to these challenges positively and at some cost. In each of these areas of challenge we have taken a stand in defence of Canadian values and as leaders on the world stage.

As we review what we have done in the past and consider what we will do in the future, it is important to place these challenges in a broader context. As the tragic story of the former Yugoslavia clearly demonstrates, international security is indivisible from human security.

To restore peace to Bosnia we must also restore the human conditions that support peace, conditions which will allow families to reunite, schools and hospitals to reopen and communities to rebuild. Peace and stability are in many respects preconditions to a degree of human security that will allow the people of Bosnia to learn the lessons of peace, the lessons of trust, tolerance and co–operation. Without peace and stability we risk teaching an entire generation of Bosnians the lessons of war, the lessons of mistrust, hatred and violence.

From the very beginning of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia, Canada recognized the importance of early action on behalf of the international community to prevent the spread of violence. It was Canada which led the call in 1991 for the UN Security Council to address the crisis in the former Yugoslavia.

As we heard from our Minister of National Defence this morning, Canada was among the first to send peacekeepers to the former Yugoslavia, undertaking some of the most difficult assignments. In June 1992 it was Canadian troops that were deployed to Sarajevo to reopen and secure the airport so that the airlift of relief supplies could begin.

Canadian troops were in Srebrenica in eastern Bosnia–Hercegovina to establish the UN presence in that besieged city. Until the drawdown of UN forces this fall, Canada was the fifth largest contributor to UN peace forces in the former Yugoslavia.

As well, since the autumn of 1991, Canada has contributed well over $63 million in humanitarian assistance for the victims of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. Canadian money has been used to purchase and deliver food, medical supplies and clothing, to provide shelter, to assist refugees and displaced persons and to support victims of sexual violence.

In 1992 Canada also introduced special measures to help citizens of the former Yugoslavia join their relatives in Canada. Over 7,000 persons have been landed in Canada under these special measures. In addition, over 11,000 refugees have been admitted to Canada from the former Yugoslavia through government assisted and privately sponsored programs.

Outraged at reports of horrendous crimes against humanity committed during the conflict, Canada led efforts to investigate and prosecute those responsible. A Canadian judge was one of 11 elected by the UN General Assembly to the International War Crimes Tribunal. The critic for the Reform Party did not make note of that.

Today, with the initialling of the Dayton agreement on a general framework for peace in Bosnia–Hercegovina, the parties to the conflict have committed themselves to sign later this month in Paris, an agreement that would ensure that Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Bosnia and Hercegovina respect each other's sovereign equality. The agreement guarantees that Bosnia and Hercegovina will remain a single state within its internationally recognized borders.

The Dayton peace agreement touches on issues such as the new constitution of Bosnia and Hercegovina, territorial divisions, human rights and policy and military forces. Among the key points agreed:

Bosnia and Hercegovina will be composed of two entities, known as the Federation of Bosnia and Hercegovina and the Serb Republic. These will be joined in a loose union with a central government.

Bosnia–wide elections, assisted and supervised by the Organization for Security and Co–Operation in Europe, OSCE, will take place within nine months of entry into force of the agreement.

Sarajevo will be a single city.

Parties will begin negotiations on confidence building measures, or CSBMs and on a sub–regional arms control arrangement under the auspices of OSCE.

Refugees and displaced persons will have the right to return to their homes of origin or receive compensation.

Admittedly the Dayton agreement is fragile. We know that, but that is all we have at present. Questions remain. Serious difficulties must still be worked out and much could go wrong. Yet this agreement represents a major commitment to peace by the parties to the conflict. It is the best chance at peace we have had since that conflict began. The Dayton peace agreement presents us with an opportunity to end the suffering in the former Yugoslavia. This is an opportunity we must seize now.

The formation of the implementation force for Bosnia will be authorized by the United Nations Security Council. It will be placed under NATO command and tasked to separate the warring forces and implement the military aspects of the Dayton peace agreement over a 12–month period. That is why it is wrong to compare this to Cyprus, where we had peacekeeping forces for almost 30 years. This is an essential part of the peace agreement. Without it, parties to the agreement believe there can be no peace.

The parties to the Dayton peace agreement are not alone in recognizing the importance of seizing this opportunity to bring peace and stability to the former Yugoslavia. The response of the international community to the call for an implementation force has been rapid. In addition to our partners within NATO's military structure, 19 non–NATO countries have indicated their willingness to participate in IFOR.

It is important to recognize that a Canadian contribution to IFOR represents but one dimension of a comprehensive approach to bring a lasting peace to the former Yugoslavia.

Canada will also remain engaged in humanitarian and refugee issues. We will remain politically involved, counselling diplomacy and negotiation in addressing problems as opposed to a resort to arms only. We will engage ourselves fully in the multinational effort on economic restructuring and social rehabilitation in the former Yugoslavia.

In this regard I would suggest that Canada's focus should be on social rehabilitation and the development of democratic and just societies. This focus would include the promotion of human rights and ethnocultural tolerance in the states of the former Yugoslavia and continued support for the work of the International War Crimes Tribunal.

Canada should engage itself in the promotion of free elections in co–operation with OSCE. We should support the creation of national human rights institutions and work to promote free media. Some are even accusing the international media that fuelled this conflict in the first place.

Canada's commitment to the building of civic societies should also entail a concentration of assistance on community based projects and on the rehabilitation of social infrastructure in the former Yugoslavia. Canadian projects should be initiated in communities where inter–ethnic co–operation is beginning to emerge.

With regard to economic rehabilitation, Canada's contribution to a multilateral effort should be significant but not disproportionate to the contributions of European allies and the U.S.A. We could consider some debt relief within the framework of multilateral agreements reached at the Paris Club, if countries were to meet the eligibility requirements of such relief.

All these activities will ensure a comprehensive Canadian approach to the post conflict situation in the former Yugoslavia. Integral to this is a continued Canadian effort in the field of security. The peace in Bosnia–Hercegovina remains dangerously fragile. The stability that can be provided by an international implementation force is essential.

In participating in the implementation force, IFOR, Canada can make a unique contribution. There is no more experienced or well trained peacekeeping force in the world than ours. To participate in IFOR means to accept our responsibility to continue addressing a conflict we have been concerned with from its very inception. To do less would mean walking away from a conflict that has challenged key Canadian values and interests before it is effectively resolved.

It would be wrong for us to walk away from a job only three–quarters done, ignoring the hard fought investment of Canadians made over the last four years. We must continue our efforts to bring peace and stability to the former Yugoslavia. This requires solid Canadian participation in the military force to guarantee the implementation of the peace agreement.

It is an essential element in a comprehensive Canadian approach to peace in the former Yugoslavia. It is our best hope to ensure that the dreams and talents of the entire generation of Bosnians are not lost to war.

On a personal note, I have many constituents from the former Yugoslavia, from the different ethnocultural backgrounds. Every one of them is urging us to continue the Canadian participation and assistance. That is their wish as Canadians. I welcome concrete suggestions rather than hon. members taking their 20 minutes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I understand a large number of members from all parties want to participate in this important debate. If in fact members will be splitting their times, 10 minutes is not as long as members are customarily used to. I would just caution the House so that we might get as many members as possible to participate in the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rather agree with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that there are two reasons why we cannot easily pull out of these peacekeeping missions.

• (1345)

Strictly on humanitarian and compassionate grounds, I do not believe we can ignore such suffering. However, we must also recognize that, in an open world, there is so such interdependence that we have to realize that any conflict anywhere on this planet will affect us sooner or later.

Having said that, I must state that, in my opinion, the problem lies in the type of mission in which Canada will be participating. The bottom line is that Canadians would like to know, as would Quebeckers, what the exact nature of Canada's involvement over there will be.

What I would like to ask the secretary of state is the following: How can we make sure that Canada will have a say, significant say, in the decision on what type of contribution it will make in the former Yugoslavia?

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his intervention. There will be a series of implementation conferences, co–ordination conferences, et cetera. That is why this debate is so crucial. Before ministers go to these conferences, they want input from parliamentarians sitting in this House.

Let me make it very clear. Before it even goes to that level, it must go to cabinet. Before going through cabinet, cabinet wants our ideas. While we are debating here, the Department of Foreign Affairs and the Department of National Defence are holding expert consultations.

This process is ongoing. The process of consulting Canadians never happened under previous governments. It is happening now. Again I urge members, if they have constructive ideas they should go to the cabinet table and to the international discussions we will be having. This is where we will show the world another example of how Canadians can work through consultations, how we can work putting partisan politics aside.

When we are representing Canada abroad, be it in peacekeeping, be it in any forum, that is when partisan politics are put aside. We are representing Canada, united, undivided, strong. That is when the peacekeepers really have high morale and that is why I am so pleased that the Reform Party has changed its attitude toward our peacekeepers abroad.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind myself that I am speaking on a motion by the Minister of National Defence:

> That this House take note and welcome the recent Dayton peace agreement and the international community's continued efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans, and Canadian support of these efforts by participation in a multinational military implementation force under NATO command.

In the next 10 minutes or so I plan to talk about the new ground we are breaking, what are the trends, talk about what I see the missions are and give some possible areas of the difficulties that I foresee. Maybe from that one could draw some ideas about some of the things that Canadians could do with the considerable experience they have had in peacekeeping.

I want to start by going back to 1947. It depends on how one reads history, as the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke mentioned. If members look at history they have to look at the trends. If they look at the trend beginning in 1947 and the 40 years until 1987, there were really 13 peacekeeping missions.

From 1987 until this year there have been double that or 26. If members look at 13 in 40 years and 26 in 5 years, there are twice as many in one–fifth the time. Therefore there is a factor of 10.

Whether that factor of 10 will continue to rise, I am not sure. It is an indicator that what we are doing now we are likely to have to do again some time in the not too distant future.

This is peacekeeping operation No. 40 in the world. I believe it is the most challenging one and that it will allow us to break new ground.

There is another aspect of this which, if it does not bother me, it guides me in my personal belief of what should be happening. There are 184 countries in the world. Some are very large. We are the second largest of the countries. Some are very small. Of the 184 countries, what is important to remember with respect to ethnicity, cultural differences and various other differences is that only 10 per cent of those countries have any kind of homogeneity in their population. Of those countries the 10 per cent has an ethnic grouping of about 75 per cent.

What we are seeing here may not be the end of our involvement in historical patterns. For that reason it is important for us to debate this issue. What we decide today will be debated in cabinet and will eventually become the Canadian decision. It will set ground rules for future involvement in what will inevitably be the result of these kinds of actions downstream, hopefully not too soon, but in all likelihood before this Parliament ends.

When considering the 44 months of difficulty which have existed in Bosnia, it is uplifting to talk about a chance to change the horror of war to the prospect of peace. A quarter of a million people have been killed. In the city of Sarajevo 10,500 people were killed. There are up to a million refugees. It is a very sad situation. They have a decimated landscape of shattered buildings, roofless homes, deserted towns and countless graves scattered in the hillsides, bearing the names of young men and women who were born after 1970.

The special joint committee of which I was privileged to be a member saw all of this. There is a battered, bombed out mental institution in Bacovici being run by Canadian soldiers and the wretched inhabitants of this institution depend on Canadians for their very existence.

In a civil war such as the one we have witnessed in Bosnia there are no winners nor are there likely to be winners. The only likelihood of a winner is the prospect of peace. Peace can be the only victor in this lexicon of issues.

The peace implementation plan, although it is not perfect, offers hope that some things will be no more. There will be no more days of dodging bullets and nights of artillery barrages. There will be no more winters of freshly dug cold and sinister graves. There will be no more years of isolation from the outside world.

There are 10 highlights to the Bosnia peace accord that were mentioned by the Minister of National Defence this morning. First, Bosnia remains a single state within a present border. There will be a Bosnian–Croat federation with 51 per cent of the territory and a Bosnian–Serb republic with 49 per cent.

Second, there will be a rotating presidency, beginning with a Bosnian–Muslim, a two–house Parliament and a constitutional court. The central government will have responsibility for foreign policy, foreign trade, monetary policy, citizenship, immigration and other collective issues.

The capital, Sarajevo, is united and under Muslim–Croat control. This may prove to be difficult in the future honing and improving of these negotiations.

International supervised elections should take place next year, or in the foreseeable future.

Almost a million refugees will be able to return home and people may move freely.

The control of Brcko, a Serb held town, will be decided by an arbitration panel made up of Muslims, Serbs and Europeans.

It is important to the issue that there will be a corridor of between three to five miles in northeast Bosnia linking the Serb held smaller territory to the east to the central northern part by a corridor called the Posavina corridor. That is still the subject of some intense negotiation.

The Muslim held town of Gorazde will be linked to the federation by a land corridor. The Serbs retain Srebrenica and Zepa, Muslim enclaves they overran last summer. Last but not least, the NATO implementation force will be participating in the near future. In fact it has already started.

What are the NATO objectives? There are two, primary and secondary. The primary objective, as I see it, which I will put slightly differently but with the same thrust as the Minister of National Defence, is to oversee the withdrawal of warring factions from a buffer zone about five kilometres or two and a half miles wide created in most places along the current cease-fire lines. After a certain period of time, maybe 30 or 45 days, this zone will be widened to five miles or more, except in Gorazde, Sarajevo and Brcko which, as I mentioned earlier, will have special boundaries.

The secondary mission is removing land mines and also quasi–military roles such as providing security for relief agencies, delivering food and other necessities of life and ensuring passage for the thousands of refugees that I mentioned.

To try and prevent small conflicts from growing there will be an agreement that several commissions could be created to discuss this.

I have given the background of what I believe is the setting for Canada's participation. We are breaking new ground. This is the first time that NATO has had a pure peacekeeping role. It is not only NATO. We are involved with the partnership for peace, our future allies, and Russia has a role to play with a command and control system that has been set up for the very first time.

Quite frankly, as a parliamentarian and a member of the government, there are risks involved. There have been risks in every peacekeeping operation. However, I quote the hon. member who stood up a few moments ago and said: "The risk of not participating either monetary wise or the risk of lives or wounded may be much greater than not participating".

From the various debates we have had in the last two years, from the special joint committee on defence, the white paper discussion and the present discussion on reserves, it is very clear to me that Canadians are prepared to and want to take this risk and participate in this operation.

It is the role we have to play. I really implore the opposition members, after their political rhetoric, to give the government some indication of what they believe the Canadian people would like us to do so that we can be guided in the cabinet discussions and downstream decisions.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize and commend the Minister of Finance for his announcement in September that Canadians were able to purchase Canada savings bonds for registered retirement savings plans, RRSPs, this year.

In my riding, when I held prebudget consultation meetings last year, many of my constituents recommended the creation of a debt bond similar to victory bonds as a way to ensure that more of our national debt was held by Canadians, lessening our dependence on the international money markets and money speculators.

The Essex Canadian Auto Workers political action committee met with me this summer to advocate that Canadians be able to use Canada savings bonds as RRSPs. I thank the members of the CAW for their continued interest in Canada's fiscal health.

The changes made this year show that the government and the Minister of Finance listen to Canadians and are willing to act on Canadian suggestions for better handling the nation's finances.

I encourage all Canadians to participate in prebudget consultations. Their suggestions will be heard. I also thank Canadians who took advantage of the new option and purchased their RRSPs through Canada savings bonds this fall.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on Friday Bloc members questioned the Minister of Indian Affairs on the paternalistic and disdainful attitude and intentions toward aboriginal people shown in a memorandum written by his assistant deputy minister.

In his reply, the minister launched into a full scale attack on sovereignists and on the government of all of the people of Quebec.

While refusing to be answerable for the inappropriate suggestions of his assistant deputy minister about buying off the aboriginal people, the minister launched into an attack on Quebec which was remarkable for its exaggerations and inaccuracies. He even said that I had been kidnapped by the Mohawks. What a pitiful performance, and what disdain for the democratic system, coming from a minister of the crown.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when the Liberal government came to power in 1993 it promised things would be different. Yet the more things change the more they stay the same.

Look at the Prime Minister's Quebec package. In the referendum aftermath Canadians in every region of the country looked to Ottawa for a vision. The best our Prime Minister could offer was "Charlottetown lite", reheated Tory policies that had already failed inside and outside Quebec. Not only did the Prime Minister have to borrow the Tories' vision, he has also resorted to their bag of dirty tricks by invoking closure on his Quebec veto bill.

That's right, the government is going to shove its unity package down Canadians' throats whether they like it or not, limiting debate on a package that will not fly in any region of the country. The Tories were never so bold or undemocratic.

This may unite Canadians yet in their conviction to reject the old Canada and begin building the new: no more Liberal, no more Tory; in '97 Reform's the story.

NATIONAL SAFE DRIVING WEEK

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Safe Driving Week sponsored by the Canada Safety Council.

To mark the 40th anniversary of this campaign which is designed to promote safe driving on Canada's roads, Transport Canada would like to take this opportunity to remind Canadians that road safety is everyone's responsibility.

The theme of the campaign this year is the hidden face of impaired driving. Impaired driving is still a serious issue. Recent statistics suggest that over 40 per cent of drivers killed in car accidents had been drinking.

Transport Canada has also been working hard to reduce death and injury on our roads through initiatives such as the national occupant restraint program and the introduction of mandatory safety equipment for vehicles.

All Canadians can play a role in promoting safe driving, which begins with safe driving practices. Drivers must take extra care to use safety equipment such as airbags and seatbelts properly. Exercising common sense when driving a vehicle, observing speed limits and respecting the rules will make our roads safe for everyone.

National Safe Driving Week is an important campaign and I urge hon. members to endorse its goals.

PEACEKEEPING

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today as we debate sending troops to Bosnia we must remember the accomplishments achieved over the past half century by Canadian UN forces.

We must embrace the vision of global peace and unity so recently articulated in Ottawa by UN Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali. Canadians must set the example as ambassadors of peace. To waver at such a historical moment in the history of these warring countries would be paramount to turning a blind eye to a starving child. Bosnia is starving for peace.

As members of a united nation, all Canadians must accept the challenge to make a lasting peace for all Bosnians.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the early 1600s Canada has grown geographically and maturely as a nation of which we are very proud.

We as the Liberal Party sat recently in opposition. We looked across the floor of the House of Commons and watched the present leader of the separatist party and Marcel Masse as Minister of National Defence and Roch LaSalle sitting in the cabinet benches of the Government of Canada wielding all their power and political philosophy at the utmost. Today they are campaigning to separate Quebec from Canada. They are misrepresenting the facts of life to the wonderful people of the province of Quebec.

Today we think about statesmen such as Baldwin, Lafontaine, Georges Etienne Cartier, Ernest Lapointe, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Louis St. Laurent, Pierre Elliot Trudeau and the current Prime Minister who have and who are laying the foundation for a great future of a Canada that will always include Quebec. Unlike the leader of the separatist party in the House who changes political parties like he changes clothes, the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party—

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, who announced that the federal government would withdraw from manpower training, did not keep his promise.

• (1405)

By tabling a proposal that offers even less than the proposal made to the government of Quebec in June 1994 and dismissed out of hand by Daniel Johnson, Ottawa has again shown its inability to acknowledge the consensus in Quebec on the need for transferring the authority and resources for manpower training to that province.

From now on, the minister will be able to impose national standards if the provinces want federal funding, and if they do not accept Ottawa's standards, the minister will be able to go over the heads of the provinces and offer these programs directly to the unemployed.

It is now obvious why the minister waited until after the referendum to table his reforms.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Arise, young people of Canada. You have nothing to lose but poverty. This generation is ruining you. It leaves you with horrendous mortgages. You have heard of the visible mortgage.

The federal and provincial debt is about $800 billion and grows at well over $100 million a day. When you are raising your family almost certainly about one-half of every dollar you pay in taxes will go to pay interest on the mortgage this generation leaves you. Sadly this is only half the story.

There is another little known and largely invisible mortgage. Actuaries estimate the cost of benefits promised to pensioners through the CPP, OAS and medicare programs will double from about $50 billion to $100 billion per year. Your income taxes will be 50 per cent higher just to cover these costs.

Young Canadians, arise and join the—

SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan is the best place in the world to live according to Martha Justus, an economist with Informetrica. She used the same United Nations human development index that ranked Canada number one among the countries of the world.

When this index was applied to the provinces, Saskatchewan came out on top. The UN ranking is an attempt to define quality of life by combining life expectancy, educational attainment and gross domestic product adjusted for cost of living.

The findings of Informetrica were no surprise to those of us from Saskatchewan. Our community oriented history and culture have produced some of the best social legislation. For example, the recent initiatives by our provincial NDP government gives many part time workers access to benefits usually enjoyed only by full time employees. This further enhances our quality of life.

Yes, Saskatchewan is number one.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian infrastructure program is still in full swing in Peterborough where it represents more than $35 million and 68 construction projects in every village, township and city, both school boards, Fleming College and Trent University.

One feature of the program has been the way it has released moneys, private and public, being held in reserve for future projects. The release of these funds now has resulted in useful projects and has created much needed jobs. Money has been spent at the grassroots of the economy.

I strongly urge the government to build on its experience with the current infrastructure program and launch another. Perhaps the new one could be redesigned to deliberately tap more private sector funds. Perhaps it could include regional variants to accommodate special local needs. Perhaps priority could be given to particular types of infrastructure.

Let us consult with the municipalities and launch a new invigorated infrastructure program.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, six years ago this week the promising lives of 14 bright, talented young women were lost in a senseless act of violence at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal.

Canadian women everywhere remain haunted by this tragedy. On Wednesday, Canada's national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, the tragedy of December 6 should stand as a symbol of the safe, just and peaceful society we must strive to create.

We must remember there is much strength to be gained from this awful sacrifice. Through dedication and effort and regardless of regional, linguistic, racial or partisan divisions, the memory of these women should inspire us to rebuild a nation founded on the principles of equality and respect where women shall no longer be victims.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of Human Resources Development tabled his unemployment insurance reforms. The minister told whoever wanted to listen that the purpose of his reforms was to adjust to the new demands of Canadian society and that it would be easier for the unemployed to re–enter the labour market.

However, now that the reforms have been tabled, it is clear that the impact will be far worse than we expected. The federal government hopes to reduce its deficit at the expense of women and young people.

Furthermore, in order to ensure that wealth is redistributed, Ottawa has decided to reduce the premiums of those who are well off by one billion dollars and, to make up for this reduction, increase the premiums of low–income workers by $900 million. Is that what the federal government calls justice and social equity?

THE LATE ROBERTSON DAVIES

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to pay tribute to the late Robertson Davies, one of Canada's most treasured writers.

This sentiment accurately describes Robertson Davies' status: a monument to Canadian literature.

Robertson Davies was to me a person of another world. I knew him by reputation only. When I first heard him on the radio I was impressed that he appeared as interested in hearing the opinions of others as in expressing his own. Acknowledged the world over as a great man of letters, Robertson Davies was also a man of the people.

Canada and the world are much the better for his presence and for being the beneficiaries of a great literary legacy on his passing.

BANKS

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Dominion Bank and the Bank of Montreal announced substantial increases in 1995 profits last week. Their profits rose 17 per cent and 19.5 per cent respectively over last year.

While these figures may earn the industry the respect of its shareholders, they are also drawing criticism from small and medium size business owners. We have all heard their frustration at the banking industry's reluctance to lend to the small business sector. We know it plays a critical role in our economy. That is why we are working hard to foster a new environment of opportunity for it.

We cannot do it alone. It is our view that the banks have a special obligation to assist small businesses in obtaining financing. Let us hope their increased profits motivate them to fulfil that important obligation.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak about the fascinating art of quilt making.

Quilt making and the preservation of quilts are an integral part of our history. The art of quilt making reflects Canada's rural beginnings, and its continued popularity is living proof of the vitality and the art of this form.

Today quilt shows are just as popular as they were generations ago. Currently I am seeking Parliament's approval to proclaim the fourth week of every May as national quilters week. Such a proclamation will give these committed and tireless artisans the recognition they deserve.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, the Minister of Human Resources Development finally unveiled his unemployment insurance reform, which will make it increasingly difficult for the unemployed to access the system. The reform provides that eligibility levels will be considerably higher and that those frequently out of work will be penalized, so that the first victims of these cuts will be young people, women and seasonal workers. The federal government is cutting $2 billion from the program.

Will the minister finally acknowledge that he waited so long to table his reform in order to avoid having Quebeckers know before the referendum that they would get hit with two thirds of the UI cuts, that is, about $640 million?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not have his facts straight.

The reality is that Quebec is affected no differently than the other provinces. The full mature year after the transition takes place, the next impact on the province of Quebec would be 7 per cent of benefits because a large proportion of the money we are saving is being reinvested to ensure that people in Quebec can go back to work.

That is what I do not think the hon. member fully understands. The whole purpose of the reform is to give people the opportunity, the resources and the support to be re–employed. It is about jobs. It is about work. It is about employment and the way in which governments can work together to develop partnerships to help people attain those very important objectives.

That is what it is all about and that is where the money is going. It is going to shift us from a program that previously provided a simple income benefit program. However because it is no longer relevant to the much tougher world of work we live in, we are now giving people a better ability to meet the kinds of demands and to do what they really want to do, which is to get a job.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot deny the terrible effect the cuts in his reform will have on young people, women and seasonal workers, especially. Everyone is affected, but they are more so.

The minister cannot deny it, and I would ask him this: Since the federal government is using the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund to reduce its enormous debt, are we to understand from the $2 billion cuts announced Friday that, rather than improving its own finances through better management, Ottawa is trying to reduce the deficit on the backs of the unemployed?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me again point out some relevant facts. It is quite clear the hon. member has not looked at the report. He does not know what we are proposing.

There will be a substantial extension of coverage under the new proposal for part time workers or people who have multiple jobs. Half a million Canadians will be included in the program where before they received absolutely no coverage at all. A quarter of a million seasonal workers will be able to receive extended benefits beyond what they receive at the present time.

There will be the opportunity for more people to improve their earnings because we are basing it upon a much more realistic test, the test of hours.

To get to the question raised by the hon. member and not the prologue where his facts were wrong, the reality is that the money we are using is first to go into a reserve to stabilize premiums against a further recession. In that way we can ensure that future workers will not be hurt the way workers were in the past recession and we can ensure there is an infusion of money at that point in time. We are reducing the costs for both employees and employers as a result of this measure to stimulate job creation. We are ploughing back $800 million of employment benefits to help people get back to work.

This goes back to the very heart, the goal of what we want to do, which is to ensure that Canadians will have the opportunity to get a good job.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when the minister talks of getting Canadians back to work, we cannot forget that, for more than two years, the government in power has done absolutely nothing to get Canadians back to work, except the poor and the unemployed with cuts. That is what happened.

The minister cannot deny this. Given that the level of employment in Canada has hardly budged and given the enormous cuts he is making to unemployment insurance, will he admit that, far from giving Canadians the dignity of work as he calls it, he is hitting them, pushing them towards welfare and condemning them to poverty? Because that is what his plan is about.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the poor member really has got himself wound up into the wildest coil of exaggeration I have seen in a long time.

As the member well knows and as he obviously should know, the reality is that since this government has come to power we have created close to 500,000 permanent jobs. The unemployment rate has gone down from over 11 per cent to 9.4 per cent. In Quebec alone, 119,000 new jobs have been created.

As we all know, one of the most important elements of this program is that in addition to helping people adjust to the labour market, buying the opportunity to get the kind of skills they need, they will also be able to generate between 100,000 and 150,000 new incremental jobs, of which 40,000 would be in the province of Quebec. It is worth fighting for 40,000 jobs, which is what we are doing. I wish the hon. member would join in that fight.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Thanks to the cuts resulting from the February 1994 budget and the present reform, the minister will enjoy a $5 billion surplus by the end of 1996, after requiring workers and employers to pay $6 billion back into the recession fund. This is a very substantial grab. Yet, this surplus will not be set aside but will go into the federal government's current revenue to reduce its deficit by $5 billion.

Are we to understand from its UI reform that the government intends to reduce its deficit not by improving management of government operations but by reducing UI benefits by another $2 billion?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the present time the unemployment insurance account is still in a deficit. That deficit was allowed to rise to $6 billion in the last recession because there was no reserve placed against it.

What is even worse is that at the same time the previous government jacked up the premium rates from about $2.05 to almost $3, a 50 per cent increase in premium rates at a time when the economy was going into recession. All that did was make the recession all that much worse.

We should learn from those lessons. We should not put Canadian workers in a position where all of a sudden money is drawn out of the economy when in fact money should be going back into the economy. One of the basic principles of this national program is to be counter–cyclical, to reinvest when times are bad and to put a surplus aside for protection when times are good.

We are learning that lesson. We are setting up a reserve fund so we can stabilize the premiums. In that way when there are problems in the economy we will not have to jack up premiums, we will not have to deficit finance, but we can make sure that we put the money back in the economy to keep jobs for Canadian workers.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the size of current surpluses and the maintenance of high premiums, workers will never be able to benefit from this surplus, which will only be used to reduce the deficit.

Since UI premiums and benefits are part of the government's revenue and expenditures, does the minister recognize that his so–called recession reserve is nothing but an accounting fiction and that this UI fund surplus will be used strictly to reduce the federal deficit, as specified on page 11 of the government's own annual financial report?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from time to time I have heard the hon. member for Mercier talk about the responsibility of members of Parliament to listen to the grassroots, to listen to people in their own regions.

I would like to quote a very important statement: "In order for unemployment insurance to fully play its role of automatic stabilizer, we feel that it would be advisable to set contribution rates in such a manner as to allow a surplus to accumulate during periods of expansion, thus avoiding the necessity to increase contributions during periods of recession". Was this le Conseil du patronat? No it was the CSN and the CEQ, the two major unions of Quebec which have advocated exactly what we are doing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the changes to unemployment insurance that the Minister of Human Resources Development announced on Friday will not create a single sustainable job.

The new 7 per cent payroll tax is a full time tax on part time workers and amounts to a massive tax grab. Since tabling his bill the minister and his officials have failed to inform Canadians exactly how much more money the government is getting from this tax grab.

Why will the minister not tell Canadians exactly how much money he is pulling out of the pockets of part time workers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, frankly the hon. member from Calgary just does not get it.

The member just does not understand the whole point of the reform which is to make sure that for the first time part time workers would get the security protection of the unemployment insurance fund. That is the whole point of the reform. If those workers make less than $2,000 they get the premiums refunded. She still goes not get it.

What has happened is there has been an artificial glass ceiling. Employers have set 15 hours where nobody has the opportunity to get access to maternity benefits, to get job security, to get retraining. As a result they have been sent home. What we are doing is we are opening up the door of opportunity and security for part time workers in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me continue.

The new tax will hurt 2.5 million part time workers and their employers. The minister wants us to believe that this tax is revenue neutral. The fact is that the students and working moms targeted by the tax will be forced to pay for months, 910 hours to be exact which accumulates to months, before they can collect and few ever will. This is not a revenue neutral tax. This is a cash windfall of $1.2 billion at the expense of part time workers.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member's question, but I suppose I can make up one for the hon. member and then answer it. Seeing she seems to make up most of the facts she uses, I might as well make up the questions that she wants answered.

• (1430)

Let us deal with the part time worker issue, one of the strongest cases that was made to us during the public hearings. I heard the hon. member's leader last week saying that we have to listen to the people. We did. They said that at this time, when there are increasingly more jobs of a part time nature or of a multiple job nature, we have to give people coverage. They did not have coverage. Under the old weekly basis, after 15 hours people were sent home; they were told not to work any more. The whole labour market was distorted as a result, and those people had no security. We have opened up eligibility for over half a million Canadians.

If that person, a student, male, female, or whatever the case may be—

An hon. member: A Reformer?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We may have to look at the charter of rights for that.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is habit forming when we have to respond to the question mark. This is about killing part time jobs.

There is very little evidence that the part timer tax will benefit anyone except the federal coffers. Many businesses are opposed to this scheme. Ultimately, the increased cost to business will kill off the creation of part time jobs and generate huge tax revenues. In fact we expect this tax will generate over $1 billion.

How can the minister justify this $1 billion tax grab at the expense of part time workers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should know, the cost reductions we have built into the program amount to $1.3 billion for small business employees and employers. That has a very strong job stimulating effect.

Second, we have also built in a rebate for small business. If there is an increase in premiums they will receive a 50 per cent rebate. Obviously the hon. member did not know that either.

Third, to repeat, if a worker, up to $2,000 of income, does not want to claim their eligibility, they have a right to a full $2,000 refund on their taxes.

It seems very clear. Now that we have a question from the hon. member, we understand that the question is not based upon anything she has read in our report.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In June 1994, the federal government offered to transfer budgets for several manpower training programs to the Government of Quebec. Daniel Johnson rejected the proposal out of hand, calling it a bargain basement agreement. Ottawa is now offering to give assistance the unemployed directly.

Will the minister admit that his reform proposal does not even go as far as the offer made in June 1994, in that the plan is no longer to transfer budgets to the Government of Quebec but to send cheques to the unemployed directly? Does he recognize that the federal government is not, in fact, withdrawing from the area of manpower?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would have expected that surely by this time the hon. member would have caught on that in fact we are going much further than the previous offer.

The Prime Minister over a week ago said that we are withdrawing from the area of education and training. In fact we have introduced in the legislation that there would be no direct involvement in terms of a voucher unless there was provincial consent.

Furthermore, we have clearly put on the table the entire global amount of expenditures we make, which in the province of Quebec right now is about $500 million or $600 million, plus the savings that will be generated, which will be another $240 million, to determine how we could work out a partnership with them. If they have delivery mechanisms that suit the criteria for the clients we must serve, we are quite prepared to use those delivery mechanisms. We can sit down to work out how we can eliminate duplication and overlap in these areas. We can work out common employment plans at the community level. We can discuss how we can share resources.

This is a real attempt to find a new partnership for employment with every province and help people get back to work.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what Quebec wants is for the federal government to withdraw from this area where it has proven totally ineffective over the past 15 years.

Does the minister realize that by sending cheques directly to the unemployed, his department is preventing Quebec from putting in place a real manpower policy, just to give the federal government visibility with the unemployed?

• (1435)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in 1941 the provinces, including the province of Quebec, gave to the federal government the responsibility for the unemployment insurance program. It is part of the Constitution. In case the hon. member has not read the Constitution lately, it is in the Constitution. For all those who pay into the system, we are the trustee to ensure they receive proper benefits.

We are making sure that those who have the right they establish with their payment of premiums have the right to receive the benefits. We do not care who delivers them; we simply want to ensure, as a result of our trusteeship, that they receive those benefits. That is part of the Canadian Constitution.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development announced that his five-cent reduction in UI premiums on $100 of insurable earnings would create 24,000 full time jobs in Canada. More money in Canadians' pockets equals more jobs. It is as simple as that.

We have to wonder why then the Minister of Human Resources Development is taking a 7 per cent tax bite out of the pay cheques of part time workers in this country.

If a token UI premium reduction creates 25,000 full time jobs, how many jobs will be lost when the government takes $1.2 billion out of the pockets of part-time workers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the problem with that question is that the hon. member has been listening to her colleague from Calgary and they both have it wrong.

We have said very clearly that part time workers will now be covered by the UI system, and if they want to have a rebate on their premiums they will receive a rebate. Should I repeat that again? Should I underline it? Should I get a red pencil so they can understand it properly? Up to $2,000 there is a full rebate of all those premiums.

On the other hand, those who want to come into the system and become eligible will pay the proper premiums so they can receive the protection of maternity benefits, sickness benefits, they are protected against being out of work and have programs to get back to work, all the protection they do not have now.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are talking math, and I suspect it was not a prerequisite when the Minister of Human Resources Development got his job.

My strength is not math either, but I can figure out this much mathematically. According to his own department, a $900 million reduction in UI premiums creates 25,000 full–time jobs. That is one job for every $36,000 in reductions. Using those same figures, the minister's $1.2 billion tax grab would kill close to 34,000 jobs in this country.

Will the minister confirm that this tax grab on part time workers is a job killer? And if he does not agree with our figures, maybe he could provide the House with his department's own research in this area.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member read the guide that was tabled at the same time, because that is where the full information would be disclosed.

The reality is that when someone receives coverage under the insurance program they pay a premium. That is what an insurance policy is all about: they pay a premium and get a benefit. Now we are saying that part time workers who were denied any coverage and not included in the program will be able to get the coverage. If they do not receive eligibility they get a rebate. That seems to be simple mathematics. They receive a rebate. That is the point of the program.

What I think the hon. member is clearly missing is that as this workplace goes through very substantial changes, part time workers and many workers who now have two or three jobs do not have sufficient hours or income to get coverage. As a result, it creates insecurity, which creates problems in the labour market. We are trying to restore security for over half a million workers.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. After tabling a UI reform package that is really an extensive cutback program, the Minister of Human Resources Development is about to table an old age pension reform that goes along the same lines.

Will the minister admit that, after his all–out attack against unemployed Canadians, he is about to do the same thing to seniors?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have neither attacked Canadian workers nor do we intend to attack Canadian seniors.

What we are doing as a government is ensuring that this country is able to govern itself effectively. For workers, that means getting back to jobs. For seniors and people over the age of 65, that means making sure they have good security in their old age. That is the intention of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): As a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, will the minister confirm that not only is the federal government set to cut old age pensions but that it will encourage, I repeat encourage, seniors to work part time upon retiring?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only person who is guilty of inciting is the hon. member, who is making those kinds of false statements in the House and trying to raise fears that people should not have.

He has been told many times in the House, by the Prime Minister and others, that we would not be touching seniors' existing pensions. What we are looking at is the need to make a major reform in the Canada pension plan and other forums to make sure it is a sustainable program, that it provides security not just for this generation of seniors but for the next generation of seniors.

The basic purpose of government is to look ahead to the future. Unfortunately, this member only seems to be able to look to the past.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask a general question about job losses, but I am upset about the logical inconsistency of the minister. He should have been coached by somebody who understands this.

On the one side, the minister claims that reduction in legislatively mandated premiums on unemployment insurance creates jobs. Then the minister turns around and says now we will legislate increased premiums for part time workers. He claims that one will gain jobs and the other one does not lose jobs. Could he clear up this inconsistency for me?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes, because we are offering a rebate to employers who pay the premiums.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is clearly on some of those who get rebates, not the others. It is inconsistent.

Last month Canada lost 64,000 full time jobs. There are reports of a coming recession with threats of still further job losses. The red book reference to jobs, jobs, jobs appears to have been about job losses, not jobs gained.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Since he proudly claimed credit for jobs created in previous months, will he now take responsibility for these job losses and tell us how he plans for Canadians to get back to work?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the obvious instalments in the job program is what we did in this program, which was to take a program that had ballooned to double its size over a decade and provide a way of refining that program and reducing many of its costs so that it can be a sustainable program.

Second, we are substantially streamlining the program so that business can save about $150 million on administration costs, which they can convert back into the job areas.

Third, the program generates $800 million of new employment benefits, which create a number of jobs for Canadians, especially those who have been long term unemployed.

Fourth, we have a major investment of $300 million to help develop in high unemployment areas specific investment funds and initiatives to help create jobs in those areas.

• (1445)

This is a major instalment of the job creation of this program.

PURCHASE OF HELICOPTERS

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Probably in the hope of saving enough money to buy submarines that we do not need, the government is contemplating the purchase of about 20 American built Sea Hawk helicopters. However, this type of helicopter is known for experiencing problems at sea. This is not very reassuring, considering that these helicopters will fly over the sea 80 per cent of the time.

Will the minister confirm that he intends to spend close to one billion dollars to buy inadequate helicopters at a reduced price?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the answer is short and clear.

Even if he will not confirm it, how can the minister justify his intention to award, once again without tender, a contract worth close to one billion dollars to buy helicopters from an American company, thus depriving, as we already mentioned, the Canadian aircraft industry, which is primarily located in Quebec, of any economic spinoffs?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's statement is totally wrong.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on December 1 last year I asked the Minister of Justice what action he was taking to protect women from violence.

Today I ask the Minister of Justice what legislative measures he has taken in the past year to implement the government's plan to deal with the issue of violence against women?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I must acknowledge the deep commitment and the enormous contribution of the hon. member in this area.

Although a great deal remains to be done, those things that have been achieved over the last year in dealing with men's violence against women have been brought about largely because of the contribution of my colleague and other members of the Liberal caucus.

Over the last year a number of steps have been taken to which I can refer in response to her question. On February 15 of this year, Bill C–42 became effective. Among other things, it provided in peace bonds that application can be made by someone other than the woman affected. An application might be brought by a police officer. The penalties were increased, the terms were made firmer.

I can refer as well to Bill C–41, the sentencing bill given royal assent in mid–July. Among other things, as a result of the initiative of the hon. member for Mississauga South, domestic violence was made an aggravating factor. As a result of the work by the hon. member for Brant, restitution was provided for victims of domestic violence.

A great deal remains to be done. I am proud to say we have already taken steps this year that will make a difference.

IMPLEMENTATION FORCE

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have no details about the Canadian role in the upcoming NATO deployment or the size of the contingent or much else. The defence minister says the cabinet will decide tomorrow.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Will the minister table this proposal in full detail and allow Parliament to have—

The Speaker: Members will recognize that the Chair must wait and listen to what the question is going to be, rather than just the preamble. This question, in my view, is out of order.

If the hon. minister would like to address it, I will permit him to, but in my view it is out of order. We will go on to the second question.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for that. I did check with the Clerk to try and look at the rules.

We have talked about many human rights abuses in all parts of the world. We have talked about the genocide that has occurred in places, particularly the former Yugoslavia.

● (1450)

I would like to know what the government has in mind for all of our forces any place in the world to handle how they are going to deal with the issue of genocide.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again this does touch to some degree the debate that is before the House.

The troops of the Canadian forces proved what the appropriate actions are when faced with the genocide in the former Yugoslavia. Were it not for the presence of our forces and the UN in general many more thousands of lives would have been lost.

The Canadian Armed Forces need no lessons from the hon. member across the way with respect to dealing with difficult situations. In any combat or any engagement the forces are committed to they will operate to the best of their abilities. They will use the Canadian standards of fairness and tolerance in the application of their duties including the application of force.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

We just learned that the Minister of Industry is about to award a $100,000 contract, to write his speeches and advise him on the development of the information highway, to the firm that lobbies him on behalf of businesses having an interest in the information highway, including Astral, Unitel, Western International Communications and many others.

By letting lobbyists representing these businesses write his speeches and dictate to him his policies concerning the information highway, how can the minister claim to protect the interest of Canadians in that regard?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I remind the hon. member that it was not that long ago that we brought forward the toughest, most extensive lobbyist registration legislation in the western world and he did not support it.

Second, I would indicate to him that in the matter he has raised, the issue of conflict of interest was raised with the ethics counsellor. He reviewed the arrangements the firm in question had put in place with a view to applying the same principles which apply within the legal profession, as approved by the Canadian Bar Association.

The ethics counsellor indicated that in his view there is no conflict of interest that would arise if the contract in question were to be awarded.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister, who is the main person responsible for preserving the integrity of this government.

Does the Prime Minister not find it unacceptable that the industry minister should be the spokesperson of businesses having an interest in the information highway, and what should we think of an ethics counsellor who sees nothing wrong with that?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the member had trouble understanding the answer, but what he needs to understand is that questions of conflict are ones which are taken extremely seriously.

The moment such a conflict was raised by a competitive firm for a contract which was being offered in response to a request for proposals, that matter was investigated thoroughly. The undertakings given and the oaths given were judged by the ethics counsellor to be sufficient to give us the confidence that no conflict would prejudice the work that was being done.

I want the hon. member to understand that the issue of integrity and conflict are very important. If he has any basis on which to suggest that we should not accept the oath or the systems that are in place, then let him come forward with specifics as to what his problem is in particular.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

Prairie farmers are outraged at the recent revelation that Canadian Wheat Board commissioners were given severance packages of up to $290,000. In November 1994 I submitted an access to information request for all available information on pension plans and wages for Canadian Wheat Board commissioners. Agriculture Canada replied "no such documents exist" regarding my request.

In August I challenged that reply but got no response. Why was the minister hiding this information?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will check the paper trail to which the hon. gentleman refers and I will ensure that all requests for information are properly responded to.

However, the hon. member should know that the severance arrangements to which he has referred in his question with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board were developed about 15 years ago with the concurrence of the Privy Council at that time. When those severance arrangements were developed, none of the current commissioners was in office.

This year, in consultation with the Privy Council Office, I have made arrangements to modernize those severance arrangements, to bring them into line with other requirements.

The hon. gentleman can point no finger of blame at the current commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board because they were not in office at the time when the severance arrangements were put in place.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last time I asked for information in the House, the RCMP were accused of using improper procedures. I wonder which cowboy in the agriculture ministry threw the lariat the wrong way. It was the Liberal government which 15 years ago allowed these excessive perks and privileges to infiltrate the Canadian Wheat Board.

Why does the minister not make these perks and privileges retroactively disappear, like the government did with the Pearson airport deal?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the arrangements under which the current commissioners came into office were legally in effect at the time when their services were engaged by the Government of Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The Standing Committee on Finance, of which I am a member, has been listening to Canadians' suggestions for the 1996 budget.

When will the minister appear before the committee to provide us with his views on the deficit problem and other economic issues? What message will he bring?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the Minister of Finance will appear before the Standing Committee on Finance the afternoon of Wednesday, December 6.

In his appearance last year the minister requested the help of the committee in suggesting appropriate actions to hit the 1995 deficit target. This year, however, we are firmly on track for our target. Last year the minister laid out the principles of deficit reduction and this year he will confirm his commitment to those principles. The committee will be asked to focus on reflecting the priorities of Canadians as the 1996 budget is prepared.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Human Resource Development.

In 1990, 87 per cent of unemployed Canadians were eligible for unemployment insurance. Two years ago the Liberals drove it down to 50 per cent. The CLC predicts that the latest announcement means that two–thirds of out of work Canadians will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance, around the same level that exists in Mississippi.

How can the minister claim that this will benefit working Canadians? Surely they are trying to balance the deficit on the backs of out of work Canadians.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the one thing I sincerely wish the president of the CLC for Christmas is a pocket calculator so he can get his figures right.

Quite clearly the economist who made those statements is a prime candidate for the remedial training programs that we are prepared to offer under the new employment package. He simply does not know what he is talking about.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister or to the parliamentary secretary.

Last Monday night, a Radio–Canada documentary on the television program Enjeux showed us the terrible fate met by infant girls in government operated nurseries in China. One million baby girls are literally left to die of neglect in institutions.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether the Prime Minister intends to voice his condemnation of these unacceptable acts instead of settling for addressing human rights behind closed doors, thus condoning this shameful practice?

[English]

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the human rights situation in China has always been a priority with the Canadian government. As a matter fact recently at the APEC summit meeting our Prime Minister had the opportunity to have bilateral talks with the president of the Chinese government, Mr. Jiang. He raised the human rights issue with him. We raise those issues not only in the bilateral forum but also in the multilateral forum, such as the UN High Commission on Human Rights.

We want to assure every member of the House that the Canadian government has put human rights on an equal priority with trade. We will continue to press those issues with the Chinese government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party and every member of this House would like to congratulate the performance of the captain and crew of the HMCS Calgary and the captain and crew of the Sea King helicopter in the rescue operation this past weekend.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hart: I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence: When can Canadians expect to hear about the bidding process to commence on the new shipborne helicopters?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed heartening to have the hon. member at last congratulate the armed forces on one of its particular exploits. It was of heroic proportions and all Canadians should be proud of those members of the crew of HMCS Calgary.

With respect to the question of maritime helicopters, this is a matter, as I have said publicly before, that will be decided before the end of the fiscal year.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to six petitions.

CANADIAN TRANSPORTATION ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION AND SAFETY BOARD

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to present, in the two official languages, the report of the auditor of the Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board.

This report deals with the financial year ending March 31, 1995. The report stands referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today. I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Fenelon Falls, Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

The petitioners also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the chronically ill, the disabled or the aged. The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

FETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): The second petition has to do with fetal alcohol syndrome. The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that consumption of alcoholic beverages may cause health problems or impair one's ability. Specifically fetal alcohol syndrome and other alcohol related birth defects are 100 per cent preventable by avoiding alcohol consumption during pregnancy.

• (1505)

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation to require health warning labels to be placed on the containers of all alcoholic beverages to caution expectant mothers and others of the risk associated with alcohol consumption.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the final petition was submitted to me by Mrs. Betty Pellier. It has to do with section 43 of the Criminal Code.

The petitioners would like to bring to the attention of the House that section 43 of the Criminal Code allows school teachers, parents and those standing in the place of the parent to use reasonable force for the correction of pupils or children under their care, and that the reasonable force has been interpreted by the courts to include spanking, slapping, strapping, kicking, et cetera.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to end legal approval of this harmful and discriminatory practice by repealing section 43 of the Criminal Code.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to present on behalf of people in the riding of Provencher.

The first petition concerns abortion. It was signed by a number of constituents from Niverville and Morris. These constituents respectfully pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I have is with respect to assisted suicide and euthanasia. It has been signed by constituents from Rosenfeld, Rosenort, Niverville and St–Malo.

They too respectfully pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no change in the law which would sanction or allow in any way the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition collected during the recent tour of the mining photography exhibit Les galeries de mines. The petitioners wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Canadian and Quebec mining industry is the main employer in over 150 communities, a significant contributor to the gross national product and to Canadian exports, and a cornerstone of the Canadian economy. The petitioners therefore pray and call upon the House to take the necessary steps to support our mining industry.

[English]

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I have two petitions primarily from the riding of Windsor West.

The first petition refers to the steps the petitioners wish to be taken with respect to the apprehension, investigation, punishment and release of dangerous sex offenders and pedophiles.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition relates to the issue of doctor assisted suicides.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a number of petitioners from my riding have asked me to present their petition. It draws the attention of the House to the following. The majority of Canadians respect the sanctity of human life and human life at the pre–born stage is not protected in Canadian society. The petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 192 and 205.

[Text]

Question No. 192—Mr. Hanger:

Through which mechanism and in pursuance of which specific powers, either statutory or regulatory, is the federal government able to determine, for the benefit of the provinces, who among all individuals receiving welfare in Canada are sponsored immigrants?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Citizenship and Immigration Canada (CIC) uses memoranda of understanding (MOU) to facilitate the exchange of information on sponsored immigrants with provinces, and where applicable with municipalities, for the purpose of administering social assistance programs and for the department's own sponsorship initiatives. Privacy is a concern and the MOUs must respect federal and provincial privacy legislation. At this time CIC has MOUs with the municipalities of metropolitan Toronto, Peel, Windsor, London, York, and the Ontario ministries of community and social services and health. Negotiations are under way to sign MOUs with other provinces and municipalities that require them. In Ontario some municipalities require their own MOU because the provincial data base does not hold all municipal data.

The MOUs allow CIC to confirm with welfare authorities that an applicant is a sponsored immigrant and how long the sponsorship is for. They also allow welfare authorities to advise CIC when a sponsor has defaulted on his or her sponsorship agreement and to confirm that the sponsor has paid back the provincial funds paid out to the sponsored immigrant.

Question No. 205—Mr. Gilmour:

What was the total dollar amount, direct and indirect, and source of government funding per annum from 1990 to the present, including the 1995–96 estimates, to the Valhalla Society?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I am informed as follows. In so far as the Department of the Environment is concerned,

1994–95, $58,325, environmental partners funds;
1995–96, $21,045, environmental partners funds.

In so far as Human Resources Development Canada is concerned,

1990–91, $1,671, Canadian jobs strategy summer employment placement;
1993–94, $2,624, Canadian strategy workplace based training placement.

The following departments and agencies have reported no information:

Canadian International Development Agency,
Department of Canadian Heritage,
National Capital Commission and Natural Resources Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 144 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 144 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Question No. 144—Mr. Stinson:

For each of the fiscal years 1992–93 and 1993–94, which groups received the ten largest amounts in federal grants for multiculturalism, and what were the amounts?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

THE BALKANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, just before question period, the parliamentary secretary to the defence minister had just completed his speech. I noted that, as in the speech of the Minister of Defence, the government is not providing any details about Canada's intervention in the upcoming peace mission in Bosnia.

From the speeches we have heard in here since this morning, it is clear that, like the Bloc Quebecois, the Reform Party, which is to some extent in favour of participating in this mission, wants to know what the government intends to do.

This morning, we asked for details on how aid will be provided, the size of the contingent, the costs, the time frame involved and Canada's commitments if it were to once again take part in this mission. We had a fine description of Canada's entire in and of how proud everyone is of it, but now we would like the parliamentary secretary to tell us what the direct implications are, as they have yet to be disclosed.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the hon. member gave me an opportunity to comment on some of the things he said.

I really have a problem with this. The opposition parties say there must be a debate in order for them to have input and say what it is they believe the government should be doing. I have heard three speakers and they have sat on the fence saying: "I wish the government would tell us what it is going to do".

In my presentation I went through the roles and missions of the NATO force and what it is supposed to be doing, as did the minister. I listed the participating countries. I mentioned precisely some of the things we may be doing. Last week opposition members had a briefing for over an hour and received a 19–page document with maps, options, command and controls and rules of engagement.

I have some idea of what I would like to do, but I am not permitted to do it. We have to wait for a debate and we want to wait for a debate. The opposition parties are cajoling us. Now that we are having a debate they are criticizing us because we have not told them what it is the government wants to do. If they want us to do that, I imagine the government could accommodate them. We have a lot of good decision makers here, so we could decide.

I thought the purpose of the debate was to allow the opposition parties to have input with respect to roughly how much money they thought would be reasonable and what roles we should continue in peacekeeping. Should they be military roles or would they like the preponderance to be in the human rights area? Should they be quasi–military or quasi–civilian roles? Would they prefer us to put all our eggs in the special commission basket? That is what I want to hear from them. If they want us to tell them, we can do that. Which is it? Do they want to participate or do they not?

The Deputy Speaker: The time for comments and questions has now expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Verchères.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak in this debate on Canada's contribution to the NATO forces as part of the Dayton peace plan.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, on November 21 the three main belligerents agreed to end a conflict that has been raging for more than three years in the former Yugoslavia. The agreement which, for the time being, exists only on paper, was signed in Dayton, Ohio under the auspices of the Americans.

As part of this peace plan, a peace implementation force is to be deployed in the former Yugoslavia, mainly in Bosnia. The implementation force will consist of nearly 60,000 troops. This military force will be under NATO command. Most members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with the exception of Canada, Denmark and Iceland which has no armed forces, have agreed to send troops for the military operation to take place under the Dayton agreements. In fact, Canada has yet formally to advise its allies whether it intends to participate in these operations and, if so, what its contribution will be.

That is why we are having a debate today in this House. The Liberal government claims it wishes to consult Parliament before making a decision on Canada's participation in this operation.

In the past few weeks it has been clear that the Liberal government does not play by the rules. In fact, we have a distinct impression of déjà vu.

The government has already made up its mind. This was obvious from a report in the Citizen on Friday, December 1, quoting National Defence spokesman Stéphane Corbin as saying that no decision had been made on the Canadian contribution. However, Canada's commitment is clear.

The Prime Minister already made it perfectly clear that Canada would send troops. On November 23, the Prime Minister said: "Of course, we will send troops, but the size of our contribution will depend on what we are able to do and what we are asked to do". In this statement, the leader of the government showed how little respect he has for this House, whose prerogatives he should be the first to defend, but he seems quite incapable of doing so.

This becomes even more obvious when we realize that the Prime Minister already agreed with UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros–Ghali on the duration of Canada's participation in this NATO mission. They apparently agreed that any country taking part in the implementation force would be committed until peace was restored in the former Yugoslavia, whether it took six months or three years.

Making such a commitment without consulting Parliament, despite the changeable situation and the possible consequences, is very alarming for the future and shows a flagrant lack of consideration for the role of Parliament.

Despite condemning this kind of behaviour, the official opposition has a duty to fulfil its role in this House and to act in accordance with its principles and ideals. Not only because of our responsibility to our fellow citizens, but also because of our responsibility to the international community.

For these reasons and despite the partisan politics that can divide us in this House, the Bloc Quebecois supports the government's commitment to send troops to the former Yugoslavia so that the Dayton peace agreement can be implemented.

Despite its flaws, this agreement may be our last chance to end the conflict that has been raging for years in that region of the Balkans. Even if Canada's participation appears to lack public support and involves risks for our soldiers, we must not remain insensitive to what is occurring outside our borders.

For several years now, Bosnia–Hercegovina has been ravaged by a war to which we too often remain indifferent, because television often shows us only nameless faces that resemble millions of others. Yet, each person living in this region torn apart by this deadly conflict enjoyed an apparently normal life before all this started. Men, women and children have seen their lives turned upside down by this protracted, seemingly endless conflict. We have a moral obligation to them, because our responsibility is not restricted to the national territory of Quebec and Canada.

For most of their histories, Quebec and Canada have been spared from violent conflicts. Although we have long enjoyed a very enviable standard of living, we should not forget that others outside our borders are suffering and need our help. Given its status as an affluent nation, Canada has a responsibility to help those who are the innocent victims of war.

In response to our Reform colleagues, I must point out that we should stop looking at outside conflicts or problems as having nothing to do with our domestic problems. In this world of increasing globalization and integration, we must realize that international problems are also our domestic problems, and that our domestic problems are also international problems.

International developments have a direct impact on Canada and Quebec. When dealing, for example, with population movements, missed business opportunities, etc., we must realize that developments abroad have an impact on our domestic policies.

Our goal is not to interfere in another country's internal affairs. We will not be deciding for them what is good or bad.

Our responsibility is limited to preventing those who did not ask for this conflict in the first place from suffering and being killed. So far, this responsibility has been carried out through the UNPROFOR, as part of a peacekeeping operation. However, measures taken to date were unsuccessful in putting an end to the conflict and its disastrous consequences.

Two weeks ago, the three main belligerents unexpectedly agreed to stop fighting. But for the peace plan to work, they need our help. The help they need from us does, however, involve risks much higher than those faced by Canadian troops who took part in UNPROFOR peacekeeping operations in the past three and a half years, no matter what our defence minister says; he who would have us believe that the type of military intervention contemplated is no riskier than the peacekeeping mission started in 1991.

In fact, the risks associated with the military operation arising from the Dayton agreements are higher because the nature of the operation to be carried out by NATO is completely different from the one carried out by the UNPROFOR. The operations lead by the UN in the former Yugoslavia since 1991 were conducted under Chapter VI of the UN Charter, which allows only for the pacific settlement of disputes between parties concerned.

Article 33 is quite clear on this matter. It reads as follows: "1. The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice".

Then: "2. The Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such means". This is what articles 33.1 and 33.2 say.

But what we are debating today is not a simple peacekeeping operation, in which acts of aggression, while always possible, are unlikely. We are talking about a major military operation designed to force peace on belligerents. To implement the Dayton agreements, our troops will be mobilized in accordance with Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

Under the provisions of this chapter, armed forces under UN command, or the delegated command of NATO in this case, are allowed to use all necessary means to restore peace and fulfil their mission. This kind of mission exposes our troops to much higher risks, as they are more likely to see fire. Of course, they will be able to retaliate, but they would definitely be exposed to much more brutal attacks.

It is the first time that such an operation is led by NATO since the Korean war, more than 40 years ago. Therefore, we must ensure that our participation is not tainted by an aggression that could jeopardize Canada's credibility regarding peacekeeping operations. The government must inform Quebeckers and Canadians of the possible consequences of such a mission. We have the right to know what dangers may lie ahead for our troops.

For that reason, the Canadian government must immediately tell us what its policy will be in the months to come in this regard. Unlike what occurred when our troops were sent to the former Yugoslavia as part of UNPROFOR, the Bloc Quebecois feels that, this time, Ottawa must take its place and stop being meek. As you know, throughout our participation in UNPROFOR, the number of Canadian troops remained around 2,000, one of the largest contingents after those of France and the United Kingdom.

Yet, the federal government was not able to ensure Canada's active involvement in the political decision making process to manage the conflict. In spite of its strong participation in UNPROFOR, our country was not included in the international contact group set up in April 1994 to find a solution to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. That group included the United States, France, the United Kingdom and Germany. Given its implication, Canada fully deserved to be a member of that group.

Considering the large number of Canadian troops in the former Yugoslavia, we expected the federal government to take initiatives and propose solutions as to how to solve the conflict and end it. However, as we know, no such initiatives were taken.

Once it was decided to send humanitarian assistance and troops to maintain peace in the former Yugoslavia, Canadian diplomacy was content to let things happen. For these reasons, although we support Canada's contribution to helping implement the Dayton peace plan, we must be careful not to repeat past mistakes.

Therefore, we must immediately take a close look at all the issues relating to Canada's participation in the peace process in the former Yugoslavia. First, it is obvious to the Bloc Quebecois that Canada's participation in this NATO mission ought not to exceed the size of its UNPROFOR contingent, about 2,000 at its highest point.

Canada must make its intention of continuing to be actively involved in the peace process clear to the various stakeholders. I would like to take this opportunity to point out the regretfully low contribution of our European allies, with the exception of France, Great Britain and Germany, to this military force to be set up as part of the Dayton agreements. As for our own participation, it ought to be substantial enough to enable our diplomacy to play an active role in coming months.

The Bloc has difficulty seeing how Canada could send any more soldiers to Bosnia–Hercegovina. Over the past three years, Canada has spent $517 million on its UNPROFOR participation and on humanitarian aid for the former Yugoslavia, or nearly $172 million a year. According to the Minister of Defence, the annual cost of sending between 50 and 3,500 Canadian soldiers to Bosnia–Hercegovina, however, would range between $2 million and $75 million.

In the same breath, the Minister of Defence admits that the cost of taking part in a NATO mission is twice as high as for an equivalent UN mission. The Bloc's extreme scepticism about the Minister of Defence's figures is therefore understandable. That is why I am demanding, on behalf of Quebec's and Canada's taxpayers, that the federal government provide a clear figure for the expenses that would be incurred in sending troops to Bosnia–Hercegovina, and do so even before they leave this country.

Moreover, Ottawa must provide Canadians and Quebeckers with answers on the composition of the Canadian task force. The public wants to know, not only how many troops will be deployed, but whether only combat troops will be deployed or logistics and support troops as well.

There is no doubt in the minds of Bloc members that, judging from our past experience in peacekeeping operations, Canada ought to assume tasks more closely related to monitoring and communications, both being areas in which we have recognized expertise. In other words, only a small proportion of our force should be combat troops.

The public also has the right to know how long our troops will be in Bosnia–Hercegovina. According to the Department of National Defence, allied chiefs of staff have agreed on rules for troop deployment for a period of 12 months. What if the government wants to extend the mandate of our troops? Will Parliament be asked to do so two days before their mandate expires, as was the case last April, when it was asked to renew the mandate of our peacekeepers with UNPROFOR? And will the Canadian government once again have made up its mind, as it did today, before the matter is tabled in Parliament? Will it show the same lack of consideration for the people of Quebec and Canada?

Will Canada have a political say in how our soldiers are used? This matter is an important one for the Bloc Quebecois. We realize that Canada has a moral obligation to participate in the implementation of the Dayton agreements. However, this obligation should not obscure the fact that we also have a responsibility to the public and to the soldiers who will be deployed over there. The Bloc Quebecois feels that the Canadian government should at all times have the right to withdraw its troops from this mission. Ottawa should provide assurances to that end as well as a plan for emergency withdrawal.

According to the latest news, France, Belgium and Canada wanted a say in operations in case of incidents on the ground, but the United States objected.

• (1530)

It seems the matter has been resolved, but no one knows what transpired. The Canadian government must answer these questions before sending a single soldier to Bosnia.

Today, the public does not know how many of our troops will be sent over there, what role they will play or to which international division they will belong. Although these questions are important and deserve clear answers, the public is even more concerned about the risks to which our soldiers will be exposed.

There are also a number of other aspects involved in the implementation of the Dayton peace agreements, and I am referring to the trial of war criminals. As far as the Bloc Quebecois is concerned, the war crimes tribunal set up by the United Nations must pursue its mission fully and independently. According to my party, amnesty is out of the question for those who are accused of war crimes, including Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic and General Ratko Mladic.

The Dayton agreements indicate that these two individuals are to be excluded from political life, and rumour has it that these "warlords" may benefit from some kind of amnesty. Can the Government of Canada tell us whether it intends to insist that our allies and the international community respect the mandate of the international criminal court? Anything else would be unacceptable to us.

If the Dayton accords can be implemented without too much problem, we will have a moral obligation to help the people of the former Yugoslavia rebuild their country. We will have to see what we can do, from an economic point of view. So the federal government should take a clear stand immediately on the role it intends to play at the meeting of the World Bank in Brussels on finding funds for Bosnia–Hercegovina. Similarly, we might ask ourselves whether Canada can help in the expunging of Bosnia–Hercegovina's foreign debt, given the lamentable state of its own public finances. These are the questions that warrant our attention, and the position of the Canadian government should be clarified as quickly as possible.

In closing, allow me to once again express my regret at the fact that the federal government had decided before holding this debate that it would send Canadian troops to former Yugoslavia. In so doing, as it did with the renewal of Canada's participation in UNPROFOR in May, the government is demonstrating a lack of respect for Canadians.

We would like the government to consult this House within a year on whether we should pursue our involvement, and we would hope that it would not do so within a couple of hours of renewing the mandate.

Finally, I would like to point out that, in view of the change in our soldiers' mandate in Bosnia–Hercegovina, it would appear vitally important that the government keep open the option of withdrawing our troops at any time. If the NATO mission is incident free, so much the better. However, should the situation worsen, the government should keep all its options open, including that of bringing our troops home.

The latter possibility should not be taken lightly, because just last Saturday, General Ratko Mladic, the leader of the Bosnian Serbs, said that the Dayton agreements on Sarajevo should be renegotiated and that the Serbs would never agree to being governed by what they call the "butchers". A short while ago, the American general, John Shalikashvili, said the following on the NATO mission in Bosnia–Hercegovina as well:

[English]

"The mission will be tough, there is no doubt about it, and we have to be prepared for casualties".

[Translation]

The federal government will soon be sending troops to Bosnia–Hercegovina as part of a mission to impose peace, which will not be fun and games. The federal government must therefore know what to expect and act accordingly, because the lives of our troops are at stake. Ottawa must also get busy about other aspects of this mission, including proceedings against those guilty of war crimes.

The government may rest assured that the Bloc will be watching carefully and will follow the situation closely to ensure that the interests of our troops and, of course, of the people of Bosnia are looked after.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for a presentation that certainly relates to the debate. I want to make a couple of comments with respect to the more pointed nature of my feelings on what he had to say.

I certainly do understand his concern as a member of the opposition about the possibility of changing the structure, the participation, the withdrawal, or the future of any NATO force and the Canadian participation without a debate in the House. I would at the same time quickly remind him that his leader was a member of the government who not more than four years ago participated in committing a very large Canadian force to the Persian Gulf without as much as one word of debate in the House. I will tell him that if that has to happen, I would ask him to be considerate because it is not without precedent.

The previous government, of which his leader was a cabinet minister, used the phrase that it was not expeditious and propitious to do that. It is not always propitious and expeditious, so I would ask him to have understanding for these kinds of things.

I was expecting to hear from the parties opposite some comment on the size and structure of the force. I will give the hon. member credit, he talked about the possibility of surveillance and communications troops. However he did not give any indication of the scope of money he or his party were prepared to support.

The opposition parties, both the main opposition and the third party, have been mouthing off to the press. They have been going through a great litany and lexicon of rhetoric about not having a debate. Now that the time has arrived, lo and behold, they do not want to tell us what is on their minds. I have not heard a member of the opposition, with the exception of the possibility of surveillance and communications troops, say anything about what they would like to have in the way of whether it should be military, quasi–military, should we be a member of the commission, what kind of rules of engagement we should have, what kind of a force we should have that is tailored to this kind of a mission, what kind of conditions we should have in place to withdraw.

The conditions are right for the members of the opposition to stand up and put their money where their mouths are and tell us what they want to do. Do not be afraid. We will consider it. We may not do it to the letter of the law, but give us some range. What do they have in mind? What are we good at doing? Should we continue doing what we were doing before or should we do something differently? What other areas of expertise would they like us to use? Mr. Speaker, ask them to tell us what they would like to do.

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, I ask the parliamentary secretary, to read the remarks I made a few minutes ago, when they are available tomorrow.

The parliamentary secretary claims that we made no suggestions to the government. He really should read what I said, because we made many suggestions to the government, and it ought to consider them. None of the speeches by members on the government side this morning ever mentioned the number of troops it intends to send to Bosnia or the length of time they would have to stay there. None of the speeches made by government members mentioned the type of troops to be sent there. Should they be combat troops, communications troops, engineering troops, medical support troops?

The government has been absolutely silent on this issue since it called this debate. Today, we are asked to debate this issue. We readily admit that it is up to the government to make decisions on foreign policy, but we do not recognize in this debate the commitment made by this government to consult Parliament on foreign policy issues, since these are always hurried consultations. When Parliament is consulted, it is always in a hurry. On the one hand, members of Parliament cannot prepare adequately and, on the other, they know that the government has already made up its mind and decided what to do even before they were consulted. This whole consultation process in the House is nothing but a sham.

When the parliamentary secretary claims that we do not recognize this role of the government, stating that the present Leader of the Opposition was a member of the previous government, I simply remind him, because he does not seem to have noticed yet, that the Leader of the Opposition resigned from the Conservative government and is now the leader of the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely astounded at the hon. member's suggestions. I know my colleagues in the Reform Party, who have been weak kneed today, agree with me at least in respect of the hon. member who just spoke, who has made these outrageous suggestions that somehow the government is at fault for not explaining its policies.

I sat here this morning and heard the Minister of National Defence make the most lucid remarks explaining the government's position and saying what he felt the government's obligation was. He laid it out for all members of the House to hear. The hon. parliamentary secretary made a speech that was a model of clarity and brilliance. Yet the opposition has sought to obfuscate on this matter.

The hon. member who just spoke will not tell us his party's views. As we said, the whole purpose of the debate is to hear the views of all hon. members so the government can reach a decision based on the views of members of the House.

[Translation]

The hon. member who just spoke did not explain the official opposition's views. I am surprised that he did not clearly explain them when he answered the question put to him by my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. Instead, he attacked the hon. member who asked the question. I cannot understand this.

[English]

He said that the hon. member did not know what he was talking about, that the government was not coming clean with the House and the government had an obligation to lead and decide and make all the decisions. Yes, it does, and the government will make the decision on Wednesday. The Minister of National Defence indicated that ever so clearly in his remarks this morning. Obviously it has gone right over the heads of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Bergeron: May I answer?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member will get a chance to respond. I am looking forward to his response, but I would like him to answer some questions. Will he tell us how much money he thinks we should spend on this mission, how long we should stay, how many troops we should commit? Tell us the answers to those questions. The government will listen to the hon. member and make a decision accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing to see our government colleagues claim that they want a non–partisan debate while they turn it into a truly partisan debate with their speeches, questions and comments following our speeches.

In my speech, I clearly indicated how many troops—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bergeron: If you listened, you might understand my answer. Pay attention to what I am telling you.

How many troops should we send. I mentioned that. How long should they stay. I mentioned that. How much it should cost. I mentioned that too.

I do not know if the member for Kingston and the Islands was peacefully resting on his desk during my speech, but, obviously, he did not listen to anything I said.

An hon. member: This is not the first time, it is always like that.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just arrived. Certainly it is a great way to start off one's debate on this very important matter.

I heard people across the way saying that the government should make a decision on this thing. I suppose if the government had made a decision on it, then we would have been doing the wrong thing and should have had the debate in the first place. As I understood, this was the object of the exercise, to have a debate. At the end of the day, with the feelings of the House of Commons made known, the government will make a decision as to our participation in the former Yugoslavia.

It is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate today because I am one of the people who believe that Parliament should take part in these debates and decisions that are being made in this type of operation to send our troops to foreign countries. This is something we have said in this place for the seven years I have been here, that these debates should take place. By and large that is what happened since our party came into power in 1993.

I have no doubt, and I do not think many have, in what should happen to our role in the peace process in the former Yugoslavia. Peace in the region has been a long time coming, but it has finally arrived. I am glad to say that with the participation of the implementation force with Canada peace will be maintained.

Some hon. members from across the floor, as well as some other Canadians, have questioned the role we have played in the former Yugoslavia to date and have even questioned if we should be there at all.

As I have said before, I believe we were needed then and, more important, we are needed now more than ever. The conflict that ended with the agreement reached in Dayton, Ohio contained many atrocities the global community should never have witnessed and hopefully will never witness again.

To ensure this Canada must continue its tradition of peacekeeping and participate in the implementation force. We must help maintain the fragile peace that has been maintained.

International involvement is a benefit to everyone. The world is a complex community. States are interrelated in many ways, economically, politically and socially.

Conflict breeds conflict and we must do all we can to prevent conflicts from occurring and end the ones that already exist. Better relations among nations carry a benefit shared by all. Peace operations are a major part of this philosophy.

All of us know Canada has a long distinguished tradition of peacekeeping. We all like to trot out the name of the Hon. Lester B. Pearson. He was the man who invented it.

Our forces are not strangers to international missions, and we all speak about that. We are all so proud of that. Only a select few such as Canada have taken a lead in peacekeeping. Since 1947 more than 100,000 Canadians have served abroad in over 30 peacekeeping and related operations.

This is unmatched by our allies. We have recently paid homage to the 103 Canadian soldiers who gave their lives in these missions. Unfortunately I doubt they will be the last, but this is a risk we must take.

We are acting for a greater goal. International peace and security do not come without a price. The end of the cold war was celebrated by many, but little did we realize that such a vacuum would bring about so many regional conflicts. The importance of joint intervention has increased tremendously over the last number of years.

As a result international organizations, primarily United Nations, have become more involved in state disputes, having to toil with human rights and humanitarian issues on a far greater scale than ever before.

The potential for peace is there and Canada must do its part to achieve it. Without international co–operation how can we expect world peace to become a reality? We are not magicians and we cannot pull a white dove out of a black hat. We, as a member of the industrialized world, must accept reality and participate in the fight for peace. Canada long ago accepted this fact.

Not only are we members of numerous international organizations, we have continually participated in every United Nations peacekeeping operation. It is our duty to continue to play our role in this way.

As everyone knows, the nature of peacekeeping missions has changed dramatically since they were first established. From unarmed observers of peace agreements in the early years of peacekeeping, they have since taken on stronger roles of armed enforcers of peace agreements. It was a slow transition until recently. Since the end of the cold war international missions have been given much tougher mandates. In some cases, such as Bosnia, they were not wanted, they were not respected and they were even used as human shields.

Yes, much has changed since 1947. Generally we speak of peacekeeping in general terms, but peacekeeping has not always been peacekeeping in the true sense of the word. Missions have been used to contain the conflict and maintain the surrounding peace, to actually make peace or to enforce the peace once it had been reached.

The signing of the peace agreement with the formal peace accord to be signed on December 14 has stopped the fighting and the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. Peace has been made. Canadian personnel were there and will be there to assist humanitarian operations.

We were not there to keep the peace earlier because there was no peace. Now that peace has been reached as part of IFOR, we will be there to keep the peace, hence that is where peacekeeping comes from.

Although the mission will be a NATO led enforcement mission and not a peacekeeping mission in the traditional sense, to me it is still very much a peacekeeping mission. There will be peace to be kept.

Already we have heard some members focus on the specific role our men and women should play in IFOR. Before I add my views on these matters I will talk about the process of determining our role. Let us have no doubt that the Canadian government will have the final say on all rules of engagement used by Canadian forces.

To me there is little question that we should participate in IFOR, but how many, for how long and in what capacity is up for debate. The Minister of National Defence has consulted our allies on what is still needed for this force. What other countries have already committed will also determine what we will say.

There are many ways we can participate and contribute to the implementation force. There is a multitude of military tasks within the mission, all of which I will not dwell on given the amount of time I have, but I would like to mention a few.

Recently we heard the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands suggest we send an air squadron rather than land forces. All of the air power required is needed from other countries. We have always had troops on the ground to cover the front line. Our troops should be there. Our troops have much to offer in enforcing the ceasefire, enforcing the demilitarization zones to defend persons, property or areas designated as protected, and so on.

Do not get me wrong, that should not end our contribution. Besides having our infantry we should contribute in areas of logistical, medical and air support.

The parameters of the implementation force appear to be quite broad and they are not just to keep the peace but in co–operation with civilian assistance to help rebuild the region. War has devastating effects on people, their communities and countries.

The former Yugoslavia has much to rebuild. The capital city, Sarajevo, where just 10 short years ago the Olympic Games were held, is in ruin. Canada should participate in the non–military operations as well. Getting the region rebuilt quickly will diffuse many grudges held and allow countries to withdraw their forces sooner rather than later.

We all know Canada is proud of its troops, for they are among the best in the world. We should give them a symbol of that admiration. To my colleagues on all sides of the House I say yes to the implementation force, yes to sending our troops and yes to giving them the recognition they need when it is over.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Hillsborough for his speech describing what the Canadian Armed Forces have done over the years. It is true their peacekeeping activity has been quite extraordinary. However, the people of Canada and the people in my riding who elected me and who expect me to ask the appropriate questions here in this House when necessary, are wondering what to think now.

• (1555)

Can Canada still afford conducting the operations it is conducting all over the world, at a time when we are cutting welfare benefits, and asking all Canadians and all Quebeckers to tighten their belts one more notch? That is the question we must ask ourselves.

Can we still afford such measures? If our means are limited, why not be content with limited involvement, instead of always claiming that we are out to save the world?

Mr. Young: Take limited action, like the separatists.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): This has nothing to do with separatism. The minister is just babbling away.

Why seek to do great things, at a great cost, when we know very well that we cannot afford them? Let us be modest. That is what Canadians and Quebeckers will ask: that we be modest in the decisions we make now.

Yes, we must go, to honour our commitments to NATO. But let us participate according to our means. This really has to be said.

[English]

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the lecture. It is tough when money is not available to do certain things but if we do not work to maintain peace in the world we will not have the luxury of social programs or anything else.

Conflict has the ability to spread throughout the world. That is why we are in the NATO alliance. That is why we are members of the United Nations. That is why we have participated actively over the last 50 years to ensure the world is a better place. Even with all the problems, Canada has played its role and should continue to play its role. I do not believe peace has a price.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with is an escalation of the traditional peacekeeping, as the hon. member has pointed out, in which Canada has proudly participated since the Suez crisis of 1956.

This is a new level of readiness, a combat situation. NATO is clearly asking Canada for combat troops. The U.S. has said NATO wants land forces and the U.S. president has said it is willing to accept casualties in this higher level of participation.

The hon. member spoke about Canada always being there, always able to be there. In the 1960s we had a force of some 120,000. In just a few short years we will be down to a force of some 60,000 but the commitments have increased over time.

I quote from the defence minister's white paper of a few months ago: "Canada cannot and need not participate in every multilateral operation. Our resources are finite and we may not agree with the purpose or the organization of a given mission".

How many Canadian soldiers have to be sacrificed so that the Canadian government can continue on this course?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian government does not want to sacrifice any Canadian soldiers. As I said, over a period of years our forces have become smaller but we have participated and I believe we have to participate.

We have talked many times about the situation in the former Yugoslavia. Last year and the year before we were told we could not do what we will be able to do this time. If our soldiers find themselves in troublesome situations they can use force to get out of them.

That is what we are saying. I am not suggesting for a minute we want to sacrifice our soldiers. I believe this will be as safe a mission as it can be. There is a chance of soldiers being injured in any mission. That is life. Every man and woman who joins the Canadian forces or any other force knows that.

We are not doing this to put Canadian soldiers at risk. We are doing it to maintain the peace accord which has been signed and to stop these terrible atrocities from continuing. I believe that Canada and all Canadians will be proud to participate in such a force.

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for me to rise in this House this afternoon.

Peacekeeping missions took a new turn in the 1990s. In order to meet the new challenges of global security in the next century, we need a United Nations Organization and other international organizations that are able to play a more efficient role in conflict resolution.

The extent and complexity of contemporary peacekeeping missions call for the UN to ask regional organizations to play a greater role in conflict resolution.

The role of NATO in this effort is an excellent example of the kind of co–operation that is possible between international organizations.

The UN is the ideal tool for giving legitimacy to an international peace mission and NATO is the organization best equipped for carrying out a mission in Europe, especially one that could call for the use of force. But the UN still needs to be changed.

Created in the 1940s, the organization must get the tools necessary for facing the challenges of global security in this century and those to come. The UN record since the end of the cold war is quite impressive for the most part. Missions in El Salvador, Cambodia, Mozambique and Haiti have produced sound results. But failures in Africa and the former Yugoslavia have raised some doubts.

Unfortunately, many member states put all the problems of the world on the UN's shoulders, which is very unfair. Member states must stop criticizing and start doing their bit. Canada is well aware of the UN's problems, but our government is determined to find solutions.

Given our experience and expertise in all aspects of peacekeeping and the new ideas we propose, we are in a unique position to help the UN. Canada helps to improve UN peacekeeping missions in different ways, such as offering expertise at UN headquarters in New York and establishing the Lester B. Pearson training centre for peacekeeping at Cornwallis, Nova Scotia.

As Canadians, we can offer pragmatic and feasible ideas to prepare the UN for the future. Last September, for example, Canada submitted to the General Assembly the results of a study to improve the UN's response capability to respond in times of crisis. Events in Rwanda showed that simple measures can settle a crisis before it sets completely out of hand.

[English]

The Canadian study recommends concrete changes at all levels of the UN system to ensure that such measures can be implemented quickly and effectively. These changes would be cost effective and their implementation would not require any reform to the present UN charter.

The study's clear recommendation is its proposal to create a multinational, multidisciplinary headquarters planning cell, comprised of military and civilian personnel from member states. This planning cell, which would operate under the authority of the security council and the strategic direction of the Secretary–General, would fill an enormous vacuum in the UN system.

It would be responsible for planning and preparing for rapid deployment of a multi–functional standby force of up to 5,000 military and civilian personnel. This force would be deployed for a brief period either to meet an immediate crisis or to anticipate the arrival of follow–on forces or a more traditional peacekeeping operation.

For this vanguard concept to work, this rapid reaction force, the UN standby arrangement system would need to be enhanced so that all the essential components of the force, either military or civilian, could be identified well in advance.

The authority to deploy personnel would still require a UN resolution as well as the consent of each participating government. So far the response to our study from other member states has been encouraging. We look forward to building on this initiative in the months ahead.

In conclusion, while the international environment is becoming even more complex, it is no surprise that peacekeeping has followed suit. As new security threats continue to emerge, Canada and other members of the international community must not let up their efforts to discover new and innovative approaches to peacekeeping.

Whatever the challenges are, Canada's commitment to this useful conflict resolution tool should remain steadfast.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party has been saying today that this debate is a lot of smoke and mirrors because we will not have the opportunity to vote on this issue.

The argument that we are putting forward is that the government has already made a decision and has committed to sending troops.

I was wondering if the hon. member could comment on the most recent Canadian Press report from just a few minutes ago. It states: "A NATO official has said that Canada has committed a headquarters brigade and a battalion to IFOR". This would mean a participation in the neighbourhood of anywhere between 1,200 and 1,500 people. What does the member have to say?

[Translation]

Mr. Bertrand: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for his question. What he just said, however, is not quite true. Absolutely nothing has been decided. Members of the third party have not yet revealed any of their views concerning the force to be deployed in the former Yugoslavia.

I have been here for nearly an hour, but I have still not heard any real suggestions from the third party. I will remain in the House a little longer to see if they offer any positive suggestions.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, following the speech by the hon. member opposite, I would like to share some of my thoughts about what is going on.

The government is asking us to agree to send troops under NATO command, but it is being vague about it. This is what makes it difficult. It is difficult for us to take a position, because we do not know how much that will cost, how long the mission will last and what responsibilities will be given to our troops.

It is therefore very difficult for the opposition to decide. We, in the Bloc, are in agreement with the proposal in hand. We agree but, as I said earlier, restraint has to be used, and my hon. colleague just said something to this effect. So we agree on this. However, we will not know before this debate comes to an end how much all this will cost. In other words, the government is asking us to give it a blank cheque. I would like the hon. member to comment on that.

• (1610)

Mr. Bertrand: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Shefford for his question. We are here to listen to what the official opposition has to say.

Let me repeat what I told the member of the third party. I did not hear any suggestion from that party as to the size and the duration of our involvement. I will stay in the House for a while, and I look forward to hearing members in the official opposition provide us with at least that information.

[English]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get a very clear and definitive answer to the question that my colleague just asked the hon. member. Has Canada already committed troops to this UN initiative? Yes or no.

Mr. Bertrand: Mr. Speaker, what is clear is that there has been a commitment from Canada to participate. There has been no clear commitment on the number of forces and other things to be committed.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to participate in the debate today on an issue of national importance, the NATO mandate to commit a peace implementation force to Bosnia.

The Reform Party supports international peacekeeping commitments and takes pride in the work that our armed forces have done worldwide. They have a reputation of being the best peacekeepers in the world and this reputation is well deserved.

From Korea, Cambodia, the Golan Heights, Bosnia, Somalia and Rwanda Canadians have been there and have done the job asked of them with honour, dignity and determination. They have performed above and even beyond the call of duty.

Nothing serves to show the dedication and bravery of our troops better than the rescue mission of a Romanian freighter sinking in a storm off the Atlantic coast this past weekend. A master corporal with the support of his colleagues rescued the crew in a 30–year–old helicopter despite the odds and the shortcomings of this antiquated vehicle. This helicopter lacks sufficient range, forcing the frigate to close in tightly to the distressed ship and the master corporal and his colleagues are true Canadian heroes.

Since the end of the cold war peacekeeping has changed dramatically. We have left the era of classic peacekeeping to a new era of active peace enforcing. In response to this change the Liberal government has increased Canada's peacekeeping commitments.

However, the Liberals have done this without a coherent policy. They have increased our commitment while decreasing significantly the resources they are willing to allocate to the Department of National Defence and military personnel.

This must be considered before we can determine what kind of force Canada is able to contribute to IFOR. We must also have a clear set of conditions before we commit our armed forces to a task such as this.

Reform Party members have developed such a clear set of conditions that we would like followed before committing our troops on peacekeeping and peace enforcing missions. The Reform Party's conditions are: one, all peacekeeping missions must be approved in advance by Parliament, including a proposed budget; two, the belligerents must signify their genuine willingness to settle their conflict peacefully; three, the mandate, duration and rules of engagement must be specified and adequate command and control must be in place, sufficient resources must be available to do the job; four, Canada must be included in any diplomatic negotiations; five, rules governing troop rotation must be established and adhered to.

As it stands right now the Liberal government has not been forthcoming with information to determine whether these conditions are being met.

Today we are debating the issue of contributing to the NATO peace enforcing mission in Bosnia. However, this is only a take note debate. Parliament will make no decisions here today. The government has already made the decision.

The United States has made it known that Canada is contributing between 1,200 and 1,500 troops. Twenty–two Canadians were sent to Bosnia on Saturday with other NATO forces to begin the preparations for the main NATO force. The Canadian people had no voice in this decision.

Canadians will not know whether the belligerents are genuine about peace until they sign a formal agreement scheduled for December 14. This is not a done deal. The leader of the Bosnian Serbs has already served notice that he is not happy with the accord and he has warned of bloodshed over Sarajevo.

While supporting all peace efforts in Bosnia, I have a number of military concerns this government must take into consideration before sending our troops to Bosnia. Before we make a commitment to IFOR we must first assess whether our land forces have the personnel, the equipment and the resources necessary to contribute to the IFOR mission; second, whether our land forces are facing a morale problem; and third, whether questions on leadership raised by the Somalia inquiry should be addressed prior to a deployment of this nature.

For the past 25 years the Canadian Armed Forces have been abused politically and financially by governments to the point where our forces are in disarray. They are quickly becoming ineffective in taking on missions asked of them by the government. This is not an indictment of our military personnel who shoulder the burden of these commitments, but it is a condemnation of successive governments that have failed to provide effective leadership and resources to the Department of National Defence. Our armed forces are at the edge not of technology or effectiveness, but at the edge of survival as a fighting force.

The 1995 budget of the Liberal government has cut the defence budget to the point of calling into question whether our land forces are capable of sustaining any combat role. To the Minister of Finance I say that there is a point at which armed forces must be funded to remain viable. We have hit that point. Yet the Department of National Defence is bracing itself for more cuts at a time when our government finally is calling on them to do a job they should have been equipped to do in the first place.

No other country has neglected its armed forces as much as Canada. In the early 1960s our armed forces totalled over 120,000. Today the Liberal government is reducing that number to some 60,000. Yet the demand on our armed forces has remained the same. And the demand on our military personnel will only increase as the new world order unfolds.

Our whole army is approximately 23,000 people, which is smaller than the metropolitan Toronto police force. In fact we could take the whole army and march it into B.C. Place Stadium to watch a football game and there would still be room for thousands of additional spectators.

In addition, our armed forces have been almost demilitarized. The government has trained and equipped our land forces for classical peacekeeping based on lightly armed troops. Leaders are being taught the wrong lessons, which could result in a disaster when faced with a serious combat situation. This is at a time when classical peacekeeping is required less and less.

Peacekeeping missions are now peace enforcing missions, requiring the skills and equipment our government has neglected. The Liberals have based their security policy on peacekeeping alone, at the expense of our combat readiness and conventional capabilities.

Being trained and equipped to act as a peacekeeping force is a far cry from stepping into a conventional combat role. This is what the Liberals are asking of our land forces today. Due to the Liberal government's procrastination, our 30–year old armoured personnel carriers will not be replaced until 1997. The land forces lack critical support infrastructure such as logistics and medical.

I would like to quote from a recent study by the Conference of Defence Associations. They state:

> —the Armed Forces are in fact a facade, or a three–dimensional chess board, in which many pieces are missing from the main board, and almost none exist at all on the lower supporting boards.

If the Liberals send our land forces on this IFOR combat mission to Bosnia, we may be asking our land forces to pay the price for the lack of government leadership they have had. No wonder morale in the Canadian Armed Forces is at its all time low. The Minister of National Defence in his rhetoric blames the low morale on the Reform Party. However, the attack on our armed forces by the Liberal government is responsible for the low morale. This in turn has its own cost on operational ability in our land forces. For the past three years they have been forced to rotate 3,000 personnel on UN missions every six months. To many, this may not sound like very much. Many states can field such a force without difficulty. Because of the size of our modest land forces, successive rotations of 3,000 troops is a significant burden.

In fact it is a burden that normal training, which is imperative before any mission, has ground to a halt. Our land forces have been forced to scramble to be able to put together the personnel and the units to fulfil the commitments the government has obliged them to do.

Sadly, the Minister of National Defence blames again, of course, the Reform Party, the only party that is looking out for the interests of our troops, for the problems of his own making. The minister is responsible for the morale problems and should not pass the buck in this cowardly manner.

The morale problem is well documented. For example, an August 1995 chaplains' report states that we are seriously taxing the morale necessary to remain a competent force. It states that rapid successions of deployments requiring the members to continually be away from their families must be balanced with adequate time at home. Stress levels are at an all time high, resulting in breakdown of the family and other serious problems.

I am gravely concerned that the government will commit a significant number of our land forces personnel to Bosnia without taking the morale issue of the rotation of our troops into consideration. We cannot rely on land forces reserves to take up the slack. We need them to help the regulars maintain operational strength during their UN tours. While this was occurring, the Minister of National Defence announced the number of militia reserves was being cut by some 6,000.

The rapid succession of deployments is not the only factor that is reducing morale and operational effectiveness. The Somalia inquiry has raised a number of questions regarding the leadership of our forces as well. The leadership problems have been documented extensively by senior officers in the Canadian forces. For example, one report last March states that there is a grave lack of confidence in the senior defence hierarchy among the rank and file. The report states that there is a widespread belief in the Canadian Armed Forces that political agendas and careerism have replaced leadership in the defence hierarchy. The report discusses the perception among soldiers that the loyalty and focus of senior officers is directed upwards, and not downwards to the rank and file. It criticizes how leaders appear hypersensitive to human rights and political correctness at the expense of building the warrior ethic in soldiers. The report states that soldiers perceive that their interests and welfare are being sacrificed so that senior leaders can be successful in delivering the same bang for the buck.

It is ill–advised for the government to consider sending combat troops to Bosnia, given the seriousness of this problem and the fact that the Somalia inquiry investigating the chain of command will not issue a report and recommendations until June 1996.

The government should seriously consider the current state of land forces before committing them to this combat mission. I stress this is not the classical peacekeeping to which Canadians have become accustomed, nor are our land forces trained and equipped. Our whole land force has spent the last three years training for peacekeeping deployments. They lack the equipment and the resources. Morale is low and there are questions about leadership that must be addressed. This is not the time to send them on a mission for which they are ill–prepared.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am really disappointed that the third party had a golden opportunity to really put its policies forward and boost the morale of our forces at all three service levels, really make an input, really make a significant contribution nationally and internationally, and what do they do? They talk about Somalia. They talk about all other issues except the motion that is on the table. The official opposition at least gave us some figures. They said our commitment should be up to 2,000 troops, et cetera. I wish they would have gone on more specifically, what kind and so on. The third party has not given the government one constructive suggestion.

On one hand, they complain that the government has already made up its mind. It has not. Cabinet is not meeting until Wednesday. They read something in the newspapers. It is like the budget: someone reads something in the newspapers and they call it a budget leak. That is what they are comparing this to. Forget about what is in the newspapers. Give the government constructive suggestions and concrete ideas. This is their golden opportunity, and they are blowing it.

They praise our peacekeepers and then in all their debates what do they do? They bring the morale right down as low as they can get it. If I were out there fighting, I certainly would not listen to what they were saying. That really would depress me.

I have always respected the hon. member for having good ideas. I am wondering if in the time left he would share them with us. What is it he would like cabinet to consider? What are the options? Do we participate at all? If so, how many troops? Two thousand troops? What kind? Should we forget about that altogether and go on the human rights side on other issues?

Let us hear it. This is their golden opportunity and they are blowing it.

Mr. Hart: Thank you very much for that disjointed odd question.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Babblelogue.

Mr. Hart: Babblelogue, yes, that is a good comment.

The opposition parties have a deep concern for what the government will do. It is very clear, and let us not pull any punches on this. What NATO has been asking for and what the U.S. has been asking for are combat troops to participate in IFOR.

This is not the same kind of mission Canada has participated in before, in peacekeeping missions. Let us look at the problems. The cornerstone of a peacekeeping mission depends on the fact that our troops are trained in compromise and negotiation, two cornerstones of peacekeeping operations. Canadians have done that job very well, but now we are moving to a new level. We are moving to the level of combat troops, peace enforcement. Get it out of your head that this is the same somehow as a peacekeeper, because it is not. There are no blue helmets any more. We are talking about a demilitarized zone that has been partitioned through the country of Bosnia. That partition is going through towns, cities, villages, farmlands, and there will be some action there. There will be some firing. Anybody on that side of the House who says there will not be is not being honest with the Canadian public. There will be. The U.S. President has stated that there will be and casualties are expected.

Canadians have to look at what we have been doing in peacekeeping operations since 1956, since the Suez crisis. We have let the equipment and the numbers of our Canadian Armed Forces decline.

I served in the Canadian Armed Forces twice in my adult time. I know the results of what a Liberal government can do to the Canadian Armed Forces when it is in charge. I have lived through it. I am surprised by the hon. parliamentary secretary's attitude. He knows that the hands of a Liberal government ran our equipment and our armed forces into severe decline. We do not have the equipment to get involved in this peace enforcement mission. There are also serious problems in the land forces command which simply have to be addressed.

Members opposite continually blame the Reform Party for the terrible morale in the Canadian Armed Forces. Members of the Reform Party support the armed forces and many in this caucus have served in the Canadian Armed Forces. No, we are not to blame for the morale problem. It is the decline in numbers, the decline in support. On the other side of the coin there is the increase in demands being placed on our military while the resources are shrinking.

The white paper says very clearly that Canada does not have finite resources. We have to pick and choose which missions to participate in. Canadians have participated honourably and valiantly for three and a half years in the former Yugoslavia. No, we are not turning our backs, but for God's sake, we will not send our troops ill-equipped and with a serious morale problem into a combat situation. It is a recipe for disaster and this government will pay the price for it if it decides to take that decision.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the hon. member that the druthers of the third party is not to send any troops to participate in this operation?

Mr. Hart: Mr. Speaker, I have been very clear in my comments. I am saying it is the intention of the government to send combat troops, and the indication is that NATO is asking for combat ground force troops according to information made available to me as a parliamentarian, received through Access to Information and conversations with senior officers.

Many frustrated people in Canada are banging down my door saying to do something about this. I do not think I can make it much more clear to the hon. parliamentary secretary. I am representing the constituents of my riding and other people across the country who have phoned my office saying: "Do not send combat troops". Can I make it any more plain?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is banging on the member's door. The member spoke of the HMCS Calgary and the brave actions of an outfit that he claims has difficulty with morale. Has he considered the awards that have been made, and I hope he attended some of the presentations by the Right hon. Roméo LeBlanc at Rideau Hall, for some outstanding acts of heroism? Has he considered this action of an outfit that is plagued by bad morale?

Mr. Hart: Mr. Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary is pointing out and I have acknowledged in the House today the courageous activities of the crew of the HMCS Calgary and the courageous activities of those people on the Sea King helicopter who literally plucked survivors out of a very dangerous situation. We are not talking about the activities of our naval forces; we are talking about land force command. We are talking about soldiers on the ground with boots and rifles and they do not have the equipment. I say again that if the government is talking about those types of troops, absolutely no.

• (1635)

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to our Standing Orders, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—Social Programs.

[English]

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the motion concerning Canada's participation in the peace implementation force to be deployed within Bosnia-Hercegovina.

The Dayton peace agreement has given the world a great deal of hope; hope that the situation in the former Yugoslavia will once and for all improve, and hope that innocent people will no longer have to suffer the violence of war.

Having come from that region of the world, this peace agreement touches me more personally than it does most other Canadians. I would like nothing more than to see a lasting peace which would ensure safety and security for all people in the former Yugoslavia.

I have had the honour to debate the issue of Canadian involvement in the former Yugoslavia many times in the House. Each time I have stated very clearly that I support Canadian involvement as long as the lives of our men and women are not placed in danger.

There were many times when I felt that Canadian peacekeepers were not being given adequate tools to do the job which they had been sent to do or adequate tools to protect themselves. When I speak of adequate tools I am not only referring to weapons, I am also referring to the mandate of UNPROFOR which often tied their hands. In spite of these obstacles, Canadian peacekeepers managed to make a valuable contribution to the fragile peace in Croatia and to perform a valuable humanitarian role in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

Although not always evident, Canadian peacekeepers are well respected in the region. They have established a rapport with locals in the areas to which they were assigned. That is fundamental to the success of any peace mission.

The mission in which Canada is now being asked to participate is different from that of UNPROFOR. The peace implementation force will consist of approximately 60,000 military personnel. It will be responsible for overseeing the military aspects of the peace agreement recently reached in Dayton, Ohio. The force will be organized into three divisions: one American, one British and one French. Britain, France and the United States are collectively contributing the bulk of the forces necessary for this mission. They will send a combined total of 49,500 troops.

NATO will assume command of the mission once IFOR is deployed. However, it will operate under the authority of the United Nations Security Council resolution which permits the use of all necessary means to fulfil the mission.

Given that the formal peace agreement will not be signed until December 14 of this year in Paris, it is unlikely that any deployment of forces would take place prior to that date.

IFOR will not be a peacekeeping mission but rather a NATO led enforcement mission. Where UNPROFOR was mandated only to monitor the implementation of United Nations resolutions and to provide an escort for humanitarian operations, IFOR will be there to enforce the peace agreement.

Canadians and their allies have a great deal of work ahead of them. They will be required to co–ordinate arrangements to ensure freedom of movement and self–defence for IFOR troops within a given sector. They will be required to monitor and if necessary, enforce the withdrawal of parties to their respective territories. They will also co–ordinate and mark boundaries and lines of separation between parties and will establish, monitor and if necessary man lines of separation.

In addition to those responsibilities, IFOR troops will enforce the ceasefire provision of the peace agreement, defend persons, properties and areas designated as protected, monitor the clearing of minefields by parties to the agreement and provide a combat capability to reinforce IFOR troops as required.

In addition to this already lengthy list of responsibilities, IFOR will help to establish a joint military commission with civilians, military and non–governmental agencies in the area and will assist both the UNHCR and other civilian aid agencies in the conduct of their humanitarian missions. As well, IFOR will observe, secure and if necessary prevent interference in the movement of populations, refugees, displaced persons and their property.

Needless to say, what I have just outlined will be a challenge for all those participating in the IFOR mission. Canada has expertise in all of these areas simply because of our historic role in difficult peace missions around the globe.

As I stated earlier, our forces did an excellent job during the UNPROFOR mission and often without necessary means. Canada has already dedicated a great deal of time and effort to finding a peaceful resolution to the situation in the former Yugoslavia. To quit now when true peace is within reach would be a shame.

IFOR's mandate will give Canadian troops the tools needed to succeed in the implementation of the Dayton peace agreement. It will also give them the tools they need to protect themselves. To pull out now after we have done so much already would be like throwing in the towel in the third period of the Stanley Cup final.

We cannot let our allies down at this stage of the game. It would be wrong to let down the hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons who are counting on our help and who have trusted us for so long.

Not only would I encourage my government to contribute a modest force to IFOR so that we can finish what we started back in 1991, I would also encourage it to take a stronger leadership role in this region.

• (1645)

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I share the sentiments the hon. member just gave about the refugees and how we are going to deal with them. However, we have not talked about what sort of a mandate we have, what sort of numbers. We have not talked about any of the details.

We are told to come up with all of these figures, that it is the opposition's job to come up with all of this. I thought the government would come forward with a proposal which we would then debate and discuss. The government does not have any ideas and it expects us to supply them.

We have listened to a lot of things. Just about an hour ago a CP reporter said that he had been told by a NATO official that Canada has committed a battalion of combat troops. We heard the Prime Minister say that Canadians could be there for up to three years. What does he know that we do not know? Why would he say something like that? We have heard Mr. Ouellet say that we are committed—

The Deputy Speaker: When referring to ministers the hon. member will please address them by their titles rather than their names.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With all of this being commented on by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the defence minister and NATO officials, why do we not have the information so we can honestly debate it?

Mr. Peric: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern of our colleagues from the third party. We are at the doorstep of long lasting peace. I am confident that Canada is ready to contribute whatever is necessary.

I hope that this mission lasts only for six or twelve months. I would be very disappointed if it lasts for three years. I believe it will not last that long.

By pulling out right now we would betray not only our allies but the people who trusted us for so long in Bosnia–Hercegovina. We would betray the people in that area.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): It's a different mandate.

Mr. Peric: It might be a different mandate but I strongly believe that we are ready for that mandate, that our soldiers are highly qualified for that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the member for Cambridge for his remarks.

Sometimes in this place, although we are all equals, some remarks from some members perhaps carry a little more weight. Certainly the member for Cambridge knows of which he speaks with his heritage and culture from that area, from the former Yugoslavia. Also he has been extremely active in forming an association within Parliament for the Canada–Croatia–Bosnia society.

I commend the member for his work in this area and for his fostering an understanding among parliamentarians like myself of the complexities of the situation in Bosnia–Hercegovina, as well as all of the other states in the former Yugoslavia.

I would ask for his comments about the positive aspects of the Canadian presence in Bosnia–Hercegovina as well as in Croatia. What has been the impact of the presence of Canadians while the war was still going on with respect to the people of Bosnia–Hercegovina? Can he tell me what the impact has been and perhaps that will help explain why he is so adamant that the presence should continue?

Mr. Peric: Mr. Speaker, coming from that area and knowing the mentality over there I would like to answer my colleague as well as colleagues of the third party that the morale of Canadian peacekeepers is very high. They are highly respected. The morale on the other side is very low. I am not afraid that our soldiers will not do the proper job over there. I am very confident because all three sides highly respect Canadian soldiers.

• (1650)

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the debate since this morning and there is an issue that has not been mentioned a lot if at all, and that is the impunity of those who have committed crimes against the civilian population.

It is the same story in Rwanda where almost one million people have been killed and the murderers are going scot–free. In Haiti, the military regime left without being punished and we have the feeling that the same thing will happen in the former Yugoslavia.

Could the hon. member for Cambridge tell us whether the Canadian government is concerned about this issue, and whether it might not foster similar civil wars in other countries?

[English]

Mr. Peric: Mr. Speaker, two things have to be separated, Somalia from Bosnia and Hercegovina. There was never civil war in Bosnia and Hercegovina or Croatia. As we know, there was occupation. There were attacks starting with Slovenia by the former Yugoslav army. It was the same thing with Croatia and Bosnia. The two situations cannot be combined as one. They cannot be compared.

As far as I know from talking to Canadian soldiers in Croatia, there were no scandals. They were doing their job, as much as they could do. They are highly respected by all three sides. Canadians should be proud of that. They have continued and are keeping a long history, a tradition. We have to support them in that endeavour.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this very important debate today.

Canada has a long and impressive history of peacekeeping around the world. As I am sure all members are aware, peacekeeping as it is known today was invented by a Canadian, former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson. During the Suez crisis of 1956, Mr. Pearson proposed the formation of an emergency UN force to supervise the cessation of hostilities.

Since 1947 Canada has participated in every United Nations peacekeeping operation. We are one of the few countries that has done so. We are also one of the few countries that has paid all of its United Nations' dues, including our share of peacekeeping costs.

Canada has played a major role in the ongoing peacekeeping efforts in the former Yugoslavia. It has been involved in four separate but related operations in the region. It has been participating in the Sarajevo humanitarian airlift. The navy has one frigate operating with NATO's standing naval force Atlantic, in the Adriatic, monitoring and enforcing sanctions.

Canada has also provided two crew members for AWACS aircraft enforcing the no–fly zone over Bosnia. Canada has also provided a battalion to support the United Nations operation in Bosnia. That unit was based in Visoko, northwest of Sarajevo. About three–quarters of that unit's personnel were withdrawn in October of this year, with the remainder returning to Canada in late November.

Canadian troops have played a valuable role in Bosnia. They have delivered relief supplies, protected civilians and monitored ceasefires.

Over the past three years we have all become far too familiar with the scenes of violence and suffering on the nightly news reports from Bosnia. The war in Bosnia has been extremely brutal and vicious, despite the best efforts of the United Nations and Canadian troops to relieve the suffering of innocent civilians.

The previous United Nations' efforts were at best a band–aid solution. Therefore I welcome the agreement signed recently in Dayton, Ohio, ending the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. After more than three years of fighting, 250,000 dead and the creation of two million refugees, it is high time that the fighting end in Bosnia.

• (1655)

Although I hope that the Dayton agreement will bring peace to the region, I must admit that I share the doubts expressed by many. We have become familiar in the past few years with the short lifespan of Balkan truces and agreements. After several years of fighting, it will be extremely difficult for all sides to live together.

The peace agreement is extremely complex and will be very difficult to implement. For this reason I welcome the participation of NATO. As I am sure members are aware, NATO is planning to deploy 60,000 troops, including 20,000 American troops, to enforce the agreement.

Besides the United States, 11 other NATO countries have indicated that they will provide troops. As well, Russia and 19 other non–NATO countries have indicated that they will provide troops. Russia and many of the non–NATO countries are former members of the Warsaw pact and current members of the Partnership for Peace. This will be the first co–operative operation between NATO and the Partnership for Peace countries.

NATO has made clear that the implementation force will not be a traditional peacekeeping mission, but rather a NATO led enforcement mission. It will operate under chapter VII of the UN charter, which permits the use of all necessary means to fulfil a mission.

The implementation force will be required to monitor and enforce the withdrawal of each side's troops to their respective territories, establish and man lines of separation, enforce the ceasefire provisions of the agreement, defend protected areas and assist United Nations and civilian aid agencies.

It is quite likely that the implementation force will be involved in some fighting as it seeks to enforce the peace agreement. For this reason, NATO troops will be heavily armed and authorized to use force.

Despite their large numbers and heavy armaments, NATO troops are likely to have casualties. The terrain will make operations difficult. Snipers and land mines can be very difficult to deal with.

Despite all the difficulties, I am in favour of NATO participation and Canadian participation in this operation. We have been trying since the war began to find a solution. Canada should not abandon Bosnia just when a real solution is becoming a possibility.

This agreement is the only means to end the war and we have a duty to support it. Although I feel we must support the Dayton agreement and the NATO implementation force, there are limits to what Canada can do. We must set clear limits on what role Canadian troops will fulfil.

I have the greatest respect for the professionalism and skill of Canadian soldiers. However, I am very concerned about the preparedness of the Canadian army to play a frontline role in a peace enforcement mission. I am concerned that the Canadian forces will not be properly equipped for the combat role they might be required to fulfil in Bosnia.

The defence review undertaken by the joint committee on Canada's defence policy clearly indicated the shortcomings in equipment of the Canadian military. Although the government has taken steps to correct many of the shortcomings, it will take time to fully modernize Canada's equipment.

I had a long talk recently with a constituent of mine who served in Bosnia and was gravely wounded. Although seriously wounded, he is very proud of the Canadian military and the job it has been doing in Bosnia. It is very satisfying to hear him talk about what he has personally gained through his military service. He feels the military is a great training ground for Canadian youth. He feels that the Canadian troops are the best trained troops in the world.

Despite this, he feels that Canada should maintain its role as peacekeepers and not become peacemakers. He is of this opinion as he is personally aware of some of the more glaring deficiencies in Canada's military equipment. For instance, the Cougar armed vehicles that Canada was using in Bosnia were purchased in 1980 as training vehicles. In his opinion, they do not provide adequate armour and the targeting system on the gun is not very effective. In his opinion also, the flak vests do not provide adequate protection and are inferior to modern vests.

Personally, Canada can best contribute by providing support troops and humanitarian relief. Canada should provide the support it is best equipped to provide and leave the provision of combat troops to countries best equipped for that role.

In previous peacekeeping missions, such as in Namibia, Canada provided logistics and support personnel.

• (1700)

In peacekeeping operations in the Middle East Canada provided communication troops and logistics support to United Nations peacekeeping operations. Another option would be to provide engineers and assistance in demining operations as Canada did in Cambodia. Another option would be to provide medical support to the implementation force in the form of field hospitals.

The resettlement of a large number of refugees will place an enormous strain on United Nations humanitarian agencies. Canada could provide support to resettlement and reconstruction efforts in Bosnia.

I emphasize that the most valuable contribution Canada could make to the implementation force would be to provide support troops in the areas of communication, logistics and medicine. I also emphasize that I am in favour of supporting the implementation force. We have a moral duty to support the peace efforts in Bosnia, and our troops will be up to any job they may be asked to perform.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened quite attentively to the hon. member's comments. I appreciated the courage it took for her to make some of those statements obviously in contrast to the stated position of her party and the government.

Her comments are not all that far out of sync with the position of the Reform Party which has been very outspoken, as we know, against the commitment of Canadian combat troops when they are obviously ill–prepared, ill–led and poorly equipped, as the hon. member drew attention to.

It is not so much the troops who are the biggest problem. It is the people across the way making the decision involving their lives. It does not instil confidence or morale in our armed forces when the de facto commander in chief does not even know which way to put his helmet on.

If the hon. member feels the government is to commit combat troops when they are not prepared to take on that role, as she said, will she let her feelings be known to the Minister of National Defence and speak out as Reformers have been doing against the commitment of combat troops?

Ms. Phinney: Madam Speaker, I have no necessity to speak to the minister because he already knows how I feel because our party is free and open. We can say how we feel at any time.

I am sure no troops from Canada will ever be allowed to go in ill–prepared or ill–led. I have stated an opinion and we may hear from other members more familiar than I am about how much improvement has gone on with the equipment since the committee made those comments.

That is how I feel right now. I am quite willing to be proven wrong. I also know the Americans will be going in with plenty of equipment and our troops will be using their equipment if we do not have adequate equipment ourselves.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for a good presentation. This is the kind of debate we were hoping to get, not just the usual political rhetoric even if it has to be within our own party. There are some different ideas about the kind of troops, the numbers and that kind of thing.

I want to comment on a very important statement the hon. member made. I have to agree with her. When we were in ex–Yugoslavia, in Croatia and particularly Bosnia, we did receive from the troops a justified concern that equipment was not the best for what they had to do.

In military operations one is seldom equipped 100 per cent for what one has to do. Even then measures had been taken with respect to the armour of the APCs and the other vehicles. Corrections were being made. Every member in the House is aware we have gone forward with priority, as indicated and agreed in the special joint committee, that we would rectify the deficiencies in APCs. That is under way.

Another aspect was quite glaring to us. We were concerned as a committee with the number of rotations individual soldiers had. The recommendation was made by the joint committee and it was agreed, certainly by the third party if not by the official opposition, that we would increase the army size by 3,000 troops. We recommended 2,500 in the report but I believe it worked out to 3,000 ground troops instead of headquarters personnel. That adjustment has been made. It should greatly improve the rotation of combat soldiers and should also make it better for logistic soldiers. I wanted to set the record straight on that.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Madam Speaker, there is no question the government has made a commitment to the UN initiative. However, I would feel much more comfortable about the decision if the concerns raised by my hon. colleague and by the hon. member who has just finished speaking, the questions of moral, leadership and, most important, equipment were put to rest. I would feel much more comfortable with our troops going into that situation if they were well equipped and had excellent leadership.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my speaking time with the hon. member for Louis–Hébert.

I want to speak today on the participation of the Canadian Armed Forces in the implementation force in the former Yugoslavia. I agree with the principle but not with the way the government, particularly the Prime Minister and the defence minister, made commitments to our NATO allies.

First, on November 23, in a speech he gave following a meeting with the Secretary–General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros–Ghali, the Prime Minister had already committed in principle Canadian funds and human resources, without first seeking the approval of this House.

Indeed, even before Parliament was asked to debate the issue, the decision had already been made. As far as I know, the government should be at the service of Parliament and not the other way around. What is the use of having a democratic institution like Parliament where parliamentarians give advice to the government and pass legislation, if this government ignores procedure and only asks Parliament to rubber stamp its decisions?

Indeed, on November 23, the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "Of course, we will send some troops, but the size of our contribution will depend on what we are able to do and what we are asked to do". The Prime Minister was referring to our NATO allies and particularly to our neighbours, the Americans. Therefore, the decision on Canada's contribution will depend on the decision of our neighbours to the South and not on what our Parliament would have decided first. That is how decisions are made in Canada.

While I support in principle the Canadian government's peace plan to participate in NATO's operations in the former Yugoslavia, I am still puzzled by the way the federal Liberals are proceeding. It is a question of attitude.

Even President Clinton did not formally make a commitment until the American Congress ratified the United States' contribution to the ceasefire monitoring group. In my opinion, the Prime Minister's statement is further proof that he attaches very little importance to parliamentarians' opinions, since he announced, even before today's debate, that he would send troops to Bosnia.

Undoubtedly, the Prime Minister has a double standard. Even last week, he proclaimed that the House was sovereign on the matter of his famous distinct society clause and that this clause had priority over everything else. Today, in the case of the Canadian Armed Forces's involvement in the multinational military implementation force under NATO command, the decision has already been made and the only thing the House can do is ratify it. That is what we are being asked to do today.

I would like to raise several other points which strike me as irreconcilable differences between what the Government is saying publicly and what is being said here in this House.

At an information session this past Thursday, an Armed Forces spokesperson indicated that Ottawa's contribution to date to the United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslavia has been more than half a billion dollars over three years, or approximately $517 million, for a force ranging from 1,600 to 2,000 in size. That half billion, or some $172 million yearly, represents the additional cost for National Defence to commit Canadian troops to UN peacekeeping in the former Yugoslavia. In other words, this figure represents what it cost over and above the normal costs of keeping our troops here in Canada.

Keeping those figures in mind, we are now told that the present NATO commitment ought not to cost more than an additional $75 million for a 12 month period involving some 2,000 to 3,000 Canadian soldiers—$75 million for a mission that differs greatly from a peacekeeping mission. This is inconceivable, half as much money, yet twice as much will be demanded of our troops.

In an article in Le Devoir on November 24, headed "Canada to participate in implementation force", the Minister of Defence is quoted as referring to far greater costs for this type of intervention, much more than $75 million.

I will read part of this article, and I quote: "Mr. Collenette also said that the logistics involved in combat operations of the kind organized by NATO are far more costly than in the case of UN peacekeeping missions. We will have to look at the financial aspects", concluded the Minister of National Defence.

There is a problem here. The Minister of National Defence tells us these combat operations may cost us a lot more than we are being told by the military, this in addition to the opinions of certain experts and officials who are saying that the cost of participating in a NATO mission is usually twice that of UN peacekeeping missions.

I am rather sceptical when people tell me it will cost only $75 million for 12 months, which is $75 million more than it normally costs, and people should realize that. Could the Minister of National Defence let the House know the real costs involved in these combat operations?

In another article published in Le Devoir on August 19, 1995, the Minister of Foreign Affairs responded to a report in Le Soleil estimating the cost of Ottawa's commitment within UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslavia at $710 million over three years.

I have a very simple question: Who in this House could tell us the exact cost of such operations? There is a $193 million difference from department to department. Who is right? I find it hard to believe that the House is being asked to give its consent without knowing the real cost of these combat operations, especially when they are supposed to cost half as much as previous commitments to peacekeeping operations.

Considering the current federal deficit, how can we afford to ignore these facts? This is very disturbing. And I am sure the vast majority of taxpayers in Quebec and Canada would like to know the real cost of these combat operations.

The principle involved in peacekeeping operations is a noble one, but I doubt we can afford to get involved without knowing the real cost of this gesture of human solidarity. When shown these figures, not a single banker in Quebec or in the rest of Canada would be willing to endorse such operations without at least knowing what he was getting into.

• (1715)

I support Canada's involvement in principle. The Bloc Quebecois supports Canada's participation in NATO's implementation force. I cannot, however, give this government a blank cheque without knowing where and how this money will be spent. It is taxpayers' money we are spending. And given the cuts imposed by the federal government on the most vulnerable in our society, it would be unthinkable not to know how much money will be spent and how it will really be spent.

Finally, as far as the implementation force's mission is concerned, no one knows, of course, how long it will last or what the implications will be in the medium term. The Prime Minister told the Secretary–General of the UN that participating forces would have to stay the course until peace is really restored, whether it takes six months or three years.

Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's commitment, should the mandate extend beyond the expected 12 months, I think the government should be required to submit its decision to the approval of this House. I also think that the 12 month mandate should be clearly stated and that Canada should commit no more than 2,000 troops to the NATO forces, which is approximately the maximum level of Canada's participation in UNPROFOR.

In conclusion, given our current financial situation, I have major reservations about the defence department's threat assessment.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I find the hon. member's remarks ambiguous. I would like him to clarify this for us. His leader has always been in favour of a Canadian military presence in Europe for humanitarian reasons, as he so eloquently explained in our last debate on the matter. And he himself agrees in principle with this policy for the same reasons that I and other members of this House believe it is crucial that Canada participate in humanitarian and large–scale efforts to restore peace in that part of the world.

I myself support this government initiative. I think that the hon. member also supports this government initiative. I think that his party supports this initiative. Even so, he is looking for an excuse to criticize the Prime Minister, to criticize the government, to find small things to complain about here and there, claiming that our Prime Minister is wrong when he says that our level of participation depends on the American level of participation. This goes without saying, but at the same time it does not mean that the Americans are deciding for us, as the hon. member is suggesting. What it means is that we will make our own decision based on what our allies are doing. It is perfectly logical, rational and appropriate.

I personally find that holding this debate in the House of Commons gives us, Canadian parliamentarians, the chance to have a say in this decision. This is undoubtedly a complex decision that depends on many other factors, but that is always how it is on the international scene, and to claim otherwise is, in my view, to distort the debate and only to look for excuses to criticize the government.

Mr. Leroux: Madam Speaker, where we disagree with the government is on the way it is going about this. We are always told that the House is its own master, that Parliament is a sovereign institution. In fact, that is not the case. The Prime Minister has already made a commitment. He now puts the issue before the House, in order to have his decision endorsed by the different parties, and this is what we object to.

We do agree with the decision. We know that Canada has made commitments to NATO. We know that it has always fulfilled its commitments. We have no problem with that. What we are saying is: fine, let us go, but according to our means.

• (1720)

As you know, we may be one of the most indebted countries in the world, per capita. Sure, we must continue to help others, but we should also take our situation into consideration when making that decision. The Bloc Quebecois agrees that we should send troops to Bosnia–Hercegovina, along with our partners. However, the government should not always surprise us at the last minute. If the House is its own master, if it is sovereign, then it should be the one to decide. The government should come back and tell the House how many troops should be sent, and so on, because these are important issues.

In my speech, I mentioned that President Clinton waited for the approval of both Houses before taking action. That was not done here, in spite of the Prime Minister's promise.

In conclusion, it is important to fulfil our commitments, but we must also not lose sight of what is going on. This operation is very different from a peacekeeping mission. Lives may be lost. Our troops risk their lives, but the risk could or will be greater this time. If we send armed forces personnel over there, it does not have to be combat troops. We could send auxiliary forces, engineers, nurses, etc. We have all this expertise available in Canada. We would still be taking part. But I think we must be careful. We do not have to do more than others. We must do our share, but we do not have to do more than others.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Very briefly, the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned the length of time. As we all know, NATO has said this is a one–year mission, 12 months.

Has the member given any consideration to how optimistic that time frame is in this type of operation? One year seems very optimistic. We are moving some 60,000 troops in there.

During the briefing we received from the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, I did ask the member to be very brief.

[Translation]

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Madam Speaker, it would be advisable that following a one year commitment, the government came back to the House and asked if we agree to extend Canada's participation.

Again, it is important to have the figures. People must know the cost of that participation. That is what is important.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are today debating the recent Dayton peace agreement and Canada's contribution to the peace effort in the Balkans.

For over three years, discussions have gone on between the Bosnians, the Serbs and the Croats in the hope of reaching an agreement on establishing a real peace process. On November 21, an agreement, albeit an imperfect one, but an agreement nonetheless, was signed by the parties.

This peace agreement signed in Dayton, Ohio, provides, among other things, that refugees will be permitted to return home or will be compensated, if it is impossible for them to do so. The agreement also provides for the unrestricted movement of the entire population within Bosnian territory.

To implement the accord the international community is being invited to provide humanitarian aid or help in the reconstruction, with the objective of establishing an enduring peace in the former Yugoslavia.

Today, we are being asked to debate the form Canada's contribution to the peace process should take. We are, however, entitled to question the usefulness of this debate and whether the Government of Canada has not already made all the decisions, since, less than 48 hours after the Dayton agreement was signed, the Prime Minister of Canada was saying publicly that Canada would send a number of troops, according to its capabilities and NATO's request.

The Bloc Quebecois questions the attitude of the Prime Minister, who is leaving no doubt that the decisions have already been made and that the opinions of the members of this House are of little import. His message is that Canada will send troops to Bosnia, regardless of today's parliamentary debate. However, the debate is relevant, and, in this regard the Minister of Foreign Affairs should have informed the Prime Minister that Canada could get involved in three ways, apart from simply sending troops.

Participation in the implementation force is one kind of intervention, of course, but taking part in the reconstruction and welcoming refugees unable to go back home are other kinds of assistance that Canada should consider.

I would like to elaborate on the latter, on Canada's opportunity to help Bosnian refugees. Canada can help out in two ways. The High Commissioner for Refugees made an appeal to welcome refugees from the former Yugoslavia. In this regard, a few weeks ago, the Canadian Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reached an agreement with NGOs and other organizations to implement an action plan to welcome these victims of war. The Quebec government is also involved in this special operation. The Bloc Quebecois supports this initiative and urges the Canadian government to pursue its efforts in this regard.

Canada could also help refugees on the field in Bosnia–Hercegovina. The best estimates suggest that there are more than 1.3 million displaced people in Bosnia itself and 800,000 refugees in neighbouring republics and other European countries. Canada must facilitate the implementation of the Dayton agreement and help those who want to return to their homes.

The time has come to recognize that Canada's previous interventions in the former Yugoslavia have been less than successful. So far, Canada's participation in UNPROFOR has cost taxpayers over half a billion dollars. Despite the enormous resources invested by Canada, the results have been on the whole rather disappointing.

Canada has been excluded from major decisions, as demonstrated by its April 1995 exclusion from the contact group composed of the U.S., Russia, France, Great Britain, and Germany. Canada has maintained a large UNPROFOR contingent, even though our troops had little guidance and no clear, original, well–defined policy regarding the outcome of the conflict and how to resolve it.

The Canadian government did not show any international leadership or take any major policy initiative that would have allowed it to exert some influence. Before making a further commitment to participating in the implementation of the Bosnian peace and reconstruction plan, the official opposition believes that several questions ought to be answered. Canadian taxpayers have a right to know whether or not Canada will have a say in operations involving Canadian troops.

Also, given that Bosnia is faced with severe economic problems, we must ask ourselves if the Canadian government intends to provide financial assistance as well or if, given our own debt problem, we could not find a more responsible and practical form of assistance. For instance, Canada could very well provide technical assistance for future elections in Bosnia, given its expertise in that area.

We also want to be apprised of the risks to our troops. We know that the ceasefire monitoring force will consist of combat troops as opposed to peacekeepers. This new task will therefore be conducted under Chapter VII of the UN charter instead of Chapter VI. And we know that Chapter VII allows the use of a broader range of means, including the use of force, to fulfil these missions. In other words, every means available will be used to implement the agreement.

Finally, the Bloc Quebecois has three more concerns in relation to the timing, nature and cost of this operation. As far as duration is concerned, the UN secretary general and the Prime Minister jointly stated that this mandate could be for up to three years. If that were the case, the Bloc Quebecois demands that the government seek the House of Commons' approval of its decision to extend the mission beyond the currently planned 12 month term.

As for the mandate of Canadian troops deployed in Bosnia, we hope that the Canadian government has learned from its mistake and that, this time, it will develop a clear mandate. While troops may have to perform a variety of tasks, Canadian troops could specialize in communications and more traditional aspects of peacekeeping. Out of concern for Canada's image as a peace-minded country, we Bloc members think that only a very small percentage of the troops we assign to NATO should take part in combat missions, and only if necessary.

Finally, the Bloc Quebecois feels that Canada's participation must be more or less the same as in UNPROFOR, that is about 2,000 soldiers. That seems to compare with the level of participation of our European allies, except for France, Great Britain and Germany. The cost of such an operation is high. The defence department estimates that, over a 12 month period, it could be anywhere from 2 to 75 million dollars, depending on the number of soldiers involved. The various scenarios provide for sending from 50 to 3,500 troops.

We have our doubts about these figures, considering that Canada's participation in UNPROFOR cost about $172 million annually. The defence department has admitted that a NATO operation would cost about twice as much as a UN peacekeeping mission. The Canadian government must show more rigour and give the real costs of that operation, before getting involved any further.

In short, the Bloc Quebecois is asking the Canadian government to show greater discretion, rigour and, particularly, transparency. There is no doubt that Canada must contribute to the peace process in Bosnia. The way to do it must be thoroughly debated in this House.

[English]

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Madam Speaker, today we are having a very serious debate in the House on the Dayton peace agreement. A number of nations got together to hammer out a peace agreement for the combatants in the former Yugoslavia. This conflict has been ongoing for a number of years and Canada has made a tremendous contribution during the past four years to the humanitarian needs in that area.

There has been a wide sweeping debate in the House this afternoon and therefore I would like to read the motion before the House:

> That this House take note and welcome the recent Dayton peace agreement and the international community's continued efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans, and Canadian support of these efforts by participation in a multinational military implementation force (IFOR) under NATO command.

The implementation force will not be a peacekeeping mission in the traditional sense but rather a NATO led enforcement mission which will operate under the authority of the United Nations security council resolution pursuant to chapter VII of the United Nations charter which permits the use of all necessary means to fulfil a mission.

Since this would be an operation not in the traditional sense of peacekeeping and because NATO and many other countries are involved, it should not be surprising that we have been requested to send combat troops.

Given the nature of the world today there are many hot spots. Some can become hotter. This is one big issue which we have today. What will it be six months, a year or five years from now? No one can predict. The world is a very unpredictable place in this era of our history.

The implementation force is the only way to handle this matter. There is a peace agreement which must be implemented. The basic way of life must be restored to the area. The people in that region must live without fear of what will happen to them.

This is not the time for Canada or for any other responsible country to fold up its tents and walk away. This is a time when the international community must come together, shoulder to shoulder, in the best interests of mankind.

• (1735)

The winners of such operations are those who will suddenly find themselves living in security and peace. The winners are the free countries of the world accepting their responsibility in what is otherwise a cruel world.

The winners are people like the Russians and those in the eastern European countries who a short time ago belonged to the communist bloc and who today are moving with their friends in the western world to implement this peace agreement in the former Yugoslavia.

If that is not a fantastic happening in this era of our history, I do not know what is. Who would have thought eight or ten years ago that we would see this happening on this date in history or that we would see it unfold in the days ahead?

The other winners of this of course will be those still alive in that country, the children and the women, who will finally have some peace. They will remember as they walk through their cemeteries young children from infants up, women, grandparents, old and young, whose names are on that flood of tombstones in cemeteries throughout the former Yugoslavia. It is a slaughter which neither this country nor any other responsible country could turn a blind eye to and walk away from. Without proper supervision it could happen again. Graveyards will be the reminders of this horrible period in the history of the former Yugoslavia.

The winners will be the NATO countries and the eastern bloc countries that have bridged the gap over recent times and are now putting their total efforts toward this humanitarian cause in a truly wonderful display of international unity for peace.

There is monitoring to be done and there are mines to be disassembled. If they are not, the country will live a further hell in days ahead.

Humanitarian aid has been provided very responsibly and generously by Canadians over the last four years. You bet our Canadian soldiers are well trained. They can build schools, hospitals, roads and bridges. They can do it well.

I do not appreciate the logic put forward in the House today when members of the Reform Party say our forces are becoming ineffective. I do not buy that for one minute. It is a terrible thing to say about our Canadian forces whom we expect to go on missions around the world. Are they capable of doing anything? You bet they are capable of doing anything and they will do their work over there along with the best in the world.

It is time Parliament and all members stood together united and thanked those people because regardless of a few problems they have carried the Canadian flag with dignity and with pride around the world. We owe them a great debt.

People in the former Yugoslavia want peace and security. Sure, some rebels are not happy and nothing will ever satisfy them, except when they get everything their own way. Hence the reason for the supervision and the necessity for it.

There are some in this world who lock their minds and throw away the key and do not want anyone questioning the mean streak they have in them. All the good things in life, the everyday necessities of life, must be brought back into action and rebuilt.

Government institutions are needed in the former Yugoslavia. Infrastructure faces a mass improvement because of the destructiveness that has gone on there for a number of years. Canada's participation has been a responsible one over a period of time.

Our forces have done a great job for us in the international community. We must look after them while they are on these missions, which means more than good equipment. It means a commitment in money and a commitment to giving them the equipment to go forward in the days ahead. We have done a lot of that already.

However, it means another thing quite often forgotten in a debate such as this. It means making certain their families back home are well looked after. I talk about the story of a young person involved in a conversation with me in the former Yugoslavia, in Bosnia. He said: "I do not mind being over here serving at all because I feel I am doing a job that has to be done. I do not mind it as long as I know my family is all right back home".

We cannot keep peacekeeping alive and do things the same way we did with the blue berets when circumstances require a different scenario.

From an historical point of view we can ask how much money it will cost. We can ask how many troops are needed. However, we do not get the answers for all these solutions in the future. The danger of doing nothing is far worse than the danger in the implementation of this peace arrangement.

We belong to the UN as a responsible partner. We have been a member of NATO for years. Today we hear about the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson who brought about the first peacekeeping mission in Egypt. Let us remember one thing: Canada has done more than its share in comparison with any nation in the world in keeping up that policy.

Now as we try to take the steam out of heated debates and difficult situations in the world it becomes very important for Canada to be part of the solution and not part of an isolationist attitude.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my distinguished colleague, known for his lifetime of study of military affairs, Canada's role in them and the constructive contributions he has made, whether in his discussions with the minister concerned he might find it useful to remind people that NATO, as a regional security organization, is subject under chapter VIII of the United Nations charter to the charter. Specifically by reference back to articles 34 and 35 in article 52 of the charter, the security council's role in peacekeeping arrangements under chapter VI extends to operations of NATO and other regional military organizations.

Would it be appropriate perhaps in his discussions with the minister to remind the minister of that fact and perhaps bring forward in any adhesion by Canada to the new Bosnian force that it would remain subject to the United Nations charter, and subject to international law as established under the charter, whatever the nature of the military command, whether it be direct UN command, as in the past, or a particular general from one of the member countries of NATO?

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, history would have taken quite a different turn without an organization such as NATO, which came to birth during the cold war years and served a very useful purpose during all those years.

Today as we come into an era in world history where we have some 80 hot spots around the world, we may well have more Yugoslavias to look after as the years go by. I suppose it is a case of managing them. It is very important that NATO and the UN be partners in these conflicts. NATO is needed because of its expertise and the UN needs NATO because it is a cohesive body of 16 countries.

I would also point out to my hon. friend that in no way inhibits all the other UN countries of the world from coming in to support them and to work with them. Some 40 countries may well be involved in this. We will find out whether Canada is directly involved by a formal decision of cabinet. That is the way things are done in a democratic country.

In the world today, it becomes absolutely necessary that organizations such as NATO, organizations that used to be the communist bloc, organizations such as the UN at large, all come together in a co–operative spirit to manage some of those meanspirited operations that are out there in the world which have to be managed as the days go by.

In answering my honourable friend I look on it that all these are necessary. I am sure the minister is quite sure they are necessary, but we must always look toward putting them together as a massive international body for the good of mankind. If we do not we are wasting our energies.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am sure that most civilized people would like to see an end put to all of the rivalries and tribal wars and the genocide that accompanies them, not just in the Balkans but everywhere in the world. Particularly fearsome is Africa.

Because there is a time limit and this NATO effort would go absolutely nowhere without the Americans, what will happen if the battle moves into Macedonia and the Americans are out of there in a year?

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, I would like to think we do things with the best of intentions and the greatest efficiency that we can, with the knowledge we have at hand at the moment.

We want all the answers in advance of what will happen. If Napoleon had had all the answers he needed in advance, he would never have gone to Waterloo. There are always questions that have to be answered, but only time will answer them.

If we sit back and do nothing at this time, then we will only add to the problem. We know through world history that as problems become bigger and bigger eventually everybody is dragged into them.

As I said earlier today—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to lend my support to the motion we are debating today. It is the second time I have risen in the House on this issue. Although nearly two years have passed since that time, my position remains the same.

We must continue to lend our support to the international community's efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans. It was these efforts after all that brought about the Dayton peace agreement and we must do our part to show our continued commitment.

As the vice–president of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, I have followed NATO's involvement in the Balkan crisis very closely. Through my participation I learned firsthand of the important role Canada plays in NATO.

[Translation]

For 45 years now Canada has been one of the key supporters of NATO because it was, and still is, in our national interest to do so. NATO membership has been beneficial for Canada in a number of ways: it has prevented world conflicts; it has helped us economically, by enabling us to maintain reduced armed forces, knowing that we could call for help if necessary; and, most important of all, perhaps, it has given us a voice in one of the key fora in the western world on issues of Euro–Atlantic and world security.

• (1750)

[English]

The greatest value of these benefits can only be achieved if Canada has credibility with its allies and continues to be an active member of NATO. It is therefore essential that Canada participate in IFOR.

We must not turn our backs on NATO, as if it were turning into a partner we could no longer trust to produce Euro–Atlantic and world security arrangements. It would not be in our interests to do so, particularly since the creation of IFOR is a key element in the changing structures and operations of NATO.

NATO's integrated command structure has always been one of its strong points. The Alliance is the only organization that has created an effective military force from the contributions of its various member states. During the cold war, however, this was a static structure spread out as widely as possible throughout its member states, with its eyes resolutely glued to the eastern bloc. This is not what we need now to ensure our security or that of our allies.

[English]

We need a NATO which is cheaper, which is flexible, which can act in any direction from which a threat can emerge and which can assemble forces organized, trained and tailored to a range of possible uses from classical peacekeeping to humanitarian intervention to collective defence.

As well, the NATO for the modern era must also be able to work with others, be they multilateral institutions like the UN or SCE which need organized military muscle or other countries, big and small, which see an interest in what concerns NATO.

In January 1994 such a concept for the evolution of NATO was endorsed by the North Atlantic Council under the concept of combined joint task forces. However, since then the concept has been stalled in spite of Canada's best efforts to move it along.

Necessity being the mother of invention, the need for NATO to get its act together to enforce the peace in Bosnia has resulted in the alliance's first combined joint task force, the IFOR. There must be no going back for NATO and Canada's voice will only be heard in making these lessons stick if it is part of this latest great step forward in the adaptation of NATO.

Now would be perhaps the worst of times to turn our back on NATO and our allies but the value of participating in IFOR to maintain allied solidarity is at most only half the story. For the past three years, Canada and Canadians have seen participation in multilateral military operations in the former Yugoslavia as being in our national interest.

It was in our national interest because we consider European security part and parcel of our own. We have trade, historical, military and emotional ties with Europe. We have learned from experience that European conflicts can spread to our allies, and even to our own country. In the past, Balkan conflicts have had a particularly strong tendency to spread with a ripple effect, as far as Canada even.

If we wish to be able to continue to depend on the protection of an effective system of international security for ourselves, we must make a significant contribution to it when the system is being used to protect others.

Many Canadians originally come from these areas and an even larger number come from neighbouring countries whose stability is at risk.

Canadians cannot stand aside while others suffer. Many people in Bosnia today owe their lives to the presence of Canadians.

The signing of a peace agreement has not obscured this aspect of our national interest, and we will not be satisfied until Bosnia and the surrounding region once again enjoy stability, peace and security. This will require the full implementation of the Dayton peace agreement. This, after what has happened in the past, will require the presence on the ground of a multinational military force under the command of NATO.

[English]

We have struggled and bled through the worst of times in Bosnia. What do the effort, money and lives that have been spent to date mean if the job is not carried through to its conclusion? It is for these reasons that I support the motion and Canadian participation in IFOR.

My support and what I hope will be the support of this House does not give the government, the military planners or NATO carte blanche to send Canadian troops on the mission. Canadian participation in IFOR should conform with the principles for multilateral missions laid out in the 1994 white paper, including a clear and enforceable mandate, an effective consultation process among mission partners, a defined concept of operations and clear rules of engagement.

• (1755)

The Dayton agreement provides the foundation for a clear and binding mandate. NATO's participation guarantees the presence of a separate agency to monitor the situation. It also provides guarantees for an effective consultation process, until now often lacking in UN operations in Bosnia.

The membership of IFOR, which includes nearly all NATO member countries, Russia and up to 19 other countries, should be sufficiently diverse to be acceptable to all parties. There is every indication that principles fairly similar to ours formed the basis for planning operations.

[English]

Clearly Canada's participation in implementing the peace plan cannot be open ended. The seemingly never ending peacekeeping mission in Cyprus must not be repeated. While the UN operation in Cyprus was an example of classical peacekeeping, different from the peace enforcement initiatives being put forward by IFOR, it is imperative that a definitive timetable be put forward.

The UN security council has repeatedly called for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus, the voluntary return of refugees to their homes, the cessation of all interference in the internal affairs of Cyprus and respect for its sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and unity. Now more than 20 years later, the situation on the ground is no different with more than 30,000 heavily armed Turkish troops continuing to illegally occupy nearly 40 per cent of the territory of Cyprus. The UN mission in Cyprus has been hampered time and time again by the intransigence of Turkey.

The proposal for the complete demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus put forward by the president of Cyprus, Mr. Glafcos Clerides, is the concrete solution to this longstanding problem. Similar resolutions have been supported in the United States congress and most recently the Australian Parliament unanimously adopted a resolution in support of the demilitarization of Cyprus. Canada must also put forward a resolution in support of this to indicate that the status quo is no longer acceptable and negotiated settlements must be brought forward.

Time and time again it has been seen that only a united effort will bring about the resolution of the most complex disputes. Today's debate will lend Canada's voice to the united effort that is being put forward in helping to bring peace to the Balkans.

At this point I wish to refer to the continued response of Canada to the humanitarian issues in the former Yugoslavia. As chair of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration I applaud the initiatives of the government through the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Under the special measures program nearly 7,000 citizens of the former Yugoslavia have been landed in Canada since 1992. As well, the joint sponsorship program has seen more 270 persons in need of resettlement sponsored to date.

The government will continue these programs for as long as a need for humanitarian aid continues. It is part of our commitment to the United Nations and our responsibility to the international community to ease the suffering of citizens in the former Yugoslavia.

[Translation]

The people of Canada will not rest until peace and security have been restored in Bosnia. As parliamentarians we have a duty to support them and to force the government to report on the progress of this mission.

[English]

In conclusion, I believe that Canada should participate under NATO command first because it is in our national interest to take our three years of efforts to bring peace and succour to Bosnia to a logical and positive conclusion and second, because it is a demonstration of our commitment to NATO which is a vital component of our national security.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be dividing my time with the member for Athabasca.

Like my colleagues who preceded me, I am considerably disappointed in the fact that this is just a take note debate. There is no great honour in participating in a charade. We are here to give an aura of respectability to decisions made by cabinet and DND bureaucrats, life and death decisions affecting our Canadian forces.

This is a matter which should not have been about partisan politics, a family matter if you will, but a matter in which we could put our ideological differences aside, sit down and reason together, make the best decisions possible and vote freely without the lash of the party whips. However, that will not happen.

The Prime Minister and I are about the same age. Neither of us will ever be asked to pick up an Armalite or step into a minefield. If, as usual, old men—and we are mostly men in this place—are to be asked to decide to send young people to die in a foreign land, they should be able to make informed decisions, which is a condition this government is denying those of us on this side of the House.

The briefing we received on November 30 was not very informative. That is putting it rather gently. The unfortunate officer who had to deliver it was not in a position to tell us even approximately how large a force cabinet has decided to commit. He did not know what sorts of troops Canada would be sending, what their function would be or what the long term objectives would be. Under those circumstances it hardly seemed worthwhile to ask him how they would be equipped or where our impoverished military would be able to scrounge effective weaponry on short notice.

In spite of my objections to giving a blank cheque to cabinet on this matter I am not an isolationist. I believe that for the sake of international political stability as well as for the sake of common humanity we must at times be our brothers' keepers.

For more than a year before the UN finally stopped temporizing and bluffing I strongly advocated tactical air strikes against the Bosnian Serbs to protect the so–called safe havens. The tiny under armed peacekeeping forces were incapable of serious intervention, but the use of superior air power was something that was doable. And it did work, albeit too late for thousands and thousands of civilians.

With the hostilities more or less on hold and with most of the exhausted combatants ready to sign a peace agreement on December 14, I can see some merit in deploying significant well equipped ground forces to in effect keep reminding the three parties that the war is over. The two divisions proposed by NATO should be adequate to do the job, although that is by no means certain.

I believe Canada should participate in something, but what? Canada faces a moral and practical dilemma. We must never again send inadequately equipped troops into harm's way. Our peacekeepers performed magnificently in Bosnia with limited supplies and equipment, some of it obsolete. However, under the more severe rules of engagement proposed for the NATO force, Canadians could end up being cannon fodder. That is not an idle fear. Aside from the fact that Canada cannot properly equip a significant fighting force on short notice, there is no indication that Canada will be significantly involved in the military and political decision making process beyond helping to define the rules of engagement.

If the mission turns out badly, neither the Minister of National Defence nor the Minister of Foreign Affairs can assure Canadians that our soldiers will not be put at undue risk because of decisions made by other nations. We are no longer a big kid on the block and we are unlikely to be treated like one within NATO councils. With our deteriorating economy and feeble military capability we cannot expect to be taken very seriously, notwithstanding our past contributions to UN endeavours.

NATO has indicated this will be a quick and dirty operation that will only last about 12 months. That sounds reassuring, but what exactly is proposed if when the magic deadline approaches the troops are actively engaging one or more of the belligerent parties? If DND or the Department of Foreign Affairs have the slightest idea, they are not telling anyone. There is no such thing as a timetable for war. Even if DND could cobble together an adequately equipped and militarily significant force right now, we would not have the resources to sustain it for a prolonged and indefinite period.

In summary, Canada's participation in whatever cabinet is proposing to do might save lives and help to maintain world political stability. However, with our military gutted by this and preceding governments, with our top heavy military bureaucracy and our thinly stretched and overused cadre of combat troops, we simply lack the capability to make an effective effort. In military parlance, the tail of the Canadian forces is overdeveloped and the teeth have been neglected. Our plethora of generals and colonels cannot throw their desks at the Serbs.

To suggest that we can continue to be the world's 911 number is false and misleading puffery. My advice to the government is that it be guided by its white paper of December 1994. Sit this one out. Do not get us in over our heads. Do not start something we cannot finish.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, first let me say that I believe we have to be involved in the peacekeeping effort. As the hon. member mentioned, political stability is very important. In spite of the misgivings of the hon. member, if Canada were not involved, seeing as it has been an architect of peacekeeping, then there would be many other countries that would not get involved.

The hon. member mentioned that we lack the capability of making a credible effort in this regard. I wonder if he and his party would like to come forward to give us the number of soldiers that should be sent and what kind of equipment they should have, instead of undermining the efforts of the government to fulfil a very useful role, a role we have been instrumental in pioneering.

Mr. Morrison: Madam Speaker, as I said, it appears the government wants to give an aura of respectability to the decisions it has already made.

The hon. member asked how many soldiers we would send and how we would equip them. I would rather the hon. member tell us how many soldiers the government has decided to send and how it hopes to equip them when we simply do not have the equipment. We did not even have adequate equipment for our poor little peacekeeping forces with their light armour and obsolete personnel carriers. How on earth will we equip a genuine fighting force?

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Madam Speaker, if I was confused earlier this morning, I am even more confused now.

Earlier the Reform member stated that he supported air strikes. When our peacekeepers were in the region last year the Prime Minister had to put a halt to it. We had ground troops in there. The United States of America did not have ground troops and of course the U.S. was advocating air strikes. The hon. member says we do not want our soldiers to be injured; we do not want to bring them back in bags. I am really confused. They are saying send in the planes and bombard these people. Can they clarify their position?

If they wanted more information, they could have come to the briefing. They could have provided input. But they did not bother to show up. All they do is sit there and criticize. To me this is a blatant flip–flop: one day one way, the next day the other.

• (1810)

Mr. Morrison: Madam Speaker, I do not believe I saw the hon. member at the non–briefing we attended.

With respect to the question of air strikes, I would remind the hon. member that when air strikes were first mentioned we had almost unanimous agreement in the House on that particular matter. This is nothing new. At that time it was clearly stated by members from all parties this did bring in the possibility that our forces would suffer casualties.

Nobody over here is saying that our soldiers are not capable of fighting and that they cannot take casualties. What we are saying is they have nothing to fight with. The Liberals want to send them over there to fight the Serbs with their teeth, and they cannot do it.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member just said. I think he said the Reform Party's position was not that we not send troops to fight. That certainly was not the position the third party defence critic concluded. After 30 minutes I finally got it out of him.

I want to ask the third party members if they believe we should have Canadian forces that are not able to participate in armed conflict. What do we have an armed forces for, to sit at home and stick their tongues out at people?

Mr. Morrison: What I would like to know is what do we have a Minister of National Defence for? These are the forces that have had no decent support from the politicians and the bureaucrats behind them. They do not have the equipment. The Liberals want to send them over there to take their lumps. I would suggest that some hon. members opposite, if they are so bloody brave, should pick up their Armalites and head for Bosnia.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to participate in the debate because I have somewhat of a unique position on the whole issue, having a son in the Canadian Armed Forces who could end up as part of this mission and possibly be one of those who could come back in a body bag if this thing turns into a disaster.

Mr. Collenette: Great optimism. A great thing to say.

Mr. Chatters: Well, the minister does not give one great cause for optimism. I will put it that way.

Mr. Collenette: I am glad I am not your son, hearing that from his father.

Mr. Chatters: Well, I am sure he would not choose you to be his Minister of National Defence, as well.

Mr. Hoeppner: How many sons do you have over there? Let us hear an answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): May I remind the hon. members that comments should be addressed through the Chair.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Remind the minister of that.

Mr. Chatters: Madam Speaker, I have looked forward to this debate for some weeks, having heard the Prime Minister say that he promised a full debate in the House of Commons before any decision was made in regard to this matter. I can only say that I was extremely disappointed to find out in the last couple of days that the whole debate was to be a fraud, a sham, that the decisions have already been made, not only to commit soldiers but how many soldiers would be committed.

I suppose five years from now the auditor general will be able to tell us what the operation will cost, because the Minister of National Defence, the finance department and the government have no idea what it will cost, or at least they are not willing to share it with us.

The government knows what the command structure will be for the Russian forces there and who will be in charge of those forces, but they do not know yet who will be in command of the Canadian Armed Forces and what the command structure will be. That does not give one great confidence. In addition, there is the unmitigated arrogance of members across the way to taunt us on this very serious matter, this insult to democracy we have witnessed all day.

I can say that the Reform Party has every bit as much concern as anybody on that side of the House for the suffering and the atrocities that are taking place in the former Yugoslavia. However, our primary concern must be for our Canadian sons and daughters. My concern is that the government would send my son and his colleagues into the theatre of war without properly equipping them and without proper command. I think that is truly atrocious.

We have simply asked from the beginning of this whole debate that the government and the ministers lay before Parliament a proposal that would clearly lay out the Canadian criteria, the mandate for the mission. We have also asked that the government lay out the command structure and how our Canadian soldiers and commanders would fit into that structure.

As we have heard before in previous debates on this issue, there were great concerns that we were one of the major forces in the peacekeeping effort in the former Yugoslavia and that we had absolutely no input into the decisions made concerning those forces. We really do not want to be in that situation again. We want to be able to make decisions and be part of that command structure.

We also asked that the government lay before Parliament for debate the rules of engagement. What happens when some of these war criminals are arrested and taken into custody? What happens when our Canadian soldiers are face to face with those individuals and perhaps need to shoot somebody to enforce the mandate they have been given?

I do not think we have heard anything on any of these issues. We have questioned the business of the length of the commitment. We have heard 12 months yet we hear that at the end of 12 months this mandate is to be handed over to some fictitious organization, that our soldiers will be withdrawn and the authority transferred to others.

It is unbelievable that they can go into the situation that exists there now, then in 12 months democratic elections will produce some kind of a government structure to turn this whole situation over to.

We have heard again from our members the problems our peacekeepers have already faced in the former Yugoslavia such as our soldiers not having enough combat helmets. They certainly do know which way to wear them, front or back, but if they do not have them it is difficult to put them on either way.

We have also heard about the armoured personnel carriers, the rolling coffins our soldiers were riding around in and the efforts to armour them to provide safe transport for our soldiers. After that they were so heavy they did not have enough power to get to the top of a hill. There are all kinds of horror stories, and that was a peacekeeping role. Clearly the members opposite do not seem to understand the difference. This is not a peacekeeping role. This is a combat role.

I believe we have asked a lot of reasonable questions which the government would have brought forward. We had hoped Parliament might have a chance to have a free vote on the issues debated and that members could make a democratic decision on behalf of their constituents based on that vote.

An hon. member: We make democratic decisions and you do not agree with them anyway. You lose the vote and then you complain.

Mr. Chatters: Yes, we know all about your democratic decisions.

I am truly disappointed and concerned for the welfare of our young people whom the government is now sending into a combat situation. My family has a long tradition of very proud participation in Canada's military. It has served in the second world war and Korea. Now my son in the Canadian Armed Forces participates in the peacekeeping roles. My son and I are truly embarrassed by what Liberal governments have done in the last 30 years to the Canadian military, once one of the proudest organizations in the world with much to be proud of.

We have expressed great concern with the ability of the government to put the kind of a combat battalion in the field that is equipped to do the job, to rotate it on a regular basis and to avoid the battle fatigue and the problems we faced in the peacekeeping role in Yugoslavia.

To begin again, after some of our soldiers have put in four tours of duty in the former Yugoslavia with all the problems that has caused for the families and children of those people, there are grave concerns as to our ability to do that and at the same time preserve some kind of family structure for those involved.

Again, I am truly disappointed. I wish the government would be honest and provide a chance for some democracy in this place.

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.): Madam Speaker, tonight from all three parties in this discussion I have been hearing the expression the former Yugoslavia. Let me clarify this. The former Yugoslavia means a territory of newly formed countries, starting with Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia–Hercegovina and the former Republic of Macedonia.

It would be absurd to use the expression of Latvia as the former Soviet Union. I would appeal to members to use proper names. Those countries are members of the United Nations.

Mr. Chatters: Madam Speaker, I do not believe there was a question there.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address some of the key concerns that—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We are still on questions and comments.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I am aware of that and you will get a seven–minute comment from me.

This debate is about two things: the recent Dayton peace agreement in light of the international community's continued effort to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans, and to consider Canadian support for peace efforts by participation in a multinational military implementation force under NATO command.

Like Canadians everywhere, the residents of York North want to see this crisis resolved. They have watched civilians on both sides of the conflict suffer unnecessarily. They have seen fellow Canadians risk their lives participating in humanitarian missions. They view the Dayton peace agreement as a ray of hope and they support Canadian participation in an implementation force.

Canada has long been an active player on the world stage. In the spring of 1945 Canada and 49 other nations gathered together to draft and adopt the charter of the United Nations, an international body created to prevent military conflict.

Since that day Canada has played an important and influential role in the operation of the United Nations.

• (1825)

It was, after all, our own Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson who presented the concept of peacekeeping to the world in response to the Suez crisis of 1956. He was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts.

Canada has taken part in almost every single United Nations peacekeeping operation since 1956 and many other missions outside the organization. As of November 1 of this year more than 1,600 personnel are deployed in 13 missions, making Canada the sixth largest troop contributor.

My question is simple. Why would the Reform Party try to break down this very important Canadian tradition of helping a country during a very important crisis?

Mr. Chatters: Madam Speaker, certainly you will not find me or any of my colleagues disputing the past history of the Canadian Armed Forces. We distinguished ourselves many times on the battlefield and would continue to do that again.

The members of the armed forces are there because they are willing to do those things. They cannot do those things if the government does not provide them the tools.

It is truly disgraceful what the Liberal government has done to our Canadian Armed Forces since the end of the second world war. Do not imply that we think any less of our armed forces or are any less proud of our armed forces than you are.

It is time you put your money where your mouth is, put the money up and provide the equipment—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to have to remind the member once again to please address your comments through the Chair. We have time for a very brief comment by the member for Scarborough Centre.

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this is what true democracy is all about, to be able to debate this important issue in the House.

I mentioned earlier about the flip–flop—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, there is a point of order.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, to the parliamentary secretary, because time is about to expire I would like to ask the hon. member if he could ask for unanimous consent to extend—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, I thought you were asking a question of the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I am happy to answer the hon. member's question. There have been some consultations. I have spoken with the Minister of National Defence. We will be more than happy to extend the debate after the vote scheduled for 6.30 p.m.

We would be prepared to extend the debate for two hours to 9 p.m. on the understanding that during the extended hours of debate there would be no dilatory motions, no quorum calls and no other business called or motions put to the House except the item under discussion.

We would be more than happy to extend for that two–hour period if it would help the hon. member. I understand there are many hon. members who wish to participate in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent to extend the debate until nine o'clock under the conditions stipulated by the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The remainder of the time is to the hon. member for Scarborough Centre.

Mr. Cannis: Madam Speaker, it is wonderful and this is democracy at its best to be able to debate this most important issue.

I mentioned flip–flopping. The reverse party—I mean the Reform Party—is stating here that our troops are not equipped and that they are not prepared. I do not know what impression it has. It thinks we will send our troops over there unequipped, unprepared. That is a false illusion. If the Reform Party thinks there is an expenditure needed, is it supporting the minister to spend the money? If he spends the money the Reform Party will come back and haunt him for spending money when we should cut. What is its position?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 6.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the second reading stage of Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

The House resumed from December 1 consideration of the motion that Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion carried. Accordingly, the bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

(Bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

THE BALKANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to an order made earlier today, the House will now resume consideration of government business, Motion No. 27.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address the House on this very important issue.

I would like to reiterate some of the important issues that I raised earlier on. This debate is about two major things: first, the recent Dayton peace agreement in light of the international community's continued efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans; second, to consider Canadian support for these efforts by participation in a multinational military implementation force under NATO command.

The residents of York North, like Canadians everywhere, want to see this crisis resolved. They have watched civilians on both sides of the conflict suffer unnecessarily. They have seen fellow Canadians risk their lives participating in humanitarian missions. They view the Dayton peace agreement as a ray of hope. They support Canadian participation in the implementation force.

Canada has a long tradition on the world stage in relation to peacekeeping. We know that under the leadership of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, who presented the concept of peacekeeping to the world in response to the 1956 Suez crisis, we are indeed world leaders.

Canada has taken part in almost every United Nations peacekeeping operation since 1956 and many other missions outside the organization. As of November 1 of this year more than 1,600 personnel are deployed in 13 missions making Canada the sixth largest troop contributor.

Since the end of the cold war, the nature of conflict has changed. It has become more regional and complex. The need for peacekeeping forces is increasing rather than decreasing. Peacekeeping forces, whose original missions were to monitor ceasefires, are now working on the maintenance and re–establishment of peace, delivering humanitarian aid, supervising elections and monitoring human rights abuses.

The parties to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia want peace. They have fought and suffered for several years. They are tired of the carnage and are prepared to pursue their goals through negotiations and political means. They have signed a complex agreement setting out the compromises and frameworks they are prepared to live with.

After more than four years of bitter fighting, peace may finally be at hand in the former Yugoslavia. The people of the region have endured terrible hardships. There could be no accurate measure of their suffering or loss. The effects of this conflict will be seen for years to come. Citizens will bear the emotional scars of being witnesses to the atrocities of war, of having had loved ones die in their arms from causes so simple and so possible to prevent: starvation, hypothermia, dehydration.

The land is scarred from years of battle. Bombs, chemical spills, mines and neglect have taken their toll. The infrastructure has been eradicated. It was only recently that electricity was restored to Sarajevo. Roads, buildings, sewer systems, the fundamentals that we as Canadians take for granted must be rebuilt.

What is critical to any peace process involving the use of peacekeeping troops is that the military component must be accompanied by a strong, viable political process. In the former Yugoslavia we now have a strong peace process. The Dayton peace agreement points the way clearly to a new political reality designed to end the fighting and conflict in that region.

What is required militarily is a brief period of stability to allow the implementation of the political steps agreed upon. The international community has laid the foundation for a strong peace process. The Dayton peace agreement points the way clearly to a new political reality designed to end the fighting in that region.

The Dayton peace agreement calls for, among other things, country–wide elections to be held within nine months. Free elections would be a tremendous step forward in the former Yugoslavia. A truly democratic election process that produces a government and a leader supported and chosen by the population would go a long way to ensuring the cohesiveness of the country.

Free elections require stability, freedom of movement and freedom of information. We must counteract nearly four years of war and hate. The groundwork must be laid to ensure that elections are feasible. One way of ensuring a successful election is to provide residents with a commitment to personal security.

Canada's efforts to re–establish peace in the former Yugoslavia are extensive. Over the last four years Canada has played a significant role in the international community's efforts to deal with the war in the former Yugoslavia. These efforts have been carried out primarily through the United Nations and NATO. Not only have Canadian military personnel helped prevent the conflict from spreading to other parts of the region and from becoming more brutal, they have also saved countless lives by assisting and delivering humanitarian relief supplies and preventing more massive assaults on civilian populations.

In September 1991, Canada led the call for the United Nations Security Council to deal with this situation. Since then Canada has contributed one of the largest contingents to UN forces in the former Yugoslavia. As the mandate of the UN forces evolved over the course of the conflict, so did the tasks performed by Canadian troops. Their duties have ranged from traditional peacekeeping functions such as monitoring ceasefires to more challenging roles such as establishing humanitarian airlifts, repairing schools and supporting hospital workers.

With the peace process now moving into a new phase, the Canadian forces are ready if necessary to serve with an implementation force. The peace implementation force plan calls for roughly 60,000 personnel. This plan covers the military aspects of the peace agreement negotiated in Dayton. It will be implemented after a UN Security Council resolution is passed authorizing the mission. The objectives of the implementation force are as follows:

The first objective is to ensure compliance with the military aspects of the peace agreement. This would include, in particular, the withdrawal of forces to their respective territories as set out in the agreement and the establishment of agreed lines of separation of those forces.

The second is to create secure conditions for the withdrawal of UN forces currently in place.

The third is to create secure conditions for the conduct of other non–military tasks associated with the peace agreement. The UN, the European Union and the Organization for Security and Co–operation in Europe will be among the organizations carrying out civilian duties. All our NATO allies will be participating, with the exception of Iceland which has no armed forces. Among non–NATO nations, 19 including Russia, have indicated a willingness to contribute.

Finally, the plan calls for the replacement of the implementation force with non–NATO forces after 12 months. This transfer would occur regardless of whether the peace agreement has been fully implemented. Citizens of the former Yugoslavia view the Dayton peace agreement as a ray of hope. Canadian involvement in the implementation force would allow this ray of hope to shine.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased the debate has been extended because if it had not been, I would not have been able to put my views on the record.

A lot of members are very interested in what is going on in Bosnia and Croatia and the other states of the former Yugoslavia. In my constituency there are many individuals whose families have served in a number of different support functions with the United Nations since this conflict started. In the Dartmouth–Halifax area because the east coast Canadian navy is there, there are many individuals who have served onboard the ships which offered logistical support in the Adriatic. Many individuals from Atlantic Canada have served on a number of the missions in Bosnia.

The hon. member for Athabasca indicated earlier that perhaps he was in a unique situation because his son might be one of those called upon to serve. He may be unique in that regard but there are many of us, myself included, who have family members in the Canadian Armed Forces.

My brother Paul served in peacekeeping missions under the UN as a blue beret in Cambodia. Cambodia was a very difficult mission. There were no warring factions at that point in time, but it was a highly unstable political situation. It was difficult on family members. It was difficult on Paul's fiancée at the time but he served proudly wearing the blue beret of the United Nations. He served there proudly as a member of the Canadian Armed Forces.

My nephew, Neil Bernard MacKinnon, served two or three tours of duty in Bosnia. He was a young man in his early twenties. When he would visit, my dad, who served in the second world war, would say: "I think Neil Bernard has seen more slick trenches by his stories from Bosnia than I did in the Italian campaign during the second world war". That young man dedicated himself and his life to serve the Canadian Armed Forces. He served very proudly under very difficult circumstances in Bosnia. It is unfortunate because he lost his life in the spring of this year, not in Bosnia but here in Canada in a training exercise in Suffield. This is currently the subject of an inquiry.

Some of the best remembrances I and my family have of Neil Bernard are his stories about the service he gave in Bosnia, about the humanitarian tragedy that was unfolding in that particular state and about the important role played by Canadian peacekeepers serving under the UN banner in that little part of hell. That is how he described it to me one day.

Today it is important that as parliamentarians we not debate in isolation. I have heard a lot of isolated debate today. I have heard a little bit too much partisanship in the debate as well. We are talking about the soldiers, the men and women who have chosen to serve this country, Canada, through the Canadian Armed Forces. We sent these people over there in a time of war and conflict when there was no peace to keep. They provided humanitarian aid. Some were injured and some were killed. Some were scarred by what they saw, but nevertheless they did it because they believed in the Pearson commitment to humanitarian aid and peacekeeping through the United Nations.

I remember in the last Parliament we had another debate on the UN and UN resolutions with respect to the Persian Gulf crisis. I remember quite well having to speak in that debate. It was certainly not as focused as this debate is. The government at the time did not want us to speak specifically about whether or not our troops would be committed if a war did break out. It was a resolution on whether or not we supported UN resolutions. I remember I was waiting to speak on that bill. There was a long list at the time. It was a motion. My interest in speaking was that I knew if a war did break out and the Canadian government committed troops there would be men and women who lived in my riding, some of whom lived in my neighbourhood and some of whom had children who went to school with my children, who would be committed.

As members of Parliament, I wanted everybody to be quite aware of the dangers of such a commitment of forces in the Persian Gulf. I supported at that time the government of the day doing what it did. I supported that Parliament and the Canadian government had to support members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

It is a little different this time around. We are being asked to debate the principle of whether we should continue, now that we have the Dayton peace accord, to provide troops for a one–year period as peace is implemented in Bosnia.

Clearly, the members of the Canadian Armed Forces have been truly tested over the years from budget cuts and lack of equipment they believe they need. But not once have I talked to a member of the Canadian Armed Forces who was not prepared to go and do the job they joined the armed forces to do. If that is in protection of the sovereignty of our country, they are there to do it. If it is to go and protect or preserve a peace or to try to bring about a peace in a foreign state, they are prepared to serve.

I am rising today to say that I support the Canadian government participating in the IFOR in Bosnia. I do not do it lightly. I do it knowing full well, as the member for Athabasca said, that when you get involved with an action like this there are inherent dangers. Members of this place have to understand that when they speak in support or not in support of motions such as this.

I also believe very strongly that we can no longer continue to ask the members of our Canadian Armed Forces to do more with less. During the Persian Gulf situation and since 1991 in the Bosnian situation, there is no question that what we have done is ask our men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces to stretch the resources further than the resources many times could be stretched.

I am one of those who believe that if we want the Canadian Armed Forces to continue to hold up the very credible reputation that Canada has worldwide for its peacekeeping and peacemaking efforts, then we must provide the resources to the armed forces to make sure they are the best equipped forces in the world.

I get worried about talk of continued budgetary cutbacks. I get worried when I know that perhaps some of the equipment our armed forces has is not what it should be. But I get equally worried when I hear members opposite of the third party, the Reform Party, who want to have it both ways. Two or three times in debate they have criticized the government for allowing a debate to happen, which is outrageous, and have said that we cannot send troops over because they are not properly equipped.

I do not care what the Minister of National Defence says and I really do not care what the Minister of Finance says with respect to the need to get the deficit down when I know there are members of the Canadian Armed Forces who do not have the resources they require to do the job we ask of them.

I will say it in this place. I said it publicly and I will continue to say it, even though some in my party may not like me saying it. At least I am not hypocritical. I am consistent. I have been for the seven years I have been here.

What I would like to find out from the members opposite, from somebody in the Reform Party, is whether they are in favour of sending troops over. Please say so. If it is with the condition that there is more money allocated through the budgetary process to provide them with better helicopters to replace the Sea Kings, I will be the first one to jump up and say I agree with them. If it is with the assurance that the announced armoured personnel vehicle program be accelerated, which would cost a little more money, I would agree with them. If it is conditional on the purchase of new submarines to retire the aging class we have most of the time that do not work because they are so bloody old, I will agree with them.

I would like them to be clear and intellectually honest in a debate like this. The men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces deserve better than political rhetoric on the floor of the House of Commons when there are motions put forward debating whether or not they participate in international obligations, particularly when there is the threat of injury or even death.

I support the government's initiative, but I will also put it on the record that I want the government to ensure the troops we send have the resources they need to do the job we ask of them.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in the debate on Bosnia and Canada's role in this important geopolitical problem.

There have been four years of brutal war. Two million people have been displaced. Over 200,000 people have been killed. Now, thankfully, there is the Dayton peace plan. It is a welcome initiative. However, there is something we must understand: it is a fragile peace plan and it is only the beginning. The international community must realize the Dayton peace plan gives the world an opportunity to provide long lasting peace in Bosnia; however, it is not the end of the situation.

In the long term, history tells us that peace cannot be enforced at the end of an assault rifle. It has to come from peace building initiatives from people on the ground. Any time there is a civil war that tears apart a country, as the conflict in Bosnia has done, the seeds of ethnic discontent, hatred and future wars will be there. The only way to combat that is for us to contribute to peace building initiatives for the disparate ethnic groups in that land.

Let us look at the scenario that now faces us. The 12–month timeline that has been set up by the supreme allied command is a fantasy. The people of that region will be there for a longer period. We have to ensure that we will not be engaged in a Cyprus in the middle of Europe. We have to understand that the Bosnian Serb population is very tenuous, with Radovan Karadzic and General Mladic saying they will make certain parts of the former Yugoslavia bleed, namely Sarajevo. They are an element that has to be neutralized.

The Muslim–Croat alliance that exists now is tenuous at best. Many people tend to forget that two years ago these two groups were fighting a bloody war within Bosnia. Much has to be done to mend fences there. The Bosnian federation as it now exists with two federations under the umbrella of one country is also tenuous. It will fracture. Whether it fractures into two areas or three, with a Croat–Bosnian–Muslim and a Bosnian Serbian group or with the Croats and Muslims divided into two groups, is yet to be seen. In my estimation, Bosnia will fracture into at least two or three groups. It is important for us to ensure the fracturing is accomplished through diplomacy and not at the end of an assault rifle.

There is much that has to be done, and IFOR gives us the opportunity. Troops need to be deployed but they do not have to be Canadian troops. I believe there is a way around this situation. The European Union has a force of 50,000 troops that has never been tried. That force is well armed and well equipped. The European force can use Bosnia as a teething ground under the existing NATO command structures. A lot could be learned from this, which could be used in future peace building initiatives.

Canada has done its part. Our armed forces have done an admirable job in the former Yugoslavia. Our troops need a rest. They need to re–equip and take a bit of a break.

Bosnia will secede. As I said before, we want to ensure that it secedes peacefully.

I believe the effective contribution Canada can make, rather than sending over troops, is to ensure the peace building initiatives that take place on the ground continue. We can contribute engineers for the rebuilding of infrastructure: hospitals, roads, bridges and the like. We can also utilize NGOs and civilian groups to contribute to the peace building and peace bridging that must happen with the civilian population in that region. This is something we are good at and something we can contribute to the peace building process in the former Yugoslavia without contributing troops.

Economic prosperity in any war situation is absolutely fundamental for the peace building process. Just because we are enforcing a peace with an international protection force now does not mean to say there will be peace in the future. Contributing to the infrastructure development and developing economies so the people in the area can stand on their own two feet is absolutely fundamental for peace building.

One of the things we can do to neutralize Radovan Karadzic and General Mladic is to take away their power base. The people in Sarajevo are scared, the Bosnian Serbs in particular. If we can contribute to making sure they will be secure in their environment, they will not provide a fertile ground for General Mladic and Mr. Karadzic to put a flame into the very volatile situation that is Bosnia as we know it.

I would also suggest that we continue with the arms embargo, and I would continue with the demilitarization process that has to occur in the former Yugoslavia, a very difficult situation to pursue.

I would say involvement of the European force is something that is long overdue, for the European community abrogated their responsibility in the first place in the former Yugoslavia. When they were given the mandate to try to defuse the situation, defuse the precursors to conflict that were there, they turned their back and stuck their head in the sand. It is high time they contribute to this initiative, contribute to IFOR by using the European force that is there.

Our contribution as a country to ensure that our commitment to European security is there and to ensure our allies in NATO realize we are also committed to security in Europe can be the involvement of our military through engineers, not combat troops, and can be the involvement of our civilian population NGOs through peace building initiatives on the ground. All we need to do is look at the Middle East to see that peace building must be done along economic lines as well.

On a broader scale, I would ask our Minister of Foreign Affairs to work with our Minister of National Defence at developing a long lasting, far–reaching Canadian foreign policy on how to prevent these conflicts from occurring in the first place. That involves identifying the precursors to conflict and working with international organizations to ensure there will be a predictable, identifiable and concrete response to the precursors to conflict.

This conflict in the former Yugoslavia and many others around the world were entirely preventable. The writing on the wall in the former Yugoslavia was there in 1987, yet the world community chose to ignore it. If we had addressed that conflict then, we would not have seen the hundreds of thousands of people killed, the millions of people displaced and the profound human tragedy that none of us in this room can possibly comprehend.

We as a country can take a leadership role as one of the few countries in the world that has the international suasive power in the international community to encourage our neighbours to develop the broad peace building, peacemaking and conflict prevention framework that needs to be done.

Apart from using the United Nations, we can also use the international financial institutions as cheap non–military economic levers in conflict prevention, both as a form to dissuade potential groups from engaging in conflict and also to encourage groups to enter a road of peace rather than go down the road of war.

With the debate we have had today—and I thank the hon. members in the House for extending the debate—I hope we can make an effective contribution, not necessarily through our combat troops but toward the peace building initiatives we in Canada are so good at.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I sit in the House and listen and it reminds me of someone trying to walk down a razor blade afraid they will slip. I think that is what is happening with the party opposite. What does it understand by collective security? The person on the right is going to be there when they are called upon. There is a trust. There is a belief that one will deliver the goods. It is my belief the third party is really off its stick in this whole debate, trying to win friends on one side and trying to do something on the other side.

I want to know now, does the hon. member understand what the concept of collective security in NATO is?

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, we understand what collective security is. I made it very clear in my speech that peace in the former Yugoslavia must involve a number of routes. One is the use of combat troops.

As his colleague mentioned, our troops are having a difficult time because of a lack of equipment and the fact that they have been rotating quite frequently through the former Yugoslavia. They are very tired and they need a break.

Be that as as it may, Canada can make an effective contribution. One of the things I mentioned is through the use of military engineers we can contribute to the infrastructure development in Bosnia. If there is no infrastructure development in Bosnia, no economy to provide people with the means to get on their feet and provide themselves with their basic needs, they have all the seeds, the groundwork will remain for future conflicts to occur.

IFOR is just a stop gap measure. There is a pool of soldiers not being utilized right now, a pool of soldiers in the sphere of influence that Bosnia is in, the European Union force.

As I mentioned before, there are 50,000 troops. They are not being used anywhere and they are well equipped. What better place to have them teethe their techniques and drills than in the former Yugoslavia, in Bosnia right now? They can do it under a controlled setting under the guise and leadership of proven soldiers who are there right now, the Americans, the French and the British. They could learn the techniques and the tools to be an effective peacemaking, peace building and peacekeeping force.

In the future I hope the European Union force can take the leadership role in trying to ensure that IFOR maintains its mandate, that we can continue to ensure that Bosnia does not have short term peace but enjoys a long term peace and that it does not descend into the caldron of brutality it has been for the last five years.

We need to contribute to this. We can involve civilian populations in the peacemaking process in the former Yugoslavia. There are number of options there as I mentioned in my speech.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have engaged this member in debate in the past. He is usually rather unequivocal with his position.

I ask him to be unequivocal. The member heard me indicate my support and I could not make it any clearer. I am concerned about whether the Canadian Armed Forces generally has the resources given to it through the budgetary process to have the best equipment possible to do the job we ask of it.

I ask the member opposite a question concerning himself individually. Forget his party. He knows the comments I have made about his party and its position. Does he support the Canadian Armed Forces participating in IFOR? It is either yes or no.

Perhaps the member thinks this is the forum in which we debate exactly every detail the Canadian forces are to do over there. The member should know those details will be worked out with their colleagues who are putting together this collective force.

With or without qualifications, does he support it? Yes or no.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, if we had more details on Canadian troop requirements in the former Yugoslavia we would be able to make a more equivocal statement.

The contribution Canada can make toward the peace process in Bosnia is to use perhaps our military engineers toward infrastructure development but not use our combat troops in IFOR at the present time.

• (1935)

I hope that is very clear: do not use our combat troops under IFOR but contribute toward European security, contribute toward participating with our allies in building peace within Bosnia through non–military methods, through the use of our engineers, through peace building initiatives, through our non–combat troops in the military and also through non–military groups we have in Canada, NGOs, civilian groups and the like.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to share my thoughts about Canada's peacekeeping role in Bosnia this evening. I begin by giving a vote of thanks to our Canadian troops.

Despite the bad press they have received because of a few bad apples and a few incidents in the past few years with people who are not worthy to be called Canadian soldiers, despite the miserable state of the leadership at national defence and the wholly inadequate response to leadership deficiencies on the part of this government, and even though our forces have not always been properly backed up by this government, I commend the fortitude, the restraint and the professionalism shown by our military personnel in the field. The quality of our peacekeeping has never been more restrained or to be admired more than in Bosnia. We are recognized the world over for our contributions there to date.

Canadians have an unparalleled reputation for even handedness and compassion in other areas of the world as well. A Canadian working for World Vision in Rwanda and Somalia who had daily contact with our troops had nothing but praise for them. He told us that our personnel consistently went above and beyond the call of duty in service to other Canadians as well as to the people native to the area. That is a typical comment.

However, there are a number of defence reports circulating that show a serious morale problem in the forces because of the rapid and successive deployments in Croatia and Bosnia. Some soldiers have seen three or four tours of duty in a row and are becoming exhausted. Still, they are professionals and I expect they will return to the field once again without hesitation if they are asked to serve.

The question we address tonight is should they be asked in the first place? Nowhere is it more appropriate that the questions be asked than in the House. I remind the Canadian people that the Prime Minister and the minister of defence have already made the decision to send the troops, which renders the House of Commons almost irrelevant in this debate. All we as members can do is stand up here and voice our frustrations. It was obvious in that last exchange between members on government side and this side when they said "support us, we do not know if we have the troops or the supplies or the necessary equipment. Just support it". It is very frustrating.

Members of Parliament are denied any meaningful input which is contrary to the recommendation of the special joint committee's defence review last year which said: "The government should not commit our forces to service abroad without a full parliamentary debate and accounting for that decision. It is our expectation that, except in extraordinary circumstances, such a debate would always take place prior to any such deployment".

In other words, before the decision is made we should be debating it in advance. So much for the recommendations of that special joint committee.

Earlier this year the House considered my private member's Bill C–295, the peacekeeping bill, which would have placed reasonable limits on Canada's peacekeeping role. The bill would have required Parliament to approve participation in the mission, a mission such as we are discussing tonight. It would have required the government to offer the House an estimate of the mission's cost, its duration and the role of the Canadian troops before committing to it. These are the exact questions Canadians are asking today, and the government is not offering adequate answers. I am not going to sign a blank cheque or approve a blank cheque because those questions have not been answered.

I point out a few important things, especially to the people back home at CFB Chilliwack in my riding. The first is obvious. This is not a UN mission. This is a NATO mission and NATO is not intended to be a peacekeeping body. It is a joint force originally designed and meant to defend Europe in the face of aggression. We are a part of that. We understand that concept of collective security.

However, the quality of this mission is not a normal peacekeeping mission. We need to know that up front. It is a NATO led enforcement mission, not the kind that Canada usually participates in under the authority of the United Nations. The Minister of National Defence has already said this mission would be a fully armed, sharp point combat role in which NATO forces would be able to fire first and to respond to any attack with overwhelming force. Previous American leadership has said this force would be meaner than a junkyard dog. This is not a peacekeeping force.

Given also the warlike tone of some of the Bosnian leaders who have already repudiated the Dayton treaty signed in Ohio, I think we can expect some difficult combat action. Canadians are understandably uncomfortable with this role when they are not defending their own soil.

They ask questions such as are we willing to accept an escalation of our role in Bosnia? Do we have the equipment to equip our forces properly? Are we willing to raise the stakes even further with the risk of having our Canadian soldiers shot or blown up by land mines or humiliated and held hostage by people intent on destroying the peace? I have already attended one funeral in my riding of a Canadian soldier who served in Bosnia. I can understand their concern about this escalation in the role.

We hear that NATO may also be involved in rearming Bosnia. People ask if Canada should be a part of this where it takes sides and helps to arm different factions in a war, where it helps pick the winners and losers. In some people's minds this provokes rather than reduces hostilities. Canada has invested too much in its international reputation for peace to jeopardize its neutrality now by enmeshing itself in conflicts as one of the antagonists.

We also have no idea what the goal of this mission is. We do in broad terms but NATO says it hopes to stabilize the situation within a year, then throw the hot potato to somebody else, an unknown, unnamed entity with the power to keep the antagonists apart. Who would that be? No one knows for sure but it seems to me if history is any teacher we are likely to see NATO forces there indefinitely.

Because this upcoming year is an election year in the U.S. there will be intense pressure for the Americans to pull up stakes and return home after that year is up. Then someone will have to stay behind and keep the peace. Who? I talked to a senior member of the armed forces on the weekend back home. He said that when he went to Cyprus 30 years ago it was supposed to be a one–year mission. We all know what happened there. We were there for 30 years and we do not want to see that happen again.

Not only that but as part of the bigger picture Canada is also on record saying we want to give some of our forces to a standing permanent rapid reaction force, virtually a standing army, to the United Nations. I realize this is a separate issue but if that were to come about it would surrender more of our troops outside of Canadian led combat forces.

I wonder sometimes where the leadership of our country is taking us. I am not sure it understands that we do not have an infinite amount of troops to give to either the UN or to NATO while trying to keep our other jobs properly equipped and manned.

The cost of this mission? In the last three years we spent $800 million in the former Yugoslavia. In the next year we would expect to spend another $200 million, but that is just speculation because the government will not give us the figures. We have asked it to give us the figures, the cost, the role and so on, but it will not give us any of that. It is interesting that if we commit more troops to NATO we will have fewer troops to commit to any UN led force in years to come, and there are bound to be more demands on that as well.

I reiterate the idea of a colleague from the Reform Party. We could arguably and persuasively say Canada has some obligation to serve with NATO but Canada need not take an active combat role. We could have a support role either with the engineers, as was mentioned earlier, with providing field services, supply services, an intelligence network and so on. There are things we could do outside the combat role.

To be heavily involved in combat, to be rearming some portions of the population and not others, to be acting outside our traditional UN mandate is a huge step when I do not see the end result the government is trying to work toward. Without an effective national debate we are about to launch an armed forces, exhausted and low in morale for the reasons I mentioned earlier, into a dangerous high risk combat mission without goals, without timetables, without cost estimates and perhaps even without the proper equipment. Is this wise?

It is said that discretion is the better part of valour, and our national leaders will show their discretion in this situation by declining combat participation in this venture.

• (1945)

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in a more cynical and uncaring age than our own, Bismarck once quipped that the Balkan conflicts were not worth the bones of a single Prussian Grenadier.

In depositions I gave to the committee on foreign affairs of the United States House of Representatives on August 12, 1992 and August 3, 1993—and these are entered and published in the congressional record of those two dates—I recommended that with the pending break–up of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which was first put together as part of the World War I victors' peace settlement, it would be wise to go back to the original Versailles treaties of 1919 and specifically the treaty of St. Germain–en–Laye which created Yugoslavia to achieve a peaceful, orderly succession and avoid loss of life and hardship to the civilian population of the region.

Now, three years and 250,000 civilian deaths later, we seem to be reaching the same result as might have been obtained under the orderly international law processes envisaged by the Versailles treaties, including resort to the compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court afforded by the treaty in case of impasse on territorial frontiers.

Our foreign minister and later Prime Minister, Lester Pearson, fathered the concept of United Nations peacekeeping. We have since come of age in our experience with UN problem solving in the former Yugoslavia with the mission in the Bosnia–Hercegovina region being quickly transformed from classical UN peacekeeping, which is simply physically keeping apart warring rivals who have already accepted a military ceasefire, and this involving chapter VI of the charter, Pacific settlement of disputes, the transformation into the new concept of an activist peacekeeping role involving chapter VII of the charter.

Having gone so far, Canada has become part of the continuing post–communist succession problem in Yugoslavia and should stay the course.

There are, however, steps that can be taken to offset or reduce the dangers of our continuance in the new NATO based phase of the operation and to ensure that decisions taken are compatible with and protected by international law and also rational in the political and larger geopolitical sense.

First, it should be recognized that NATO as a regional security arrangement falling within chapter VIII of the United Nations charter, derives its international law authority from the United Nations charter and cannot go beyond that. Issues such as the right of self–defence and its present day practice can be updated or redefined in contemporary international law terms by the security council and also the general assembly as glosses on classical doctrine, and jurisprudence, as the 1992 decision of the International Court of Justice in the Lockerbie case confirmed.

NATO, however, has no power to dispense from existing international law norms, and NATO commanders and their political governors would act at legal peril if they did not refer back to the security council and general assembly when new political facts challenging the political–military settlement now reached might emerge.

One such potential problem obviously concerns future relations of the two main constituent parts of the new Bosnian entity: the Croat–Muslim Bosnian Republic and the Serbian–Bosnian Republic, their relations to their adjoining mother states, Croatia and rump Yugoslavia which is Serbia–Montenegro.

The current political military settlement has an element of historical transition inherent in it and irredentist pressures for ultimate junction with the adjoining mother states can be expected.

It would be an error for NATO to view such matters, if they should arise, as purely military in character and proper for a NATO military decision alone. Political common sense and prudence counsel following what international law in any case enjoins, namely referring the high political issues back to the security council and general assembly for definitive ruling.

Likewise whatever dispositions the NATO high command might wish to make, the military decisions of NATO are referable back to the United Nations for their ultimate sanction and justification under international law.

In adhering to the new NATO force for Bosnia, the Canadian government might perhaps attach appropriate reservations confirming the primacy, as to Canadian forces, of the United Nations over its regional security organizations authorized under chapter VIII of the United Nations charter.

• (1950)

This being understood, we can and should support Canada's continued participation in the Bosnian peace process that after four long winters seems at last to be opening up the prospect of the rule of law and peace and elemental security for the inhabitants of that historically troubled region.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise in the House this evening to debate the issue of whether we should once again send troops into the Balkan theatre to aid that area in implementing the peace initiative which has recently been achieved at Dayton, Ohio.

The first question we have to ask ourselves is whether Canadian troops should go back. Should we be sending our troops back to this area where they have already performed with such skill, with such professionalism and have brought such pride to Canadians by the contribution they have made in the humanitarian rescue of unfortunate people in that region?

Our troops have made tremendous contributions in that area. Many members of the Reform Party have taken the position that they have done enough. Let us cease our contribution. Let us stop there.

As many other Canadians do, I might subscribe to that point of view myself if things had not changed. Things have changed enormously in the last couple of months. There has been a dramatic change in the conditions under which that whole region is presently evolving.

We have heard described in this House the conditions of the Dayton, Ohio peace agreement which has been achieved. There is no reason for me to go over the conditions and the parameters of that agreement.

It is not a perfect agreement, but the Serbian government of Mr. Milosevic is committed to it. There will be problems in Sarajevo. There will be problems in other areas but the Serbian government is committed to the agreement and various other governments in the area are committed to it. It is clear that without some form of active intervention from outside forces to make that peace treaty work there will be no opportunity or no possibility of peace being established in the region.

We must ask ourselves the question, should we intervene at this time and give peace a chance? Should we listen to what Mr. Clinton said on television the other night when he laid out the reasons why for the first time he is prepared to commit United States' troops to this grand enterprise?

Should we recognize the tremendous contribution the United States has made and is making to this and the difference that will make? Should we then take these risks, for risks there will be? There are always risks in any enterprise worth the game.

It seems to me this is an enterprise in which we can balance the risks with the reasonable certainty of a better opportunity to ensure peace than we could have before. Take, for example, the position of the security of our troops, a matter referred to at great length by members from the third party.

It seems to me that the security of our troops in the present circumstances is far superior to what it was before. When we were debating this matter before, the members of the third party were constantly saying we should not be putting our troops in harm's way. They have no opportunity of defending themselves. They are in this awful position where they can be taken hostage, they cannot defend themselves, they have been put in an impossible position.

We are going to send them back equipped. We are sending them back with a force of the United States of America, 20,000 troops of the most important army in the world, with the most sophisticated weaponry in the world and with the authority to take defensive measures if they are attacked.

In my view, they are in a far better position than they ever were before. I am far more at ease as a parliamentarian to know that our troops will be going in those circumstances rather than where they were before.

If they were being asked to go back and produce in the conditions they were in before I would agree they should not go back but these are not the same conditions. They are not so inconsistent.

• (1955)

Look at what the local countries around are dealing with, the determination of Croatia and Serbia. There is a contribution from all countries in the area. We can now be assured the risk of this war spilling over can be eliminated.

It makes sense to send our troops back under these circumstances. This confirms our overall policy objectives in this area and all other areas, which are to provide effective humanitarian aid and to assure the evolution of multilateral peacekeeping which directly fulfils the need for security and peace in the world. The joint foreign policy review by the Senate and House of Commons laid great emphasis on the need for Canada's participation in multilateral peacekeeping because that is the future of the world. That is where Canada can make a contribution that is needed.

Finally, it corresponds to our commitment to the human rights of the people in these areas. There can be no human rights without peace, security and stability. Without that the talk about human rights is empty talk. This gives us an opportunity to contribute to the establishment of human rights in this area.

We have made these contributions before. We have not just contributed armed forces in this area. We have contributed mounted police who on a day to day policing mission gave stability and proper peace and security to small neighbourhoods to ensure that individuals could get some opportunity for justice and fair treatment.

Our non–governmental organizations have provided food aid, resettled people, provided an opportunity for people to try to get their lives back together. This can only be accomplished in an area where peace has been established and where there is some form of security guaranteed by troops. It is our troops that will be doing that.

I feel we must support this initiative. We must urge the government to be part of any comprehensive scheme in which our NATO allies are participating and in which we can make an important contribution. It corresponds to our interests in establishing peace in the region. It creates credibility for the multilateral peacekeeping process, an important contribution Canada can make to the world today.

In conclusion, I would like to say that this initiative is in keeping with Canadian interests and values. It is in our interest, because we have an interest in peace and in humanitarian aid, and we can be proud of what we have already done and what we will be doing in this area. It is in keeping with our values, because our values are those of a society that is fair, equitable and peaceful.

We want to contribute to a world where these values prevail in place of those of war and aggression. It is, moreover, our duty to take part in this initiative. Chances are good this initiative will succeed and that we will make a significant contribution to its success. I am very proud to speak in favour of this government initiative.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his remarks. I know he is very well informed. As chair of the foreign affairs committee, he is in the loop. He knows all the inside stories.

I know he thinks the third party is somehow not in favour of sending troops overseas or some such thing, but if he could just grab the nub of the argument. He says the troops will be in much better shape this time when we send them over because they will be so much better equipped to defend themselves in the case of aggression. I hope that is true. I have been calling for that since the last time I saw one of our guys chained to chain link fence. I wanted them to be better equipped and have the ability to defend themselves.

Can the member not understand that is the problem? He says, and maybe he knows because he is part of the inside circle, that we are going to have better equipment, a better opportunity to defend ourselves and so on. What we are asking is that we merely be told what we are going to do when we get there. What are we going to send? Are we going to send 20 F–18s? Are we going to send tanks? We do not have tanks so I guess it is not tanks. Are we going to strap Eaton's catalogues around our guts to try to keep them from being blown up? What are we going to do?

We are just asking for a list of what it is we are sending over there so we know that our troops will be well looked after. That is all we are asking. If the member knows something more than what is in this motion and he can tell us, then maybe we would vote in favour of it. Saying that we hope the guys get over there and tying a Canadian flag to the end of a World War II musket in the hopes they do not get their guts blown out is not good enough. We need some more assurance before we start sending our guys over there.

If the government wants to assure us, just tell us what equipment we are going to send over. It is not going to be tanks because we do not have tanks. Is it going to be submarines?

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): We don't have any of them.

Mr. Strahl: We do not have submarines. What is it going to be? Why is the government so assured that we are going to be able to look after ourselves? If the government could just tell us what we are sending. We are sending an unknown number of people over there for an unknown duration at an unknown cost with unknown equipment to do an uncertain role with an unknown resolution at the end of it and we are supposed to say it sounds good to us? I think not.

If the government could just tell us what we are doing then maybe we could vote with it.

Mr. Graham: Madam Speaker, it is easy to have a reductio ad absurdum on these sorts of arguments. Is the hon. member seriously suggesting that we are going to parachute our troops in unarmed, that we are going to drop them in with absolutely no equipment? This is an absolutely ridiculous argument.

It reminds me of exactly what the Bloc Quebecois members were saying this afternoon. They were saying: "We agree we should be participating. We accept that we have an obligation to do this. We accept that we should be there, but we do not like the fact that the Prime Minister has not talked to Mr. Clinton first", or something like that. Reasons can always be found.

What are we talking about here? We are talking about participating in a NATO enterprise. It is going to be absolutely secured by a great deal of superior American firepower, troops and armour and we will be able to play an important supporting role.

I do not think it is up to us in this House to try and second guess the generals, to second guess exactly what is going to be on the ground. Are there going to be three tanks, two troop carriers, four submachine guns? That is not the role of members of Parliament.

Members of Parliament know we have armed services that are equipped to do the job they will be asked to do. We know they are not being sent over there with a bunch of Eaton's catalogues strapped around them. We know they are going there in an enormous, complicated enterprise with NATO troops and with allies who, all pulling together, will be able to achieve this extraordinary enterprise.

To suggest that they are somehow being dropped in there without proper equipment and preparation is irresponsible. In my view it totally ignores what we have been able to achieve so far. It totally ignores the quality of our armed services.

As a member of this House, I do not expect the government to give me a shopping list of every platoon and every weapon that is going. What I expect is a principled decision based on a common sense approach and an understanding of the strategic and military necessities. My understanding from listening to the Minister of Defence this morning in opening this debate and from listening to what the Prime Minister has said to date, is that we have that understanding. Let us go with it. Let us not quibble and constantly raise these quibbling concerns which are really just an excuse to try and get out of what our duty calls us to do.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a quick rebuttal to the earlier speaker. I do not think these are quibbling concerns. These are life and death concerns. We have been raising questions here all day and getting absolute nonsense for answers, when we get any answers at all.

I would like to thank hon. members of the House for agreeing to the extension of the debate. It allows those of us who did not have the opportunity earlier to speak on this issue this evening.

As we debate a renewed commitment of troops to Bosnia, I find myself with many more questions than answers. My colleagues have already raised this concern. How can we have a meaningful debate if the government cannot decide or will not tell us how many troops it will send, what their job will be and under what conditions we will bring them home? But what is new? The government has not had any criteria for three years. Why should I be surprised and expect it to change?

Apparently NATO is expecting at least 1,200 to 1,500 Canadian troops. According to reports, this is more than Germany or Turkey are each committing. The former Yugoslavia is almost on their doorstep yet Canada is supposed to commit more human and financial resources to this effort than they are. Why?

It is far more expensive to maintain our troops across the Atlantic than it would be for a neighbouring NATO ally, I would submit. Has Canada or more important, our soldiers, not already demonstrated a commitment to the peace process in the former Yugoslavia? Canadians spent three years and 10 lives in Bosnia. Unlike what the earlier speaker said, I do not believe it means that Reformers are saying we have already done enough. That is not what we are saying. I have not heard that here at all today. It is time some of our other NATO allies bore their share of the burden, however. As history has shown, achieving sustainable peace in the Balkans is critical to European security.

I commend the Canadian soldiers who already served in the former Yugoslavia. They performed professionally and beyond any reasonable expectation, given an unclear mandate and extremely adverse conditions. They were sent as peacekeepers before there was any peace to keep. They were sent into a war zone inadequately equipped and lightly armed. They protected civilian populations in so–called neutral zones when the parties to the conflict did not abide by the rules.

Despite questionable command structure, poor supplies, low morale and an indecisive government back home with no plan to get them out when the situation took a turn for the worse, despite all of this, they did their jobs. They delivered humanitarian supplies and kept thousands of women, children and non–combatants safe in the middle of a war.

The reason they were sent in the first place was not to keep the peace, for the belligerents were still at war. It was so the government of the day could tell the world that Canada was ready to participate anytime, anywhere, as long as it was called a peacekeeping mission.

There was good reason many NATO allies were not there before. There was no peace accord, but Canada was there. Sadly, it seems that political pride in our peacekeeping tradition takes precedence over the safety of our troops. If someone labels it a peacekeeping mission, they know we will come running. Our soldiers deserve more from us than this lapdog mentality. Let us make sure we are going back for the right reasons, for reasons that Canada defines.

We are justifiably proud of the Canadian men and women who have served as peacekeepers over the years. When they lay their lives on the line, they must know that political leadership has done everything in its power to ensure they are given the best chance for survival.

They have a right to expect some things from their government. We have a solemn responsibility to consider their safety above all else. If we make a political decision to participate, it is their duty to carry it out no matter what the military assessment. They cannot say no. They have to obey orders. Even the generals cannot object after a political decision has been made. It is our duty to ensure we have done everything politically possible to define the parameters and create the conditions for a safe peacekeeping mission before we commit Canadian lives to a war zone.

Make no mistake. Bosnia is still a war zone. Canadian blood should not be shed because our political leadership refuses to take reasonable precautions. Our soldiers are sworn to defend Canada, not to defend the vanity of politicians who want to preserve a reputation at the UN, no matter what the cost in Canadian lives.

I recognize there is a fine line here. The only way we could completely protect our troops is by never sending them anywhere. However, we have commitments to our NATO allies. We have international humanitarian commitments. We must balance these obligations against our troops' welfare. This decision is not about protecting Canada. It is an optional engagement.

The Prime Minister has committed us to the new NATO force before the peace accord has even been signed. Will this time be different from the last time? There is not even a pretence that the implementation force is on a humanitarian mission. There are other roles to fill in the former Yugoslavia. We can hold our heads high if we engage solely in humanitarian activities, as some of my colleagues have indicated.

Why are we having this debate if the decision has already been made? How can we have a meaningful debate when we are told that we might be sending 20 troops or we might be sending 2,500? The Department of National Defence is not sure.

Members opposite have been chastising Reformers throughout the day for not supporting our peacekeepers. We are not talking about supporting peacekeepers. We are being asked to buy a pig in a poke and we are not going to buy into it.

We may be there for 12 months. Maybe it will turn into another Cyprus. It looks like the government has written a blank cheque to NATO. This is a political decision for prestige within NATO and to show solidarity. It is nothing more and nothing less.

What of the soldiers? Before I could advocate sending Canadian troops back to Bosnia I would want more assurances that we have done our job to ensure their safety. Yes, they are soldiers and they would willingly lay down their lives in defence of Canada, but they should not be asked to do it for a political whim.

I have a few questions which the Prime Minister and his defence staff have not answered.

Is there a well defined Canadian mandate? NATO wants to stabilize the situation within 12 months and then pull out. However, the Prime Minister said that we should be prepared to stay there longer. That is unacceptable. If we are going in, it should be for a set period, after which we can assess the situation with a full debate. All the facts should be revealed to the Canadian public, for the army belongs to them, not to the current political party. It is their sons and daughters we are talking about. If we do not have a time frame for withdrawal, how do we know if we have achieved our objectives? Canada must establish its own criteria for participation, not just use NATO's.

Will the Prime Minister make a commitment to hold a comprehensive military and political review after 10 months so our troops will know what to expect by the end of the year? Uncertainty will only exacerbate morale problems. Over the past three years the government has unilaterally extended our commitment without listening to Parliament or consulting the Canadian people. Let us not do it again.

Can the Prime Minister assure us that our soldiers will be better equipped than the last time they went to Bosnia? They are the best trained troops in the world, but there is a limit to improvisation. If we are going to send them back into a potential war zone they deserve the best equipment we can afford. With cuts at DND and outdated personnel carriers, is this realistic?

Can the Prime Minister assure us that Canadian soldiers will be under Canadian command? No one seems to know the answer to that question. We cannot afford another Gallipoli or Dieppe. It should be a precondition for our participation.

Canadian peacekeepers are trained to clear up misunderstandings before they escalate into open conflict. I have grave concerns that the same cannot be said for everyone else in the 60,000 strong occupation force. If civilians are antagonized by inexperienced peacekeepers, will this increase the risk to our Canadian soldiers?

The parliamentary secretary asked for some recommendations. I have one for him. He noted that assistance to refugees and humanitarian assistance is a secondary priority. I believe it should be Canada's top priority. I believe we should focus our involvement on technical, logistical and human support. Yes, we have commitments to our NATO allies, but we have an even greater moral obligation to our troops.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Prince George—Peace River for beginning his remarks by stating that we have to achieve a proper balance between the need for the security of our troops and what we are trying to achieve. I regret that he then promptly descended into political rhetoric which suggested that all of this was being done for the sake of political vanity and the whims of politicians. Does the member not agree this is a changed situation? Will he not admit this is an extraordinary opportunity?

Three months ago in that theatre we looked at the possibility of that war extending itself outside those borders, of hundreds of thousands of displaced people, thousands of men, women and children losing their lives, with a terrible winter coming on with no prospect of success. Suddenly we have a prospect of peace, which requires to make it work the contribution of the world community to get in there, pull the parties apart and make it work. Surely that is worth some risk. Surely that is worth our participating in. Why is that a whim? Why is that some irresponsible craziness on behalf of people to want to see that?

Is Mr. Clinton being whimsical and foolish to commit 20,000 United States troops to this enterprise? Are the British and the French a bunch of whimsical idiots to be doing this? Why are we suddenly portrayed as people who have just vanity instead of people who are recognizing we have a global responsibility to peacekeeping and humanitarian aid, which we have been doing in this country for generations now? This is an opportunity to make an important contribution. To be pulling up all these objections at this time and to be accusing people of engaging troops because of some form of whimsical vanity strikes me as not only irresponsible, it is absolute foolishness. It is wind and wind and wind.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Madam Speaker, I will leave it up to the audience watching at home tonight on their televisions to decide who is full of wind and wind and wind after that outburst by the hon. member.

I would say that it is whimsical on the part of our government. Certainly Mr. Clinton is not. He is sending his troops over there with the best equipment in the world. What are we sending our troops with?

We have been raising these concerns on this side of the House for two years. The Reform Party has raised these issues time and time again about inadequately equipping our troops. We ask the same questions today. The hon. member was just asked that question and he evaded the answer again. We are asking because we are concerned about the safety of our troops, and we get absolute nonsense. I for one am sick and tired of it.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, today we are debating the merits of sending our troops back to Bosnia, not for another peacekeeping mission but for what can be called a peace enforcement mission. Should Canada send troops as part of a NATO mission in an attempt to stabilize the area referred to as the former Yugoslavia? That is the question.

Our first thought should be of the peacekeepers. All too often they become faceless, nameless individuals who are sent overseas to keep a fragile peace. Well they are not faceless and nameless people to me. I have met several of the peacekeepers and many of their families. I know the role of peacekeeper takes its toll on the individuals and their families. The amount of stress is something I can only imagine.

I admire the men and women who have represented Canada in peacekeeping missions and sometimes in peacemaking missions. We have some of the best peacekeepers in the world. They have done a superb job in the face of adversity. They have been forced to make do with less than adequate equipment. Canadian troops have a long tradition of improvising and making do with outdated and unsuitable equipment for the job that must be done. Our troops carry out this tradition with a considerable and justifiable pride. They successfully refit, modify and repair equipment others would abandon in despair. While our personnel take pride in making do with unsuitable equipment, it is also a source of stress and frustration for the peacekeepers and their families. Our troops should not be sent into tense situations like this without the best equipment available.

Our troops are also forced to endure less than adequate leadership at the top. The leadership crisis in DND negatively affects troops. The Somalia affair has clearly exposed this. I do not believe we should be deploying more troops until the leadership crisis is sorted out.

In addition, memos from DND tell us of a morale crisis. The memos explain that the burden of rapid and prolonged deployment is one of the primary causes. The succession of deployment of our military personnel has led to their exhaustion. Some soldiers have seen three or four tours of duty in Croatia or Bosnia. This contributes to low morale of forces and their families. Stress levels are at an all time high, resulting in family breakdowns, alcohol consumption, untimely depression, attempted suicide and even suicide.

Recommendations have been made to balance the tours with adequate time at home. Yet the government fails to take into account the well-being of Canadian troops when the international peacekeeping agreements are made. The troops deserve better treatment from this government and from the upper layers of leadership within the forces.

It is important to ask why this is merely a take note debate. This mission to Bosnia involves Canadian lives. Why has the government refused to bring this issue before the House for a free vote? I do not mean a free vote as the Prime Minister envisions a free vote. The Prime Minister's idea of a free vote is to instruct Liberal MPs to vote any way they wish as long as they vote exactly the way he tells them to vote. I do not see that as a free vote, not in my interpretation of a free vote. Why not have a free vote where members vote according to the majority view of their constituents?

This debate is a sham, because I am sure the decision of whether or not to deploy troops has already been made. Therefore, expressing my misgivings or support for this venture is of little importance to this government. In fact our comments will have little or no impact on this mission and whether it goes ahead. However, I hope we can influence future troop deployments for peacekeeping or peace enforcement missions.

Regarding this mission, the timeframe for the NATO involvement has been given as 12 months. Following the expiry of the 12 months, NATO intends to withdraw from the area and transfer authority to another body. There are some obvious questions from this vague description of what might or will happen. What happens after 12 months? If authority is to be transferred to another body after 12 months, what body? If that body is not capable of doing the job, are the NATO troops to be kept there indefinitely?

The Prime Minister has said that if we truly want peace we should be prepared to stay as long as necessary. Is he willing to keep troops in Bosnia after the 12-month mandate? The answer seems to be yes. Then for how long?

We also know very little about the mission itself. How much will the mission cost? How many troops will be deployed? What roles are Canadians expected to fill? We do not know the answers to these questions because the government will not give us the information. How are we supposed to debate this issue without all the facts?

As far as the costs are concerned, the department has stated in a briefing that the incremental costs could be somewhere between $2 million and $75 million. That is unbelievable. A normal estimate may allow 10 per cent or 15 per cent of a range in giving the estimate. This Liberal estimate has a range of 3,800 per cent. That is the Liberal range. This figure, in addition to being vague, only refers to the defence department costs. What about incremental costs incurred by the Department of Foreign Affairs? Is there a ceiling to the cost? If so, what is the ceiling?

The fact that we know very little about the details of this mission concerns me. Indeed, the media seem to know more than parliamentarians, as shown by the leaked document from the U.S. that indicates Canada's expected troop commitment lies between 1,200 and 1,500 troops. Why has the government chosen to keep information from parliamentarians and Canadians? Again it shows this debate is a complete sham.

Many of the problems I have outlined in my speech could be alleviated if our military had a clear mandate. First we need to define Canada's military role, and it should be up to Canadians to decide what this role should be. After appropriate debate through public meetings and through the media, Canadians should decide what functions they want DND to carry out. Then the decisions on how these functions can be performed should be made by the appropriate people within the forces with as little political interference as possible. If the military is splintered by playing too many roles, this diminishes the effectiveness with which it can accomplish its tasks.

I believe Canadians, if given all the facts, could and should make the decision as to what the mandate of our military should be. For example, should the military play a defensive role; that is, should it defend Canada against invasion? Should the military play a peacekeeping role? Should the number of military reserves be increased? Should it include a search and rescue function? Should it be used in situations of civil unrest—for example, native standoffs, organized crime revolts, or unilateral declaration of independence from one part of the country and possible disruptions resulting from such a secession?

We know the first option is not the most practical because we do not have the troops or the money to perform that role. Canada has come to depend on the United States and perhaps NATO for protection against invasion.

Whatever role Canadians decide they want our forces to play, two things are clear: our troops deserve the best training they can get, and our troops deserve to be the best equipped for the job they are to do.

In conclusion, we cannot afford to make decisions affecting Canadians' lives by the seat of our pants. I cannot support this deployment, given all the questions, the lack of information and the lack of answers.

The government is playing fast and loose with the facts. These facts affect Canadian peacekeepers and their lives. Reform refuses to—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, your time has expired.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Madam Speaker, peacekeeping is one of the strongest and most enduring traditions of Canada's foreign and defence policy. Canada is justifiably proud of its distinctive record in preserving world peace and fostering global security. In fact we are the only country that can claim to have participated in almost every peacekeeping mission organized under auspices of the United Nations.

Canada's peacekeeping commitments command the respect and admiration of the world community, a commitment that we parliamentarians are examining once again under the issue of a renewed participation in the peacekeeping force in Bosnia, as we should and as is our responsibility.

Canada has taken a leading role in the efforts to bring about a peaceful end to the conflict in the Balkans. Canada was among the first countries to call for a concerted international action and Canadian forces have served with distinction since 1991. Let us not ignore that their participation was at considerable cost to Canada. Indeed, 10 Canadians were killed on this assignment. Let us examine this request for a further commitment very carefully.

Incredibly, the warring factions in Bosnia made a peace agreement a few short weeks ago. Requests for assistance to provide a stable forum for this peace initiative to mature and grow have been made. Our values of peace, freedom and democracy and our aversion to intolerance, terrorism and destruction cry out for our participation. Canadians do not simply stand for these ideals; they act on them and sacrifice for them.

Fifty years have elapsed since the end of the second world war, the war to end all wars. What have we learned? I wonder.

• (2030)

Over the last four years unthinkable horrors we thought were banished forever have been seared into our minds once again: the degradation of skeletal prisoners caged behind barbed wire fences; senseless murders of defenceless women and children; cowardly killings of men and boys in mass graves; ethnic cleansing; sickening destruction and obliteration of homes, of neighbourhoods, of entire communities where playgrounds and marketplaces became war zones; endless lines of refugees stumbling in misery and despair. The picture is not pleasant.

Our veterans of two world wars fought and too many gave their lives to guard against such atrocities. Can we now do nothing less?

The Muslims, Croats and Serbs have miraculously hammered out a peace settlement to put down their arms, to seek out and prosecute war criminals, to protect human rights, to build for the future peace and democracy.

They have asked for assistance, for our confidence and support to implement the Dayton peace agreement. Should we participate in peacekeeping forces that will facilitate their efforts? The only conceivable response is yes.

Canada was a founding member of and a continuing major contributor to NATO. When a situation becomes difficult Canadians do not renege on their responsibilities. Canadians do not turn their backs on their allies. Canadians stand up and are counted.

Canadian forces are familiar with the geographical terrain of Bosnia. They know the people, their culture and their differences. Canadian forces are well trained and competent. They are not only well suited, they are ideally suited for this deployment.

It is also interesting to note that to date 19 non–NATO countries including Russia have also indicated a willingness to participate. These countries share our goals. We must also share their burden. These countries realize that peace and stability in Europe are essential for world security.

Bosnia lies nestled in the middle of a diverse European continent, in close proximity to some of the fragile democracies of the former iron curtain countries. Stability must come to this region to ensure the flames of war and all the devastation they bring do not lick beyond the Bosnian border. Let us not forget the spark from the Balkans that ignited the first world war. Let us not forget this lesson from history. We have seen Europe in flames. Never again.

The stability provided by the NATO presence will allow civilian agencies from around the world to commence programs of humanitarian relief and reconstruction, to provide food, shelter, clothing and medicine, to reconstruct roads, schools and hospitals, to reunite families, to heal the wounds of war, to allow the people of Bosnia to pull themselves from the past and to build for a future in peace.

There will be considerable cost and expenses associated with this military exercise; this in an era of necessary fiscal restraint and deficit reduction. Responsible Canadians are prepared to pay this price. They are aware of the quarter of a million men, women and children who have been shelled, shot and tortured to death and the campaigns of rape and ethnic cleansing. They are well aware of the price of failure of this peace accord.

Let there be no mistake, deployment of Canadian troops is not without risk and may very well involve casualties. Every effort will be made to minimize such risks but we must be prepared nonetheless.

One of the most difficult decisions the government has been called on to make is to place the volunteer men and women of our armed forces in situations of potential danger in far off lands when the values of our nation require it.

I urge the government to join this partnership of peace. Let us stand and be counted in this period of crisis once again. Let us stand for peace and freedom. Very simply, it is the right thing to do.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, given the nature and the make–up of Canada, there are people living in Canada who come from all over the world. Any time there is strife somebody in Canada has ties to that locale. When there is strife and war there are Canadians who feel it very deeply. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why we have evolved to such an extent into a peacekeeping nation.

If we look at it in an historical context, over the last 50 years peacekeeping has emerged as one of the most important activities of the international community in promoting peace and stability. Peacekeepers have served in regions throughout the world laying the basis for peace and saving countless lives.

The classic peacekeeping role has been to help maintain a ceasefire or to prevent the outbreak or spread of hostilities so underlying disputes can be settled through negotiations. In this sense peacekeeping has been a practical device to assist peacemaking.

Since the end of the cold war, however, the face of peacekeeping has undergone a remarkable transformation.

As the international environment has evolved over the last six or seven years, so too has peacekeeping. Witness, for example, the recent operations in Bosnia, Rwanda or Somalia. The dramatic changes are far from over and peacekeeping must continue to adapt to meet new challenges.

In tracking the evolution of peacekeeping over the last half century, it is critical that members of the House understand the full context of peacekeeping as they debate the possible deployment of Canadian forces personnel as part of a new mission to the former Yugoslavia.

I will briefly discuss some of the ways the international community and in particular Canada is responding to meet the new challenges of peacekeeping.

When international statesmen sat down to frame the charter of the United Nations in 1945, the harsh experiences of the second world war were still fresh in their minds. Peacekeeping began modestly. In the late 1940s the UN began deploying unarmed but clearly identified military personnel to observe peace agreements in some of the world's trouble spots.

Two of these early missions, the UN truce supervision organization in the Middle East and the UN military observer group in India and Pakistan, continue to this day.

With the Suez crisis of 1956 peacekeeping moved beyond simple observing and took on a more ambitious role. Suez was the most serious crisis faced by the United Nations since the Korean war and called for an imaginative response.

Lester B. Pearson, Canada's secretary of state for external affairs at the time, argued the UN should not only establish ceasefire between the warring parties but it should also police it with military personnel and make arrangements for a political settlement.

UN members were initially unimpressed by Pearson's scheme, but his determination and skill ultimately paid off and the United Nations emergency force was born. For his efforts Pearson was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957.

UNEF set the tone for most peacekeeping operations over the next 30 years. Peacekeeping forces, made up primarily of military personnel, supervised ceasefires, monitored troop withdrawals and provided a buffer between opposing local forces.

Some of the key peacekeeping principles, such as that the force be lightly armed, impartial and enjoy the consent of the warring parties, were also established in 1956.

Over the next three decades a select number of countries, including Canada, took the lead in peacekeeping. The great powers, because of ideological differences and colonial entanglements, kept a low profile.

Canadian peacekeepers served in many areas throughout the world, including the Congo, West New Guinea, Cyprus and the Golan Heights. Since 1947 more than 100,000 Canadians have participated in over 30 peacekeeping and related operations, a contribution which remains unmatched. Over 100 Canadians have lost their lives in the line of duty and many more have been wounded.

Looking at contemporary peacekeeping with the end of the cold war and the super power rivalry, we have seen a more active United Nations in the peacekeeping field. Between 1947 and 1988 the UN carried out 13 peacekeeping operations. In the last seven years alone there have been more than twenty.

The UN has also become more interventionist. The humanitarian impulse has on occasion challenged traditional notions of sovereignty. As a result the UN has become more involved in intra–state disputes and has grappled with human rights and humanitarian issues on a far greater scale than ever before. In short, modern peacekeeping operations demand a full range of military capabilities on the ground, in the air and at sea. Canada's own experience in the Balkans, Central America, the Middle East and Asia underscores this point.

In the former Yugoslavia Canadian ground troops have performed a wide range of humanitarian tasks. In Cambodia we currently have personnel on the ground serving with the Cambodian mine action centre, responsible for mine clearance operations.

At sea Canadian naval forces have participated in operations off the coast of Haiti and the former Yugoslavia, enforcing economic sanctions and arms embargoes. We have also had Canadian personnel involved in naval peacekeeping operations in Cambodia and Central America.

Modern operations sometimes take place in the absence of a viable agreement and without the consent of the warring parties. In some cases the warring parties to disputes have turned on UN forces. The result, as we have seen in Bosnia, is that our personnel have been exposed to considerable danger and have suffered casualties.

These experiences have reminded the Canadian government that fully trained soldiers are the best peacekeepers. They are equipped with the complete range of skills and level of professionalism needed to meet these new challenges.

At the same time, the government is aware that our personnel require specialized training. That is why they receive instruction in such areas as cultural sensitivity, international humanitarian law and dispute resolution. The government intends to enhance this type of training in the future.

In meeting the new challenges of peacekeeping, clearly peacekeeping in the 1990s has taken on a new look. If we are to meet the new security challenges of the next century we desperately need the UN and other international organizations to play a more effective role in resolving conflict.

Because of the scope and complexity of modern peacekeeping operations, the UN has had to call on regional organizations to play a greater role in conflict resolution. NATO's role in the proposed peace implementation force for Bosnia is an excellent example of how international organizations can work together.

The UN is the right instrument to confer legitimacy on an international peace operation, while the alliance is the organization best equipped to carry out a mission in Europe, especially one that may have an enforcement dimension to it.

As for the UN itself, reform can no longer be put off. Created in the 1940s, the organization must be equipped to handle the security challenges of the 1990s and beyond. The organization's record since the end of the cold war has been for the most part impressive. Missions in Namibia, El Salvador, Cambodia, Mozambique and Haiti have produced solid results.

However, setbacks in Africa and the Balkans, where many new concepts have been introduced, have raised concerns. Unfortunately many member states criticize the UN for all the world's current problems, which is hardly fair. Member states must stop shifting the blame and step forward to do their part.

Canada knows the UN has its share of problems but the government is determined to find solutions. Canada is in a unique position to help the UN. With our extensive experience and expertise in virtually all areas of peacekeeping, including many of the new concepts, we have much to offer.

Canada is helping strengthen UN peacekeeping in a variety of ways, from providing expert advice at headquarters in New York, to establishing the Lester B. Pearson International Peacekeeping Training Centre in Cornwallis, Nova Scotia.

In true Canadian fashion, we are putting forward practical and achievable proposals to help prepare the UN for the future. With the international environment becoming ever more complex, it is no surprise that peacekeeping has followed suit.

As new security threats continue to emerge, Canada and other members of the international community must not let up in their efforts to discover new and innovative approaches to peacekeeping.

Whatever the challenges, Canada's commitment to this useful conflict resolution tool should remain steadfast.

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate respecting the participation of Canadian forces in the peacekeeping mission in co–operation with other countries in the former Yugoslavia.

• (2045)

The peace agreement signed a few weeks ago brought a sigh of relief for all after the many years of bitter battle which had raged in that area of the world.

Canada has a long tradition of peacekeeping. Whenever the word peacekeeping is mentioned, Canada's name comes to the forefront. We have had experience in this area for almost 40 years.

Monitoring peace is a noble cause. It shows a willingness for fellow humans and governments to do something constructive to alleviate human suffering. It will bring stability to a region that has been torn up after many years of internal conflict and civil war. It is the first time in a spirit of co–operation, NATO forces along with the non–NATO forces, are participating in this peacekeeping effort.

It is not a military mission alone. It is a mission of hope for the people of the Balkans. It is a mission of ending misery for the people of Bosnia, Serbia and Croatia. It is a mission of ending ethnic cleansing which has cost the affected communities tens of thousands of innocent lives.

Actions speak louder than words. It is this principle that is guiding the government to share this collective responsibility of keeping peace in the former Yugoslavia.

My colleagues on this side of the House have mentioned lack of resources. That should not deter the government from taking firm action on this matter. It is our contribution in maintaining world peace.

I support the government's position to do its share of bringing peace to this central European region. A time period of 12 months for this peacekeeping initiative does not seem to be far fetched. There is speculation it could extend to more. We cannot work on speculation and other unreasonable suppositions.

As regard the competence and the ability of the Canadian defence forces, they are among the best in the world. As the saying goes, when the going gets tough, the tough get going. It will be a test of professionalism for our fine men and women of the Canadian forces once again under trying conditions. We cannot leave the question of keeping world peace to the regional countries and communities because the world has become a global community.

Events happening in one part of the world cannot be ignored as regional skirmishes not worthy of serious consideration by those who are not immediately affected by them either directly or indirectly like our country here.

World security is a collective responsibility of each and every member of the international community. It is more so for Canada because we are a respected and influential member of this community. I see no reason why we should take a back seat to any other country in bringing peace to the Balkan region by participating in this noble cause.

Finally, this is an important initiative that I am sure will have the support of all Canadians. We have to support this initiative without any hesitation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate on peacekeeping. In case you had not noticed, this is the first time I rise in the House to speak in a debate on our armed forces. If I am not mistaken, it is the third such debate, and this is the first time I have decided to intervene.

I do so not as a member of the national defence committee or the foreign affairs committee but to pass on comments made by some of my constituents.

First of all, I want to congratulate all those who participated in the Dayton agreement and made it a success. I believe that all these people who came from far and near deserve to be congratulated by the whole world.

• (2050)

We also owe a vote of thanks to all the parties who signed the agreement. They showed they were at least willing to try to restore peace to a part of the world where it had disappeared and this only a few years ago.

[English]

Some friends were telling me that they had met people who came from the former Yugoslavia who had lived there prior to and during the war period. They had lived in a country that was as normal as one could find, perhaps not quite as wealthy as ours, but for a country that operated under the kind of regime it did, it was relatively prosperous. They had done rather well. They were living as we do, perhaps not as wealthily, as I said.

Virtually overnight the peace they had known was no longer there. The neighbours they had known as friends became their enemies. Families were broken up in the strife. All of a sudden people could no longer trust virtually anyone. People had reverted to that Hobbesian state of nature where it is every person for himself.

I suppose if it teaches us anything, it is the fragility of peace everywhere and that we should cherish peace if we happen to enjoy it at the present time, as we do. It has at least taught me that.

[Translation]

I also want to say that I am proud to be a Canadian and an heir to the legacy of Lester B. Pearson. As you know, I presented a motion in this House to have a statue erected in his honour. It is just next door to this building. It was erected a number of years ago, and I am pleased to have been the one to suggest this. I must say that every time, and especially recently, when I pass this statue of Mr. Pearson, I remember his particular contribution to peacekeeping throughout the world.

[English]

Some colleagues are perhaps a little more isolationist than others in this Chamber. I am not one of them. I happen to believe that we have an important role to play in the world. We do not live on a planet of our own. We share this planet with everyone else. It is time we remembered it. Some members across the way see it differently. They are indicating so by their heckling at the present time, which is their privilege.

I do not believe we are doing our job properly as MPs if we do not know members of Parliament from other countries, if we do not speak with them, if we do not find out what goes on in the world. Whether we realize it or not, whether we are by nature isolationists or not, the planet is shrinking all the time because of communications, because of increased trade, because of all these reasons.

The problems of one country are the problems of the world, not just of that country. Even if they were problems of only that country, I still believe it would be our duty morally and otherwise to help where we could. However, they are not only the problems of those other countries, they are everyone's problems, particularly in the world in which we live.

I was here when we dealt with and voted on this issue when it involved the gulf war. Madam Speaker, you will remember that night. That night we all realized very suddenly how small the planet had become once those scud missiles left Iraq and were aimed at another country. In the space of a few minutes many members of the House became all too familiar with every spot on the globe where we were expecting a scud missile to land next. It did not take us long to learn the planet was smaller and that all of us in this world were closer to each other than we had previously thought. It is time we all remembered this.

This evening some members are saying: "We cannot vote for this kind of initiative; we cannot speak out in favour of this kind of initiative because we do not have enough information".

• (2055)

All of the parties were provided with documentation. The parliamentary secretary tells me that documentation was offered to all parties in this House. I trust that members of all parties have a little idea of what is going on in the world, what has happened in the past, what has happened in this war, and so on.

The members were indeed properly informed and I would add that those who do not have the information perhaps chose not to find out any more.

[English]

I would like to speak about our role as Canadians. Some people have said we should not go there because we have been there already. That is a rather unusual view. To me that means we have expertise. We have experience. We have been there and we know what we are doing.

Our military people are well trained. They are the best. Our military people, we know from previous roles we have had in that part of the world and elsewhere, are very qualified. They have done tremendous work. We have the expertise and the experience and we are highly respected. Yes, we should be there.

I have constituents who have been to the former Yugoslavia, either in Croatia or in Bosnia. Recently there was a meeting of young people in my riding and a young man came to address the meeting. He is a soldier who has just returned from Bosnia. His job was to deactivate land mines. He brought some material with him, along with his blue cap and blue beret which he wears for more formal occasions. He spoke about the job he did in Bosnia.

It did not take long before hands rose to ask the soldier whether he would go back. He said yes. They asked him why. He said he thought they made a big difference and because they saved lives.

There was a time not that many months ago when Canadian soldiers were experiencing great difficulty in that part of the world. Canadian soldiers and soldiers from other countries were either being held as hostages or were being otherwise threatened. That was the time when all of us in the House should have supported those soldiers. We should have been united.

[Translation]

And what did some of the hon. members have to say? While some of our Canadian troops were being held hostage, they were telling us that it was time to announce our withdrawal from Yugoslavia.

[English]

That was not the Canadian way and we did not do it. That was not the right way and we did not do it. As far as I am concerned we do have a role to play and we should be contributing as Canadians. I believe our military would support that. I believe the Canadian population would support it. I believe it is the right thing for us to do. Let us hope, contribute and pray that peace in the former Yugoslavia will last for a long time.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I cannot let this opportunity go by without mentioning that the Reform Party is not isolationist.

The hon. member referred to the gulf war. The gulf war proved how poorly equipped our Canadian forces are. That has been our main concern in this debate all day long.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being nine o'clock, pursuant to an order made earlier today, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

POINT OF ORDER

MOTION NO. 26—AMENDMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR CALGARY SOUTHWEST—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: Colleagues, I am now prepared to make a ruling on the admissibility of the amendment, moved last Wednesday, November 29, by the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, to government business Motion No. 26 relating to Quebec as a distinct society.

I have reviewed the representations of the chief government whip, the chief opposition whip and the hon. member for Calgary West, and I would like to thank them for their helpful comments.

[English]

Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada, fourth edition, at page 321 states:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment has been proposed.

This idea is also repeated as citation 568 in Beauchesne's sixth edition.

Beauchesne also notes in citation 567 that:

> 567.—the object of an amendment may be. . . to modify a question in such a way as to increase its acceptability—

[English]

In his presentation the chief government whip quoted citation 579 of the same work, arguing that the proposed amendment would introduce a foreign proposition and would raise a new question which could only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice. He also referred to the 1923 and 1970 Speaker's rulings on which this citation is based. I have reviewed these decisions, and while it is indisputable that these are accurate references, they are not germane to the case now before us.

The Chair has reviewed the terms of the main motion and has taken into account the nature of its wording. The wording of the proposed amendment is linked directly to the text of the main motion and touches on various concepts found therein. It appears to the Chair that the proposed amendment does not stray beyond the scope of the main motion but rather aims to further refine its meaning and intent.

Thus the Chair is of the opinion that the requirements for amendments outlined in Beauchesne's citations 567 and 568 have been met.

I therefore rule that the amendment is procedurally acceptable and will be proposed by the Chair when next this government order is called.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ) moved:

That this House condemn the government for choosing to reform unemployment insurance in a way that maintains overlap and duplication in the manpower sector and thus prevents the government of Quebec from adopting a true manpower development policy of its own.

—She said: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to present this motion here this morning. I would like to read to the House a motion that was adopted yesterday by the Quebec National Assembly: Yeas, 96; Nays, 0; Abstentions, 0; it was therefore unanimous, with the clearest possible consensus.

That the National Assembly reaffirm the consensus expressed in this House on December 13, 1990, on the occasion of the ministerial statement on manpower adjustment and occupational training, to the effect that Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and patriate accordingly the funding allocated by the federal government to these programs in Quebec.

Within the current constitutional framework and in order to improve services to customers, Quebec must take over the control and management of various services pertaining to employment and manpower development and all programs that may be funded through the Unemployment Insurance Fund within Quebec's borders, and must therefore receive the funding appropriate to such responsibilities.

The motion adopted unanimously by the Quebec National Assembly goes on to say:

The Government of Quebec and representatives of business, labour and the co–operative sector agree to oppose any initiative by the federal government that would constitute an invasion of Quebec's prerogatives.

Therefore, it asks the government and the Minister of Employment to immediately undertake formal discussions with the federal government in order to ensure the respect of the consensus and the promotion of the interests of the Quebec people.

Especially after the referendum vote on October 30, it is important for the government to be aware of this consensus and realize it cannot be satisfied with the guideline in this new bill, Bill C–111, in part II under the heading "Employment Benefits and National Employment Service".

In fact, throughout part III, what predominates is not Quebec's right to control, develop and take responsibility for its manpower policy but a renewed affirmation of the central government's primacy in this area over which Quebec has jurisdiction. All the federal government's noises about being prepared to negotiate and being open to suggestions cannot obscure a very important side to this question. Today, money collected from Quebec workers and businesses in the form of unemployment insurance premiums goes to and is controlled by the federal government.

The federal government determines under what conditions it would be prepared to agree that the government or, as appropriate—and this is something we will find in another bill we will discuss later on— agencies, individuals or any other intervenor the government may consider would be called on to implement the measures provided in the bill.

Primarily for the sake of efficiency and also from a cultural standpoint, Quebec insists on being in charge of implementing this manpower policy, on being the only one in control and in charge of this policy. Culture is basically an expression of differences. And we know that as far as the implementation of manpower policy is concerned, countries have different ways of doing things, different objectives and different priorities. In Quebec, we do not do things the same way they do in France, Japan, the United States and the rest of Canada.

We have this consensus in the National Assembly, which was expressed in the past and confirmed again yesterday, so it is a matter of efficiency and our own culture. Why efficiency? So we can stop this endless bickering which prevents us from improving the circumstances of ordinary people whose needs are tremendous, with the unemployment rate still around 11 per cent. Of course, the unemployment rate only indicates how many people want to enter the labour market. It does not consider all those people who are discouraged, who are on welfare or are trapped somewhere without benefits of any kind and have become discouraged.

Given the rate of unemployment and Quebec's need for a strong and vigorous economy, it is not only unacceptable, it is downright intolerable that this issue of control over manpower is once again caught in a tug of war, which prevents ordinary folks—women, men, young people, seasonal workers—anyone with needs, from getting the most out of the services they are entitled to.

This is why, for reasons of efficiency relating to our culture, the official opposition has tabled this motion this morning, which it will speak to throughout the day.

The government has to realize the extent of the need of those it is penalizing by insisting on running the show. These people need jobs, help and a strategy. They cannot live with a system full of holes, a system that is in fact not one, but two. It is a useless system, because two governments are competing within it: one is on its own turf and the other is endlessly butting in. It has broadened the meaning of the constitutional amendment on unemployment insurance and, once again, with employees and employers' money, it is pushing aside the Government of Quebec.

The Prime Minister of Canada said, in the final days of the referendum campaign, that he would do everything to keep Canada united. Now, in an area where consensus is so strong and less than a month after October 30, the government introduces a bill that ignores the unanimous will of Quebecers. The government is acquiring the means to prevent Quebec from doing what it considers appropriate. It is giving itself the wherewithal to control. Worse, if, at the end of negotiations, Quebec, with the knife to its throat, refuses to bow to the dictates of the federal government, Quebec will be unable to do what it wants.

I am sorry the minister finds this funny; he could say he was open, but he has not managed to call even a single meeting of ministers of manpower and employment in the time he has been in office. He has not been and still is not known for his flexibility.

It is hard to avoid feeling worried and discouraged in the face of a text such as this, regardless of the minister proposing it, because it is absurd to find ourselves once again in this endless twisting and turning at the expense of the ordinary folk.

• (1025)

Subclause 61(2), which deals with training, stipulates that the central government, through the commission, and I quote:

> —may not provide any financial assistance in a province in support of employment benefits mentioned in paragraph 59(e) without the agreement of the government of the province.

But paragraph 59(e) reads as follows:

> 59. The commission may establish employment benefits to enable insured participants to obtain employment, including benefits to:
> (e) help them obtain skills for employment, ranging from basic to advanced skills.

It is important to have a good understanding of this provision. It means that, this time, with respect to the so–called employment benefits the government wants to introduce, in the absence of an agreement, it may proceed on its own by giving the commission the required mandate. In this specific case, however, it goes so far as to say that if the province—Quebec, in this instance—disagrees, it will not give anything. Great.

It would make people responsible for Quebec's refusal to relinquish its jurisdiction. The last time we saw this was when Maurice Duplessis was in office.

These provisions are extremely disturbing and do not appear to portend successful negotiations, far from it.

These measures, which are supposed to help workers, are in fact modelled after other measures already in place in Quebec to help welfare recipients improve their lot and find jobs they can keep. These measures already exist in one version or another. Except that, in this case, the federal government—that is the beauty of it—is set to introduce similar initiatives that will create an inextricable web of overlap and duplication so that two individuals in the same business could each receive a different kind of income supplement: welfare in one case and job benefits in the other.

This kind of chaos is unacceptable. Co–ordination is needed. We must see to it that workers and people looking for jobs benefit from a real labour policy. The only way such a policy can become a reality is if Quebec has control over all these measures.

This bill was expected. The minister had said that it would make people change their attitudes and that it would really help, as the ambitious title "employment insurance" shows. Yet, I cannot help but point out that the $800 million that will be spent on these measures will in fact only be spread over five years, another $200 million for all of Canada, because measures are already in place whose effectiveness needs to be reviewed but whose total cost is $4 billion, with the difference that only $1.9 billion comes from unemployment insurance.

How much will that make by the year 2001, when this reform is complete? Some $4.2 billion, or a mere $200 million more, with this difference however, and a crucial difference, that an additional $800 million will be paid out of the UI fund then while, as a result of the general tax currently levied to cover the cost of most of these measures, $600 million less will come out of the consolidated revenue fund.

This whole operation that had raised hopes results in $200 million in fresh money, but also and again, for Quebec in particular, in the imposition of measures causing duplication and overlap, jamming the labour market and preventing Quebec from putting in place an urgently needed manpower policy.

I hope that, even though he laughed earlier, the minister will understand that the consensus in Quebec calls for the government, as a modern constitutional system, to recognize Quebec's jurisdiction and to accept that Quebec should have sole responsibility over this manpower policy for ordinary people and, therefore, that the allocated funds made up of money coming from businesses and workers should be transferred to Quebec to administer according to its own needs and priorities.

I repeat, this must be done not only with the consent of the parties, but also that of business, labour, the co–operative movement, community groups, which may have been more active in Quebec than elsewhere, perhaps because Quebec was seriously hit by the 1982–83 recession. But this consensus is the best guarantee of what could be the Quebec model, in which we will be able to use our resources, our scarce financial resources, to help ordinary people whose individual well–being is in great need of improvement.

I sincerely hope that our plea be heard in the interest of the people, because the government has no right to stubbornly keep preventing Quebec from fully playing its role like this.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to ask some questions and make some comments on the speech of the hon. member for Mercier. As always, she takes a very pessimistic outlook on this legislation.

For the record, Canadians from coast to coast participated in what was perhaps the most extensive consultation process in Canadian history. Over 100,000 people participated. The hon. member for Mercier was a very active member of the human resources development committee that was looking at the modernization and restructuring of Canada's social security system. The hon. member heard what I heard. She heard what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister heard.

Canadians were saying they wanted an unemployment insurance system, a social security system that would help the most vulnerable in our society, that would help Canadians find jobs and keep their jobs and to do that in a sustainable fashion. They realized the skyrocketing costs of unemployment insurance from $8 billion in 1982 to $20 billion in 1992. They realized the distortions which exist in the marketplace where 38 per cent of benefits are directed to 14 per cent of the firms and represent 12 per cent of the people. They realized that all these things needed to be changed because the status quo simply was not serving the people it was supposed to serve.

Throughout this process we engaged Canadians in a serious debate about the issues. If we look at the objectives and clearly analyse the EI bill we find that those objectives are met. The hon. member said this is a regressive piece of legislation. She should rethink, re–read and re–analyse what is in the legislation.

The hon. member does not talk about the progressive measures found in the legislation. Over 500,000 Canadians who were excluded and marginalized by the Unemployment Insurance Act will now be covered by the legislation. Part time workers count. Every hour, every dollar, every effort which they make will be rewarded under the legislation.

The hon. member did not talk about the family income supplement which will allow people to receive up to 80 per cent of their average earnings. The hon. member did not talk about that because it is too positive to mention. She did not talk about the people who are included in the legislation. She did not talk about the fact that low income Canadians will be able to earn $50 without being penalized or taxed back. She did not talk about the fact that by reducing premium rates for business, job creation will be enhanced. Employees will be helped because they too will participate in the employment insurance fund.

The hon. member tried to depict the federal government as a government which imposes its rules and regulations upon the provinces. That is not the case. The legislation is quite open. It says that the federal government will negotiate with the provinces on wage supplements, top ups, self–employment assistance, skills and loans. It will also work together with the provinces on job corps partnerships.

Why is the hon. member continuing, like every member of the Bloc, this misinformation campaign? They are trying to confuse Canadians. Canadians know that the employment insurance program which was introduced speaks to the number one issue facing Canadians, and that is job creation. Over 100,000 jobs will be created directly as a result of measures taken by the bill.

I am quite surprised. The hon. member knows that the province of Quebec has historically benefited from the unemployment insurance program and it will continue to do so under the employment insurance program. She also knows that she will benefit from the $300 million transition fund in high unemployment areas.

I have a simple question for the hon. member: Why does the Bloc Quebecois continue this misinformation campaign? Why does it not tell the real story to Canadians?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member did not address the motion because, given its subject, he could only have agreed with me. We will discuss the overall UI reform project when we debate the UI bill.

The motion before the House this morning provides that Quebec should have control over manpower policy. The hon. member remained silent on that issue, because he knows that I am right. What is really important is to ensure that the unemployed have the best guarantees to get help to find decent jobs.

Let me digress for a moment to say that, yes, I did participate in the consultation exercise. Everywhere we went, Canadians told us that the real issue was jobs, not employability. And in order to create jobs, it is essential to have a co–ordinated manpower policy.

This is why this motion deals with manpower policy. In that regard, and regardless of the October 30 results, the National Assembly was unanimous in demanding, yesterday, that Quebec have control over the manpower sector, and that the central government pull out of that field of jurisdiction and stop interfering in it. The vote was unanimous: 96 to 0, with no abstentions. Moreover, that unanimity also exists among businesses, unions, co–ops and community groups.

I would have liked the parliamentary secretary to comment on our motion. I can only conclude, with some pleasure, that if he did not do so, it is because he would have had to say, assuming he is in favour of an efficient manpower policy in Quebec: "Yes, you are right. The central government should get out of that sector".

The parliamentary secretary said that Quebec benefited from the UI program. The fact is that Quebec and the Maritimes are the ones that bore the brunt of the 1994 reform. The same is true again with this reform. Indeed, by the year 2001, Quebec alone will have to deal with an annual shortfall of $735 million, in addition to a reduction of over $640 million in UI benefits.

I thank the hon. member for finally agreeing with me that the central government had to leave that sector.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief questions for my colleague from Mercier.

It becomes very obvious to me as I listen to Bloc members that they are interested only in Quebec. Because of that I question whether they should be the official opposition in this matter, but that is simply an aside. We have to take into account the concerns of all Canadians. I have a very difficult time seeing how the concerns she has expressed differ in any way from the concerns all Canadians have. Therefore, I cannot support this motion as it stands.

We all want jobs. She states Quebec wants a vibrant economy and jobs. Is that not true for all of Canada? Should we not be moving toward a policy that addresses this across the nation? She says there is a culture in Quebec. Do we not have a culture in the rest of Canada? Yes we do. That also has to be taken into account.

Why is Quebec asking for control over only the educational aspects of this and not control over the rest of the program? I cannot understand why Bloc members are only picking and choosing some of the things they want. I find that very difficult to understand. Perhaps the member can clarify for me her party's position on this.

I realize that education is a provincial matter. I agree with the member that the provinces should be looking after the training programs because those are truly educational aspects of the program. If that is the case, why not reduce the premiums to the point where they do not include the educational aspect? The government has admitted that by reducing the premiums a lot of jobs would be created. Why is the member not working on that aspect of reducing the premiums and letting the Government of Quebec tax its own people for the educational aspects of this program?

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. First of all, I would like to tell my hon. colleague that yes, Canada does have a culture. What I am saying is that we ought to organize along cultural lines, since the economy, the organization of manpower policy, are linked to culture, after all.

The Quebec National Assembly's demand—I could provide a translation of it, but I guess the interpreter will take care of that for now—goes beyond the educational aspect. What they say, and this was adopted unanimously, is that Quebec must take over the control and management of various services pertaining to employment and manpower development and all programs that may be funded through the unemployment insurance fund within Quebec's borders.

It is, therefore, a matter of jurisdiction and of encroachment, but for the sake of efficiency. We want to take over the overall co–ordination because we can see the inefficiency of the present system and the great needs. Now I am being accused of not speaking for all of Canada. Let me tell you, if anybody has travelled across Canada and given voice to the needs I saw everywhere, it is I.

Except that this morning, with the National Assembly's resolution, I felt it was extremely important to state that these demands have unanimous support in Quebec. I am, however, aware that debates need to be held in Canada on centralization and decentralization. Knowing that I am not able to answer for Canadians on this, I wish that a debate will be held. I think there should be a debate.

In Quebec however, the debate is over; this is the consensus of Quebec, the consensus of a variety of groups, unions, businesses, community groups, and so on; it is true for the province as whole, it is true for the regions. So now we wonder what is keeping this government from giving us back the tools needed for results, instead of continuing along with this unproductive duplication and overlap.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate on the motion in the House of Commons, particularly since the hon. member for Mercier could be nominated for the Quebec prize for literature, the Prix Athanase–David. Her speech is a great example of fiction writing, and I trust that all of her colleagues in this House will support her nomination after hearing it. This is an excellent example of the Bloc's talent for writing complete and utter fantasy.

[English]

When we read the Bloc motion, we wonder where its members have been. Like Rip Van Winkle, they have been asleep for the last while. They neither take into account the statement made by the Prime Minister, which says very clearly that we will be prepared and in fact will welcome the opportunity to give full responsibility for education and training to the provinces.

The tabling last Friday of the legislation for employment insurance clearly indicates once again that the area of education and training is the jurisdiction of the provinces. Furthermore, we would go beyond that and take in those areas of direct employment activity that are within our constitutional orbit and share with the provinces, sit down and work in concert with the provinces, plan with the provinces, co–operate with the provinces for one reason: to develop a partnership for employment.

Yet Bloc members bring in a motion that totally and completely misses the point. They are saying that somehow there will be more intrusion, more activity and no withdrawal. It seems this group simply cannot take yes for an answer. When we say we are going to do exactly what is being proposed, they seem oblivious, unable to filter it out. That only confirms my suspicion that all the speeches, all the motions and all the commentaries were written before we even got around to making good on the initiative of the Prime Minister or tabling legislation. They just pulled it out of the old vault, took out the old speeches from the old drawers, put new dates on them, and presented them once again without taking a look at reality or the facts or the hopeful signs.

With the initiative we announced on Friday we can begin developing a whole new set of relationships with provinces, communities and individuals directed toward the creation of jobs and employment. It is the beginning of a new dialogue about how we can come together and form arrangements so we can share responsibility. If people are unemployed they do not care whether it is a provincial or a federal jurisdiction, they simply want a job. That is what it is all about.

As I listened to the hon. member for Mercier carefully, what was beginning to creep into the language was that she was far more concerned about transferring power to bureaucrats in provincial capitals than putting money directly into the hands of individuals so they can get back to work. That is the real issue. Power is at the heart of this motion, not employment. It is the opportunity to control and manage, not to provide a new form of empowerment for individuals. That is what the debate is really about. It is really oldspeak government. It is really setting the clock back.

When Canadians in whatever region are looking for government to provide new leadership, new formulas, new methods, we have an opposition party that is retreating back into the romantic past, trying once again to dig up the old speeches that were written 30 or 40 years ago and not dealing with the difficult new realities in a world where work has changed.

The major modernization of the insurance system of Canada for employment is pegged on one important reality, that the world of work is changing and we must keep up and be relevant to that world of work. That is why the measures we have introduced state that the clear responsibility that was given by the provinces to the federal government in 1941 to be responsible for the basic insurance program for Canadians dealing with unemployment had to be modernized. I will be the first to say that throughout the years it has been a good program. It has provided an enormous bridge of support for generation after generation of Canadians who have faced unemployment.

We should take some real pride in the fact that the federal government has been able to ensure not only security for the individual but security for the regions. Areas where there was wealth, growth, and jobs were able to share with those who were less advantaged. That has been the genius of the program. It was built on sharing, something our hon. friends opposite forget about. Sharing is not part of their vocabulary. Co–operation is not part of their vocabulary, the notion that somehow they can have a national system of insurance that enables Canadians to distribute support and security because we all mutually benefit from it. It is not a matter of charity but of good investment. We must make sure we can support the various measures in areas where they are faced with high unemployment so that those areas with lower unemployment do not have to bear the full burden in a geographic way.

This plan has worked for most of its years, but it is changing because Canada is changing. What we have been discovering in the last decade or so is that the original architecture was no longer sufficient to meet a world where the work has changed, a world where we now have hundreds of thousands of part time workers, where there are multiple job owners who were not being given any protection, where individuals were facing much tougher problems of adjustment when jobs or skills changed.

There is one thing that is clear from every single analysis and study that has been done internationally and nationally: the higher the level of literacy, skill and education, the better the chance for a job. There are lots of anecdotes and examples of people with good degrees who cannot find work. That is one reason we have introduced the youth internship program, which enables young people to move from school to work in an easier fashion through industry support and small business.

We know we have to invest in those areas. We also know that increasingly people need to get re–employment much quicker and faster than they do now and that there are useful tested means of achieving that.

We spent the last two years working on various projects using wage supplements where the small business community that wants to hire a new worker but does not have quite the cash flow or is concerned it will not get full productivity or full learning in the first six or eight months is reluctant to make that commitment. Wage supplements open the door. We have seen in place after place that we have 70 per cent to 80 per cent improvement in job retention as a result of that measure and that we can extend work by 14 or 15 weeks. This is what is important, that we add about $4,000 to $5,000 additional income.

In talking about the employment insurance program, people get tied down talking about their benefits. What we have to talk about is their income. How do we improve people's income? The best way to improve income is by employment. That is the best way of doing it. If people simply rely year after year on a benefit program they begin to lose the ability to be in the job market and also their income does not grow. Governments are having tight times. Provincial governments everywhere are cutting back on those assistance programs. The real thing is to have a springboard back into the job market.

We have said we are going to take all the programs we have, 39 programs, and bring them down to five simple employment measures. These are not programs with their own organizations and their own bureaucracies, but a basic set of measures that are available to individuals to get back to work. They make the choice.

I find it amazing that the members of the opposition do not have much trust in individual choice, that they really do not believe that individuals can exercise the right to decide how to get back to work and how to make these tools work. They really have lost faith in the right of individuals to be able to choose and decide, not exclusively but with some support. We know that oftentimes individuals thrown totally into the market by themselves do need some assistance, but assistance that works.

However, the opposition members talk about transferring from one government to another and all these kinds of things. They have lost the sense that individuals are what really count and that they should be given the opportunities to make those choices. At the same time, they have also lost something else that is very important to recognize. It goes back to the fundamental importance of the employment insurance system: it is a federal constitutional responsibility and people pay in premiums.

The hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois shakes his head. This is a party that spends its entire question period and its entire existence in the House arguing about federalism in the Constitution. Yet this hon. gentleman does not know that in 1941 the provinces ceded responsibility for unemployment insurance to the federal government. That is incredible ignorance for someone who likes to say he knows what he is talking about. He does not know a simple reality of the history of this country.

When people pay a premium they have a right to a benefit. That is what they are investing in, the right to that benefit. Now the Bloc Quebecois is saying no, just turn the money over to a bunch of bureaucrats and they will decide whether they get the benefit for not; it is no longer his or her right as an individual to have that benefit. That is what the Bloc members are saying in this motion, that individuals in Quebec who pay a premium no longer will be assured of the right to get the benefit of that because it is going to be decided somewhere else. As a result, the fundamental principle of the insurance program is taken away.

I do not think that is a very popular notion in Quebec or anywhere else. What is recognized is that they are fundamentally undermining the philosophy of the insurance program, which is that people contribute to protect themselves against the risk of unemployment. That is what it is all about.

I am surprised at the lack of understanding of the hon. member about the history of federalism in the country wherein that was ceded by the provinces to give us the insurance program. I am even more concerned about the sense of neglect of the principle of insurance, that is that people pay for the protection.

Basically we are saying that they will be eligible for an income benefit and an employment benefit. The employment benefit has within it five basic measures, including a wage supplement, with highly effective evaluations in terms of getting people back to work.

Income supplements tested out in New Brunswick and British Columbia over the past year show that people on lower incomes who would not take jobs because the income was not sufficient to pay for their family needs will take the jobs if there is a small top up. Thirty–three per cent are now back to work today compared to only 3 per cent in the general area of proven success.

Canada is the self–employment capital of the world. We are generating more opportunities for individuals to start their own businesses. In a matter of two years of testing the program for unemployment insurance, over 30,000 people started their own businesses. Each created a job for another person. In other words 60,000 jobs were created as a result of the measure.

Hon. members of the opposition want to deny people that. They say: "Don't do that. Don't give people the right to self–employment, to start their own businesses, to create jobs for themselves or somebody else".

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): They have lost faith in the individual.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They have lost faith in the individual. Yet that basic benefit was built into the program.

We also built in the basic partnership arrangement for job creation. Job fare is working in New Brunswick today involving 1,000 people from the forestry industry, older workers mainly. They are now back to doing reforestation, rebuilding that resource of the nation, cleaning it up and creating a resource that will be richer for the next generation of people.

Then we have the skills voucher that is available to individuals. That is where we come to an interesting point. We have said clearly in the legislation that in terms of the application of the voucher we will do so only with the consent of the provincial governments involved because it is their jurisdiction. We will not deliver it if they say no. It is not our right to do so. We think it is important that individuals have the right to make that choice. If getting back to work means a three–week program in computer upgrading, they should have that right. If the province says no, I will respect that.

I want to go beyond that. In all the measures I have talked about we are prepared to sit down with each province to work on a business plan of protocol, a year by year arrangement to determine the best allocation of the measures and to eliminate all duplication. Where the province has a program that can deliver that kind of opportunity to an individual who is our client, I am prepared to use it.

This is contrary to what the member for Mercier said. We should not listen to her. Frankly the hon. member for Mercier has an incredible track record in the House of crying wolf on misinformation. A year ago she was saying: "Oh, my God, you have changed the UI system. There will be 200,000 people on welfare". Where did it go? It did not happen. In fact it began to get a bit better. We have to look at her track record.

I make very clear that in the province of Quebec the SPRINT program provides a training voucher for people to go back to work. If the province is agreeable we can use it. Clients who pay a premium and get the benefit can use that direct program. I have no problem with that. It is perfectly good. I do not want to duplicate but that means sitting down province by province to work out the arrangements.

The one test I must have as a trustee of the insurance program is to ensure that those people who have paid into the program are eligible for the benefits and that they have a chance at being re–employed because that is the nature of the new benefits.

The member is creating a great fantasy of huge standards and intrusions. Once again the prize for fiction goes to the member for Mercier for fabricating, making up, fantasizing and, more important, trying to scare people, fearmongering again. It is unfortunate. In many ways I have a great respect for the hon. member for Mercier. She is a good person and a compassionate person. The problem is that every time we have a debate in the House—

• (1105)

Mrs. Finestone: First of all she leaves.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is another problem. She does not listen too well. Let us put it that way. Nevertheless everything is filtered through the prism of her separatist philosophy. That is the problem.

She cannot look at a major new program to help unemployed people. She cannot deal with the fact that we want to totally rework federal–provincial relations to transfer far more responsibility to the provinces, to transfer all responsibility for training. She cannot see that because everything is filtered through a separatist black box. It does not allow the hon. member and her colleagues to see the opportunities which exist.

I should like to clarify another important point. The hon. member made claims that this would be offloading on the provinces and that it would create problems. I point out something that has not been deliberately omitted but certainly has not been commented on by opposition members. An important initiative in the legislation is to extend for up to three years to all those who have had an attachment to the insurance system their eligibility for employment benefits. People who have exhausted their claims will now be eligible to start their own businesses with a self–employment program, to get a training voucher or to receive a wage supplement.

This means that 40 per cent of the people presently on the social assistance rolls in the province of Quebec will now be eligible for re–employment benefits. At a time when the provincial government is cutting back on those benefits we are filling the vacuum. That is a very crucial reason negotiation is so important.

There is an opportunity to harmonize our efforts. There is a real opportunity to separate those on assistance from those on the insurance program because in many cases they are the same person. Let us deliver through provincial programs such as APPORT. Bloc members have forgotten that last summer I signed an agreement with the provincial Government of Quebec to contribute to the APPORT program, specifically to test how provincial governments could deliver direct employment measures. Now we are seeing the benefits of that.

I am pleased that the assembly has agreed to negotiate. It is a first step; it is a good first step. The minister of employment for Quebec has already thrown conditions into the process, but I do not mind. I invited her over a month ago to have discussions. I am willing and open. Once we get together to form a partnership we can talk about how to bring the measures together to help those who have exhausted their benefits but want to be employed and about how we can ensure that the benefits paid out are delivered efficiently and without duplication.

Those are the real opportunities this measure opens up. It is a way of redefining how we work as governments and how we can work together. It means redefining the role of government for the individuals and giving far more responsibility, choice and hope to individuals of being able to find work. They will know there is support and they are not being left alone.

It also means an opportunity to help rebuild communities. One of the interesting developments in Quebec is that it is reorganizing down to the community level. I am doing the same in my department. We are reorganizing so that we have far more autonomy and discretion at the local, community and regional levels. If we can get together with provincial governments to agree on decentralization down to the community level, to let them make choices about the best way of employing people, we have done something very exciting. We have redefined governments in their relationships with each other, with individuals and with the community. We can provide the strength to rebuild the communities, to rebuild the employment system in Canada and to rebuild the country while we are doing it.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment, to set the record straight. Reacting to my shaking my head—it was not even something I said—the minister went off on a tangent and said that my understanding of the history of Canada and the Constitution was lacking.

I shook my head to indicate that there was nothing in the Constitution on this subject originally, although of course the minister is right, in that the provinces agreed to a constitutional amendment that gave the federal government responsibility for unemployment insurance. I want to make that clear, and I think it was in 1941. I wanted to make that clear.

The minister is intelligent, dedicated, energetic and well intentioned, and he probably wants to improve things, except when he says that the hon. member for Mercier does not listen too well. I want to appeal to his own ability to listen, because in the days to come, it seems there may be a meeting between the minister and the Quebec Minister of Employment. I hope he will go to this meeting with an open mind. In fact, I hope both parties will.

This morning, he seemed to be open to discussion. I am not the Quebec Minister of Employment. I am in the opposition here in Ottawa. I am also a member of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, and like the hon. member for Mercier, the minister's parliamentary secretary and the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, I travelled with the committee across Canada last year. I listened to people, and of course I do not share the assessment that was made of a consensus in this respect. I might remind the minister that everywhere we went, there were demonstrations, and 75 or 80 per cent of the briefs boiled down to the following: Mr. Minister, no cuts, please. That is history. But yesterday in the Quebec National Assembly, and that will be the subject of my question to the minister—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Of the Government of Canada?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, of the Government of Canada, of course. There are some things that I, as a Quebecer, would like to say to the minister, and this morning I have the opportunity to do so. The fact is that throughout the year, throughout our travels, we saw two ways of looking at reality. The majority of Quebecers, in all parties, including the Quebec Liberal Party and the Conseil du patronat, have the same perception of reality. The people of Quebec have the same perception of reality.

The minister made it clear this morning. I am not criticizing his personal values, which dictate that the individual is entitled to insurance. I can go along with that. I heard that very often in English Canada too, I must admit. But in Quebec, as long as it was unemployment insurance, there were never any complaints. It is true that Quebec had agreed, I think it was in 1941, to have unemployment insurance come under federal jurisdiction. But since that time, especially these past few years, Quebec has been demanding control over funds allocated to unemployment insurance from the federal consolidated revenue fund for training and employability improvement services, arguing that these matters came within the same jurisdiction as education and training. There lies the source of the dispute, if you will, that has been going on for some time now, over the fact that, when the federal government takes money from the unemployment fund for training, it is meddling in a provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, the minister has surely received a copy of the resolution passed by the National Assembly. As I have been asking him since yesterday, is the minister ready to recognize Quebec's sole responsibility for labour adjustment and job training policies in Quebec, according to the unanimous wish of Liberal Party members, even those who were in the no camp in Quebec?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving the floor to the minister, I would simply remind my colleagues that all questions must be put to the Chair in order to keep the discussion within parliamentary rules.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to direct my remarks to such a distinguished resident of the central office of the House.

First let me apologize to the hon. member if I misinterpreted his earlier comments about the Constitution. His clarification is certainly reasonable. It will fully restore my respect for his constitutional knowledge and judgment.

Let me get to the central point which is the question the hon. member raised. The reality is that we have clearly said that all choices and decisions about the nature of education and training will be made by provincial governments. We are withdrawing from the course purchases which have been the standard pattern over the past few years where federal bureaucrats would sit down with their counterparts and decide which courses would be available to clients. It will be purely a provincial choice.

We are withdrawing from apprenticeship training, co–op education and a number of other measures because we believe that the fundamental questions of curriculum, supply, institutions, course, faculty, all the things that make up the basic training and education are provincial choices, purely within their jurisdiction.

We are also prepared to go one step further and say there are other programs, not training, but which are directly related to employment and if a provincial government is able, wants to, is prepared to and has the mechanisms to decide how to make them available, that is fine. All I have to make sure is the person who is the insuree, who puts the money into the pot, is able to get the benefit back. That is the test and a requirement under the act, under the Constitution as the trustee for that insurance program.

The design, system of delivery and the nature of how training takes places are clearly and simply provincial responsibilities. It is important to recognize it cannot take place through a simple block transfer. As we have learned in the past, a block transfer with provinces does not end up in the programs it is intended for.

Quebec has been one of the better provinces in ensuring transfers for education and health end up in those programs. There are a lot of provinces in which a lot of roads have been built with money that was supposed to go to universities and a lot of provincial public buildings built with money supposed to go into the health care system.

As a result we have to ensure that when my colleague pays into the program she has a right to expect a benefit in return. That is all. We are saying we are substantially simplifying those benefits. We are basically saying that the 39 programs my department would run are being taken down to five measures. Those are not even programs, they are simply a tool. The provinces will be able to design that tool.

I use the example of the SPRINT program in Quebec which I think is a good program, a system to get people back to work. If Quebec is prepared to make that available to clients in the employment insurance program, let us do it and get them back to work. Those are the kinds of discussion I want to have.

I can assure the hon. member that we will discuss in good faith. We have invited the provincial ministers to meet with us and I am looking forward to that because I think there is a chance for a new, fresh, innovative dialogue with the provinces on this very crucial issue.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the experience the minister displays in his career in politics is very obvious. He is a very good speaker and I compliment him on that. I am sure he would do very well selling air conditioning units at the north pole.

• (1120)

As I listened to him there were several glaring contradictions. I have a series of questions related to these. He makes the same mistake as the Bloc when he appeals to history for what he is doing. Back in 1941 the government was given permission to run an unemployment insurance program. It is no longer a true insurance program.

My question is a very obvious one. Why does he appeal to this mandate back in 1941 to support what he is presently doing, making this a grand federal scheme that does not include only insurance? Why does he not return this to a true insurance program and only that?

Is there a long range plan behind all this? It is obvious this is simply tinkering. Is there some direction? Are we going to go beyond this?

The minister's press releases said a five–cent reduction in the premiums will create 20,000 jobs approximately. If that is true, 20,000 jobs with the unemployment we have is a drop in the bucket. If we can create jobs by tinkering with it only five cents, what is stopping the minister from reducing the premiums even more and creating more jobs? That is a very obvious question and a contradiction as far as I am concerned in what the minister is saying. If he wants to really create jobs why is he not doing more?

There is doublespeak. He says we are putting money in the hands of the individuals for empowerment. Why is he taking it out in the first place? The federal government charges a big handling fee whenever it takes money and does whatever it wants with it. Bureaucrats do not work for free.

I have several other questions. Perhaps throughout the day I will have a chance to ask them. I have asked three key questions we need answered now.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his compliments. I wish my father were here to listen to him. He may actually believe them. My father was an insurance agent. He had a small insurance agency in the north end of Winnipeg. It was enough to keep us together and to go to school.

I learned one lesson when he was involved in the insurance field and that is the best way to be a good insurer is to reduce the risk. When he sold casualty insurance or fire insurance he always went along with a good program to ensure that people would have good wiring in their houses, that they would reduce the risk of accidents, whether it was health or safety or whatever.

When we have an unemployment insurance system, what do we do? We reduce the risk of unemployment. That is the best way to bring costs down, to protect against it. That is why it is a full insurance program. That is why as a trustee we have to invest in getting people back to work. That was the fundamental purpose.

It would be interesting if the hon. member read the debates from the House in the early 1940s. He would learn from that. The basic premise was that only on a national level could we ensure there was both a spread and sharing of the risk but also that we would try to reduce the risk. Only a national government which was responsible for the management of the overall economy could provide the kind of priorities and judgments in concert with others. That is why the provinces ceded responsibility at that time.

The hon. member would know that insurance is very much a question of reducing risk. That is why in our business we want to invest in bringing down unemployment and giving people a chance to get back to work.

The second question is legitimate. As the hon. member knows, we try to balance our program. When we want to talk about creating jobs we do not do it by one mechanism alone. Reducing costs for business is one important way but it is not the only way.

I have explained in the House a couple of times that what we want to do first is build up a reserve. It means we can protect against the really quite tragic and disastrous effects of what happened in the early nineties when the previous government did not have a reserve fund. When the recession hit it had to escalate premiums by almost 95 cents. It was the classic putting on the brakes while trying to go up hill.

• (1125)

The reality is the unemployment insurance system was designed to put money into the economy as a counter cyclical measure at a time when a recession is taking place. That government pulled money out because there was no reserve built up in order to insure and stabilize employment.

It was a clear recommendation to the House of Commons committee by business, labour and other groups that we have to build up a reserve, which is what we want to do.

We are still paying off the deficit of the nineties. We inherited a $6 billion deficit in the UI account when we came to government. We have been wearing that away for the past two years. That is why we need to build up the reserve. Each year the Minister of Finance will take a look at the accumulation in that reserve and how it can then be adjusted for further reductions for business.

This year we thought we would be prudent and give a premium reduction. We have also provided savings to business by making a substantial simplification of the system. We will have the ROE, the bugbear of business, which will be substantially simplified and will save $150 million. That is a good first step.

We froze premiums when we came in. We have now reduced them as a first step. We are bringing down the cost for business and each year it will be reviewed.

In the meantime we can assure Canadians, at a time when the business cycle becomes more difficult, we will have a reserve so we will not be taking money out of the economy when we actually want to stimulate the economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): While these compliments are going across the floor and directed to the Chair, I must say it is appreciated. However, what we appreciate the most is the respect the House continues to show for our institution through the Chair and its occupant at any one time.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to request of you and through you to the minister that any remarks on the presence or absence of my colleague from Mercier, as was made in the previous portion of the debate, be deleted from Hansard.

She is accorded the respect of all of us according to parliamentary procedures. One of the core issues relevant to that respect is that we do not remark on whether she is here or not. There were comments made by the minister during his speech and by colleagues surrounding him that may be part of the blues. I would like that to be addressed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Let me see if I can be helpful from my perspective. I am certainly satisfied that at no time did the Minister of Human Resources Development make any reference to the absence of anyone in the House. I will review the blues and if someone else did then it would be a matter for the Chair to take under advisement.

I appreciate the reminder by the member for Calgary Southeast not only of a tradition but a rule of the House that is very important to our deliberations. We all know the constraints on our time away from the House. Therefore I fully respect the member's intervention.

I do not think there is a point of order. We are engaging in debate. I will return to the debate on the motion of the official opposition.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments.

Like everyone speaking today, I am honoured to address this motion. I clearly do not support the motion because referencing only Quebec narrows its scope. When the intent behind the motion is applied more appropriately to all provinces then of course I would support such an action.

At the end of my speech I will amend the motion so that it refers to the powers of all the provinces. Given they should all be treated equally, we must ensure motions such as these reflect that.

The motion proposed by my hon. colleague allows us to address some of the points made in the recent so–called employment insurance reforms. We believe the government intends to prorogue the House but in doing so may try to manipulate House procedure to ensure this legislation does not die on the Order Paper. Tabling the bill so close to Christmas break demonstrates that the government either does not expect to give it second reading until next February or that it hopes the bill will die on the Order Paper. Either way, tabling the bill as it has amounts to nothing more than irresponsible governance.

I will first address some of the amendments to employment insurance and then will focus on the government's failure to transfer powers to the provinces for labour market training. In its throne speech on January 18, 1994, the government stated that Canada's social security system must be responsive to the economic and social realities of the 1990s. This was a noble sentiment and we agree with it. However, the government also said in the throne speech that it would announce an action plan for major reform of the social security system to be completed within two years.

The minister's announcement is not major reform of the social security system and it barely qualifies as reform of the unemployment insurance system. I say this because the minister's tinkering will not create a single sustainable job.

Let us take a closer look at some of the changes. This is cosmetic change, not the kind of real governmental changes that Canadians are demanding. It is a name change; unemployment insurance is now employment insurance. Do we think that Canada's unemployed care about what the program is called? Unemployment by any other name is unemployment. It is this kind of rhetorical grandstanding of which Canadians have grown weary. Changing the name of UI to EI will not create a single sustainable job in Canada.

There is a rollback of payroll taxes of five cents for every $100. This is a tax rollback of one–twentieth of one per cent. This amounts to a savings akin to a wooden nickel. It is hard to imagine this so–called tax cut will create a single sustainable job in Canada.

The minister wants Canadians to think he has rolled taxes back but let us look at what is really going on. Part time workers will now have to pay the UI payroll tax which includes employer and employee shares totalling a 7 per cent tax hike. When eligibility is changed from weeks to hours, the government is imposing a tax grab on part time workers, a tax grab of over $1 billion.

This means youth in Canada and working moms, many of them single parents, will have to foot the bill. Youth and working mothers will have to work many hours to be eligible for benefits. While they are accumulating benefits the minister will be sure to tax their paycheques. The big problem with this is the lengthy period of eligibility. It is often the case, as it is with the nature of part time work, that the contributors will move from job to job with short periods of unemployment in between. This means youth and working moms will pay benefits and seldom will be able to collect. This amounts to a substantial tax grab on a segment of society which can least afford it.

The government has no estimates of how many jobs will be lost because of it. It does not know how many jobs will be lost because it has failed to do a thorough analysis of this aspect of the bill.

According to statistics ending in October of this year, youth unemployment in Canada stands at 15.6 per cent. We needed to hear yesterday and today some ideas on how to get our youth into meaningful work situations. Instead of positive change we have learned that today's proposals will cause employers to hire fewer part time workers because a tax is effectively imposed on the hiring of part time employees.

Let me restate this point. Part time workers now represent a massive tax hike on employers. This will not create a single sustainable job. In fact this change may choke off part time work altogether. This is especially disturbing when one considers that a growing percentage of the labour force is employed part time.

The minister announced an $800 million job training program. The auditor general's recent report indicated that these expensive and wasteful schemes do not create jobs. He criticized the Western Economic Diversification Program, ACOA in the Atlantic provinces and FORD–Q in Quebec. We all know what a colossal failure the TAGS program has been. The government admits the $6 billion infrastructure program created only a few thousand short term jobs.

Perhaps what is most disturbing about this announcement and more specifically related to the motion we are debating today relates to labour market training. It is clear from the government's package that the Prime Minister broke faith with Canadians when he announced he was giving labour market training to the provinces.

The minister is trying to sneak through the back door a new made in Ottawa social program scheme which will intrude on provincial jurisdiction. He has created two mega programs and for all these new programs all the provinces must reach agreement with the federal government. The Liberal government needs to give power and resources to the provinces with no strings attached. If not, then the gesture is meaningless. The government simply does not understand what decentralization means.

Let us move on now to decentralization, an issue that has garnered significant attention of late, especially given that the EI changes break the Prime Minister's Verdun commitment which he reiterated on Tuesday last week.

It is ironic that we debate the government's broken promise of decentralizing manpower training today. Today at committee we will hear the bureaucrats explain to us how Bill C–96 also fails to decentralize powers. In fact, the bill may even create new powers for the federal government. Even if this new power never manifests itself, the bill at a minimum entrenches the status quo of federal intervention into provincial areas of social policy jurisdiction, areas I am sad to say for which the new EI bill fails to relinquish power.

I find it quixotic, though I suppose not entirely uncharacteristic, that the government would try to enact legislation which engenders and champions the notion of centralization and the status quo. To do so amidst the decentralization forces pressuring the country to change is profoundly absurd.

Recent events have shown to all that fundamental change is required of our federation. There is almost universal agreement that the federal government needs to rethink its current role as provider of services and programs. In areas of social policy we cannot continue to support a system which separates the revenue raising capacity from the expenditure function. In other areas too there is strong evidence to support devolution to the most logical level of government.

In October the Reform Party released its vision for a new confederation. Reform believes that decentralization will permit future governments to respond more effectively to the needs of ordinary Canadians. It also addresses many of the historic concerns of individuals from all provinces.

Reform's plan includes giving provinces exclusive control over natural resources, job training, municipal affairs, housing, tourism, sports and recreation. It gives the provinces control over setting their own interprovincial standards for health, welfare and education, replacing federal cash transfers with tax points, and allowing provinces to raise their own taxes to finance social programs.

This decentralization will lead to a more balanced federation, one in which Ottawa will play a co–operative role rather than a dominating role. The proposals outlined in the new confederation speak to the long term. They furnish Canada with a vision. They put flesh on the conceptual bones of a new federalism. This is the kind of leadership that has been conspicuously absent from the current government benches.

How can one govern without a coherent direction? It is incomprehensible. I am not talking about prescience here, but about the courage to say: "These are my ideas; this is my vision". We have seen none of that from the government.

The traditional response to fiscal crisis has been centralization, consolidation and concentration. This instinct increasingly leads to failure. Centralized control and consolidated agencies create more waste, not less. There are many reasons that Reform speaks for this vision of decentralization and they will be outlined.

Decentralization will engender greater flexibility allowing institutions to respond more quickly to changing circumstances and client needs. Decentralization will create more effective program and service delivery, as the deliverers and providers of government assistance are closer to those they serve.

Decentralization will reduce waste, overlap and duplication created by concurrent jurisdictions and poorly co–ordinated government programs and services. Decentralization will engender greater fiscal responsibility, for a government that spends the money it raises will inherently be more accountable than one that spends the money someone else collects.

Decentralization in regard to the tax system is most compatible with the tenets of federalism. The efforts of a federal form of government is local autonomy. In its designated spheres, each unit is free to exercise its policy discretion unencumbered.

It is important to remember in this debate on labour market training that decentralization is neither a celebrated buzzword nor a passing political fad. It is a policy movement that has been vigorously championed in Canada since the 1960s. It represents reconfiguring the locus of attention in the federation.

Former B.C. Liberal Party leader Gordon Gibson writes in his new book: "Canadians ultimately want less control by Ottawa and more local management of their affairs. The basic concept here is government closer to home. Now home is where the heart is in our private lives perhaps, but in government terms, home is where the folks have the knowledge and resources to do the job. That single thought takes us a long way".

Adhering to the rule of thumb that the responsibility for addressing problems should lie with the lowest level of government possible does not require that we disavow the notion of federal leadership. A federal government with fewer employees, fewer departments and smaller budgets can still have a steering role in Canadian society. There would still be a policy framework setting function in certain areas even if no services were delivered.

These would include policy areas that transcend the capacities of state and local governments such as international trade, macroeconomic policy and much environmental and regulatory policy; social insurance programs like employment compensation where paying equal benefits to all citizens requires that rich and poor share differentiated burdens; and investments that are so costly that they require tax increases which might discourage business from locating or staying in a city or province. These are fundamental to leadership and to federalism at the central government level.

Even in these cases Reform believes that programs can be designed to allow for significant flexibility at the provincial or municipal level. The federal government can and must work with provincial governments to define jointly the mission and the outcome, but in doing so it must free lower governments to achieve those outcomes as they see fit.

Today we see that British Columbia is to be penalized to the tune of $47 million for trying to do just that. What has been the Liberal response to decentralization?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Breaking the law.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Decentralization is not about breaking the law with all due respect to my hon. colleague on the other side of the House. The government has resisted the natural ebb and flow of this federation by operating completely oblivious to its surroundings.

We saw this in the recent referendum. The government grossly miscalculated by adhering to a status quo position. Only when it became obvious that its policy was a complete failure did it move to make insincere promises of change. Now where is this change? Where is this vision for a new federation, a new federalism? Where is the blueprint for a renewed Canada? Where is the leadership to bring forward such a plan, given this government's previous attempts at major change? I would suggest that we will be waiting a long time before we see substantive and meaningful change.

Let me give one example of how this government is failing to deliver on its promises to reform and decentralize social programs. Consider the current welfare issue in British Columbia. I wanted to come back to that in my text because it is extremely significant today. When the province made changes to its own program by stipulating a residency requirement for welfare qualification, the federal government stepped in, and it has indeed stepped in, in a punitive fashion today, and threatened the province. Yesterday the artificial deadline passed in B.C. and we now see the results of what has happened.

There is no question that the B.C. government should be permitted to administer its affairs without federal interference. The minister, rather than taking such punitive action against the province should back off and leave it free to run its own programs. It is absurd for the minister, who has radically reduced transfers to the provinces, to turn around and intervene in provincial jurisdictions.

The minister continues to refuse to meet with the provinces over the Canada health and social transfer. Now when the provinces try to move forward, he stands in their way. Go figure. It would seem this is the Liberal position on co–operative federalism. How terribly predictable. How truly unfortunate. How really "made in Ottawa" it is.

During our briefings on Bills C–111 and C–112 we were provided with a briefing package on the changes these bills provide. At every twist and turn and at every reference to labour market training it is very clear that the provinces must negotiate with the government. They must seek to enter into a formal agreement with the federal government on how employment insurance benefits will work and how they will be delivered. Instead of giving complete power and adequate resources to the provinces, these amendments give a de facto veto to the federal government over the management and control of manpower training programs.

Ironically, the Liberal government is holding on for dear life to programs it has proven it is absolutely incapable of managing properly.

Just two weeks ago the auditor general stated in his report that there are grounds for concern that a lack of training in key areas may be producing a braking effect on jobs for the unemployed when the economy is expanding. Clearly, Canada's auditor general believes that the Liberal government is failing in its attempt to create those long term sustainable jobs, jobs, jobs we keep hearing about from the other side of the House. In fact, one may conclude from his comments that the government is actually hindering job creation, not helping it.

The minister's changes amount to mere tinkering, not a sweeping and comprehensive reform. What we need are systemic reforms that address the needs of the chronically unemployed, which was what UI in 1940 was intended to do. It was to provide a bridge for short term unemployment, not the massive social safety net we now see.

I would like to share briefly with the House three options for change the minister did not address. Two of the options involve decentralizing power for training programs to the lowest level of government: directly to the individual. Our options for relinquishing control to individuals are motivated by the desire for individuals to care for themselves when they are capable of doing so. That is absolutely fundamental to the Reform ideology of individuals accepting responsibility to take care of themselves when they are able to do so. That is not too difficult to understand.

However, the government wants to maintain control over training because it is a traditional political activity to maintain visibility in the area of employment and job creation. After all, the election is only two years down the road, and we want to be visible out there. Boy, we went out there and created those jobs, jobs, jobs. Are we not good?

The first option to be considered is that employment insurance could be returned to a true insurance plan, as it was originally intended to be when it was created in the 1940s. This would mean doing away with regional inequities in the program and ensuring that only those who truly need benefits receive them.

The system has become an income supplement. Income supplement does not, in my definition, translate to insurance. We believe there is a need and place for income supplements, but they should not be in UI or EI or whatever it is called. UI was meant to provide workers with temporary assistance for brief periods of time when they were between jobs.

The second option would be for individuals to change how they contribute to unemployment insurance. They could contribute to registered employment savings trusts, or REST accounts. These accounts would be mandatory and would be used at the discretion of the individual. As many people never use UI, it is only a tax with no benefit. With a REST account, similar to RRSPs, if the funds are not used the money could be directed into their super–RRSP accounts. This idea is not without its problems; I acknowledge that. The period of transition would be difficult and youth and the intermittently employed may find the plan difficult to manage.

A third option for the government is to drastically slim down EI, return it to a true insurance plan, and at the same time have individuals contribute to REST accounts. These things would happen together. This plan would ensure that the chronically unemployed are cared for and that those people who are seldom unemployed would be able to administer their own employment insurance program. They would not be taxed.

These are three options we are developing. We hope that in the new year we will be able to finalize our research and bring our plan forward to Reform's general assembly in June, where the membership, the people, can debate and come to a final decision on this important policy plank.

Having proposed options for decentralizing training, and after having demonstrated yet again how badly the Liberal government has broken its promise to transfer labour market training, I move:

> That all the words after "prevents" be deleted and replaced with the words "the governments of all the provinces of Canada from adopting a true labour market training policy of their own".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): On the proposed amendment to the official opposition motion moved by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast, I will take it under advisement and the Chair will respond to this matter in the shortest time possible and get back to the House.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by the hon. member from the Reform Party, the human resources development critic. At a time of constant change in our society, we welcome the meeting of minds and any exchanges that can take place between legislators and other individuals who are willing to propose new ideas. Although I may not agree with the concept prescribed by the hon. member, I certainly congratulate her on making at least the effort to come up with a new employment insurance plan.

I have some fundamental questions in relation to a couple of points. One deals with the issue of federal–provincial relations, which is preoccupying the minds of the Reform Party members and of course the Bloc Quebecois as well. Other questions relate to the employment insurance package as it relates to small business.

On the issue of decentralization of federal–provincial relations, members of Parliament who have followed this file attentively would probably find that the federal government has made many efforts with all the provincial governments to come up with a plan of action that speaks to the reality of the various provinces. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Human Resources Development has met with many of his counterparts. Part and parcel of this employment insurance legislation speaks to the fact that when we are talking about the tools, namely the self–employment assistance, the skills and loan grants, the top–ups in earnings, the federal government is co–operating with the provinces.

Second, on the definition of decentralization, local empowerment, and the redefinition of the relationship among the individual, the community, and government, it is clear to me that if we are to give vouchers or give the opportunity to an individual to make up his or her choice, that is the ultimate form of decentralization. It speaks to the confidence the federal government has in the people of Canada.

We believe the people of Canada can make the best choices for their own lives. They understand that in a changing economy they need to upgrade their skills, they need training opportunities, they need the types of vehicles that will ease their transition from the unemployment rolls on to the payrolls.

The issue of job creation is extremely important for the people of Canada. As a result of the measures taken in this bill, 100,000 to 150,000 jobs will be created. Who will create them? Small business, which is responsible for the creation of 85 per cent to 90 per cent of all new jobs.

What have we done to enhance the opportunities for small business? We have lowered the premiums. The hon. member from the Reform Party says it is only a nickel. If the hon. member were to calculate the reduction that occurs, not only to premium rates, and include the fact that maximum insurable earnings have gone down from $43,000 to $39,000, business also incurs that saving.

Equally important in this discussion is that it is not only business that gets the tax break, it is also individual Canadians who pay into the fund. That is a very important point to underline.

We believe in building a strong entrepreneurial spirit. I think our actions speak to that. One of the five tools we have outlined in the human resources investment fund is the self–employment assistance program. Since we formed the government, 34,000 people have participated in this program, creating 60,000 jobs. That speaks to job creation and it also speaks to empowering people and giving people the opportunity that is required.

How else is small business being helped? The five tools will enhance the human resources potential of our country, which means we are going to have a better skilled workforce. A better skilled workforce means we can set as a goal high paying, highly skilled jobs that produce high value added products. That is extremely important to underline as we modernize our economy.

When we talk about modernization, what about the new labour market information system that is going to connect business and people from coast to coast to coast so we may match people and also reduce the time people spend on the unemployment rolls of our country?

These are extremely positive measures, not to mention what we have learned from the past government's error in reference to reserves. By building up a higher reserve we are going to make sure that the next time there is a recession, hopefully not for a long time, or the next time there is a downturn in the Canadian economy, we will not be taxing small business and employees at a time when they need tax relief. This reserve will make that transition from economic downturns to better economic times a lot easier.

This will create stability in the premium rates. It will create jobs. It will create confidence. It will generate the type of confidence that is required so employment opportunities can be increased.

I would ask a simple question to the hon. member. In the employment insurance package the Reform Party introduced to the media a few months ago there are some fundamental flaws. One flaw is that it excludes more people than it includes, unlike our package, which brings in 500,000 people, including 44,500 seasonal workers who were excluded by the old unemployment insurance package. Why does the Reform Party, whether it is on the pension reform package or the employment insurance package, continue to practise the politics of exclusion?

• (1200)

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I concur that this is a welcome meeting of the minds. We can have reasoned debate. We can come to the House of Commons and feel secure in knowing that at least our ideas will be received and debated in an atmosphere of collegiality, understanding that we come to this place with differing ideologies.

The simplest answer to the hon. member's question when it comes to differing ideologies and how we understand and view the unemployment insurance system is that there is no doubt in the minds of the Reform Party that the unemployment insurance system is a fundamental labour market institution as it was developed in the 1940s. When it was developed in the 1940s it was for a specific reason: temporary assistance as an individual moved between jobs. It was not as it has now become, "a cornerstone of Canada's social safety net".

If we look at it in those terms it is coming at the question from two very different points of view. On the one hand we would like to see it as part of and included in the labour market as a tool. On the other hand it has become part and parcel of the fabric of social support in Canada. I do not quite know where a meeting of the minds would find agreement. We could see where each of us is going, based on our belief systems, on what we believe to be right.

Another comment with respect to the question of differing ideologies is from something which appeared on page 20 of the briefing notes we were given the other day. It comes back to the question he asked. I question the political motivation behind the part of the proposal dealing with employment benefits and services.

The federal government is now committing to work in concert with each province. The alarm bells start to sound when we start thinking about each province. The hon. member talked about inclusion and the same kinds of support across the country. Yet in my mind it will obviously be different because each province is invited to enter into agreements.

For the decentralization the hon. member has described, it tells me there will probably be a different set of circumstances for each province given its particular debt, deficit and unemployment situation. This will include the agreements. That is why I say there could be quite a difference when we are talking about federal–provincial alignment.

The design of the employment benefits and measures, how they will be implemented and a framework for evaluating the results tell me there will be consistency across the country. It just opens a social safety net to all kinds of expectations that perhaps the government has not thought about.

With respect to the member's comment about growth and small business in the country, there is no question that small business generates lots of jobs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I ask the member to summarize in the next minute or two, if she could, so that we could resume the debate.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have one more point with respect to building up the reserve. I will move away from the small business comments I wanted to make.

Regarding the surplus in UI, I maintain the finance minister will probably do some very creative accounting with that surplus. He will reach his 3 per cent of GDP in the next budget and it will be on the backs of taxpayers in a UI surplus. Our growth rate right now, as was just reported, has moved from 4.2 per cent to 2.3 per cent. No one can tell me our economy is going anywhere. We have not created a single sustainable job since the government came to power.

• (1205)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before we resume debate I will return to the matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast in her intervention about another member on the government side referring to a member of the official opposition, the Bloc Quebecois, not being present in her seat. I told the hon. member at that time that I would review the blues.

I have the blues before me and a reference was made by a government member that first of all she leaves. The member for Calgary Southeast was entirely right that it occurred. Second and most important it goes against the convention of the House to make any reference to the absence of any member at any one time from the Chamber.

I know other members such as the member for Lévis, and I believe someone on the government side, wished to rise on the point. I will consider the matter closed now that it has been raised correctly by the member for Calgary Southeast. I thank her for her intervention and the matter is closed.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mercier.

Before going any further, I would like to thank the member for Calgary Southeast for her vigilance, her attention and especially for having raised the matter. I appreciate the intention, because the member for Mercier does make a great contribution, she is indeed very active in the House. I think the remarks in question were inappropriate.

The debate is on a motion which reads as follows:

> That this House condemn the government for choosing to reform unemployment insurance in a way that maintains overlap and duplication in the manpower sector and thus prevents the Government of Quebec from adopting a true manpower development policy of its own.

I listened to the arguments by the member for Calgary Southeast on the amendment she is proposing. I shall reserve my comments on it for the moment, but I would like to thank her for paying attention. Her remarks indicate that other provinces would also like to take charge of manpower training within their borders.

However, after touring the country with the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development last year, I felt that some provinces, such as the Atlantic provinces, were not as keen, perhaps not fuelled by the same desire. They wanted the federal government to remain very visible in this area, because they felt that their province may be experiencing economic difficulties in this regard.

I simply want to say that the amendment proposed by the member for Calgary Southeast would not be easy to implement because there does not appear to be a consensus, unlike in Quebec. This has been shown very clearly. I will tell the member for Calgary Southeast this: I will discuss it in my speech, I will recall the historical background of this claim by Quebec and the reason it is so important to us.

To us, manpower training means education. Under Canada's Constitution, education is a provincial matter. This is particularly important to Quebec, because education is also a cultural concept, very close to our culture. It is a treasure to the people of Quebec.

All those involved in this area agree. I would point out that, yesterday, the Quebec National Assembly passed a motion to once again remind the federal government of its position. When I speak of the Quebec National Assembly, I am not talking just about the members of the Parti Quebecois, but also about the members of the Quebec Liberal Party.

Yesterday's motion was passed by a vote of 96 in favour, none against and no abstentions. It was therefore passed unanimously.

What does this resolution say? It says:

"That Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and patriate accordingly the funding allocated by the federal government to these programs in Quebec; "Within the current constitutional framework and in order to improve services to customers, Quebec must take over the control and management of various services pertaining to employment and manpower development and all programs that may be funded through the Unemployment Insurance Fund within Quebec's borders, and must therefore receive the funding appropriate to such responsibilities;

"The Government of Quebec and representatives of business, labour and the co–operative sector agree to oppose any initiative by the federal government that would constitute an invasion of Quebec's prerogatives".

Therefore, it asks the government and the Minister of Employment to immediately undertake formal discussions with the federal government in order to ensure the respect of the consensus and the promotion of the interests of the Quebec people.

I stress that this motion was adopted unanimously.

A while ago, after I shook my head at something he said, the minister introduced a historical dimension to the debate. I had mentioned 1941 a bit earlier when answering a colleague's question. I must make a correction, I was wrong by one year. The constitutional amendment enabling the federal government to set up and run the unemployment insurance program was passed on July 10, 1940. It was the British Parliament—as you know, we had to ask permission—which amended section 91 of the British North America Act, making it possible for the federal government to set up the unemployment insurance program.

It would be useful at this point to summarize Quebec's claims. Stakeholders in the labour market have recognized unanimously the need to patriate to Quebec all responsibilities and federal funding in the area of manpower training. The Liberal Party and the Parti quebecois are in agreement on this.

It is also worth recalling that, in 1991, the former minister in charge of manpower, income security and manpower training claimed, in a policy statement from the Government of Quebec about manpower development: "For many years, Quebec has claimed control over policy instruments affecting the work market. In other words, the Government of Quebec and its economic partners want laws, budgets, institutions, programs and services concerning manpower or the operation of the work market to come under a single authority. Partners on the Quebec work market are almost unanimous in recognizing that manpower policies must be prepared by authorities as close as possible to the various work markets".

This request for devolution of manpower training goes back a long way. In 1989, the job forum was a critical step in the advancement of this cause. This is when the job market partners, that is labour, management and government, agreed to ask that Ottawa hand over full responsibility for manpower training.

With such a consensus, the Government of Quebec officially requested, in December 1990, that any federal moneys for manpower programs be handed over to Quebec, including money from the unemployment insurance fund used for that purpose. In December 1990, the Liberal Party was in office, not the Parti Quebecois, and Robert Bourassa was premier. The Liberal Party of Quebec claimed exclusive jurisdiction not only over manpower training, but also over other aspects of manpower development, such as placement, employment assistance, job creation support, etc.

To back up this demand, the Quebec government created the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, or SQDM, which was to serve as a link between all labour market stakeholders and to manage all manpower development programs in Quebec.

The Quebec Liberal Party went even further, asking for an administrative agreement allowing Quebec to manage the unemployment insurance program within the province. It was asking for a return to the pre–1840 situation. Quebec wanted to be given jurisdiction in this area.

Otherwise, the federal government would have to maintain a rather cumbersome administrative structure in Quebec. To make UI benefits and related services accessible to the Quebec people, a whole network would have to be maintained with all the inconveniences of this kind of duplication.

In concrete terms, this agreement would have resulted in the UI program running the SQDM.

This happened under the liberal government led by Robert Bourassa, a true blue federalist. Now, you will ask, what sort of problems is this situation creating in Quebec? At the same time, one must recognize that there is a problem with vocational training in Canada. In 1993, Canada was ranked 22nd out of 22 developed countries for on–the–job training.

According to available statistics, the federal network runs 27 training programs—the minister said 38 earlier—and the Quebec network 5. The federal government—which has started cutting down—operates close to 100 Canada Employment Centres in Quebec, while Quebec set up the SQDM to replace the former Commission de formation professionnelle.

The original mandate of the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre was to work towards the creation of true single windows in every Quebec region. Today, it acts more as a mere manager of federal funds, without much of a say.

I would like to point out that in 1993–1994, transfer payments accounted for 56 per cent of the SQDM budget, or $150.7 million out of a total of $269.5 million, an accurate depiction, if ever there was one, of Ottawa's control over manpower. The lack of co–ordination between the two networks results in the unemployed being ill served by the various manpower training programs.

An internal memo of the federal government did reveal that in the spring of 1993—this is a federal memo, remember—nearly 25,000 unemployed people referred to a training program could not register for lack of available places.

The policy statement of minister Bourbeau described how two different manpower training networks could cause problems. It said: "We understand how hard it can be for an uninitiated person or business to find its way among the multiple service centres like the Canada Employment Centres, the offices of the Commission de formation professionelle de la main–d'oeuvre, Travail Québec centres, school boards, colleges, universities and the Department of Manpower, Income Security and Skills Development."

Minister Bourbeau, a liberal federalist, estimated at $275 million the cost of these overlaps and duplications in manpower training programs. The minister who said that was not a PQ member, not a BQ member, not a sovereignist, but a federalist.

Both governments agree that manpower training programs must change. In his discussion paper on improving social security in Canada, the Minister of Human Resources Development said: "Unfortunately, existing programs do not do this well enough. Too many people end up in programs that have little to do with their needs, aptitudes or opportunities. Many get training for jobs that do not exist locally. Many are shunted from one program to another. There are too many mismatched programs, with inconsistent rules and too much red tape. Programs offered by different levels of government are often not coordinated."

He felt the system had to change. The federal government is not alone in adding to the mess of manpower training programs. We must recognize that, at the time, there were too many manpower training programs. The present minister has merged a number of programs, but she is having problems because of the federal's ongoing presence and there is no sign of it withdrawing readily, given that it is currently introducing new measures. Yes, it says that these are not forced on the provinces, yet it will keep imposing guidelines. It intends to keep control.

The minister said a while ago, in his presentation, that we cannot do away with controls because certain provinces—not Quebec but others— had used the program's money to build public buildings. He feels this is enough to justify a permanent control by the federal government.

Basically, what he wants to do, what he would like to see is the provinces, Quebec included, manage the programs listed in his bill. He would like the provinces to do what he wants them to do. He is treating the provinces as mere pawns. For us in Quebec, this flies totally in the face of the established consensus.

I will quote someone else. The president of the Business Council on National Issues, Mr. Thomas d'Aquino, added his voice to the voices of those who recommend that the federal government hand over manpower training to the provinces as fast as possible. On October 28, 1994, Mr. d'Aquino said: "There is no doubt in my mind that decentralization in this area would be beneficial to the Canadian economy. The sooner the politicians come to an agreement on this question, the better".

Last year, members of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development travelled across Canada. When the minister suggests that he is implementing recommendations made to the committee, let me say that I disagree with that. I travelled to all the provinces of this country and to all the larger cities of Canada with the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development—the parliamentary secretary knows that, he had to suffer the consequences. On some occasions, I admired his courage in facing those who opposed his reform. But when he tells us later that this is what Canadians want and wish, after what I have seen and heard, when I know that 75 to 80 per cent of briefs were against what the minister is now proposing, that is, cuts of some $2 billion in unemployment insurance, I know that is not what Canadians asked for.

People who came to testify before this committee said that what is missing today is work, job opportunities. They wished that the government would follow the policy outlined in its red book. The Liberal slogan during the last election campaign was even "Jobs, jobs, jobs". But we see that, in fact, there are not more jobs today. But worse still, the proposed changes will create two classes of unemployed.

As critic for training and youth, I see that a young person will now have to work 910 hours over 52 weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance. That represents 17.5 hours of work per week in one year, every single week, in order to qualify. Otherwise, he will not be eligible. He must accumulate this minimum number of hours. So, it is now twice as hard for newcomers on the labour market to qualify for unemployment insurance.

And what do they do to unemployment insurance? They create a fund and make it available to the provinces, and tell them: "You can help yourselves to some of it, but only under certain conditions because we want to keep control over it, or else we are going to take it away".

But this fund the minister mentioned is made up of money contributed by employers and employees. Why is the federal government messing with this fund when, as everybody knows, it has not contributed a single penny to unemployment insurance since 1991? It is not this government who did that, but the Conservative government. But now it is turning a profit with unemployment insurance and using part of this profit to provide manpower training in a field which comes under provincial jurisdiction.

This is what we are against and what we are condemning. There is a small opening here. We saw that the Quebec National Assembly, while establishing some parameters, is continuing to emphasize the Quebec consensus on the need to repatriate all the money spent by the federal government in manpower training, even UI funds, because the federal government would use that money to continue to multiply programs and to maintain duplication.

To conclude, I ask the government and the Minister of Human Resources Development to be on the lookout, to listen more carefully to what Quebecers want. He will see that Quebecers, not only the sovereignists, the members of the Bloc Quebecois or the Parti quebecois, but all Quebecers want the Quebec government to be in charge, to be responsible for its policy concerning manpower, training and all related services. I will conclude on that and I thank you for your attention.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments made not only by the hon. member but also by the critic who spoke before him.

What struck me is the lack of sensitivity to individual Quebecers, whether they live in Montreal, in my riding of Mount Royal, in Trois–Rivières, Quebec City, Chicoutimi, Lac–Saint–Jean, or anywhere else in Quebec, because these people who paid their UI premiums and now need assistance as they become jobless are entitled to these benefits.

All their actions and remarks point to this: they want the power to make decisions with Canada's money. As usual, they forget to tell the truth. In fact, for every dollar invested in Quebec by an individual in the labour force, this individual receives $1.33 when unemployed. They want to deprive every unemployed person of this 33 cents, which over time adds up to millions and millions of dollars. What a great policy.

They then completely overlook the fact that this change addresses realities in Quebec. Like other Canadians, Quebecers must adapt their skills, attitudes and abilities to the new society. They have completely forgotten this, and they want to forfeit a rather significant amount of money. We have injected over $4.2 billion into this program, but they have forgotten this and are unwilling to tell their constituents. I find this very interesting. You do not want to tell—

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. secretary of state to please always address her comments to the Chair.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, through you, I would like to ask my hon. colleague the following question: does he not want to spread the news that the Government of Canada is pumping $4.2 billion into the system instead of $4 billion, including more than $500,000 in measures for the unemployed?

Also, of the $800 million, $240 million would go to Quebec, for a total of $747 million in extra money, and he wants to take what away. Does he really want to deprive his constituents of that? My constituents want jobs, they want retraining, they want training, they want decent working conditions, they want wage subsidies and remuneration supplements.

Regarding women, does my hon. colleague want benefits for women or does he want to take away benefits that help ensure the financial independence of women? We are talking about individual insurable earnings and basic employment insurance benefits calculated on these earnings that go to the women and not to government, for governance, but to each working woman.

In addition, women who are currently holding more than one job or working part time at different places will immediately qualify, but the hon. member does not approve of this change. He does not want them to be recognized as part of this change and those in need of assistance, like low income families with children, many of which are headed by women, to be afforded protection under this reform. There will be family income supplements, but he does not want to recognize the fact that this may mean an increase of up to about 80 per cent in the basic amount for low income families. He does not want to recognize that fact.

Neither do Bloc members, in spite of the fact that they are taking steps for reasons of efficiency relating to their culture, want UI recipients to be able to supplement their income by earning $50 a week without seeing their benefits adversely affected. They do not want to recognize that maternity leave and parental leave allowances as well as sick benefits and temporary disability benefits are maintained and provide basic support to Canadian workers and their families. They refuse to recognize the fact that the reform is actually helping women overcome barriers to employment as a result of reinvesting in targeted employment measures, daycare and income support.

I for one would like to know why the Bloc members, who were elected to this place to represent their constituents at the federal level, cannot and will not recognize that the proposals will have the effect of better protecting families, and women in particular, and why they are so intent on not giving the plain and simple facts to their constituents. Why do they not at least have the openness to say that, from now on, anyone who has received UI benefits or a maternity leave allowance in the past three years will have access to job search services? Why do they refuse to spread this good news? Could the hon. member give me an answer on that?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a comment before replying to the secretary of state for the status of women. For reasons of time, I cannot answer all of her questions. However, I want to make an observation. Most of the hon. member's comments had to do with the UI project, while today's debate is on a motion dealing with manpower training.

Through the Chair—since we must always comply with parliamentary rules—I want to provide some information to the secretary of state for the status of women, who asked specific questions.

Why will we, Quebecers and Bloc Quebecois members, not fulfil her wish to see Quebecers accept that the federal government go over the head of their provincial government to deal directly with individuals? That is what she said, they want to reach individual Canadians. The hon. member said that we are really turning this into a power struggle. This is what she is suggesting when she says: "You are turning this issue into a power struggle and, because of that, we, the federal government, have a problem adequately reaching individuals". Such a view truly reflects an attitude which still prevails and which has to do with reaching Quebecers, individually, in fields that come under Quebec's jurisdiction.

The hon. member sees this as a power struggle. Earlier, in my comments, I tried to show the adverse effects maintaining such duplication with have on these same individuals who want to get proper training.

At one time, there were 25,000 people in Quebec seeking vocational training but unable to get it, because sometimes one level of government would not have the required funds, or at other times it would be the other one. The funds allocated to a particular program had run out. There were some 30 federal programs, and approximately the same number of Quebec programs. Confused by all this overlap, the unfortunate individual was sometimes discouraged. Because they kept on trying, others obtained the information they required, but it was often too late because the funds had run out.

For example, people registering with employability enhancement centres might be asked if they were UI recipients. If they said: "No, I am on welfare", they would be told they did not qualify and should turn to the Quebec government or to Quebec funded agencies. The reverse was also possible for welfare recipients. It is always like that.

I am quite familiar with current federal programs, because I have been studying the issue thoroughly for the past two years, and I can say that only 15 per cent of welfare recipients benefit from federally developed or supervised activities. The same thing can be said about the province, and one must understand the reasons for that situation.

Since welfare benefits are paid by Quebec, even if 50 per cent of the funds come from the federal government, the province was well advised to create programs to help people qualify for UI benefits, which is what they did. When the federal government saw that they were qualifying for UI, it decided to put in place a program to allow them to retrain.

I have been in this House two years now and I know that some of my constituents have signed up for one program after another but are still unemployed because the system failed to meet their needs.

We are exposing that problem and we want it solved. According to the consensus reached in Quebec since the employment forum, only one government, the Quebec government, should have full responsibility for manpower training. That is what Quebec wants.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Before debate is resumed, I see the hon. member for Calgary Southeast in her place.

• (1240)

The Chair has been asked to rule on the validity of the amendment made earlier today by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast. Her amendment reads:

> That all the words be deleted after the word "prevents" and be replaced with the words "the governments of all the provinces of Canada from adopting a true labour market training policy of their own".

The motion of the official opposition reads:

[Translation]

> That this House condemn the government for choosing to reform unemployment insurance in a way that maintains overlap and duplication in the manpower sector and thus prevents the government of Quebec from adopting a true manpower development policy of its own.

[English]

Under the circumstances the Chair must rule the proposed amendment is not valid within our rules. Briefly, the reasons are that the amendment would change the nature of the debate significantly in two respects. First, the official opposition's motion focuses on Quebec only, as it is entitled to do, whereas the amendment enlarges the debate to all of the provinces.

Second, the official opposition's motion refers to manpower development policy whereas the amendment proposed by the member for Calgary Southeast refers to labour market training policy.

On page 257 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 929 reads:

> On an allotted day, during consideration of the business of Supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion. Journals, March 16, 1971, p. 416.

Accordingly, and with thanks to the member for Calgary Southeast for her submission, the Chair must rule the amendment is not receivable and not valid under our rules.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine.

When we debate in the House we often think about what the real people with real problems and real challenges are thinking as they see us exchange points of view. I wonder today what the unemployed Quebecer in Chicoutimi, Laval or Trois–Rivières would think about the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Mercier and the Bloc Quebecois.

What would the single mother think as she struggles to hold down two part time jobs, scared to death that her family will end up on the street? What would the older worker think who sees his job disappearing while all the new jobs required better skills? What would the small business owner think who wants to create jobs and hire new workers but cannot afford to compete with the UI economy? What would the young student think as she prepares to leave school and sees her older friends already collecting unemployment insurance for the third, fourth or fifth time at a very young age?

These people are looking for a decent chance at a good job with a good income. Instead the Bloc Quebecois has unfortunately resorted to this motion, a motion I believe has nothing to do with reality. It has nothing to do with the real challenges real people face in Quebec and outside of Quebec or with the real thrust of the employment insurance bill.

Instead, unfortunately the Bloc Quebecois wants to pick a fight. It wants to pick a fight where there is really nothing to fight about. Is the Bloc truly concerned about provincial jurisdiction over training? Perhaps it should listen to the Prime Minister, to the minister who wrote this bill. Bloc members must read the bill itself.

The federal government is saying loudly and clearly that we will do nothing in this area without the express consent of the provinces. We will get out of any activities that might be seen as interfering with provincial responsibilities.

Is the Bloc truly concerned about overlap and duplication? Then listen to what we are saying. We are saying loudly and clearly to the provinces that if you want to deliver the employment benefits under this new system, we can live with that. If you have your own programs that do the same thing, let us use your programs. If you want to find better ways to co–ordinate programs and get rid of overlap and duplication, then let us do it.

The minister has extended an open hand to Quebec, to all provinces by saying let us build a new and better partnership. Quebec was the very first province to respond and the response was yes, let us talk. The Quebec National Assembly passed a motion to enter into talks with the federal government on the very same day the legislation was tabled.

It is time that members of the Bloc Quebecois realized that time and reality have passed them by. Quite simply, the motion they have brought forward is out of date. It was made obsolete by the very bill they are trying to condemn. Let us stop. Canadians, whether they live in Quebec or outside Quebec, are tired of what really are imaginary battles.

What Canadians want us to do as responsible members of this Chamber is to get down and do the job that needs to be done. They want us to create a climate where people feel secure, a climate where jobs are created, where people are given opportunities and are empowered to make the best decisions possible for them, for their community and indeed for their nation.

As a federal member of Parliament, as a member of the Canadian government, I know we have made every effort possible to reach out to the provinces in the spirit of co–operation and goodwill. We have extended our hand to anyone who wants to sit down, to get together in a very meaningful partnership and implement the changes people are asking for.

I respect the hon. member for Lévis as a very hard working member of the human resources development committee. Of course, I do not share his point of view in reference to the issue of separation and many others. Now is not the time to throw up our arms; it is a time to roll up our sleeves.

There are people out there who depend on legislators to bring about positive change to their lives. It is for this reason that I get up in this House convinced that the employment insurance bill the government tabled is a very good bill. It is worth supporting and takes into consideration the very sensitivities that the Bloc Quebecois, the Reform Party and Canadians in general have brought forward during the debate on social security review.

What are we trying to achieve with the employment insurance bill? The employment insurance bill recognizes two fundamental things. One is that people during time of unemployment require income security. It is provided in the bill. It also recognizes the fact that there is a different economy out there. Long term unemployment since 1976 has tripled which speaks to the structural changes of unemployment.

People are staying unemployed for a longer period of time. Why is that? Because they do not have the skills required to get the new jobs. We need to have an active measure introduced which is referred to as a human resources investment fund.

The $800 million human resources investment fund has five tools which include a target income supplement, wage top–ups, skills and loans grants. There are job partnerships and self–employment assistance which has been working extremely well. There have been 68,000 jobs already created. We have lowered premiums to generate job creation which benefits not only small business but also individual Canadians. We have reduced the maximum insurable earnings which again reduces the premiums.

We have taken all those steps because we believe that the system needs changing. We are doing this also with a great deal of fairness.

Low income families will be able to get up to 80 per cent of their average earnings. The 500,000 people who were excluded from unemployment insurance are brought into the system. UI exhaustees who were shut out of the past system are now brought in if they have had an attachment to unemployment insurance in the past three years. Anyone who was receiving parental benefits over the past five years will be able to access one of the re–employment tools which means they will be given opportunities for re–employment.

Above all, we are not only modernizing the employment insurance system, but the net result of these measures through the various measures including a $300 million transition job fund will be the creation of over 100,000 new jobs for Canadians. We are doing this for the people of Canada who throughout the hearings told us that they wanted a system that would help Canadians get jobs, keep their jobs, a system that would help the most vulnerable and do it in a sustainable fashion. They too understood that the program as it is today could not be sustained when in 10 years it has gone from $8 billion to $20 billion.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks, the parliamentary secretary talked about "real Canadians", and then about "real problems".

We on this side also feel we are talking about "real problems", and, in our mind, there is also such a thing as "real Quebecers", and not only Bloc members who are intent on paralysing the government. The parliamentary secretary himself read the resolution passed by the Quebec National Assembly. This resolution was supported and passed by all members. It was supported by the Parti Quebecois members on the government side and by members of the Liberal Party of Quebec as well.

Needless to say, the official opposition does not feel isolated on this side of the debate as he would have us believe by saying we are the only ones who do not want to co–operate and discuss solutions.

Let me put a few questions to the parliamentary secretary. Concerning the partnership he was talking about, what does the federal government intend to do about employability development organizations? I should point out that all of them have been advised that their mandate will be over on March 30. What will happen to them after that? After all, they are funded by the federal government. Could he outline the alternatives for me?

Time permitting, could he also tell me what will happen with the program for independent students? Funds for this program ran out a long time ago in many ridings. It is all very fine to have programs, but what good are they when there are no funds? What does the government intend to do between now and March 30 for those people who want to go on training? This is an existing program. What is in the way of the federal government keeping those programs alive until an agreement is reached?

• (1255)

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Lévis for his question which deals with an interesting point. He is concerned about what is going to happen with training institutions and the independent studies.

The $800 million human resources investment fund that we have announced will target five areas. There will be agencies that will have to deliver this program. I also want to bring to the hon. member's attention, and I am sure it is good news he already knows about, the fact that it is not only $800 million. This will be added to a fund of $1.9 billion which means that we as the federal government are investing approximately $2.7 billion on those five tools.

We are empowering individuals and local communities and provincial governments, if that may be the case. These programs will be delivered by organizations. Some of those organizations may be the organizations the hon. member correctly brought to the attention of the House.

We have to put this debate into its proper context. The federal government felt that the system which presently exists was not working, and the hon. member knows this because Canadians told us from coast to coast. There were far too many jobs and skills mismatched, which thereby also increased unemployment.

What is positive about our program is that it is better targeted. It collapses 39 programs into five. They are five tools that we know actually work because over the past two years we have done experiments and pilot projects with these five programs.

If we look at the self–employment assistance, 34,000 people participated and 68,000 jobs were created. If we look at the wage top–ups and earning supplements, these have also increased the duration that people stay on the jobs plus their income, which is something we need to address as a federal government. We need to provide people with job opportunities and also good jobs that increase income levels.

I conclude my response by turning 360 degrees to the hon. member's question on my earlier comments. As we debate this in the House of Commons, Canadians are faced with the challenges of an ever changing economy. I spoke about the young people, the older workers, the multiple job holder and the part time employees who under the present unemployment insurance program are being marginalized and excluded. We will find that Canadians will respond well to this employment insurance bill. It brings people into the fold. It provides greater income security and opportunities. It recognizes that in an ever changing economy we need to do things better. We need to target things better.

From a fairness point of view there is the fact that low income Canadians with dependents will get a top up which will make them reach approximately 80 per cent of their average earnings. There is the fact that people who were excluded or were UI exhaustees in the past three years will have access to the programs. The only thing they have now is to go on social assistance.

People who were on parental benefits in the past five years will also receive the opportunity to access one of the five pools of the human resources investment fund. That may be a very important bridge to the workplace, to get them back to work.

Overall the reactions I have heard today have been balanced. The small business sector is applauding this move because it basically reduces its tax burden. Small businesses really believe they are benefiting because through the employment insurance active measures they are actually going to have better human resources available.

• (1300)

At the federal level we want to co–operate fully with our provincial counterparts to ensure we are doing this together, in partnership. In the final analysis, the employment insurance bill tabled last Friday is really about bringing positive change to people's lives and improving their quality of life.

[Translation]

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank and congratulate again the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

As you know, we are getting into a rather important debate which concerns a very large majority of my constituents in Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine. I feel very emotional because, as a member of Parliament, every day I am made aware of requests which are sent to me, to my office or to various offices providing services to our constituents. We try to find ways to create appropriate and durable jobs in my riding.

As for the motion the hon. member for Mercier put forward, we have the feeling that it was written before the minister introduced his bill here in the House.

I sense in this motion that they are not willing to really work with the Government of Canada, that to a certain extent they question the sincerity of the members on this side of the House, that they question how seriously the Canadian government wants to get Canadians and Quebecers back to work, especially people living in remote areas.

I want to tell you, mainly for the benefit of the population but also for the benefit of the hon. member for Mercier, who is the official opposition's critic for this department, that this piece of legislation is intended to limit and ultimately eliminate the well–known overlapping and duplication in the system.

Again, for the benefit of the members opposite and of the public at large, I want to say that the program has been designed in such a way as to harmonize the programs we have to create jobs and develop employment across Canada.

Besides, what are we trying to do? We are inviting the provinces, especially my province, Quebec, and its employment minister, Mrs. Harel, whom we have to call by her name today, to sit down with us in order to explore the opportunities provided to all Quebecers, businesses and the unemployed in particular, to create permanent and durable jobs, and to stimulate as well, of course, the economic recovery of our area.

Still, the minister spoke of five new conditions, five new programs, if you will, that are now provided for in the bill. We know very well that these five different kinds of benefits will surely help those truly in need.

I still go back to my region and I know full well that the people who work in the natural resources area, especially those who work part–time and in seasonal industries, are often penalized by the current system. The system we are proposing will right this wrong which has been going on for much too long.

I can give you some first–hand examples. In the Magdalen Islands, fisherman's helpers—this is just one example among many others—used to work and still work 10 weeks a year to qualify for 42 weeks of UI benefits. When the program was changed, they had to work 12 weeks to qualify for only 30 weeks of UI benefits. That meant 10 weeks without income for these fisherman's helpers who worked, might I add, not 35 hours a week, not 50 hours a week, but rather 70 hours a week on average. Such is the life of a fisherman's helper in the Magdalen Islands, in the Gaspé Peninsula and, of course, on the lower North Shore.

I can also give you similar examples of men and women who work long hours in the forest industry, throughout eastern Quebec and rural Quebec. Unfortunately, these people were penalized. The number of hours they worked was not taken into consideration. With the new system, we now know that 12 weeks of work equal 420 hours of work. But I can assure the House that these people, these fisherman's helpers in the Magdalen Islands, for example, work an average of 700 hours in 10 weeks.

These people will be able to qualify. The people will not go without benefits for 10 weeks, as we have seen these past two years. This is what the reform is all about. I think it is encouraging to see in this debate that both sides of the House recognize that seasonal workers do work hard and do put in countless hours of work.

Thus, companies will be better able to evaluate the efforts made by these workers in various areas. I can tell you of all kinds of examples, such as people who work in fish factories. I met a few of them in Pasbébiac, Gascons and ridings around Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine who work close to 90 hours a week. That is substantial. Unfortunately, as we know, these people were not eligible because, depending on the species harvested in the summer, the fishing season is often restricted to 10 or 12 weeks.

So I believe we have corrected an iniquity that harmed the regions. Of course, the opposition is claiming that these cuts are unfair and wrong, while they mostly benefit people who earn no more than $40,000. Very few of my constituents earn $40,000 or more in seasonal jobs. Most of them are low–wage workers who did not have a chance to become educated or to find long–term jobs. Life is not always easy and the first thing that we have to acknowledge here today is that we want to help those who really need it.

I remarked to the hon. member for Mercier, the other day, that in her own constituency, there are female or male single parents with two or three children and an income of less than $26,000. They did not have certain opportunities. That is why we want to establish a program for the underprivileged who really need it.

There is no shame in telling to those who earn $55,000, $60,000 ou $70,000 in a few weeks or in a few months, in the worst cases, that they have to reimburse, in part or in full, the unemployment insurance benefits they received. That is fairness. That is justice. That is the main goal of federalism as we know it.

I heard some positive criticisms, but then I hear members of the Bloc Quebecois say: "We are not happy with the situation. We only want the federal government to transfer the whole amount directly to the province of Quebec and let it run the program altogether".

However, no one on that side spoke about the difficulties encountered by the people, the problems they have in finding a job, in getting training. No one ever mentioned the 40 per cent dropout rate in Quebec.

As members of the Canadian government, we believe in this decentralization, and I want to tell you, especially my good friend, the member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, that the Canadian government, with the offices it already has, will now be able to work in co–operation with stakeholders, social and community leaders in all of the regions of Quebec and, of course, of Canada.

We are ready to design programs that accurately reflect the needs of our regions, of our employers, of our workers. That is what we want to do. We do not want, like the SQDM and its 12 service points, to establish programs in Quebec City, which will then be imposed upon my constituents. For our part, with our 90 service points and the others which will be developed very shortly in the province of Quebec, we will at last fill a real and urgent need, that is designing programs that will help create stable, durable and gainful employment. That is the main purpose of this bill, as set out by the federal government.

Unfortunately, my time has expired. There are surely a lot of questions. But I invite the opposition, and the public to review the information and to take advantage of the new programs, which are there for the people and not for civil servants.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was much interested in what the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine said about the relevance of changing the system based on a number of weeks to one based on a number of hours.

He gave us the example of people who will probably benefit from this. However, the problem with this reform does not necessarily lie in the fact that the number of hours is changed.

Saying that someone will have to work 910 hours to qualify for UI benefits for the first time means that young people, those who re-enter the labour force and women who left it several years ago or worked at home will now have to work 26 weeks, 35 hours a week, to get UI benefits. The eligibility period has almost doubled.

There are aspects of the reform which are unacceptable and I hope the government will correct them. I will give another example which concerns the ridings of Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup. I am talking about the fact that, under the new system, seasonal workers will lose part of their benefits. After three years, people who claim for UI benefits every year, such as workers in the tourist or fishing industry, will see their benefits reduced from 55 per cent to 50 per cent of their weekly insurable earnings. They are going to be penalized because they work in seasonal industries.

Now that the reform has been tabled, would it not be possible for the government to bring forward amendments to correct these things which will have a devastating effect on regions such as eastern Quebec?

My question to the member is this: What does he think about the fact that our young people might have to move out of our regions because of the increase in the number of hours it takes to be eligible for unemployment insurance?

Will the requirement to work 910 hours, which is the equivalent of 26 weeks at 35 hours a week, result in our young people leaving the regions in greater numbers?

I have another question that I want to ask of the member, reminding him that, yesterday, the National Assembly of Quebec also endorsed the current position of the government of that province by a 96 to 0 vote. It was a unanimous decision.

• (1315)

I would like to ask him if he would be willing to table in the House a motion which would read as follows: "Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and patriate accordingly the funding allocated by the federal government to these programs in Quebec". Would he be willing to table such a motion, which was adopted unanimously by the only Parliament representing Quebecers only, in order to settle the issue of manpower once and for all? Would he be prepared to ask the federal parliament to adopt such an approach?

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, there are many questions I would like to answer.

First of all, we clearly show our confidence in Quebecers and in all other Canadians. I think that by giving each unemployed worker a certain amount of money, we give them the tools needed to create their own jobs by letting them decide which course best meets their needs. They can choose the courses suited to the new economy that is emerging in each region.

Decentralization directly involves these people, Quebecers. That is decentralization, and that is what the unemployed want. That is what we mean by change: giving people the appropriate programs, based on their own personal needs.

I also want to answer my colleague's second question, about young people fresh out of high school, professional training, college or university, that is to say all young people. When I graduated—and that was not too long ago—my first priority was to find a job. I would rather use examples from my own region. When a young person graduates, he or she seeks a job to gain experience, to show what he or she can do. This is why with the new in particular, programs like services Canada and youth internship, in particular, we will tell the young person this: "Listen, you have this much money, go to your employer and tell him that, with the support of the Canadian government, you can subsidize part of your salary, on the condition that he promises to keep you on staff for a certain period of time".

I think we are investing in Quebecers. For too long, we invested in the public service, in obsolete programs or programs that were not tailored to meet the real needs of the people. We listen to the people and to the unemployed but, unfortunately, this is not the case of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has spent a lot of time defending the government's unemployment scheme. There would not be any need for this debate if he would answer one simple question. Why does the government not return this program to its original mandate of being an insurance program, as it was in 1940 when it was started?

Liberal members defend this by saying that history says they are supposed to do all this and be involved in this area. That is not true. The original intent of this was to be a true insurance program. The government has strayed from this, which is why the Bloc is asking these questions. That is why the Bloc has these concerns. That is why many provinces have these concerns.

The member used the phrase "we are going to serve the needs of the people", and the hon. Minister of Human Resources Development in defending it said "we are going to reduce the risk".

The auditor general says this unemployment insurance program the way it is presently structured is increasing the risk. Why do the Liberals not do the proper thing and put it back to a true insurance program? They admit that by decreasing the premiums five cents they will create something like 20,000 jobs. I do not know how they know this, but that is what they say. If that is the case, why do they not put it back to a true insurance program and reduce the unemployment rate by 1.5 per cent to 3 per cent? That is hundreds of thousands of jobs.

It is totally inexcusable for the government to go off on all kinds of tangents and create more aspects for the program rather than do the right thing. I do not know how the hon. member could ever defend the fact that it is not becoming again a true insurance program.

Mr. Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, the government does not have any intention of going back to 1941. The basis of this reform is to ensure we answer the needs, the requests, and the demands of the new economy, which is completely different from the economy of 1941. In 1941 we were in the middle of a war. It was a completely different context. We did not have the new economic realities. We did not have computers and fax machines and the rise of a new economic class. We did not have the fundamental changes that have taken place in the last five years.

We are trying to invest not in the government programs per se, or the fonctionnaires, but in younger Canadians, in middle aged Canadians, and in older Canadians. We are trying to define what they need. Often what they need is also what the new economy demands. This is why we have to adapt our programs. This is why we should invest in the individual. It is up to the individual.

If I am not mistaken, the Reform Party has always upheld individual rights more than anything else. We are now investing in individuals. We have faith in Canadians to make the correct choice in order to find the course that is tailored to their needs and to that of the new economy. That is why I ask the hon. member opposite to support the government in this courageous initiative.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this opposition motion which reads:

> That this House condemn the government for choosing to reform unemployment insurance in a way that maintains overlap and duplication in the manpower sector and thus prevents the government of Quebec from adopting a true manpower development policy of its own.

This opposition day follows on an historical event yesterday in the Quebec National Assembly, when all members present voted unanimously in favour of the following motion—96 in favour and no one against, a fairly rare occurrence in any Parliament:

> That the National Assembly reaffirm the consensus expressed in this House on December 13, 1990, on the occasion of the ministerial statement on manpower adjustment and occupational training, to the effect that:
> Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and patriate accordingly the funding allocated by the federal government to these programs in Quebec;
> Within the current constitutional framework and in order to improve services to customers—

All Quebec members of Parliament, whether Parti Quebecois, Quebec Liberals, Action démocratique du Québec, everyone in the Quebec assembly unanimously adopted this motion, stating that:

> —Quebec must take over the control and management of various services pertaining to employment and manpower development and all programs that may be funded through the Unemployment Insurance Fund within Quebec's borders and must therefore receive the funding appropriate to such responsibilities;

The members of the Quebec National Assembly did not say: "Let the federal government give money to the unemployed in voucher form so they can take Quebec courses under an agreement between the federal and the provincial governments". No, what they said was: "Turn all of the responsibility over to Quebec, and it will handle things". This statement was supported by both the sovereignist government party and the federalist opposition in Quebec.

• (1325)

They also stated:

> The Government of Quebec and representatives of business, labour and the co-operative sector agree to oppose any initiative by the federal government that would constitute an invasion of Quebec's prerogatives.

To find an example of this, one need look no further than clauses 61 and 59 of the bill, which show that, where no agreement is in place between the federal and provincial governments, the province will be penalized because the unemployed will not receive vouchers to purchase courses in Quebec. If this is not an invasion of our prerogatives, what is it? Is this not the kind of behaviour the federal government has been accused of for years?

The reform as presented is not what Quebec wants. The consensus against it, which we have voiced here on numerous occasions, took on a particular historical value with the National Assembly's motion of yesterday.

Let me read on:

> Therefore, it asks the government and the Minister of Employment to immediately undertake formal discussions with the federal government in order to ensure the respect of the consensus and the promotion of the interests of the Quebec people.

What the federalist members who supported this motion, including the Quebec Liberal Party members, said was not: "We must accept the planned reform as presented by the federal government". They said it was necessary to "immediately undertake formal discussions with the federal government in order to ensure the respect of the consensus and the promotion of the interests of the Quebec people".

This initiative by Quebec is therefore entirely legitimate. And if the present federal government is not listening, if it fails to change its reforms accordingly, it will be up against a wall. And as a result, it will again fail to deal with the problem.

Why is Quebec so keen on controlling this jurisdiction? Because as much as $500 million will be invested in five new employment measures. And by 2001 and 2002, it may be $750 million. These employment measures affect all of the areas over which Quebec has jurisdiction.

Canadian federalism is a very good example of inefficiency. Although Quebec is responsible for the Labour Code, occupational health and safety legislation and labour standards, the federal government will set up programs relating to wage subsidies and income supplements, a job creation fund, assistance for unemployed entrepreneurs, and a system of loans and bursaries. We will take a closer look at some of these to show the potential for conflict.

For instance, the job creation fund. If Quebec wants an active employment policy, it will have to adopt the federal government's development model. If the Quebec government feels that the federal model is not the one it wants, and if current reforms are supposed to promote manpower mobility and get people out of the resource regions when we in Quebec prefer to promote growth in our regions, we will be stuck with this model forever.

Another example is assistance for unemployed entrepreneurs, the program referred to as self–employment assistance. In Quebec the so–called Paillé plan was implemented. If Quebec wants to develop these measures, it will not be able to control them all, and we get a situation where people who receive self–employment assistance are not eligible under the Paillé plan. If they are on the Paillé plan, they do not get self–employment assistance. This creates situations in which young people who want to start a business have to knock on the doors of two governments. This reform will not resolve the situation.

My final example involves the loans and grants program. You may be sure that, in the medium term, the program, which is intended to provide grants to the unemployed looking for work will conflict with Quebec's loans and grants program for students outside the regular programs. We will start making comparisons, we will look at workers' behaviour to see whether they would not do better in a regular educational program than under the federal program. This will raise the level of the cacophony between the two governments.

This is why, I think, the wish of Quebecers expressed in the National Assembly may be readily understood.

Furthermore, after the consensus was reaffirmed over the fact that Quebec must be solely responsible for manpower adjustment policy, the minister of employment was told to discuss matters with her federal counterpart. She did so right away yesterday. She wrote the Minister of Human Resources Development to tell him she was ready to discuss matters within the context of the mandate given her by the National Assembly. The mandate is to promote the interests of the people of Quebec and ensure respect of the consensus that Quebec must take control in this area.

Why are we having such a hard time getting the federal government moving on this? When we toured Canada, last year, with the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, we found in several circles that there was a willingness to take over, through decentralization, certain aspects such as manpower training. Why is it that the federal government has not yet moved in that direction?

The answer can be found in certain elements of the unemployment insurance reform. This reform adds to an already complex decision making process, thus assuring the bureaucrats running the national network that their empire will endure. The best way to perpetuate a bureaucracy is to make it more complex, thus justifying the existence of more assistants, more advisers, more this and more that, in the end making the product less accessible to the client they are supposed to serve.

If there is one thing the government can be blamed for, it is its inability to cut through this bureaucracy and do what the people really want. I think that the federal government was being called to order by the motion passed by the Quebec National Assembly. The National Assembly has put the federal government squarely in front of its responsibilities.

It must listen to the consensus conveyed by the Quebec National Assembly. I will stress that 96 voted for the motion, none voted against and none abstained. All the members present in the National Assembly supported this motion. I would ask the Quebec members on the government side this: Are you willing to move a similar motion giving Quebec sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders, and supporting the other proposals put forward? Are you listening to Quebecers as National Assembly members were?

Are you willing to take action in your caucus, in committee, so that this reform can provide any province with a real opportunity to opt out and set up its own program, to have a real employment development policy, and to opt out of existing manpower development programs. The array of federal and provincial labour development programs is the laughing stock of all public services, with their confusing names and objectives. These things have never been properly clarified.

The federal government claims it is making an effort, that we could agree on a set of rules. It is wondering why we on this side are not yet satisfied. It is because the federal government wants control over the guidelines. This means that, every time we want to change the way these programs are run, we must first negotiate a federal–provincial agreement, some kind of administrative agreement.

This is unacceptable, in my opinion. Before any administrative aspect is negotiated, there must be agreements on the substance of the issue, and the Quebec consensus on the need to transfer all federal budgets allocated to this sector and to repatriate control over and management of the various employment services must be recognized.

Quebec now faces a rather special situation. Because the federal government decided to maintain its network of employment centres, it is significantly reducing the number of points of service. This will result in fewer services being provided to unemployed individuals. These centres will serve a larger area than before. At the same time, another network set up by the Centre Travail Québec and the Société Québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre is also active in the field.

In the days before the referendum, this government told us: "Yes, we will take into account the fact that you are a distinct society. We will take into account the aspects that make Quebec different". However, after the referendum, we came back here and it was business as usual. It is always the same thing. The federal government claims to be able to do better than Quebec in the manpower sector. That view is not shared by anyone in Quebec, particularly in light of the results.

The auditor general once said that the federal government did not have adequate control over its employability support programs. These programs are not effective, as evidenced by the fact that one million Canadians are out of work. Yet, the government remains insensitive to this fact and cannot bring itself to giving Quebec exclusive jurisdiction over the manpower sector.

I am prepared to bet that, if the manpower sector was delegated to Quebec tomorrow, within about ten years there would be a significant change in attitude. Since the stakeholders would be closer to the field, Quebecers would benefit from a program better integrated with the education network. Ultimately, the existing gap between the number of available jobs and the number of available workers would be filled.

This is where our record is the worst; Canada has an international reputation with the OECD for performing very badly in this area, because we administer things at a distance, with no attention to local needs.

In closing, I would like to invite the federal government, particularly those members representing regions of Canada with economic and social objectives and realities that are different from those of the ridings close to Ottawa, to make their views heard in caucus. This will ensure that regions so desiring may be given the necessary tools for development, and the attitude that there is one mandatory national standard can be scrapped.

It would be heaven on earth if all we needed for automatic bottom–line results was to set standards. If that were the case, with all the standards we have in Canada all of our problems would be solved by now.

Essentially, the solution for Quebec lies in this consensus in the National Assembly, in which all of the parties agreed to the same thing: that Quebec be given control over the tools pertaining to manpower, even under the present federal arrangement. When we have this control, we will be able to get things done properly together. And we are asking our minister of employment—because she has been given the mandate, not only by her government but by the Parliament of Quebec as a whole in the National Assembly—to undertake formal discussions with the federal government aimed at ensuring that this consensus is respected and the interests of the people of Quebec promoted.

The government will be judged on whether it agrees to integrate this consensus into its reform. If it does so, it will have Quebecers' gratitude. If it does not, this will be proof once more that more than 50 per cent of Quebecers ought to have voted yes on October 30, to enable us to finally escape from this unwieldy system which benefits neither Quebec nor Canada.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listen to what Bloc is telling us and what it is saying about the government's unemployment insurance program. I have a much more fundamental question that needs to be asked. Why is the Bloc not asking the government why it is not creating more jobs? We go on nattering about why one province does not have more of this jurisdiction and we lose sight of the big picture.

It is totally unacceptable that we continue to debate these five points and we forget why the people in Canada in the last election tried to put in place a government they thought would create jobs.

• (1340)

For two years it has been going on and on and has not done a thing. Why is the Bloc not asking the government about some kind of job creation strategy. How many jobs are being created by this? How many jobs are being destroyed by the unemployment insurance program?

The auditor general has said the unemployment rate is one and a half per cent to three per cent higher than it should be because of what the government is doing. It does not make the changes. Why is the Bloc not targeting that problem?

Instead we go on about other things. We have some simple cosmetic changes that have been made like how many jobs does changing the name from unemployment to employment insurance create? Not one. In fact it destroys jobs because we now have to raise taxes. We have to do all these name changes on all the buildings, on all the letterhead and all this kind of thing. That extra tax will destroy more jobs.

We are not addressing the fundamental problem of why we have such a high unemployment rate. We are being taxed to death and the government is using the unemployment insurance system as simply another tax to run some of its favourite programs.

Those are the fundamental questions that should be asked. The Bloc should be asking those questions if it wants to claim to be official opposition in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I agree with some aspects of what the previous speaker said. Canadians have every right to criticize the present Liberal government because it was elected on a platform of jobs, jobs, jobs, but in the end it is just coasting. It creates jobs piecemeal, while just as many are being lost, so that net job creation is zero.

This government plays a lot with words, and I think that is significant. Instead of unemployment insurance it now talks about employment insurance, but for heaven's sake, the contents should match what it says on the label. There should be something to help evaluate the impact in terms of job creation and helping us to get out of this mess.

We in the Bloc Quebecois are concerned about job creation. We see in these reforms a lot of measures that will have a negative impact on job creation, including the fact that young people who come on the labour market and fail to accumulate 910 hours will remain dependent, will go back on welfare and will become part of the welfare cycle. This is wrong and lends further credence to the fact that this is a lost generation, and that, we cannot accept.

We in the Bloc Quebecois have a different perception of employment. We agree with the Reform Party in some respects. There is also a structural and organizational problem in Canada.

We have developed a system in which one government has the power to collect taxes and spend money in jurisdictions it does not know and does not control, and has developed a fantastic bureaucracy to be able to function. This has created a lot of public service jobs but today, at the operational level, we realize this no longer works. Yes, we have a problem with the plumbing. We will have to deal with a number of things, but we also have a problem with the architecture: I am referring to the fact that governments do not have clearcut jurisdictions.

From the federalist point of view, which I do not share, one could say it is entirely normal that in Canada international relations come under the jurisdiction of a federal Parliament. However, manpower is a not an area in which the federal government can be effective, and this is borne out by unemployment rates that are unacceptable, that are much too high and that show a significant spread. There are marked differences between the regions in central Canada and around the federal government, and more distant regions.

The maritimes, Quebec and other regions outside larger urban centres always seem to have higher unemployment rates than the metropolitan areas. The system puts the regions at a disadvantage, which means that young people must look for employment elsewhere. If we keep the 910–hour standard, you will see a large number of young people between the ages of 18 and 23 who may have managed to get summer jobs in their own regions but will have to leave to get jobs in the city, and we are just going to aggravate this exodus.

Yes, the Bloc is concerned about employment, but as far as the solutions are concerned, we think it is also a matter of the structure and management of manpower training and also the fact that it should be more closely related to the needs of the people concerned and integrated with our educational resources.

When we have a government like the one in Quebec that is responsible for the Labour Code, for occupational health and safety legislation and for labour standards, and we have another government that is going to introduce five measures dealing with issues such as wage subsidies and income supplements, this will further complicate the system. Someone somewhere in the Department of Human Resources Development will then be able to say he is an expert on something no one else understands.

This means he can justify his job, but this is not efficient, and in North America we can no longer afford to operate this way. If we want to be competitive on international markets, decision making must be brought as close as possible to the people. That should be the government's objective. If the federal government does not adjust and act accordingly, it will be swept away.

[English]

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, things are becoming more and more curious as I listen to my colleagues from the Bloc and the Reform Party.

I listened to Bloc members saying they agree with Reform. Then I listened to Reform members asking why government is not creating more jobs. That sounds a lot like the NDP. Then when we have the Reform and the NDP voting together against the government on issues like gun control, voting against the veto power, perhaps there is a reason for the hon. member's confusion.

Speaking of confusion, I would like to touch again on a point of confusion my friend from the Bloc seems to have. He seems to be suffering from the same affliction as the member for Yorkton—Melville in that he thinks the government was elected on jobs, jobs, jobs. Again, there is probably confusion there given the close relationship between the former government, which did promise that, and the Bloc Quebecois whose members tend to be a lot of recycled Tories.

I am wondering about the comment the member from the Bloc made with regard to what should have happened. This is not a world of should have but a world of what has happened. The people of Quebec rejected what was put to them by the members of the Bloc Quebecois.

The member has made a strong statement that there is not going to be any agreement. I regret that because it seems the package put forward by the Minister of Human Resources Development goes a long way in allowing the federal government and the provincial government to work together to achieve exactly what we have been hearing from the member from the Bloc all year long. I encourage him and his party to co–operate with the government rather than destroy the country.

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, when the government member expresses bewilderment at the opposition parties holding similar views on certain things, this may be the time to twig to the fact that, when you make campaign commitments, the decent thing to do is to honour them.

When you say you are going to create jobs, you are supposed to have corresponding policies. When you defeat a government like the former Conservative government by saying that its policies were unacceptable, you have to meet the commitments you made subsequently. The idea is not to win elections, but to carry out the mandates you have been given. That is the goal and what must be achieved.

There is a lesson for the government in this. For two years the Liberal government told us that there was no problem in Quebec. It told all Canadians: "There is no problem in Quebec, and if we do our job properly, the Quebec problem will disappear". But then they found themselves with 49.4 per cent of the people of Quebec saying yes to sovereignty. The Prime Minister acts as the middle man between Canadians and Quebecers. Canadians realized that he had lost touch with reality and should perhaps be removed so people could talk directly.

I think it important that the message be understood. Our objective should be effective government. On this point a number of parties could agree. Why could we not think ali Federalists should basically promote very broad decentralization if they really want this country to continue to function.

In any case, throughout the world today, the solution lies in small groups, which have the tools to develop and do so successfully, controlling the course they want to take and making their own choices.

• (1350)

[English]

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A Liberal member misrepresented the position and the statement I was making. I made it absolutely clear that I was not expecting—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is not making a point of order, he is getting into argument. He will have an opportunity in debate to deal with what has been said.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand Liberal members have been splitting their time and I have been asked not to split my time. I will be using the full 20 minutes, plus the 10 minutes allotted for questions and comments.

I rise today with some reluctance to speak on this motion. I hope to have an opportunity to speak on the bill and on the many good points in the legislation. However, today we are debating the Bloc opposition motion condemning the government's employment insurance legislation for maintaining overlap and duplication in labour market training. I will try to confine my comments to that motion and to the aspects of the bill which relate to that motion. However, I would like to speak about the many good things the bill will do and I hope to have the opportunity to do so in the future.

If the hon. member and her colleagues in the Bloc had taken the time to give thorough consideration to the new employment insurance legislation they would see it does not maintain overlap and duplication in labour market training. After all, the Minister of Human Resources Development tabled the legislation only last Friday. It is a comprehensive document which deserves serious consideration by all members of the House.

[Translation]

The people of Quebec would be better served if the Bloc spent more time trying to understand this bill.

[English]

Instead they are conjuring up fallacies about its implementation.

To address the hon. member's motion directly, I suggest she refer to page 19 of the just published employment insurance guide. I know the hon. member has not seen this document. If she had she would not be wasting the valuable time of the House with this motion.

On page 19 of the guide, under employment benefits, the last paragraph of the first column states: "The legislation also proposes a new partnership with the provinces in order to eliminate duplication and encourage governments to work together to foster employment". It says the federal government will work in partnership with the provinces to eliminate duplication. That also means eliminating overlap; they are, after all, the same thing.

I do not know how much clearer the government can make it. It has been spelled out in the EI guide. I hope that by elaborating I can assist hon. members opposite, who still seem confused, to understand exactly what this means.

The labour market training initiatives under EI are not the one size fits all programming approach taken by previous governments. The federal government will work with each province individually, including the province of Quebec, because Quebecers are Canadians and are entitled to the same considerations under this legislation as are all citizens of the country.

We will work with each provincial government to help it deliver a federal program if it desires to do so or, and this is a key point, where a province is operating a program which will equally serve EI clients we will support that program. I do not know how much clearer I can make it for the members of the Bloc.

If the provincial government of Quebec agrees or if it has an employment initiative which meets the employment benefits criteria of this legislation, we are fully prepared to work with the Government of Quebec to use that initiative to help unemployed Quebecers get back to work as quickly as possible. The same thing applies in every province and territory of the country.

My colleague has already mentioned, but it bears repeating, that the good news is the Government of Quebec has passed a resolution that says it is willing to discuss labour market training with the federal government. Like my hon. colleague, I can assure members opposite the federal government welcomes this opportunity to work in partnership with the Quebec government for the benefit of Quebecers. The same philosophy will apply when the government is dealing with other provinces.

Atlantic Canadians are very concerned about the impact EI will have on their lives. We understand we cannot deal with Nova Scotia the same way we deal with Saskatchewan. I should know since my grandfather and my mother are from Saskatchewan. My grandfather was an MP from Saskatchewan and spoke often of its concerns. They are not the same problems, they are not the same situations as they are in Atlantic Canada.

We are all Canadians but there are different circumstances in the labour market and they call for different approaches in different parts of the country. That is the beauty of the employment benefit measures under EI. They provide for local decision making and ensure appropriate accountability in local areas. Also, they emphasize individual responsibility and self–reliance. All of these things are much needed in this area.

Media reports on this topic keep talking about cuts to UI as if that is all there is to this legislation. There is so much more. I look at this legislation as a Robin Hood response to a program badly in need of change and modernization. We are doing everything we can to maintain the benefits for those who need them most. We are helping out. We are providing a low income supplement for low income families with dependants so they will be better off in the future than they have been in the past. They will get more employment insurance than they would under the old UI system. They will get more now under this system.

We are aiming at those. It is true we are cutting from people who make $70,000 or $80,000 a year and collect UI on top of that. People in my riding have been telling us to do that for a long time. They have been saying people who make $60,000 a year cannot keep taking out $10,000 or $20,000 on top of that in UI year after year, and after only paying in a few hundred dollars. They cannot keep drawing out when they already have high incomes. They will have to learn to spread those high incomes over the full 12 months of the year. That is only fair.

People have been complaining in Atlantic Canada about that, in my riding certainly for a long time. We are hitting those people who really should not be taking UI every year, those with really high incomes. We are preserving it for those who need it most. That is a very important point. That is why I call this a kind of Robin Hood response to this problem.

The Speaker: Colleague, I think I caught you before your next sentence. That is what I wanted to do so I could take you back there right after question period. It being 2 p.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

NATIONAL SAFE DRIVING WEEK

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as mentioned yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for London East, this is National Safe Driving Week.

As chairman of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport, I am mindful that last year over 40 per cent of automobile fatalities involved a drunk driver. That startling statistic underlies the theme of this year's National Safe Driving Week, the hidden face of impaired driving.

In addition to supporting public awareness campaigns, several provinces and territories are either currently implementing mandatory rehabilitation programs and administrative licence suspensions or plan to do so in the very near future. These measures will prohibit those charged with impaired driving from operating a motor vehicle while awaiting criminal court proceedings.

Through ongoing initiatives such as National Safe Driving Week and the strategy to reduce impaired driving I am confident we will reduce the level of drunkenness, death and injury on our roads.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on October 30, the second largest Canadian carrier stopped flying from Montreal to overseas destinations. Canadian International has decided to concentrate its international operations in Toronto, thus depriving Montreal of a direct link to Rome.

It is inconceivable that a major carrier such as Canadian International could stop providing international flights from a city as big as Montreal. This situation shows how flawed the transport minister's international route allocation policy is. In fact, Air Canada offered to provide regular flights between Rome and Montreal. The minister's policy, however, prohibits designating a second carrier for this market.

Through his policy, the minister undermines Montreal's development and helps erode its traditional role as a Canadian transportation hub. The minister must stop putting Montreal at a disadvantage by changing his international route allocation policy and reviewing all routes already allocated.

DISTINCT SOCIETY MOTION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from sea to sea do not like the distinct society motion. A recent poll shows that only 37 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec support it.

Albertans rejected this notion in the Charlottetown accord. They reject any concept that promotes the inequality of citizens or provinces or gives special status to any province.

The arrogance shown by the Liberal Party during the referendum turned to panic and confusion when status quo federalism was rejected by nearly 50 per cent of Quebecers. The result is this ill–conceived motion. Surely the members opposite can see that this motion is ill–advised and it will further embitter and fracture this nation.

Why are the Liberal members from Alberta mute on this issue? Why do they not speak out on behalf of Albertans? Can they not persuade their colleagues and their leader of the miscalculation of this motion? Too much is at stake to be silent. Canadians should debate this issue fully and not get closed off in the House of Commons. No, nervous nellies in the government invoked closure and are ramming it through. They seem proud of it.

The people will speak. If they do not get a chance to speak now, they will speak later in Edmonton East at the ballot box in 1997.

TAXATION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce, Ind.): Mr. Speaker, after watching a report on Radio–Canada's program Enjeux last week, I was outraged by the extent of tax fraud in the trade of paintings and works of art.

I have a duty to urge the government to deal a major blow to tax evasion and to the tax shelters depriving federal coffers of millions of dollars in revenue.

We must axe bogus donations to museums by the wealthy and other tax shelters the average citizen cannot benefit from. What is the government waiting for to make companies availing themselves of too many tax shelters pay their taxes? And why not end GST refunds to foreign tourists who make purchases in Canada?

Those are serious ways to eliminate the deficit without hurting social programs too much.

SYMBOLS OF CANADIAN NATIONALISM

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition, who recently recognized the importance of the symbols of Canadian nationalism by supplying my office with Canadian flags. I dutifully handed these out to hundreds of our citizens in Christmas parades across Durham. I can assure the member that the deep expression of love for our country and each other was reflected on the faces and in the hearts of all of these communities.

There are other symbols we should change in order to reflect the reality of all the people of Canada as we approach the 21st century. Our currency should reflect the true Canadian traditions rather than foreign monarchs. The head of our state should be truly elected by Canadians for Canadians. Finally, here and across the land, when people take the oath of office or oath of citizenship they should swear allegiance to our great nation.

HMCS CALGARY

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, late Friday 29 Romanians and one Greek man were plucked from the stormy seas of the North Atlantic by Master Corporal Rob Fisher from Greenwood, Nova Scotia.

HMCS Calgary and a Sea King helicopter were on their way back to British Columbia from the Persian Gulf when they responded to the sinking of the Mount Olympus, racing 900 kilometres in 18 hours to reach the sinking carrier. Amid frightful conditions, Master Corporal Fisher spent four hours pulling the crew members from the sinking ship to safety.

I know all hon. members will join me in thanking the crew of the HMCS Calgary and particularly Master Corporal Fisher for their heroic efforts, the kinds of efforts we have come to expect from the men and women who serve Canada with dedication and distinction.

THE LATE PHIL GIVENS

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to praise the late Phil Givens, who passed away last Thursday in Toronto at the age of 73.

Mr. Givens personified public service. He served the people of Toronto first as councillor and then as mayor from 1963 to 1966. He served the people of Canada as an MP from 1968 to 1972 and the people of Ontario as an MPP from 1972 to 1977. Appointed to the Metro Toronto Police Commission in 1977, he became its chairman, serving until 1985. Most recently, he served as a provincial court judge. His was truly a life devoted to serving the community.

Phil was also a man of culture. He will always be remembered as the driving force behind bringing Henry Moore's sculpture "The Archer" to Toronto's Nathan Phillips Square. That bold initiative contributed to Henry Moore's later extraordinary gift of sculpture to the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Phil touched many people's lives and will be sorely missed. He is an example to all Canadians. I am sure members of the House will join with me in sending our condolences to his wife Min and his family.

MEMBER FOR BROME—MISSISQUOI

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to the December 2 issue of the newspaper La voix de l'Est, the federal member of Parliament for Brome—Missisquoi made representations to have CIDA grant close to half a million dollars to a group of individuals including a good friend of his for an eight–month business trip to Hungary.

We also learned that this good friend, Daniel Barbeau, was selected as one of the eight lawyers who will participate in the project by one of the minister's associates in his Bedford law firm, who sat on the selection committee.

Assuming this information is true, how did the member for Brome—Missisquoi manage, given the current budget situation, to help his friends benefit from such a sweet grant?

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, when making statements, members must avoid impugning motives, as is also the rule when asking questions in the House. I recognize the member for Calgary North.

TRANS–LABRADOR HIGHWAY

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the so–called Trans–Labrador Highway is a 500–kilometre stretch of gravel road running from Labrador City to Churchill Falls to Goose Bay. For half that distance the road is only good enough to allow travel at 70 to 80 kilometres an hour. The rest of it is almost impassable.

For years the people of Labrador have fought with one government after another, demanding what most Canadians take for granted: a decent, passable road between major centres.

Imagine the earful I got from Labradorians as Reform's Atlantic issues critic when they picked up Saturday's newspaper and saw the Prime Minister opening a stretch of road in West Africa built with Canadian money.

Labradorians deserve to know how this Liberal government can spend millions of dollars in Africa when our own citizens go begging for one decent road between Goose Bay and Labrador City.

MEDICARE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, today I was glad to join with the Moderator of the United Church, Dr. Marion Best, and the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce in supporting the drive by CAW retirees and the Congress of Union retirees to save medicare.

We played a take–off on the TV game of Jeopardy, answering questions about health care in Canada. At the end we were presented a T–shirt with a caricature of the Prime Minister on it dubbed "Medicare Nightmare".

The Liberals are slowly starving medicare and with it the ability to maintain or enforce national standards. They have reneged on the commitment to repeal Bill C–91 and do something about the spiralling cost of drugs and what those costs are doing to our health care system.

The NDP congratulates the Canadian Health Coalition and the CAW retirees and the Congress of Union retirees for the creative way in which they have sought to educate the public and the Liberals about the threat federal cutbacks are posing to medicare.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, approximately one woman is killed by a weapon in Canada every six days. She is often killed in a private home. She is often killed by someone she knows. If she is killed by her partner, chances are she has been killed with a gun.

The victims of violence are often those who suffer in silence. They are our mothers, our sisters, our daughters, and our partners.

The national day of remembrance and action on violence against women is very important. It is a day for us to remember the victims of violence, those who suffer from abuse or from the loss of a loved one who has been taken from them. It is also a day of action. It is a day to promote the rights of victims, victim impact statements, the family violence initiative, more effective peace bonds, harsher sentences for offenders. These are initiatives to empower the victims of violence.

We must also continue to work locally in our neighbourhoods and communities to promote awareness and openness in helping the victims of violence. Working together, we can make our communities a safer place.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the sixth anniversary of the Montreal massacre.

At the Women's World Conference in Beijing, it was agreed that violence against women is not a private issue and that states must exercise due diligence to make sure violence does not occur in the home or elsewhere. At the same conference, Canada introduced and passed a motion that reaffirms rape as a war crime, a crime against humanity. It introduces rape as an act of genocide.

Advances are being made, but there is still much to do, still many barriers to cross, still more awareness to raise, and unfortunately more shelters to keep open.

It is with the memory of the 14 women killed in Montreal on December 6 that we continue to pursue a just society and a better tomorrow.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the strong opposition of all Quebec stakeholders in the labour market, the Minister of Human Resources Development is going ahead with his bill, which, in his own words, seeks to decentralize manpower training to individuals rather than to the provinces.

It is obvious to all Quebec stakeholders that this so–called decentralization is only a farce and does not in any way follow up on the Quebec consensus regarding this issue. On the contrary, it is clear that the minister's project is aimed at allowing Ottawa to keep control over its programs, while trying to make us believe that a decentralization is taking place. Once again, this government is acting in bad faith and is showing contempt for the provinces. Moreover, it shows that is still has not understood the meaning of the results of the October 30 referendum.

BALKANS

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the foreign affairs minister is so hard–working and dedicated to his job it is scary.

Do members remember yesterday when the government promised it would carefully listen to everything the opposition had to say before it made a final decision on the Bosnia mission? Well, the debate went on until nine last night, which is three in the morning in Brussels, where the Minister of Foreign Affairs is. The fact that he was able to stay up watching the debate that late is great. Then he worked the rest of the night away to fully incorporate the opposition's ideas into the final Canadian plan he agreed to this morning.

It is simply amazing. After staying up all night, this hard–working minister was able to put the final stamp of approval on the Bosnia mission first thing this morning, and all this with the comforting knowledge that he had taken fully into account all the views expressed here yesterday. I never would have believed it could be done. But since the government always tells the truth, it must have been what happened. Right, Mr. Speaker?

ROYAL ARMS OF CANADA

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure I draw the attention of the House of Commons to the recent improvements to the Canadian Coat of Arms. These improvements highlight the motto of the Order of Canada, our country's highest honour. Interestingly, they were proposed by a member of the press gallery, Bruce Hicks, over a decade ago. The motto, "To build a better country", is something every member of the House should be trying to do.

In 1987 the Queen approved this change for limited use in Canada. Everyone who has been to Rideau Hall will have seen this new coat of arms in the stained glass window near the entrance. Last year the Queen authorized its general use and slowly it is being introduced so as to not cost the taxpayers any money.

Last year I sent a copy of these arms in electronic format to every MP and encouraged them to start using them on their letterhead and publications when they reorder. The Minister of Canadian Heritage drew attention to it last month when he unveiled the latest edition of symbols of Canada.

As Canadians, we do not wave our flag, but I am proud of my country and its symbols. I applaud the governor general for this change.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this morning, the daily La Presse mentions that the Quebec government is prepared to initiate formal discussions with Ottawa on the transfer of federal funds earmarked for manpower training. This is good news, particularly since the Quebec employment minister herself, Louise Harel, asked that a meeting be held as quickly as possible to discuss the issue.

This development seems very encouraging. I do hope that it reflects the will of the PQ government to finally recognize the choice made by Quebecers in the referendum, as well as its willingness to turn the page and co–operate with the federal government to promote Quebec's well–being and prosperity.

• (1415)

Provided these discussion are conducted in good faith and in a spirit of goodwill, I am convinced that good things will result, both for the workers and the unemployed.

BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec daily newspapers were reporting this morning that the next leader of the Bloc Quebecois will be an acting leader and that only the party's general council members will be voting in the election.

How do you like that, a leader who will be there only on a temporary basis, a leader selected by members of the party's establishment, themselves appointed by the retiring leader before he accedes to the throne in Quebec? As a result, party members who militated in good faith find themselves excluded from a process as fundamental as the selection of a new leader, with a leader who is leaving but at the same time wants to keep on controlling what happens in his Ottawa branch.

The Bloc Quebecois has not stood the test of time, and this prearranged exercise in democracy does not bode well for Quebec when the new king finally accedes to the throne.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Quebec National Assembly unanimously reaffirmed the consensus to the effect that Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower and occupational training. To do so, the Government of Quebec must regain control over the management of employment and manpower services, with fair financial compensation and no strings attached.

Given that the National Assembly has instructed the Quebec government to undertake formal discussions with Ottawa to ensure the respect of this consensus, does the Minister of Human Resources Development intend to fall into step and discuss with his Quebec counterpart the unconditional transfer of responsibilities for providing services and setting standards in the area of manpower, along with the related funds and fiscal resources?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Quebec government accepted the amendment proposed by the opposition Liberals recommending that the Quebec government sit down and undertake a serious negotiation. That is a very good step which I think demonstrates there can be some openness in terms of pursuing these very important matters of how we can redefine the roles and responsibilities. I certainly will be approaching those discussions with a very open mind about the kinds of interests and the ways in which we can deal with the problem.

We have been in contact with Madam Harel's office. We hope to be able to organize the meetings as soon as possible and as soon as we can fully look at all the respective programs that are being considered in light of the statement and conditions set forward last week by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the National Assembly's resolution clearly reaffirmed the consensus reached in Quebec that manpower issues should unconditionally come under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government, as prescribed by the Constitution.

Are we to understand from the minister's answer that he is prepared to conduct discussions with the Quebec government about Ottawa's withdrawing, unconditionally and without federal standards, from the area of manpower and transferring related resources to Quebec, as requested in the resolution passed unanimously by the Quebec government and the Liberal opposition? Everyone agrees in Quebec. Does the minister really intend to do so?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was already made very clear in the Prime Minister's statement of well over a week ago that the federal government will withdraw from the area of manpower training. We have made that very explicit. We have also followed that up with the legislation which was tabled on Friday. It will oblige the federal government to work in concert with the provinces in detailing those kinds of relationships. We made it very clear that there would be no training voucher of any kind without the consent of the provinces. We will be sitting down with the provinces to work out a clear harmonization of programs where it is required. It can develop beyond that.

• (1420)

What is important, which the hon. member should applaud, is that for the first time since the Quebec government was elected well over a year ago there has been a major change in its position. It is now willing to sit down under the present Constitution to talk about how we can establish a partnership to help people get back to work.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that not only the minister, but all those watching these proceedings and all members of this House understand our concern. The Government of Quebec was taken for a ride so often by the people opposite that we have become extra careful. We want to know if this is going to take place under optimal conditions.

I would like the minister to be unequivocal. Will he agree, as suggested by the Quebec government at the request of the Quebec National Assembly, Liberals included, to discuss with the Quebec employment minister the possibility of repatriating to Quebec responsibilities pertaining to manpower without letting the threat of national standards hang over our heads as he has in the past? Is he prepared to make a commitment to achieve results along the lines of the consensus expressed by the Quebec National Assembly? I think that the question is clear enough to deserve a clear answer.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I gave a very clear answer to the previous question. We have already stated clearly in the House and we have entrenched it in the proposed legislation, which I hope the hon. member will vote for as he is so interested, that we recognize and accept the full jurisdictional competence of the provinces in the area of training. There is nothing ambiguous about that. It is perfectly clear.

Now we have to work out the basic rules so that we can apply all the programs. We have to ensure that the clients of our insurance program who paid premiums to get benefits will be assured of receiving those benefits. It is as simple as that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since Friday, the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Labour have been repeating that the federal government will not use the unemployment insurance fund surplus to reduce its deficit, but will instead put it into a separate reserve fund. Need I remind the Minister of Finance that, in his 1995 budget, pages 89 and 94, he took those surpluses into account in calculating the revenues and expenditures of the federal government?

Are we to conclude from the statements by the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Labour that the Minister of Finance has decided to set up an unemployment insurance reserve fund and to give up on his plan to apply UI surpluses to the federal government's revenues and expenditures?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. member by simply repeating what we said yesterday.

During the course of our extensive public discussions we received a number of recommendations, including recommendations from the trade union movement in Quebec, that we establish a reserve fund to stabilize premiums. In that way we could prevent the kind of drastic economic downturn which occurred in the early nineties when, because there had been no reserves set aside, the recession was worsened by the previous government's necessity to substantially jack up premiums.

That was recommended by the trade unions in Quebec. It was recommended by business groups and by the general public. It is good, prudent economics to set aside a reserve fund so we will not have the additional costs faced in 1992 which would make a downturn worse than it would be otherwise.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this was an important question concerning the Minister of Finance's budget, yet it is the Minister of Human Resources Development answering—everything is topsy-turvy. I shall repeat the question.

It is clearly set out in his budget, as in the federal government's financial report, that the annual activities of the unemployment insurance program have a direct impact on the deficit and the net indebtedness of the federal government.

• (1425)

Under these circumstances, is it or is it not true that the federal government intends to set up a reserve fund. If so, will the Minister of Finance admit that his deficit forecasts based on using the UI surplus will be struck a fatal blow by the creation of this reserve fund?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me answer the member directly as to how it does affect the deficit not just of the government but of the people of Canada.

Because of the failure of the previous government to set up a reserve fund in order to stabilize premiums, the interest charged against the UI account between 1992 and 1993 amounted to $1 billion which had to be paid by workers against the premiums. That is what members of the Bloc Quebecois are now recommending, that we put additional burdens on workers because they will not support the establishment of a reserve fund.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to some provinces, the government's attitude is now we see them and now we don't.

The federal government has been utterly indifferent to B.C.'s concerns on aboriginal issues and the mismanagement of the salmon fishery, and the Prime Minister's constitutional veto scheme ignores British Columbia completely. About the only time the government recognizes B.C. or Alberta is when it comes time to extract money. These western provinces are becoming increasingly alienated from Ottawa. That alienation will deepen when the human resources minister withholds $47 million from B.C. for introducing residency requirements for welfare.

What does the human resources minister really expect to accomplish by fining British Columbia for attempting to manage its welfare rolls more effectively?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is a very surprising question coming from the leader of the third party whose members stand up every day and demand that we ensure that individuals live up to the law.

The British Columbia government has broken the law. If I understand the leader of the third party, he is saying that it is okay for the provinces to break the law but it is not okay for individuals. We believe the law applies to everybody whether they are a provincial government or an individual.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the law is not the issue. If the provinces could fine the federal government for every commitment it has broken, they could pay off their deficits.

The real issue here is the government's Neanderthal approach to federal–provincial relations. The government talks about ushering in a new era of flexible federalism. The reality is that a bankrupt federal government is attempting to use fines and threats to control provincial areas of jurisdiction.

The human resources minister attaches strings to manpower training funding and imposes fines on British Columbia. The Minister of Health does exactly the same things to Alberta.

Is this really the government's vision of federalism, federalism with strings attached, red tape federalism, federalism by threats, federalism by fines?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. leader of the third party is looking in a mirror. That is his version of federalism. I will tell you what we see. We see a federalism which allows and enables Canadians to move freely throughout this country to search for work and to exercise the right of mobility.

It is very interesting that in its proposal the Reform Party says there should be a free movement of goods and a free movement of services, but apparently in the lexicon of the Reform Party there can be no free movement of people. The real problem is to defend the right of Canadians to move freely about this country.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government imposes fines on British Columbia and Alberta to impose its outmoded view of federalism. It dismisses fundamental objections to its ill–conceived Quebec package from western provinces out of hand.

All of this undermines rather than strengthens national unity. In its misguided attempt to appease Quebec separatists, in its ham–fisted approach to retaining federal control in areas of provincial jurisdiction, the government runs the risk of pushing provinces like British Columbia and Alberta out the back door.

• (1430)

Does the Minister of Human Resources Development realize that his steadfast resistance to real decentralization is as great a threat to the national unity of the country as the efforts of Quebec separatists?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the real threats to Canada is the balkanized, fragmented, mean–minded attitude expressed by the leader of the Reform Party. That is the real danger to the federalism of the country.

If he knew his facts, which he does not, he would recognize that we put in place last year a new transfer payment that would give the provinces brand new flexibility in making choices and the provincial premiers could set up a process to begin discussing it.

The ministers of British Columbia were a full part of it but refused to bring their concerns in front of the provincial body where those decisions could be made. They acted unilaterally without any discussion with ourselves or the other provinces. They took an action which broke the law.

We went out there three weeks ago to say let us find a solution, let us negotiate, let us find a partnership. There was absolutely no support from this gentleman or his party for the kind of federalism which must be based upon partnership and co–operation, not the kind of fragmentation this gentleman represents.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In his reform, the minister takes advantage of the conversion of weeks worked into hours worked to further reduce eligibility for benefits as well as their duration. The current eligibility requirement is between 180 and 300 hours of work, but this figure will be between 420 and 700 hours in the future.

Does the minister admit that, by increasing the number of hours required to qualify for benefits twofold, if not more, in both high unemployment regions and others, he will exclude thousands of unemployed people from the plan, women and young people in particular, who will then have to turn to welfare?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one reason for moving to an hours based system, which is quite a fundamental reform, was to ensure that we would give full credit to all the work that was done.

For example, in many high unemployment areas where there is a lot of seasonal work, many workers put in long hours, 40 or 50 hour weeks, for which they get no credit. They get exactly the same credit as somebody who works 20 or 25 hours.

As a result of this major changeover, many of those who are in seasonal work and work very long hours for very short periods can establish their eligibility sooner and receive benefits longer. A quarter of a million Canadian workers who presently pay into the system would be able to have a longer term of benefits than they do now because of the hours based system.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the bulk of part time and term employees are young people, women, or new workers. These are the ones who will be affected by the minister's reform.

• (1435)

Does the Minister acknowledge that, by requiring 35 hours of work instead of 15 to qualify for a week of benefits, he is greatly reducing the benefit period of part time workers, most of whom are young people or women? Seventy per cent of part time workers are women and 40 per cent are young people.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again I ask the hon. member to look at the package in its entirety.

One of the most important changes we have made is to break what has been commonly known as the glass ceiling. That was a very strong recommendation made during the public hearings. That is the rule whereby 15 hours is the dividing line on which eligibility is established.

Many employers across the country establish an artificial barrier, giving work only up to the 15–hour level so they would not have to pay premiums and give people eligibility. As a result a lot of people were denied work and, more important, were denied the opportunity to have the security of the program, to have access to maternity benefits and to have access to the re–employment measures.

We have broken that glass barrier and we will now allow the work to take its natural course. Therefore people will get more hours than they can under the present artificial barrier.

At the same time for part time workers we are establishing a major premium rebate. Close to 1.3 million of the present 2.2 million part time workers who now pay into the system, something the Reform Party has not quite understood yet, will be eligible for a refund of all the premiums to ensure basic balance and equity in the system.

ROYAL ARMS OF CANADA

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada has pronounced in a press release:

> Canada has a new coat of arms which will be distributed this week to MPs and schools across the country. . . The new coat of arms will appear on all money, passports, government buildings and rank badges in the Canadian Armed Forces. As a French Canadian, I always thought the coat of arms we had been using was too closely associated with the British. These new arms are an important change in our evolution as a country.

You bet they are, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Minister of Canadian Heritage if this is for real. If so, why did the Canadian public not even have a say on it?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the coat of arms was approved by the Queen in 1987. I am always prepared to have great parties to celebrate events but this one would be a little late.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the press release says that the Canadian coat of arms proposed by Bruce Hicks of the press gallery was approved by Queen Elizabeth on July 12, 1994, not 1987.

The point is that this issue has not even come before Parliament; it has not even come before the people of Canada.

My question is about symbols. These symbols do not belong to the Liberal government; they belong to the people of the country. If this is real, why has Parliament not even discussed it?

We have seen closure on the distinct society motion. We have seen closure on constitutional vetoes. Why are we now seeing closure on this issue?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could make a brief correction on dates. The date I gave is correct. That was when the coat of arms was approved. What happened more recently was that the Queen decided it could be distributed all over Canada. That is the difference in dates.

As to the authority, we should remember that the coat of arms is under the authority of the Governor General of Canada. If the opposition or the second party in the opposition wants to have a great debate, it can always use opposition days.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

With his reforms, the minister has taken the first step towards establishing an employment insurance system that discriminates against seasonal workers, whose benefits will be reduced depending on the number of weeks they were on unemployment insurance in the past.

Will the minister acknowledge that this is a complete contradiction of the recommendations of his task force on seasonal employment and of his own commitments, in that he is creating a two–tier system in which seasonal workers will be treated like second—class unemployed workers?

• (1440)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first we should put this matter in context. Just over a decade ago about 15 per cent of UI claimants were those who used the system on a regular basis. Today that number is well over 40 per cent. There has been an incredible expansion or explosion. That was one of the reasons the cost of the system had gone from $8 billion to $17 billion when we inherited it in 1993.

As the hon. member should know, the system was no longer being used to assist people who are unemployed or to enable people to get back to work. It was being used increasingly as a form of supplement to wage packages by a wide variety of industries.

A very strong recommendation came out of the public hearings that were held. The seasonal workers report established that it did not agree with the notion of a two–tier system. It talked about a graduated response that would apply the principles of experience rating. As with any insurance policy, a different premium level is applied the more we use it. That is the kind of principle we have applied here.

It is a very modest one. It is there to provide a certain deterrent to increased use. It is not discriminatory. It is simply to recognize and evaluate the very serious cost of the program as a result of the incredible expansion in use over the past 10 years.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, seasonal workers are honest users of the system and are only guilty of supporting the seasonal economy in the regions.

Will the minister acknowledge that regions whose economy depends largely on forestry, the fisheries and tourism, as is the case in eastern Quebec and eastern Canada, will be among the principal victims of his reforms and that they will become second–class regions with second–class unemployed workers?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member did not listen to the previous answer.

However, a quarter of a million workers in seasonal industries will be able to receive benefits for a longer period of time. If we add up the actual dollars, it will be more dollars because of the hours based system. The shift to the hours based system means that for the first time full credit or full value is given for the full work they do. That is what workers want. They want to be given full credit for the amount of time put in and not have a bunch of artificial formulas applied to them.

That is what we have done. Every dollar and every hour now count toward credit in the new employment insurance system.

ROYAL ARMS OF CANADA

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada issued a press release today detailing proposed changes to the coat of arms. We spent the morning trying to figure out what exactly he was talking about. I must say that it reads like something out of a LeCarré novel.

The Prime Minister's office does not know anything about the change. The Liberal whip's office said it must be a mistake. The Privy Council office seems to be completely in the dark.

We would like to know what all the secrecy is about. Why is this change being introduced now? Why does not anyone on that side of the House seem to know anything about it?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, changes in the coat of arms are not unusual. They have taken place over the years. We witness now, somewhat belatedly, another change.

If the member wants to make a great show of it, I would suggest he go outside and ride on the back of the unicorn.

• (1445)

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow such a class act as this low life minister.

Some hon. members: Oh. Oh.

The Speaker: Colleagues, as much as possible we should refrain from personal attacks. I ask all hon. members to be very judicious in their choice of words.

I return to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and ask him to put his question.

Mr. Strahl: Mr. Speaker, the government's arrogance typified in that answer seems to know no bounds. First it uses the old Mulroney tactics of ramming through constitutional vetoes and distinct society status when the Canadian people have not been consulted. Now it wants to change the Canadian Coat of Arms, waiting for a convenient moment when it thinks it can sneak it through Parliament past our eyes.

Why is the government now sneaking through these changes to the Canadian Coat of Arms and why is it changing the fundamental symbols of the country at a time when we are trying to keep it tied together?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I explained these changes were made in 1987. We are not currently doing anything. We are printing booklets giving the symbols of Canada all across Canada.

One reason, as I understand it, the coat of arms was changed in 1987 was to add "to build a better country". If this is irrelevant today, I profoundly disagree. Our colleagues should work for a better country, but they do not.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

As we know now, the minister's reforms will triple the number of hours required to be eligible for unemployment insurance for the first time, from 300 to 910 hours. In so doing, the minister penalizes thousands of young people who are trying very hard to enter the labour market as well as thousands of women who want to go back to work, because they will need more than six months of full time work to qualify.

Will the minister admit that all workers who lose their jobs and apply for unemployment insurance for the first time after having worked less than 18 hours a week for one year will not be eligible for benefits even if they paid premiums during that time?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting that the question cited as reference the report of seasonal workers. That same report recommended strongly that there be stronger eligibility requirements for young people because it was noticed that many young people were simply using a minimum amount of work to get into the system and therefore becoming dependent on cycles year after year.

Our response has been very clearly twofold. First, we have shifted, as the hon. member should know, to a much stronger series of measures to help people, including young people, get back in the job market quickly and effectively.

Second, we have increased our budget for youth employment by 15 per cent this year. In the first year of operation of a youth internship we already have 25,000 young people working in business to make that transition. Our belief is to use positive, active measures to help our young people get into the workforce.

Furthermore, there is one important thing the hon member should know but does not. We are extending those active measures to people who have paid into the new employment insurance system for a period of three years. All those employment measures are available even to those who have exhausted their claims. They will now have the benefit of our employment measures.

• (1450)

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is really too bad that the Minister of Human Resources Development considers unemployment insurance as a drug.

I would like to ask a question from a different perspective. Does the minister agree that individuals who work less than 490 hours annually will never be eligible for unemployment insurance although they have to pay premiums, which has not been the case so far?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has totally and completely misunderstood the major fundamental thrust.

This has been debated for many years. We have finally said the old system which purely provided benefits was not sufficient to help people get back to work. We have shifted those resources into effective measures of employment, things like the self–employment measure, things like the development of a wage supplement to provide for small business.

We are using those measures to help people get back to work, to make up those hours because we happen to believe that everyone would rather work than simply stay on benefits. We are now giving them the means to achieve that goal.

ABORIGINAL YOUTH

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Training and Youth.

At an aboriginal youth forum I recently held in Edmonton East one of the concerns expressed was the high rate of unemployment among aboriginal youth. Participants felt it was crucial to nurture and develop the talent of our aboriginal youth.

What initiatives has the Department of Human Resources Development taken to assist urban aboriginal youth successfully enter the workplace?

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is committed to helping aboriginal youth join the workforce successfully. We are actively assisting them to help gain valuable work experience.

On October 16 Human Resources Development Canada announced the latest project, a series of 16 First Nations youth service projects. The Assembly of First Nations will work in partnership with Youth Service Canada HRD to develop youth service projects which meet the needs of these aboriginal youth.

This initiative will have a total of 240 participants and will cost approximately $2 million.

ROYAL ARMS OF CANADA

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have a rather curious turn of events here today.

Earlier last week the government in introducing this distinct society motion said it attached great importance to symbolism, even symbolic statements.

Now we have a proposed change in the Canadian coat of arms, a Canadian symbol, and the heritage minister who is supposed to be the guardian of these things dismisses it as inconsequential.

To whom does he believe this Canadian symbol belongs, to the sovereign, to the government, to some Liberal backbencher or to the people of Canada?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it certainly belongs to the people of Canada, all of us, but particular to those who believe in what is written on the coat of arms: "To build a better country".

I hope the Reform Party believes in it and will support the new coat of arms.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if it is true what the minister says, that the coat of arms belongs to the people of Canada and he is committed to building a better country, why are the people of Canada not consulted and involved in changes to the Canadian coat of arms?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people responsible for the coat of arms are the people of heraldic authority of Canada under the jurisdiction of the governor general.

That is the way the coat of arms is changed. It has been approved by the Queen. If, as I said earlier, my colleague wants to trigger a nationwide debate on the subject of the change, he would be welcome to it.

VETO

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Justice stated that the so–called veto his government is proposing to Quebec in response to the referendum commitments made by the Prime Minister belongs to Quebecers and not to the National Assembly.

My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Considering what he said yesterday, will the minister confirm that the so–called veto in Bill C–110 does not in any way belong to the government of Quebec or to the National Assembly?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–110 clearly says that before the Canadian government authorizes an amendment to the Constitution, it will need the consent of a majority of the provinces that includes Ontario, Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and the Western provinces. We said clearly in this bill that what we need is the consent of the provinces.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Justice agree that the wording of Bill C–110 is such that the federal government is free to circumvent the Quebec National Assembly and, for instance, call a federal referendum in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the important thing to bear in mind is nothing in Bill C–110 changes the formula for amending the Constitution, as set out in part V of the Constitution Act of 1982. What is required under section 38, as the hon. member well knows, is the agreement of seven of the ten provinces expressed by resolutions passed by their legislative assemblies. That is what is required before a constitutional amendment can take place.

All Bill C–110 provides is that before the Canadian government will participate in such a change, and after seven legislative assemblies have expressed their agreement, it will determine the consent of the provinces to the extent of the majority as described in the bill.

What constitutes consent could very well be the legislative assemblies' statement. It could be an expression of support by the government of the province or it could be expressed directly by the people. That flexibility is one of the real advantages of the legislation.

ROYAL ARMS OF CANADA

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the debate surrounding the change to our flag was one of the most emotional, controversial and moving in Canadian history. It gave all Canadians an opportunity to participate in the development of the symbols of the country.

We are now told our new coat of arms is ready for distribution late this week. How did this happen in such a state of secrecy? I remind the Minister of Canadian Heritage the press release carried an embargo until 10 a.m., December 4, 1995.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a serious question. Although it is on short notice I will try to present her and the House with some information I just received.

I have in my hand a booklet entitled "Symbols of Canada", published by the Department of Canadian Heritage. On page 5, under the heading "Armorial Bearings", which I understand is another term for coat of arms, it states:

> Adopted: By proclamation of King George V on November 21, 1921. On the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen approved, on July 12, 1994, that the Royal Arms of Canada be augmented of a ribbon with the motto of the Order of Canada, desiderantes meliorem patriam——they desire a better country.

I hope my hon. friend also desires a better country.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, of course I absolutely do want to see all of us build a better Canada, a better future. However, the issue here concerns the embargo until yesterday, December 4, 1995, and that part of my question was not addressed.

• (1500)

If the House of Commons represents a place for all Canadians to come and debate through our membership, I would like to know why we did not have a broad debate in the House of Commons to discuss this very basic simple issue.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it—I will be corrected if I am wrong—this booklet I have was distributed to all members of Parliament and to the public. It was distributed some time ago. It is hardly a secret.

As far as I am aware, while there has been a debate and vote in the House on the Canadian flag and a debate and vote in the House on our national anthem, the matter of the armorial bearings of Canada has been something for decision of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada and not for the House of Commons. I see nothing to criticize the government over the actions of Her Majesty the Queen.

CUSTOMS

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Seniors have come into my office complaining about the long line–ups at customs as they return home for the holidays. By the time they reach customs they are quite tired from their flights. Can the minister tell the House what he is doing to ensure that seniors and other travellers can move through customs without having to stand in long line–ups?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that Canada Customs is fully prepared to provide extra services at the border during this holiday season. There is an increase in traffic at this time. A large proportion of the 110 million people who come into Canada come at that time.

Our job is to provide, through extra shifts, part–time workers, and some student customs officers, the best possible service at this time. In addition, this year we will also have at our busiest airports special client service representatives to assist those who may be in trouble.

I think we should recognize that the customs service of Canada is probably the best in the world. They work very hard and long hours during the holiday season protecting this country against illegal weapons, drugs, and other such things. I hope the House will recognize the important work they do, particularly at this time of year.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The last government walked away from the unemployment insurance fund and this government has done nothing to bring itself closer. Would the minister tell us why he thinks he has the moral authority to take another $1 billion out of the pockets of unemployed Canadians on top of the $7 billion he took out last year to use to pay down the deficit, which those people made no contribution in creating?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been through this territory several times, but I would be quite happy to try to repeat it for the understanding of the hon. member.

First, the proposed changes are designed specifically to help create jobs in this country. A large part of that amount goes to re–employment measures, which will enable people to get back to work. The remaining portion goes to help establish a fund to stabilize the premiums.

The hon. member was in this House during the 1990s. He knew what happened when the previous government had to raise the premiums by 95 cents over a period of two years. It threw the market into total havoc. It drove down the economy. It put an extra burden on workers. It destroyed jobs.

One thing about us compared to New Democrats is that we learn from history and we are not going to repeat that mistake again.

The Speaker: Colleagues, this would bring to a close the question period.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

• (1505)

[English]

The Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

December 5, 1995

Mr. Speaker

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable John Charles Major, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 5th day of December 1995, at 4.55 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

Your sincerely,

Anthony P. Smyth,
Deputy Secretary, Policy, Program and Protocol

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

The Speaker: My colleague, I am informed that you have two minutes remaining in your speech. This will be followed by a five–minute question and comment period. I understand you are sharing your time with another hon. member. Is that correct?

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my wife is often astonished at how quickly and how frequently the schedule changes for a parliamentarian. This is an example of that. When I rose to speak an hour ago I said I would speaking for the full 20 minutes and now it is 10 minutes. I happy to comply and adjust my schedule again.

Before question period I was saying that the bill was a Robin Hood response to the problem we have with the UI system. In 1983 the UI system cost $9 billion to employers and employees across Canada. Today it costs $17 billion. The growth in the cost of this program has represented a tax on jobs in Canada and we have to deal with it.

People in my riding tell me that it has been misused in many ways and it is time to deal with it. How do we deal with it and why am I calling it a Robin Hood response? We are dealing with this problem of reducing the cost of the program by reducing benefits for the well off who have been breaking the system for a while and increasing benefits to the poor. The low income people who have dependants will get up to 80 per cent, rather than 55 per cent of their previous income under this system. It is an important step forward and we are maintaining the program as much as possible in a very solid way for those in the middle. That is a very important point.

I want to mention the issue of involuntary part–time workers. I have been involved in the food bank movement in the Halifax area, as people in my riding would know. One thing we always complained about for low income people is the growing number of people who have to work part time because they could not find full time work. One reason for that has been the incentive provided in part by the UI system to employers to only hire part time workers, who would work less than 15 hours a week so they would not have to pay these UI benefits, for example.

By moving to an hourly based system where every hour counts and every hour has premiums paid on it, it means that people who are working part time will qualify for UI and the incentive for employers to hire only part time will no longer be there. These are important and positive points about this employment insurance program.

I urge all members of the House to vote against this Bloc motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the member for Halifax West. I was surprised, because he is from one of the Atlantic provinces, that he had no criticism of the unemployment insurance reform. His is one of the regions that will be affected most in Canada following the unemployment insurance reform. The member sees only positive effects, but his region will surely suffer negative and disastrous consequences.

I come from Latin America, and sometimes representatives of the International Monetary Fund, who travel throughout Latin America, tell governments that they must make cuts, reduce salaries or terminate unemployment insurance or social security programs. From what we see here in Canada, it looks like policy is being dictated by the International Monetary Fund or the OECD.

I would like to know the member's opinion. What does he think of the negative consequences of the system set up by the Minister of Human Resources Development for the Atlantic region, which will be hit just as hard as Quebec and other regions in Canada?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, they are incredible. The Bloc members are unable to see the benefits of these changes to the system. They fail to see the problems with the old unemployment insurance system.

Yes, I come from one of the Atlantic provinces. But, in these provinces, in my region, many people recognize that the old unemployment insurance program needed to be changed, renewed.

[English]

The hon. member speaks about my region being hard hit by these changes. The member should examine the proposals a little more carefully and see exactly what is happening. The fact is 45,000 more seasonal workers in Atlantic Canada will have access to employment insurance because of these changes.

Yes, there will be a reduction in the overall amount being spent, but we are focusing it much better toward the creation of employment, toward employment assistance programs, toward training programs, toward important things that are required to move this system away from unemployment insurance to insurance of employment, which is what it is all about.

In the year 1997–98 there will be a total net decrease of about six per cent. By the year 2001 the total decrease in the whole impact of the program will be about seven per cent. Considering that the cost of the program has gone from $9 billion 12 years ago to $17 billion today, it should not be surprising that we need to have some changes to this program. The fact that the total impact over the next five or six years will only be seven per cent total for this region should tell the hon. member something. We have done this by making sure that those who need it the most still have it. This means it will work well in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, studies have shown that the utilization of unemployment insurance benefits is very hard to forecast. The reason is that institutions tend to exploit the opportunities. For example, we know institutions developed in Atlantic Canada that allowed workers to work for exactly 12 weeks in order to qualify for benefits and then the next batch came in to work for 12 weeks. This is how the cost increased.

I wonder whether the Department of Human Resources Development has looked at the possibility of similar institutional developments coming forward in the context of now making part time workers eligible.

• (1515)

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the department has examined many aspects of the bill. There will also be an ongoing monitoring process by the Employment Insurance Commission.

The Reform Party has been saying that we should make it much more like an ordinary insurance system, maybe even make it a totally privatized system. This shows me that Reform Party members are not responsive to the concerns of Atlantic Canada, that they do not care one iota, not one ounce, not even a smidgen about the people in Atlantic Canada. Otherwise they would not hold that position.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what counts for Canadians is jobs, and that is what counts for the government as well. This is also the fundamental objective of the bill on employment insurance, which the opposition motion is so wrongly criticizing.

The bill does more than protect the incomes of the unemployed. It is based on the principle that we must more actively help people find work. And it is based on the requirements of a modern economy. Another question, however, is central to the debate. The employment insurance bill announces a completely new way to view the role of the provinces in the labour market. This goes to show how flexible this government has been in the past and will continue to be in federal–provincial matters.

A closer look had to be taken at job creation and preservation. Serious thought had to be given at how to combine our efforts with those of the provinces. This involves understanding jurisdictional problems and finding solutions.

We take into account the fact that the provinces are responsible for education and job training. We accept the point of view held by many in Quebec and elsewhere, that the federal government should not get involved in job training. We acknowledge that the federal government should not get involved in activities that might alter provincial priorities in the area of job training.

[English]

Last Friday the Minister of Human Resources Development restated that commitment. He went further. He outlined how the new employment benefits under employment insurance would assist in getting Canadians back to work. Needless to say, they will be much more respectful of provincial responsibilities in this area.

[Translation]

Quebec provides an excellent example of this sort of active approach with the collective organizations and partnerships such as the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre.

[English]

The employment insurance bill provides for a new balance to federalism. This is what we see in employment benefits. It is based on an answer to a very important question: would a new set of roles and arrangements between the federal and provincial governments do a better job of getting Canadians back to work and would it do that more efficiently?

The answer to this question is yes. And now is the time to say yes. Quebec is the forum where this answer has to be given. We will no longer be buying training courses from public or private institutions. We will withdraw from apprenticeship, co–op and on–job training programs. These measures are in keeping with the consensus in Quebec.

However, while the federal government no longer intends to play a role in manpower training, it does intend to continue its role in helping the unemployed return to work. The new employment benefits will represent an investment in people. We want to spend this money so effectively that our clients will never need us again. We want to spend this money on, to devote it to activities that will ensure the best results.

Wage subsidies, for example, will help employment insurance clients find work, and we are talking here primarily about people such as those with a disability, who have a harder time of it.

• (1520)

Income supplements will help employment insurance clients find work; most of these people may need short term financial assistance.

Job creation partnerships will help create new jobs for employment insurance clients.

The five measures we have just mentioned are not programs; rather, they outline the types of needs on which we have decided to focus our efforts.

We are reaching out to Quebec and we are ready to work with its employment development programs and tools.

Through the strategic initiatives program, the federal government already supports two Quebec programs that should allow all of Canada to learn important lessons on the labour market. Federal support for PWA will help over 25,000 families throughout Quebec benefit from this important program every year.

As my hon. colleagues may know, PWA provides wage assistance to low income families. Parents benefit, of course, but so do tens of thousands of children, who can then grow up in families who are proud of their work.

[English]

The results will be clients who are better off with a simple process. That is a basic reason why we are insisting our programs be harmonized with provincial ones.

By reinvesting insurance savings, we will spend more on helping these Canadians. Expenditures will rise from $1.9 billion to $2.7 billion. This money will be spent on concrete measures that will make it possible for Quebecers and Canadians to find work.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to sum up these various arguments. Our government has said that it would withdraw from job training, and it is. We are going to focus our efforts on effective measures that have a tangible impact. We have made a commitment to harmonize efforts and to strike partnerships so that we can provide real benefits for our clients and for the future of employment insurance.

As part of this employment insurance proposal, we invite the provincial governments to collaborate with us in designing and distributing employment benefits.

I was therefore delighted to see that the Quebec government has taken an important step toward an agreement. When the Quebec National Assembly voted in favour of the Liberal amendment urging it to discuss with the federal government, it made a decision that gives us some hope. It took a step that should eventually improve the choices offered the unemployed throughout Quebec.

We are confident that our commitment to fully respect provincial jurisdiction over education and training is a step in this process. We feel that our commitment to harmonize our activities with those of the provinces is another.

[English]

The government has always been committed to flexible federalism and to flexible approaches on federal–provincial issues such as working together to help the unemployed.

Everyone will benefit from this type of collaboration.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, while the minister said in his opening remarks that his government's main concern was with jobs, I can tell you that this government's biggest failure is precisely in that area, in spite of the fact that it got elected on a platform of "jobs, jobs, jobs".

These jobs are nowhere to be seen in Canada, let alone in Quebec. Unemployment is running as high as 10 per cent in Canada. What the minister is suggesting today does not reflect reality.

He also said that the federal government plans to withdraw from occupational training, but at the same time, it is putting forward unemployment action measures to try to interfere, once again, in areas of provincial jurisdiction, because education and occupational training come under provincial jurisdiction.

• (1525)

I must say that I agree with the resolution passed by the Quebec National Assembly saying that the Government of Quebec is prepared to undertake negotiations with the federal government, provided that the federal government completely withdraw from occupational training.

Does the minister agree with the federal government's complete withdrawal from the area of occupational training?

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, the first question or comment made by the hon. member, to the effect that there has been no job creation, is just not factual.

The fact of the matter is that, since we took office, 509,000 new jobs were created in Canada. I am quoting Statistics Canada figures. More than 119,000 new jobs were created in Quebec. That is my answer to the first question.

When we look at the facts, we can seen that jobs, in fact more than half a million new jobs, have been created in the economy. Our economic and job creation policies work.

Second, regarding occupational training, we must make a distinction between two things. Quebec claims jurisdiction in the matter because education is a provincial jurisdiction. This means that we must withdraw from all training courses coming under their jurisdiction. But there is another jurisdiction involved which is a federal jurisdiction and, in fact, an exclusive federal jurisdiction, and that is unemployment insurance.

When we draw money from the UI fund to reduce unemployment, we are acting like any responsible person would in spending adequately the funds allocated to them; that is our jurisdiction. We are trying to limit future UI expenditures and to stimulate employment.

A measure designed, for example, to supplement a person's income to allow this person to find a job or to subsidize his company so that he can have a job clearly does not pertain to training. It is an employment measure coming fully under federal jurisdiction and involving the UI fund, over which the federal government has exclusive responsibility.

[English]

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the member who spoke about the great amount of jobs that had been created since the Liberal government took over. I beg to differ with him. If jobs have been created, it certainly has not been as a result of the federal government. Any jobs that have been created have been done through the private sector.

When will the government realize that governments do not create jobs? The best thing that governments have been able to create over the last many years is debt. If job creation programs instigated by parliaments were successful, everybody in Canada would have at least two jobs.

The other day I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development about changes in the delivery of the training programs. He said that we really should be transferring resources to the people, to the private sector and to communities. I would certainly like to see that. I applaud the minister for even thinking about transferring training to the private sector. That is a great leap in attitude for the Liberal government. I would like to see that come about.

In the private sector at least the training would be job specific. It would be specific to the marketplace. The marketplace would have some say in what sort of training should take place rather than having training programs that are supported for example under section 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, whereby moneys are allocated to very questionable job training prospects. When I ask about those specific projects that take place in our area, because I would like to have some feedback as to what kinds of permanent jobs have been created and how many people have become employed as a result of those projects, I get very little response. As a matter of fact, I am waiting to get some information as to how successful or unsuccessful those programs are.

I believe the Bloc has come up with a good motion. However, I do not believe it is specific to Quebec. We are talking about Canada. Of course the Bloc oftentimes only speaks about the province of Quebec. This is certainly relevant in my province of Alberta, as it is in la belle province. The Bloc would have had our support if the motion had not been strictly specific to Quebec.

The auditor general questioned the effectiveness of this program. This is not simply an idea the Reform Party has come up with or the Bloc has come up with. The auditor general stated in his report: "In studying programs that pumped about $4 billion into regional development over eight years, administrators often just added up the number of jobs the projects they funded were supposed to create and concluded that the programs had created those jobs". That is hardly the way to assess the effectiveness of the program. There should be more accountability with respect to these programs.

It is noteworthy that there will be a rebate to people who are part time employees. If they do not earn more than $2,000 their contributions will be refunded. However, the employee's contribution will not be refunded to the employee. That will have the reverse effect of what the Liberal government says will be a job incentive program. Anything that taxes the people who employ people will have a negative effect on the number of people who are employed. We should be doing more to remove payroll taxes. We should not be putting more roadblocks in the way of business, industry, and private enterprise. We should give them more of a break to ensure they become successful.

My dad used to say that when you work for somebody you have to make sure you make them a dollar or they could not possibly afford to pay you. That is something that may have escaped hon. members opposite.

Having looked at this motion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "sector".

• (1535)

The Speaker: I have looked at the amendment. Because it is the deletion of words I am going to accept it.

[Translation]

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Pierrefonds—Dollard has the floor. I understand you will be sharing your time with another member.

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that Bill C–111, introduced in the House last Friday by the Minister of Human Resources Development, is one of the most modern pieces of legislation introduced by this government.

As Prime Minister Jean Chrétien said, the proposed reform aims to help jobless Canadians to rejoin the workforce as quickly as possible, and to regain the dignity associated with working.

Employment insurance is designed to promote the development of the Canadian workforce, as well as economic growth.

To that end, the new employment insurance program proposes new measures geared to the needs of individuals and communities.

It also seeks to promote partnership and co–operation with the provinces, with the sole purpose of improving the well–being of Canadian workers.

In co–operation with the provinces, and in the context of a new vision and a new approach, we want to provide Canadian workers with the tools and the opportunities that will help them find their niche in the workforce. Along with the provinces, the private sector and community organizations, we want these workers to have jobs that will make our country competitive on the international markets.

Governments must work together to meet the challenges of the new economy and provide workers with the necessary skills and knowledge.

Employment insurance proposes a system that is better suited to the needs of those who want to find work in the modern labour market. For example, I can think of the workers who want to get training, so that they can meet the new labour market requirements, including in the professional and industrial sectors, to ensure their well–being and also contribute to the country's economic growth. Once fully implemented, the proposed reform will create between 100,000 and 150,000 jobs every year, including 40,000 in Quebec.

Employment insurance is a much more efficient program, because it recognizes the work effort, while also helping the unemployed. The proposed changes are fair to all Canadian workers, including those who hold part–time jobs.

This program is indeed more efficient. Once fully implemented, it will result in savings of two billion dollars, without depriving any Canadian of his or her rights. Out of that amount, $800 million will be reinvested in the employment benefit program. Adding to that amount the current budget of $1.9 billion for employment benefits, we get a total of $2.7 billion to be allocated to employment assistance each year. This is a unique and golden opportunity for those provinces interested in reaching agreements with the federal government to look after their workforce in a proactive fashion.

It was also our intention to ensure that Canadians living in high unemployment areas could take advantage of employment incentive measures in order to work more hours in a year. We have therefore established a $300 million transition job fund over three years, to fund independent growth–related employment in areas of higher unemployment.

In conjunction with our partners, we wish to encourage employers to create new jobs and to help the unemployed to return to the work force as quickly as possible.

Employment benefits are practical and efficient tools which assist those attempting to return to the work force with practical, and in some cases personalized, measures.

Since training is a provincial responsibility, and it is the federal government's intention to withdraw from that sector under the new legislation, skill development loans and grants will be given only after formal consent by the province concerned.

Employment benefits were designed to encourage personal initiative, to encourage people to make appropriate job search choices. There are management systems to help recipients plan their return to the work force in a methodical way. They will need to commit to following that plan, and there will be follow–up mechanisms.

We have sought to make wage benefits and all employment and re–employment measures as flexible as possible. All levels of government acknowledge the necessity of bringing their labour market–related roles in line with each other; duplication of effort, services and expenditures must be avoided, and initiatives must be co–ordinated. A province wishing to administer a service itself, or to substitute another program which would yield the same results, will be able to do so. The federal government is determined to act in as open a manner as possible, within the confines of its mandate under the national Constitution.

What will Quebec get out of this new legislative package? Respect of our jurisdictions, greater flexibility in human resource management, new opportunities for agreements, and the continuation of some of the many agreements already in place between us relating to employment insurance and human resources development.

To prevent overlapping initiatives and programs, we want to sit down with Quebec and see how we can focus our efforts in the area of manpower training. Parochial squabbles do Canadians a disservice and are counterproductive. We are here to serve all Canadians and that should be the only rationale for what we do.

If the province of Quebec already has a program, we are quite willing to let Quebec manage and determine the basic orientation of this program. We want to avoid duplication at all costs. It is too expensive, creates bureaucratic problems and prevents us from understanding the needs of workers and employers.

We will try to set up formal and specific agreements with the provinces. In each case, we will ask what instruments, programs and employment services should be designed and managed locally. This will be done keeping efficiency in mind. We must give each individual the tools he needs to get back on the labour market.

This means that on the basis of such agreements, Quebec will be able to assume responsibility for delivering an even larger number of projects, programs and services to its workers.

As Prime Minister Jean Chrétien announced a few days ago, the federal government will withdraw from manpower training activities. We will no longer purchase training courses from provincial institutions. We will withdraw from apprenticeship training, co–operative education programs and on–the–job training.

These measures must be implemented as soon as possible. We have provided for a transition period of up to three years to give the provinces and institutions time to adjust.

Since 1966, we have concluded agreements with Quebec as we have with other provinces in this country, and this proves that we are able to work in harmony to promote the well being of our human resources, with due consideration for the priorities of the province.

The employment insurance bill is a starting point for discussions with the provinces. These discussions may lead to various agreements depending on the particular needs of the provinces, their economic situation and the needs and circumstances of local labour markets. It is up to us to sit down together at the negotiating table and proceed with our discussions while considering our workers, the jobs they need and the economic development of all regions in our country.

In some cases, for example, a provincial government could manage federal employment measures or could use its own programs, rather than implement the proposed federal measures. Similarly, we could combine federal and provincial programs along with other programs from the private sector and the community.

These programs could be administered by the private sector, a local or provincial organization or a consortium. The employment benefits and services proposed in Bill C–111 are based on proven job creation practices.

Experience tells us that helping claimants set up a business is an effective way to return people to work. Since April 1994, 34,000 Canadians have set up businesses using this method. Seventy per cent of them were still active 18 months later. They create an average of 1.1 jobs.

A quick example, before I conclude. In February 1995, Dominique Grenier of Sainte–Agathe–des–Monts started a specialized business in software for people with a disability.

After four years of temporary jobs, he saw self–employment assistance as a way of getting a job. After only ten months, his business is expanding. Interest in his products, which help people cope with their environment, continues to grow. Next year, he intends to hire at least one person, and perhaps two. Here is what he says: "I would not have been able to carry this project out had it not been for the help I received from the Department of Human Resources Development. This sort of program is vital for anyone wanting to start a business".

In the interest of our fellow citizens, this bill deserves our support. It is centred on a single and vital objective: jobs that give Canadians, communities and regions real hope for the future.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the member's speech. I know he is very interested in his riding and I have heard him many times express his concern about the issue of employment in the province of Quebec. I recently had the opportunity to read a report by the Quebec Manufacturers' Association, who said that employment conditions and problems of labour and employability within Quebec were very serious. I would like to get the views of the member.

I understand unemployment insurance benefits in Canada are some of the highest in the western world. Many people feel that because these benefits are inordinately high compared to countries we compete with in international trade, it has created a lower productivity. In view of that, a number of people feel that productivity in Canada has been declining over the last ten years and no less so in Quebec.

A very positive aspect of this legislation would be to increase labour productivity, increase the attractiveness of Canada and of Quebec as a competitive place in which to do business. What we are really looking at is a long term commitment to create a great number of jobs within that province.

Mr. Patry: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my Liberal colleague for his question. This new employment insurance reform as proposed by the Minister of Human Resources Development will help us increase productivity in Quebec and across Canada.

There are several very interesting points in this reform; there are the responsibilities we will give to all job seekers. There will be wage subsidies and earnings supplements. I already mentioned self–employment assistance. There will also be partnerships with the provinces, municipalities, and the companies themselves to put people back to work.

I think that this is the most important. There will also be social incentives. Basing the reform on the number of hours of work and on earnings will greatly benefit the Canadian economy. There are inequities in the existing Unemployment Insurance Act in that some people can qualify for UI after working 15 hours a week for 12 weeks, while others who work 14 hours a week in part time jobs, perhaps for several years, have no chance of receiving UI benefits.

This bill will eliminate some inequities. In the case of lower income people, namely those working part time, some 500,000 of them will now be eligible for UI benefits should they need them—although I hope they will keep their jobs for as long as possible.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague opposite a question.

Given that the opposition motion before us today deals with the perpetuation of duplication and overlap in the area of manpower, how does he react, as a Quebec member representing the interests of Quebec in this House, to the resolution unanimously carried yesterday in the Quebec National Assembly requesting that the federal government withdraw totally and completely from the whole area of occupational training and everything that pertains to it?

First, what is his reaction and, second, how can he reconcile not acceding to the unanimous request or wish expressed yesterday by the National Assembly with regard to this government's so–called good intentions in recognizing Quebec as a distinct society? If the federal government were not to comply with the resolution passed yesterday, how could he reconcile all that, as an elected representative supposedly here to represent the interests of the Quebec people?

Mr. Patry: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. colleague from the Bloc Quebecois for his question.

I think it is relatively easy to reconcile the federal government's position and the interests of the people of Quebec, because our focus is on job creation. I believe that the Quebec government is looking into the matter and that future legislation passed in the National Assembly will also focus on job creation now that the referendum was defeated in Quebec.

As far as our reform proposal is concerned—and you referred to occupational training in particular—we feel that the bill now before the House of Commons makes it quite clear that the government intends to withdraw from occupational training completely.

I think that what must be understood with this bill is that the federal government would like all provincial and territorial governments of Canada to get together and look at how duplication can be eliminated. As I indicated in my remarks, as far as we are concerned, there is no question of us buying any occupational training courses whatsoever as we know them, because we must withdraw from occupational training with the consent of the province of Quebec.

I reach out to my hon. colleague and suggest that he ask his leader, who is very likely to become the next Quebec premier, to be not so kind but rather so wise as to come and sit down with the federal government to negotiate federal–provincial agreements on manpower training.

[English]

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a western Canadian, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on the motion of the opposition party concerning our government's plans to reform the old system of unemployment insurance in Canada.

So far most of the discussion that has taken place since the Minister of Human Resources Development introduced the new act on Friday last has focused on the impact in the eastern parts of the country, in Quebec and Atlantic Canada in particular. It is important to keep in mind, however, that these reforms will impact in all parts of Canada. Canadians in every province will be potentially better off because of them.

A number of respected and knowledgeable Canadians, including several from western Canada, have already spoken publicly in support of the new legislation. There is broad support for the new program all across the country.

It is important that members of the House should assess the new employment insurance act in terms of what it will do for unemployed Canadians, not on how it fits with one political ideology or the other. It is also essential that we use this opportunity to help Canadians to better understand the new act, and especially to clarify some of the misconceptions that have arisen in some of the public discussion in the past few days.

The first thing that needs to be clarified is the question of the reserve, how the reserve that is expected to accumulate in the insurance fund will be used. I raise this because there has been concern expressed that any surpluses that may accumulate will be used to pay down the government's debt or reduce the operating deficit.

Let me be perfectly clear on this. Surpluses in the insurance fund will not be used to reduce the government's debt or deficit. The unemployment insurance fund has operated under a separate set of accounts in the past, and that will not change with the new law. The federal government acts as a lender of last resort for the account when it is in deficit, which by the way must be repaid with interest. Alternatively, when the account accumulates a surplus it will earn interest.

Since 1986, following the recommendation of the auditor general of the day, the unemployment insurance account has been part of the government's consolidated account. This is simply to provide an integrated report of the government's financial operations.

As with the unemployment insurance account, the employment insurance account will be separate from the government's consolidated revenue fund. It cannot be used for purposes other than those designated in the legislation. Thus, should there be any surpluses in the employment insurance fund, which is self–financed out of employer and employee contributions, it will stay in the EI account. To make it abundantly clear, EI premiums will not be used to pay down the debt.

It is true that the unemployment insurance fund is currently in a small surplus position. It is true that the minister has said it is the government's intention to increase the reserve in the account. The reason for this is quite apart from issues of deficit and debt reduction. The reason for this is to ensure the stability and long term sustainability of the EI program itself.

Members of the House may remember that during the last recession the unemployment insurance program was in serious financial difficulty. Benefit claims were climbing sharply, contributions were not covering the increased payouts, and the unemployment fund operating deficit was growing at an alarming rate. As everyone knows, for an insurance program a growing deficit between claims and premiums spells disaster.

The government of the day, in reaction to this impending disaster, was forced to raise premiums and then to raise them again. In a two–year period premiums increased by about 25 per cent. In fact over a five–year period premiums rose by 36 per cent, from $2.25 to $3.07.

The bad news is that these hefty increases in premiums, which I would remind hon. members are paid by the employers and the employees, were not enough to balance the account. At the end of the day, the fund eventually ran up a cumulative deficit of $6 billion.

People are tired of these big numbers. They are getting very used to them. I put this in perspective. The impact of a $6 billion deficit on a fund like this means hardship for the employers and the employees. In the first place, employers were faced with higher payroll taxes at a time in the economic cycle when they could least afford it. In effect, this served as a drag on job creation. Some estimates suggested that the premium increases killed as many as 40,000 jobs.

As for the workers, they too were faced with paying higher premiums, which meant they had less money in their pockets after deductions. The increased premiums reduced their after tax income at a time when the economy needed stimulation in the form of more consumer spending.

Fortunately, the system is now back in equilibrium. As I said earlier, we have a small but positive surplus in the account. The financial disaster in the UI fund was averted. No one wants that kind of situation to happen again. That is why it is extremely important that we build a surplus in the EI fund.

Should we get into a position where the reserve is judged to be sufficient, it will allow us to consider whether further premium reductions may be possible. The review of the adjustment to the reforms, which the legislation itself requires must take place by December 1998, will provide us with an opportunity to reassess the financial stability of the fund and contemplate any such changes.

Where did the suggestions for these changes come from? As it turns out, the proposal to accumulate a reserve in the UI account came from the House of Commons committee which studied this issue and whose members recognized the necessity of maintaining a stable account through the economic cycle. They recognized the need to have money set aside in case of a downturn in the business cycle and the consequent need for higher UI payouts should this occur. For this reason they made a recommendation to keep a reserve against that possibility. This is what the term insurance reserve is all about. It is a matter of prudent fiscal management and has nothing whatsoever to do with deficit reduction.

This is not to say that our government has lost any of its firm resolve to deal with the deficit and debt situation we inherited. We remain firmly committed to the objective set out by the Minister of Finance. We are meeting our deficit reduction targets through operating efficiencies and other spending cuts. We expect to make significant savings with the new employment insurance act. How can this be? There are some very practical ways this could occur.

The first is that we are reducing the cost of premiums for both employers and workers. We are restructuring the system of benefits as we come to grips with a program whose costs have doubled from around $8 billion in 1982 to over $16 billion this year. We are introducing a number of new administrative efficiencies which will reduce the overhead costs of operating the unemployment program and will result in a more decentralized program delivery system.

These are important measures for western Canadians and in fact for all Canadians. Reducing premiums means that western Canadians will pay less for the benefit program and will receive more back for every dollar they contribute. This will reduce the amount of cross–subsidization of the program by western Canadians.

These are big changes. Of course sometimes big changes need a time of transition. For this reason government is committed to ensuring that in special needs areas, for example, where unemployment rates are higher than 12 per cent, those areas will receive transitional assistance during adjustment to the reforms.

In addition, the family income supplement will mean that low income parents on unemployment insurance could collect up to 80 per cent of their previous earnings. An important aspect of this new measure is that it treats the family as a unit for unemployment insurance purposes and not as a set of individuals.

We know that the best way to reduce costs in the unemployment program is to get people working again. It is not for nothing that the new program is called employment insurance. The new employment insurance program introduced last Friday contains a set of employment benefits that have been described as pro work. Some $800 million of the savings from unemployment reforms will be reinvested in these measures which are designed to help unemployed workers re–enter the workforce.

Western Canadian provinces will also have full access to the employment benefit measures. The objective of these employment benefits is to improve incentives to work and to reduce dependency on the EI system.

The new employment benefits include well targeted, results oriented measures such as wage subsidies, earning supplements, self–employment assistance, job creation partnerships and loans and grants to help workers improve their skills. Use of these employment measures will be tailored to meet specific labour market needs and priorities as determined within a decentralized context. The emphasis will be on flexibility, common sense and practical experience.

In addition, the future service delivery and decision making will take place as close to the local level as possible. Local skills and expertise will be used working in partnership with other levels of government, community groups, educators and others from the business community and labour organizations.

This new approach to unemployment assistance is based on the idea that effective programs can be designed and delivered in the region that will use them. Ottawa does not have to make all the decisions. It is based on our belief that people want to work. They do not want to draw UI time after time. With the new employment insurance program, we are giving them the tools to get back to work.

Other sceptics may ask whether this innovative approach will work in western Canada. The answer is it already is. The human resources development department has undertaken a number of pilot projects in western Canada which are based on this model.

There is a job creation partnership project in the area of tourism in Medicine Hat. Twenty–six seasonal or displaced workers became involved in a project jointly funded by the federal department and the city of Medicine Hat to help the city plan for an expansion of its tourism industry.

• (1605)

In the area of business start ups, in my home city of Saskatoon there is a self–employment assistance project which has helped 17 entrepreneurs start new businesses. A number of these people have in turn hired new workers.

Another example is in that very important area of making the transition from welfare to work. There is a self–sufficiency project in the lower mainland of British Columbia, a co–operative venture which provides earnings supplements to help single parents get off welfare and get back to work.

These are all practical working examples, not just airy–fairy hopes and dreams. This is why we know it will work in western Canada just as its works in all parts of the country. The door is open for the development of co–operative ventures with each and every province.

With the new employment insurance act this government has opened the way for individual provinces to work with the federal government to develop unique labour market programs which meet the needs of individual governments, regions and people. Because of this, I must disagree with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mercier. It is my belief that contrary to that motion this government is doing everything—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Madam Speaker, in her speech, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt claimed that, generally speaking, Canadians were enthusiastic and appreciative as regards the reform proposed in the bill.

I can say that I heard of lot of opinions to the contrary. Many people have opposed several aspects of this legislation.

The hon. member also says, and I agree with her on that issue, that some decisions had to be made to try to reduce, if not eliminate, the UI fund deficit. It is true that something had to be done sooner or later about that.

However, based on what principle of social equity does Bill C–96 lower the contribution of high income earners, while increasing that of those who hold precarious jobs, particularly part–time workers?

In the end, the deficit will be reduced at the expense of the poor, not the rich. I would appreciate it if the hon. member could comment on that principle, because I cannot figure it out.

[English]

Mrs. Sheridan: Madam Speaker, I do not disagree with the hon. member opposite that there are some discordant notes and most of them are being played from that region of the House.

As with any bill there will be debate across the country but the provisions of the bill responded to a need that committee members heard when they travelled across the country just over a year ago. They heard a need for reforms to the unemployment insurance fund and the act, not only to the underlying principles but to the way the service is delivered. This piece of legislation goes a long way to providing that service delivery.

The second question concerned what principles of social equity this was based on. The provisions of the bill will go a long way to ensure there is greater equity among all Canadians. I would quote again as an example the changes from a minimum number of weeks to hours to take in part time workers.

I am not sure if I misunderstood what the hon. member said or if he misunderstood what I said. In terms of using the employment fund to reduce the deficit, I went to great lengths to say that is not in fact what the reserve will be used for. If that was his suggestion, I will say once more that the reserve in the employment insurance fund will not be used to reduce the debt and deficit. The surplus which is there will exist as a contingency. If it ever becomes large enough it will be used to reduce premiums. That would benefit both the employers and the employees which is quite an equitable solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Madam Speaker, first, I want to say that I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Champlain.

I am very pleased to participate in the debate on the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mercier, which reads:

> That this House condemn the government for choosing to reform unemployment insurance in a way that maintains overlap and duplication in the manpower sector and thus prevents the government of Quebec from adopting a true manpower development policy of its own.

You will understand the relevance of that motion, following an almost historical event yesterday, in that a resolution was unanimously approved. Indeed, it is rare that western parliaments unanimously approve such resolutions. Yet, that was the case yesterday in Quebec City, where the three parties at the National Assembly, namely the Parti Quebecois, the Liberal Party and the Action démocratique, unanimously agreed on a resolution which provides, in part, that:

> Quebec must have sole responsibility for policies pertaining to manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and patriate accordingly the funding allocated by the federal government for these programs in Quebec;
> Within the current constitutional framework and in order to improve services to customers, Quebec must take over the control and management of various services pertaining to employment and manpower development and all programs that may be funded through the Unemployment Insurance Fund within Quebec's borders, and must therefore receive the funding appropriate to such responsibilities;
> The Government of Quebec and representatives of business, labour and the co–operative sector agree to oppose any initiative by the federal government that would constitute an invasion of Quebec's prerogatives.

This is a resolution that was unanimously approved, by a vote of 96 to nil, by the three parties sitting in Quebec's National Assembly. The timing of this resolution is all the more appropriate, given a particular aspect of that reform mentioned on page 3 of the release. I am referring to the national employment service. It is said that "a modernized employment service will help jobless Canadians organize and conduct job searches. The computerized information network on the labour market will be more powerful and will tell people where they can find work in every region of the country. To that end, the implementation of an improved and universalized version of the service delivery system in Canada's human resource centres was announced in August 1995".

People in Trois–Rivières know all about the implications of that announcement. This is the other reason why I am pleased to speak today and to discuss, for the third time in the last two or three weeks, issues that plague Trois–Rivières.

These are linked to one of the aspects of the minister's reform and relate to the creation of a new national placement system. It will be centred on the Department of Human Resources Development employment centres, and in our area it has been decided that the regional administrative centre, the focal point of departmental activities in our region, will be located, not where it would normally and naturally be, in Trois–Rivières, the regional capital which I have the honour to represent, but in Shawinigan instead.

This is, of course, a worthy city as well, one which knew glory in the days of natural resources development by the Shawinigan Water and Power, and is now represented as best he can by the hon. member for Saint–Maurice, the Prime Minister of Canada. The decision was made at the Department of Human Resources Development to have Shawinigan be the one to benefit from the regional administrative centre, instead of Trois–Rivières.

The question remains—since we are totally in the dark as to the reasons for this decision—was this a technocratic decision or a political one? If technocratic, it is confirmation of all of the public's prejudices against the judgment of technocrats in their ivory towers, away from life's realities, away from the grassroots, making decisions among themselves in comfort and behind closed doors. They hold meeting after meeting at which they convince one another of how justified their decisions are, without ever really worrying about whether those decisions are in the least bit rational.

If this is a technocratic decision, then we must condemn it out of hand, because it is based on absolutely nothing rational. I will offer you proof very shortly that it even contradicts the parameters set by the department itself.

The other explanation, perhaps a more plausible one, is that allmighty, all–rational, all–giving politics were involved, where the Prime Minister might have let it be known that common sense and interest ought to prevail, including the self–interest of the member for Saint–Maurice, to ensure that the residents of his riding, with all logic, all rationality thrown to the winds, would reap the benefit of the creation of this new centre instead of the region of Trois–Rivières, the city of Trois–Rivières ever being where workers are merely shuffled around without a job created. In fact, if my memory serves me right, there was more than shuffling, there were cuts, with 58 positions lost due to office closures.

Whether technocracy or politics were involved, the decision is indisputably illogical and arbitrary. As I have said, it contradicts the parameters the department has set for itself with respect to creating these regional centres. The parliamentary secretary will agree there was some kind of rationale. It is never easy to make these decisions, and that is why you need certain criteria.

The main criteria when making these decisions include the population affected, the number of unemployment insurance recipients affected, the number of welfare recipients and the number of businesses and employers likely to hire people on unemployment insurance and welfare.

In each case, Trois–Rivières represents more or less twice the activity, population, number of employers and number of unemployment and welfare recipients. That is why Trois–Rivières is the regional capital. It is the largest urban area and the most important one in terms of economic activity and population in the whole region. That is why it made good sense to have and keep this kind of service in Trois–Rivières.

The department, for reasons that remain obscure, decided to locate the service in Shawinigan. The decision was not only arbitrary and illogical but also very unpopular. Since September, a petition has been circulating, signed by more than 25,000 people, condemning this decision by the federal government. Seventy agencies took the trouble to draft resolutions condemning this decision, including 40 municipalities as well as community agencies.

This case has attracted the support of the Fédération des caisses populaires and the Fédération de l'âge d'or, because the elderly become anxious when they see changes coming and the regional federation got involved as well.

We are seeing a chorus of protests in the riding of Trois–Rivières and in the region, including Cap–de–la–Madeleine, a riding represented by my colleague from Champlain, Trois–Rivières–Ouest, in my riding, and even on the other side of the river, in Bécancour, which historically has always done business with Trois–Rivières because of its location.

So this illogical and unpopular decision will have certain practical consequences. This is not about protest for protest sake. The fact is that, under the new system, the paperwork will be done by the regional management centre in Shawinigan. People will register in Trois–Rivières, where the facts will be noted, without further processing. And any action subsequent to registration with the manpower centre, on three out of four files requiring additional processing, according to our statistics, will be taken from Shawinigan instead of being processed in Trois–Rivières as is now the case.

The minister claims it will make no difference and will not in any way change the quality of the services now enjoyed by the people of Trois–Rivières and surrounding area. Nevertheless, we should realize that departmental investigations following registration and all appeals to the UI board of referees, for instance, will from now on, according to our information, be done in Shawinigan instead of Trois–Rivières.

Do not tell us there will be no drop in the quality of service for the Trois–Rivières area. That is just not true.

This decision is arbitrary, illogical, technocratic and political, and above all, it was made without any consultation with regional partners.

As I said before, the government has three alternatives, one being the status quo, leaving things unchanged in Trois–Rivières and setting up a centre in Shawinigan for the northern Saint–Maurice area, but the government should not establish a regional management centre in Shawinigan for the whole region, as it is about to do.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as I listened to the member's comments about this bill I became very confused. He started off criticizing the federal government's spending power, presumably under the whole aspect of manpower training. Basically what has been asked for is the federal government not use that power in such a way that it would create duplication and overlap within provincial jurisdictions.

I hear the federal government has consented to that and has basically said it will not use its spending powers. However, they want the government to do both. They want the government to give them the money in addition to curbing its powers. The reality is they want to have their cake and eat it too.

Worse than that, the hon. member went on to give us a dissertation from the national assembly in Quebec City which would, as I understand it, basically say we should have no presence there whatsoever. The member continued to argue why we should have a placement centre in his riding of Trois–Rivières. It would be more consistent if he argued there should be no placement facilities either in Shawinigan or his own riding.

It seems terribly inconsistent to me. The argument seems to have developed into "we want to have the spending, we do not want you around, but we kind of want you around too". We had a very looped discussion.

What really concerns me is the discussion about labour mobility. Basically what has been stated is that the federal government has no presence in the whole aspect of placement throughout the whole country as a nation. I do not know what the member is saying. If he has unemployed workers in Trois–Rivières and there are jobs available in New Brunswick or possibly Ontario or another jurisdiction, would he rather have those people in Trois–Rivières continue to be unemployed? Is that basically the philosophy behind these comments? Possibly the member could clarify that for me.

• (1625)

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to pursue my line of thought and show the arbitrariness and illogic of the decision or proposal, because we hope it is still a proposal, to locate the centre in Shawinigan instead of in Trois–Rivières. It is a matter of good common sense. It is clear. Trois–Rivières is the regional capital of the Mauricie region; this is a fact.

Certainly, if we undermine its character like this, take the stuffing out of the regional capital, maybe we will no longer have one. Shawinigan may not be a desirable choice, because it is not as well situated.

We have to bear in mind that this decision is not only arbitrary, it is political. It has all the earmarks, at least according to our information. We can see that the Prime Minister is looking after his own political interest to show he is working for his constituents, while leaving far behind the collective interest of the Mauricie region.

There are two types of people. The people of Shawinigan, and they have a lot of good common sense, are very aware of the outlandishness of the situation. They are also increasingly uncomfortable, like the federalists in Trois–Rivières, who are well aware that, in logical terms, the decision is untenable, because, historically, economic activity has been focussed in Trois–Rivières primarily. They know a major centre has to be maintained. Everyone knows that the decision, with its obvious political overtones, is untenable.

I reiterate the three options open to the government. It could maintain the status quo, keeping Trois–Rivières as the main centre of activity for the entire region; it could set up a centre in Shawinigan to satisfy the Prime Minister's fancy while retaining Trois–Rivière's regional nature, incorporating Bécancour; or it could implement its plan, which should not be done, especially as regards Shawinigan becoming the regional capital. Shawinigan lacks the attributes of a regional capital—although the people there are very nice—but it lacks a pool of employers and of people and claimants, who do benefit arbitrarily although highly politically, at the expense of individuals, employers, seniors and community organizations. We will never agree with a decision that means we have to go all the way to Shawinigan.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt: national defence; the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra: Vietnam.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind the members of this House that job training has historically been an area of provincial jurisdiction.

The federal government sneaked in through its jurisdiction over unemployment insurance and put in place a multitude of employability development programs. Over time, and given the costs involved, the federal government has decided to restructure its authority, reduce its financial involvement, and increase its visibility. This is probably the basis of the reform proposed by Minister Axworthy.

However, for several years now, there has been in Quebec a consensus to repatriate manpower training powers. The government, labour unions, and the Conseil du patronat du Québec are hoping the federal government will take a concrete step in this direction in the interest of users, both employees and employers, as outlined in a 1991 letter made public by Quebec employment minister Louise Harel and signed by her Liberal predecessor, André Bourbeau, which condemns any attempt by the federal government to fund labour training through groups and organizations.

The Prime Minister of Canada is using the principle of decentralization to play politics by sending directly to Quebecers cheques allowing them to adapt their training to the new realities in the labour force. He has just missed a good opportunity to establish constructive relations between the Canadian federation and its provinces.

The federal government's position in this area denotes a lack of respect for Canada's provinces and supports its efforts to centralize powers. By acting this way, the federal government is trading effectiveness for visibility while contributing to anarchy.

The minister's bill specifies that he will try to conclude with the provinces official agreements on the implementation of four manpower programs designed to put people back to work. However, should he be unable to come to an agreement with the provinces, he reserves the right to implement his programs with or without their consent. The federal government gives itself the right to bypass the provinces, in case no agreement can be worked out. Does the Minister of Human Resources Development agree with us that the provinces will negotiate with a knife at their throats?

The fifth program announced by the minister provides for the establishment of a job creation fund amounting to $300 million over three years, which is not distributed among the provinces. To obtain federal funds, the provinces and perhaps even the municipalities will have to inject an equivalent amount. This type of funding favours the richest provinces. This goes against the objective of the fund, which is to create jobs in high unemployment regions.

On the one hand, the minister is promoting overlap between the various levels of government and supporting the costs, and on the other hand, he is tightening UI qualifying conditions and reducing UI benefits.

For the second year in a row and in spite of the UI account surplus, the Minister of Finance announced in his February budget speech that the funds allocated by the Treasury Board to the Canadian job strategy administered under the unemployment insurance program would be cut by an additional $1.1 billion for fiscal years 1996 and 1997.

At the same time, the Minister of Human Resources Development is announcing that $800 million will be allocated to training programs to promote job readiness. This new resource envelope being funded through the UI fund, the government is able to save $300 million on the backs of employers and employees just by shifting the load.

By introducing in his reform the notion of weekly hours of work and by increasing the number of weeks of work required to qualify for benefits, the minister is going after part time workers, most of whom are women, and seasonal workers, the most vulnerable segment of our society. By acting this way, the minister is giving a one–way ticket for social assistance to a larger number of Quebecers, as more than 40 per cent of new welfare recipients were previously on UI.

Once all of minister Axworthy's proposals will have been implemented, they will represent a $640 million shortfall for the people of Quebec. In my riding, the economy is heavily dependent on the expansion of the tourist, forestry, farm and business industries, all of which provide mostly part time and seasonal employment.

On the whole, UI reform represents a shortfall of approximately $7 million just in my riding.

The federal government is drawing its inspiration from the cuts Alberta and Ontario made on the backs of workers and the disadvantaged. The Chrétien government could show some initiative and daring in cutting tax benefits for large companies and the best paid members of our society, but apparently he would rather disguise his deficit reduction effort as a social program reform.

According to a document released by the HRD department, the reform making the unemployment insurance into an employment insurance is designed, among other things, to help unemployed workers meet the challenges of new job requirements and career renewal.

Could the minister tell us how, concretely, his reform proposal will resolve the persistent disparity between the ever increasing number of unemployed and the 300,000 jobs that remain vacant every year in Canada, because the unemployed lack adequate training?

This reform will certainly perpetuate overlap between levels of government and the associated costs, but it will also force all those who are looking for a job or for further training to go back and forth between their Canada employment centre, the regional office of the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, educational institutions and aid agencies. The people of Quebec and Canada will not only have to bear the brunt of this reform, but they will also have to put up with the drawbacks of overlap. That is the real impact of the Axworthy reform.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the comments of the hon. member. I must admit it seemed there was more discussion about governments and partisan issues than about people. I was concerned that the member had not really addressed the basic issues and the needs of the workers of Canada, regardless of what province they live in. We only have one taxpayer. The important issue is that we really make sure the services provided to Canadians are focused and efficient.

The member talked a little about the fact that in his opinion job training is the sole jurisdiction of Quebec. He said there was federal encroachment by this legislation that has come forward before the House and basically reduced it to a simple matter of petty politics. He then concluded that Quebecers needed full control over manpower training but then concluded we need a constructive partnership. In itself, that is a total contradiction. You cannot have full control and a constructive partnership at the same time.

My real question has to do with the whole UI issue. The member seems to talk about the UI distribution as some sort of instrument of equalization of benefits. Quite frankly, every region of Canada should have one objective, and that is to eliminate all benefits for all Canadians because we will not need them. We need people to get jobs. UI is not a matter of equalization. Our objective should be to reduce the amount of benefits paid through job creation.

Would the member try to deal with the essence of the subject really being not equalization but rather the best interests of Canadians?

[Translation]

Mr. Lefebvre: Madam Speaker, earlier I listened to the speeches made by several members opposite. I listened carefully. One of them mentioned that, under the new program, a worker unemployed for 52 weeks would—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member must addresss his comments to the member who just spoke, namely the member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Lefebvre: Madam Speaker, I will remember that. One of his colleagues said that a person working 14 to 15 hours a week for 52 weeks would benefit—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Again, I remind the hon. member for Champlain that his observations must relate to comments made by the member who asked the question, not to those of another speaker.

Mr. Lefebvre: I understand, Madam Speaker. It is because I do not have the name of the hon. member's riding.

An hon. member: Mississauga.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mississauga. Fine. I will now continue. The member opposite told us that the new UI program is beneficial to those who never collected UI benefits. He referred to people working 14 to 15 hours. However, if we multiply those 14 or 15 hours by 52 weeks, we realize that it is impossible for these people to be eligible for UI benefits. The numbers do not add up.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address the Bloc motion on the subject of unemployment insurance reform. I can only begin by saying how astounded I am that such a motion could have been drafted, let alone introduced at this time.

What is the source of the motion? What unemployment insurance reforms are the hon. members of the opposition thinking about? I presume it is not the same reform that was introduced by the Minister of Human Resources Development last Friday.

I heard the Prime Minister's announcement a little over a week ago. I read the documents. What I and millions of Canadians heard was a statement from the Prime Minister that the federal government respects and recognizes the jurisdiction of the provinces in education and training. Millions of us heard him say the federal government is therefore withdrawing from the direct purchase of training, from apprenticeship training, co–operative education programs, and workplace based training. We heard him announce that agreements with the provinces will be sought on the design and delivery of proposed employment benefits in order to harmonize them with provincial programs. We heard him explain that in some cases the provincial government or a provincial agency could be responsible for delivering these federal measures. Indeed, he was at pains to point out that in other cases provincial programs could be used instead of the proposed federal measures.

He made it perfectly clear to millions of us that funding for training will only be provided by the federal government with the consent of the province concerned. Depending on the agreement reached, it could be provided to individuals, to the provincial government, or to a third party. He stated clearly and ultimately that this arrangement can allow a province, if it wishes, to assume full responsibility for these employment measures, subject only to the proviso that the federal government's responsibilities to ensure the needs of the unemployed are addressed and that the measures that allow them to return quickly to the workforce are met.

The employment insurance reforms specifically and deliberately seek to eliminate overlap and duplication. The reforms will mean that even more than ever a province will be able to develop a comprehensive labour market strategy and policy. It is surely a distortion to maintain otherwise.

It is always difficult to bring about true reform. In the case of a program as well ingrained in the economic and social fabric of Canada as the unemployment insurance program, it is doubly difficult. I am concerned that factual distortion of the sort presented by this motion will damage public understanding of the reform package, especially in Atlantic Canada, where a sound understanding of the new system is of paramount importance.

I believe it is important for Atlantic Canadians to know the facts so they can be aware that the reforms provide much needed structural adjustments, which are absolutely necessary and which over the long term will be good for Canada and for Atlantic Canada.

The opposition members should also take note of the fact that these reforms will help high unemployment regions like Atlantic Canada. This reform package will create 100,000 to 150,000 new jobs, and 45,000 part time workers in Atlantic Canada who are now not eligible for benefits will qualify under these reforms.

Unemployment insurance was never a solution to the Atlantic regional unemployment, nor was it meant to be. We are now facing the fact that it has actually become a cause of unemployment. In other words, it is part of the problem and not the solution. Many people are better off collecting UI than accepting the work that is available. In a recent survey of small businesses in Atlantic Canada, 45 per cent of respondents said they want to hire but cannot compete for workers with the social programs, particularly UI.

The new employment insurance legislation is a balanced package that improves work incentives, reduces dependency, and increases fairness while helping Canadians get back to work.

• (1645)

Specifically what does this mean for the Atlantic provinces? It is true that we are cutting overall spending. There will be impacts on Atlantic Canada. We should remember that when reinvestment is taken into account the overall reduction in the region will be no more than 7 per cent. On the whole each of the four Atlantic provinces currently receives more in benefits than it pays in premiums. Although the ratio will be lower they will still be net recipients after reform.

Another important impact for Atlantic Canada is that during the transitional period regions with high unemployment will receive more in terms of job support programs. About $800 million in savings from the new system would be reinvested in proven job support programs to create opportunities and to help more people get into the job market.

By fiscal year 2000–01, $214 million or 27 per cent of that amount will go to Atlantic Canada. Further, to stimulate the economy in high unemployment areas transitional job funds will provide $300 million for job creation over a three–year period. This is in addition to the $800 million being invested in job support programs.

On the benefit side, people in high unemployment areas will need fewer hours of work to qualify for benefits and will be able to receive benefits for a longer period.

There are other provisions affecting seasonal workers and as we all know Atlantic Canada has more than its share. Under the new system, although some seasonal workers in industries like fishing, forestry and agriculture will receive lower benefits, they will nonetheless get more out of the program than they pay in premiums. They will have more incentive to work outside the peak season because additional work will now not only increase earned income but provide increased benefits as well.

Workers, employers and communities have to be able to cope with the substantial change the employment insurance scheme will bring to the Atlantic region, so the new system will be introduced gradually over several years.

The new employment insurance system will bring essential change to the Atlantic region. We believe the employment insurance active employment measures will lead to stronger labour markets and a more skilled workforce, which in turn will attract investment and jobs.

In the Atlantic region the federal government already works in partnership with the provinces, municipalities, community organizations and the private sector to design and deliver re–employment programs. There are education and training initiatives, personal and business counselling, wage subsidies, self–employment assistance and special programs for women, youth, aboriginal people, individuals with disabilities and members of racial minorities.

Whenever possible both individuals and local communities are encouraged to take responsibility for their own development.

The old UI system trapped people in a cycle of dependence. The new system is designed to help people help themselves. I want Atlantic Canadians to understand that fact and not be distracted by the naysayers. This is why I say the motion before us should be viewed in Atlantic Canada and across the country as the distortion it truly represents.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for South Shore for providing the House with an insight into the situation in Atlantic Canada. There has been much said in the media and among members of Parliament who perhaps do not know the situation very well in Atlantic Canada.

One of the impressions given in some media reports is that it is somehow the norm in Atlantic Canada that people would work for only a few months and make a substantial amount of money, that it was simply a way of life to go on UI. The member has dispelled that very well. The constituents of South Shore should know how very hard and how very ably their member has represented the interests of Atlantic Canada.

With regard to the media impression that has been given, could the member elaborate a bit more on the kinds of things that have been happening, from his experience in South Shore and Atlantic Canada, in reaction to the proposals and on his expectations with regard to the potential benefits of the new program?

Mr. Wells: Madam Speaker, I did an interview in my riding last week. Some people who discussed the issue were in favour of some parts of the program and against other parts. To suggest that we can bring in this substantial change without there being some negative comment is not possible. Certainly when people will be affected there will be some negative comment.

However, on balance it is clear to me from discussions with the business community and others in my riding that the change from weeks to hours is very positive. Every hour of work will now count in the seasonal industries. In many of the industries in Atlantic Canada people do not work a 35–hour week during peak periods. They work 40, 50 and 60 hour weeks. Now they will get credit for all the extra time, whereas in the past they would only get credit for the week regardless of the number of hours. That is a very positive aspect that has been accepted and endorsed by Atlantic Canadians.

As I stated earlier, there will be at least 45,000 additional people in Atlantic Canada who will now qualify for benefits. They are not getting benefits now because in most cases they are working less than the 15 hours presently needed to qualify.

In addition there is the new family support benefit, a family income supplement for low income families with children. This provision will allow claimants to earn up to 80 per cent of their insured income.

Those are three points but there are others. I could perhaps cite six or seven other provisions that are very beneficial to Atlantic Canadians which will offset some areas where without question some adjustment will be needed. We all recognize that we need to make structural changes to make the system an employment program as opposed to an unemployment program.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Madam Speaker, I must say that I was very disappointed and even shocked to hear the comments of the member who just spoke.

Throughout his speech, we had the impression that he feels the unemployed are lazy people and that making them hungry will somehow help create jobs.

A supermarket recently opened in my riding. It needed to hire 60 people, mostly for part–time jobs. Yet, 2,000 people showed up. It is not true that the unemployed are lazy. What is true, though, is that there are no jobs for people willing to work. Jobs will not be created by making these people hungry.

[English]

Mr. Wells: Madam Speaker, that comment is very much like the motion, a distortion of the true facts. That is certainly not what I said or implied. To even suggest it to me is an insult. I did not say that. I will not suggest it. The member should not even think it.

We all recognize that people who are out of work are not out of work by choice. At the same time the present system is not helping them. We are trying to bring in employment measures that will assist these people to get the tools and that will help industry and business create the jobs these people badly want.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in support of my colleague for South Shore, I simply advise the member from the Bloc that we from the maritimes need not be told that unemployed people are not lazy.

I will speak to a number of benefits included in the minister's recent announcement. Probably the most important benefit concerns the fact that employment insurance will now be much more inclusive. There are estimates that up to half a million people who were not eligible to be included in the benefits of the unemployment insurance will be included for benefits under employment insurance.

I cannot overestimate how important that provision is because it will allow many Canadians inside the system who currently are on income assistance in the province of New Brunswick to qualify. In many cases they could not find sufficient numbers of weeks to work but could certainly find the number of hours necessary under this provision. There will be people in my province who will be able to qualify with nine or ten weeks of work who might have needed to find fourteen or fifteen weeks of work in the past. They will have access to the program by virtue of the fact that the industries in Atlantic Canada are very seasonal. During peak periods they can work long hours but they cannot extend the long hours over a large number of weeks. It is very important that it has a very progressive outcome by virtue of that.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1710)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend Her Honour the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, Her Honour was pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act—Chapter No. 38.

Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons—Chapter No. 39.

Bill C–61, an act to establish a system of administrative monetary penalties for the enforcement of the Canada Agricultural Products Act, the Feeds Act, the Fertilizers Act, the Health of Animals Act, the Meat Inspection Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Plant Protection Act and the Seeds Act—Chapter No. 40.

Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff and to make related and consequential amendments to other acts—Chapter No. 41.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion and the amendment.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Madam Speaker, one of the benefits of the recently announced employment insurance amendments has to do with the fact that coverage is going to be broadened quite considerably. Many people will have access to employment insurance who have not had access to it in the past.

Another significant advantage is the low income protection contained in the amendments. This will allow up to 80 per cent of insurable earnings to be covered for low income families with children.

There are also the advantages in terms of the long term political viability of the program in that high income earners will have a greater percentage of their benefits clawed back. As an Atlantic Canadian, I am somewhat tired of all of those who point to us and talk about all those wealthy people who are drawing unemployment insurance benefits after making large amounts of money. It does not happen very often. By introducing this clawback we will be able to establish that more quickly in the minds of Canadians.

I also point out the importance of the employment benefit programs that are part of the package. There were 39 in the past which have been reduced to five. Those five programs will now be managed essentially by local officials which means if one element of the package is more suitable to my constituency then all of the attention could be placed in that area. That is a huge improvement.

The job partnership program meets a very real need in my part of Canada. Many people do not acquire enough coverage for the full 52-week period. For example, people are eligible for 26 weeks of insurance benefits yet their summer job or their seasonal job does not start until 10 weeks beyond that.

One of the elements of the new employment benefit package is a job partnership program which will allow job creation opportunities in the communities. This will allow people to fill in that gap when they otherwise would not have benefits or income.

I pay tribute to the minister for last year's consultation. As an Atlantic Canadian, I have been particularly concerned about the bill and the UI changes. I can only say good things about the amount of consultation the minister has allowed and I understand he is going to continue to receive when we look at the bill in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.15 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(16).

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the amendment lost.

The next question is on the main motion.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, if you were to seek it, the House would probably give its unanimous consent that those members who voted on the previous motion be recorded as having voted on the motion now before the House, with Liberal members voting nay.

Mr. Duceppe: Madam Speaker, members of the Bloc Quebecois will vote in favour of this motion.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Madam Speaker, Reform members, except if they wish to do otherwise, will oppose the motion.

Mr. Solomon: Madam Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party vote no on this motion.

Mr. Bhaduria: Madam Speaker, I vote against the motion.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Income Tax Act to eliminate the payment of personal income tax on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to introduce this motion today. I believe taking this action could benefit a great number of people, particularly our senior citizens.

Amending the Income Tax Act to eliminate the payment of personal income tax on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less is not a completely new idea.

In 1974 an exemption on the first $1,000 of interest income was introduced as a way of counteracting the impact of inflation on the taxation of interest.

• (1750)

It was also believed the exemption would reduce tax evasion, as those with small amounts of bank interest would no longer have an incentive to ignore the interest they received when filing their income tax returns.

Another argument was that the exemption would increase savings by increasing the post–tax return of investment that produced interest. All of these were valid arguments in 1974 and remain valid today.

In 1988 as a result of a decision by the Tory government the exemption was removed. According to statements given by the witnesses to the Standing Committee on Finance in 1987 the people who had the most to lose if the exemption was removed were senior citizens.

It therefore stands to reason that senior citizens are the people with the most to gain if the exemption is reinstated. According to testimony before the committee more than 80 per cent of taxpayers over 65 claimed the $1,000 deduction in 1983.

Despite the fact that the deduction was removed in 1988, 2,026,620 or about 70 per cent of all seniors who filed income tax returns in 1992 still included bank interest as a source of income. Bank interest was even more significant among the seniors 75 years of age and older, with 878,370 people or about 75 per cent naming bank interest as a source of income. It is obvious that for senior citizens keeping their money in a bank savings account is a way of life, the result of a lifetime of habit.

Think for a moment of the life of a person who is 75 years old. Think of the time they were born, the significant events of their lives and the lives of their parents. Think of the Great Depression. Think of the second world war. These people have known the hardship of trying to make ends meet when the ends just seem to get farther and farther apart.

The Great Depression hit Canada and Canadians hard. It was a terrible, grim time when all manner of personal indignities and deprivations became the norm. People lost their jobs, their homes, their dreams. Soup kitchens were a booming business. Men tramped the city streets trying to pick up 50 cents doing odd jobs or in desperation travelled the country in boxcars looking for work or a handout and the advice of those who still had handouts to give. It was always the same as that of John D. Rockefeller, always to save their money, not squander it. It was a lesson they took to heart.

Then the war came and blew the depression away. Suddenly there was a desperate need for everyone to work, but there was an equally desperate need for everything to go to the war effort. Rationing was introduced and people learned to barter and to save their butter and eggs for the important events in their lives.

People saved string from parcels. They saved paper. They saved buttons and zippers from discarded clothing, anything they thought could be used again.

Our senior citizens and many of their children still save everything useful. They are the original recyclers and they know how to clip a coupon. When they were finally able to work again they saved every cent they could squeeze from their carefully worked budgets as a down payment on their future.

Credit was a dirty word to our senior citizens. It meant you could not afford to pay your bills. It meant a loss of dignity.

• (1755)

Instead they saved to buy their homes. They saved to pay cash for their furniture, their appliances and their cars. They saved to pay for the education of their children. They saved for their old age so they would not have to do without in their sunset years, so they would not be beholden.

Now with interest rates so low their carefully hoarded nest eggs are yielding less and less. Seniors have been hard hit in recent years by falling interest rates. Unlike younger people who may have been able to accumulate savings, our senior citizens are usually unable to work. Their interest from their savings is their income. A $1,000 exemption on interest will really make a difference to them.

Younger taxpayers still working may enjoy a tax advantage or an investment in an RRSP, but such investments and tax breaks are often unavailable to seniors. Many older people are not at ease putting their money into more adventurous avenues.

Often they do not feel comfortable turning their life savings over to a stranger to invest. They are afraid of losing what they worked so hard to save. They feel it is safe and secure in a bank savings account and they want to be able to withdraw their money at will.

Surely the people who built this country deserve a break. It was their money, carefully saved and invested, the banks had at their disposal when others came to borrow. Their habit of putting money aside for the future enabled the banks to invest in the dreams of other younger people when they wanted to start a business or build a new home.

I believe this would be a good habit to instil in the young people of today as well. I believe giving them an income tax exemption on the first $1,000 of interest would prove to be an incentive.

As parents we always want things to be better for our children than they were for us. We try to teach them the importance of a strong work ethic. We show them ours is a society that celebrates success. We tell them they must always strive for personal excellence. We encourage them by stressing there is nothing they cannot achieve if they just try.

We know young people must be given the opportunity to learn to take responsibility for their own lives. Only then can they acquire the self–confidence and pride in their own accomplishments that everyone needs for self–esteem. Without self–esteem it is pretty hard to gain entry into the mainstream of society and virtually impossible to become the leaders we will need in the future.

Our youth are the future of our nation and our world. They will decide our destiny. The choices made by the young people of today will eventually define the world in which we all live.

There is little in this life more fulfilling than saving for a goal and reaching that goal through conscious effort and sacrifice. I can think of no better or more satisfying way to take control of one's own life and destiny.

Our government should do whatever it can to encourage our young people to be responsible citizens and consumers. Among young people age 25 to 29, 406,660 or 55 per cent included bank interest as a source of income in 1992. So it is already a significant means of saving, ready to increase with some encouragement. Young people who may be saving for a down payment on a house or for a new couch or refrigerator are not making much interest on their savings. They should not be penalized on what little they do earn.

An exemption would act as an incentive and would make more money available for banks to loan out as well. Many of the big ticket items like appliances have been purchased on credit cards in the past few years. Instead of the dirty word it was to our seniors, credit and the amount of credit available somehow became a status symbol.

Credit is incredibly easy to get. Everyone has heard of reports of children and even the family dog being offered credit cards. But credit card purchases cost consumers much more than waiting until one can pay cash. It is very easy to be sucked into the maelstrom of spending more than one actually earns.

In the first seven months of this year 36,118 consumer bankruptcies were filed across Canada. That is 16 per cent more than in the same span last year and one per cent more than in the first seven months of 1991, when the 12–month toll reached an unprecedented 62,277. According to some analysts, much of the cause of these consumer bankruptcies is credit card borrowing.

Saving is clearly a better way to go. For those with relatively modest incomes, an investment in a savings account is one of the few investment opportunities readily available.

There are plenty of tax breaks for those with large amounts of money to invest. An exemption on the payment of income tax on the first $1,000 of interest from savings accounts would give a break to the little guy and help our senior citizens as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Madam Speaker, I too rise to speak to the motion by the member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton concerning the tax exemption of interest income from saving accounts generating interest of less that $1,000.

I am convinced that this motion, in its present form, as the member explained in his speech, is aimed at helping people with low incomes, people who are not well off. However, it creates a huge void, because, of course, a motion is not a bill, it is not very precise. The motion provides:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Income Tax Act to eliminate the payment of income tax on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less.

Let us look at it in today's context. Someone with $10,000 in an account earning 9 per cent would make $900. This means that this $900 would be tax deductible. It might be a commendable goal. However, if I had $50,000, I could make five $10,000 term deposits in five different accounts and earn $4,500 in interest, $900 on each account, and pay no income tax. But in truth, I would not belong to the group the motion is aimed at. I am not convinced that he is not trying to help people with a high income or large savings to evade income tax.

For this reason, I find it difficult to support a motion whose present wording would create such an unprecedented tax loophole. Even if there is a precedent, it would still be a horrendous loophole.

If you put this debate in a larger perspective, you can see that the goal of the motion is to help lower income people. I am pleased that we are showing concern for people with a low income and few savings.

In politics we are very often influenced by the richest lobbies, we also go to bat for the neediest, but in between there are all the workers, all the wage earners, that we very often forget and that are probably the least organized. They very often belong to professional corporations or trade unions, but it is very seldom that we show concern in our speeches or political actions for the lower middle class. They maybe the least organized and this would explain the fact that they are the target of all government measures: they are not a political force.

If you look at this motion in the larger perspective, it shows a desire for equity. In the area of taxation everything is a matter of equity. However, I do not think that the solution is to increase the deductions we now have. With our deficit at around 32 billion dollars, such a proposal does not seem like a good idea at the present time. Just as we cannot afford to forego tax revenues, because our tax system is extremely complex and some people can even afford tax experts to bypass the system. I am not talking about fraud or anything illegal here, just going over every comma and every sentence in the Income Tax Act to get the most out of it.

I am just back from a series of consultations held by the finance committee in western Canada, where even tax experts told us: "Look, we cannot even make sense of this Act ourselves, and we are not sure that the government can make sense of it either. One of these days, we will have to consider a real reform, whose first objective would be, even before the amount of tax revenues to be generated, to simplify the whole system". Of course, the second objective would be to determine the optimal level of revenues to be generated by a new tax system.

All of this brings me back to an issue which has yet to be settled. The people have the feeling that the current tax system is not working and they are not mistaken.

Take, for example, the GST which has been in effect for several years now and which will not generate more revenues this year than last year. There is a problem here. Even though the growth of domestic demand is weak, we see that taxpayers have developed a number of ways to avoid paying this tax, which is perceived as being extremely unfair.

This has been fuelled by the Liberal members who decried this tax, when they were in opposition, and promised to replace it, something they never did. By the way, we should also be concerned about that. People felt that their concerns were legitimate since they even had the support of a political party saying that the tax was unfair.

It is true that it is not perfect, that it is flawed, that it causes a lot of problems, but the Liberal Party was accused of demagoguery when it said that it was a new tax. The tax on services was new, but the tax on goods simply replaced the federal sales tax. In that context, it is not right to make the taxpayers angrier than they already are about the current tax system for purely political reasons.

I come back to the fact that we cannot afford today to add these types of deductions, but if we want people with low incomes and few savings to feel that there is some kind of justice, we have to ensure that our tax rules do not allow higher income people to avoid paying their fair share.

Sometimes people are right, sometimes they are wrong, but when we refuse to have a thorough debate on an issue, the perceptions that people have, whether good or bad, remain. An example of that is the perception that banks do not pay their fair share. I do not have a definite opinion on that, but I think that it is something that is worth looking into. It is not by avoiding the issue or by making a fine statement that will sound great on the news, such as it is too generous, it is out of date, etc., that we will make progress. We will have to look into all this.

Perhaps when the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Revenue both consult Canadians on the budget next year they ought, instead of listening to all of the organized groups whose final word is always "Do anything you want to anybody else but me", to set some guidelines for a real debate, true consultation on various scenarios for tax policies and tax expenditures, in order to get a proper evaluation.

How much do the present measures cost? What are their objectives? Based on that, let us go out to Canadians so that they may make their own evaluation and come up with a final conclusion that "We can afford this, but not that. Here are what our priorities are for taxation for economic and social development".

Our taxation system pursues two objectives, obvious economic ones, but a major social objective as well: the redistribution of wealth. This ought never to be lost sight of. For that reason, if the taxation system is simplified, that second objective must not be lost sight of.

You do not deal with fiscal problems due to the fact that not enough tax revenue is being collected from people who could pay more, by increasing the number of deductions that already exist. We simply cannot afford it. How much would the measure suggested today cost? Good question. I repeat, those who are a little better off may manage to avoid this altogether by having more than one bank account, as I explained earlier, by having three or four accounts, for instance. That often happens.

I have two or three accounts myself. The point is to put your money into different accounts, keep your interest income below $1,000 and thus avoid paying taxes on this income. I realize this technicality could be improved upon while maintaining the purpose of the motion which is that interest income of $1,000 and less would not be taxable, but in the end, what have we achieved? How are we going to finance all that? The question lies here as well.

Therefore, out of a sense of fairness, yes, we have to work on it, but not necessarily in the way suggested. In the minute I have left, I wanted to say, because I heard mention of RRSPs, where accumulated interest is tax protected, that they are not really affected by such a motion, because RRSPs are taxable only when money is removed from them. This is when tax is taken, according to our income at that point.

So this would not promote saving necessarily. It would not have a particularly strong effect on saving, because the vehicle already exists and is already attractive enough, I imagine, from all the funds successfully channelled and the financial institutions' aggressive campaigns to solicit RRSPs.

So, to avoid creating an additional tax shelter, which will cost us a lot and risks benefitting those who, in the end, perhaps have the income and ability to avoid it, we cannot support this motion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, Motion 497 seeks to amend the Income Tax Act to eliminate the payment of personal income tax on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less.

The rationale used by the hon. member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton is that the motion will do five things. First, it will promote savings. It is pretty hard to save these days. As the hon. member from the Bloc mentioned, this creates different avenues and ways to stuff your savings away where it will be harder for Revenue Canada to find it.

Second, the motion is intended to help the elderly who rely on savings and seldom enjoy the tax advantages of an RRSP later in life. This is an honourable objective and one I would agree with as a problem to solve. But solving it this way is unnecessary, especially if we were to devise a proper system of taxation.

Third, it is intended to compensate for falling interest rates. Why is this the responsibility of taxpayers, adjusting for the inflation component and interest income? That is not necessary. When institutions set their rates they base them on the performance of the economy. They are set at a regular time and over a period of ten years the average rate of return is adjusted for inflation.

Fourth, the rationale is to reduce administration costs because banks will no longer have to issue T4s for interest income, reducing the paperwork for Revenue Canada.

I believe the hon. member has it backwards. In April we all become employees of Revenue Canada and we work for free. We sweat for hours trying to get this income tax done and figure out how much we have to pay, make sure it is correct and then send it in. The information we use has to come from where we have earned our money or placed or invested our money. So whether interest income on savings is less than or higher than $1,000, the banks will still have to issue the paperwork necessary to show you made less than $1,000 or more than $1,000.

• (1815)

We need to stop tinkering with the Income Tax Act and the income tax system. We should stop using it for direct social and economic engineering. This is another example of using it for social engineering. We are using it to solve a problem. I do not deny there is a problem with money, with savings, and with how we look after ourselves, but the way to solve it is not through the Income Tax Act. We are making it too cumbersome and too difficult. It should be under a separate direct–spending program if we want to help seniors and children.

In 1917 the original purpose of income tax was simply to raise money. It was to pay for the first world war. Then the politicians and bureaucrats saw how nice and neat it was. I agree, it is a great way to deliver social and economic benefits. But problems have been created.

In 1992 the net revenue that was collected by the government on personal income alone was $60 billion. That included all the exemptions, deductions, and tax incentives or loopholes. If there were no deductions, exemptions, and tax incentives, the revenue for 1992 would have been $120 billion. That is $60 billion we are leaving in the hands of people. We give it back to the people. We know it is unfair.

If we collected that revenue and put it into the spending envelopes of the people who are responsible for immigration, transportation, unemployment, and health care, then we would know what that costs. We would know who is responsible: an elected minister or a permanent deputy minister. Those people would be more responsible and accountable. The pressure would be on the government to rationalize and justify its spending. I believe there would be a downward pressure. The problem with our current income tax system is that it is unfair.

The GST is another example. It generates $30 billion to $36 billion, yet the net take of the government is $15 billion to $16 billion. There is the system of rebates, the high cost of compliance and the high cost of collection. It is ridiculous.

If we used taxation for the one simple purpose of raising money and then put the money into the areas where we want to spend it and where Canadians want it to be spent, it would be a more efficient and effective system of taxation than we presently have and we would no longer need all these rates.

We know the system is complicated, confusing, and convoluted. We need to make changes. Yet nobody addresses that. Everybody is afraid to look at a simple system of taxation because in simplicity the cost of transition from the current income tax system to a simple tax system would be too expensive and the transition would be unattainable. I heard that from the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, who is an income tax lawyer and an expert in his field.

In the name of deficit reduction and in the name of losing tax dollars, is the government afraid to look at a system of taxation that features a single rate and allows a generous tax–free portion so that the people who need the money most, the seniors and low–income Canadians, do not have to pay any income tax? That line would be somewhere between the poverty line and the low income cut–off. Would that not reduce the pressure on our social programs? Would that not be a more efficient way of helping the people who need the help, rather than tinkering with the Income Tax Act, adding five more pages of definitions and rulings and three more reasons why auditors have to check every bank account, as the hon. member said earlier?

We have to look at tax reform. Tax lawyers are afraid to return from holidays to read the latest communiqués from Revenue Canada with the new rulings and definitions.

The current system is a disincentive to work. The more a person makes the higher the percentage they have to remit. They call that progressivity, but at a certain point they stop working for the government. Why? They see that government wastes money. If the government were spending the money on programs Canadians want and not what bureaucrats and politicians want, and if people could see their tax money being spent fairly and wisely, in a way that was responsible and accountable, in a clear and visible fashion, we would have more compliance. More people would pay. With a single rate everybody would know they are paying the same rate over a certain base that is tax free.

It costs us $12 billion to send in our income tax. The personal portion we pay other people to do this for us costs $3.7 billion. Revenue Canada is $1.5 billion. The government cost for GST is $0.6 billion. Corporate costs to do the T4s and their corporate tax is $4.9 billion. The GST industry costs $1.7 billion.

It is clear that our current system is unfair, unclear, and unacceptable. There is no reason we should keep up with it and there is no reason we should continue to promote ways and means of adding more to the confusion of the income tax. We should be cleaning it up, simplifying it, rewriting it.

We have had three major tax reforms since 1971. We went from 18 different brackets and a high marginal rate of 80 per cent in 1971 to 10 brackets and 43 per cent in 1981, to today, from 1988 until now, three brackets with a high marginal rate of 29 per cent. When each of those transitions and reforms went from 80 per cent down to 29 per cent it meant more revenue to the government.

Lower taxes mean more revenue. Simplicity means more revenue. Therefore we need one more major tax reform in this country, one more simplified tax featuring a single rate with a generous tax free portion that will look after the lower income and retain progressivity. It will introduce fairness. Everybody will know what they are paying. Reduce the rate to the area of 20 to 22 per cent, another 7 per cent reduction, and a single rate. I would argue that would generate even more revenue for the government.

Some of the other principles we should keep in tax reform are keeping it simple and understandable and defining the purpose as raising money. Tax reform is not to add another element that the first $1,000 you make in savings accounts is free because we are helping this sector; not to help the farming sector by giving this deduction over here; not to develop oil and gas by offering flow–through shares over here; not to help this by doing that over there; not to help charitable organizations by allowing generous exemptions over here; not to aid and facilitate seniors by having some moneys there.

The Liberals are neglecting their responsibility to the public in giving lip service to tax reform. They are not prepared to look at genuine comprehensive tax reform in this country. The Reform Party is and will. We will continue to address this issue.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wish to rise today in the House to speak on Motion No. 497. I would like to congratulate my hon. colleague from Bramalea—Gore—Malton for his hard work in getting this motion to the floor of the House of Commons.

Motion No. 497 reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Income Tax Act to eliminate the payment of personal income tax on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less.

Federal taxes on foreign and domestic income received by Canadians and Canadian income received by non–residents are imposed under one statute, the Income Tax Act. The net income or profit received by Canadians is defined by that act.

Personal income taxes are imposed by both the federal and provincial governments. The federal government has agreements with all provinces except Quebec to collect personal income taxes on their behalf.

The federal government defines taxable income in the Income Tax Act and levies its personal income tax according to the rate schedule in the act. The agreeing provinces then levy their personal income taxes as a percentage of the basic federal tax.

In the last decade, the number of taxpayers has jumped from 10.4 million to 13.7 million. In 1988 there was a sharp drop in taxpayers due to the first year of the tax reform. Under it, a significant number of low income taxpayers were granted tax relief. Another decline in the number of taxpayers took place in 1991 and was caused by the recession of the early 1990s.

Between 1974 and 1988 the first $1,000 of interest income was exempt. The exemption was introduced in 1974 as a way of counteracting the impact of inflation on the taxation of interest. It was also argued that the exemption reduced some tax evasion, as those with small amounts of bank interest no longer had incentive to ignore the interest they received when filing their tax return.

• (1825)

Several arguments can be made in support of my hon. colleague's motion. The exemption of the first $1,000 of interest income would promote savings. This is very important for those with relatively modest incomes. Often an investment in a savings account is one of the few investment opportunities readily available to a good number of people.

Under the existing system, by imposing tax on interest earned some consumers are more apt to choose to spend their income in the year it is earned because the interest earned on their already taxed income will be taxed should they save. "Spend it. We are only going to be taxed on it", they cry. This commonly held view dictates against the merits of saving money.

With the proposed motion there would be little distortion between present and future consumption. While there is some controversy about the magnitude of the change on savings resulting from income tax on interest, the general view is that it is a negative effect.

Some of us ask what are the consequences of reducing savings. It is generally felt that a reduction in savings will normally lead to a reduction in capital accumulation and in the long run to a reduction in output per capita.

In light of shrinking government budgets and the upcoming review of our role in the provision of pension income, we have and continue to encourage Canadians to invest in their retirement. There are deductions for RRSP contributions, but why is there no provision for savings account or Canada savings bond interest?

I realize that RRSP interest is taxed upon withdrawal, albeit generally at a reduced rate. There are real limitations in the deferral of taxation and these implications translate into economic choices.

Another argument in support of the motion is that it will help Canada's senior citizens. After the $1,000 tax exemption was eliminated in 1988 there were some very convincing statements in favour of keeping the exemption, especially as it related to senior citizens.

In the 1980s over 80 per cent of our taxpayers over the age of 65 claimed this exemption. It was said that the elimination would have a disproportionate effect on senior citizens. Almost half the current generation of Canadian seniors, about 50 per cent, live at or below the poverty line. A small percentage, 5 per cent only, across Canada enjoy incomes of $40,000 or more. The remaining 45 per cent had hoped during pre–retirement years to invest in something that would act as a supplement to their pension cheques. This 45 per cent of Canadian senior citizens over the age of 65 would benefit by the restoration of the $1,000 investment income deduction.

A third argument is that the exemption would compensate for falling interest rates. Although economic activity may in general be stimulated by falling interest rates, those whose incomes depend on interest bearing assets are being hurt by falling rates. Seniors have been hit hard in recent years by such falling interest rates.

While there are benefits for seniors and an encouragement of savings I also have some serious concerns about the motion. The proposal to exempt the interest on savings accounts runs counter to current trends toward increasing tax revenue. If all bank interest were tax exempt, the lost tax revenues would certainly be significant.

In the mid–1980s the $1,000 exemption cost the federal government about $900 million in loss tax revenue. In 1992 tax filers declared over $18 billion in bank interest. This figure would be much higher if the exclusion were only for interest earned at financial institutions, as investors would adjust their portfolios to take advantage of the tax break.

Recently Revenue Canada instituted reporting changes for financial institutions. Beginning with the 1995 tax year, these institutions will be required to issue T5s for interest income at $50, down from the current $100 limit.

This new measure is meant to limit tax evasion. Some taxpayers with interest below $100 have simply ignored that income for tax purposes, forgetting or ignoring that every interest dollar earned is to be included as income. However the new change seems to indicate the government considers bank interest an important source of tax revenue.

Revenue is obviously an important component of our deficit reduction policy and reducing revenue runs counter to this necessary policy.

Another concern I have with the motion is the difference in treatment of earned income and non–earned income. Those who work for minimum wage are taxed on the first dollar they earn. Those who earn income from interest revenue are treated equitably under the existing system. I understand that invested money was once income and was likely taxed at the time it was earned, but the interest too is income. Allowing exemptions for interest income will disproportionately benefit seniors. How can we balance this against earned income so that it is socially equitable?

I will also address a comment by my colleague from Rimouski. The bill indicates interest earned on savings accounts. This would include all savings accounts and it would be an accumulative effect. It would be the total of the interest that would be considered an income. We could not spread our savings over five, six or ten different accounts. The exemption would apply to the full income no matter where it was.

• (1830)

While I have some serious concerns about the bill, I generally speak in support of it because the investment income exemption is one of the few tax initiatives that would reach out and touch most Canadian citizens, including my constituents of Erie, rather than just a select group of investors.

Taxpayers are crying out for tax relief and tax reductions, and understandably so. This initiative could be a possible means of partially satisfying these demands.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, contrary to the private member's Motion M–497, the Government of Canada should not support the elimination of personal income taxes on interest from personal savings accounts when the amount of interest is $1,000 or less.

As hon. members may remember, before 1988 individuals were allowed to claim a deduction of up to $1,000 of interest income in computing taxable income. This interest income deduction existed at a time of high inflation as an approximate method of providing some allowance for income tax paid on the inflationary component of interest.

Inflation is now very low. Therefore this rationale would not apply today. In addition, the elimination of interest income deduction was one of a number of base broadening initiatives introduced as part of the 1988 tax reform. Those measures made possible a reduction in tax rates and the enrichment of certain tax credits.

The elimination of interest income deduction for 1988 and the subsequent taxation years was largely compensated by a $1,730 increase of the basic personal amount.

Therefore it would be inappropriate to restore this deduction particularly at a time of very low inflation. The federal revenue cost resulting from allowing a deduction of up to $1,000 of interest income for income tax purposes would be very high; in the order of $1 billion per year.

Because of the fiscal situation of our country we simply could not afford to make such a change without making up lost revenue. This lost revenue would therefore have to be made up through a general tax increase, an increase in taxes across the board. Most of the burden would fall on the shoulders of the average income Canadians while the deduction would benefit only most higher income individuals.

The bulk of the efforts of the government on the income tax side since coming to office in the fall of 1993 has been directed at ensuring the tax system is fair. A number of tax advantages that did not meet the standards of fairness Canadians expect were eliminated in the 1994 and 1995 federal budgets presented by the Minister of Finance.

Let me highlight a few of those more important changes that have contributed to making our tax system fairer. As hon. members are aware, the federal budget of February 22, 1994 proposed a number of personal income tax measures. First, the $100,000 capital gains exemption was eliminated. This exemption largely benefited high income filers, and there was little evidence that it encouraged investment and job creation as it was first intended to do.

The tax exemption for premiums related to the first $25,000 of coverage under employer provided life insurance plans was also eliminated. This measure ensures individuals with employer paid life insurance are not treated more favourably than those who purchase life insurance out of after tax income.

The government did not limit its elimination of tax preferences to those preferences that affect individuals. A number of tax measures affecting businesses were also introduced in the government's first budget. For instance, the deduction for meal and entertainment expenses was reduced from 80 per cent to 50 per cent of eligible expenses. This change makes the tax system fairer by reflecting the significant element of personal consumption involved in these or such expenses.

In addition, Canadian controlled private corporations with capital of $50 million or more are no longer eligible for the small business deduction and the enriched research and development credits accorded to small businesses.

The government's commitment to tax fairness did not end with the tabling of its 1994 budget; quite the contrary. The federal budget tabled February 27 announced more steps the government was taking to make the tax system fairer. For example, it was announced that the tax deferral advantage enjoyed by individuals with business or professional income resulting from their ability to select their own year end for tax purposes was being eliminated.

As other Canadians, individuals who begin to earn business or professional income will have to report their income on a calendar year basis.

Moreover, the 1995 budget eliminated some of the tax benefits from family trusts. The government repealed provisions allowing the postponement of the implementation of a rule requiring a deemed disposal of assets after 21 years.

Our efforts to make our tax system fair did not start and do not end with budgets. The proof of that is the measures announced by the government in December 1994 to prevent the erosion of the tax base brought about by the active promotion of abusive tax shelters and a longer list of deductions in the calculation of the alternative minimum tax.

What the government has done in the last couple of years attests to its commitment to a fair Canadian tax system. Giving preferential treatment to interest income, as suggested in this motion, would not be consistent with the policy the government has adhered to from the start. Such a change would benefit mainly high income taxpayers, since they have more savings.

To conclude, and for all these reasons, I urge the House to reject private members' Motion M–497.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): There being no further members rising for debate and the motion not being designated a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired and the order is dropped from the Order Paper, pursuant to Standing Order 96(1).

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, on October 3, I asked the minister of defence a question pertaining to separation expenses for members of the armed forces. Separation expenses are funds a member of the armed forces may apply for when being posted to a new place of duty away from his or her spouse and dependents.

This money is to temporarily assist the member with new accommodations while separated from his or her spouse and dependents. Temporary is the key word. The member's spouse and dependents are expected to eventually move to the location of the member's new posting.

Canadian forces administrative order 209–3, article 8, states a member may collect separation expenses for up to one year if the new posting will create undue hardship on the member's family and if the member's career manager feels it is in the best interest of the Canadian Armed Forces.

On October 23, I asked the minister why some senior officers were collecting separation expenses for a prolonged period of time. I pointed to two examples. In one case access to information documents show that Major–General Armand Roy, now a lieutenant–general and deputy chief of defence staff, collected separation expenses over a three–year period totalling over $50,000.

Access to information documents show that Rear Admiral Keeler, the current chief of financial services at national defence headquarters, collected $86,000 in separation expenses over a four–year period.

I told the minister that by allowing this type of action to continue while able seamen in Esquimalt collect welfare to feed their families was an example of the minister's mismanagement of his portfolio. I asked him how he could allow this to go on under his nose.

The hon. parliamentary secretary for defence stood on behalf of the minister but failed to grasp the meaning of the subject matter at hand. He gave me an answer that dealt with moving expenses. He said I had signed a report supporting the mobility of our soldiers. I was extremely dissatisfied with the parliamentary secretary's answer. I do agree with the mobility for our troops but did not sign any report to that effect.

The parliamentary secretary said that my question hurt the morale of our soldiers. Let me tell the parliamentary secretary, bread lines and welfare cheques hurt the morale of the Canadian Armed Forces, not questions pertaining to Canadian forces administrative orders. He did not address the subject matter at hand. He did not explain why general officers were permitted to collect separation expenses for a prolonged period at a great expense while some soldiers were having trouble feeding their families.

I will put my question again and hope that this time the parliamentary secretary, having had over a month to consider the question, will be able to provide Canadians and members of our armed forces with an answer.

How can the minister allow general officers to collect separation expenses for a prolonged period at great expense when other members of the Canadian Armed Forces are collecting welfare?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member to note that the separation expenses of which he speaks are offered to both officers and non–commissioned members of the Canadian forces to ease the disruption caused by the frequent relocation of Canadian forces members and their families. I believe he is quite familiar with that.

As the member is aware, certain current Canadian forces policies dictate that a member is expected to move their family to the new place of duty within a reasonable time. Should an occasion arise where the move to the new location does not meet personal or service needs, a member may apply to their career manager for an imposed restriction to receive separation expenses.

Normally separation expenses are granted for a period of up to a year, but extensions are considered as an exception to the rule and are approved only when the circumstances justify it, and if it is in the best interests of the Canadian forces and the individual. Every member who requires an extension of separation expenses must submit a request through the chain of command. It is the responsibility of the individual to demonstrate that the reason for separation from dependents is valid.

Approval of an imposed restriction is granted for such reasons relating to a dependent's medical situation, the education of dependent children, or personal economic factors of an aging parent at home who has to be looked after by a spouse.

The receipt of separation expenses for more than two years is extremely rare, but changing circumstances may require extensions beyond that. We have to remain flexible.

The hon. member should note as well that it may be in the interests of the department in some cases to grant separation expenses to a member of the Canadian forces rather than paying the cost of two successive moves in a short period of time, if it costs less.

In the government's opinion, separation expenses provide our troops with the kind of financial support which I am sure the hon. member would agree is necessary to maintain mobility and ensure the welfare of all the Canadian forces personnel. After all, this was the report of the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5) a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

(The House adjourned at 6.45 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NATIONAL SAFE DRIVING WEEK

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is National Safe Driving Week.

Ten years ago, vehicle collisions killed 4,364 Canadians and injured another 259,200. It was estimated then that approximately 43 per cent of driver fatalities involved the use of alcohol.

By 1994, even with the doubling of vehicles on the road, vehicle collision deaths had fallen by 25 per cent to 3,260 and the number of injured by 5 per cent to 245,000. However, of those collisions, 44 per cent of driver fatalities involved the use of alcohol.

The conclusion is obvious. We have made great strides in reducing the number of Canadians killed and injured on our roads, but impaired driving continues to demand our attention. That is why the theme of this year's national safe driving week is "The Hidden Face of Impaired Driving". Canadians are still having accidents that could have been prevented by not mixing drinking and driving.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal so–called unity package is going to have a negative effect on Canada. This package will divide the country more than it will unite it. The distinct society clause will be seen as giving Quebec special status. By lending the federal government's constitutional veto to provincial governments rather than the people, the government will pit one province against the others.

The net effect of the government's package is to increase inequality. Without a doubt, denying all citizens constitutional equality will entrench the notion that all Canadians are unequal.

My constituents in Edmonton—Strathcona and I support the Reform's blue book policy which states clearly our commitment to Canada as one nation and to our vision of Canada as a balanced federation of 10 equal provinces and citizens.

SRI LANKA

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Sri Lanka is a country consumed in violence by the ongoing conflict between the Sri Lankan army and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam. Since 1983, 50,000 people have been killed and another 500,000 Tamils have been forced into exile.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has stated Canada's position: There can be no military solution to the problems in Sri Lanka. Both the minister and the secretary of state have stated on a number of occasions that Canada is willing to become involved in resolving the conflict if asked by both sides.

The situation in Sri Lanka is grave. Innocent people are being subjected to terrible violence, hunger and despair. Amidst this terrible violence, allegations have arisen that aid money is being used to buy military equipment.

I applaud the efforts of the minister and the secretary of state in issuing a standing offer to become involved in resolving this dispute, and encourage them to act to ensure that aid reaches those who need it the most.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today is a very special day.

Every year for the past six years, December 6 has been a day to reflect on violence against women. Since the day when 14 young women were shot and killed at the École polytechnique in Montreal, Canadians and Quebecers have become less and less tolerant of all forms of violence, particularly violence against women. How can one not be appalled by the fact that three out of ten women in Canada have been hit at least once by their spouses?

The Quebec government understands the need to act and it has chosen this day to table its policy on violence against women.

The federal government should follow in its footsteps and deal with the causes of violence, which are mostly psychological distress and despair linked to unemployment, indebtedness and poverty.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House the deep concerns of many of my constituents regarding pornography.

The local chapter of the Saint John Catholic Women's League has sent me several little ribbons in recognition of White Ribbons Against Pornography or WRAP week. The CWL took part in WRAP activities from October 22 to 29.

The members of the CWL and their parishioners wore the ribbons, wrote their names on the backs of them and sent them to me to show their opposition to pornography in any form. We need stronger laws to protect us from this destructive menace in our society.

Today we remember the 14 young women who were brutally and tragically murdered at École Polytechnique in Montreal five years ago. As we honour their memories let us remember that pornography contributes to the type of violent act that took their lives.

I commend my constituents for their efforts and I wholeheartedly agree with them. I urge the government to stand up for Canadians and pass stronger anti–pornography laws.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we remember the tragedy that occurred on December 6, 1989. It has been six years since 14 young women at École Polytechnique in Montreal lost their lives. The pain of that day is still fresh in our minds.

Although much has been done to improve public awareness with respect to violence against women, we have only to read the papers to see that it is still happening every day. One look at the statistics demonstrates that women continue to be the target of violent acts.

Steps have been taken by the Liberal government over the last two years to curb violence against women and to promote women's equality both within Canada and internationally. Within Canada, the federal plan for gender equality was announced while internationally, Canada played a leading role at the United Nations World Conference on Women. However, we still have a long way to go.

Today, on the national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, take a moment to remember the 14 young women who died, as well as countless others who have suffered, both here in Canada and around the world.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today marks the sixth anniversary of the tragic deaths of 14 young women at the École Polytechnique in Montreal.

In honour of this national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, the Government of Canada calls on all Canadians to recognize that violence against women is a violation of women's human rights and has no place in Canadian society.

• (1405)

Unfortunately too many women continue to suffer various forms of abuse at the hands of their partners, acquaintances or strangers. Therefore, eliminating violence remains a priority of the Canadian government.

Since the tragedy in Montreal, the federal government has stepped up its efforts to eliminate violence against women. In fact, Canada is viewed as a world leader in recognizing and addressing the problem through community based action, information exchange and awareness, and shelters for battered women and children.

I call on all Canadians to assume responsibility for the eradication of all forms of violence against women in this country.

BILL C–103

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a Senate committee proposed an amendment to Bill C–103 that would grandfather the Canadian version of Sports Illustrated. In so doing, it joined the Reform Party, the task force on the Canadian magazine industry and the current Minister for International Trade in making this recommendation.

Unbelievably the Minister of Canadian Heritage is compromising our international reputation by insisting that Sports Illustrated be banned retroactively as of March 1993. If the Senate, a special task force on split runs and the Minister for International Trade all recognize the legitimate rights of Sports

Illustrated to run a split run in Canada, why does not the Minister of Canadian Heritage?

Maybe the answer is that he clearly does not know what he is doing. Yesterday he said: "What we are trying to do is make sure our Canadian industries remain Canadian, are able to grow and export, because export is part of their ability to mature". But get this: Bill C–103 will impose a Canadian 80 per cent excise tax on our magazine exports. Unbelievable.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, five years ago former NDP MP Dawn Black gained unanimous support in the House of Commons for her bill making December 6 a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. As we have each year since 1990, today we remember and mourn the lives of the 14 women killed six years ago in Montreal.

Today is not just a day of remembrance but a day of action. In this respect the Liberals have not lived up to their commitments to women. In the past year the federal government has wiped out the Canadian advisory council on the status of women. While the government says it is committed to ending violence against women, it dismantles the very programs that provide vital support to women.

Many such programs are funded through the Canada assistance plan or federal transfer payments to the provinces and territories, payments which are being cut back drastically, threatening the survival of emergency shelters for women, child care and other programs to help women and their families.

The Liberals must show their commitment to women through action, not words.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is a day of national mourning and remembrance for the 14 young women whose lives were cut off in mid–stride six years ago for one reason only: they were women.

As we mourn we should be mindful that over 50 per cent of women in Canada, one in three in B.C., are the object of physical, mental and emotional violence. Battered body and soul, living with chronic helplessness and pain, it is a legacy of bitterness that they pass on to their children, Canada's children.

As parliamentarians, women or men, Liberal, Reform or Bloc, we have a duty to stop this endless nightmare that so many women endure as an excuse for living. The Minister of Justice, the Minister of Health and the Secretary of State for the Status of Women have shown clear leadership on this issue but it is not enough.

We must mobilize our communities, the media and businesses. We must make this issue a cause nationale. Violent crimes cost this country over $4 billion a year in money but the real cost in terms of human life and hope is immeasurable.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we mark December 6 as Canada's national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

Today we remember, we mourn and we act. We remember the 14 students who tragically lost their lives at École Polytechnique in a senseless act of violence against women. We mourn the loss of 14 of our best and brightest young women and what could have been.

We vow to act with resolve to eliminate abuse against women everywhere. On average, a woman is killed every six days in Canada, often in a home and by someone she knows. The weapon of choice is generally a gun. These are startling, sobering facts, but true.

The government is responding with initiatives, including tougher firearms control, elimination of the extreme drunkenness defence, more effective peace bonds and much more. However, eradication of violence against women requires the full participation of all members of society: government, media, business, communities, individuals and families.

I encourage everyone to join in the partnership to eliminate violence against women. Just do it.

Mr. John English (Kitchener, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, six years ago in a university, a place of learning, a Canadian tragedy occurred. On this day in 1989 a lone male directed his rage at 14 innocent women at École Polytechnique in Montreal.

In a country such as Canada where so many women have experienced some level of injury, physical or sexual, we must make every effort to live up to our reputation as being the best country in the world in which to live by ensuring a society which is safe from ethnic or gender based violence.

We mark this day of remembrance for the victims of the Montreal massacre and to raise Canadians' awareness that violence against women is not only a crime, but an infringement of human rights.

Violence against women reflects not power over others but the fear of cowards.

CANADIAN HERITAGE COMMITTEE

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, the government introduced a motion to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

However, this declaration of love toward Quebecers has turned out to be a complete crock, in light of the incendiary comments made by some Liberal and Reform members of the heritage committee.

What Quebec federalist can believe in the sincerity of Liberal members when they strongly object to Telefilm Canada's subsidies to French–language audiovisual productions, which they see as overly generous in relation to the demographic weight of francophones?

No Quebecer can remain indifferent to these members' shameless blackmail tactics against the Canada Council last week and Telefilm yesterday, if they maintain their policy of subsidizing any artistic project on the basis of creative merit rather than on the basis of Quebec creators' partisan commitment to federalism.

This spectacle is a clear indication that—

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to commemorate December 6 which remains in our national conscience for the death of the women students in Montreal. Last year on this day, in response to hyperbole on the government side, I questioned the sincerity of some Liberal members. A year has now passed and it is time to examine the government's record of how little has been accomplished to really change things on behalf of victims.

We now have more gun regulation that will not make the Montreal murders less likely to occur again. Victims still have no comprehensive special standing in the courts and the Criminal Code. We still have section 745 which releases murderers early and my private member's bill for victims is still to be dealt with by the House.

I call on the government, in view of the well–meaning sentiments that are always heard on this day, that by this time next year may we have substantive changes to the law which will bring meaning to the remembrance of this day. May it be said of the House that while being right, we could also do what is right.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, six years ago the unspeakable happened in Montreal. I want to pay special tribute to my former colleagues, Dawn Black and Mary Collins. Five years ago the House, in a rare show of unanimity, passed Ms. Black's private member's bill creating this day in perpetuity as a day of remembrance and action.

I would also like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Saint–Hubert. She is another individual who supports very strongly many of the measures which we fought for across party lines in the House.

Violence against women is a very special horror which this country deals with. It is not one which responds merely to platitudes. It is not one which responds to political responses with respect to social programs or gun—

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this week, the very loquacious member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine was determined to show that he could take arrogance and absurdity one step further.

Mistaking this place for the defunct youth Parliament of Canada, the gentleman nicknamed "Monsieur 31" confirmed that he had all it takes to hold the part of the leading man in a vaudeville show.

In her editorial, Lise Bissonnette of Le Devoir reported that the young MP had launched an all–out attack against the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, which he accused of being unable to carry out its mandate, adding that his government could easily deal directly with its partners. Ms. Bissonnette ironically described the member's remarks as follows: "As we know, out of the mouth of babes—".

Each of us has a duty and a responsibility to stop all forms of violence. That is what our government is doing, especially through the Firearms Act that we just passed.

I wish to thank the families of the victims of l'École polytechnique for being so vigilant and courageous in their efforts to create awareness and their support for gun control. I am sure that they are helping to save lives.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on the weekend, the Minister of Labour announced on all TV and radio stations in Quebec that, as part of its unemployment insurance reforms, the federal government will create a reserve fund to cushion the impact of future economic recessions or slowdowns.

On the other hand, the 1995 budget of the Minister of Finance provides that UI fund surpluses will be used to absorb the federal deficit. That is what it says on pages 89 and 94 of the Budget Plan. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance did not answer our questions. Today, I will put the question to the Prime Minister.

Considering that the statement by the Minister of Labour is a clear and direct contradiction of what is indicated in the government's budget, could the Prime Minister tell us which minister is right?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Both, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in that case, I will put the following question to the Prime Minister.

If they are both right, how does this tally with the facts? There are no two ways about it: either the Minister of Labour is right, and a reserve fund will be created to cushion the impact of economic problems, or the budget provisions are no longer accurate. How can the Prime Minister say in all honesty and sincerity that both ministers are right, when they are contradicting each other?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the Unemployment Insurance Fund shows a surplus, it is entered as a surplus, and the money is used in the government's current accounts. On the books, however, it is considered as a debt we owe this fund. Instead of borrowing on the market, we use this fund. It is on record as a reserve that will have to be paid back if necessary. However, because we have worked very hard to reduce unemployment since we formed the government, the Unemployment Insurance Fund has shown an annual surplus because of our good management.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister realizes what he just said. He just explained that the government's deficit for this year will actually be $5 million more, because the Minister of Finance took the surplus in the Unemployment Insurance Fund, subtracted it from that column, put unemployment insurance revenues into revenue, and then told us: "Here, this is will be my deficit".

Does he realize that with this answer he just confirmed, as the leader of this government, that the deficit of the Minister of Finance will be $5 million more?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said before very clearly, we consider that the funds in question are made up of money that we borrowed. Instead of borrowing from the private sector, we are borrowing from ourselves. However, on the books, as good accountants, we said it was not our money, it was money held in reserve.

Instead of borrowing the money on the market and competing with the private sector, we are using this money, which we know we will have to pay back some day.

• (1420)

However, it is quite probable that in the years to come, since the government is working very hard to create jobs, instead of a deficit the UI Fund will again show a surplus next year.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

The data available in the financial review of the Minister of Finance reveal that 82 per cent of program expenditure reductions proposed by the federal government were in the unemployment insurance program alone.

In this context, how can the Prime Minister refuse to admit that his government's only strategy in fighting the deficit was to cut the benefits to the unemployed?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the Parti Quebecois government says we cut transfers to the provinces, it is contradicting the member, who has just said that all we cut were the benefits of the unemployed, and not transfers.

But we cut all over, except that we reduced transfers such as those for health and the other programs. We did, however, increase equalization payments. In fact, since we have been in government, transfers to the province of Quebec have remained at exactly the same level. They are even slightly higher than they were when we came to office.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is avoiding the question. We are saying that, of all the government's program cuts in connection with transfers to the provinces, 82 per cent of the cuts were made to the UI fund. This is what we are saying today. And this is what he is trying to get round.

I would ask him the following question. Does the Prime Minister realize that his approach to reducing the deficit through the unemployment insurance surplus is unconscionable and testifies to his inability to improve the state of public finances other than by imposing a job tax? What his employment insurance amounts to then is a job tax.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member is engaging in an attempt to misinform Canadians.

Let us go back to last Friday and bring forward two basic facts. It is very important to clear the fog the Bloc Quebecois constantly tries to disseminate.

First, $800 million of the proposed savings in the system are being recycled into direct employment benefits to get people back to work. Therefore it represents a substantial shift from income benefits to employment benefits and is designed to meet our very different work situation. It allows us to give people a quick, effective way back into the employment market.

The figures the hon. member refers to have absolutely no relevance to the fact that we have said directly the money is being recycled.

Second, we are beginning to reduce the premiums under the system. There will be a $1.3 billion reduction for businesses and employees so that we can put more money in their pockets and they can create more jobs.

[Editor's Note: Electrical power interruption.]

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my argument is so powerful that it even affects the electrical system of the House. The problem is that when the Bloc stands to speak, the lights go off totally and everybody is in the dark.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says he wants to put his makeshift unity policy behind him and get on with jobs and the economy. So let us do that.

At present the greatest single impediment to job creation and economic growth in the country is the dead weight of the federal debt of $570 billion, a debt the government is adding to at the staggering rate of almost $100 million per day.

The IMF and Canadian business groups have repeatedly called upon the finance minister to get real and revise his weak deficit reduction targets.

Has the Prime Minister specifically instructed the finance minister to come up with a new deficit reduction target, the only one that means anything to the Canadian taxpayer, namely a zero deficit by 1997–98?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are on target with what we said to the Canadian public we would achieve.

We said that we started at 6.2 per cent of GDP and that we would be at 3 per cent after three years. We will be there. We set some realistic goals in a way that we have not stifled growth in Canada. At the same time as we were going through a reduction in the deficit, we saw a reduction in unemployment. The policies are working very well.

Most of the time members of the third party are not asking questions on the economy. Yesterday, for example, they spent the day talking about the coat of arms. Is it extremely important?

On January 15, 1994 the leader of the Reform Party criticized previous opposition parties. He said that anyone could make a jackass of themselves in question period. Yesterday the Reform Party proved that quite well.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the former head of the Economic Council of Canada, John Deutsch, used to have trouble getting Mr. Trudeau to take the debt and deficit seriously. I wonder if Mr. Trudeau passed the virus on to the current Prime Minister.

The only way Mr. Deutsch could get Trudeau to take public finance seriously was to somehow link it to the Quebec or unity issue. Perhaps we can awaken the Prime Minister's interest in the issue by pointing to a recent CROP poll which said that 80 per cent of Quebecers believed the government should come to grips with real deficit reduction. This is something Quebecers have in common with other Canadians.

If the Prime Minister is groping for actions to unite the country, why does he not personally commit his government to balancing the federal budget before the end of his mandate? I ask him not to give us a 3 per cent answer.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we ran in the last campaign we were very careful to put in writing what we would do. We are meeting our goals. We are respecting the commitments we made and we are on target.

When we introduced the budget last February it was extremely well received by all commentators; we had done the right thing. We are moving in a rational way in the reduction of the deficit. At the same time we are not doing it in a way that is causing social problems in the country.

That is why we are a party of the centre. We are not doctrinaire. We will not eliminate medicare just to have a balanced budget. We will make sure we have policies that respect the individual and at the same time offer solid administration.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister likes to dwell on the past. I am wondering whether he remembers a time in 1978 when Mr. Trudeau went to an economic summit in West Germany and was somehow briefly converted to deficit reduction. He came back and went on TV. Does the Prime Minister remember this? He announced $2 billion in spending cuts without even telling his finance minister, who is now the Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister take a short trip, perhaps to Queen's Park; take a few lessons on budget balancing from Mr. Harris; get on TV and commit himself to spending cuts that will balance the federal budget?

Eight of eleven senior governments in Canada are now committed to deficit elimination. Will the Prime Minister make the Government of Canada the ninth by committing to balance the federal budget by 1997–98?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Reform Party is making too many trips to Queen's Park. He will lose the only Ontario member he has in this House very quickly if he does not change his travelling plans.

We have a good plan for reduction of the deficit. At the same time we are making sure the economy is working well. We will have managed to take the deficit from 6.2 per cent to 3 per cent in three years, as we said we would. It will be reduced gradually and eventually we will have a balanced budget.

• (1430)

However, we are not like their friend in the United States by the name of Gingrich who is talking about balancing the books in 2002. We do not talk like that; in Canada we do it.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

A little more than a month after the Quebec referendum, the unemployment insurance reform tabled by the government calls for both the maintenance of national standards and the implementation of five new manpower programs as demanded by Quebec.

In light of the maintenance of national standards and the introduction of new programs, will the Prime Minister admit that the proposed reform does not in any way reflect the distinct and unique character of the people of Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the reform has been well received all over the country. I have figures in front of me showing that 66 per cent of people in Quebec feel it is a well balanced reform which respects the regions.

But an unemployed person is an unemployed person. What does he or she need from government? Good programs. Language has nothing to do with it. The unemployment insurance system takes money from those parts of Canada where people have the good fortune of having jobs and shares it with others who, in other areas, do not enjoy that privilege. It has nothing to do with language and culture; it has everything to do with respect of the individual, and all citizens of Canada are treated equally.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it has been made very clear that this reform targets Quebec and the maritimes. It is a far cry from what the Prime Minister said.

How can the Prime Minister claim that his motion on the distinct character of Quebec holds any meaning when, the first chance he gets, he makes a total mockery of a unanimous request from the Quebec National Assembly by treating Quebec like any other province, subjecting it to the same national standards when it comes to manpower?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have done what we said we would do, namely withdraw from manpower training and make these funds available to those individuals who are our clients, the unemployed. We want to make sure that the money they contributed in while working gets back to them instead of going to others.

As for the question of a distinct society, I note, once again and for the third time, that the members of the Parti Quebecois and of the Bloc Quebecois will again vote, in their great hypocrisy—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, they will again vote against the distinct society, because they criticize us and when the time comes to vote in the House, they vote against—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, I would ask you all to be a little more careful in your choice of words during question period. As we know, words that stir up one side are usually replied to in kind.

• (1435)

[English]

I ask all hon. members to please be very careful in their choice of words. Naturally we would not allow some terms to be used against individual members but when they are used in a general way they have been acceptable in the House.

UNDERGROUND ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of National Revenue and taxation bragged about raising $1.1 billion out of the underground economy.

If he were truly serious about attacking the underground economy why were Revenue Canada auditors instructed not to audit visible minorities?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the basis of the hon. member's question is false.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if that is truly his answer, if he really believes it is false, then this gentleman is not doing his work.

A report was done by Ernst Young on the underground economy. A lot of field auditors were interviewed, reviewed and visited. They were asked what was going on. Six, seven or eight case reports were done. The study and some off the record remarks by auditors confirmed they were instructed not to audit certain visible minorities "due to potentially explosive political repercussions".

Further, the minister should know that 90 per cent of liquor smuggling in Ontario comes across one certain spot near Cornwall.

I again ask the minister what steps he is taking to ensure his auditors apply the rules of the Income Tax Act to everyone equally regardless of race.

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Typically, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about off the record information.

We in Revenue Canada have a number of situations which can be difficult. One example is the transport of grains across the border to the United States where our customs officers are told not to stand in the way of a speeding truck. No, they take the licence number and we arrest the truck later. That is the type of situation we have there which of course the Reform Party, which approves of running the border, thinks is a good thing.

With respect to other situations in which there could be risk to our officials, we instruct them not to take unnecessary risks. We instruct them to proceed with their work. We certainly do not instruct them, as the hon. member has claimed, to avoid any visible minorities.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. By lowering the maximum insurable earnings, the government is making its most significant tax reduction, that is $900 million, in the interest of high income earners, while at the same time reducing the benefits paid to seasonal workers and collecting premiums from workers who hold precarious jobs.

Will the minister admit that, contrary to his claim that this reform is fair, the new proposed system is regressive and unfair, in that it gives some of the benefits taken away from the poor to those who have stable and well paid jobs?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a habit of being able to understand only half the equation.

The other half of the equation is that higher income earners will therefore have fewer benefits because they pay less of a premium. The reason is the maximum insurable earning has gone up to 40 per cent higher than the average industrial wage. The recommendation of both the seasonal task force and the House of Commons is that it should be frozen or brought down because it far exceeded what was required and therefore much higher payments were going out to those at higher income levels. That is the reason we brought in the reform. It was to be fair.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the other half of the equation is that the minister is taking money from people who were not contributing before. Will the minister recognize that it is unfair to have high income earners pay lower UI premiums, while people who work part time less than ten hours per week will now have to pay premiums, even though they will not be eligible to collect UI benefits?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this poor member has it so totally wrong. It is incredible how mistaken he really is. The reality is we have extended coverage to part time workers.

More workers at part time levels will now have the opportunity to be extended. If they are not eligible we offer a full rebate of their premiums up to $2,000. Obviously this member cannot read.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the minister of human resources announced two mega training programs, one for $800 million and the other for $300 million.

Federal training programs have proven a colossal failure. The auditor general says regional development programs do not create jobs, except of course for federal bureaucrats.

Why is the minister throwing over a billion dollars into more wasteful training programs when the auditor general says the programs will not create jobs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me make a correction in the statement of the hon. member. The employment measures are not just for training. They are directed specifically at a number of tools to help people get back into the workforce.

Self–employment is a good example. Over the past two years in a number of test projects across the country we have been able to take people on the unemployment insurance system and help them start their own business, thereby creating a job for themselves and a job for another person. Sixty thousand jobs have been created by one of the tools we included in that package.

Another tool is the use of a wage supplement which again helps small business people to create tools. We have evaluated specifically that in these measures we can add up to 15 additional weeks of work and, more important, up to $5,000 additional income for the people who use these proposals under our measures. That seems to me an awfully good investment.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about test projects. I am talking about creating sustainable long term jobs, and not with these billion dollar boondoggle projects.

In his last report the auditor general said there is absolutely no evidence that training is accompanied by new jobs. The $1.1 billion needed for these wasteful programs will come at the expense of part time workers.

When the auditor general has said these training programs will fail, why is the government hammering part timers to the tune of a billion dollars to pour into its bottomless pit of so–called job creation, mega training programs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote an authority whom the hon. member might accept as even more valid than the auditor general: the member for Calgary Southeast herself.

She wrote to me on April 10 saying the community of Calgary Southeast has a proposed training centre. It is well known that this area is Calgary's home to many who are unemployed, struggling and lacking in ability.

I encourage her to consider supporting this training project and help in the revitalization of Calgary Southeast. It seems to me the member for Calgary Southeast wanted training programs for members of her riding. Why does she not want them for the rest of Canadians?

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN HERITAGE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, government members of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage maintained that there was no such thing as a Quebec culture, that there was only a single and broad Canadian culture. At the same time, they were sharply criticizing Telefilm Canada for funding sovereignist Quebec artists.

• (1445)

Does the Prime Minister agree with the members of his caucus, who say there is only one culture in Canada and that Telefilm Canada must now fund artists according to their political opinion?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a French culture in Canada, which is Canadian. It is in Quebec primarily, but I think the culture of the Acadians and Antonine Maillet forms part of the French culture, and this culture is not necessarily Quebec culture.

So, when we talk about a Canadian culture, it may be of French or English expression. This morning I spent time with Canadian natives who were having ceremonies. They too have a culture, which is entirely their own but Canadian at the same time because it covers all of Canada. There are people of this culture in British Columbia, in Quebec and in the maritimes.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the cat is finally out of the bag. The Prime Minister, a Quebecer, has just denied his own culture. Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that his fine speeches in recent weeks on the distinct nature of Quebec society were nothing more than pure hypocrisy, since he did not manage even to convince—

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, I would ask you once again not to use words that incite on both sides. I would again ask the hon. member to carefully choose and use her words, as I have before. I would ask you not to use the word "hypocrite". Now, if the hon. member would put her question.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata,): Mr. Speaker, I will phrase my question using the same word the Prime Minister used. Will he acknowledge, since he has not even managed to convince the members of his own caucus that Quebecers are a people, that there is a distinct culture and that the federal government must not lose sight of this in implementing its programs?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I return to my argument. French culture is not found only in Quebec. English culture is also found in Quebec. Gabrielle Roy came from St. Boniface, Manitoba, and she is considered one of French Canadian literature's finest. Her works continue to be used today in schools in Quebec. That is just to show the quality. I think that the member for Québec–Est, who was born in Penetanguishene, learned French culture and the French language in Ontario, and he is not any less French, because he is with the Bloc today.

What I am saying, and I have a number of examples, is that French culture may be found throughout Canada, and that English culture may be found in Quebec. We cannot say that Quebec is strictly French, because all sorts of people live in Quebec. There are a lot of proud francophones living outside Quebec.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The passage of Bill C–68 marked an historical moment for Canada and for the families of the 14 École polytechnique victims.

[English]

Bill C–68 is the greatest memorial the government could have erected to the young women and their families. In the spirit of this national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, what specifically does the minister feel Bill C–68 will accomplish?

[Translation]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by pointing out the important contribution made by those who lost family members in the Montreal tragedy six years ago today.

[English]

If it were not for the commitment and the hard work and perseverance of the families of those victims, this important matter would not have found its way to the top of the national agenda. We are in their debt for the work they did to ensure the passage of the bill.

In specific response to the question put by the hon. member, whose own work was so important in this regard, may I emphasize that every year in Canada some 13,000 orders are made in the courts of the country prohibiting people from having firearms because they have shown a propensity for violence. Too often that violence occurs in the context of the home. By a margin of two to one, when men kill women in the home the weapon of choice is a firearm, and 80 per cent of the time it is a rifle or a shotgun. It is almost always legally owned.

The registration system that is provided for in this bill will permit police to enforce those orders to remove firearms and save lives. That is only one of the ways this bill will help in the effort we must make continuously to deal with violence by men against women.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the results of the Alberta plebiscite on producer exports for wheat and barley were released. Sixty–six per cent of barley producers and 62 per cent of wheat producers, a good strong majority, voted for choice and options to export these grains outside Canadian Wheat Board jurisdiction.

Will the agriculture minister respect farmers' choice and options to export their own wheat and barley?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the members opposite in the industry to keep the results of the plebiscite that was announced today in perspective.

As far as the results, that plebiscite gives us the opinions of a number of producers on an issue in one province. It is a wide–ranging issue that affects all of western Canada. The number of producers who expressed their view are just a little over 10 per cent of all the grain producers with permit books in western Canada.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the agriculture minister and the Prime Minister seem to forget that a promise made is a debt unpaid.

Two years ago both the minister and the Prime Minister promised prairie farmers a producer plebiscite on grain marketing. It only took a few weeks for the Prime Minister to make good on commitments to the separatists in Quebec and now this government is ramrodding Quebec appeasement legislation through the House. Are prairie farmers second class citizens to the separatists in Quebec?

Will the Prime Minister fulfil his own promise today and commit his agriculture minister to hold a prairie–wide binding referendum on grain marketing?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that before he makes a statement on what the Prime Minister said, he should have his facts straight. I do not recall the hon. member being present when the Prime Minister made that statement. I was.

• (1455)

The Prime Minister at that time said the minister is following through on that. The minister has put in place a process called the western grain marketing panel to consult with members, participants, and all stakeholders in the western grain industry before the consideration of any changes, if there were ever to be changes, to the western grain marketing system.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the secretary of state for the status of women.

In the speech she gave at the 4th world conference on women, the hon. secretary of state demanded equal rights for all women. At the same time, she presented to the whole world the famous plan for equality between the sexes concocted by her government to achieve this noble objective.

Since it is acknowledged that the campaign against violence can only succeed if women achieve economic equality, can the secretary of state tell us if her government has taken its famous plan for equality between the sexes into account in its UI reform?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes, we have certainly conducted an in depth analysis of all the data affecting the lives of women and men to determine the impact of all the actions taken by the Minister of Human Resources Development in this regard.

I must also tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we considered the fact that, in the end, taking every hour worked into account is a winning proposition for women. I am proud of what we have done.

Furthermore, our government's decisions affecting poor families and children are an important part of our initiatives. We should all be proud and give the right information on what our party has done in this regard.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since we know that 70 per cent of part time workers are women and that the UI reform will have a very negative impact on them, will the secretary of state admit that her famous plan for equality between the sexes simply does not work and is a total failure?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not acknowledge these facts, which are neither current nor true. Our minister has responded to this line of inquiry several times by showing how women in part time and seasonal jobs will fare better in relation to the number of hours worked both for the well–being of their society and for their own families.

I think my colleague would be well–advised to look at the data more closely; she would be very happy with the results.

MAGAZINE PUBLISHING

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a Senate committee proposed an amendment to Bill C–103 that would grandfather the split edition of Sports Illustrated Canada. This is one of the amendments the Reform Party proposed. It was also a recommendation of the task force on magazine publishing.

Here is something interesting. The Minister for International Trade wrote a letter to the Minister of Canadian Heritage in January 1994 suggesting the same thing. Does this indicate a split in the cabinet over the split runs?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, of course there is cabinet solidarity on the subject. What the Minister for International Trade wrote in a letter to me dated January 27 was a report of the conversation he had with his American counterpart, Mickey Kantor. It is quite natural for the Minister for International Trade to report to the Minister of Canadian Heritage on the views expressed in the United States.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, careful reading of the letter clearly shows that the Minister for International Trade was making a recommendation to the Minister of Canadian Heritage, which he chose to ignore.

• (1500)

The most disturbing aspect of the bill is that the Canadian government has now decided to place a tax on any future Canadian split runs into the United States. If the bill becomes law, a Canadian magazine that wants to export a very similar magazine to the United States will be subject to an 80 per cent excise tax imposed on it by its own Canadian government.

How in the world could the heritage minister have created such a bone headed law that punishes Canadian industry?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the policy on split runs has been in effect for something like 30 years. It has helped the Canadian magazine industry which has contributed to our understanding of ourselves as Canadians. It contributes to our identity. It contributes to national unity, a fact that our colleagues in the Reform totally ignore because they are not interested in Canadian unity.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two economic studies were released yesterday by the Centre for Research on Violence Against Women and Children in my riding. They put the annual calculable cost of this violence at over $4.2 billion, with health related costs alone at $1.5 billion annually.

I ask the Secretary of State for the Status of Women how knowledge about the cost of violence against women will affect government action on this very important issue.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I recognize and thank the member for London West and particularly Dr. Greaves from the Centre for Violence Against Women which undertook this study at the behest of Status of Women Canada.

The question of the pervasive nature of violence against women and children and its negative impact in a social, economic, health and criminal sense is very serious. There is no doubt the issues described in the study are vital and important to us all.

I will study the findings. I will recommend certain actions to the Minister of Justice and to the Minister of Health, notwithstanding which I would suggest to all members of the House, to all levels of government and to societies and municipalities that the problem is beyond just this government which has done a very good job through the Minister of Justice with respect to the criminal element.

The social and economic aspects still need to be addressed. Until the economic interests of women are looked into, we will have ongoing violence against women and children.

BANKING

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is with regard to the embarrassingly high bank profits that have been announced in the last few days.

As a result of the UI changes almost $1 billion was taken out of the pockets of working Canadians and small business operators. With obscenely high bank profits being registered, what steps will the Prime Minister take to make sure they too pay their share of the deficit?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, like other corporate citizens they are paying taxes on their profits. In the last budget the Minister of Finance imposed a special $100 million tax on the profits of banks. They pay more than the normal share, but the Minister of Finance will look into the situation. It is a sign in some ways that the economy is performing better than before.

I hope they will pay a lot of tax out of these profits as we need the money to create jobs in Canada.

The Speaker: I have an announcement to make before dealing with a few points of order. During question period the lights went off and on. I want members to know, so that when they return to their offices they will know what is going on, that there is a general power failure in parts of downtown Ottawa. The emergency generator at the House is now in operation. We are recording the television signal but nothing is being distributed until power is restored.

• (1505)

Our computer system was cut and needs to be restarted, which takes approximately an hour. Therefore the blues from question period will be delayed.

POINTS OF ORDER

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek unanimous consent of the House to observe one minute of silence in memory of the 14 young Canadian women who were murdered six years ago this day in Montreal, on December 6, 1989.

The Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The House stood in silence.]

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from an answer the customs and revenue minister gave. He said that the Reform Party encouraged farmers to illegally run the U.S. border.

The Reform Party has never encouraged farmers to run the border with their grain. The customs and revenue—

The Speaker: I think the hon. member has a point of clarification. It is not a point of order but a point of debate. I thank him for raising it.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is a day of remembrance.

Today, we reflect on the tragic December 6, 1989 when 14 women died in the prime of their lives. Today, we also want to reflect on the thousands of women who face violence as a daily reality.

It was also 25 years ago tomorrow that the royal commission on the status of women tabled its report in this House.

[English]

The report was a landmark study of the status of women in Canada. It contained 167 recommendations ranging from equalizing women's opportunity in the workplace to recognizing the equal contributions of both partners in the division of family assets upon marriage breakdown. Most of its recommendations have now been implemented. For example, sex discrimination is now prohibited under all of Canada's labour laws. Minimum wages are the same for both men and women. Maternity leave and parental leave benefits can be claimed.

• (1510)

The royal commission, however, did not identify violence as a major issue, but its members had a vision about what it would take to achieve equality. They predicted that as we uncovered the root causes and consequences of women's unequal status new issues would emerge that would need addressing, and they were right. In the last 25 years we have uncovered a close relationship between a woman's lack of equality and her vulnerability to violence, and we have brought it out of the shadows.

At the fourth United Nations world conference on women in Beijing, Canada made a commitment to implement the conference's platform for action, a powerful global agenda for the advancement of women. Among the 12 main themes it contains a plan of action to address violence against women. The global platform reaffirms that violence against women is not a private concern and that states must exercise diligence to ensure that violence is not occurring in homes, in schools, in the workplace or on our streets.

[Translation]

Another commitment is the federal plan for gender equality, released in August. The plan is a framework for federal action to bring about equality for women in Canada.

We created the plan in conjunction with our preparations for the Beijing conference, and it includes several commitments to address violence against women.

There have been significant changes since the royal commission report. At that time, only one woman was a member of the House of Commons, Grace MacInnis.

[English]

There are now 54 women in the House. Whatever our political persuasion, we share a debt of gratitude to the royal commission, for without its vision the road here would have been longer and harder. Women's voices are now heard in the Chamber. Violence against women is now openly discussed. Women and men are working together to find solutions. I am confident that together we can find solutions at all levels of society.

Today in particular I to commend the House for its support of the historic legislation on firearms control. The weapon used at l'École polytechnique will soon be banned.

All of us want to make the country safer for women. We will succeed with the help of our partners, the men in the House and the men of the country, the NGOs, individuals, labour, business and other levels of government.

In memory of the women who died six years ago, let us pledge to continue our campaign against violence to prevent such tragedies and to give women and girls their rightful place in society.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of emotion that, like all the hon. members of this House, I wish to pay tribute today to the 14 young women who were gunned down by an assassin six years ago. We join their families and friends in remembering them and thinking about the impact that their death will have on our society.

As the hon. secretary of state for the status of women mentioned, the tragedy that took place at l'École polytechnique prompted us, collectively, to reflect on the steps we should take to ensure that such a tragedy never happens again. This is a joint undertaking in which each of us must take part. The lives of our daughters, sisters, colleagues, friends and fellow citizens and their safety are at stake.

The second part of my remarks is intended not to be critical but rather to be constructive. I believe that, as parliamentarians, we must speak candidly about our concerns to further the common cause of equality for women. As the secretary of state for the status of women quite rightly pointed out, 25 years ago, the royal commission on the status of women came to the conclusion that violence against women can only be curbed by ensuring equal rights for women.

I am pleased to see that just today the Quebec government has taken some very concrete steps regarding conjugal violence. Today, the Government of Quebec tabled in the National Assembly its action plan on conjugal violence. It is important to turn our attention to this plan for a moment.

First of all, I should point out that six ministers have co–operated in developing a structured and integrated action plan: the ministers of justice, health and social services, public security, and education, the minister responsible for family affairs and, finally, the minister responsible for the status of women.

Many actions are planned, but I will just list a few. In all cases, during the inquiry on the provisional release of the accused, the attorney general's prosecutors will be required to ask the court to set as a condition for release that the accused surrender his weapons to the police.

Second, victims will be informed quickly and automatically of the provisional release of the accused and of the conditions set by the court. They will also be informed of a release under a temporary absence or parole program.

Third, a prevention campaign on violence against women will be launched. Moreover, the Quebec police information centre will record all cases of spousal abuse, as well as all conditions for release. Firearms will be confiscated immediately when a spouse is arrested. In the education sector, the emphasis will be put on the prevention of spousal abuse and screening for children who witness such violence. This is what we call action.

Again, these are only a few of the measures included in the Quebec action program. On behalf of my colleagues, of women who are victims of spousal abuse, and of Quebecers, I congratulate the Quebec government on this major initiative.

While Quebec is taking action in its fields of jurisdiction, what does the federal government do?

Mrs. Finestone: We implemented laws to take similar action.

Mrs. Gagnon: There is some and, in fact, quite a bit of inertia at the federal level. Let us start with the achievements of the government, as mentioned by the secretary of state for the status of women. I must say that I have some sympathy for the hon. member who must work with a government that shelved the issue of women as soon as it took office.

An hon. member: You know that is not true.

Mrs. Gagnon: So, this government approves a plan to promote equality between men and women. Mr. Speaker, could they please let me finish? The government pledges to implement the program for action approved at the 4th world conference on women. It passes a bill on gun control. That is nice, but that is also very little after two years in office.

Let us now look at what the government did not do. Let us look at the missed opportunities. There are quite a few. The government did not amend the Criminal Code to specifically prohibit female genital mutilation. That is also a form of violence. It does not happen here, but it is a form of violence. It also takes place in Canada. The government did not protest to Chinese authorities when, just last week, the situation of orphan baby girls became public. That is also a form of violence against women. These women are seen as expendable.

The government did not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect homosexuals against discrimination. That is also another form of violence. The government did not put its reform projects through the prism of its plan to promote equality for women, thus forcing many women to live in poverty. That is another form of violence, and we are still a long way from achieving equality between the two sexes.

In conclusion, I ask the government to truly follow the spirit and the letter of the recommendations made 25 years ago already. I ask the government to implement, in its own fields of jurisdiction, true measures to promote equality between men and women, so that some day we can say that the tragedy which occurred at Polytechnique was a terrible but isolated incident.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of this House share in the painful memory of the tragic event that happened six years ago, in 1989, when we lost 14 of our young women at l'École polytechnique in Montreal. They fell victim to a senseless crime.

• (1520)

We all believe the rights of victims of crime must be placed before the rights of criminals in society. Today we feel those sentiments most deeply.

Exactly one year ago today in the House of Commons we held an emergency debate on violence against women. I appreciate the noble sentiments that continue to be espoused by those who speak on this and similar issues, for I too share those ideals. However, I am greatly concerned that in the intervening years since that emergency debate very little has been done to improve the situation.

I am concerned that the House does only lip service to addressing the issue of violence against women, children and men. Remember, we must not limit our focus to eradicating violence against women. We must enlarge our scope and become active pacifists to wipe out senseless violence in society. We must rally to this sentiment and demonstrate to the world that Canada is a leader in its efforts to reduce crime, to safeguard its citizens and to champion the rights of victims.

To do this we must get at the root of the problem, not just smooth over the symptoms. Gun control will not in and of itself solve the problems of violence in society.

I believe that until the government of the day can identify the root causes of crime, until it can identify the reasons for domestic violence and violence against women, we will continue waking every day to face the personal tragedies brought on by crime.

Today the government must take a more positive step in the area of violence against women and demonstrate its commitment to rooting out the problems the minister has alluded to.

In its press release of November 27 of this year Status of Women Canada called violence against women a violation of women's human rights. I agree with this statement and I believe the government should enforce its sentiments.

The government sent many people at great taxpayer expense to the women's conference in China. I challenge that conference site on the basis of China's terrible record of human rights abuse, especially to women, children and political dissidents. At that conference our government confirmed that eliminating violence remains a priority. It should be, and according to the secretary of state it is, a global goal not limited to Canada.

Today is a serious day for us all, a day for us to remember, a day for us to help the healing. It is a day when we should all commit to moving forward. We must foster attitudes which promote peace and tolerance and express zero tolerance for the violation of human rights and zero tolerance for violence against women.

Echoing sentiments of the Secretary of State for the Status of Women, I pledge and let us all pledge in memory of the women who died six years ago to continue vigorously our campaign against violence to prevent such tragedies.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I request the consent of the House to speak briefly on this subject on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

The Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address the House on this important day. I rise on behalf of all New Democrats on this national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, December 6.

Today is the anniversary of the 1989 Montreal massacre at l'École Polytechnique. Fourteen women died on this day, a great tragedy. Today we reflect on, remember, mourn and call for further action to address and prevent violence against women.

• (1525)

On this day I also remember the work of my former colleague, a New Democratic member of Parliament from British Columbia, Dawn Black, whose efforts during the previous Parliament led to the establishment of this national day of remembrance and action. I think of her dedication to the House and to the issue of violence against women when I think of the motion today.

I also remember and sympathize with the families of the 14 women who died simply because they were women. Those families live with the effects of this great tragedy in ways many of us will never fully understand.

Violence cannot be condoned, but it cannot be treated only with punishment. We must understand violence and treat the causes as well as the criminals. A plan of action must be recognized every day of the year, in every part of the country and in all our actions. We must deal with the economic and social roots of the circumstances which lead to violence against women. We must deal with economic and social legislation in the House. We have to keep in mind the possible human consequences of that legislation every day of our lives. We are confronted daily with decisions we can make in the House which may affect people in ways which could lead to violence and we must address those matters.

Today is the day on which we reflect on, remember and mourn that which has been done to women. We must address the need to work further on this important issue. I trust all members of the House will heed the call for action on this important day.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I also would like the opportunity to speak on this subject.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, today on the national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women I rise to extend the sympathies of my party to victims of violence across the country.

Six years ago 14 young women were brutally murdered at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal. That act of violence reverberated across the country. Its pure senselessness shocked us profoundly. It made us question the direction Canadian society was taking. It prompted the federal government to take action to deal with this issue at home and internationally.

As a society we must be committed to stopping violence against women both in and outside the home. We have to address the root causes of violence. As members of the House we must pass laws which will do that. Progress is being made on this front, but only continuing efforts involving each and every one of us on both sides of the House will change the attitudes which perpetuate violence.

To the families of the 14 young women whose lives were so brutally cut short six years ago today and to all those who have suffered because of violence, they are in our thoughts and in our prayers. It is not enough to have a policy of zero tolerance against violence. As legislators we must take concrete action so that women, indeed all Canadians, can lead their lives free from the fear of violence. We must try to find out what has happened in our society and what has changed in our society which brings about these brutal acts.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report from the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French Speaking Parliamentarians, together with the financial report concerning the twelfth session of the AIPLF Regional Assembly of America, held in Quebec City, July 12 to 14, 1995.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

HEALTH

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of reference received from the House dated November 8, 1995, I have the honour to report on behalf of the chairman, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, with amendments.

[Translation]

Your committee referred the bill to a subcommittee. According to the standing committee's resolution dated November 7, 1995, and in anticipation of the order of the House, the report from the subcommittee was deemed adopted as the seventh report from the standing committee during yesterday's meeting.

[English]

Copies of the relevant minutes of proceedings and evidence of the subcommittee and the standing committee are also tabled.

HEALTH

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 108(1) and 108(2), on behalf of the chair, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, I have the honour to present the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Health entitled "A Study of National AIDS Strategy: Report of the Subcommittee on HIV–AIDS".

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, we are asking for a government response to our report.

[Translation]

That sub–committee was created by the Standing Committee on Health in 1994. Its precise terms of reference were to study the spread of HIV, the prevention and the treatment of AIDS and the support for HIV carriers and AIDS sufferers, and to focus particularly on the role of poverty and discrimination in that situation.

The sub–committee has now completed the first phase of its work, that is a thorough review of the National AIDS Strategy. It held hearings from December 1994 to May 1995.

The report touches briefly on the epidemiology of HIV in Canada and around the world. It deals with the various elements of the strategy, the orientation, the coordination, the partnerships, the budget, community action, education and prevention, care and treatment, and finally, research. It contains several recommendations suggesting that the federal government increases its efforts in the fight against the AIDS epidemic.

[English]

Copies of the relevant minutes of proceedings of the subcommittee and the standing committee are also tabled.

PETITIONS

SRI LANKA

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition from 110 British Columbians, many of them from my riding of Vancouver East.

The petitioners draw the attention of Parliament to the continuing military offence in Sri Lanka and the arrest in Toronto of Mr. Manickavasagam Suresh.

The petitioners call on Parliament to ensure Canadian neutrality so that the national conflict in Sri Lanka is not jeopardized; to intervene immediately and release Mr. Suresh; to take action to lift economic embargo and press censorship in the north and east of Sri Lanka; to allow freedom of movement of the civilians in the north and east of Sri Lanka without fear, intimidation, and terror; and to resolve the conflict between the Tamil people and the Sri Lankan government through peaceful negotiations between the Sri Lankan government and the LTTE, the representative of the Tamil people.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today on behalf of the residents of Simcoe Centre.

The first group of petitioners request that the Government of Canada not amend the human rights act to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation. The petitioners are troubled about not defining the phrase sexual orientation. They have a legitimate concern that such a broad term could include all kinds of sexual behaviour.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition involves section 718.2 of the Criminal Code.

The petitioners are concerned that naming some groups in legislation will exclude other groups from protection and that sentencing based on the concept of hatred is very subjective and will undermine our justice system.

• (1535)

MILITIA

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting a petition asking the government to respect and maintain the historic significance of militia units in Canada. This particular petition comes from Brockville and of course they are referring specifically to the famed and historic Brockville Rifles.

Their feeling is that in the haste to streamline the role of Canada's forces, the militia will be looked upon as an easy target and something that can be done without much significance. However, I want to remind the government that very often in small communities that is the only federal presence that exists. Therefore, I would like to see it maintained and restructured or the role redefined. The petitioners understand that change is likely to happen, but they are not prepared to see it happen in such a way that there will no longer be reserves. It is a pleasure to present this petition.

The second petition I have contains 2,500 names and concerns the same topic of maintaining the Brockville Rifles, but it is lacking a little in form. I am using this method in bringing this concern to the public.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions from constituents of Trinity—Spadina. The petitioners would like to see Parliament ban the use of BST in Canada and not accept dairy products from countries where BST is used to treat cattle.

The Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous agreement for the following motion. I move:

That, on Thursday, December 7, 1995, if any division is demanded with regard to any business pursuant to Standing Order 81, the said division shall be deferred until 6.30 p.m. on Monday, December 11, 1995; and

On Friday, December 8, 1995, notwithstanding the Order made Thursday, November 30, 1995, the putting of the question on any motion relating to the Business of Supply pursuant to Standing Order 81 shall be deferred until 6.30 p.m. on Monday, December 11, 1995.

(Motion agreed to.)

RECOGNITION OF QUEBEC AS A DISTINCT SOCIETY

The House resumed from November 29 consideration of the motion.

• (1625)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Mr. Manning moves the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "accordingly" the following:

"5. Nothing in this resolution shall:

(i) confer or be interpreted as conferring upon the legislature or government of Quebec, any new legislative or executive powers, proprietary rights, status, or any other rights or privileges not conferred on the legislature or government of any province;

(ii) diminish or be interpreted as diminishing in any way the rights and freedoms of any resident of Quebec;

(iii) deny or be interpreted as denying that Canada constitutes one nation".

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, a point of order. I wish to invoke Standing Order 43(2). Liberal members will be sharing their time 10 minutes and 10 minutes for the rest of this debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Madam Speaker, I had prepared a speech, but I am going to have to leave half of it out, because something happened during question period which I find extremely important. But first, I would like to let you know that all Bloc members will speak for 10 minutes only.

Last Wednesday, when he tabled his motion, the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

—Quebec is a distinct society within Canada. As a Quebecer and a francophone, I understand and share the desire of my fellow Quebecers to have our difference recognized.

He was talking to the motion he had tabled in the House. The motion reads as follows:

That

Whereas the people of Quebec have expressed the desire for recognition of Quebec's distinct society;

(1) the House recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada;

(2) the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French-speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;

This afternoon, during question period, I asked the Prime Minister if he was in agreement with his colleagues on the heritage committee who, for the past two weeks, have been coming strongly against the distinct society and Quebec culture. I asked the Prime minister if he believed that his colleagues had the right to state that there was only one culture in Canada, and that, from now on, Telefilm Canada should fund artists on the basis of their political obedience.

The Prime Minister rose in this House and said that in Canada, there was only one culture, a Canadian one, whether French or English. It would appear that, two weeks after tabling in the House a motion saying that we are distinct because of our unique culture, the Prime Minister has not understood his own motion, probably because it was written by a member of his staff. If our culture is unique, it is the Quebec culture since we are in Quebec, and that is what we are requesting.

Our culture is unique because it is French, because among other things our majority is French–speaking. But, today, the Prime Minister said: "No. There is only one culture and it is Canadian." You cannot have it both ways, either the Prime Minister does not understand the meaning of the motion or he understands very well and, for the first time this afternoon, when he rose in the House, he recognized that Quebec is not a people, that there is only one people and it is Canadian, English Canadian preferably. However, he allows us the privilege of expressing the English culture in French. This is the gist of what he said this afternoon.

Yet, when we passed the bill which created the Department of Canadian Heritage we asked that the government be responsible and acknowledge that there was a distinct society in Quebec. We repeated our request, we proposed amendments to recognize Quebec culture, but the Liberal government trivialized Quebec. It made its culture part of the Canadian melting pot, excluding it from its bill on culture and denying Quebec its very distinct existence, its fundamental right to express its difference.

During the last two weeks, the Liberal Party's representatives on the Heritage Standing Committee practically had allergic reactions every time they heard or met witnesses who financed artists or films.

Today, the Quebec people want to be recognized as a people and want the powers which go with it. On October 30, 49.5 per cent of Quebecers voted for a country of their own; the federal government is offering us an empty shell, which has only some value as a symbol, and we realized today that it is not even worth the paper it was written on two weeks ago.

Quebecers are a people. As early as 1766, the English government of Murray said that Quebecers, who were then called Canadians, were a brave and courageous people.

In 1791, the Constitutional Act divided Canada's territory into two colonies, in order to recognize the existence of two peoples on its territory. At that time, these two peoples were called the Canadian people, but they lived in Quebec, hence today's Quebecers, and the British people.

In 1839, Lord Durham, whom we cannot suspect of being a Quebec nationalist or of having a separatist frame of mind, came to the following conclusion in his report on the state of the colony, and I quote: "Problems in Lower Canada are not political or administrative in nature, but are the result of the forced co–existence of two distinct nations in the same state."

In 1905, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, an inveterate Liberal, said and I quote: "Every time I go back to my province, I am sad to see there is a feeling that Canada is not for all Canadians. We must come to the conclusion that Quebec is our only homeland."

In 1965, the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, whose work Prime Minister Trudeau hastened to wreck, released a preliminary report in which it noted that Canada was going through the most serious crisis in its history. The commission exposed in these terms the misunderstanding on which the Canadian crisis was based and is still based, and I quote: "[—] English people, many of whom were showing good will [—]did not understand [—]the profound leanings of so many Quebecers towards an increased autonomy and their growing belief that Quebec would become a distinct nation ruling its economic and social institutions."

Because English Canada still does not understand Quebec, the constitutional future is doomed and we will never be recognized as a people. According to the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, an essential requirement for Canada's survival is a real association that can only exist between equal partners.

In fact, this motion is totally in line with what Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon told the Toronto Star on April 27, and I quote:

[English]

"Quebec has to make its decision based on what I believe is the greatest country in the world and not look for us to change our country in order to make it more acceptable for them".

[Translation]

In fact, the Premier of Manitoba is telling us to either take Canada as it is or leave. That is why the Bloc Quebecois is fundamentally opposed to the motion before us today, and our voting against it will surprise no one in Quebec. Quebec is no longer content with crumbs. Quebecers have risen, they are standing up with their heads held high. They are asserting themselves as a people who want to be recognized as such and they want to negotiate as equals.

In the wake of the Meech failure, Robert Bourassa said, and I quote: "Quebec is, today and forever, a distinct society that is free and capable of controlling its own destiny and development".

• (1635)

At his party's March 1991 convention, he convinced his colleagues to adopt the Allaire resolution, which read as follows: "The failure of the Meech Lake accord is a historic event. This failure has made it imperative for Canada to change. Above all, the Meech Lake accord failure occurred at a time in history when Quebec society has reached a level of maturity, openness and development allowing it to feel fully in control of its future. Undoubtedly, Quebec now has the means and resources needed to exercise its choices".

Quebecers know that the Prime Minister's proposal is empty. Today, they understand that the Prime Minister is incapable of quoting a single Quebec author. His references are strictly Canadian. Quebec will accept nothing less than to be recognized as a people with all the powers that this entails.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the hon. members of the Bloc Quebecois are once more forgetting that the people of Quebec have reaffirmed their sense of belonging to this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt, but the table advises me that there will be no questions and comments since we are debating a special motion. The hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe will be sharing the member's speaking time.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on the Prime Minister's motion to outline Quebec's traditional demands and show that this motion of the Liberal Party of Canada is nothing more than a charade to water down the aspirations of the people of Quebec.

My remarks will be broken down into three parts, covering the last three decades. What happened during each of these three decades?

Thirty years ago, during the quiet revolution, a clear movement in favour of Quebec becoming a sovereign state and assuming sole responsibility over its social and economic policies developed in Quebec. This prompted the Quebec government to undertake discussions on the patriation of the Constitution, that is to say on a new division of powers and on an amending formula that would be acceptable to Quebec.

In 1964, the Fulton–Favreau formula restricted the federal government's capability to act unilaterally, by requiring a majority of two thirds of the provinces to make substantive changes to federal institutions. This gave rise to widespread protest in Quebec.

In fact, the Fulton–Favreau formula was putting off negotiations on the substantive issue, namely the division of powers, to deal only with the technical aspect of the matter: the patriation of the Constitution.

The Quebec government then specified that any agreement concerning the patriation of the Constitution would be subject to a positive and satisfactory redistribution of powers. From then on, this will become a traditional demand. A new Constitution was to give the Government of Quebec the broadest powers possible on the basis of affirming the two–nation status of Canada in the country's social, political and economic structures.

But Pierre Trudeau and the Liberal Party of Canada did not agree. Trudeau objected to policies based on Quebec as a nation. As part of the patriation process, they were intent on doing away with the Quebec rhetoric based on the concept of collective rights and with the fact that the French Canadian nation was becoming identified with the Quebec government.

At this stage of the negotiations to patriate the Canadian Constitution, the political thinking of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau is clear: Canadian federalism cannot, without jeopardizing its integrity, tolerate any constitutional asymmetry in the distribution and use of legislative powers.

Moreover, in Mr. Trudeau's mind, there are essentially only citizens and their individual freedoms vis–à–vis the state. Consequently, the Quebec society must blend with the rest of Canada.

• (1640)

The Victoria charter marks the beginning of a second decade of negotiations and discussions to patriate the Constitution. The charter recognizes Quebec's jurisdiction over social policies, but seeks to impose national standards. In a letter to the Prime Minister, in which he states his refusal to accept the Victoria charter, then Quebec premier Robert Bourassa writes: "Canadian federalism must be decentralized to reflect the diversity of the regions, and to allow the Quebec government to preserve the cultural future of its majority".

In March 1976, Pierre Trudeau, who was still Prime Minister, writes in a letter addressed to all provincial premiers that if there is no unanimity, the federal government will have no choice but to decide whether or not to recommend to Parliament the patriation of the 1867 Constitutional Act.

The third decade of discussions and negotiations on the patriation of the BNA Act starts with the failure of the Quebec government to obtain a mandate to negotiate sovereignty–association with the rest of Canada, a concept which implies the national recognition of Quebecers, as well as a major redistribu-tion of constitutional powers, in favour of Quebec. As early as 1981, and in spite of having been re–elected, the Parti Quebecois finds itself in an extremely vulnerable position vis–à–vis the federal government. A scathing answer came from the Liberal Party then in power in Ottawa. The Canadian Prime Minister took advantage of Quebec's vulnerability and proceeded with unilateral patriation of the Constitution.

On December 1, 1981, Quebec's legislature adopted a resolution opposing unilateral patriation of the Constitution. Thus, Quebec reaffirmed its will to entrench in the new Constitution the fundamental equality of the two founding peoples and as a natural consequence of its distinct society status, its extended and exclusive jurisdictions.

The "Canada Act", or the Constitution Act of 1982, was the temporary conclusion of a process which had been going on for over 20 years. The charter of rights and freedoms, enshrined in the new Constitution, is the very basis of the principle of a Canadian nation. It gives the central power unprecedented political influence, an unparalleled power of centralization.

We all know what happened next: the day Pierre Trudeau decided to unilaterally patriate the Constitution, the Liberal Party of Canada lost Quebec; since the 1984 election, it never could obtain more than a third of Quebecer's votes. From then on, it spoke mainly for Canada. The Conservative Party came to power in Ottawa and undertook to have the newly patriated Constitution signed by Quebec. More consultations were held between the premiers, which led to the Meech Lake accord in June 1987. A strong basis for negotiation was then laid out between Canada and Quebec since that accord has forced the courts, from the Supreme Court on down, to interpret the whole Constitution, including the charter of rights and freedoms, in light of the traditional claims of Quebec.

Once again, however, the Liberal Party of Canada was not prepared to accept that and did everything in its power to scuttle the 1987 accord. The current Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal Party made every effort, with the assistance of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, to water down the recognition of the distinct nature of Quebec. In English Canada, where the Meech Lake accord gave rise to much opposition, his voice was heard as being extremely effective in ruining any political basis needed for the accord to succeed.

The current Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal Party then reiterated his party's position: Canadian federalism cannot accept constitutional asymmetry without being substantially weakened, Quebec cannot be regarded as a nation and only individual rights are recognized by the charter of rights and freedoms, which is the only instrument for interpreting the Constitution and the status of the Quebec state.

• (1645)

Last week in the House, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois described the rapprochement that was made in the late 80s between the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party of Canada, a rapprochement which led to the Charest report, where the interpretative clause granted to Quebec in view of its distinct nature, as a state representing a nation, was formally denied.

The beginning of the third decade of talks and negotiations about the status of the province of Quebec in the Canadian Confederation, pursuant to a Constitution which Quebec never agreed on, is marked again by a toughening of Quebec's position. Since it obviously could not expect anything from English Canada, the Quebec government, largely supported by the voters, now favoured a clearly sovereignist option, as shown, first, by the emergence of the Bloc Quebecois and the mass election of its members in Ottawa; second, by the almost total disappearance of the Conservative Party; third, by the failure of the Charlottetown accord; and lastly, by the election of the Parti Quebecois in Quebec.

From then on Quebec would no longer get involved in endless and useless rounds of negotiations. The results of the second referendum on the sovereignty issue held in the province of Quebec occurred half–way through this third decade, recognizing the dazzling progress made by the sovereignty option in Quebec since the failure of Meech. Quebec is now heading towards its political sovereignty and nothing can make it go backwards. Certainly not this silly resolution which the Prime Minister of Canada introduced last week to urge the House of Commons to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. This is only a token recognition.

This very day, in the House of Commons, during question period, the Prime Minister himself denied the existence of a Quebec culture although his own resolution aims at recognizing it. He stated that there is only one culture in Canada, and that is the Canadian culture. We will vote against this resolution, which is as hypocritical as it can get.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the members of the House of Commons in the debate on the motion to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. In order to properly understand the true scope of what the Government of Canada is doing by proposing this resolution, it must be interpreted in the light of the October 30 vote.

Quebecers had two very clear things to tell us: they want to be recognized within Canada for what they are: a people with a French–speaking majority and a different and distinct culture. They also want to see profound changes made to the way the Canadian federation operates.

Of course, our government needs to respond to economic imperatives and to the necessity of ensuring the continuation of our social programs, and this requires new partnerships with the provinces. We must, however, also acknowledge the reality of Quebec's malaise, a malaise directly linked to the wounds of the past, the most severe of these being the failure of the Meech Lake Accord.

The Leader of the Opposition, in his reply to the Prime Minister's speech, has given us his version of the recent history of our country and the path it took through the constitutional to–ing and fro–ing. Allow me then to give you my version, that of a Quebecer with a totally different perspective. I was there when the Meech Lake Accord failed.

• (1650)

Unlike the Parti Québecois and a number of the Bloc members who voted against Meech, what I wanted, along with most of my fellow citizens, was for there to be recognition that Quebec is distinct, different, and it was my impression at the time that this country did not accept me for who and what I was.

[English]

However, I understood that it was not the country that was refusing to recognize me. It was not my fellow citizens who were not willing to recognize me. It was rather the very process of constitutional negotiations and of agreement ratification that led us to this dead end. This is why I wondered, is it necessary to break up my country just because we have difficulty agreeing on the process to be used?

The answer is clear to me. I believe it is possible to pursue the discussion and continue to build this prosperous country in an atmosphere of respect and generosity.

[Translation]

Like the majority of Quebecers, it is my firm belief that it is possible for us to reconcile two realities: our identity as Quebecers, of which we are extremely proud, and our identity as part of Canada.

I have always believed that these two realities are in no way mutually exclusive and that they do not in any way justify the destruction of a country built up by the generations before us with such effort and determination. That is what I defended then as a member of the Liberal government in Quebec, and that is what I defend now as a member of this Liberal government in Ottawa.

During the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister of Canada made commitments he is meeting today by recognizing that Quebec is a distinct society. To do so is to recognize history, our common history. To do so is to remember the origins of the Canada of 1867 which opted for a federal system designed to reconcile Quebec's right to be a distinct and provincial autonomy with the need to work together to build this vast country of ours that is Canada.

In a speech to the Quebec Legislative Assembly on November 24, 1871, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, and I quote: "It is a historical fact that the federal system was adopted only to maintain the exceptional and unique position of the province of Quebec on the American continent".

Do not get me wrong. I am simply stressing that unlike those who believe that separation is the only way for Quebec to take its place within Canada, I am convinced we can deal with this matter in a different way, without breaking up the country.

The Leader of the Opposition may argue that distinct society is no longer an issue in Quebec but the fact remains that Quebecers earnestly want their distinctiveness to be recognized. This government understands that. Of course, some people would have preferred to see this recognition immediately entrenched in the Constitution, because the logical corollary of this recognition is its inclusion in the basic law of our country.

We would have preferred to do so now. However, the PQ government and the leader of the Bloc Quebecois have already closed the door on any discussion. Nevertheless, by rejecting the proposal for Quebec's separation on October 30, Quebecers clearly gave their provincial government a mandate to work together with the Canadian government to find practical solutions and help Quebec develop its potential within the Canadian federation.

• (1655)

The government of Canada understood the message and presented, in an initial gesture of openness, the motion we are debating today in the House of Commons. We have met our commitment. The ball is now in the court of the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois. By their stubborn refusal to consider any options for change, they are saying no to Quebecers. Make no mistake: whether the option selected to describe distinct society is Meech 1, Meech 2, Meech 3, Charlottetown 1, Charlottetown 2 or Charlottetown 3, the response of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois was very clear: "I am a sovereigntist and I will never sign an agreement with the Canadian government".

The Leader of the Opposition often says Quebecers look to the past to justify their choice. I say to him today that Quebecers will also remember that the Bloc Quebecois and its leader refused to vote for the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society in this House.

To recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada is a step in the right direction, as our federalist partners from Quebec acknowledged. It will provide the foundation for new, constructive relations with all our fellow Canadians. For once, the Parliament of Canada will be united. And when we have passed this motion, Parliament will have to consider the distinct identity of Quebec. For the first time, elected representatives of all Canadians will make a solemn and meaningful gesture towards the people of Quebec. As a Quebecer, I am proud to be part of a government that recognizes the distinct identity of the people of Quebec, and I am proud to be a member of this government which will continue to work towards including this recognition of the Canadian Constitution.

Because the interests of Quebec and the interests of Canada as a whole are involved, I will vote in favour of this motion.

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this historic debate on the Prime Minister's motion to recognize Quebec as a distinct society by its language, its culture and its civil law tradition.

The motion we are now debating is one of three initiatives for change announced by the Prime Minister last week and which act on the commitments made during the referendum campaign in Quebec. In addition to recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada, the federal government will henceforth grant a regional veto on all constitutional changes and pull out of manpower training.

These initiatives result from promises that the Prime Minister made to his fellow Quebecers during the referendum campaign, and particularly the great Montreal rally which brought together more than 150,000 people, including 500 from my riding of Simcoe–North and the neighbouring riding.

It is important to note that these initiatives are not the only measures the government has taken in response to Quebec's referendum, but they surely are an important step. Moreover, they are further proof that when the Prime Minister makes a promise to Canadians, he keeps his word.

During the referendum campaign, everybody was talking about the need for change, everybody said that, in the future, things should be done differently if our country were to remain united. However, I have the impression that the change the vast majority of politicians were referring to did not reflect what Quebecers want.

Indeed, when I was going from door to door during the referendum campaign, time and time again people told me that they wanted jobs, economic stability, a better future for their children, a good social climate, and so on. I can assure the House that the numerous Quebecers I met attach little importance to constitutional changes and to the squabbles that go with it.

In this regard, Quebecers are not very different from all other citizens of Canada. People from my riding of Simcoe—North express the same concerns. That is why I say that the commitment to change to which we should give a lot of importance is the one the Canadian people, including Quebecers, want. This is why I am proud to be part of a government which, for two years now, has been tackling the real problems of the Canadian people, which are job creation and economic growth.

That being said, the proposals put forward by the Prime Minister are not without sound basis and legitimacy. The motion on distinct society is important because it recognizes an obvious historic fact and reassures Quebecers as to their place in our country. In fact, the concept of distinct society is not new, neither historically, nor constitutionally.

[English]

According to Professor Ramsay Cook, francophones in British North America and Canada developed early on a consciousness of their distinctiveness, both individually and collectively. The most obvious badge of that distinctiveness was language, while the civil code provided a legal foundation for difference.

The idea of distinctiveness is even recognized implicitly in the British North America Act of 1867. The mere fact of creating the province of Quebec was the beginning of acknowledging a distinct society within Canada. There are also explicit recognitions of this fact in the Constitution. For example, section 94 recognizes the civil law of Quebec as distinct. Section 133 made Quebec, alone among the original provinces, bilingual, and by doing so made French for the first time an official language of Canada.

The motion put forth by the Prime Minister is yet another explicit means to acknowledge Quebec's distinctiveness. Even though the distinct society resolution we are debating is not a constitutional resolution, it is important that it is a solemn commitment that sets out how the federal government, the only government in Canada that speaks for all Canadians, will conduct its affairs. In effect, it will indicate to all citizens and all federal government authorities that it is the will of the House of Commons that the distinct character of Quebec society be recognized once again within the Canadian federation.

I also want to assure all Canadians that the expression distinct society is not exhaustive by any means. Even though the motion simply notes that the distinct society includes some specific elements of Quebec, it does not exclude others. It does not exclude the fact that Quebec is a pluralistic and democratic society, that all its citizens are equal before the law, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or the Canadian Constitution.

This motion and the other measures announced by the Prime Minister are a significant first step in delivering on the promises he made during the referendum campaign. They are also an important bridge to the first ministers conference on the amending formula that is scheduled to take place in April 1997. Once these negotiations start we will have benefited from the practical application of the distinct society motion and the veto bill.

The Prime Minister made it quite clear that these measures can some day be entrenched in the Constitution if it is the desire of the province of Quebec and other provinces to do so. However, the Government of Quebec has stated categorically that it does not want to participate in any constitutional discussions. Until this unreasonable position of the Parti Quebecois government changes, we will not be able to incorporate these measures into the Constitution.

• (1705)

I am convinced that the vast majority of Quebecers will view these initiatives in a favourable light. They will see that the Prime Minister is serious about making the changes they want.

Obviously, members of the Bloc Quebecois and of the Parti Quebecois will oppose these changes. The reason is simple: they are separatists. They have no intention of improving Confederation. Their only goal is to destroy Canada. As Jacques Parizeau said during the referendum campaign: "We do not want a distinct society, we want a country."

In spite of the intransigence of the Bloc Quebecois and of the Parti Quebecois, we will not let them prevent the adoption of these changes that are not of a constitutional nature, changes that the people of Quebec and the rest of Canada want.

[English]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be splitting my time with my colleague, the member for Simcoe Centre.

I am pleased and I am also saddened to rise today and speak to government Motion No. 26, which seeks to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. It also gives me great pleasure to stand before my colleagues in the House today as a loyal Canadian and state why I am opposed to this motion.

Speaking here today, I hope to make clear my opposition to this motion from a historical, legal, and personal point of view. Along with Bill C–110, this motion constitutes the other half of the Liberal initiative to appease Quebec separatists in the wake of the disastrous handling of the October 30 referendum by the Liberal government. From a historical perspective, I must again note the saying, which has often been quoted in the House, that those who do not learn from the mistakes of the past are destined to repeat them. It would appear that history is not a subject the framers of this motion are even remotely acquainted with.

For the benefit of those Liberal members who were not present in the Chamber last week for the debate on Bill C–110, I will say it again. If this motion were some grade B horror movie it would be dubbed "Son of Meech". This motion, or is it a rerun of a motion picture, is a doomed rehash of the Meech and Charlottetown packages which were ultimately rejected by Canadians. If they could be given a say on this motion it would be rejected outright as well.

I was not present during the Meech and Charlottetown debates, so I have waited several years to speak on this issue, but my remarks are as relevant now as they would have been in 1987 or 1992. This is when attempts similar to the one before us were made by the former Tory government.

Yes, Madam Speaker, and members on both sides of the House, "je me souviens". I remember the failures of those initiatives, even though the members across the way clearly do not. I also remember that a former prime minister and a government bloated with arrogance yet painfully thin on solution proposed essentially the same thing. I also remember what became of that government just one year later.

It is because people remember and have learned from history that I say confidently that this motion is unacceptable to Canadians.

From a legal point of view, this motion raises more questions than it answers. That would not necessarily be such a problem except that the Prime Minister will not answer any questions in regard to the meaning of that phrase distinct society. What does that mean?

• (1710)

This lack of openness by the Prime Minister only adds to the confusion. For example, does the motion confer additional powers on Quebec or not? If, as I suspect, it does or will with the passage of time give powers to Quebec that are not given to the other provinces, then clearly it must be opposed.

Also, is this motion the precursor for an attempt by the Prime Minister to entrench the notion of distinct society in the Constitution? If it is, as I suspect is the case, and the Prime Minister wishes to do so at the scheduled review of the Constitution in 1997, should Canadians not know this now? Let us have the government be forthright.

By extension, any entrenchment of distinct society as an interpretive clause in the Constitution will be unacceptable to Canadians for the same reasons it was back in 1992. Also, does the notion of distinct society in any way detract from the principle that all Canadians are equal? Here again the government will give us nothing but vagaries.

By way of personal remarks I would like to share with members on both sides of the House the contents of a very insightful letter I recently received. The letter is from François Labrecque, a longtime resident of Quebec. I had the honour of meeting him while I was in Quebec City recently, and he wrote to me with his thoughts on this distinct society issue. He writes quite intuitively: "I am not sure the concept of distinct society should be presented as is. Instead of thinking of powers and rights with regard to distinct society, we should think in terms of responsibilities of individuals, groups, responsibilities of the people themselves and of their provinces to ensure that the distinct character is preserved".

He concludes in part that the Liberal Party approach is to provide distinct society status for Quebec and nothing for the other regions and provinces, which provokes negative sentiment in the rest of Canada and is clearly a divisive element.

This is a Quebecer I am quoting, who clearly understands the shortcomings of any distinct society proposal. Reformers would agree with his position.

For the benefit of those Liberal members who require further insight, no Canadian doubts that the language and culture of Quebec make it distinct. The language is dynamic, the culture is vibrant. These two characteristics alone will ensure its survival. That is why attempts to legalize or enshrine the concept in the Constitution are so insulting and offensive to many Quebecois.

The Liberals are asking Quebecers to adopt some siege mentality that claims their language and culture is weak and dying. Fortunately, Quebecers themselves know the exact opposite to be true and realize that assuming responsibilities in key areas will allow Quebec's distinctiveness to be maintained.

From a personal point of view, I watched as the Prime Minister tabled this motion in the House last week on November 27. At the time I could not help but feel that my birthright as a Canadian was being sold for the sake of a deal. I cannot understand how a government that professes to be so dedicated to the concept of equality can advocate something that so detracts from this principle. Then again after seeing Bill C–64, the government's racial quota bill, I should not really be all that surprised.

I ask members of the House to contemplate the concept of equality as they consider the consequences the motion will have on the equality rights of all Canadians.

I cannot support the government's motion to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. There is no safeguard to ensure that the motion will not be used to further the goal of Quebec nationalists. There is no assurance the motion will not be used to confer additional powers on the legislature of Quebec. It offers no guarantee that individual rights will not be made subservient to collective rights. It affords no protection to the minority population of the province.

The leader of the Reform Party has put forward an amendment that would address many of the concerns I have raised. It is my hope that when it is put to a vote members opposite will support it. To do otherwise and to adopt the government's motion as is would be to characterize some Canadians as distinct and some as second class citizens.

Unless the amended motion is adopted by the House I serve notice of my intent to vote against the motion as put forward by the government.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak against the motion to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. We are talking about a promise or a commitment and I will talk about some promises and commitments that have been made.

I will start with a promise that was made in the eleventh hour. It is a reluctant promise. It is a promise that was made in panic and desperation. It is a promise that had to be made because the government was out of touch with the people of Quebec. It is a promise that was made with no reflection on the past or no vision of the future. It is a promise that is out of touch with Canadians as a whole. As a matter of fact 55 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec oppose the recognition of a distinct society.

We are trying to bring in a promise the Canadian people already rejected at the front door. I am talking about Meech Lake and Charlottetown. The Canadian people had a say and they rejected the concept of a distinct society. Yet here we are trying to bring it in through the back door, top down, with no consultation. The government has imposed closure to push it through. The attitude is that it knows best what the people of Canada want. This is a Quebec promise, not a Canada promise.

In October 1993 there was a cry for change in the country from both inside and outside Quebec. The message I heard in October 1993 was that Canadians were worried. They were concerned. The response of the government since the election has been don't worry, be happy. After two years of blissful ignorance and a do nothing approach we almost lost the country on Monday night, October 30.

It is interesting that during the referendum the separatists had 30 days to spread their unchallenged version. The destroyers of Canada were given 30 days to get their message out. The government brings in closure so that we who want to speak for Canada, to get the Canada agenda out, are given 30 hours. We have 30 hours to debate what is probably one of the most significant motions before the House in the two years we have been here.

So much for open government. So much for government responding to the voters. We should not be surprised. This is the government that actually had to appoint candidates because it did not have confidence in the Canadian voters to select the right candidates. This is the government that shows its so–called true concern for the democratic process. This is the government that has shown its arrogance time and time again in the two years we have been here, with the rebuke of government members who stood to speak against gun control.

We were dealing with a promise of desperation. Let us now deal with some promises or commitments that have been made to the Canadian people. What about the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs? Two years ago we heard about jobs, jobs, jobs, and today we have an unemployment rate of 9.4 per cent. In the month of November, 44,000 jobs were lost in Canada. Where are those jobs? What happened to the much heralded infrastructure program that was to kickstart the economy and create jobs? It was another failure. All it did was put us $6 billion deeper in debt with no jobs. Now we have a cabinet committee looking at the job creation problem.

It is also interesting that the only jobs we have right now are because of free trade. This is a government that opposed free trade, but it is a pleasure to stand today and recognize the jobs that free trade created.

What about the promises of dealing with the deficit? Nothing has been done in two years in spite of warnings from Moody's and the IMF. Government members were shooting the messenger when Moody's warned the finance minister that he was not going far enough in dealing with the deficit. We have since learned that the IMF has issued the same warning to the government, that it has not been serious in attacking the deficit and that Canada is in great jeopardy.

What about tax relief? Smokers are the only ones I know that received any tax relief from the government because it gave in to the smugglers. Canadians as a whole have not had any tax relief. Canadians who drive cars are paying additional taxes which they can ill afford, although there was a commitment to tax relief.

The statement in the red book on criminal justice was that fighting crime and violence required tough measures. We have not seen tough measures. Tough measures are lacking. We still have section 745 of the Criminal Code that allows those convicted of first degree murder back on the streets after 15 years and we still have no victims' rights.

The government has not addressed the issue of political reform. We all experienced the level of cynicism and mistrust out there between the voters and the politicians. It still has not addressed the problem. It has done nothing about recall. As a matter of fact a private member's bill on recall was defeated in the House. The government does not believe in referenda, in letting Canadians have a say on major issues that affect their lives.

The GST was to be replaced. In two years it has done nothing about the GST. The Deputy Prime Minister was to resign if the issue was not dealt with in two years. The last time I looked she was still in the House of Commons.

I am highlighting these promises because they were made to all Canadians. If these promises had been kept, they would have gone a long way to addressing the unity crisis we face in the country. The people of Quebec are just as concerned as the people of Ontario and the people of B.C. about the fact that we have a government that is not getting its spending under control, that is not dealing with the criminal justice system, that does not respond to victims and that is not responding to elected politicians who represent the people in their ridings.

We could see the people of Quebec during the referendum looking at Ottawa and asking: "Could it be any worse if we went on our own?" They were looking at a federal government that is failing to deal with the major problems of the country. It is conceivable some of them could very well have said to themselves: "Why not leave? What we are looking at in Ottawa is a situation that is taking us deeper and deeper into debt. There is no indication they have learned from the past and will do anything about it".

It is evident we have not learned anything from the past. I recall the b and b commission that originated back in 1965. It was to deal with the greatest crisis in the country. I supported that in 1965 because I thought it would address the unity problems we were having and would bring the country together.

After 30 years it has been an utter and complete failure. All the government has to do now is look across the aisle and staring it in the face are 53 members of Parliament elected from Quebec to tear the country apart, living testimonial to the failed policies of the past, the status quo.

There is no question we must change. That was the message in October 1993. I am proud to say Reformers put forward 20 positive proposals for change that had strong support both inside and outside Quebec.

• (1725)

The 20 proposals for change did not require opening up the Constitution. They could have been done by a willing government. We saw it as a win–win situation. It was to go a long way to keeping our country united. It was to go a long way to addressing our overspending because many of the changes dealt with a realignment of powers, decentralization, eliminating duplication and bringing governments closer to the people they were serving.

We also missed the message in the Spicer commission report. The Spicer commission criss–crossed Canada and spoke to over 400,000 Canadians, 300,000 elementary and secondary school students. In the report there was strong support for equality of provinces and of people. There was also strong support for the recognition of Quebec's differences, but there was little support for two–tier citizenship. That is what the bill is dealing with.

During our break in November I held a series of town hall meetings across my riding. I wanted to get the feel of the people about the situation we would be dealing with, the possibility of another referendum or the possibility of recognizing Quebec as a distinct society.

I supplied the people at the meetings with a questionnaire. At the end of the meeting I asked them to answer this question: Would you support distinct society status for the province of Quebec if it meant granting special powers not available to the other provinces? Ninety–eight per cent of those who responded to the questionnaire said no to any special status in recognizing the province of Quebec.

It is time the government stood up to the separatists and called their bluff. It is time to stand up for Canada and speak for Canada as a whole.

This country is a great country. It can only continue to be a great country if it is based on equal provinces and equal citizens. I call on all members of the government to oppose recognition of one province. Otherwise they are destroying our great country, the country our children and grandchildren are looking forward to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent to call it 5.30 p.m. and proceed to Private Members' Business?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

POLITICAL PARTY FUNDRAISING

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): moves:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reviewing and reforming funding for political parties.

He said: Madam Speaker, the present system of financial contributions to political parties contains deficiencies that must be dealt with. All too often, we hear people say that large companies run the country and that they are the ones who can benefit the most from their financial support for political parties. This is a commonly held view.

As we know, such a notion is very harmful to democracy and that is why I believe it is necessary to consider possible changes.

According to data obtained for the four last years, including the election campaign of 1993, the existing system costs the state some 30 millions dollars annually. Of course, I have all this information at hand.

Since taxpayers have to pay for the system one way or another, we propose the following solution: the state should contribute one dollar for every individual. This way, democracy would be better served.

This solution has many advantages. I will give you a few examples. Such a system would be the most democratic form of funding for political parties. Of course, every one would be equal. Members of Parliament would no longer have to collect funds for general elections. As we all know, this requires a lot of time and effort, and political parties themselves have to spend money to organize public fundraising.

The cost to the state would actually be lower, because the figures I quoted were very conservative. I have indeed demonstrated that the government would pay less in such a system.

This will put to rest the public perception that this is a slush fund, because it is not good for the public to believe such a thing. Politicians or parliamentarians would not owe anyone anything.

Time has come to review the system to ensure the proper functioning of democracy, so that we can, once and for all, be free to do our job without having our hands tied.

[English]

The democratic principle demands that every citizen be accorded complete equality by the process which selects the people's representatives. Canada's present electoral system violates this principle in a fundamental way, for it is privately financed.

When private interests are involved in party financing the political process deteriorates into a mere approximation of democracy. The participation of corporations, unions and private individuals in the political process obviously is inevitable and indispensable in many ways but should in no way include the financing of political parties.

In my view the repair of this structural failure is of paramount importance. Any country which claims serious adherence to democratic ideals should publicly finance its political parties by a mechanism which directly relates their financial support to their political support.

After looking at this present system and then at individual financing options I present an inexpensive and flexible public financing mechanism. Here are at least three objectives. The present financing of political parties makes a mockery of the cornerstone of our democracy that every citizen should be accorded complete equality by the process which selects the people's representatives. It allows private organizations which have no right to vote at all to indirectly cast hundreds of ballots by financial support to a particular political party.

It restricts flexibility on policy issues since political parties must give greater consideration to the largest supporters. This is incompatible with the concept of a truly representative democracy. Political parties should be solely responsible to their members and obviously to the public.

Shareholders of corporations and members of unions do not necessarily support donations made on their behalf. Party financing by private organizations is a clear distortion of the democratic process. However, in a free and democratic society private individuals should have the right to contribute their own personal funds to the party of their choice.

That sounds logical. Nevertheless there are at least three fundamental objections to this option. It would require political parties to spend a greatly increased and inordinate amount of their time in fundraising. This is an inappropriate role for the people's representatives and also is inefficient.

The proper function of a political party is to structure policy, not fundraising. It does not address the primary inequity. Any privately financed democracy, whether financed by private organizations or by private individuals, will have its fundamentally democratic factor distorted. This situation is abnormal and unacceptable in our system. It simply cannot be protected from abuse.

In the United States it is common practice for every member of a corporation's top management to simultaneously contribute to a party or candidate the maximum donation allowed by an individual, thereby in effect making a corporate donation.

• (1735)

The argument for individual financing is an incorrect generalization of the principle that in a free and democratic society each individual should have the right to support the party of his or her choice. This right is inalienable but should not extend to the use of personal wealth. The right to support the party of our choice includes the right to vote for the party of our choice and to work for the party of our choice. However, merely signing a cheque seems too easy and unfair to those who do not have any great amount of money to contribute.

The mechanism is very simple. I will outline a simple, flexible and inexpensive democratic public financing mechanism that will certainly make the system much more fair and equitable.

We would eliminate all private financing of political parties; establish a party financing fund by an annual allocation of $1 per voter from general revenues; distribute a portion of the fund among the registered political parties proportional to popular vote; distribute the other portion of the fund among the registered political parties in existence.

The cost is negligible. One dollar per voter per year is a small amount for the support of a democratic election. Furthermore, the annual cost to the treasury would actually be less than what it is today, less than the $30 million that it costs. The method of the distribution is flexible and democratic.

The distribution of the first part of the fund by proportional vote directly ties financial support to political support, ensuring that parties with greater political support receive greater financial support.

The distribution of the second part of the fund equally provides a counterbalance that moderates the effect of large majorities, ensuring that parties with less support receive sufficient funds to effectively communicate the policies to the citizenry.

[Translation]

In closing, some obvious conclusions come to mind. Public funding is the only truly democratic way of financing political parties. At present, political party funding is a mix of personal tax credits, corporate tax deductions and contributions made by the government to each candidate who gets at least 15 per cent of the vote in an election.

Public financing will force political parties to account for the use made of their funds. Political party funding will spare the political parties the need to raise funds, which is very time and energy consuming. This way, political parties can devote their time to developing policies. Finally, it will greatly improve the way the public perceives politicians, political parties and politics.

This is basically what I had to say about the need to make changes in our political system with respect to funding of political parties. If any other member wishes to comment on this, I will welcome their comments, and if they have questions to put to me, I will gladly answer them.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the hon. member's motion. At the same time, I regret having to do so because if this hon. member of the government feels the need to table such a motion, it is because his own government has failed to honour its red book commitments, the commitments it made in the last election campaign.

There is no cause for alarm, however. If the hon. member looks carefully at the government's record of the past two years, he will see that it has broken all its commitments, whether they have to do with social programs, defence policy or the red book.

• (1740)

The fact that a Liberal backbencher has to remind his own government that it had promised to thoroughly review political party funding shows how lightly this government takes its election commitments.

In the matter under consideration, the red book promises to restore voters' confidence, promote integrity in political institutions, and limit conflicts of interest and influence peddling through an in–depth review of political party funding.

This wish is reflected in the motion. Except that, in March 1994, I launched a debate that made it to third reading, a private member's motion saying that political parties ought to be funded by the public, that they should only be funded by people who have the right to vote, which would exclude institutions, corporations, unions, non–profit and for–profit associations.

Although this would be a guarantee of democracy and openness, the vast majority of the hon. member's fellow Liberals voted against it, because their party is no different from the one it replaced. As they say in Quebec, they must look after their buddies after the election. They must return the favour to the big engineering and architectural firms, to the big banking institutions for funding them and helping them get elected.

In this respect as in many others, the government has refused to honour its commitments by enacting bills or amending existing legislation.

The motion before us is nothing but wishful thinking. What is wishful thinking? Decisions that have not been implemented in practice. The hon. member's motion is nothing but wishful thinking. He knows full well that his government is not interested in changing the system, because, like the Conservative government, it is financed to a very large extent by multinationals and private interests.

His motion should have proposed a concrete measure, instead of saying "the government should consider the advisability of reviewing and reforming funding for political parties". It should have said: "We will change this or that to the funding of political parties, for example by authorizing public financing, that is by allowing contributions only from those who have the right to vote. That would have been a concrete measure, instead of merely expressing an interest to reconsider the existing system. The member acts exactly like the Conservative government did when it tried to distance itself from its 1988 election commitment.

At the time, Prime Minister Mulroney pledged, one week before the election, to implement public financing for political parties. I remember seeing a front page article in La Presse. But what did he do after that? He set up a committee, the Lortie commission, which cost $20 million and produced a report with recommendations that were taken into consideration neither by the Conservative, nor by the Liberal governments.

If you want the true solution to the problem of political party funding, look at how things are done in Quebec. But let us be honest and recognize that some steps were made in the last 20 years, such as the granting of a tax credit. Twenty years ago, 95 per cent of the financing came from companies. The tax credit currently granted to corporations and to individuals has resulted in a 40 per cent drop in contributions made by corporations. This is a first step. Some provinces also took action to limit interference in the government machinery associated with political contributions. All political parties talk about bringing in reforms, but no one takes concrete action. The Liberal party reminds us of those old parties.

Let us not forget also that putting the funding of political parties in order is in line with the Criminal Code. Section 121 of the Criminal Code clearly states that it is an offence to attempt to obtain a special privilege in return for a financial contribution. A good many departments must be nervous about certain contributions.

Reforming political fundraising is not only in keeping with the Criminal Code, it also reflects the public's desire for openness and transparency. Voters now want the people they elect to Ottawa to know whom they are there to serve. They want their elected representatives there to serve the common good and not the interests of a privileged few. They want the individual who has contributed $20 to be shown as much respect by elected members as the company that contributed $50,000.

They also want funds to be collected according to clearly defined standards and used to serve all, not a privileged few. This is a way to perpetuate our democracy in the face of huge multinationals and rich backers of political parties.

By putting grassroots fundraising at the service of democracy and the political parties, we put the focus on the voter. We also force the parties to come closer to the voters and to care about their needs, since they are the ones who will be providing our funds.

More value will be assigned to membership in a political party. It also develops a feeling of pride in belonging to a political party they help to finance. It also increases the democratic vigour of a society and forces the party to decentralize its decision making. As we come closer to achieving grassroots financing, democracy as it is experienced in Quebec and Canada becomes a great and noble undertaking that starts reflecting the true meaning of democracy and openness.

To conclude, I think the following puts it in a nutshell: tell me by whom you are financed and I will tell you whom you serve. That is more or less what we can learn from this discussion on the motion before the House today.

I also wish to pay tribute to the hon. member who within his own party, had the courage to realize the extent to which his party and the traditional party system are at the beck and call of certain corporations and privileged contributors instead of being there to serve all citizens.

His suggestion that $1 be contributed per voter to the existing parties, a proposal inspired by a professor from New Brunswick, is admirable but would prevent the creation of new political parties. For instance, could the Reform Party or the Bloc Quebecois, two parties that appeared on the political scene at the last election, have been born without this contribution?

My point is that, by helping to maintain existing parties, government financing might prevent other ideas, structures and political groups from developing. So feelings are mixed about this suggestion that raises many concerns.

Nevertheless, I hope that discussing these issues may help the Liberal Party understand that, even within its own ranks, some drastic changes are in order. And they will have to come in the form of grassroots financing of political parties.

[English]

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Madam Speaker, when I look at Motion No. 367 I could certainly agree in a general sense with the thrust of the motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reviewing and reforming funding for political parties.

•.(1750)

The only problem I have with the wording is it is a little vague. It says "consider the advisability of". It is a pity the member had not worded his motion "that in the opinion of this House the government should review and reform funding for political parties". That would have been a lot clearer and a bit more forceful in its thrust.

I see that the motion is non–votable and it reminds me that this one hour of debate is fairly meaningless. I wish for the hon. member's sake that it could be a votable motion so that at least members could express their opinions on this issue.

I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to make this motion votable.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, this is absolutely amazing. The member's own colleagues are denying him the right to have a votable motion. The member spent some time talking about the importance of democracy in political parties and he cannot even get the consent of his colleagues to allow a vote on that motion in the House. It is certainly a symptom of the way the government runs its affairs.

In a general sense I agree with the motion. I would like to read the Reform Party policy on funding of political parties. The blue book policy which was developed and passed by our members it says: "The Reform Party opposes any assistance to political parties and political lobbies from public funds, including any refund of candidate or party expenses, government advertising during the electoral period, the renting of parliamentary staff for reimbursement, tax credits for contributions to federal political parties and the transfer of tax credits to leadership campaigns, to nomination campaigns or to parties at the provincial or municipal level".

It can be seen that we have a rather comprehensive policy. It stems from the way that we had to build our party.

I heard the hon. member from the Bloc talking about the difficulty of building a new party. We had to build our party from the ground up, from nothing, with not a single cent. I was there almost from the beginning, from late 1987. In fact, one of the people who is now on my executive committee in the riding association was one of the original signatories to the charter of the Reform Party.

We had to raise money by having bake sales, by having garage sales, by walking door to door asking for $10 here and $1 there. It was worth it. It is tremendously fulfilling to be able to build a party that way. If something is not worth working for, it is not worth having.

In that respect I disagree with the member's position that the state should fund parties because it is unfair to people who cannot afford to contribute. If it is not worth working for, it is not worth having.

Even though the Reform Party and even the Bloc started from way behind with tremendous disadvantages, it is tremendously fulfilling to be able to build a party from the ground up.

The hon. member stated that the present system is unfair to people who cannot afford to contribute. No, it is not. People who cannot afford to contribute can work as volunteers and help. Perhaps they can even be fund raisers. I do not think the present system is unfair at all.

Although the hon. member for Gatineau has a formula which he claims would be democratic and fair, when I look at his formula I see that there is a component that would give an equal amount of money to each party but then there is a component that gives some money based on the share of the vote in the previous election. Obviously that is an unfair advantage to the party that is in power. That is not reflected in a democratic way of the support levels at the time of the next election. That is a major flaw in the approach that has been proposed by the member from Gatineau. All that does is give the government side an advantage so it can spin its propaganda and cover up its lack of interest in the political will of the people between elections.

• (1755)

The government very clearly demonstrates it has no interest in the people's opinions between elections. I do not think it is going to take this member's motion seriously because it is simply not interested in getting the public involved.

It was obvious when members opposite refused to make this motion votable that they were not interested in democracy at all. If they were interested in democracy, they would take notice of people and their opinions on the Young Offenders Act. They have done nothing to make it more effective.

If you ask people anywhere in the country if their streets are safer than they were two years ago when the government was elected, they say no. All the polls indicate that people sense that things are much more dangerous than they were then.

On Indian land claims, the government does not give a darn what B.C. MPs have stated about what is happening in B.C. They simply do not care what the people of B.C. think. We could talk about the employment equity bill and the way that was forced through the House and the lack of democracy in the way the government works.

Frankly, I often tell my constituents that if members came here just once a year for 15 minutes, put all the bills for the year on the table and took one vote, the outcome would be exactly the same. This is a place of parties, rather than—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Could I ask the hon. member about the relevance of his comments to the private member's bill.

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, what I am trying to relate it to is the fact that the member opposite wants to institute some sort of democratic support of parties. I am trying to point out that the government side is not interested in anything democratic. Its members will not vote for the motion. They will not allow it to be voted on because they are not interested in democracy. They want to pursue their political agenda, their party agenda.

If Madam Speaker would feel more comfortable with my getting more closely aligned to the motion, I am certainly prepared to do so.

I support the idea that the government should review and reform the funding for political parties, but not along the lines suggested by the member. I would rather see the House get involved in the Reform Party proposal, which is to make the support of political parties depend entirely on the money they can raise from the people they purport to represent.

After all, political parties are nothing more than special interest groups. At the moment, political parties are special interest groups that have a special advantage because the donations they receive are tax deductible with a premium. They are much better than the tax deductibility for any other type of charity or special interest.

The politicians of the past have chosen to give themselves an advantage over everybody else who has to raise money from the public. Members of the Reform Party feel that the political parties should have to raise their money from the people they purport to represent and that the money should not be tax deductible. It should be truly money that is given in support of that party.

As I said earlier, if it is not worth working for something, it is not worth having. It is certainly worth working to build a political party.

Reform also disagrees with the idea that these election rebates go back to candidates and parties. All it does is perpetuate the public paying for special interest groups that they may not have any interest in supporting whatsoever. Clearly this is anti-democratic, not democratic, as the member would like us to believe.

In summing up, I would like to repeat one more time the Reform Party's position on this type of motion. I will read that policy one more time.

The Reform Party opposes any assistance to political parties and political lobbies from public funds, including any refund of candidate or party expenses, government advertising during the electoral period, the renting of parliamentary staff for reimbursement, tax credits for contributions to federal political parties and the transfer of tax credits to leadership campaigns, to nomination campaigns or to parties at the provincial or municipal levels.

• (1800)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre for bringing this motion before the House for debate. It is a useful topic for debate and I am glad we have this opportunity for discussion.

However, listening to the hon. member for North Vancouver, it was one of the most extraordinary things I have heard in a while. He came out with this policy of the Reform Party which is another case of do as I say but not as I do policies Reform spouts so often in the House.

We all know that during the last election the members of the Reform Party scooped their hands into the public till. Although they abhor the idea of public financing of elections, they all applied for the rebate they were entitled to get from the federal government. Then their party applied for its 22.5 per cent reimbursement which it is entitled to get from the federal treasury. The members had no reluctance about going after that money to the best of my recollection.

Now they say their policy is they will not take that kind of money. Yet according to the rumours I hear they have fundraisers from time to time. They issue tax receipts for those fundraisers the way other parties do even though they say their policy is they do not do that.

They say that is their policy but they do exactly the opposite. They do as much as any other party does to take advantage of the laws of Canada that give political parties advantage. Frankly, they ought to do that but not if they are saying their policy is different. It is what I would call hypocrisy, but I think it unparliamentary for me to say that a member of the House is hypocritical or a hypocrite. I would not do that. However, the Reform Party policy is very hypocritical on this matter.

Those members use the money in the most unorthodox ways like paying suit allowances of $30,000 a year to their leader so he can be properly dressed while he gives up the publicly paid car.

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know what this has to do with the motion before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary is getting to the point. We will not have to wait much longer.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, indeed we will not because I am talking about electoral financing, which is what the motion concerns. The hon. member may have missed the point since he got on about young offenders and so on. I am trying to address my remarks to the subject matter of the motion which is, after all, electoral financing, but that may have escaped him. His remarks seemed to be all over the place.

The other thing he should know is his colleague and our very good friend, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest, introduced a bill dealing with electoral financing which is currently being studied by the procedure and House affairs committee which I have the honour to chair. I know the bill is going to come up next Tuesday. It is going back on the agenda for consideration in the committee.

Does this bill abolish public financing of parties? No, it does not. It eliminates funding for parties that get less than a certain percentage of the vote but it will continue it for everybody else. I believe there has been some agreement reached between the hon. member and members of the other parties which improves the situation somewhat. However, I do not know what the final result is and I would not presume to discuss the final details of the bill not knowing them.

I think the hon. member for North Vancouver ought to be aware that the policy of his party which he spouted with such apparent sincerity is being ignored quite blissfully by the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest in the bill he has presented to Parliament and which now he is pressing my committee to report back to the House on so he can pass it.

I hope the hon. member for North Vancouver is here in the House to support his colleague's bill when it comes to a vote. It is a votable item and he will have that privilege. I am looking forward to seeing what he says because here he reads the policy on the one hand and he will get a chance to vote for the policy by voting against his friend's bill. We will see what happens then.

The Liberals on my committee are supporting the bill as are the members of the Bloc Quebecois. They have good sense. The hon. member for North Vancouver would do well to learn from his colleague, the member for Edmonton Southwest, and scrap the ridiculous policy he says his party members have voted in. I find it quite extraordinary. Let me turn to the motion before the House.

The Canada Elections Act provides for the reimbursement of a portion of election expenses incurred by registered political parties. Specifically, a registered party is entitled to a reimbursement of 22.5 per cent of the expenses declared in its return provided it spends at least 10 per cent of the election limit.

Some of us have criticized this because we feel it encourages parties to spend money in order to collect the reimbursement. If they do not spend up to 10 per cent of the expenditure limit they do not get any reimbursement. Therefore they must spend like crazy to get there. It can be a fairly substantial limit, as hon. members know. They then get back 22.5 per cent of their expenses so that once they hit the limit it is basically a 75 cent dollar they have put out.

There is no limit on the amount that can be contributed to a registered political party but there is a limit on the amount that can be spent.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing recommended that registered parties receive at least 1 per cent of the votes cast in an election before they are entitled to any reimbursement and then receive 60 cents per vote received for a maximum of 50 per cent of election expenses. They could not get more than 50 per cent of their expenses back under this system.

In the last Parliament we had a special committee on electoral reform which considered the matter but did not agree with the Lortie recommendation. I was a member of that committee. I believe I am the only one left in the House. The others have moved on to other things.

We reviewed the report and recommended that the 10 per cent expenditure requirement be applied to a party's direct election expenses and that the rate of reimbursement be increased to 25 per cent of direct expenses, a very modest change from the present law.

I do not mind saying the reason we could not agree on anything else was that we ran into a stone wall with the Conservative majority, which saw that its electoral chances were failing. Those members realized that if they went to a 60 cent per vote arrangement, as recommended by the Lortie commission, they would get very little money if their vote fell out the bottom, as the polls at that time indicated they would. That is exactly what happened. Had we had that rule in place the Conservative Party would have been worse than bankrupt. It is in trouble now but it would have been much worse; the rule significantly helped it in the last election.

The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has proposed a bill that would eliminate reimbursement for parties that gain less than 2 per cent of the national vote. He is going to change that because he has received agreement from the other parties to make changes. I do not know what the changes are so I do not want to go on about his bill.

Now we have a proposal from the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest, being a generous spirited individual, has looked at other possibilities. I know he has because he has had suggestions made to him in the course of the committee proceedings where he had the advantage of hearing from other members. He said that all makes sense, let us make some more changes. He is making more changes and I commend him for that. I am looking forward to seeing the bill in its possibly final form when it rolls out of the committee possibly next week. If that happens we will all have the benefit of that and perhaps it will make the motion of the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre unnecessary.

However, we are dealing with his motion today. It is not a votable motion despite the efforts of the hon. member for North Vancouver and so we will have to deal with it as it stands. We will have a discussion about it and then go on to something else.

The hon. members opposite, although genuine in their desire for reform, do not agree on how they should go about it. They are making efforts to raise the level of debate by discussing these things and I respect that, particularly by the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest. It looks to me as though he has a speech coming up and I am looking forward to hearing his remarks.

The point is how to solve this problem. I do not know the answer but I do think the Lortie commission report is worth looking at again. The point of it was to ensure parties get reimbursed based on the number of votes they receive. Another possibility is to have a pot such as that suggested by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre and have a fixed amount of money available in accordance with the limits on election spending and then divide the fixed amount among the parties that participate in the election based on the number of votes they receive.

I believe there is general agreement that no party should get more than 50 per cent of its expenses reimbursed so that it would prevent some party that won more than half of the vote from getting more than half the money available. That strikes me as fair and reasonable.

However, I do not think that is what has been put forward today and we need to look at that kind of proposal in greater detail. We need to look at it with respect to the charter of rights and freedoms because, as we know, there have been challenges to the expenditure limits on parties and on others, third parties in particular not participating in elections.

All those issues will concern the procedure and House affairs committee as it undertakes the review of the Canada Elections Act, which I hope it will be doing soon. No doubt at that time it will consider the very worthwhile proposal put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

• (1810)

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would, first off, like to pay tribute to the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre for tabling this motion. Although very timid for a party like the Bloc Quebecois, the motion is revolutionary for the Liberal Party of Canada.

For the benefit of those watching us, I will take the liberty of rereading the motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reviewing and reforming funding for political parties.

It is very little. In fact, it is almost lip service. However, when I looked in the May 6, 1994, issue of Hansard, I found words, in the context of a similar debate, that were quite surprising coming from a federal Liberal. I will quote some of them.

He said: "I maintain, and I am not the only one, that the way political parties are funded leaves much to be desired". A certain former prime minister currently under investigation is suing the Government of Canada. If we had a good policy on funding political parties in this country, I am sure this sort of situation would not arise.

For over two years now, Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in your company in this place. The people in my riding claim my salary is high. But, for me to become a millionaire in politics, someone will have to augment my monthly income.

And yet, I know people who have done nothing but politics and who are said to be millionaires tens of times over. They probably know how to manage their pay better than I do.

I would, however, like to quote in passing a few extracts from the speech by my colleague for Gatineau—La Lièvre. I remind you that he went to the right school, my colleague for Gatineau—La Lièvre, because he sat in Quebec's National Assembly. He said:

> No companies, no legal, architectural or engineering firms. We all know the gamut of contributors to party funds. There is no need to elaborate. I do not think that large contributions are made out of love for democracy. We must absolutely look at this issue. I say this as the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

The text I have just quoted is on page 4019 of the House of Commons Debates for May 6, 1994.

Clearly the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre knows what he is talking about, because I took the liberty of checking with the office of the returning officer to see how the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre financed his electoral campaign in 1993. These figures are official, and anyone can go and check them with Elections Canada. In this member's case, individual contributions totalled $15,168, which represents 55 per cent of his financing, and corporate contributions amounted to $12,311, or 44 per cent.

• (1815)

I also took the liberty of checking in the riding of Saint–Maurice, the Prime Minister's riding. Individual contributions accounted for only 25 per cent, whereas corporate contributions accounted for 33 per cent. One union contributed $5,500, and, obviously, funds were transferred to him from his party, given that he was in their good graces.

Obviously, when we know who is funding the party in power, we can think about their intentions. On October 3, 1994, the Quebec City paper Le Soleil ran a headline to the effect that the Liberal and Conservative parties could thank major corporations for funding the political parties. I will give you a few examples. Listen carefully, Mr. Speaker, I think this is worthwhile.

The largest contribution was to the Conservative Party in the amount of $216,000. It was made by a company recorded only as T'ANG Management Limited. Give me one good reason why this company gave $216,000 to the Conservative Party, led by Ms. Campbell. Give me one single reason. The member for Gatineau—La Lièvre said in May 1994 that it certainly was not out of love for democracy.

If it is not out of love for democracy, does it fly in the face of this democracy? In the red book, the party opposite me made the commitment to change the way political parties were funded. Brian Mulroney decided to do the same thing a week before the 1988 elections. He did nothing.

In the Conservative Party, there was a member as courageous as the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, François Gérin, the former member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. Not only did he advocate that political parties should be funded exclusively by voters, he applied this principle, rejecting any contribution from law, engineering or architectural firms, businesses, large or small, or unions. Unfortunately the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre did not do the same in 1993 since he accepted quite generous contributions from corporations of his riding and elsewhere.

This morning, the Royal Bank of Canada announced net profits of $1.3 billion. Why do banks make that much money? Because they have connections in government. By feeding Grits and Tories alike, they are not taking any chance. They are sure to be on the right side and to have favourable laws. For instance, the Royal Bank of Canada gave $88,700 to the Liberal Party and $85,300 to the Conservatives in 1993. Banks are not taking any chance.

Do you think that this party is serious about modernizing political funding? What was this same party doing just six weeks ago in Quebec? It flouted Quebec democracy by throwing money left and right three days before the referendum to arrange a big love–in. This nearly reached the no side's spending limit. Unfortunately it will not be accounted for. All they will get is a $10,000 fine.

They paid the salary of civil servants and teachers for that day. They closed schools and offices to allow civil servants in Hull and Ottawa to go to Montreal so they could show their affection, which lasted for an hour or so. Democracy was not respected in Quebec on that day. Some no side posters were even put up illegally.

The Reform Party is not without guilt either. It will be remembered that, in 1993, they accepted $25,000 from the Canadian Pacific and $10,000 from John Labatt. Naturally the sums were more modest but the corporations knew that the Reform Party had no chance whatsoever of coming to power. The Liberals had a heyday and they welcomed the opportunity. I hope the Prime Minister will not be prosecuted or come under investigation 4, 5, 6 or 10 years from now. If we believe in democracy, we must make a certain effort.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in respecting the tradition of the House, I will make my comments very brief, to give the member an opportunity to wind up, if that is the pleasure of the House.

I want to say a few words to this motion. As the House knows and as has been made very clear by the member for Kingston and the Islands, I have a bill before committee that speaks also to election financing. I commend my hon. colleague opposite for bringing this question to the House.

I am not speaking in favour of this motion. It does not provide the respect to emerging parties that it should. That has already been covered by others. It does not pay respect to new ideas and to parties that may never in fact elect anybody but do bring new and fresh ideas into the body politic of Canada. That is extremely important to our political discourse as a nation. And this bill does not respect performance. In my view, it is absolutely essential that performance be respected and rewarded. No matter what their historical significance, parties that do not resonate with the people should not be rewarded.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands went to great lengths to point out the contradiction in my presenting a bill to the House that would affect election financing that does not speak directly to the party policy. I want to make it clear, so that everyone understands, that my bill is incremental. The notion and the reason behind my bill is that it will save the taxpayers of Canada $1 million or so. In my books, saving $1 million or so is particularly important. In particular, the measures in that bill would ensure that political parties are rewarded only if they have resonance within the body politic of Canada, and that political parties are not rewarded merely because they have the resources to spend money.

I have listened to the debate this afternoon. I think this debate is particularly important. When I started to investigate election financing I noticed that if we measured the number of books they would be approximately eight or nine inches high. These are all books about election financing in Canada.

The point the hon. member from the Bloc raised about making sure the political process in Canada is kept as free as is humanly possible from any taint of scandal or influence peddling is one of the reasons I have come around to the view that there is much we can learn from the way the province of Quebec handles financial donations in that province.

I thank the House very much for the opportunity to speak. Once again I congratulate my hon. colleague opposite for bringing this very important debate to the House.

• (1825)

I concur with my hon. friend from North Vancouver who lamented that this was not a votable bill so we could see where all the dogs lie on this particular issue.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I understand that the hon. member for Gatineau—La lièvre has already spoken to the motion.

Mr. Assad: How much time do we have left, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There are still a few minutes left. Under the right of reply, I am prepared to give the floor to the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. However, I must inform the House that he will be the last member to speak to the motion.

Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Assad: How much time do I have, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Usually, under such circumstances, the House agrees to allow about two minutes for the member to close the debate.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, clearly, I will not have enough time to rebut some of the objections raised during the debate on this motion.

My research shows that there are much fewer flaws in this proposal than in the present system. This, I hope, will be the subject of another debate, at some other time.

I would have liked my colleagues in this House to realize that this is not a "revolutionary" idea, contrary to what one of my colleagues from the Bloc quebecois said. I believe it to be plain common sense.

It is indeed an idea I have been promoting for many years, even at the National Assembly, when I had the honour of serving my fellow citizens at the provincial level. I raised the issue of funding for political parties in 1974. This is not something I became concerned about last week.

I have observed the trend and the many scandals concerning political fundraising.

The idea I am presenting today is very simple. I am asking for a debate, not only among members of this House, who can settle the issue, but also in the public at large.

You know, I did just that. I asked several people: "Do you believe that the current way of funding political parties is democratic and fair or that there are slush funds?" Most people answered: "Do you think we are nitwits? We do not believe that the system is fair and equitable. Far from it."

If you ask ten people, at least nine of them will tell you that the system is rotten to the core. So, time has come to examine the way political parties are funded. We do not have to adopt the exact system I am proposing. A University of New Brunswick professor wrote a doctorate paper on the subject. I consulted him and exchanged information with him. His studies demonstrated that the most democratic way is to let the public at large fund political parties.

That is not complicated; perhaps it is even too simple. As is too often the case when an idea is too simple, it is difficult to get it accepted.

To conclude, this is a start. We must hope that other groups that care about our society will realize that the funding of political parties is fundamental in a democracy, and that big multinationals or people with a lot of money cannot be allowed to be the main backers of political parties. This is paramount in our democracy.

• (1830)

Let us hope then that this is a start, because the data that I have gathered clearly show that this would be the most equitable system, one which would not cost more to the state, not a cent more than it is costing today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

RECOGNITION OF QUEBEC AS A DISTINCT SOCIETY

The House resumed consideration of the motion and of the amendment.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of this motion on behalf of the people of Guelph—Wellington.

Canada has always been a nation of ordeals and of triumphs. This country was tied together with the railroad when some said it could not be done. It answered the call of peace and freedom in both world wars when some said that our country was too small to make a difference.

We have held together a nation of difficult climate with unbelievable vastness and extreme beauty. I am confident that we can turn the ordeal of the 1995 referendum into another triumph for our country.

This motion reminds us that it is the responsibility of the people elected to this national assembly to do what is right for Canada. The people of Guelph—Wellington know that this sometimes means that we recognize the obvious.

On October 27, 1995 residents of Guelph—Wellington joined the Canadian family in Montreal in a crusade for Canada. This crusade did not end when the buses returned. It did not end on referendum day when my constituents completed their prayers at Dublin Street United Church in Guelph. It did not end when the signatures dried on the petitions of love and affection signed by the students of the Wellington County Separate School Board. This crusade has not ended in the hearts of the people of Guelph—Wellington and all across Canada.

Their crusade is about promises to be kept, relationships to be strengthened and a nation that continues to be built. We owe it to the people who boarded buses at 3 a.m. on October 27. We owe it to the people who voted no on October 30 and we owe it to every Canadian who loves this country and feels an attachment to its support and support this motion.

The people of Guelph—Wellington are discouraged by members of political parties that believe they were elected to celebrate division and welcome the negative. They know that the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party were not at the rally on October 27. They are aware that while one party works toward separation, the other is anxious to demand that the terms of the break–up of this country be staked out, almost like vultures.

Never before has the difference between the government and the opposition parties been clearer. The Liberal government reminds Canadians that there is a lot to be thankful for. The Bloc and Reform Party find much to complain about every day. We are the crusaders. They are the destroyers.

We seek to unite but they seek to divide. The Prime Minister said in the House on November 29 that the spirit of co–operation and partnership that inspires us should motivate us to continue building this great country in an atmosphere of generosity and respect. What the Prime Minister is proposing is both reasonable and prudent. In voting in favour of this motion, we are representing the best interests of all Canadians in the context of all that is good for Canada.

The people of Guelph—Wellington are proud of their past and they know that we can acknowledge Quebec's distinctiveness because they are confident of our future. They look to the members of the House to build bridges, not to create gulfs.

We can give regional vetoes without destroying the fabric of our nation. We need not be afraid. The history of the community that I represent is a strong one because we have been successful when we all work together. There is no question the referendum was a difficult experience for the people of Guelph—Wellington and for all people across Canada. In the process, our patience has been strained, but our determination to make this country work has not weakened.

• (1835)

My constituents are telling me to rise above the leaders of division and speak directly to the people of Canada, the Canadian family that lives in Quebec, in British Columbia and every community across Canada. They believe that the options presented by the Prime Minister are better than those offered by the Bloc and by the Reform Party. We have a vision of unity and we have a vision of peace.

We want the government to continue on its agenda of jobs and growth. They know that a united Canada means more employment, economic stability and a stronger country for their children and their grandchildren. Their message to me is to get on with it and keep the promises made to Quebecers before the referendum. Ignore those who want to destroy Canada. They want their affection for Quebec to be heard and they want Quebecers to know that we have all succeeded in Confederation, every one of us.

The central question that must be answered is: How can we turn the ordeal of October 30 into a triumph for all Canadians? I do not believe this can be done by being closed, intolerant and narrow. We should always remember those who prayed, wrote, called, marched and rallied for our country during the days prior to the referendum. Triumph calls for inner strength. It calls us to put away our differences. It rises above fear and it rises above frustration.

We are the only elected body that can speak for all Canadians. This country was not built because our leaders reminded us of what is wrong. Canada is the best country in the world. Our Prime Minister can rise with pride to tell us that he is a proud Canadian and a proud Quebecer.

I am proud of my community of Guelph—Wellington. I have said here before that I believe it is the best community in Canada. In Guelph—Wellington, we are crusaders for this nation. We see the rally in Montreal as the beginning, not an end. We see this motion as another step in nation building. We are proud of our community and proud of our province, but we are first and foremost Canadians.

It was a Quebecer, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said that the 20th century belongs to Canada. It was another Quebecer, our Prime Minister, who said on October 27 that with this motion and other actions by the government, the country will enter the 21st century strong and united.

Guelph—Wellington residents want nothing more than a united and a strong Canada. They helped build our nation. They have love for family and community. They work hard and they want us to do what is right for Canada. They are Canadians first.

This motion is about change, change not for the sake of change, but change for the betterment of Canada. The people of Guelph—Wellington are confident Canadians. They know we can recognize the obvious, we can give regional vetoes and we can be centralized government without losing our nation. They know that the negative political parties will vote against this motion, but they also know that Canada will not be defeated. Canada has had its share of ordeals, but we have always triumphed.

As they left their buses in Montreal on October 27, the people from my riding were handed a message from Quebecers. I hope members of the Bloc are listening to this. This is the message that my people were handed on October 27 from Quebecers. It says: "Quebecers would like to thank you for your support, your love and your encouragement. We appreciate this unselfish act and we thank you from the bottom of our hearts. God bless this country and all its citizens. We thank you."

I have read and re–read this message many times. This motion is for the author of that message and for everyone who believes in Canada.

• (1840)

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and honour to speak on behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West to this extremely important motion tabled by the right hon. Prime Minister.

During and after the Quebec referendum the Prime Minister assured us that he would adequately address the clear demand for meaningful change within the federation. The Prime Minister is keeping his word to the people of Canada.

Like many of my colleagues on this side of the House, I am joining this debate in the Canadian spirit of conciliation, compromise and goodwill. At a time when various groups throughout the world are killing one another as a result of neo–nationalism, how typically Canadian for the federal government to address hard core neo–nationalist angst within the relatively calm and cool context of parliamentary debate.

The day before yesterday during debate on government Motion No. 27, we debated the recent Dayton peace agreement and Canadian support for the international community's continued efforts to bring enduring peace and security to the Balkans through participation in a multinational military implementation force under NATO command.

The significance of these two motions should not be lost on the members of the House. How typically Canadian for us to be so devoted to the maintenance of peace and security throughout the war torn regions of the world as to help other nations reach a lasting peace with one another. With respect to the current debate, how typically Canadian for us to set an example for the entire world by choosing conciliation instead of conflict, diplomacy instead of rebellion, peace instead of war.

I am not aware of any other nation in the world with the same degree of potentially conflicting differences from east to west in terms of culture, language, geography, economics and political outlook as Canada, whose citizens despite these differences are not embroiled in a bloody civil war or otherwise killing one another for the sake of these differences.

Canada by its very nature stands out as a beacon of hope in the world where the concept of peaceful co–existence is overshadowed by seemingly irreconcilable conflict between factions. It is therefore not only timely but also typically Canadian for the Prime Minister to extend an olive branch to the people of the province of Quebec in the wake of the October 30 referendum.

The results of the recent Quebec referendum remind us that we cannot take Canada for granted, that diversity must be respected. Consequently, the government has acted swiftly to initiate a process that in the words of the right hon. Prime Minister "will ensure the unity and evolution of Canada in order to respond to the aspirations of all Canadians".

I think that is worth restating. The government aspires to respond to the aspirations of all Canadians from sea to sea to sea. Some less diplomatic than I have suggested the members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the so–called dark prince of separatism, have been so consumed by their own thirst for power that they have lost sight of their primary responsibility to protect the economic, social and political security of the people of Quebec.

Others more cynical than I believe the desire of the Leader of the Opposition to focus 20:20 hindsight on the constitutional failures of his former political bedfellows is an indication of his unwillingness to set aside his uncontrollable, self–serving political ambition and focus on the long term future of the people of Quebec. Personally I feel that the marathon speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition has been somewhat misunderstood.

Clearly we can all understand how easily one can become confused by the constantly changing political agenda of the former Conservative Party federalist turned separatist, now would–be premier of Quebec.

I would like to cut through all of this confusion for a moment and focus on the unity motion. The unity motion is a solemn declaration that sets out how the Government of Canada will conduct its affairs with respect to Quebec in particular and Canada in general. Passage of this motion will indicate to all Canadians and all federal government authorities that it is the will of the House of Commons to recognize the distinct character of Quebec society within the framework of the Canadian federation.

I know what it is like to serve in the opposition. Unfortunately exaggerated and unwarranted attacks on forthright government initiatives are key elements of the often underwhelming opposition art form. If we rise above the separatist bantering of members opposite we see a government, in fact an entire nation of people united by their genuine concern for the long term future of the citizens of Quebec within the federation. How typically Canadian to labour to keep our country together.

Let us not forget the tens of thousands of letters and phone calls and rally goers from Hamilton, Dundas, Ancaster, Flamboro, Burlington and from right across Canada who so passionately showed their support and concern for the people of Quebec before, during and most important, after the October 30 referendum. Let us not forget the evolution of federalism that has allowed Quebec and the other provinces to enjoy increased powers and gradual decentralization with respect to the unique character of each and every province within the framework of a strong and flexible federalist system.

In the case of Quebec we recognize and respect its distinct character, its French speaking majority, its unique culture, its civil law tradition, the fact that Quebec is different, not superior. How typically Canadian that the federal government continues to recognize and respect the rights and concerns of minority groups within Quebec as well.

On behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West I want to say how proud we are of the right hon. Prime Minister's efforts to keep our federation alive. I am proud that the federal government has chosen to address the very real concerns raised by the people of Quebec in a diplomatic and conciliatory fashion.

If this is what it takes to ensure Canada's pre–eminent position in the world as a peace loving federation, if this is what we must do in order to remain the greatest country in the world in which to live, then in my support for this motion I am proud to be typically Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this opportunity to participate in the debate on the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, even if all that was tabled before this House was only a motion, is important to me personally, as a Quebec nationalist and as a member of the Bloc Quebecois in this 35th Parliament.

Before starting my remarks, I must say that it is rather late, in 1995, almost 1996, to realize that Quebec is different from Ontario, from the west and from the maritimes.

I remember, of course, the great declaration of love tens of thousands of Canadians outside Quebec made on October 30. I clearly remember New Brunswick Premier Frank McKenna coming and telling us that he loved us, while at the same time he toured industries on the periphery of his province, saying: "Come and do business with us; we love our Quebec friends". He was trying to steal our industries away from us. Love, yes, but as long as it is profitable. The Canadian federation has been extremely profitable to Ontario in particular for several centuries now.

By putting forward these proposals for change, including the one dealing with recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, the Prime Minister of Canada acts on the promise he made himself to trap the leader of the Bloc Quebecois before he leaves. The Prime Minister said: "I dream of the day when I will rise in this House to vote for Quebec's recognition as a distinct society and smile as I watch the Leader of the Opposition vote against it".

This is the Prime Minister speaking, a member from Quebec, the hon. member for Saint–Maurice, who, unfortunately, does not travel to Quebec often enough and, as a result, is literally out of touch with the francophone public opinion in Quebec. Twenty days before the referendum, like Claude Garcia, he was telling everybody: "We are going to crush the Quebecers and have a 65 per cent victory". Can you see how out of touch from his home province this man is?

That was a petty thing to say, a much too petty strategy, but it is true to form for the Prime Minister and member for Saint–Maurice.

This motion recognizing Quebec as a distinct society is not the result of a sensible reflection with the interest of the country or the betterment of the Canadian and Quebec society in mind, let alone a major change to save the country.

No, the Prime Minister's reflection was not based on these noble intentions, but rather on the desire to get back at the Leader of the Opposition and to discredit him.

Revenge and discredit are inappropriate guides at a time when the survival of two nations is at stake. But neither the people of Canada nor the people of Quebec are fooled by the Prime Minister's scheme or by the Deputy Prime Minister's crocodile tears.

The people understand that this distinct society proposal that was cobbled together even before the committee had tabled its recommendations and that has been revealed as phoney, this motion that recognizes Quebec's distinct society in such a superficial way is outdated and is no longer an issue in Quebec for both sovereignists and federalists who want serious changes.

Again, this shows how the Prime Minister is totally out of touch with Quebec reality. His fanaticism prevents him from understanding the message sent to him on October 30 by the people of Quebec.

• (1855)

In this regard, even partisan federalist newspapers are criticizing the Prime Minister. In the November 29 edition of La Presse, for example, Alain Dubuc writes: "The Chrétien government's first timid effort mostly shows that it has great difficulty in understanding what is happening in Quebec and Canada and, above all, in accepting changes that we see as inevitable".

They all agree that recognizing Quebec as a distinct society only through a declaration in the House of Commons does not resolve the underlying problem. Even its eventual entrenchment in the Constitution no longer satisfies the aspirations of Quebecers.

The Liberal government has missed the boat and neither the Leader of the Opposition nor the members of the Bloc Quebecois will be embarrassed to vote against this motion. On the contrary, adopting this motion would be a major setback in Quebec's path to recognition as a people.

As Gérald Larose used to say, we do not want to be bothered with distinct society any more. What we want now is to be a normal, quiet people.

Quebec is sick of these meaningless slogans, of being a society at the mercy of Ottawa's and English Canada's whims, of listening to a Prime Minister who denies ever having said what he said, both before and after having said it.

If the official opposition accepted this motion, Quebec would be seriously weakened since, as everyone acknowledges, Ottawa's distinct society proposal does not go as far as the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord, which both Quebec and the rest of Canada rejected.

The Prime Minister's motion to have the House recognize Quebec's distinctiveness cannot in any way be considered a response to the demand for change expressed by Quebecers in the October 30 referendum. We must keep in mind that, a little over a month ago, 50 per cent of Quebecers voted in favour of Quebec's sovereignty, while the other 50 per cent voted for a major renewal of Canadian federalism.

The motion before us falls short of Quebecers' aspirations. It is unacceptable, for both sovereignists and federalists.

Once again, the Prime Minister of Canada has made the wrong decision, as all Quebecers and Canadians know. That is why I think that the Prime Minister will not find it so funny on election day.

In closing, one can laugh at a people some of the time, but not all of the time.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's motion on distinct society takes me back to 1992, the year of the Charlottetown accord. That is also when I decided to dedicate the rest of my career to standing up for Quebec's interests here in Ottawa, as eight other Bloc members were already doing, seated at the back of the House, isolated, but undeniably efficient.

When offers are made to me, I usually examine them. I never dismiss anything out of hand, without giving it at least some thought.

• (1900)

Of course, Quebecers have the same attitude. Thus, having heard and read the Prime Minister's motion, I can say that it is the greatest dilatory tactic I have seen in my political life. The Prime Minister botched his work. The referendum results made him panic.

During the week preceding the referendum, he felt that he had to promise some changes, and this is what we have now: an empty shell, a black hole, a total blank. Distinct society my foot. This carbon copy of the Charlottetown proposals, which were rejected by both Quebec and Canada, as we recall, does not recognize the people of Quebec in any way. Where on earth does the Prime Minister live to think that Quebec is now prepared to accept less than Meech 1 and 2, less than Charlottetown, if that were possible?

The motion says that we speak French in Quebec and that we have a civil law tradition. How nice. This resolution is nothing but wishful thinking. The 1982 patriation of the Constitution was a denial of the existence of the Quebec nation. Since then, there has been only one nation: the Canadian nation. Thankfully, no Quebec government, not even the Liberals, put up with that rebuff. Meech 1 was entrenched in the Constitution. Some legal and political aspects in that accord allowed Quebec to keep its head high.

The current Prime Minister, along with his friends, managed to render that agreement meaningless. Quebec rejected a proposal, as did English Canada, but not for the same reasons, of course. How can the leader of the government dare take a step backward and seriously think that his resolution meets Quebec's historical and legitimate aspirations?

His ally in the no camp during the last referendum, the leader of the opposition in the National Assembly, Daniel Johnson, demanded that Quebec's distinct nature be entrenched in the Constitution. The Prime Minister knows full well that his motion is meaningless. He only introduced it to be able to say that he is fulfilling the promises for change he made at the last minute, when the yes side seemed dangerously close to winning.

As we saw in 1992, with the referendum on the Charlottetown accord, it is no longer enough to say, affirm, or wish that Quebec be recognized as a distinct society. At the time, the distinct society clause only had a symbolic value, so much so that most French–speaking observers in Quebec were convinced that this concept no longer had the same meaning as it did in the Meech Lake accord. It was so watered down that even Clyde Wells felt there was no risk of seeing this clause serve as a stepping stone towards the affirmation of a special status for Quebec. Yet, this is what the Prime Minister is proposing.

As a member representing a Quebec riding, I cannot support a motion which proposes much less than even the minimal claims made by Quebec over the years. Any Quebec member who does is in fact saying that, as far as he is concerned, Quebec does not exist as a nation. There are only people who speak French in a given region of Canada, period.

We all know that this resolution is just that: a mere resolution. With all due respect to this House, this resolution has no legal effect, even if it is supported by a majority of elected representatives. It merely reflects the will expressed by parliamentarians, and it would not be binding on any court in Canada. It is meaningless.

In his attempt to propose changes to Quebecers, the Prime Minister also included manpower training, as well as a veto power. Let me briefly say that, as regards manpower training, I am still looking for the change. Actually, there is one change. We now know that, when the Prime Minister talks about decentralization, it means that the federal government keeps control over the distribution of money.

The federal government prevents Quebec from implementing a true manpower training policy. Yet, everyone in Quebec agrees that all powers related to that sector should be delegated to the province.

• (1905)

It seldom happens that everybody agrees on one thing, in Quebec or elsewhere. As for the veto, let us not delude ourselves, what is being proposed amounts to providing for regional referendums whose terms and questions would be developed in Ottawa, where Quebec representatives are in minority as you know. Flexible federalism means that Ottawa makes the decisions and the provinces have to live with them.

Three weeks ago, I heard the Prime Minister say that he was a Prime Minister from a Quebec riding, a francophone and a Quebecer, and that his government should be trusted.

Personnally, I was willing to trust him to some extent. I told myself: "Listen, mistakes have been made; he made mistakes in 1982. But sometimes, a guy who has made a mistake can get back on his feet. I will therefore go half way and trust him".

In the motion he put forward, Motion No. 26, I thought I would find a recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, and that this recognition would also be enshrined in the Constitution. That was not the case. A few moments ago, I heard a member opposite say that we wanted separation and so forth. I will tell you that my father is a well known businessman in Quebec and in Canada. He has traded in all ten provinces of Canada. When my father returned from the west, the first question I used to ask him was: "Dad, how did it go out west?" And his answer would be: "Jean, it has been very hard, very difficult. I have the feeling that the west will separate before Quebec does".

When we look around in this House, we see that Quebec has rejected this proposal from the Prime Minister, Mr. Chrétien, who represents the constituents from Saint–Maurice, and that even the English Canadians who make up the third party, the Reform Party, said no to this proposal. Something must be wrong when both French speaking and English speaking Canadians agree to reject a proposal.

So, we have to recognize what Quebecers have been asking for for the last 25 years. It is not asking too much to want to be recognized as a distinct society. The federal government has done it for the Indians, why can it not do it for Quebecers? They gave the Indians some land. We are not asking for land, we already have some. We only want to be recognized.

Frankly, I must say that, after fighting for 25 years, Quebecers, the French speaking citizens of Quebec, really thought this time would be it. However, the Prime Minister told us: "Dear friends, wait until 1997, wait until April of 1997, when we will reopen the Constitution". I have to tell you in all honesty that, as a politician, when I decided to come to Ottawa, I told myself: "The only way to succeed is to be on the spot, to go to Ottawa and mingle with my English speaking friends". Because I must say in all honesty that the people from western Canada are my friends.

It is not because we have a different point of view that we cannot get along with people from western Canada or the maritimes. Of course not. What is important is to be on the same wavelength and to get support for a society, for a people—the men and women of Quebec who want to be recognized some day.

I trusted the Prime Minister. I am a bit disappointed, because I would have liked for the notion to say that our distinct society will be enshrined in the Constitution. It was not asking too much, as I said earlier, but it was not done.

This was his last chance. I remind the House that three days before the referendum, thousands of English speaking Canadians came to Montreal. I was proud, because these people came to visit our region. To say they love us is one thing, but to prove it is another matter.

So, as far as I am concerned, I would like all this to be enshrined in the Constitution and I will continue to reflect on this issue.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in what can only be regarded as a historic debate.

• (1910)

I would like to talk about a couple of things that are important with respect to the national unity of our country. These are things members opposite perhaps failed to mention when they talked about what they perceived to be the wrongs or the injustices suffered by their fellow citizens in various parts of the country. I say various parts of the country because this is not a case of complaints only from one province. We hear it from many provinces. We hear it from the provincial premiers when they complain about some of the changes the government is proposing in the amending formula. I know that bill is not before the House tonight, but it is part of the package of reforms the government has introduced, which I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss.

Although members do not mention it often, always in back of their speeches is the famous battle that occurred in Canada on the Plains of Abraham. I am not going to go through that. There was a second battle, which I think is virtually of equal importance for the future of the country and which is never mentioned. I want to remind hon. members about this story because it is of tremendous significance for Canada.

The battle happened 220 years ago this year. There was a revolution that started in the United States. The American Revolutionary Continental Congress decided to send a force to invade Canada and take over the colony of Quebec, which was then part of the British Empire, having been captured 15 years previously in the famous battle I mentioned earlier.

The Americans dispatched General Montgomery to capture the province of Quebec, or what was then the colony of Quebec. Starting in September he moved up the Richelieu River and captured Fort Saint–Jean and Fort Chambly before October 18, 1775. He subsequently attacked Montreal, where the British governor, Sir Guy Carleton, was stationed.

Governor Carleton realized the defence of Montreal was hopeless, given that he was outnumbered substantially by the American force. He had only 800 British regulars with him to defend the entire colony. He left Montreal by ship and sailed for Quebec on November 11, 1775, and immediately began fortifications of the city of Quebec.

General Montgomery took Montreal on November 13, stationed 500 of his troops there, and then moved on to Quebec City with about 300 men. He gathered with him various people from the countryside, des habitants pour l'aider avec son attaque sur la ville de Québec.

It is estimated he had between 1,600 and 1,800 men outside Quebec when he started his siege on December 5, 1775. The governor, Sir Guy Carleton, was in a heavily fortified position with apparently adequate food, but of course the city of Quebec was pounded by a bombardment launched by Montgomery and his forces as they besieged the city.

As winter continued to move in to the area and made things colder and more difficult for Montgomery's troops, he realized that in order to maintain his position he had to take the city and get the battle over with reasonably quickly. He launched an attack on the city of Quebec on December 31, 1775 in the early hours of the morning. It was dark. There were a lot of shots exchanged and ultimately Montgomery was killed in the streets of Quebec. The battle was lost for the Americans. The siege continued until the spring, but a British ship arrived, lifted the siege, and the Americans had to retreat.

That battle was won because the residents of the city of Quebec helped the British governor. They sided with the British governor, the recent conqueror, in order to preserve what they thought was a better way of life under the British crown as an independent part of North America and not as part of the United States. In a way, they were the first United Empire Loyalists, because they made that very significant decision. If they had not made that decision and had sided with the Americans and rebelled against the British force, as they could easily have done, no doubt Quebec would have fallen and no doubt we would have been part of the United States as a result of the revolutionary war.

The men and women who made that decision were residents of the city and of the surrounding countryside. In my view they were the first great nation builders of Canada. We never hear mention of them whenever a member of the Bloc Quebecois or any separatist is busy talking about Canadian unity.

It is a battle that holds tremendous significance. In my visit to Quebec I saw the place in the street where Montgomery was killed. I believe there is a plaque in the street where this happened.

Some of ancient buildings in Quebec bore marks for a long time of the bombardment they suffered from the Americans in that war 220 years ago at the end of this month, the anniversary date of the attack on Quebec led by Montgomery.

This was a very significant event in Canada's history which saved Quebec, basically the only part of Canada that was then of any significance as a British possession that operated as part of a group of colonies that began to grow and prosper, all of them not prospering quite so well but at least growing in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and ultimately in Upper Canada, in Ontario.

By 1840 we had the Union Act of 1840 that put the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada together under a single administration, at least legislatively.

Subsequent to that the debates took place in respect of the union of the Canadian provinces. It is to those debates that I want to turn because I want to quote some nation builders. That is what we are engaged in here in a very modest way today.

It is important to bear in mind some of the words some of these people spoke. I turn first to the remarks of the hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. He was not a knight at that time. He was the attorney general for the western part of the province of Canada and at that time the member for Kingston.

He was one of the senior Fathers of Confederation. I quote what he said in respect of Confederation at that time. This is in the Confederation debates in 1865, talking about the union of Upper and Lower Canada:

> It was felt that a dissolution of the union would have destroyed all the credit that we had gained by being a united province, and would have left us two weak and ineffective governments, instead of one powerful and united people.

Those words apply precisely to the situation we faced in pre–referendum Canada a few weeks ago. I submit those words are of importance now just as they were then. He went on to say:

> The Lower Canadians would not have worked cheerfully under such a change of system—

He was talking about a different system than the one I was reading about before—> —but would have ceased to be what they are now—a nationality, with representatives in Parliament, governed by general principles, and dividing according to their political opinions—and would have been in great danger of becoming a faction, forgetful of national obligations, and only actuated by a desire to defend their own sectional interests, their own laws, and their own institutions.

He was speaking of having a unitary government where there would not be a federal division of powers as we now have where different parts of the country have the right to decide certain things.

We have a situation in which both the opposition parties are claiming the federal government should give up powers and where the federal government has acknowledged that is so and has chosen to do that.

I refer to Sir John's conclusion:

> In conclusion, I would again implore the House not to let this opportunity to pass. It is an opportunity that may never recur. At the risk of repeating myself, I would say, it was only by a happy concurrence of circumstances, that we were enabled to bring this great question to its present position. If we do not take advantage of the time, if we show ourselves unequal to the occasion, it may never return, and we shall hereafter bitterly and unavailingly regret having failed to embrace the happy opportunity now offered of founding a great nation.

I quote another one, Sir George–Étienne Cartier, Macdonald's great partner in putting Canada together. He said, and these words apply today as much as they did then, in the same debates in 1865:

> The question for us to ask ourselves is this: Shall we be content to remain separate—shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence, when, by combining together, we could become a great nation? It had never yet been the good fortune of any group of communities to secure national greatness with such facility. In past ages, warriors have struggled for years for the addition to their country of a single province.

• (1920)

Here we had the great willingness on the part of all these people to unite and form this great country we now enjoy.

I quote another great nation builder, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the great prime ministers of our country. He said, from page 1842 of Hansard, on March 13, 1900:

> If there is anything to which I have given my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust which they have placed in my hands; but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man, my hon. friend himself included, will render me full justice on that score.

As our forebearers did, we can do no less but to engage in the nation building which they did in this great and vast country of ours.

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a Canadian and I am proud to be part of a country that includes the province of Quebec. I am proud to be part of a country that not only recognizes diversity but respects and cherishes it.

What a boring country it would be if we were all the same. Our differences keep us vital and dynamic, and our ability to respect our differences while working together has made us the envy of the world.

The United Nations said Canada is the greatest country in the world. We owe this honour in large part to those who built Canada, to the men and women who came here searching for a better life and for hope.

The fabric of our country is woven from the threads brought here by people from around the world. These threads of hope, tolerance and compassion unite us as Canadians and will provide the strength to see us through the challenges that lie ahead.

Countries are not rigid like the stone and rock they are carved from. They must be fluid and adaptable if we are to survive.

Since Confederation, Canada has successfully adapted to a rapidly changing world. Our boundaries have changed and it was less than 50 years ago that we acquired a new province, Newfoundland. We are now in the process of creating the new territory Nunavut.

Our economic base has expanded and diversified to the point at which Canada has a highly integrated economy and is a competitor in world markets. A century ago the people of a country that was largely based on farming and trapping could never have dreamed that the Canada of today would be a leader in telecommunications, aerospace and finance, and that its agricultural products would be marketed around the world.

Canadian society has also changed dramatically. Our population has grown tremendously and shifted from largely rural to mostly urban. An influx of people immigrating from around the world has made Canada a unique cultural mosaic.

Canada has grown and prospered because of its ability to read the signals for change and to adapt for the well–being of our country. The referendum vote on October 30 was a vote for Canada. It was a signal for change.

As the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism noted during the debate on Friday, the Prime Minister, the government and Parliament have a duty to preserve the unity of Canada as a nation indivisible.

Quebecers and Canadians have asked the government to keep Canada together. The Prime Minister has responded quickly to the signals for change. It is a response to keep the country united. That is what Canadians and the people of my riding of Dauphin—Swan River want.

• (1925)

When the Bloc members refer to the rest of Canada as English Canada they do a great disservice to the hundreds of French Canadians who live in my riding of Dauphin—Swan River; French Canadians who have kept their language, culture and traditions alive in rural Manitoba.

I am pleased and proud to represent predominantly French communities such as Ste. Rose du Lac, Laurier, St. Lazare and San Clara where people of many ethnic origins, including English, French, Ukrainian, Polish and First Nations people, work together toward their common goal of building strong communities and contributing to a strong and united Canada.

I have been overwhelmed by the response of the people of Dauphin—Swan River about the future of Canada. The people of my riding tell me that for the good of Canada, for our present and for our future, we need to remain united.

As the Prime Minister has so eloquently stated, a Canada without Quebec is no Canada, and a Quebec without Canada is no Quebec.

I also bring to the House a message from the youth of Canada. They too want and deserve a voice in the debate about the Canada they will inherit from us.

In November I travelled to a number of schools in my riding of Dauphin—Swan River to listen to young people about their vision of Canada. The students told me their Canada includes Quebec. It is important to them that we make every effort to keep our country united, from sea to sea to sea. That is the Canada they know. That is the Canada they want. That is the Canada they deserve.

This was also the message three young people from Russell, Manitoba brought to me in Ottawa on their way to the Montreal rally. These young people spent their hard earned dollars to travel to Montreal to be part of the chorus of voices ringing across Canada, telling Quebecers they are important to Canada. The courage and the commitment of these young people is a shining example of the belief western Canada has that a strong Canada is a united Canada.

We must lead by example. We must show our young people that differences can be overcome and that compromise is preferable to conflict. As a member of Parliament and as a member of the Liberal government I am committed to ensuring a strong and united Canada for the benefit of the people of Dauphin—Swan River and for all Canadians. As a mother and a grandmother, the Canada I want to give to my children and my grandchildren is a Canada which includes Quebec.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Motion No. 26 this evening.

It is a pleasure to speak to any government legislation of significance these days because the Liberal government has developed a habit of invoking closure on important controversial bills. It is beyond comprehension. This is one of the most important issues before the House and the government is limiting debate. What is the government afraid of, that people may actually find out what it is doing?

It is difficult for me to find parliamentary language to accurately describe my outrage at how the government rams through legislation by denying members of Parliament the opportunity to bring the concerns of their constituents into the debate. However, I digress. I am here to talk about the motion before the House today. I had better take advantage of the opportunity to speak before the Liberals decide they want to invoke closure in the middle of my speech.

The motion is rather simple but leaves many questions unanswered. Motion No. 26 calls on the House to recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada. Before I give my opinion on the issue of whether Quebec is distinct, I will address the issue of what this means to the rest of Canada.

• (1930)

If Quebec is distinct, does that mean the rest of Canada is indistinct? Does it mean there is no difference between the outports of the Newfoundland coast and downtown Toronto? Does it mean there is no distinction between the isolated native communities of the north and downtown Vancouver? Does it mean the rural grain farming communities of the prairies are indistinct from downtown Ottawa?

The answer to these questions is obviously no. Not only are the other nine provinces distinct from each other but there are significant distinctions within the provinces themselves.

My first administrative assistant on the Hill was a francophone from Campbellton, New Brunswick. I can accept the fact that she and her fellow francophone New Brunswickers consider themselves to be distinct from the Quebecers who live just on the other side of the Restigouche River.

This motion also recognizes the distinction between francophones in Quebec and New Brunswick but it does not recognize the distinction between New Brunswick's Acadians and New Brunswickers of British origin. Does that mean that there is no distinction between the two groups? That is the biggest flaw of M–26. It demands that this House recognize only one distinction.

Let us look at the three largest metropolitan cities in Canada. I have enjoyed my visits to Montreal and could have spent days wandering in the old town, but like Toronto and Vancouver, Montreal is a city whose population is a blend of old stock Canadians and larger, newer immigrant communities. Immigrants come to these cities from countries that span the globe. What is different is the percentage of the various ethnic groups that make up the population of each of these three cities.

Despite this difference, they are still all large cosmopolitan cities with tall skyscrapers in the central business district surrounded by a mix of industrial and residential communities.

However, the government wants us to recognize that Montreal is distinct but Vancouver and Toronto are not. Why? Because as is stated in part (2) of the motion, the government wants the House to recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition.

Now we know why Montreal is to be considered distinct and Vancouver and Toronto are not. Montreal is distinct because of its French speaking majority but where does this leave Montreal's anglophones and allophones? According to this motion, they must be indistinct. Let us flash back to the aftermath of the referendum and Premier Parizeau's comments about the ethnic vote. His comments were roundly and rightfully condemned.

Members opposite were especially vocal in their condemnation of Premier Parizeau's attack on the ethnic vote. What does the government do in response? It put forward this motion that states that Quebec is distinct because of its French speaking majority. It wants to legislate a distinct status for Quebec's francophones, separating them from the ethnic minority, the very fact Liberals condemned Premier Parizeau for stating.

Once again, the government deals in a logic that can be understood only by that side of the House. It must be something in the drinking water in the government lobby.

Let us return to the question of whether Quebec is distinct. Yes, Quebec is distinct but Quebec is a diversified province with one area distinct from another within its own provincial borders, the same as all the other provinces.

The northern parts of British Columbia and Alberta are very different from the southern parts. I recall the comments separatists were spouting after the referendum loss that the results showed division in Canada. No, the referendum result showed division in Quebec. Although Quebec is no longer a homogeneous province, the federal government wants it to be treated as one.

Points (2) and (3) of the motion state:

> (3) the House undertake to be guided by this reality;
> (4) the House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

What this means is unclear. The Prime Minister is telling Quebecers that these sections will provide Quebec with a great deal of power, yet at the same time he is telling Canadians outside Quebec that it does not. Which is it? Let us not leave this motion undefined. Reform Party members have attempted to clarify the meaning of distinct society with our amendment, that this motion does not confer any powers, rights, status or privileges to Quebec that are not provided to any other province. Our amendment will ensure that all Quebecers will be treated equally.

• (1935)

Our amendment also makes it clear that there is nothing in this motion that denies the fact that Canada constitutes one nation. That is the danger of passing the government's motion without the Reform amendment. By identifying Quebec as a distinct society, the government is agreeing with the basic tenet of the separatist mantra that the Quebec people are different from the rest of Canadians. Do the Liberals honestly believe that once they acknowledge this difference they can counter the second part of the separatist argument that because of this difference Quebecers need their own nation?

In dealing with this issue I have tried to do what the government refuses to do: ask the opinions of average Canadians. In my latest householder I included my regular 10-question survey. Two questions in that survey are first, do you believe that Quebec should be granted distinct society status if it confers special privileges or powers to Quebec? Second, do you believe that Quebec should be granted distinct society status if it confers no special privileges or powers to Quebec?

Unfortunately with the government's rush to stifle debate, I will not have enough time to have a truly representative response to these questions. However, as of this moment the answer to the first question is overwhelmingly no. The answer to the second question is still too close to see a trend. My greatest objection to this motion is that the government believes it is ordained to make these serious decisions on its own without any consultation with Canadians.

It would have been more appropriate if the government had stayed to its original plan and had us voting on this motion tomorrow, December 7. What could have been more fitting than having the government ram through a motion in this manner, and by having it do so on a day that already has a reputation of being a day that shall live in infamy? I guess we will have to come up with our own day of infamy, but then the government is providing us with so many.

The people of Surrey—White Rock—South Langley should have had an opportunity to express their opinions on this motion and the veto issue directly through a national referendum. However, they will have to be content with their MP's having a chance to contribute in this debate. It is very unfortunate that there are many Canadians who have lost the opportunity to have their member of Parliament speak to this issue.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the distinct society motion presented by the Prime Minister and his government with respect to the province of Quebec.

The reason we are debating this motion late tonight is because of the Prime Minister's last minute Hail Mary promise to Quebecers during the dying moments of the referendum campaign. With this motion, combined with a constitutional veto and a transfer of manpower training to Quebec, the Prime Minister feels he has now made the best and most significant contribution to national unity. We are all going to live happily ever after.

I am afraid I cannot agree with his logic, his proposals and the timing of them. He has resurrected the constitutional ghosts of Christmas past and will witness the same results as was had with Meech and Charlottetown: failure.

In analysing the components of the distinct society motion I have to ask the question whether the Prime Minister truly feel this really satisfies Quebecers' desires, hopes and needs. The Prime Minister is a Quebecer. If anybody should know what Quebecers want, it is he.

However, during the referendum campaign he misread, he misunderstood and he misrepresented to the rest of Canada what should be done. He said: "Thank you very much for staying quiet. Don't worry, they won't leave. Just don't say anything to upset them and everything will be fine". He almost blew it and he knew it.

He got the minister of fisheries, Captain Tobin, to use his turbot popularity and throw together a unity rally in Montreal asking everybody from sea to sea to get to Montreal. He then turned around and made promises to the separatists, promises to the sovereignists, promises to the nationalists, promises to the federalists. Keeping promises is not one of the Prime Minister's strong points. He promised to renegotiate NAFTA, but did not; he promised to eliminate the GST, but has not; he promised to eliminate patronage appointments, but will not; he promised free votes, which maybe is something he is not allowed to deliver on. Now we have him promising to recognize Quebec as a distinct society in Canada.

As a Quebecer he should know what Quebecers want when they say distinct society. He knows they want the rest of Canada to recognize Quebec as one of two founding nations. He knows Quebecers who want distinct society do not feel there is any cost in acknowledging that they are one of two founding nations. They want a distinct society clause that will protect their rights over language, culture and civil law while keeping the province French.

I do not disagree with some of these aspirations. What I do worry about are the consequences if the definition of distinct society is not spelled out. If distinct society means Quebecers are different because of their language, culture and civil law, I recognize that. That means they are unique and distinct from other provinces and people, just as other provinces and people are unique and distinct from them.

However, if Quebecers want this distinct society clause to mean that not only are they different but they also get special legislative powers above and beyond the rest of Canada, I am against that. I am sorry but the answer is no to one province getting special treatment over another.

While Reformers can agree to recognizing differences, we cannot agree to giving Quebecers some form of special status over and above other Canadians. That is fundamentally unacceptable and I truly feel that most Quebecers understand that point.

All Quebecers want is something that gives them satisfaction that they will not be tromped on, stamped on and kicked on, as is currently being done by the Minister of Human Resources Development with his new employment insurance program.

The frustration in Quebec is based on the fact that we have too much federal interference in matters of provincial jurisdiction. Quebecers want the federal government to get out of their lives in a lot of areas. That is where the solution to national unity lies. Give the provinces the powers they want and need, regulated by the federal government, and let us make government the right size doing the right thing. Let us have a smaller and more open government.

Simply put, all provinces want control over their purse strings on programs closest to the people, delivered at a lesser cost than is currently the case with the bureaucratic nightmare in Ottawa.

I am not against the distinct society motion which recognizes Quebec as a distinct society within Canada, provided it is fully defined and does not make them the biggest kid in the playground. That is why I ask the Prime Minister and the government to support Reform amendments to this distinct society motion so that he can get more support from all across Canada, including from those people in Quebec who look on this motion very suspiciously. It would give the people of Quebec and the rest of Canada what they want: recognition with powers, but not special status.

I ask the government to support our amendments because what we are trying to do is please the majority of Quebecers, not the minority. If we keep trying to come up with programs and with definitions to please the separatists it will never work. It has not worked for 25 years and it will not work for the next 25 years. The separatists act like spoiled children; not all Quebecers, just the separatists.

Most Quebecers want what is in their best interests, and that is no different than me as a distinct and different person from the province of Alberta. I want the best for my province just as people in Quebec want the best for their province.

Let us design a motion that appeals to the majority of Quebecers, that appeals to the majority of Canadians. That is how we can build on national unity. For the sake of national unity I ask the Prime Minister to please consider the input and information that has been coming to him through the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on the constitutional veto. I hope the government listens. There has been some valuable input there.

We can debate sharing the federal government veto with four or five regions. That is not really the issue. I believe there are five regions because British Columbia is more like the Atlantic provinces than it is like the prairies.

The point is this veto should be for the people of Canada and not their legislative assemblies. We already have the seven provinces out of ten representing 50 per cent within the constitutional amendment clause. The separatist Parti Quebecois will now have veto power over changes to the Canadian Constitution. This is ridiculous. The veto should be given to the people of Quebec and not to the politicians.

• (1945)

We should be and I think we are a country of 10 equal provinces committed to similar goals and objectives, each with the same rights, privileges and powers. If we want to change those rights, privileges and powers, it should be one one way or another through a national referendum from the bottom up, not necessarily by elected officials from the top down.

We have to look at the situation very seriously. We have to conclude that a lot of people in Canada want change, not just the province of Quebec or the people who had the referendum. People across the country want change for the good. They do not want change to justify the status quo.

We have to look at issues like changes to the Constitution or granting one province recognition in a way that the rest of the country worries might give it special powers. We have to address those issue. What is wrong with addressing them? We all have to work together to bring the country together from sea to sea.

We have to make amendments to the Constitution to give it the ability to live and the ability to be changed. It should be difficult. It should not be easy to change the Constitution once we define the powers, the levels of responsibility and the way we will work together as 10 provinces. We should think about how we can make changes to it. We cannot give a veto to every province, or there will never be change. We cannot put that Constitution in a vault, let it die and gather dust. We have to give it life. It has to be a breathing document. It has to be tough to make change but we have to allow change to happen.

We have to look at different provinces and different regions and try to recognize their specific needs and wants. There is no reason we cannot accommodate them. There is no reason we cannot come up with a mechanism to give Quebec what it wants and recognize it as a distinct society. It is different. It is unique. It has made a valuable contribution to the building and the nurturing of this great country called Canada.

If that means that Quebec should also get special powers over and above being recognized as distinct, that is not right and we have to tell Quebecers that. The separatists really want this. It is not all Quebecers. Those who want it want to protect their French language. We should be able to help them protect their French language and their French culture.

They in turn should protect minority rights within their province, the English and any other immigrant, and how they can interface with their provincial problems. They do that. What I am saying is that we have ways and means of producing a collective agreement if we just identify the right problem.

This is a panic effort by the Prime Minister and the government to fulfil a promise that he made in the dying moments of a game that he thought he would lose. The game is called unity and he was afraid he would lose the country. He did not want to go down in history as the Prime Minister who lost the country after having told all of us: "I am from that region. Don't worry. They won't vote to go", and they almost did.

It is sad. Now that it is all over they almost look at us and ask: "What did the Reform Party do?" We kept telling them all along to tell Quebecers the consequences of separation, the price of separation. They did not do it then. We will do it now and never in the future will any province look at itself and say it will separate and everything will be perfect. We will tell them the cost of separation.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address the House today on the motion put forward by the government to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

I remind members of the most recent referendum in which a majority of Quebecers voted to stay in Canada. With this motion we are trying to make sure we build on that commitment by Quebecers.

With all the rhetoric it is difficult for Canadians to understand what is going on. The Bloc is telling Quebecers there is nothing in this package, that it is a bunch of platitudes, that it means nothing, that we in so–called English Canada really do not want them to stay. The Reform is telling us that we are giving Quebec everything, that we are giving it something that other provinces do not have, and that somehow it will be able to do other things within Canada to get special powers because of the motion.

• (1950)

No wonder Canadians are having a hard time understanding. Quite frankly it is not only rhetoric but lies are being told to Canadians on the issue. It is disturbing, especially given the fact of how important the issue is to Canada and to the future of the country.

The opposition is telling truths but it is only telling half truths. The Bloc says it does not want to talk about the Constitution. Then it says that somehow the motion does not give Quebec any special constitutional power. How can it argue on the one hand that it does not want to talk about the Constitution and on the other hand argue that the motion somehow is not constitutionally significant?

Frankly it is no surprise that Canadians do not want to talk about the Constitution. They want to deal with other issues. They want to deal with jobs. They want to make sure that their families have opportunities for education and proper health care. These are issues of concern to Canadians.

The Prime Minister gave a commitment at the Montreal rally, which I am proud to say a number of my constituents attended, to address some of the concerns of Quebecers. I know the Reform Party blames us for the outcome being so close, and it was. I agree that it was Canadians who came together in that last week, drew the referendum together and showed Quebecers what they thought.

On behalf of not only the constituents of Haldimand—Norfolk but of all people of Canada I want to say how proud I was of those great Canadians who went from the riding of Haldimand—Norfolk on their own volition to Montreal to express their deep desire for the country to stay together.

All Canadians inside and outside Quebec understand there is nothing we could propose right now to the Government of Quebec and to the Bloc Quebecois that would make them happy. There is nothing we could propose right that would make them all of a sudden jump up and say that they want to stay in Canada. They are not prepared to do that.

What the Prime Minister has done, and I think he has done it very well, is drafted it in a way that he is giving exactly what he committed to. He is opening the door for future commitments and future negotiations in 1997 or 1998. He is allowing Canadians the time to sit down and work on some of the problems we have as a country.

I call on all Canadians to take up the challenge of the Prime Minister to go to Quebec, to Alberta or British Columbia and tell them we need to keep the country together and that the fact the United Nations considers us the number one country in the world is no mistake.

It is because we have been able to draw together, to work together, to bring the diversity of Canadians together and to focus attention on working for the betterment of not only Canadians but the country as a whole. We have stayed together all these years because of that desire of Canadians.

There are those who ask: "What is Canadian? What is Canada?" Some people say Canada is something that is not American. I believe we saw in Montreal what Canada really stands for: for sharing, caring and working together. The motion tries to build on that. I ask Canadians to challenge the naysayers and those in Quebec who say that English Canada does not want them based on history and on fact.

Recently we observed Remembrance Day with ceremonies in which we remembered the strong dedication that many Canadians gave to their country. We recently celebrated the 50th anniversary of the end of the war in Europe. Those Canadians died for their country, believing in their country. I wonder what they would think today about the ongoing debate in the House, what they would think about the silliness of some of what is being said. They fought and gave their all for their country. They deserve our giving them something back. We should sit down, talk, throw away politics, throw away the rhetoric and let their memory guide us in terms of our deliberations.

• (1955)

On behalf of my constituents of Haldimand—Norfolk, I want to tell Quebecers there is a desire on our part to make things right. I think Quebecers are being told lies about the position of English speaking Canadians in rural areas. My constituents would like a chance to sit down and talk with their French speaking compatriots.

People in Haldimand—Norfolk are proud of Canada, and they think we have accomplished great things together over the last few years. We would like you Quebecers to try to understand how we feel. Do not believe all the talk about English speaking Canadians being willing to let you go and not being ready to compromise. We are ready. Let us get together and talk about it.

[English]

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether you understood what I said. Perhaps you can read the translation afterward. I say on behalf of the people of Haldimand—Norfolk that we need to sit down, to throw away the rhetoric, to put politics behind us and to share our common values of what is Canadian. We can do that and at the same time we can work on what Canadians really want.

We can work on making the economy work. We can work on a health care system that is envied the world over. We can work on saving the environment. These are all very important issues that we need to address. We do not need to be talking about the Constitution at this time.

In our three–point plan we are trying to make sure that as Canadians and as legislators responsible for all of Canada and not just one region or one province, we make it very well known to Quebecers that we love the country, that we need them as a part of the country for it to be strong and that we recognize their distinctiveness. We recognize they have a distinct and different language from that of a lot of Canadians. We recognize they have a different culture and a different legal system. I only wish the opposition party, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, would recognize it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I assure the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk that I understood every word and I take the liberty to compliment him on his effort to speak in the other official language.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in tonight's debate on the Prime Minister's motion concerning the recognition of Quebec's distinct society within Canada. In supporting this motion, I would like to talk, first of all, as an Acadian from Nova Scotia. As you know, Acadians were among the first people to settle in Canada after the First Nations, and, since the founding of the first settlement at Port–Royal, four centuries ago, we have had our share of upheavals, struggles and turmoil.

• (2000)

Protecting our language and culture has never been easy. We have had to fight, and we still do, to get our share of recognition. But we realized a long time ago that our chances of survival as a cultural community were much better if we joined forces with the francophones of Quebec, Manitoba and elsewhere in Canada.

We know that the preservation and blossoming of our language and culture largely depend on our being part of a larger country which has been able to include our concerns as well as those of other cultural communities in a larger entity and a broader vision. This is Canada.

The Official Languages Act and the bilingualism policy have provided a concrete example of this broader vision of Canada.

I consider myself lucky to have had a chance to personally experience the distinct nature of Quebec. For four years, in the early 1980s, I was a student at Laval University, where I made a lot of close friends among Quebecers. I had a chance to have lengthy discussions with them about their vision and their place both within Quebec and within Canada.

I found that, in general, the distinct nature of Quebec and of Quebecers is not based on a separation from the rest of Canada, but rather on an affirmation of oneself and a feeling of solidarity that finds its expression and its soul in the vitality of the French language, as the singer–songwriter Michel Rivard says so beautifully: "The language of my heart is the heart of my life".

But despite all the political rhetoric and the sovereignist movement, the Quebecers that I know have a profound attachment to Canada. And I think that if all cultural communities across Canada can work together, we can contribute to the growth and prosperity of our wonderful country.

[English]

I have no trouble with the notion of Quebec being seen as a distinct society within the context of this motion. Nor do I see any contradiction in the notion that while not conferring special powers to the Government of Quebec, this motion is by no means symbolic, although it carries some important and powerful symbolism.

By recognizing the distinctive character of Quebec in its policies, its laws, its regulations and its programs, this motion provides one more prism among many others through which the Government of Canada commits itself to be guided in the development of its laws, its regulations, its policies and programs before they are enacted and as they are implemented.

The members of the Reform Party have a hard time understanding this because they do not really understand how modern government functions. When government policy is developed and presented before cabinet for consideration or when a change is made to a body of regulation or when a new law or program is adopted and advanced and presented before Parliament, it must be evaluated according to many different angles or dimensions. One of these is the balance of impacts of the program across gender lines, socio–economic lines, and regions and provinces so that the balance of these impacts is fair and equitable.

A good example of this is the legislation that was tabled last week by the Minister of Human Resources Development. In the package of information that accompanied the legislation creating the employment insurance program, one of the first tables presented is a table describing the financial impacts of employment insurance by province. No government would contemplate a major change in a program such as employment insurance without considering the impacts across provincial lines.

Another example of a prism through which government policy has to be evaluated is provided by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which since 1982 has been enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ensures that laws and regulations and programs introduced by the federal government respect the basic freedoms and rights of Canadian citizens that we have enshrined in the Constitution through the charter.

A third example is provided to us by the official languages legislation enforced by the official languages commission for Canada and the whole policy and infrastructure promoting official bilingualism in Canada, which ensure that linguistic minorities in Canada, including Acadians and other francophone groups throughout the country, as well as anglophones in Quebec, receive the recognition of their language and receive services in the language of their choice.

These are commitments the federal government has made for itself and for its programs. They are part of the prism through which all laws, regulations, and programs must be evaluated by the Government of Canada.

The distinct society motion the Prime Minister has brought forward this week will in a different way act as a prism and a guide and an opportunity for the federal government to commit and ensure that the programs and its policies reflect this particular cultural aspect of Canada, which is the distinctive character of Quebec in those very important categories of unique language, culture, and civil law tradition. That in a sense is the genius of the Prime Minister's approach to recognizing Quebec as a distinct society and putting into practical effect the application of that respect as far as the Government of Canada is concerned.

One of the reasons Canadians continue to be so supportive and have such great confidence in the Prime Minister of Canada is because largely through his great experience in government he has found a way to give concrete effect to the commitments and undertakings he made to the people of Quebec and to the people of Canada for change and for recognition of their particular place in Confederation in a way that does not violate the rights of other Canadians and the rights of provinces but acts as a positive discipline on the Government of Canada.

If other Canadians and provinces through the constitutional discussions choose and can agree on the enshrinement of such a principle in the Canadian Constitution, that would strengthen the notion of the distinct society we have adopted and will adopt through this Parliament.

[Translation]

I will conclude my remarks by saying that I know this initiative will never satisfy the separatist members of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the member's time has expired. I now give the floor to the member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans.

• (2010)

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member who just spoke that it will never satisfy us.

"Whatever they say or do, Quebec is, today and forever, a distinct society". Those words were spoken by Quebec's federalist Liberal premier Robert Bourassa, the day after the failure of Meech. "The days of negotiating with ten or eleven parties around the table are over. From now on, only bilateral discussions will be held."

This goes to show that the federal Liberal government motion before the House today is nothing new. The concept of a distinct society was developed by the Quebec Liberal Party. Actually, it goes back to 1965 and the preliminaries of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, which used the term distinct society in a marginal note to the paragraph that defines Quebec society on page 103.

In a speech on May 9, 1986, Quebec Intergovernmental Relations Minister Gil Rémillard stated five minimum conditions which, if they were met, might lead Quebec to ratify the Constitution Act, 1982. Meanwhile, the Parti Quebecois was talking about a distinct people.

According to the Meech Lake Accord, in 1990, the Quebec National Assembly would have been responsible for protecting the duality and promoting the distinct identity of Quebec. We supported the Meech Lake accord because it was supposed to recognize the distinct identity of Quebec. This provision would not have the effect of lessening the existing powers of the federal government.

Basically, including this in the Constitution would be a way to make up for the affront we suffered in 1982, after Liberal Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau said in a speech on May 14, 1980, before the May 20 referendum: "We are putting our seats on the line, and if you vote no, this no will mean yes to a new Canada". The result was the unilateral patriation of the Constitution in 1982, with the help of the present Prime Minister.

To take a leaf from the book of the hon. member from Nova Scotia, how can we trust these people? Basically, what were we asking for? We were asking the judges to consider both concepts, the Canadian duality and distinct society, in their interpretations of the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982, the latter including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Prime Minister's baby, as he keeps reminding us in this House.

At the time, the distinct society clause would have limited the centralist and standardizing tendencies of the Charter. When the Supreme Court ruled that certain sections of Bill 101 were unconstitutional, the Quebec National Assembly would have been able to adopt them again, if the distinct society clause had been accepted.

Another important event, involving a player we saw at work during the referendum campaign last October, was initiated by the Charest report, named after the hon. member for Sherbrooke, who is often conspicuous by his absence from this House, and the Charest report goes back to—

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but, if I have heard him correctly, the hon. member is not allowed to comment on a colleague's absence from this House. I would ask the hon. member not to comment on any member's presence or absence.

Mr. Guimond: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, you have been vigilant and I withdraw my comment.

The purpose of the Charest report, published in May 1990, was to limit the scope of the distinct society concept, particularly by stating that the distinct society clause did not in any way restrict the effectiveness of the charter.

Right from the start, in May 1990, it was obvious that certain provincial premiers were uncomfortable with the idea of a distinct society. From then on, the Meech Lake accord began to experience some difficulty.

• (2015)

According to certain premiers, the semi–official nature of the distinct society concept could have led to the Canadian courts' not using that clause in interpreting the Canadian Constitution. Then came the Charlottetown accord, in which the constitutional importance of the distinct society was watered down into a set of eight fundamental characteristics defining Canada. How could the courts have seen their way clear in all of that?

We were led to believe that the notion of a distinct society ranked higher than the other fundamental characteristics. But the overall sparseness of the Charlottetown accord shows that the notion of a distinct society would not have had any real effect. This was already an indication that it was an empty shell. And that is why Quebecers voted no in the October 26, 1992, referendum on Charlottetown: because they considered that it did not give enough to Quebec. The other provinces voted against it as well, but because they considered that it gave too much to Quebec. Imagine!

I have just given a brief overview of Meech 1, Meech 2, the Charest report and the Charlottetown accord. I have never seen a box wrapped in Christmas paper without anything inside, but such is the case with the propositions of the Prime Minister, his Liberal team, and the "learned committees" he has set up to show Quebecers how much he loves them.

Nothing in this motion recognizes Quebecers as a distinct people. As we know, a motion of the House of commons has no legal value, let alone a constitutional one. The motion introduced by the Liberal government is an empty shell that will have no legal or political impact. It is an act of panic aimed basically at deceiving those who want real changes to Quebec's status.

Fortunately, Quebecers can see through all this and pick out what is truly good for them. The Prime Minister's reaction in introducing this motion tells us there is a terrible threat. He kept the phrase "distinct society" because it would have been difficult to do otherwise, but he did all he could to strip it of its meaning. Just imagine. The Liberal government's proposal was considered unacceptable even by Quebec Liberals, whose leader, Daniel Johnson, recently asked that the distinctive character of Quebec be entrenched in the Constitution.

The definition of distinct society proposed by the Prime Minister is identical to the one contained in the Charlottetown accord, which was rejected by a majority of Canadians and Quebecers. Furthermore, the definition proposed by the Prime Minister does not go as far as the one initially proposed in the Meech Lake accord. How could anyone in this House believe that we could not oppose such a motion? Come on. We are not idiots.

The government's motion to recognize the distinct nature of Quebec cannot, in any way, be considered an adequate response to the changes demanded by Quebecers during the October 30 referendum. We must bear in mind that, last October, Quebecers voted in favour of sovereignty in a very large proportion and that a majority of Quebecers, including some who voted no, were in favour of a comprehensive renewal of Canadian federalism.

Given that my time is almost up, I would like to tell you that we are in favour of sovereignty for the people of Quebec and that it is out of the question for Quebecers to negotiate agreements that even Daniel Johnson called, when referring to manpower training, cut–rate agreements.

• (2020)

Clearly, the federal government's proposals give nothing to Quebec.

To conclude, like many, I think that we must be careful not to undermine whatever good faith remains between the various parties. On the contrary, we should create links that will bring us closer to a partnership—

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the member's time is up. The hon. member for Chicoutimi has the floor.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is true that we are all making history in taking part in this debate, establishing the federal system's inability to renew itself.

I never thought I would rise in this House to speak on anything so empty as this motion on Quebec's recognition as a distinct society. This motion by the government is essentially an exercise in futility. It is complete and utter nothingness.

Since October 30, improvisation has prevailed in this House, so much so that the Quebec Ligue nationale d'improvisation now has pretty stiff competition.

Before October 30, constitutional matters were systematically off topic. We were told time after time again that Canadians wanted to hear about the economy, work, jobs and job creation. But, surprise, the day after October 30, the sovereignist project was within a hair's breadth of becoming a reality.

A few days later, the federalist camp reacted hastily in the face of a potential victory of the yes side. In Verdun, we had the pleasure of a speech by the Prime Minister, which brought back memories. In 1980, on the eve of another referendum, another Prime Minister came to Quebec to make promises. The current Prime Minister was at his side.

On October 30, the federalist camp heaved a sigh of relief. The reality of the matter is something else, however. After their narrow victory, the federalists no doubt consulted each other and decided to react. And what a reaction! I said before that this smacks of improvisation. Two committees were created in this very House. But, all of a sudden, the Prime Minister himself announced the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. To hell with the committees, he sidestepped his own creations and everybody else.

The distinct society motion, as it stands, is nothing more than idle talk and pure window dressing. It being only a motion of the House of Commons, it could be easily overturned at the whim of any federal government. There is nothing in the Constitution that recognizes Quebec as a distinct society. All this motion means is that, in the future, it will be possible to tell Quebecers: "You are distinct. Are you not happy? You are distinct." But giving Quebecers the means to act as a distinct people is out of the question, let alone seeing the Liberal government try its hardest to have this distinctiveness recognized in the Constitution. Again, this would be too much to ask.

But, come to think of it, what else could we expect from a Prime Minister who told this House last September that everybody knew that Quebec was distinct therefore it did not have to be enshrined in the Constitution. If this is how he reads last week's motion, then it is justified.

The Prime Minister would certainly need a history lesson. History teaches us that every time the federal government wants to do something for Quebecers, it ends up watering down its promises. This is akin to using the same coffee grounds to make five or six pots; what remains at the end of this process is like dishwater. That is what the government is doing with this motion. First Meech, then Charlottetown, and now the 1995 motion. There is nothing left; not much substance indeed. It merely encourages the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of the recognition that Quebec is a distinct society.

Unlike some Liberal members, we see the past as important. As the famous saying goes: what goes around, comes around. Quebecers know their history. They also know what they want. The Prime Minister's motion will go down in history mostly as another insult to Quebecers' intelligence, as an attempt to convince them that a simple motion could finally settle the issue.

This government is forgetting something else. Quebec's motto is "Je me souviens". On October 30, some Quebecers decided to give Canada a last chance. It was the last chance. Once again, they thought that Canada would recognize them as a people and give them the powers that go along with being a people. Unfortunately, they were once again in for a disappointment when they saw what was really being proposed: a motion that sets us back even further.

This motion was put together in a mad rush because the Prime Minister knows full well that he will be questioned by the official opposition. While, in 1980, Quebecers were represented by 74 Liberal members in the House of Commons, in 1995, it is quite a different story, since 53 Bloc members have been given the mandate by the people of Quebec to look after their interests. The Prime Minister knows full well that if he tries to delude Quebecers into believing that he is delivering the goods, we will be there to condemn him for it. The mandate we have been given by the people of Quebec was clear and it has become even clearer since October 30.

Where I come from, we have a saying that goes: "Rude awakenings are to be expected on the morning after". Never has the saying been so true as in the aftermath of the October 30 referendum. At the beginning of my remarks, I indicated that I never expected to have to speak on such an empty and meaningless motion, and I am sure that the people of my region agree.

This is another history lesson that Quebecers are not about to forget. It is also a lesson for those who thought they would give a last chance to Canada. But by dint of remembering, the people of Quebec will take action. I have no doubt about that. One day soon we will start writing the history of the people of Quebec.

The motion put forward by the Prime Minister is tasteless, colourless and odourless. Anyone who believes that Quebecers are a people must reject it.

• (2030)

[English]

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am splitting my time with the member for Ottawa—Vanier.

I was torn as I thought through what I would say tonight on this resolution. I am profoundly saddened that I am standing here and talking on this issue at this time in our history. We have so many issues to deal with in this country. However we are once more drawn back into a debate that at its roots is not going to put bread on the table, is not going to do anything to alleviate poverty, is not going to create a job, is not going to enhance the capacity of people to work, to learn or to earn. It is a debate that if I understand what the members of the Bloc have been saying tonight is based on a constant bringing forward of a history that has not served them or the rest of Canada particularly well.

What confuses me is that shortly after I was elected to this Chamber I had several opportunities to travel into Quebec; one as a student in Jonquière. I spent some time there at the CEGEP studying French and meeting with the Bloc member for Jonquière who most hospitable. He took me around, showed me his constituency and introduced me to people there. We had wonderful discussions about what Canada needed to do to deal with the debt, with social programs and with all of the kinds of things that we talk about all across the country.

Some time after that I had an opportunity as a member of the HRD committee to go into Montreal, Quebec City, Lévis and Rivière–du–Loup to talk to people and receive submissions, in particular, about unemployment insurance but really all of the social programs that were encompassed in that rather large review.

Three members of the Bloc toured with us across Canada as part of that committee. We started in Vancouver and travelled right across the country. What struck me about that experience is that when we got away from the opening moments of the hearings, when the organized groups would come in and demonstrate, wave and shout and scream in Vancouver, in Toronto and in Montreal, and sat down with people to talk about what they were concerned about and what did they wanted to see the government do and what were the issues they wanted us to confront, I did not hear the word "Constitution", I did not hear the word "embarrassment", I did not hear the word "insulted".

I heard people talking about how we can help our kids get an education, how we can build skills, how can we find jobs. I heard people in Lévis and Rivière–du–Loup talking about being very concerned about their future and about the fact that their children were having to move out of town to find work. I heard unilingual French people saying the same things in those communities as unilingual English people were saying in Saskatchewan, Alberta and in my own province of Manitoba.

I do not mean to make light of what occurred. Any time 50 per cent of any area votes to leave a country as strong and wonderful as Canada, there is a problem.

I have talked about this with members of the Bloc. Lots of conversations go on in this House, some of them across the floor like tonight. I have a conversation two or three times a week in the gymnasium with the member for Quebec–Est. We talk about what is at the root of the concerns that is driving people in Quebec to want to leave Canada. I have had many long talks with the member for Mercier about her views of social programs in Canada or in Quebec. Frankly they are very consistent with my views of social programs in Quebec. To try to understand what is driving this desire to break up this country is something that has been very difficult for me.

I want to share with the members of the Bloc something that I hope will help their understanding of the feelings in other parts of Canada about this issue. When the Meech Lake accord failed to pass the Manitoba legislature, I was the House leader for the opposition. When the constitutional amendment was brought to Manitoba, there was a very detailed and thorough public examination of the proposals.

• (2035)

A committee was struck, with representatives from all three parties in the legislature. That committee travelled all over Manitoba. Committee members went to Indian reserves in the northern part of the province. They went to small rural communities in the north, the south, the east and the west and they spent many days in the city of Winnipeg, allowing Manitobans to come forward and speak to them about their feelings on the Meech Lake accord.

As a result, Manitoba put forward some amendments to the accord as it was then struck. When I hear the language used by previous speakers here about how people did not respect Quebec and how that was an insult to Quebec, I want to tell them that subject never came up in these hearings.

The Meech Lake accord says in subsection (2)(i):

> The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with
> (b) The recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.
> (3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec—

That was what the Meech Lake accord said, if I understood the members opposite correctly.

After holding hearings all over the province, after researching it, considering it, debating it, this is how the three parties in the Manitoba legislature said the clause should read:

> The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that the following constitute fundamental characteristics of Canada:
> (d) Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

In the Meech Lake accord the recognition is that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society. The recommendation of all parties of the province of Manitoba was that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

My province has recognized and supported that fact since 1990. This resolution, which calls on the House to recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada, is simply consistent and affirms the very statements that the member holds up as an example of the things that Quebec wanted. It is the very thing that the three parties in the legislature and the people of Manitoba were prepared to support and the very thing that the Prime Minister asks us to support now.

When I look at the role we have as legislators, there are six practical things we do. We pass, amend or rescind legislation. We deal with expenditure or the withholding of expenditure, the cutting of expenditure. We regulate. However, there is an intangible thing we are called on to do in the Chamber and that is provide leadership.

It is time we began to talk about not how we drive this country apart, but how we pull it together, how we collectively provide some leadership that will improve the lives of people in this country, not harm them.

[Translation]

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my speech this evening is entitled An open letter to my Quebec kissing cousins. They know who they are.

First, I want to thank these cousins for the discussions we had during the referendum campaign. One of them was in charge of the yes side in her community, in the lower St. Lawrence region. We had a brief conversation, two days before the referendum, in a very serene and pleasant atmosphere.

The other two had me over for dinner, in a Montreal suburb, on a stormy fall evening. Inside, there was also a storm raging. It was a storm of ideas, concepts, rebuttals and assertions. In short, it was a very pleasant evening, and I thank them.

That evening, we discussed the Constitutional Act of 1982, the Meech Lake accord, as well as issues such as overlap, duplication, immigration, and the French language in North America, Canada and Quebec. Of course, we also talked about the distinct society.

• (2040)

Today, I find myself participating in a debate revived last Wednesday by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. That day, I listened very carefully to the speech made by the opposition leader. If I do not call him by name, dear cousins, it is not out of disrespect, but because the rules and the tradition of this House prevent me from doing so.

As I said, I listened carefully to what he had to say. Several of his statements are so skilfully crafted that you have to stop and think for a minute or two to figure out what he means, especially when he is talking about the Constitutional Act of 1982. Here are some quotes from the speech he made. "One of the things the 1982 Constitution effectively introduced into Canada and Quebec's legal and political landscape was the notion of a single country, a Canadian nation—this was a first".

And he added: "This was the first time constitutional and legal texts talked about Canada as a single nation, the nation of Canada. The corollary, needless to say, was that Quebecers found their existence as a people being denied, implicitly, if not explicitly".

Finally, he said, and I am still quoting: "—but it never occurred to me that, someday, a democratic Canada, English Canada, a nation that is open, tolerant and respectful of individual rights, could actually rely on its weight to crush Quebec's wish, tear up the Constitution agreed upon by our forefathers in 1867 and replace it with another constitution that was not recognized by Quebec but imposed on Quebec, a constitution repudiated—" I could go on and on.

I could spend hours proving that the Constitution was not replaced or torn up, that not all Quebecers repudiated this Constitutional Act, as the Leader of the Opposition would have you believe. But by doing this, I would be getting into an argument with some politicians. For now, I would rather talk to my cousins.

In the face of such a condemnation of what happened in 1982, I thought it was time for me to reread the Constitution Act of 1982, which I did. I looked everywhere to find some hint of the crushing he talked about and that some people would like to make a part of the historical bagage of Quebecers, but I could not find it.

I looked everywhere to find where it says that the existence of Quebecers as a people was denied implicitly or explicitly, with the same result, but I could not find a thing.

I looked everywhere to find the provision that says that English Canada—and I will come back to this irritating expression a little later on—relied on its weight to crush Quebec's wish. Again, I could not find it.

So we have every reason to wonder, Mr. Speaker and dear cousins, whether these remarks were intented to perpetuate and to reinforce a myth that has been created and spread by separatist forces.

Dear cousins, I have a question for you. What bothers you in the Constitution Act, 1982? Is it the entrenchment in the Constitution of your fundamental freedoms, such as the freedom of conscience and religion, the freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including the freedom of the press and other communications media? I do not think so.

Is it the freedom of peaceful assembly? I do not think so either. Freedom of association? I doubt it. Is it the entrenchment of your democratic rights, your mobility rights or your legal rights? I do not think so. To this day, I have not met one Canadian, or one Quebecer for that matter, who is against these rights.

Is it the entrenchment in the Constitution of French and English as the official languages of our country then? Does it bother you so much? Or is it the fact that the concepts of equalization and regional disparity, two typically Canadian concepts that continue to serve Quebec well, were included in the Constitution?

I still fail to see what is the cause of this national humiliation the advocates of independence have talked so much about. Based on the points I just mentioned, how has Quebec's wish been crushed?

Dear cousins, on the autumn evening when we met, I really appreciated our ability to speak frankly, directly and with mutual respect. So I ask you to consider carefully and as objectively as possible the following question: what bothers you personally about the Constitution Act of 1982?

• (2045)

There is something else I would like to say, and I referred to this earlier. The term English Canada, which Bloc members and their leader are using indiscriminately these days in a poorly disguised attempt to keep erecting walls between Canadians, cropped up at least a dozen times in the speech made last Wednesday by the Leader of the Opposition.

Well, I want to ask Bloc members who are constantly complaining, loud and clear, about the general lack of understanding of the Quebec society, to please stop ignoring a million French Canadians who do not live in Quebec. We would appreciate some respect.

In fact, the term is not accurate since New Brunswick is officially bilingual, probably another humiliating result of the Constitution Act of 1982. The Bloc likes to speak in separatist terms, and it is pretty obvious why. I hope you, my cousins, are not fooled. You know, in northern and eastern Ontario, there are a lot of French Canadians, including your own cousins. Some day, we should discuss how certain expressions evolved and why, hardly a generation ago, we were all French Canadians, and today, we are Franco–Ontarians, Québécois, Acadians, Fransasquois and so forth.

Maybe we should invent new hyphens, new links, with all due respect for the late John Diefenbaker. I agree, we are all Canadians. But as such, we all have one or more links elsewhere. Some are new Canadians, others are English or French Canadians. In this great country with a strong tradition of tolerance and openness, there is room for everyone, even communities that form a distinct society.

When you think about it, the hyphen is a symbol that seems tailor–made for Canada. Are we not one of the hyphens or links between France and the United Kingdom, between Europe and the United States of America? We see those links throughout our history, between Lower Canada and Upper Canada and even in the Act of Union.

The beauty of the hyphen is that it manages to link two entities that are sometimes entirely distinct. Is this not the very essence of Canada? Squaring the circle, duality in unity? My dear cousins, you will agree this would make an interesting subject for our next meeting. Meanwhile, let this House recognize the distinct identity of Quebec society by voting for the motion presented by the Prime Minister, a motion which, at the very least, is a step in the right direction. That being said, my dear cousins, I remain, yours sincerely.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in opposition to Motion No. 26, which is the motion put forward in the House by the Prime Minister. I will oppose the motion unless it is amended, as was suggested by my leader, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

I am concerned that the federal government has used closure to limit debate on something as important as how Canada functions, how we respect and treat one another, and whether or not the principle of distinct society is a worthwhile course for us to follow as a nation.

The whole idea of using closure, or time allocation, has been addressed many times in the House. I will not condemn it at length. I will just repeat that I believe it is wrong. I know that members opposite, when they sat in opposition, declared that it was wrong. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands called it morally wicked if the Mulroney government introduced time allocation and closure. Yet the Liberal government has introduced this procedure far more often than the Conservatives did under Mulroney. The Liberals do not even bat an eye. They think there is nothing wrong with limiting debate on important issues that do not need to be dealt with in an emergency when the national good is at stake.

When we talk about distinct society it brings back memories. I first remember hearing this phrase discussed in the debate on the Meech Lake accord. Perhaps it was coined before that, but I was not aware of the phrase until the Meech Lake debate. Subsequently, it was a bone of contention when the Charlottetown accord was put forward and voted on in a national referendum in Canada and defeated.

It is interesting that the reason the Meech Lake accord never did pass is because of a member who sits in our midst. While there was opposition to the Meech Lake accord in the province of Newfoundland with its premier and there was resistance in the province of Manitoba with the government there, the one member at that time in the Manitoba legislature who probably had more impact on bringing down the Meech Lake accord than any other Canadian was the hon. member for Churchill, who now sits in the House.

It is interesting that the member for Churchill, in recognizing other problems the aboriginal people of Canada face, has called a sacred assembly. As a people they are doing some soul searching. They are even looking for inspiration from higher powers than themselves to solve problems facing the aboriginal people.

Maybe if we as a nation started to reflect on the one we recognize in our Constitution as the supreme authority, perhaps we would be better off than spending all this time trying to confer special privileges, rights, or distinct society, whatever that may mean, on a group of individuals. The Constitution calls upon us to recognize the supremacy of God. If we have the correct interpretation of how this almighty person looks upon the world, he looks upon us with the same eyes regardless of our language, our race, or our culture. I believe we are all equal before him. We are all special, but certainly I do not expect he would suggest that any of us are distinct or in some way deserve privileges the rest of us do not.

I want to talk a little about why I am concerned about the phrase distinct society. I am a little concerned about how it may be interpreted in the future. Quite frankly, I do not trust the Liberal government when it proposes that this really does not mean anything.

I am reminded of a Liberal politician in the past who when he spoke in western Canada would not speak in glowing terms of the national energy program. This subject seldom came up because this Liberal, being a fairly knowledgeable and experienced politician, realized that western Canadians were aware that the national energy program had siphoned billions of dollars out of the western Canadian economy and into the federal treasury and the same proportional benefits were not returned to the people who owned the natural resource. Natural resources of course are a provincial jurisdiction.

This same experienced Liberal politician would go into Atlantic Canada, far away from the west, and expound on the virtues of the national energy program. I saw this on television one day. The wonderful thing about television is that sometimes it captures the things you say and it is recorded and broadcast in other parts of the country.

I realize that we have to be careful that we are consistent with our message in all parts of Canada when we are dealing with an issue, whether it be the national energy program or whether it be distinct society.

I have the uncanny feeling that when we are talking about distinct society the message being conveyed to the province of Quebec is not the same message that is being conveyed to other parts of Canada. The message to Quebec is that this will meet their aspirations. This somehow will confer on them some feeling of being a nation, meet demands that have been made by the separatists. Somehow these demands will be met and their feelings of nationalism will be appeased by recognizing them as a distinct society.

Then in the rest of the country the message is a bit different: Distinct society does not really mean anything, it is just an acknowledgement of something that already exists; it is no big deal, nothing to be worried about, and it might keep the country together.

I doubt that very much. It does not seem to make sense to me that you can convey one message to Canadian citizens in the province of Quebec and another message outside of the province. Something does not fit. Rather than question the message, we have to question the messenger. I do not think they are dealing a fair hand to Canadians when they describe the distinct society.

We really have to be concerned about how this term distinct society will be interpreted in the future. We can sit in this House and the government and the Prime Minister can say distinct society means this or that. But we know this term will be interpreted in the future by the courts and by future governments, so we have to be concerned about how distinct society is defined.

Actually I cannot find any place in Motion No. 26 or in any other information that tells us exactly what distinct society means in this case. We are told it includes the French–speaking majority. It does not say anything about any other Quebecers. We are told the House will be guided by this distinct society phrase. We are told the House will encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

To me that sounds like a blank cheque. That is saying let us adopt the phrase distinct society, hang it over the door of Quebec, and then we will try to pursue it with diligence and all our effort without knowing really what it means. We will interpret that in the future. We will let future politicians and future governments, perhaps even separatist governments, define the phrase distinct society for us. Just trust us, it will work out all right, that is what they are saying.

That concerns me very much as a Canadian, because I realize that when we are talking about the future of our country we are not talking about today only. We are not even talking about the people who make the decisions in this House and in the legislative assemblies of the provinces across the land. We are talking about the decisions that will be made in the future by parliamentarians and by people in the various legislatures, including possibly a separatist government in the province of Quebec.

I want to deal with this whole idea of conferring special status or rights on any group of society. Why would we do that? There are three reasons we might do that. The first reason is because these people are inferior to us and they need some kind of assistance. I do not accept that for the province of Quebec. I see them as my equals. Second, we can say that they are superior and they deserve some special status. I do not accept that either. I see them as my equals. Thirdly, we could say that because some of their ancestors were here before some of our ancestors they deserve a higher rung on the ladder. I do not accept that. Wherever we come from, we should all be treated equally. None of us should have any special status conferred upon us. Therefore, unless we accept the Reform amendments I cannot support the motion.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Motion No. 26 today, as it will have a profound impact on the future of our country if it is adopted.

Let me state my position quite clearly. As a Reformer, as an Albertan, as a Canadian and as someone who considers Canada as home, I cannot support distinct society for any province. I cannot support elevating one province over another, and I am not prepared to separate the haves from the have nots. I believe in equality and fairness for every man, woman, and child in this country regardless of their race, colour, creed, origin, or abilities.

To say that this motion is ill conceived is a euphemism of the first order. This motion is an unmitigated disaster, an affront to the House, a disgrace to the country and misrepresents all Canada stands for.

It is our duty today to govern this country with democracy, freedom, and equality as our guiding lights as we build on the past and lay the groundwork for the future generations. We have to be accountable for our actions today, just as those in the past have been judged by history for their actions.

There have been defining moments in history that were hailed as great achievements, yet history found them to be shallow and empty gestures that in hindsight would have best been left undone. I think of 1938, when Mr. Chamberlain promised us peace in our time as he waved a document that was, as I called it, a one–sided agreement. One year later, his proclamation for peace was trampled under the jackboots of an army that marched across Europe.

• (2100)

In 1982 the prime minister of the day proclaimed a new Constitution for the country that he said would last for 1,000 years. But that Constitution did not have the signature of Quebec, and like Mr. Chamberlain's declaration for peace in 1938, this Constitution was a one sided agreement.

I hear the historians of tomorrow calling this motion a one sided agreement that will not stand 1,000 years and will not even buy peace in our time. Today we are debating a motion which the government promises will bring peace and harmony to the country. As in 1938, the motivation for this motion is appeasement, not resolution. This is an offer to Quebec, not an agreement with Quebec.

Let us look at the proposed motion. The government wants the House to affirm a distinct society in the province of Quebec. Distinct society is not defined. Those who have demanded recognition as a distinct society in these last few years have not demanded recognition as a medal to be worn with pride but as a lever to exert more power, more advantage and to receive preferential treatment at the expense of the rest of Canada. Let us not lose sight of that fact.

The government mistakenly believes that talking about an issue, making statements about an issue, is equivalent to resolving the issue. Our debate today is a prefect example of that hypocrisy. In passing this motion the Prime Minister believes he will have achieved peace in our time. We know today Quebec is not satisfied. We know today the leaders of the separatist movement in Quebec will brush this gesture aside and march on.

What faith do we have today that this agreement will buy peace within Canada, harmony within Canada and build the structure for a united Canada while the forces of separation organize and marshal their resources for another assault on the unity of the country? We have none.

Alberta and British Columbia have been vocal over the years in their demand for change within this united federation, but they have voiced their concerns in a true and democratic way of working in a positive manner to achieve change. Both of these provinces are designated as have provinces within the equalization formula. Both of these provinces have contributed billions over the last few decades to the promotion and protection of this Confederation while they continue to live up to their commitments without demands that they receive the benefits equal to their contribution to the country.

If we are to have peace we need goodwill and commitment by the parties involved, not a simple, frivolous motion debated in the House produced at the whim of the government, all in the false hope that one single motion is a panacea to several decades of dissent.

The Reform Party has proposed three simple amendments to this motion to give it strength and focus. First, the government is asking that we recognize Quebec as a distinct society. We as Reformers say that is fine provided we recognize this is not to be used as a lever for more power and privilege at the expense of other provinces. Surely our amendment confirms the very heart of any federation, any family and any society that wants to survive today: equality for all.

• (2105)

Second, we recognize the French speaking majority, culture and legal traditions in Quebec. They are a fact of life which exist each day. However, we also recognize the great promise of the new world which guarantees equality for all regardless of who we are, what we are and where we came from.

Third, while we undertake to be guided by the reality of a distinct society and recognize that fact, we also undertake to be guided by the reality and recognize that this nation is one nation, from sea to shining sea.

Changes to the Constitution and the devolution of federal powers is a manageable process, but it is being managed in a most disgraceful manner by the Liberal government. The Reform Party knows that Canada can work together, will work together and, with real leadership in the country, will stay together. Leadership requires vision and a clear statement of the way to the promised land.

In the face of the challenge to break up the country the Reform Party has responded with a call to action with a plan and a program. A strong and proud Canada will move forward only when the leadership of this great nation articulates a clear vision for the country which is created by, endorsed by and supported by the large majority of Canadians and provinces.

This motion, in the way it is presented, is not the answer.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to enter the debate on Motion No. 26, which would recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

As we listen to the opposition parties we are wondering just what we are doing here. A distinct society will not cause the price of gasoline to go up. It will not affect our paycheques. It will have little or no effect on the lives of Canadians.

I have taken the opportunity to do a mailing to the constituents of Durham. I am happy to say that a good many of them are responding on how they feel about this issue. Their main concern is they want to keep the country united and strong. However, they have limitations. They do not think it should be done at any price. They are concerned that we respect the civil rights of all people in Canada. This motion will not inhibit the civil rights of individuals within the province of Quebec.

People are prepared to recognize each other as being distinct. However, it is an unusual concept for a society to recognize one element as being distinct. Clearly that means the other elements must also be distinct. There is a polarization of understanding. I believe that is healthy. It is useful within our system.

As I was coming to the House tonight I thought about all the debates and arguments caused by these two words in the last two or three decades. I wondered what would happen if we all collectively went to bed tonight and got amnesia. We would forget about our past. We would forget about our history. We would forget about we were doing when we lived together.

What would happen when we woke up tomorrow morning? We would find that we still have this huge country, the second largest nation in the world. We would discover that within that nation there were different linguistic groups: some French, some English, some others.

We would find that over a certain period of time they had entered into agreements with each other, individuals. That is all government is about, contracts and agreements between people.

We would discover that we had built a caring society, that we had developed medicare systems, unemployment insurance systems, pensions for our elderly. We had built all of these things, a social fabric, and we called it Canada.

We also did some other things. We also borrowed a lot of money to pay for some of these social programs in periods when our revenues could not sustain them. We would discover as we opened the books that we had huge debts; some of them federal, many of them provincial, but all culminated in a huge bill we all had to pay.

Having looked at these aspects, we would also see we had inherited tremendous resources. We had inherited the forests, the mines, the rivers. We had inherited a country of mountains, of lakes, from sea to sea to sea, and that we all together shared this great nation.

It seems to me we would be hard pressed to discover what we did not like about each other. We would be quite respectful with each other and humble to live in such a country. We would discover we were willing to respect the cultural integrity of the numerous groups that live within that country; that our objectives were not to overpower or overwhelm another culture but to co–exist.

I am sure we would look at the calendar and would see we were approaching the 21st century. We would look at our debts and we would look at our resources and we would try to see how we can live together and work together as we approach the 21st century. I am sure we would find a solution for that.

The other side of the coin is we do not have amnesia and so what have we forgot? We probably forgot the negative parts of our history. We forgot about the Plains of Abraham. We forgot many other aspects about the existence of Canada today. We probably forgot about some of the symbols we display so proudly, which are really symbols of a bygone day. They are symbols of our heritage, and not something we want to get rid of; we want to evolve as a nation.

It is clear to me as I travel throughout the country that people no longer understand what the governor general stands for or represents. Ever since being elected to this place, one of the things I enjoy doing, at least initially, is going around to our high schools and presenting the governor general's award. The governor general's award is presented to the highest scholastic student in a secondary school each year. I have many high schools in riding and I do many of these events.

When I am handing out that award I ask those people to name the governor general. In two years none of these academics has been able to name the governor general. If our institutions of government have become so irrelevant maybe they should be changed.

If we want to enter into and renew our partnership links, both of these cultures have to adjust for each other. I question some of my brethren in other parts of the country who want to cling to the status quo, our symbols of the past.

• (2115)

Two days ago I was surprised to hear my Reform colleagues arguing about changing the coat of arms of Canada in such a way that it states we want to work toward a better country. Can we imagine wanting to stick to the status quo to the point where we could not see that simple change as being useful? I would like to change a lot of other things in the country. I know many people respect the monarchy. Indeed that is part of our past and is something we cannot erase.

It is time to change some of the symbols of Canada. I have no problem with our currency reflecting distinctly Canadian symbols.

It was interesting to watch the referendum in Quebec. It was my privilege to be at the Montreal rally and see the oui signs which showed that side of the loonie depicting the Canadian loon. I ask some of my colleagues in the House whether that tells us something. Does it not tell us that if we want to evolve as a country we clearly we have to evolve together?

It would be very good if we could all get collective amnesia, put to one side some of the things in our past that we are not happy with and recognize the true strength and wealth of the country. Basically we should get along together. We have many problems. Our deficit is a tremendous burden. It is much like having a huge mortgage in a marriage and not being able to afford a divorce.

The people out there should remember that we are not talking about giving away the farm. There is very little expense, but the bottom line is that it is time to change our nation.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to speak to the resolution which recognizes that Quebec is a distinct society because of its majority French language, its culture and its civil code legal system.

A month or so ago our country was brought to a precipice by the referendum in Quebec. As I campaigned in Quebec during the referendum, as I talked to people in Quebec and thought about what was happening there, it was frightening that we had failed to understand each other. People outside Quebec did not have a good understanding of the concerns of Quebecers, how sincere they were in their concerns about the preservation of their language and culture within this huge sea of English that is North America. With the huge English area surrounding Quebec, including the U.S. and the rest of Canada, Quebecers have a very real concern about it.

I found a lack of understanding among some francophone Quebecers of the point of view of people outside Quebec and of their love for Quebec. There was a misunderstanding among them of how the rest of Canada would react to a yes vote in Quebec. The consequences would have been severe for all of us. Certainly there was a failure among Bloc members to recognize that. This reminds me that we almost lost a great country.

We must remember that Canada's position in the world is a very important one. It is one that is widely respected. Why is that? We are respected as a peacemaker and a peacekeeper around the world. We are respected because we provide an example to the world of living peacefully with differences. It is a great example. We are respected widely for our exercise of the art of Canadian compromise.

A few weeks ago I was watching a CBC television program during which Allison Smith was interviewing Israeli prize winning author Amos Oz. It was interesting to hear him talk about his work. His novels have always tried to bring together the two sides, the Palestinians and the Israelis.

He was talking about the need for compromise and the need to work out solutions in that country. He talked about the example of the Israelis and the Palestinians. He pointed out that on the one hand the Israelis had always looked upon the land in the area of the West Bank as being very important to their nation and a very important part of themselves. It is essential to them to have that land for their country. On the other hand the Palestinians look at that land as being essential to their nation, an essential part of themselves.

As he pointed out often, we feel we have a misunderstanding but if we talk enough we can work out the problem. However there was not a lack of understanding on the two sides. There was an understanding but the problem was that they both wanted the same thing. There was an impasse and a conflict.

As he also pointed out, when people realize there is that kind of conflict eventually they come to the realization that the only logical, rational response is a compromise. His phrase was that compromise is life and life is compromise.

Surely any of us who is married will understand that is true. Life is full of compromises. Certainly a marriage is made up of compromises. How can we have one without compromise? It is a very important part of a healthy marriage. Compromise is an important part of living with differences, as is all of life.

We have to recognize that we have different points of view in the country and that we have to find compromise between those points of view.

Some people have the idea that the country is made up of two founding linguistic groups. We also have the point of view on the other side that suggests that we are 10 equal founding provinces. These are two different points of view. Somewhere in the middle we have to find some common ground.

[Translation]

We are familiar with the history of the Maritimes. In 1867, the two big provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, joined with Quebec and Ontario in the Confederation. At that time, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had very powerful economies, stronger than Ontario and Quebec. Obviously, from our point of view, in Nova Scotia for instance, the agreement involved equal provinces, equal partners.

But there must be an understanding of the historical links between Lower and Upper Canada, Ontario and Quebec, with their two main language groups. Those groups joined forces to create this country. The two are part of one reality. Neither one nor the other represents reality; the two together do. But there are different understandings of what this country is, and it is difficult sometimes for those who understand things one way to understand the other point of view.

[English]

I want to talk for a moment about the word distinct which was dealt with in the resolution. According to the definition in The Concise Oxford Dictionary it is an adjective and has three different meanings:

> 1 a not identical; separate; individual. b different in kind or quality; unlike. 2 a clearly perceptible; plain. b clearly understandable; definite. 3 unmistakable, decided.

A lot of francophones do not realize that in English the word distinct is often thought of in terms of the word distinguished, which suggests some sort of superiority or a heightened level. When we talk about a distinguished person, it is a person who has achieved a high level in life. In the past that has created a problem in Canada.

• (2125)

[Translation]

The difficulty with defining the word "distinct" is to make both sides, anglophones and francophones, see that it is used differently in both languages. That was a problem I encountered when I visited Quebec. I was talking with some students at Saint–Jovite and a girl asked me: "Why do the anglophones not look up the definition of the word "distinct" in a French dictionary. In French, it means "different"; there is absolutely no suggestion of superiority".

But back in Nova Scotia, in my riding of Halifax West, when I talk to the people from down home, they ask: "Why will the francophones not consider the definition and meaning of the word "distinct", because it has a different meaning in English?"

You can see that it is hard to see the other side's point of view, or for them to see ours. It is always hard. The answer is not to separate but to communicate and find a compromise.

[English]

Whenever we have an impasse or a deadlock the only solution is a compromise. In the measures we brought forward this week is a compromise. For example, we know that Quebec wanted a veto for itself over constitutional change. We are providing in the system of how we govern the federal government's approach to the matter a veto to four regions, not just to Quebec. We also recognized in the resolution that Quebec is a distinct society because of its culture, its language and its civil code. This is an important compromise for the country. Together they form an important compromise position that will help us bridge toward the constitutional conference in 1997.

This is not a constitutional change. Constitutional change is not precluded or prevented by these measures. It will be up to those who meet at the conference in 1997 whether or not they wish to make future changes to the Constitution. That is left to the future for now.

People in my area are saying: "Let's deal with it quickly. Let's deal with it in a nice, clean manner and set it aside for now so we can focus on the real problems of the country".

Is Quebec distinct? If Quebec were to separate it would be as distinct as Mexico from the other provinces of Canada. It has a different language and a different culture in many ways, not in every way, from the rest of Canada. The majority language there is different. We cannot say that about any other province. It is clearly distinct in that way.

Does this make Quebec superior? No. Does it recognize and celebrate our differences? Yes, it does.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois, I am pleased to rise in the House today to speak on the motion to recognize the distinct nature of Quebec society.

Before speaking on the motion, as such, I would like to refer to a short passage from the Practical Guide to Private Members' Business, which defines what is a motion. It says that the effect desired is the first consideration in deciding between a bill and a motion, that in passing a motion—as is the case here— stating a resolution, the House expresses a wish without committing the government to a particular measure or direction.

A wish is expressed, which does not commit the government to a particular measure or direction. It is important to remember that this is what the motion is directed at. The guide goes on to say that, on the other hand, a bill passed by Parliament may have major implications for both the government and the public.

But there is no cause for anxiety. This is not a bill, it is a motion, that is to say a wish that does not commit the government to a particular measure or direction; in other words, it does not amount to much.

I would also point out that, in this House, a motion was passed on December 13, 1994, which reads as follows: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should officially recognize the historical contribution of the patriots of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada to the establishment of a system of responsible democratic government".

• (2130)

This motion was passed on December 13. What action has been taken to implement this motion since? None, none whatsoever, because it was idle talk that did not commit the government to anything.

Let me remind you that a motion recognizing hockey as our national winter sport and lacrosse as our national summer sport was also passed. What action has been taken since? The Canadian lacrosse team's budget was eliminated. Completely. What good is a motion? It does not mean a thing.

Besides being meaningless, the motion is contradictory to begin with, because it reads in part, and I quote:

> That—the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French-speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;

"Unique culture". Just this afternoon, my hon. colleague from Rimouski—Témiscouata asked the Primer Minister the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, government members of the heritage committee maintained that there was no such thing as a Quebec culture—

Now this motion says that we in Quebec have a unique culture. Unique means that it is exclusive to Quebec, if I am not mistaken.

Yet government members maintained that there was no Quebec culture, only one great big Canadian culture. It seems to me that their position flies in the face of the motion these same members are about to vote on.

And what was the Prime Minister's answer?

> Mr. Speaker, there is a French culture in Canada, which is Canadian.

There is only one culture in Canada: the Canadian culture. That is what the Prime Minister said. On the other hand, the motion tabled by the Prime Minister himself, seconded by his Deputy Prime Minister, recognizes that there is a unique culture in Quebec. It reads:

> That—the House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note—

—it does not say much, "to take note"—

> —of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

What did the Prime Minister do this afternoon? Just the opposite. The opposite of what? The opposite of what a meaningless motion says to do. Is there any doubt about that? I will let you be the judge of that, Mr. Speaker.

Yet, during the referendum campaign, the Primer Minister repeated time and time again that he would positively not address constitutional issues, but deal with the real problems instead, namely job creation and deficit reduction. How did we end up debating this motion then? Because they were afraid. They looked at the polls and realized that they were losing ground. Faced with rising support for the yes side in opinion polls toward the end of the campaign and with the possibility of losing the referendum, the Prime Minister suddenly changed his mind. He set up a smoke–and–mirrors operation aimed at convincing the people of Quebec that the federal government was committed to making major changes to the current federal system after a hypothetical no.

The fact that this strategy was improvised from beginning to end was, of course, reflected in the Canadian Prime Minister's ambiguous and meaningless comments in the final days of the referendum campaign. On October 24 in Verdun, he said, and I quote: "Quebecers want Quebec to be recognized within Canada as a distinct society because of its language, culture and institutions. I have said it before and I say it again, I agree". Yet, he tells us today that there is only one culture in Canada, although his motion says that Quebec has a distinct culture. It is no big deal, he has a right to be mixed up.

The Liberal government also felt pressured to deliver on its vague promises to change the federal system following the razor–thin victory of the no side on October 30.

• (2135)

To do so, it set up two phoney committees. One of these committees was chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Its mission: to save Canada. What a nifty little mission.

On November 29, even before the committee tabled its findings, the Prime Minister hastily announced three initiatives aimed at satisfying the desire for change expressed by the vast majority of Quebecers.

As far as recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is concerned, however, these efforts are not very impressive. But, before going any further, allow me to read the motion:

Whereas the people of Quebec have expressed the desire for recognition of Quebec's distinct society;

(1) the House recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada;

(2) the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French–speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;

Perhaps my English is not so good, but to me, "unique culture" means a culture that is different from others.

(3) the House undertake to be guided by this reality;

(4) the House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

In other words, this is just the opposite of what was done this afternoon.

Upon reading the motion, we realize that it is merely a recognition of Quebec society as it is now. It simply reflects a mathematical reality.

Nowhere in this text is there any mention of additional powers being given to Quebec. The minister himself said it did not provide powers to Quebec. He is an honest man.

This motion is meaningless, an empty shell. It is merely a symbolic recognition of what we already know, namely that we are different from the rest of Canada. Even the Prime Minister said so.

The fact is that the recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness, as currently proposed by the Liberal government, is light years away from what was proposed in the past.

Indeed, during the 1986–87 federal–provincial negotiations to get Quebec to sign, with honour and enthusiasm, the Constitutional Act of 1982, the Liberal Party of Quebec made a demand, as part of its June 1985–86 political agenda. This quote is for the benefit of the Quebec Liberals who hold a Liberal party membership: "The Liberal government is asking that a statement be included, in a preamble to the new Constitution, to explicitly recognize Quebec as a distinct society and as a cornerstone for the French element of the Canadian duality".

That was not written by nasty separatists in their political agenda, but by the Liberal Party of Quebec.

These proposals from the Liberal Party of Quebec led to the Meech Lake accord. Although the concept of distinct society in that accord was not worth much, at least it was entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. Moreover, the distinct society clause was interpretative. Therefore, the provisions of the Canadian Constitution had to be interpreted based, among other things, on that clause. Consequently, today's motion on the concept of distinct society is very far from what was agreed to in the Meech Lake accord. There was a minimum of interpretative powers. Today, there are none.

There is nothing of the sort being proposed today. Besides, the government side is deluding itself into believing that Quebecers will smilingly accept such a ridiculous proposition and undertaking—and I am weighing my words carefully with that choice of adjective.

• (2140)

Where were the people in the Liberal government when the people of Quebec came close to saying yes to sovereignty on October 30, at 49.4 per cent? Do the Prime Minister and his cronies really believe that the people of Quebec will settle for that stuff and nonsense when they came within a hair's breadth of gaining a country and full control over all powers? No. The federal government needs to stop fooling itself and face up to reality.

Quebec is not inhabited by a distinct society, but by a people, the people of Quebec. The men and women of Quebec already know this, and that is why they do not recognize themselves in the meaningless concept of a distinct society. If there is one lesson to be learned from the October 30 referendum, it is that the people of Quebec are on their way to sovereignty.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is both a pleasure and a duty for me to speak to a motion, so well characterized by the previous speaker as wishful thinking on the part of the House of Commons, to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

In this country people have long misunderstood the so–called identity of the province of Quebec. Quebec is not a province like the others. It is a people, a nation. It is a nation forged by history, a society that included aboriginal peoples and the many immigrants that came to change that society and be changed by it, that would enrich it and absorb its identity.

Quebec is not a province like the others, and until this fact is recognized other than by a motion on distinct society or some Charlottetown accord on an equally hollow concept, Quebecers will have no choice but to ensure that in the next referendum, the result will not be 49.4 per cent, which is a defeat or a narrow victory, but a clear majority.

I hope so, not only for Quebec but also for Canada because, as long as this issue remains unresolved, Canada will not be able to consider its own potential and problems and guide the development of its economy and its own history in the best interests of Canadians.

We in Quebec claim, and will continue to claim, that the best thing for Quebec and Canada would be to agree to a partnership.

• (2145)

We realize that the outcome of the referendum does not give us a mandate to negotiate this partnership immediately. However, Canada should not get the impression that symbolic gestures as frivolous as a motion on distinct society will do anything at all to deal with the problem facing both Quebec and Canada.

In my youth, which, I must admit, was a long time ago, I was very keen on history. History is an impassioned quest for understanding what makes a people and a nation. Quebec as a people, as a nation, has come a long way since the first French colonists immigrated to Canada, which is an aboriginal name. These French immigrants quickly mixed in.

I need only mention the Carignan–Salières regiment and its many soldiers, mercenaries from every country in Europe. They settled here. When the English conquest left the people no choice but to submit, their interbreeding explains why every historian studying this time in history says that, even in those days, Canadians or "Canayens", like the Americans, former English settlers, would not have taken long to become independent in a country with a different name.

Fortune, if we can use such a term for the English conquest, dictated that there would be a colony within a colony and that, many years later, Quebec through its complex but clear and unilateral history, would succeed in imposing itself more and more as a people and a nation. Even more so since 1960, when after a business and economic middle class abolished in 1760 revived. These young people spoke with one voice calling for "maître chez nous" and for "égalité ou indépendance", through the Ralliement pour l'indépendance du Québec, the RIN, and even the FLQ, leading this people, already a fact, to speak for itself. General de Gaulle did no harm either with his "Vive le Québec libre" from the balcony.

Quebec's history includes the election of the Parti Quebecois and the failure of its first referendum, a bitter pill for those who had worked so hard. But it was nevertheless productive, because 15 years later, in 1995, the 1980 referendum was almost won.

In these few minutes, it is not possible to review all our rich Quebec history. I want to say that I have tremendous respect for every Canadian who speaks here today; they are committed to their country. I say to them the only way the countries of Canada and Quebec can develop and flourish is through mutual recognition.

• (2150)

It is by mutually recognizing not Quebec's distinct society, which is practically meaningless, but the depth, the profound nature of our people and our nation, in both Quebec and Canada, that we can mutually and collectively prepare for the future by building on a real foundation.

Unfortunately, instead of bringing us closer to a future to which Canadians and Quebecers are entitled, this initiative marks a setback, because it tries to fulfil a wish that has absolutely nothing to do with the real underlying needs.

I sincerely hope that our position will help Quebecers and Canadians take a real step toward their future.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the great honour of supporting the motion before us today.

I am a Quebecer and it is as such that I associate myself with this motion. I do so because it is in the best interests of Quebec and because it opens the door to a renewed partnership for Canadian partners from coast to coast.

The ideal country does not exist, except in the imagination of certain persons. And we all agree that Canada is far from perfect. It needs to change. It must change to better reflect its own reality.

[English]

What is that reality? It is the reality of a vast country with a scattered, diverse population. It is the reality of a country in which regional identities are strongly expressed. It is also the reality of a country in which the francophones are concentrated in one province but a million others are distributed across the rest of Canada.

[Translation]

That is the Canadian reality. Not only must we take it into consideration and recognize it, but our institutions must also reflect this reality if we want this country to work and to achieve its full potential.

[English]

On October 30 Quebecers sent us a clear double message. While reaffirming their attachment to Canada, they indicated that they wanted to see Canada change quickly to reflect their aspirations. We must know how to interpret this message. We must not only take note of it, but we must respond to it in a concrete way or this country will fail.

As the Prime Minister pointed out so well when the motion was tabled, the referendum results have taught us that we must not take Canada for granted. It was in this context that the Prime Minister made three firm commitments on behalf of the Canadian government during the referendum campaign. These three commitments were as follows: to recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada; to refrain from making any constitutional change affecting Quebec without the consent of Quebecers; and to undertake changes to bring citizens closer to services and decision making.

[Translation]

The time has come to fulfil these commitments, to take action. Through the motion before this House, we are starting to give concrete expression to the commitments made by the Prime Minister. By putting it to the members of this House this quickly, the government is showing that it takes its commitments seriously. It is showing how important this issue is, not only for Quebec, but also for the rest of Canada.

• (2155)

[English]

Why do Quebecers want to be recognized as members of a distinct society? The reasons are obvious. Quebec is home to a French speaking majority, a unique culture, and a civil law tradition. Quebec has been built around these essential elements for more than three centuries. Recognizing this is not only acknowledging reality, it is also agreeing that these characteristics of Quebec society must be preserved and nourished in a context where Quebec co–exists in North America with a population of about 300 million anglophones.

To adopt this motion is to recognize that the French character of Quebec must be protected. It is to assert that Quebec must enjoy cultural security. It is to recognize the linguistic duality that is in the very nature of Canada and contributes to its cultural and social richness.

[Translation]

By recognizing Quebec's distinct nature and by admitting that the definition of distinct society contained in this motion is by no means complete, this House is undertaking to let itself be guided by this reality. The legislative and executive branches of government will be encouraged to take this recognition into account in all their activities and all their decisions. This means that this motion will have a positive impact on the way legislation is passed in this House and decisions are made in federal government departments and agencies.

There is more. The motion before us today is but one of a whole series of government actions. During the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister promised not to make any constitutional change without Quebec's consent. That commitment is reflected in the bill recently introduced by the Minister of Justice to provide a regional veto power. Under this bill, any constitutional amendment proposed by the federal government will require the consent of Quebec and the other regions of Canada.

[English]

The objective of the motion is clear: to protect Quebec from amendments that might reduce the powers of the Quebec National Assembly. By taking this action the Government of Canada is recognizing that the Government of Quebec, as the only government representing a francophone majority in North America, has a central role to play in the evolution of Canada.

[Translation]

This is a far cry from the so–called meaningless motion referred to by the separatists in recent days. Through this bill, the federal government strengthens the regions, particularly Quebec. We feel it is a first step toward more flexible and more effective federalism.

[English]

It would be wrong to claim that the only purpose of the motion is to meet the aspirations of Quebec. Canada is not a melting pot, nor has it ever been. The issue here is proposals that reflect the deep nature of Canada. The issue here is ensuring not only our national unity but also its harmony and the effectiveness of its institutions.

I have followed the debate on the motion with interest. I have heard the criticisms of the official opposition, which were not really surprising. I have also heard the criticisms of others who claim to be defending Canada while at the same time opposing the motion. To them I would say that it is easy to criticize after the crisis is over. However, what will those who object today say when the separatists mount another attack? I invite them to answer right now, before it is too late.

Canada is a federation of partners. It is by preserving the spirit of partnership and co–operation and by recognizing both our differences and our shared objectives that this country will grow and prosper. The motion we are debating today deals exactly with this concept of partnership. The Canada we all want is a country in which each region has its own specific character and the freedom it needs to express it. That is the essence of what this motion contains.

• (2200)

The definition of a federation is not a grouping of equal partners. The purpose of a federation is to permit the differences of the various parts to be accommodated within one country. Otherwise it is a unitary state. We are not, because we have started as a group of people who were different and who founded a type of government able to accept the differences. It is really unfortunate that there is now a party which does not agree that the differences the country has are part of its richness and of its wealth.

[Translation]

The motion before the House specifically relates to the concept of partnership. The Canada that we want is a country in which every region will have its own distinctive character and the means to develop it. This is the very essence of the motion.

Canadians want a united country. They are open to changes that will preserve its unity and promote its development, as evidenced by the resolutions recently passed by the legislatures of Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, to recognize Quebec's distinct identity.

I am convinced that the majority of Quebecers and Canadians recognize themselves in this motion. I would humbly submit to the Official Opposition, moreover, as well as to the Government of Quebec, that they are wrong to reject it.

Of course the separatists cannot accept propositions with the object of making Canada work better. This is an undemocratic attitude, for it denies the results of the referendum. It also condemns Quebec to immobility and rejection of any improvement to the system. It is thus in contradiction to what most Quebecers want.

We have no illusions about it. Since the Government of Quebec is interested solely in its own option, we shall not engage in constitutional discussions which would be doomed to failure from the word go. But that does not mean that we will not take steps today in the direction Quebecers and all Canadians want us to go. Needless to say that if Quebec and the other regions of the country consent, the Government will be open to including the changes contained in this motion in the Constitution.

[English]

Every member sitting in the House has the opportunity by voting for this motion to acknowledge Canada for what it is, a diversified country, an open country, a country that has always based its development on accepting and preserving its differences.

[Translation]

For, beyond those differences, the shared values and objectives we have always had as Canadians, regardless of where we live, remain: freedom, tolerance, the creation and distribution of wealth for individuals and regions.

The months and years to come will surely afford us the opportunity for a concrete demonstration of the fact that we go far beyond principles and idle talk.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to put on the record some of the comments I have received from constituents. They have watched and participated with all of us, or most of us, as a number of members and parties in the House did not participate in the process, in order to reach out to the province of Quebec with most Canadians to set the country back on a path of a unified purpose and commitment to the dream which has made this country the envy of the world.

• (2205)

I would like to publicly thank those from the Prince Edward—Hastings riding who took that long bus trip to Montreal on October 27 to extend their hand and to once again tell Quebecers their Canada included Quebec. It certainly was a contribution I know was well meant and very useful. I thank them for that extra effort as well as the individuals and businesses in the riding that helped to make that possible during that day and during that critical time in the future of our country.

The resolution we are debating is certainly an honest and thoughtful fulfilment of an important commitment the Prime Minister made to the people of Quebec during the referendum debate. We are fortunate as Canadians to have a Prime Minister who displays and portrays very clearly integrity and sincerity in his actions. When he makes a promise to Canadians he fulfils that promise.

The package of unity measures announced and put forward to the House and to Canadians in every province has three parts, as we well know: to recognize within Canada that Quebec is a distinct society; not to proceed with any constitutional change that affects Quebec without Quebecers' consent; and to undertake changes to bring services and the decision making process closer to citizens, initially in the field of labour market training.

This kind of leadership, to put this type of thing before Canadians and before the House, is what is needed today in order to heal the wounds, and the recent wounds, that need to be healed in order to move forward together as Canadians. This motion along with the bill concerning the veto and other actions of the House concerning workforce training measures provide a confident display of national reconciliation.

The motion that addresses the legitimate concerns of the citizens of Quebec in terms of our acknowledgement of the distinctive characteristics of Quebec as a society is only a recognition of the reality there today.

If we analyze the motion by looking at the second part it says very clearly that Quebec includes a French speaking majority. That is a reality. It says Quebec has a unique culture. That is a reality. It says Quebec is governed by the civil law tradition. That is a reality.

This motion does not give any special status to the people in Quebec. It recognizes one of the things we all say everyday, that our country is made up of many diverse cultures. However, we have six million French speaking people of a unique culture, different from many of the rest of us, in Quebec.

The motion provides them the assurance that the federal government will be guided by the recognition of that distinctness and carries the Prime Minister's personal commitment that he and the government will gladly incorporate into the Constitution, when all the provinces are prepared along with Quebec, appropriate resolutions to do so.

No matter what area we are dealing with, our own riding or an organization we belong to or in the House, we know there are differences. We know there are people who think differently. The important thing, whether in our own families or whether in the larger family of a constituency, a province, a municipality or in the House, is that we recognize and appreciate each other's differences.

We may not always agree but the only way we are to get ahead in a family of any kind, whether it is a family of the House or a family that we call Canada, is to go forward together. We are stronger as we work together to achieve that end. It is a disappointment to most Canadians when we see one political party in the House saying it wants a Quebec without Canada and another political party making it very clear it would be very happy, certainly not upset, if we had a Canada without Quebec.

The concerns that this motion conveys special powers to the province of Quebec or that this motion is an acknowledgement of the Constitution's inability to be flexible enough to accommodate such changes are simply unwarranted.

While this motion has no legal effect, it definitely expresses an important commitment by the elected body that speaks for all Canadians, this body that we are all part of here this evening, and it recognizes an obvious reality without giving the people of Quebec any powers that Canadians elsewhere do not possess.

That is not the intention of this motion. The intention of this motion and the intention and the challenge of the House is to treat all Canadians equally. We also have to recognize Canadians are not all the same when it comes to language, culture and, in the case of Quebec, the law and the civil law code they are governed by.

The Constitution is more than capable of accepting this change, as is the government. The willingness of the Quebec government to make that possible would be a significant help in giving greater weight to this important measure.

I am disappointed that the official opposition and the third party are opposed to this motion, opposed and fail to recognize the diversity of what makes up this wonderful country we are all part of.

The negative contributions to the debate during the referendum by some members of the House, some parties in the House, nearly cost us the country. We cannot stand by and allow that to happen again. It is illogical, narrow minded and not of the national character we have here Canada.

Canada must reassert our strength of purpose and unite our people. This is a commitment the government is prepared to make, and is making. It is the potential of this motion and it will be the legacy of the government and the Prime Minister.

We are a country incredibly rich in culture, resources, beauty, geography and opportunity. I encourage all members of the House to do what we can, individually and together, to make our country even stronger in the future than it is at the present time. I urge all members of the House to support this motion.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with one of my fellow members.

In May 1987 Pierre Trudeau wrote an open letter to the country after the Meech Lake accord was signed. He had this to say about Quebec as a distinct society:

> The real question—is whether the French Canadians living in Quebec need a provincial government with more powers than other provinces. I believe it is insulting to us to claim that we do—.The new generation—has no use for this siege mentality in which the elites of bygone days used to cower—.They don't suffer from any inferiority complex, and they say good riddance to the times when we didn't dare to measure ourselves against others without fear and trembling. In short, they need no crutches. Quite the contrary, they know that Quebecers are capable of playing a leading role within Canada.

Mr. Trudeau believed the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society would be a stepping stone to sovereignty, that granting special powers to Quebec would be the end of the Canadian dream. I think he was right.

Call Quebec a distinct society, promise to make government decisions in light of that status, and sovereignists will seize on it to say at last we are recognized as a distinct society, and a distinct society is a nation; we have only one more step to go.

The notion of a distinct society formed the basis of the sovereignty argument in the last referendum campaign and will be used to greater effect next time if this motion passes.

• (2215)

The current Prime Minister's last minute promise of a distinct society was born out of panic. It is a policy of appeasement to sovereignists in Quebec and it stands in opposition to traditional Liberal Party policy.

I agree with Mr. Trudeau about distinct society, but I take issue with his belief that national unity lay in his new Constitution and the charter which would form a federation, as he put it, set to last 1,000 years.

Instead Mr. Trudeau, by invading provincial jurisdictions, by consolidating power in Ottawa and by starting us down the debt road that has led us to the fiscal crisis we now face as a nation, set in motion a series of events that led us to the brink of separation on October 30. It does not help that our current Prime Minister is so closely associated with the repatriation of our Constitution and being finance minister during the time that this fiscal crisis began.

Federal strategy during the referendum and afterward was put forward by the Prime Minister in the following way. He promised a virtual status quo, even though Quebec had been demanding that the federal government get out of provincial jurisdiction since 1920. The Prime Minister now says he will decentralize some job training to the provinces. It is too little, but it is not yet too late.

Finally, the lack of federal strategy ignores the changing face of Canada. The new Canada is more than just two founding nations. We have come of age in this country. We are no longer simply two founding nations. We are a nation of almost 30 million people and growing. We are a nation of 30 million equal people. There are no longer just two languages, there are many. Canada is more than just two rich and populace central provinces. It is a nation with a growing western economy and a population to match.

In the old Canada, Ontario and Quebec could afford to ignore the western hinterland. However, in 20 years British Columbia will be nearly as populace as Quebec. Alberta and B.C. already have the two strongest economies in the nation. The west is not only a theoretical equal, it sits now at the table as a practical equal with the central provinces.

Liberals seem to be living in the past, in the old Canada. That is why the notion of a distinct society reverberates so poorly in the west. If the Prime Minister wants to give special status to Quebec and this status means unequal powers or unequal treatment of all Canadians, regardless of race, sex, language or culture, then this idea will not sell in British Columbia and the rest of Canada.

That is why we proposed these amendments. It was to make it crystal clear that it does not involve any more powers or any unequal treatment of any Canadians. If he continues to treat provinces unequally, he is starting to drive a wedge in the west where there once was one only at the Ottawa River.

It is fair to say that everyone in the Chamber feels a good deal of pressure today, pressure from their constituents, from party colleagues, from provincial governments and even from people who are yet to be born, because future generations may have to live with whatever we decide. They are in a sense looking for us to do what is right.

I regret what is happening in the House. As the proverb states, a house divided against itself cannot stand. At this crucial time in our history, we face a divided House of Parliament, not only between federalists and separatists, which is to be expected, but incredibly we also face a divided House among federalists.

The government seems to claim a certain omniscience on the subject of national unity but the results of the referendum proved it to be sadly mistaken. If at the beginning of the referendum campaign the Prime Minister had brought in the leader of the Reform Party and said: "We both represent legitimate viewpoints of Canadians. We can work out a strategy together. Let us combat the separatists in Quebec", I think the leader of the Reform Party would have co–operated gladly. However, there seems to be no room for compromise in the Liberal ranks.

Instead the Prime Minister questions the loyalty of Reformers just because they do not agree with the way the Liberal Party wants to fight separatists. Of course this is not true. We are not lacking in patriotism. We simply feel like most Canadians, that we have been shut out of the process and that the strategy is wrong.

What is that process? The resolution came before the House with two days' notice, an hour's notice to the press, a briefing to the Liberal caucus on the same day that the Prime Minister held the press conference. There was no briefing for any other members in the House. There was no public consultation or even consultation with the provinces, many of which reject this notion of distinct society.

Members of the Reform Party, like it or not, represent real points of view of real Canadians. On the Liberal side they may want to ignore the Reform members in the House but the people of Canada who voted for us cannot be ignored. In ignoring the thoughts of Reformers, the Prime Minister is alienating strong federalist forces outside of his own cloistered offices. Yet when the Reform Party protests, the Prime Minister chides them like school children and says: "Shame, shame you're in bed with the separatists". Then he proceeds to offer a constitutional veto to the separatist Government of Quebec.

There is a sincere desire for national unity on the government side of the House. I do not question that. Their tactics are wrong. There is wisdom on this side of the House worth hearing.

I would like to read from Hansard. When I asked the Prime Minister, when he must have known or he should have known that the west would never ever accept this distinct society clause, why he brought it forward, his Minister of Justice said: "Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should assume for a moment that the hon. member speaks for the people of British Columbia".

A slick Toronto lawyer does not speak for the people of British Columbia. If he wants to know what the people of British Columbia are saying, he should come out to the coffee shops, come out to the public meetings, come out to the talk shows, come out anywhere in the west and listen. If he listened he would realize the wedge that he is driving with this motion between British Columbia and the rest of Canada. I do not know why the government is proceeding with this.

The Reform policy is to confront hard and soft Quebec separatists on the one hand by developing realistic answers to the hard questions that the sovereignists like to sweep under the rug. We would detail the costs of separation for Quebecers and make sure that all Quebecers hear them. A huge percentage of voters in Quebec thought that they could vote yes and still have all the benefits of being Canadian. The federal government's failure to detail the cost of separation, to tell them where the rubber meets the road, tell them what they are in for, brought us nearly to the brink of separation on October 30. That is what we should do on the one hand.

On the other hand Reformers would also appeal to Canadian nationalists in Quebec, who represent well over half of the population. We would do this by showing them exactly where Canada can change, that we can devolve programs and responsibilities to all of the provinces equally.

We have detailed 20 separate areas where changes can be made without constitutional change simply by getting the federal government out of areas of provincial jurisdiction. Our strategy would confront the separatists on the one hand and encourage Canadian nationalism on the other and cultivate unity among all federalists across the country by preserving the concept of equality.

It is a reasonable strategy. It will work. I appeal to all members to drop this disastrous distinct society motion while there is still time. Members should stop casting insults when someone comes up with another idea and maybe see if there is a kernel of truth in it.

I invite all federalists to create a strategy in this House for all members that is not created in the Prime Minister's office. It is time for the west to be brought into the picture. It is time for federalists to work together to tell the separatist Quebecois exactly what they are in for and to offer a new vision for a united Canada.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to split my 10 minutes with the hon. member for Elk Island.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, this is a very ill conceived move on the part of the government. I believe it is politically motivated solely. The Prime Minister, having totally botched the matter of the referendum and the move on the part of some people from one province to separate from the country is now desperate to show he is doing something. If this was such a good idea he should have done it two years ago and not hastily thrown it into the breach when he was in desperate difficulty.

Members on the other side are telling us over and over that this is going to unify the country. This distinct society proposal will do nothing but intensify Canada's divisions. In my few minutes I am going to put on the record why I believe this is so.

First, once we concede that Quebec is distinct we have provided an enormous justification for it to be separate. Second, formal recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness in the Constitution is meaningless unless that special recognition also becomes a principle used to interpret the Constitution with respect to this distinct society. The rules by which our country functions would then always be interpreted so as to treat one province as distinct and special.

As a result, that province would have special status and constitutional powers, for if we state that in spite of its being a distinct society, Quebec has no more power than the other provinces, in the end it would be no more distinct than the others. The whole exercise would only be window dressing because Quebec's interests would not be better served by it. Separatists would be able to denounce it as yet another empty gesture and cause disaffection with the federal government to increase, not decrease.

The greatest danger is that giving Quebec distinct society status in the Constitution would almost certainly be interpreted as also giving Quebec special status and constitutional powers. Former Prime Minister Trudeau in 1987 pointed out that Quebec politicians will take the position "that if the Constitution says something it is because a meaning was intended". It is an old principle in lawmaking that legislators usually do not talk without saying something. It can happen, but not when they write laws. Thus we have to suppose that distinct society means something.

Trudeau was also quoted as commenting that if anyone thinks recognizing Quebec as a distinct society means nothing, "you are in for a superb surprise".

Anyone who has studied the courts' interpretations over the last several years of existing constitutional provisions will have no trouble understanding this. Canadians were astonished, for example, when our courts told us the Constitution says that if you are extremely intoxicated when you kill someone, you are not guilty of a crime.

While we may intend only to recognize a sociological and historical fact when we amend the Canadian Constitution to designate Quebec as a distinct society, down the road it is clearly open to the courts to affirm that the provision really confers special status and powers on one of the ten provinces, whether it is in the Constitution or in any other legislation, such as the motion which is before us today.

Why would it matter if Quebec was given special status and powers? The simple answer is that it would only intensify Canada's divisions.

First, it would violate the principle of equality. This principle is foundational to the whole characterization of Canada as a democracy, where every citizen has the same rights and the same value. It would be completely unacceptable for some Canadians to be designated as having different or greater rights, different or greater value, than others. In the past we have condemned societies that sought to operate on that tenet. We have declared the very idea repugnant. Would we now find special status for some acceptable in our country? Never.

Second, far from bringing Canadians together, such a move would segregate them and emphasize the differences between them even further. The Prime Minister will attempt to characterize the move to confer distinct society status and a constitutional veto on Quebec as an act of generosity and reconciliation.

Tolerance and kindness have long been praised as traits of the Canadian people. We would not wish to be accused of acting otherwise. However, I believe that Canadians must place reasonable limits on any exercise of generosity. Therefore, we must ask whether it is reasonable to give a separatist government, committed to breaking up the country, a veto over the Constitution of Canada. It will truly result in fundamentally redesigning Canada to give some citizens more say and a greater degree of control than all other citizens.

If a unified Canada is our goal, the only sound course of action is to pursue those issues on which Canadians agree and not those issues on which they are divided. The Reform Party's vision for a new and better Canada is guided by the founding principle of equality of provinces and citizens. It is the only sound basis on which to go forward as a confident and unified people.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am both angry and grieved this evening. I am angry because something which I value so highly, the wonderful country in which we live, is being treated with such indifference by the government. I am grieved because the principles of equality are being violated in the proposed legislation.

• (2230)

I joined the Reform Party and became a member of Parliament because of my commitment to the equality of Canadians. I cannot understand how a government can look back without seeing that the policies of the last 30 years have driven a deep wedge into this country. How can those members then conclude that wriggling around that wedge some more is now going to produce unity? That does not make sense to me.

I am very gravely angered by that. I am grieved by the fact that we are here in a Parliament where we cannot properly and openly discuss this. Whenever we bring forward ideas we get into name calling instead of honestly and openly debating the issues and the principles that are involved.

We have a parliamentary system here that does not respond. There is no mechanism in this Parliament to change what is now being proposed and what is clearly wrong. The reason is that all the members on the government side do not have the freedom to speak and to vote what they truly believe.

I cannot believe that among the 176 members on the other side, not one of them has any serious questions about this legislation. There are four members in the government from Alberta. Every one of us in the Reform Party who is from Alberta has heard from numerous constituents that there are large problems with further bifurcating this country with this kind of legislation. Surely those other four Liberal members in Alberta have heard those same messages. If they have chosen not to listen and not to represent them here because of that nasty party discipline that is exercised in the House, which makes this place ineffective, that makes me very angry. We have here a system of governance that cannot respond to a major crisis in this country because of its archaic systems.

I plead with those members opposite to use their own intelligence, their own analysis, their own convictions, their own beliefs, and stand in the face of this government. Because of their majority, they alone can do it. They are the only ones who can save this country.

If we keep on following the plan that is proposed, it is inevitable that the divisions among us will increase. In this very weak attempt to try to appease one province that has legitimate beefs and instead of listening to the legitimate beefs to offer this little appeasement carrot, they are putting at risk the unity of the whole country. They are doing that with impunity and as if they do not care.

It is a total shame. It distresses me. I really eagerly wish the Liberal members in the House would exercise principle and forget about this policy they have had of voting the way they are told. That will destroy the country.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to repeat the resolution, we are today debating the government's proposal to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

According to the resolution, this distinct society is defined as including a French speaking majority in Quebec, which is certainly distinct, since there is no other province in Canada that has such a French speaking majority; a unique culture in Quebec based on the French language, which is also unique and distinct in Canada; and a civil law system, which no other province has. These are not exclusive traits of the distinct society but simply the high marks.

Let me point out that these three distinctive features that are in the resolution were first recognized and granted by the British in the act of cession of 1763 and in the Quebec Act of 1774. These distinctive features that are attributed to Quebec in this resolution are not new. What we are doing here today is simply restating this distinctiveness in a different way in this century.

• (2235)

Distinct society does not mean superior; it means different. We have in Quebec the civil law. Those in the other provinces have the common law. Neither is superior. They are different. That is what the distinct society clause means.

The distinct society clause does not mean special status. Quebec and all provinces have some special provisions in the Constitution relating to them, and they all in some way have special status, but this is not the meaning or the purpose of the distinct society clause.

Finally, the distinct society clause does not mean more power to Quebec. Those who suggest this are being mischievous, destructive, and misleading. I found it extremely hurtful to hear one Reformer after another continually refer to this resolution as a constitutional amendment with constitutional consequences.

The source of the federal and provincial powers is in the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Constitution Act of 1982. In particular, the powers of the federal and provincial governments are in sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution of 1867. The only way those powers can be changed, abridged, increased or diminished is by a constitutional amendment. That is the only way they can be changed.

This resolution before the House is not a bill. It is a resolution. It is not a proposed constitutional amendment. To suggest otherwise is misleading the Canadian public, which almost amounts to dishonesty in the House. This is a resolution of the House of Commons. It is not a bill that will lead to legislation. It is not a proposed constitutional amendment. In no way can this resolution augment the powers of Quebec, nor can it reduce the powers of the federal government or any other province. This or another government might want to some day change those powers, but it is not doing it through this resolution.

If the purpose of this resolution is not to grant special status or to give additional power, then what is its purpose? The purpose of the resolution is to assure Quebec that despite its different language, despite its different culture and legal system, we want them with us; we honour and respect them with their uniqueness, with their differences, with their distinctiveness. It is a formal commitment by the Parliament of Canada, representing all the people of Canada, that we recognize they are distinctive and we want them as they are. We do not want to assimilate them, we do not want to blend them. Once passed, the resolution is also meant to be a guide, but it is not legally binding; it is simply a guide.

In many respects the resolution is like the great rally in Montreal on October 27. By that rally Canadians from all over the country, at great expense to themselves, came to Montreal to say they wanted Quebec to stay in Confederation, that they respected Quebecers as they are, with their differences. The rally had no legal or constitutional consequences. It did have very strong symbolic and political consequences. It is the same with this resolution before the House.

The distinct society clause is saying to Quebec that we recognize its distinct institutions and culture and because of them Canada is a better country. Its consequences are political and symbolic but extremely important, considering the atmosphere of the country today.

It makes Canada a better country because Canada with two official languages and two cultures has a great advantage over other countries. These two languages and cultures are great assets, not burdens. Unlike the United States, France, the United Kingdom, Italy, Germany and Japan, which have one official language, Canada can do business in English and French, can do diplomacy in English and French, research in English and French, write plays, novels, and poetry in English and French, produce television, films, and songs in English and French. It has great universities, libraries and centres of research in English and French.

This resolution alone will not do the job, but with the veto bill it is a very good start to assuring Quebecers that we accept them as they are with these differences referred to in the resolution and we want them to stay with us.

I urge Canadians and I urge my colleagues in the House to put themselves for one moment in the shoes of French speaking Quebecers. Here we have an island of approximately 8 million francophones in a North American sea of about 350 million anglophones. Put yourself in that same situation. Reverse the languages. We have 8 million anglophones in a sea of 350 million francophones. They see this situation as putting their language and culture at risk, their distinct language and culture threatened by the overwhelming majority of the anglophone provinces and of the population of North America.

Under the Quebec Act of 1774, French speaking Quebecers were the majority in that state, although it was a British colony. Under the Constitution of 1791, with Upper Canada and Lower Canada, it was one to one: the French Canadians were equal in population more or less with the Upper Canadians. It was the same under the act of the union; up until 1867 it was Upper Canada and Lower Canada.

Now they are one out of ten provinces and they are a much smaller percentage of the total population. Would my colleagues try to understand this situation, put themselves in the shoes of the French Canadians in Quebec? Try to understand how they might believe with great credibility that their unique institutions would be at risk in that situation.

That is why assurances are required, and the distinct society clause is such an assurance. I urge my colleagues to give it some thought and support it.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, there are two members who wish to speak further. We are supposed to stop at 11 p.m. I wonder if the two members who wish to speak could either divide the time or we could not see the clock until each is finished. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Not seeing the clock is fine.

The Deputy Speaker: Not seeing the clock is acceptable.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): If my hon. friend from Esquimalt cannot see the clock, I can understand it at this hour. I am sure he and I would be happy to share our time.

In spite of the remarks that were made by some of the predecessors from his party who suggested that those of us on this side of the House were speaking because we felt we had to vote a certain way with the government, let me assure the other members in the House that when we rise to speak on this question we are speaking from the profound desire of Canadians to speak for our country, to speak of how we understand our country and what we are trying to achieve. We may have our differences, but we must understand that together we must try to determine what is right about our country.

As the great prime minister of this country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said many years ago, elections decide everything and answer nothing. The referendum is somewhat like that. It made a decision. It decided that Quebec was to stay in Canada, but it did not answer the question as to under what conditions it is to stay in Canada. It did not answer many of the fundamental questions we are obliged as parliamentarians to review.

I believe profoundly and seriously that the Prime Minister's initiative is not a constitutional initiative but is a realistic initiative. It corresponds to the aspirations of Quebecers. It is a solemn undertaking by this federal House and our executive to be guided in its decisions by a recognition of Quebec's unique culture, linguistic characteristics, and civil law traditions.

[Translation]

When we come to this House, we all do so with our various experiences as individuals and Canadians. I was born in Montreal but grew up in British Columbia, in Vancouver. Most of my family still lives in Vancouver.

• (2245)

I visit regularly. I consider myself a westerner in a way, although I now live in Toronto. I had the opportunity and the privilege of teaching at the University of Montreal and at McGill University. So, I also consider myself a Quebecer.

When I look at the history of Quebec since 1774, since the Quebec Act, since our colleagues rejected Lord Durham's proposal to submerge Quebecers in an English ocean, so to speak, when I look at the history of my country, I see great French Canadians like Cartier, Laurier, Saint–Laurent, Trudeau and Chrétien, federalist Quebecers faithful to their people and convinced that federalism is the best way to protect their people's existence. On what basis?

Because the province of Quebec has a distinct identity. There is a distinctiveness that makes it different from the rest of Canada. There is Bill 101 which protects the French language in Quebec. Quebec controls immigration to the province, which is not the case in other provinces. Internationally, and I have a particular interest as chairman of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs, Quebec, with its membership in the francophonie and its privileged relationship with France, is seen as different from the other provinces.

We can say that, in terms of protecting French culture and the French language in North America, for reasons already mentioned by the previous speaker, Quebec already has a different identity, a kind of distinct society. It is a very important asset for us in the rest of Canada. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell made an emotional speech the other day about protecting the French language outside Quebec and he really convinced me that I as an Ontarian had a duty to protect the distinct identity and distinct society of Quebec.

[English]

I speak as an Ontarian. Can we say as Ontarians and as British Columbians that we have an interest in protecting a distinct society in Quebec? Does the existence of a francophone majority within a province in Canada enrich the cultural and political life of the country in a way that enables us to be distinct and different?

This is an extraordinary and complex subject. We can say that our colleagues who have spoken earlier in the House are right when they say that British Columbians are distinct. Of course this is true. We are all distinct.

However speaking as I do, coming from Toronto, we recognize that our culture in North America will only survive in the face of North American television and the enormous pressures in which we live on the north–south pole, whether they are economic, environmental or cultural, if we live beside Quebec which is part of us, enriches us and gives us a specificity that sets us apart. We as Ontarians are different because we have Quebec as a distinct society beside us. We as Ontarians live in a country that is bilingual, bicultural and bi–juridical.

I have had experience as a young lawyer travelling outside the country. One of my great advantages was to work as a Canadian in international conferences. People were able to say to me: "You represent a country that represents the civil law and common law traditions. You represent a country which has the Gaelic traditions and the Anglo–Saxon traditions. You are able to act as a bridge in this new world, this interdependent world in which we live. You are able to participate in this world in a way that is different from Americans, British, French and anyone else in the world", precisely because we are Canadians and precisely because we are enriched by the presence of the distinct society of Quebec which forms a part of ourselves. We do not need to reject it. It enriches our experience. We are able to be what we are because we have Quebec as a part of us. We would be poorer if we did not. We would be poorer if we did not have Quebec as a distinct society.

• (2250)

Looking into the 21st century we must recognize that we will be challenged as a people. Whether we come from British Columbia, Alberta, the maritimes, Ontario or Quebec, we will be challenged to adapt to enormously changing conditions. In the course of those changes our adaptation, our flexibility and our ability to be something different will be precisely due to the fact that we have been able to share together, to partner together with our colleagues in Quebec a linguistic and cultural experience that means we can live and make something work in the country that is different from anything else.

That is why I argue with my colleagues in favour of the distinct society. I respect their difference of opinion. I ask them to respect ours. This is not some political vote. This is a strong belief of people.

Mr. Epp: How about inequality?

Mr. Graham: There is no suggestion of inequality, as my colleague suggests. Distinct society is not a special status. In recognizing Quebec as a distinct society we do not diminish ourselves. We enrich ourselves. This is not a suggestion of superiority. This is a suggestion of a recognition of a difference with which we live and with which we enrich ourselves by adapting and making a part of our culture.

[Translation]

I realize my time is almost up. I want to say that in Ontario, we have a very large francophone community, whose survival depends on the existence of a distinct society in Quebec. A society that contributes to the enrichment of our society in Ontario and to the existence of an Ontario that is distinct from the United States, and I want to say to this House that the existence of Canada as a distinct society hinges on our recognizing Quebec as a distinct society.

[English]

I will repeat that in English as I believe it very strongly. The existence of Canada and the future of Canada as a distinct society depend upon our willingness to recognize the existence of Quebec as a distinct society within us. That will be our strength. That will be our future. That will be the future of Canada.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a basic principle in a democratic society is the principle of equality for all of its individuals. This principle is being abrogated and trashed by the motion the government is putting forth to give the distinct society clause to one province.

The principle of equality is something that Canada stands for, Canadians have fought for and Canadians have died for. It is the basic tenet of our country and one that this party and Canadians outside Quebec will not stand by and allow to be broken apart.

Canada stands as a beacon of hope on the planet. It stands as a beacon of hope in the global community, a hope for equality, peace and tolerance. That is what Canada stands for. Yet the course the government is taking is abrogating that and violates the very principle of equality we stand for.

Rather than leading us down the road of unity, it is leading us down the road to disunity. The government is balkanizing the very country that stands as a beacon of hope for unity and tolerance that is held up by the rest of the world.

• (2255)

The recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is not a benign statement. Rather, it enables one province to have special status over others. It is first step toward including it in the Constitution. Some may argue that it is benign and necessary, but that flies in the face of equality for all Canadians.

It enhances Quebec's group rights as opposed to the individual rights of Quebecers. It would enable an aggressive Quebec provincial government to abrogate its responsibilities and trample the rights of the minorities within Quebec. Statements by various separatist leaders after the referendum led us to believe nothing else than the fact that some of them were racist.

Furthermore, the province of Quebec with the distinct society could supplant federal policies by using the argument that Quebec is one half of Canada and the remainder is the other half. It could manipulate federal policies based on that. It is highly iniquitous because Canada is made up of ten provinces, not two groups.

Unfortunately this and previous governments have not engaged in the process of trying to bring Canada together. They have engaged in the process of appeasement. There are some glaring examples.

The federal government gives Quebec $7 billion a year. Ottawa has transferred $160 billion to Quebec over the last 30 years.

Quebec has three seats on the Supreme Court of Canada.

Quebec has been allowed to use the notwithstanding clause to step on the rights of anglophones within that province. Would Quebec tolerate the rest of Canada using the notwithstanding clause to do the same thing? I do not think so. Neither would the rest of Canada.

The rest of Canada has not been trampling on the rights of Quebecers. Rather, it has been engaging in the process of appeasement. Quite frankly the people in the rest of Canada are fed up and will simply not tolerate this any longer. That is why a distinct society with a veto is intolerable to the rest of Canada. We are hearing, sadly, the nascency of separation in the rest of Canada. That is not something about which we should be proud.

We are witnessing a tragedy. Canada is being fractured into many different groups. People are talking about Canada in a defeatist fashion. They are saying we have no vision, no direction, no identity and no culture. Some would say that Canada is like a rudderless boat in the ocean, buffeted around by circumstances beyond her control.

I do not accept that. Canada has an identity. Canada has a soul. Canada is strong. Canada has courage as we see in our peacekeepers. Canada has culture as we see in Celine Dion and the Group of Seven. Canada has made scientific contributions through Dr. Fraser Mustard.

Canada has strength in its people, in their everyday actions. That is what has made Canada the great country it is today. They are the heroes of Canada. That is the identity of Canada and that is why it is held in such high esteem throughout the world. It is our identity. It is very clear to those who have travelled to other parts of the world. We are not some benign, opaque country without an identity. We are a great country.

Essential to the unity of a country is the concept that every citizen is equal. We are not first anglophones or francophones, Quebecers or British Columbians, Afro–Canadians or Indo–Canadians. Above all else we are simply Canadians. The hyphenated Canadianism we have pursued does not bring us together with our differences; it divides us. Our differences, whether they be language or culture, do not need to ghettoize us. Rather, our differences are something we can cherish. Our differences bind us together as citizens and as human beings in a common humanity.

It irritates me to no end and gets me very angry and also saddens me to see our differences used as a way of separating us instead of bringing us together. We need to change that now. It requires strong leadership for us to do this.

To the Prime Minister, stop negotiating with the separatist leaders because you will not win. It is a futile action. Bring your principles of equality, your principles of understanding and tolerance directly to the people on the ground in Quebec and the rest of Canada. Both need to heal. Both need to come together and both need to understand each other. You must have again as the basis of your decisions equality for all.

Constitutional changes must not go to the politicians. They must not go to the provinces. They must go directly to the people. Constitutional changes must go to a binding national referendum, to all Canadians, as it affects us all. It seems the government lacks the belief in the people of this country that they would uphold tolerance and respect for each other in the decisions they make.

The rest of Canada and I am sure the people of Quebec want nothing more than to be treated as equals. They want nothing more than to live their culture and their language. If we give culture and language directly to the provinces, as we must, the people of Quebec would be the masters of their own cultural and linguistic destinies.

That is what they ask for. That is what they must have. That is also what the rest of Canada must have. The message we send to the people of Quebec and the rest of Canada is this. We stand here today simply as proud Canadians with a history, Canadians with a future based on our differences, based on what binds us together, based on respect and tolerance for each other.

It is not a fantasy. It is something we can pursue and achieve. All it requires is leadership from here, leadership in the community and for all of us to work together to raise Canada to the truly great height it can reach.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 57, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 12th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Pursuant to the order of reference of Monday, December 4, 1995 the committee has considered Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, and the committee has agreed to report it without amendment.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 18th report of the standing committee on public accounts, pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(d). The committee reviewed chapter VI of the May 1995 auditor general's report and is now reporting on this chapter, which concerns federal transportation subsidies, and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program in particular.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report.

[English]

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 107th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs in relation to the operating budget and the vote structure in the estimates.

Treasury Board officials presented a document entitled "Operating Budget and the Vote Structure". This document explains the reasons for altering an aspect of the votes in the estimates and proposes that a new operating expenditures vote be introduced for the 1996–97 main estimates. The new vote would contain items of minor capital expenditure currently included in separate capital votes. Parliament would be presented with a more accurate view of the way departments and agencies expend the funds which are allocated to them. The proposed change is an interim measure that will be in place until the government adopts a new accounting system.

Officials of the office of the auditor general have advised the subcommittee of the procedure and House affairs committee that the change being proposed by the Treasury Board Secretariat is largely administrative in nature and that it is designed to make it easier to manage government departments and agencies. The subcommittee was assured that Parliament's ability to scrutinize and approve the expenditure plans of the government would not be diminished by a change of this kind.

I am pleased to present the report. There is no need for concurrence, Mr. Speaker, as it is simply for the information of members.

PETITIONS

LAND MINES

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of people all over Canada, I would like to present a petition which calls on Parliament to enact legislation to prohibit Canadian involvement in the international proliferation of land mine production.

PEACE TAX

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition from constituents of my riding that I would like to present which calls for the establishment of peace tax legislation by passing into law a private member's bill entitled the conscientious objection act.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a third petition which calls on Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ALLOTTED DAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA LAND CLAIMS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.) moved:

> That the House urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the current provincial government mandate in order to respect the views of British Columbians on this issue as expressed by both major provincial opposition parties.

He said: Madam Speaker, the Reform Party had concerns about this matter before today. For example, on October 30 I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question. On November 27 I asked a similar question of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I have also pursued this same subject in committee.

• (1010)

The question I put to the minister on October 30 concerned the polls in British Columbia which now rate aboriginal issues as the number one issue. Among the provincial political parties, there certainly is a growing divergence of views on aboriginal issues. We now have an NDP administration which is in the waning days of its mandate.

The question I put to the minister was whether he would assure the House that he will not entertain completion of any comprehensive agreement, such as the Nisga'a claim, until there is a new provincial administration with a fresh mandate. The response from the minister included the fact that the Reform member was asking not to do anything until the non–Nisga'a government changed in British Columbia and he certainly was not prepared to do that.

In addition, there is a major divergence of opinion on costs which was a supplementary to that question. The provincial government says that the cost of settling claims in British Columbia will be about $10 billion and the federal government says it will be about $5 billion. This divergence of views is something of which we should take note. We are talking billions not millions.

On November 27 my question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans dealt with the apparent intended agreement on the Nass. I say apparent intended because everything is based on leaks. We do not have open negotiations. We do not have transparency. The only things we know are based on leaks. However, there apparently is an agreement to include some of the Nass fishery in the Nisga'a agreement. I wanted the minister's assurance that the Nass River commercial fishery would not be entrenched in a treaty which would then get further entrenched constitutionally, and be unchangeable, socially divisive and the very opposite of free enterprise. Once again, I received no substantive response from the minister.

This is no longer an emerging issue in British Columbia. This is an established issue. The transformation happened over the last three years. It is considered to be an issue which has gone off the track. Public concerns are driving a re–examination of all of the basic assumptions underlying the treaty or land claims process in British Columbia.

I can give a thumbnail summary of some of these concerns. This issue has tremendous long term implications and ramifications; socially, financially and in other ways. The issue has parallels with B.C. concerns about what many call the disunity bill that the House has been debating very recently and where we have seen closure adopted. There are many parallels here. It invokes, for example, special status, whereas the public is demanding the principle of equality.

The whole question of public ratification of the government's aboriginal initiative has not been sought. This has all been done within a cloistered environment. Neither the provincial nor federal governments has involved the public in establishing the goals and objectives of the treaty process in British Columbia.

At this time I should give a background to the negotiations going on in B.C. The Nisga'a negotiations have been going on for many years and a framework agreement was signed in March 1991. There are many who say that the openness associated with this agreement was really closed off in 1991. That is a very self–serving analysis of the agreement by some of the bureaucracy and by some government parties.

• (1015)

Clause 7.1.1 of the agreement states:

> The parties will, together, develop and implement a process of public information and consultation and will attend meetings with such selected individuals, organizations or groups as they may agree will assist in the process of public consensus building.

It is a real stretch to suggest that any of that in terms of the Nisga'a negotiations has occurred. The Nisga'a agreement is the closest to completion in the province and is a major focus of today's opposition motion.

There are some major concerns which are front and centre with the Nisga'a negotiations. One is the Nass River fishery which I have already mentioned. This is a public resource. Last week there were five British Columbia aboriginal fishery test cases argued in the Supreme Court.

There is an outstanding class action suit from commercial fishermen involving the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The outcome, if anything, would appear to rule against an aboriginal right to a commercial fishery.

This is not so much an issue of allocation of commercial licences. It is an issue of treaty entrenchment leading to constitutional entrenchment and protection of a commercial aboriginal fishery which would be in many people's minds and in my mind socially divisive and the antithesis of free enterprise.

Another major concern deals with costs. If we look at the costs involved in the Nisga'a agreement, once again we are dealing only with leaks. We never know where these leaks originate. They may be self–serving leaks, they may not be. This is one of the problems with the lack of transparency.

I put out a press release in November. I talked about some of the statements which have been made very recently on the Nisga'a offer and which were reported in the popular press. Back in March when I was doing a series of town hall meetings in British Columbia, I had taken the known offer of the day and extrapolated it to British Columbia using the Nisga'a example as a precedent. I said that the total compensation package would work out to $8.5 billion. At that time the Reform Party was accused of extrapolating figures from various sources in order to scare the British Columbia public.

In October the minister of aboriginal affairs of the province of B.C. said publicly that the cost of land claim settlements in British Columbia would be $10 billion. According to the leaks, the Nisga'a offer had grown between March and October. This is consistent with what I was saying back in March.

According to the latest leaks in the Nisga'a offer we are talking about a turnover of 2,200 square kilometres of land, a significant forest resource, $175 million cash and 30 per cent of the Nass River fishery. I might point out that other bands also have claims on part of the Nass River fishery.

• (1020)

When we talk about this total cost package of $10 billion as stated by the provincial minister, at the same time the director general from the federal ministry said that he was baffled by the number and said that the cost of the settlement was closer to $5 billion. Either he knows something we do not know or I know not what. Maybe he is only talking about the federal component. According to the way I calculate it, it is about a 50:50 split provincially and federally. That is a very significant difference and one that should concern the public and the government.

Against the backdrop of these Nisga'a precedent setting background negotiations, we also have the B.C. treaty process. We talked about that in the House not too long ago with Bill C–107 the enabling legislation from the federal end to set up the B.C. Treaty Commission.

The Nisga'a negotiations are not part of the B.C. treaty process in terms of the treaty commission. They predate it and are not subject to the same terms of reference. The B.C. Treaty Commission has only been in place since 1993.

An estimated 77 per cent of the British Columbia bands are currently involved in the process. There is a total of 196 bands in British Columbia. The other 23 per cent of British Columbia bands are not part of the B.C. treaty process and they have no other option. They either go with this process or they are left out. This is problematic for that other 23 per cent.

In July 1993 the federal and provincial governments announced the establishment of a treaty negotiation advisory committee. They have also set up regional advisory committees in each treaty negotiation area to represent public and local interests. There is much public and participant unhappiness about the consultation process and about the ratification process at this time.

If a band enters into the B.C. treaty process it receives 80 per cent funding repayable upon completion of negotiations. In effect this is a loan. The Nisga'a negotiations on the other hand are 100 per cent paid for by the federal government.

I have other concerns. The municipal level of government is not recognized in any of this. There is simply a sidebar arrangement through the provincial negotiators. Right now their intervenor funding or advisory funding or whatever we want to call it is capped at $250,000 a year. It comes from the province.

The municipalities have many concerns about this. Some of the municipalities are dealing with multiple claims. Their costs are far and away exceeding the compensation they are receiving. They are caught up in this process, not through their own doing but they cannot afford not to be there. Their interests are certainly affected.

There are no readiness guidelines to the regional advisory committee boards. They are not in the terms of reference of the treaty commission. This has also proved to be very problematical.

Interim agreements have been negotiated at the provincial level. This has also compromised the B.C. Treaty Commission process. This was identified by the B.C. Treaty Commission in its 1993 annual report. That is as far as it can go. The commission can identify it but it cannot deal with it unless one or the other or both levels of government agree to do something about it.

Governments have lost their mandate in those parts of the province most familiar with and closest to the settlement process. There has been some movement toward openness and other things to which the federal Reform has contributed. We have done some things to open up the public process. In March we had an aboriginal town hall series in the province. We covered eight communities in 11 nights province wide. In a separate exercise we set out through a 10–month process new aboriginal policy initiatives. They were very well received in British Columbia and were considered to be very refreshing.

• (1025)

Much of what we were saying in March was common sense, bottom up thinking which had not been reflected before in B.C. political circles. Now much of what we have said is mainstream political dialogue in British Columbia. Issues being talked about are an end to the Indian taxation exemption and certainly a focus on not entrenching commercial activities in B.C. treaties.

We have done more as a federal opposition party to open up this process than the B.C. Treaty Commission and both levels of government combined. The treaty commission is hampered by its mandate and the governments are still locked into an agenda they foresaw three years ago.

The layers of bureaucracy surrounding this process are leading to inevitable massive gridlock. Unless the governments obtain a publicly ratified negotiating mandate, the public will never accept the terms and conditions which are being negotiated. This will foster further disharmony and misgivings.

We are not objecting to a fair, open and complete conclusion to the process, but we do have a problem with the status quo arrangement. People are begging for leadership to break the binds of the status quo and they are not seeing it forthcoming. We are trying to fill that void. The manner and the approach currently being pursued is intrinsically wrong. It is neither enlightened nor receptive. Therefore, people conclude they are being manipulated and that the process is entrenched and resistant to change, despite mounting opposition.

One might ask what the provincial opposition parties are saying. I can talk a little bit about a B.C. Liberal government. It is talking about instituting a series of public hearings and free votes in the legislature; initiating public consultation on a principal framework for treaty negotiations; and developing a set of guidelines that would have to be approved by the legislature with the approval of MLAs who would be free to vote without following party lines.

A second step would be to set up new negotiating teams that would include local non–Indian representation. The next stage would be to send any agreements to public hearings. The final stage would be to take this back to the legislature through another free vote of MLAs.

The B.C. Reform Party is saying many things about this whole process. It does say we must offer to negotiate treaties because it is the right thing to do. The goal of treaties should be to lift the yoke of the Indian Act off the backs of native people. Further, they must own their own reserve lands and govern their own affairs within the context of the Constitution and B.C. laws. Treaties negotiated should not aspire to the false promise of native sovereignty. The principle of equality is central to our support for treaty talks.

A Reform government would insist upon renegotiating the cost sharing agreement as a precondition for B.C.'s ongoing participation in land claims negotiations. It would reject constitutional entrenchment of the inherent right of self–government, would reject a third order of government enshrined under the Constitution, would reject formal recognition of aboriginal title, and would define the meaning and scope of aboriginal rights, title and self–government. That is what treaty negotiations are all about. It would seek a clear negotiating mandate from the people, not the politicians.

If treaties confer special rights, they must first pass muster with the majority. Any deal that purports to accord special status will not pass public scrutiny in their opinion. Treaties should be aimed at removing barriers based on race, not at entrenching new inequalities.

• (1030)

In conclusion, given the importance of the issue, the costs of the issue, the social implications and the permanence of this, there is absolutely no way an outgoing government should be binding the public. I urge in the strongest possible terms for government to respect this position.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Once the minister of Indian affairs has completed his remarks I would like to invoke Standing Order 43(2) so that subsequent Liberal speakers will be sharing their time.

I also wish to seek unanimous consent to revert to the tabling of reports by standing committees. I understand that a report was unavailable earlier and that there is all–party consent to do that at the present time, which will only take a moment.

Mr. Duncan: Madam Speaker, I am anticipated to be at the aboriginal affairs standing committee to finalize a report on co–management. Am I subject to a 10–minute question and answer period? If so, could we do that first?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Questions and comments, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I do appreciate the chance to question the member on some of the things he has said. As a fellow MP from British Columbia, I share his concern that aboriginal issues are getting short shrift, especially here in Parliament by the government and the minister who seem to think, as with so many other issues, they have a made in Ottawa solution to what is really a problem affecting primarily B.C.

B.C. is the area that is not covered by treaties within the country. Depending on who we believe, it is a $5 billion to $10 billion question. It is a huge issue, which even touches on the Constitution, where rights are entrenched and different rights are given to different people. It is a big issue in British Columbia. The government should take heed that this issue is something that also could be very divisive in the country if it is not handled and settled properly.

Last week I was home on Friday and attended a public meeting where the chief federal negotiator for the southern half of the province gave a talk on the progress to date of the aboriginal land claim settlements. Afterwards we had a question and answer period. During that time I said there are three things I think people are saying they want to see happen in this federal negotiation for eventual settlement of the land claims. First, they want finality to any agreements. They do not want any leap–frogging ability and they do not want anybody to be able to reopen these cases in the future. When the deal is settled they want it settled for good. In other words, we do not want to do this again 10 years from now.

Second, they say they want any deal they make with aboriginal communities in order to settle outstanding land claims to reinforce the idea of equality rather than inequality, hyphenated Canadians. If it does not lead to that equality in taxation and before the law, I do not think British Columbians are going to support it.

Third, I asked the negotiator what his specific instructions are when it comes to the bottom line. In other words, how much money are we talking here? Are we talking $10 billion or are we talking $5 billion or $1 billion? The rumour mill is rampant. Mr. Cashore, the minister in British Columbia, has thrown out a $10 billion figure. His response was you hate it as a negotiator when somebody starts throwing out those figures because it makes it so difficult to have negotiations. He says that hidden away in his vault is an envelope with some kind of figure inside concerning how many dollars we are talking about because there is no openness in this process and we are dealing with rumours of rumours. I wonder if the hon. member could comment on those three things, about the finality or the extinguishment clause that should be in these agreements, on the principle of moving toward equality of all Canadians and because the minister will not give us anything, if he has any idea what kind of a bottom line we are looking at when it comes to settlement of British Columbia land claim issues.

• (1035)

Mr. Duncan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about the finality of these agreements. In many cases there is a major disagreement in the aboriginal political leadership concerning this concept. One of the concerns I have about the finality of these agreements is that there is a word that is no longer used within hearing of the minister of Indian affairs. That word is extinguishment.

One of the first agreements that came before the 35th Parliament, in terms of aboriginal agreements, was the Sahtu agreement in the western Arctic. There is certainly extinguishment within that agreement. When the major native spokesman for the Sahtu was at the committee hearings, he was asked about that clause. He said that was a natural quid pro quo or a trade–off for the other things that the Sahtu were receiving in exchange for an extinguishment of the aboriginal interest in lands outside of the settlement area.

That is fine and dandy but the expectation has now been delivered by the current government that no, that is not the case any more and we are quite prepared to reopen all of these old negotiations. The government is raising expectations at a time when it has not even fulfilled bottom line expectations. It keeps raising the ceiling on something that does not have a foundation at this point.

This is most inappropriate and it is certainly not something on which the public has been well informed, nor is it something that I believe the public wants to accept. It is like a never–ending set of negotiations and everything once negotiated can be reopened at any time. That is not appropriate.

The second question dealt with equality. This is probably demonstrated most clearly in the fact that the taxation exemption is becoming more and more of a problem in more and more locations across Canada. I are not talking about just British Columbia in this case.

While other Canadians are taxed to the max there is a portion of the native population that is insulated from most forms of taxation. These are the people living on reserves. Perhaps this cannot be changed overnight but we have to move in that direction.

Another major concern is that the governments be democratic and accountable with checks and balances that go far beyond the checks and balances of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The lives of many people living on reserves are being regulated by one department. That becomes very problematic. If we had multiple jurisdictions that would be fine.

We are finding that what resonates with the public is a municipal style of self–government as being an appropriate model. We have an example in the Sechelt Band, in my riding.

• (1040)

The final question posed deals with the cost and the negotiating mandate. The negotiating mandate provincially and federally, the way it sits right now, is a cabinet secret known only to the federal and/or provincial negotiators. Public ratification of that negotiating mandate is a major shift in thinking that has gone on and something that is being asked for more and more and something we promote.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given that the 10 minutes have now expired, I wonder if we could ask for unanimous consent to revert to the tabling of reports by standing committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is this agreeable to everyone?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table today the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration.

I thank members of the House for their unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois presented a minority report on the issue of immigration counsellors. This is a very serious issue. We agree with the diagnosis: we are indeed confronted with a serious problem. Some counsellors are good, but the ethics of others are questionable.

But we differ on the constitutional issue, since we maintain that it is up to the provinces, and not to the federal government, to regulate trades and professions. That is the reason behind our minority report.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA LAND CLAIMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to rise again in the House to address this resolution. However, the motion has no thought behind it and therefore gives no idea of its consequences. I do not even know why we are entertaining such a motion. I honestly feel that we are not doing our job here debating it.

This motion, as it is written, goes against the very democratic fabric of Canadian society. Basically it asks the federal government to stop doing business with a duly elected majority provincial government. If we were to stop conducting business with the current government in British Columbia we would be insulting the majority of British Columbians who voted for this government.

Perhaps this is not the intent of the motion. Perhaps the intent of the motion is even more appalling. Perhaps the opposition party does not want the government to continue doing business with the duly elected government in British Columbia and not do business with the aboriginal people in British Columbia.

What is it we are debating here? Are we debating whether the provincial government has a valid mandate or are we debating a motion based on race? If race is the issue, perhaps we can ask the hon. members of the opposition if they have any particular wishes regarding Sikhs in British Columbia, the Chinese people in B.C. or other minority groups, or are they just willing to continue this debate on aboriginal people in B.C.?

I might remind hon. members that the negotiations to create the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were conducted in 1904, four years into the mandate of the second Laurier government. Would the hon. member have wanted these talks to be put on hold because the federal government was facing an election the next year? The second world war began four years into the mandate of Mackenzie King in 1935. Did Parliament say that it could not get involved because the Prime Minister had to go to the polls? In 1956, the last year of the St. Laurent government, the UN emergency force was created, thanks to the work of Lester Pearson. He won the Nobel prize for his efforts.

If the hon. member for North Island—Powell River had been sitting in the House back then he would have said: "I object. Canada cannot enter into such an important international commitment, not with just one year left in the government's mandate".

Let us look at the history of treaty negotiations with the aboriginal peoples. Treaty 7 was signed in 1877. The Macdonald government had been in office since January 1874. It faced an election. It would come in the fall of 1878. Was there any question then that the government had no mandate to sign? Of course not.

• (1045)

Treaty No. 8 was signed in 1899 when the Laurier government had been in office for three years. It would go to the polls the following year.

In our time, the James Bay agreement was signed a year before the end of the Quebec Liberal government.

Would the hon. member for North Island—Powell River be prepared to defer his authority on votes on issues that come before the House because the other parties in his constituency have not nominated their candidates yet or have nominated them but there has not been an election yet? Of course he would not.

Let us not hear any more self–righteousness from the Reform Party with its claims that it speaks for the people. The people elected the hon. member for North Island—Powell River on October 25, 1993, just as the people of Sault Ste. Marie elected me to come here.

Why have a Parliament at all? Why not just have an office where public pollsters send their findings to the bureaucrats? If that is the argument of the hon. member for North Island—Powell River, I invite him to give up his seat, go back home, take up his old job and do something worth while.

The First Nations in British Columbia have waited 200 years to reach agreements. Most have never had an opportunity to sign an agreement outlining their rights. That is an historic anomaly in Canada which the Liberal government inherited from the leader of the Reform Party of B.C. He was a minister in the Social Credit government that signed an agreement with the Nisga'a. He was on the committee that pushed the B.C. treaty process.

What do Reform members have to say about that? What have they said to the leader of the Reform Party of B.C.? Is he not a little embarrassed by the Reform Party in Ottawa about all his work and efforts of the past? I commend him. He at least had the courage to do something for aboriginal people.

In 1990 Premier Vander Zalm reversed a longstanding position of the province of British Columbia which held that aboriginal rights had been extinguished prior to B.C.'s entry into Confederation, or if the rights did exist they were the exclusive responsibility of the federal government. That has changed the climate out there. Premier Vander Zalm said: "You have been sitting there with the Nisga'a for 15 years by yourself. We will do these things. We will get some certainty for B.C."

The current government came into office in October 1993. We opened the doors in December 1993. Since that time 70 per cent of the just under 200 First Nations in B.C. have been at the table. They are doing it our way. They are saying: "We will trust you white people once more. We will not build roadblocks. We will come to the negotiating table". And this is the way they are treated.

The Reform Party has not voted for one piece of aboriginal legislation in the House in two years, except in the one instance when it benefited an oil company. When an oil company could make a profit vis–à–vis aboriginal people, the Reform Party voted unanimously in favour of it. That party says it will speak for the people, that it will come here with an open mind and not vote like a bunch of sheep.

Last week 42 Reform members showed up in the House to vote against the B.C. treaty process, the enabling legislation which allows us to sit down with the First Nations. Yet Reformer members stand every day to denounce Adams Lake and the Penticton blockade. So do we, but the difference is that we are prepared to sit down with the First Nations people. What I hear today is that the Reform Party will not even sit down with the First Nations people to negotiate.

I once said that the House of Commons in many instances sounds like the ill informed conversing with the ill intentioned on any given day. For the first time today I heard the ill informed conversing with the ill intentioned of the same party when they questioned each other.

I will give the Reform Party some correct information. Reformers said vis–à–vis the Nisga'a that we gave them money for negotiations. That is incorrect. It is based on loans 100 per cent. The people who are supposed to know the issues out there said that in the House.

• (1050)

Let me go back and refer to some of the history. I am in cabinet representing the poorest of the poor people in the country. Most of the time I am on my knees and my colleagues know that.

Just before the election when we were hoping to be elected, we said that the Pearson airport deal was illegal and immoral and that if we were elected we would reverse it. Why? We alleged there were a lot of people making a lot of money. There was a lot of lobbying and a lot of money being made by lobbyists. A few weeks before the election we came into the House and who defended the lobbyists and voted against the legislation? It was the Reform Party.

Reformers should think about what they are doing today vis–à–vis aboriginal people and what the Reform Party did in the protection of lobbyists on the Pearson airport deal. Reformers are saying today that there may be an election a year from now because the opposition parties are opposed to dealing with the poorest of the poor. However they will stand here righteously two weeks before an election and defend the right of lobbyists to make a bundle of money. It gives Canadians an idea of the priorities of that party.

They say: "Let us have a referendum". This is much the same. It is another way of saying we should have a referendum. I remember last year when this was placed before the Prime Minister as an important issue. They said: "Let us have a referendum". The Prime Minister said: "It is our job to make decisions and if we do them well we will be re–elected; if we do not we will be turfed". When will Reformers learn that, as we did in 1984? Reformers will learn that because the public is coming to understand the Reform Party.

Reformers thought they were the party that would talk about fiscal responsibility and bring a new spirit to the House. Instead they found a party that lusted badly for power. It had such an anti–francophone bias they were willing to destroy the country on a fraudulent question to which the answer was yes by 50 per cent plus one. It shows the public the bias of the Reform Party. It shows the public how badly the Reform Party leader wants to be Prime Minister of Canada, that he would do that, destroy the country on a 50 per cent plus one response to a fraudulent question.

I sat here and I listened. I have waited two years and listened to aboriginal bashing from the Reform Party. Some Reform members actually go out and talk to aboriginal people, an insignificant portion of that group that is deserving of respect. An insignificant number of Reformers know what the Reform Party is doing, and that it is wrong.

After two years the Reform Party has an interim policy on aboriginal issues, but it did not talk to the aboriginal people. The leader of the Reform Party says that they did not. I do not know if they could not find them; there are a million and a half aboriginal people out there. There are 608 reserves. There are 50 tribal councils. Where was the consultation? It did not exist.

A key member of the committee that devised this is the member for Athabasca who said, and it is there in two papers: "What is this treaty? The treaty process is a fraud". We negotiated in good faith and now they are saying it is a fraud. "We defeated these people". I notice an uneasiness on the face of Reformers because those with a conscience know that what that member said was wrong. He was a member of the committee that devised this. He said: "If we did not defeat them, why did they allow themselves to go to small, worthless reserves?"

There are only two ways of looking at it. We said the treaty was honourable. We made these agreements and told them in B.C. that some day we would get to them. We finished the numbered treaties at Edmonton, Alberta. We said we would with the honour of the crown and the honour of Canadians sit down with them. Or, we can take the attitude of the member for Athabasca, a member of the Reform Party. I refuse to use a name in the House again unless I put the party behind it. The member for Athabasca is a member of the Reform Party. He said: "We beat these people. We beat them into the ground. That is why they are on small reserves. This treaty process is a fraud. Rebut that".

Then I heard another member of the Reform Party say that he knows all about reserves, that those people live in a south seas environment—I was in the House that day—and the men go around burning women with cigarettes. That is the most atrocious, ill informed, ignorant comment I have ever heard about aboriginal people. That was from the Reform Party.

Now we have the B.C. treaty process and Reformers do not even want us to go to the table and after 200 years do the honourable thing. What they would rather do is stand here and have us sing O Canada. At the same time they will say: "Side with the separatists". I see no difference. I see different geography but I do not see any difference with the separatists facing me or the separatists from western Canada to my far right.

They would say to the Prime Minister that they want the country dismantled on a 50 per cent plus one vote in Quebec on a fraudulent question. They say that day after day all week. Yet what did they waste the time of the House on last week? A crest. They would destroy the country but keep the crest. They can have their crest but I want my country. It will never be saved by the Reform Party.

This is the new insight. Let us process the situation. We have the Reformers' position on francophones. We can take them out of the equation of what is the Reform Party. We know their non–position on women. If I were a woman, I would be a little concerned. We know their position on immigration. They are for immigration but not to Canada. If I were an immigrant, I would be concerned. If I were a nationalist and wanted to keep the country together, I would be concerned. If I were a lobbyist, I would like that party. If I had big money invested in the Pearson airport, I would like that party.

What do we have left after we strip the philosophy of that party? Not much. That party stood here and told the Yukon Indians that the negotiations with them would never work. They came here. They stood in the House in their costumes. It was one of the proudest moments of our party. It is working. Yet the Reform Party said the Manitoba dismantling would not work.

I get a rough time in Manitoba from the media, and rightly so. Last week the Manitoba media reported:

> In Manitoba, Grand Chief Phil Fontaine and the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs are currently negotiating one of the most progressive, daring and risky self–government initiatives in Canadian history. For the first time since Confederation, the federal government says it's prepared to give back to First Nations what many say was never relinquished in the first place.

Harvard University called the Manitoba dismantling the most progressive move in self–government negotiations in the world. The same party denounced inherent right; the Reform Party denounced inherent right. There were over a hundred editorials in the country by people who are paid to be critical. That is their job in the democratic process. A hundred of them were favourable and one was not favourable. The criticism was that we should have waited until the royal commission report.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): The people voted on the Charlottetown accord—

Mr. Irwin: I am not talking about the Charlottetown accord.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): You do not want to talk about it.

Mr. Irwin: —or a group of intellectuals sitting around discussing the Constitution. I will address the Reform. I am talking about the poorest of the poor, the constituents of the Reform Party that seems to think they do not count. Reformers do not consult with them. They do not talk to them. They do not meet with the chiefs and we have roadblocks. It is the job of the Reform Party to go out and represent these poor people. We were not elected to come here to cater to the rich, to the haves, to the white communities. We were elected to come here to cater to Canadians.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): What about the Bronfmans?

• (1100)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Sorry, Mr. Minister. I ask for order, please.

Mr. Irwin: Once in the four–year mandate I would like to hear Reform members talk about the housing conditions and what we can do on reserves. Once I would like to hear a Reform member talk about suicide problems. I have to go out there and meet with people who have lost their children. Once I would like to hear the Reform talk about health. All we get is denunciation, denunciation of Indian people for one reason, because they are Indians.

The country will not tolerate that. What Reform learned in New Brunswick and in Abbotsford it will learn in the next election. The people of B.C. want to be proud of the members they send here. The people of B.C. are nation builders and what they see strips away that pride. The Reform Party will learn that in the next election.

When the Reform Party came to my riding it said to the steelworkers of Sault Ste. Marie when the company went under and the unions had to take it over "do not give them a penny". They now have eight months of profit and two weeks ago the men did it, the men this party does not want to represent. They now have $400 million in the financial community and have invested it. They are working, no thanks to the Reform Party.

Every time the Reform Party comes up to my riding of Sault Ste. Marie every steelworker there will know that along with all the other things I have said about Reform and the groups it excludes, it has excluded the working people of the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the minister. If he wants to blame the Reform Party for anything, he should first do his homework and pay close attention to this debate. He compares the Bloc Quebecois with Reform. Well, when I, as a member of this House, tabled a bill to limit the interest collected on delinquent mortgages, for example, Reform was not the only opponent. His party was also opposed, because it was eating into the fund, the large amounts put at its disposal by Canada's large banks, the so–called seven sisters.

So he is in no position to throw snowballs at the Reform Party. It is his party that abolished the council on the status of women. What I mean is that, in spite of everything, I recognize that native people have been here for 20,000 years, according to some experts, that they have rights, and that we must recognize these rights. What better way to do so than by signing treaties? I think that the party I represent in this House will oppose the motion tabled by Reform because it is unacceptable.

Some people who have been here for 20,000 years are being denied their very right to exist, while some first– and second–generation Canadians claim that they have all the rights. I feel that all the people here, whatever their origins, have rights, but why deny them to native people? Although I disagree with the minister, I say that we should oppose the motion tabled by the Reform Party because it does an injustice to an important group of fellow citizens.

[English]

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member has said. I see the member for Saint–Jean out there working hard.

However, we have a fundamental difference. We just went through the referendum. Last week we heard the guru of the Bloc. I thought he was gone but he just stepped to the back of the bus. He was quoted in the Globe and Mail. What did Mr. Pierre Bourgault say? It is the Jews, the Italians and the Greeks who vote in an ethnic block who are the racists, not us. They only have one objective, to obstruct things. They are saying these Jews, Italians and Greeks, because they want to be Canadians, are obstructionists. If we multiply that by about fivefold we have an idea of the Cree, the Montagnais, the Attikamekw and the Micmac and their feeling of alienation within the province of Quebec.

• (1105)

We have to have a uniform philosophy. As much as I appreciate what the Bloc is saying today it cannot blame the Reform for what is happening out in B.C. and have a different philosophy in Quebec. Reform in B.C. cannot side with us to protect the Indians of Quebec because it fits its agenda and because it is taking an anti–francophone position, but not do the same thing in B.C.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am not going to get into a long diatribe of rhetoric as the hon. minister put forth today against the Reform Party. The Liberal government does not have a monopoly on caring and compassion nor a monopoly on stupidity.

The goal we have today is shared by the minister and by every person in the House. Each and every one of us wants to ensure aboriginal people, particularly those who as the minister referred to are the poorest of the poor, are able to stand on their own two feet, and that we are able to decrease the terrible parameters of rape, sexual abuse, crime and violence that occurs within their societies.

I was going to ask the hon. member a question, but he has departed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member knows we do not refer to the presence or absence of anyone in the House.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, the goal is to help aboriginal people, working with them in a co–operative fashion. That is the goal of Reform members, many of whom have aboriginal people in their ridings. We work closely with them to resolve these difficulties.

I listened to the individual responsible for the B.C. treaty process on Vancouver Island. I listened for one hour on what they were going to do for the aboriginal people. I asked: "At the end of the day will the B.C. treaty process actually help the poorest of the poor, the people I mentioned earlier? Will it actually help them?" That individual said: "I do not know".

That is the basis on which we do not approve of this process. The process will not help the poorest of the poor in aboriginal communities. That is what we want and I know that is what the government wants. The course the government is pursuing will not help the poorest of the poor.

Other concerns we have are in the resource management. Who will ensure the resources are taken care of? As the minister knows, at Stony Creek we saw a terrible tragedy with the timber on that reserve. We are also concerned about where the money goes. The minister well knows that aboriginal leadership in many cases has been known to pocket vast sums of money that was supposed to be going to those people who are the poorest of the poor. Those are our concerns.

Does the minister think the B.C. treaty process will truly help those aboriginal people who are the poorest of the poor? Who will preserve and safeguard the resources in the areas they are asking for in terms of land? Does the minister not believe that the fundamental and most important part of developing self–respect and respect in one's community is the ability for people, whether aboriginal or non–aboriginal, to stand on their own two feet and take care of themselves and be gainfully employed?

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, I want this question because I often hear this member questioning the health minister and I have always wanted to respond to him.

This member is a doctor and we would think he would bring his skills to the House. If he brought those skills as a doctor to the House he would see the suicide problems we have in First Nations. He would realize that a lot of these suicides are a result of no self–sufficiency because there is nothing left. We took all the lands. We took it all.

He would realize that there is more than having social workers there. There has to be self–sufficiency. He would realize that where there is self–sufficiency, where there are richer reserves there is stability and there is health. He would go out and learn this. He would know what is happening there.

Instead he sits here in a nation that provided him with medical skills and encouraged him to go to school, subsidized him and encouraged him to go through school and become a doctor, to bring this knowledge and skill to the House. But he says: "Let us spread this poverty equally. They are poor. Let them go out and be self–sufficient".

The bottom line is when we negotiated these treaties, and he should know this, in many cases we spent a day or two. In British Columbia, with treaties 6, 7 and 8, in a couple of days with three treaties we took away a whole province. We took away the resources from the native people.

We have spent 200 years to not make the same mistake in B.C. and make sure there is some self–sufficiency there, that we have a vision and we can work together as partners. What does this hon. member do? He is going to vote: "Stop the process. Do not negotiate any further. Let those poor people fend for themselves". Shame on him.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, the opposition motion.

I will read the motion, for the benefit of the members who are here. It goes as follows:

That the House urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the current provincial government mandate in order to respect the views of British Columbians on this issue as expressed by both major provincial opposition parties.

My comments will be twofold. In the first part, I will discuss the constitutional validity of such a proposal, and in the second part, I will deal with the issue of aboriginal claims.

Does a government, democratically elected in Canada according to the laws of the land and in compliance with our constitutional principles, have the right to govern? In other words, does a government that is the government have the right to be a government?

The Reform Party's answer to that question is no. Indeed, it is asking this House to urge the Government of Canada to not enter into any agreements to which a provincial government, duly elected according to the Constitution, would be a party, because such an agreement would not reflect public opinion, as expressed by the two major provincial opposition parties. In other words, the Reform Party is asking the House to ascertain, before entering into an agreement with a Canadian province, whether public opinion, as expressed by the opposition, is favourable to the proposal.

Our friends from the Reform Party do not seem to understand the nature of our institutions. This motion is wrong in the sense that it is an attack against the legitimacy of our institutions. It provides that the House should ask the government to determine, through polls, through supposedly scientific studies, perhaps through open lines in B.C., or editorials from the Vancouver Sun, the opinion of British Columbians, before entering into an agreement supported by the legitimately elected government of that province.

• (1115)

I am not sure whether our Reform Party friends realize what they are asking from the House. People participating in a political meeting could say: "Since the B.C. government is in the last year of its mandate, it no longer has the democratic or political right to —", and so on. As you know, it is easy to organize a partisan political meeting. It is easy to resort to inflated rhetoric and to exaggerate, so as to make an impact on public opinion.

The motion before us comes from an official party in the House of Commons. That party got 52 members elected in the last federal election and is now asking the House to pass such a resolution.

Let us change the wording a bit in order to examine the unbelievable nature of a resolution such as this. What, for example, would our reaction be if the motion were to read, selecting Quebec at random as an example: "That the House urge the government to not enter into agreement with the Government of Quebec on the sharing and devolution of manpower training until such time as the Government of Quebec has passed a motion in the National Assembly recognizing the landslide victory by the no side in the last referendum"? I think everyone here would say it was unbelievable.

To take another example, what would our reaction by if the motion were to read: "That the House urge the government to not enter into any agreement with the Government of Ontario as long as that government plans to cut back on welfare payments"? We would say it was impossible.

Yet here we have a government, the Parliament of Canada, being asked to pass judgment on the legitimacy of another duly elected government within a federation. The legitimacy of the B.C. government is just as important, just as valuable, just as constitutionally justified, as the legitimacy of the Government of Canada.

Just looking at the wording of the motion would be enough to make the Bloc oppose it.

But there are other grounds. Basically, this motion casts doubt on the entire issue, on the whole process for settling aboriginal land claims in Canada.

I have just listened to my Reform colleague's defence of the proposition. He touched on many topics. He spoke of territorial rights, of the fact that aboriginal people living on reserves pay no taxes. When it comes down to it, he has challenged the rights of these first inhabitants of Canada to demand any particular rights whatsoever to certain lands within Canada. He even referred to the B.C. Reform Party's program on aboriginal issues which proposes that it oppose inclusion of aboriginal self–government in the province's legislation. Yet, it has been in the Canadian Constitution since 1982. According to a Reform government out there, however, there must be no mention in any of the laws of B.C. of any entitlement whatsoever to aboriginal self government.

• (1120)

There was another resolution that I hesitate to mention here, because in many ways it challenges the position of minorities in Canada. According to the Reform Party's provincial platform, before aboriginal peoples obtain certain rights in Canada, they should first have the consent of the majority of the population.

It seems this party wants to propose that in British Columbia, minority rights shall be subject to the will of the majority. It is unthinkable, in a democratic country like Canada that recognizes the rights of specific populations subject to certain criteria, that these rights should be subject to injunctions or decisions by a majority of the population.

Basically, the Reform Party's proposal challenges the whole issue of aboriginal rights in Canada. That is its general purpose, but the Reform Party also challenges specific aspects. Somewhat ironically, the Reform Party's comments were fuelled by several kinds of issues.

There is a reference to the Nass River agreement now being negotiated with the Nisga'a in British Columbia. In fact, the Reform Party would rather see the agreement dropped, because of issues like commercial fishing rights, for instance. There are groups who are making representations. However, I think we should keep a sense of proportion in all this.

Today in Canada we have a major problem concerning aboriginal land claims. It is a problem that must be dealt with as quickly as possible, in a way that is fair to all Canadians and respects the rights of all concerned. The issue should not be used as an excuse to postpone agreements that may be finalized very shortly.

I think they are playing with fire, because today in Canada, there is a polarization of positions on these issues. If we read editorials in Canada or Quebec and listen to open–line shows, we realize that non–aboriginal groups are critical. They think there is some exaggeration in the whole issue of aboriginal claims, and they are right, but as a result of this situation, prejudice is rife, which is not conducive to good relations between aboriginal peoples and the general public in Quebec and Canada.

Opinions are becoming polarized, often with somewhat bizarre results. As an example of what will happen if we do not deal with these issues fairly quickly, I was reading a speech made by the hon. member for Churchill yesterday at a sacred assembly held in Hull. Now we should realize the assembly is more or less religious in nature and often the language is very symbolic. Our colleague said in his opening speech that the Creator had put aboriginal peoples in this part of the world known as Canada.

I agree one can argue that aboriginal peoples have certain rights because they were here before we were, because they were the first occupants, but I think it is a bit much to say the Creator put the aboriginal peoples in Canada.

This was said in a particular context before an audience of important dignitaries.

• (1125)

The Prime Minister of Canada was present at this gathering. Ministers of the crown were also in attendance. There was little reaction. The context is, however, a particular one. If native peoples get the idea now that Canada was given to the aboriginal people, like in the Bible, things are going to get tougher.

So, I think, in order to avoid things getting out of hand—because I think it could happen, and I am sorry to have to say it, out of respect for my colleague for Churchill—native claims have to be settled as quickly as possible and, in British Columbia, where things are developing, matters must be resolved right away. Because, in British Columbia, things go back a long way.

Between the end of the 1880s and 1990, native claims were not considered valid. In 1990, the British Columbia government began to recognize native rights, but only then. I heard the Minister of Indian Affairs say earlier that the situation of native peoples in Quebec was terrible. He said that journalists and some people are making remarks about the referendum vote. People are saying it must be awful for the native population.

In 1985 or 1986, the National Assembly of Quebec recognized 11 native nations. One of these nations barely has 500 members, but it was recognized because it had rights. The people of Quebec did not vote on whether a nation of 150 people constituted a nation. There was no vote. The National Assembly looked at the cultures and the characteristics of all the nations and recognized them. That is what happened in Quebec.

There is the James Bay agreement, which was signed in 1974 or 1975, as the minister pointed out. It was the first major agreement between Canada and the native populations. It was concluded in Quebec, while, in British Columbia, it was not until 15 years later that the territorial rights of native peoples were recognized and the validity of their claims acknowledged.

I think Quebec can hold its head high. The Montagnais of Lac–Saint–Jean, the Montagnais on the north shore and the Mohawks have always been respected. The Attikameks and the Maliseet are few in number, but worthy of respect and have certain rights they are claiming. It happened in Quebec. We, the people of Quebec, were among the governments and peoples of Canada to recognize the First Nations. We know that there is a Quebec nation, a Quebec people. But Quebec also includes other peoples.

We recognized 11 other nations. We negotiated. Our National Assembly recognized them. Agreements were signed with some of these peoples. An agreement is being negotiated with the Montagnais of the North Shore and Lac–Saint–Jean. Things were done. No one in Quebec told the government that it should not sign.

No one in the 1970s tabled a motion here in the House of Commons urging the Government of Canada not to sign an agreement with Quebec because the Bourassa government, which signed this agreement, was in the last year of its mandate. It was the James Bay agreement; it was not about fishing rights on a river somewhere. The James Bay agreement covers a vast territory. The Cree hold property rights over some lands, surface rights over others, fishing and hunting rights over other parts of the territory.

We did not undermine these people's rights by signing treaties with them. We respected them. We told them: "You are a nation, you will have territorial rights, you will be given money for development". It was not a bargaining session, as demonstrated by the fact that, in the last referendum, 95 per cent of these people—this figure is a little conservative; it is probably higher—voted no in the referendum. Ninety–five per cent is a lot of people.

What this means is that, on some parts of this reserve, not a single person voted yes. No one in Quebec questioned these results or these people's legitimacy. No one accused them of being ungrateful after we gave them territorial rights. That is not how we do things.

• (1130)

We did not give them rights. They already had rights, which we recognized and enshrined in legislation. This legislation, this treaty, this agreement was also ratified by the federal government, which also had fiduciary rights and was a party to the case.

I hope that the House will carefully examine the content of this motion. First, it should realize that the motion limits the rights of a democratically elected government in Canada. Second, the motion challenges the rights of people in Canada who belong to a nation different from the so–called Canadian nation and from what we call the Quebec nation.

I feel it is important to be aware of all this and of native people's right to demand some land claim agreements in Canada. We must hasten to correct some visible mistakes that are emerging so that we do not end up in situations that would adversely affect the future for the people of Quebec and Canada and for all the native peoples in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it makes me curious when an hon. member refers to the Quebec people and the Quebec nation. I am not quite sure what he means by this in terms of the population of Quebec. This is a point of concern for me. Obviously I am a Canadian to be able to sit in this Chamber. I came to this country after the Hungarian revolution in 1957. My 10–year old daughter was born in Canada. My wife is Irish going back seven generations.

When we talk of people within the confines of a province, I want to make sure there is some definition to it. Looking at the demographics of the population in Quebec, the direct descent French is 74.6 per cent; British, 4.2 per cent; German, half a per cent; Italian, 2.6 per cent; Chinese, half a per cent; aboriginal, 1 per cent; Dutch, one–tenth of one per cent; east Indian, three–tenths of one per cent; Polish, three–tenths of one per cent; Portuguese, one–half per cent; Jewish, 1.1 per cent; Greek, seven–tenths of one per cent; Filipino, one–tenth of one per cent; Hungarian, one–tenth of one per cent; other, 5 per cent; people of multiple origins, 8.4 per cent.

Maybe the hon. member could clarify for me that all the people living in Quebec are indeed Quebecers and are indeed Canadian.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I question the pertinence to the subject of today's debate.

[Translation]

The hon. member may want to respond, but I do question the relevance of the question with regard to the motion.

Mr. Caron: Madam Speaker, I will gladly answer the question because some members may wonder how to define a Montagnais, a Malecite or a Nisga'a.

Allow me to answer by first asking a question and answering it. How do you define a Canadian? As far as I can understand, Canadians are persons who live in Canada and call themselves Canadians. Our hon. colleague told us: "I am a Canadian. I have been living in Canada since the late 50s". He said he came to Canada from Hungary after the insurrection over there.

• (1135)

I am sure the hon. member calls himself a Canadian, probably in his Hungarian or Magyar mother tongue, and never doubts for a moment that he is a Canadian.

Similarly, Quebecers are people living in Quebec who call themselves Quebecers. These people's ancestors may have been established in Quebec since 1636, or for 360 years, like mine, or for just two, three, four or five years. Perhaps their mother tongue is Greek or Spanish. Perhaps they are like my hon. colleague from Bourassa, originally from Chile, who calls himself a Quebecer.

Therefore, a Quebecer is someone who lives in Quebec, claims to be a Quebecer and recognizes that he or she and the other people living in Quebec share the same identity as Quebecers. Of course, this identity is coloured. The Prime Minister himself mentioned in his distinct society proposal that it should be recognized that, in Quebec, we have a French speaking majority and a unique culture, although the Prime Minister told us yesterday that there was no Quebec culture. At any rate, such are the vagaries of politics.

We have our own civil law tradition inherited from old France. Of course, the people of Quebec have a colour, as do the people of Canada. From what I can see, the predominant language among Canadians is English. There is a Canadian culture defending itself against the American culture, and Canada also has its social and legal institutions.

In short, a Quebecer is someone living in Quebec who claims to be a Quebecer, like a Montagnais from the Lac–Saint–Jean region, who speaks the same language as me and looks somewhat like me, come to think of it. It is someone who says: "I am a Montagnais from Lac–Saint–Jean, living in Mashteuiatsh, attending school in Roberval, working at the Canada Employment Center in Roberval and proud to call myself a Montagnais".

A Montagnais is someone who claims to be a Montagnais and is recognized as such by other Montagnais, the same way that a Quebecer is someone who claims to be a Quebecer and agrees to belong to this nation, without any distinction based on culture, race or language. Quebec gladly welcomes everyone, as long as you call yourself a Quebecer.

[English]

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Madam Speaker, because I did not have the opportunity to address the minister's comments on debate, I will take the first few minutes of my intervention to address some of the remarks which he made.

It is difficult to listen to the sheer arrogance of the minister and the government on the subject of aboriginal issues. The minister talked about it being a democratic process. He talked about the Government of British Columbia being a democratically elected government which has a mandate to engage in the negotiations which are currently taking place. I beg to differ.

The current NDP Government of British Columbia was elected by 40 per cent of the popular vote at the last general election. That means six out of ten people who cast a ballot did not vote for the policies, the platform or the party which is now governing British Columbia.

When we speak about democratic principles, we have to recognize that the system of voting does not allow for a proper representation of the views of a majority of citizens on many issues, and this is one of them. This is a very important issue for British Columbia.

The second thing I want to address with respect to the minister's remarks is that he made the comment that natives have waited for 200 years to have the issue resolved. I do not dispute the fact that since Confederation the federal government has had the clear constitutional responsibility to deal with the issue in British Columbia and in other parts of Canada. However, in British Columbia for whatever reason, the federal government chose to abrogate that responsibility. It is not the province of British Columbia which has the responsibility to deal with the issue, it is the federal government. I might also add that for the majority of the time since Confederation there have been Liberal governments in Ottawa. What is the minister doing throwing stones at the Reform Party or anybody else when it is clearly the federal government and a host of Liberal governments since Confederation that have created the problem in the first place?

The third point the minister made, and one which needs to be responded to most strenuously, is the point that the Reform Party is not interested in helping the poorest of the poor. It is his government and him, as minister of Indian affairs, who is really deeply concerned about these poor people who live on reserves in Canada. I suppose he has a lock on caring.

A lot of native people live in my riding. There are a large number of reserves and nine Indian bands in total in my riding. I have written on behalf of many people who have come to see me who have demanded financial accountability from the minister. Can they get it? This $5.8 billion a year that the minister and the government is funnelling into aboriginal affairs is going to benefit a very few at the top.

The minister does not have any lock on caring for the poorest of the poor because it is the very people in these communities who are the poorest of the poor and they are not receiving the benefits the taxpayers of Canada are contributing. It is because of the minister's refusal to take on his responsibility and demand accountability that these people are in the position they are in.

I ask the House to recognize that although the minister may be making these grandiose statements and engaging in the flaming rhetoric that he loves to engage in so much, the reality is that the minister cares more about the entrenched leadership in Canada's aboriginal communities than he does about the poorest of the poor or the ordinary people. It is very clear to me that the leaders in the aboriginal communities are as much out of touch with their constituents as this government is out of touch with the people of Canada.

In talking about the land claim situation in British Columbia, we started by saying that almost nobody in British Columbia disagrees with the proposition that we have to resolve these longstanding disputes between aboriginals and the Government of Canada. No one disputes the fact that we have to get these outstanding claims resolved and get on with life. No one disputes the fact that there have been injustices done to native people historically and I might add in contemporary times.

How did we get to be where we are today? The government is saying that there is a a huge problem out there which has to be dealt with. The government says it has a mandate to deal with it, although there are many who would disagree with that, so it has get on with it and it is going to engage in a modern treaty making process in British Columbia.

We have to go right back to the Act of Union by which British Columbia joined Confederation to understand where we are today. By that Act of Union in 1871 British Columbia joined Confederation with an agreement that the federal government would be responsible for all existing and future obligations to aboriginal peoples. That is stated in the Act of Union. The federal government has a clear responsibility going right back to the day that British Columbia joined Confederation. However, it has never addressed that responsibility and that is why we are in the situation we are in today.

Going back to the 1970s some Indian bands decided they were going to commence legal actions to have their grievances aired and dealt with because they could not get them dealt with any other way.

The most famous legal case, the one that is the pre–eminent legal case in Canada today with respect to aboriginal issues, native land claims and the inherent right to self–government, is the Delgamuukw case. This was launched by the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en people who also happen to be within the riding I represent.

• (1145)

The B.C. supreme court listened to 360 days of testimony, to all kinds of anthropological evidence, oral evidence presented by the elders of the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en people, listened to all kinds of legal arguments made on their behalf. At the end of that process when the court rendered its decision it found clearly that there is no inherent right to self–government and there is no aboriginal title to land.

The court also found that the federal government had a constitutional obligation to address the issues of concern to aboriginal people and urged it to get on with it. In the meantime, after the court decision was rendered the Government of British changed. We had an outgoing Social Credit government and an incoming NDP government with an ideological bent on this issue, fervent in its belief it has to deal with the land claim issue in a way the province has never considered doing until then.

What did it do? The Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en people are continuing with their court action. They have appealed the decision to the B.C. court of appeal. The province of British Columbia fired the successful legal firm of Russell & DuMoulin, which had won the Delgamuuku case on behalf of the people of British Columbia, and replaced it with the firm Swinton & Company, a registered paid federal lobbyists in 1994 on behalf of the very people it was to be squaring off with in court, the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en people.

Furthermore, Swinton & Company was also engaged in an action on behalf of the Gitksan in the B.C. supreme court against the province of British Columbia at a time when it had accepted this landmark legal case to represent the province of British Columbia on the very issues it was fighting the province with on behalf of the Gitksan at the time it was appointed. Talk about a conflict of interest.

This is the way the NDP government in British Columbia has behaved with this issue. It wanted a political decision from the court. It was not prepared to allow the process to be followed through as it should have.

In following the ideological rather than the legal decisions of the court and totally ignoring how the people of British Columbia, and in Canada for that matter, voted against the inherent right to self–government in the Charlottetown accord, British Columbia in concert with the federal government went ahead and started to try to implement these things anyway, much as the federal government is trying to do with distinct society and a veto for Quebec in the unity issue right now.

This is a slap in the face to British Columbia and a slap in the face to democracy. When the people have spoken in a democratic referendum and the government ignores that decision and goes about implementing the decisions anyway, legislatively rather than through constitutional change, that is a clear slap in the face to the people of Canada, particularly the people of British Columbia.

The native population in British Columbia voted against the Charlottetown accord with almost the same percentage as the non–native population did. I have talked to enough native people to know very clearly they do not favour this notion of inherent right to self–government. I am talking about the ordinary grassroots people, not the chiefs, not the people benefiting from it.

Now we have a process in place designed to achieve ends the public does not support. They are not supported by legal jurisprudence. The public is shut out of the process. There is no opportunity for the public to even be involved. What do we have but a bunch of bureaucrats getting their marching orders from Ottawa and Victoria. They are up in my riding negotiating with the Nisga'a. We hear rumours of these negotiations although we do not even know for sure what has or has not been put on the table.

We hear rumours of a potentially massive conveyance of land, $175 million in cash, 2,200 square kilometres of land and a constitutionally protected right to 30 per cent of the Nass River fishery on a basis of forever and ever. Let us not forget the deals will be set in constitutional concrete. They will be forever. It is vital that we not make mistakes. Of course, the governments of the day are totally ignoring that.

I took the time to canvass people in my riding. One of the reasons I became so deeply involved in the issue is that I was receiving hundreds of letters and phone calls from constituents extremely uneasy with what they perceive to be a process taking place behind closed doors with the potential to alter the social fabric and the economic fabric of British Columbia with no legitimate opportunity for public input.

As I said before, there are many parallels to the current national unity issue we are seized with. There are two agendas in Canada, the government's and the people's. Most of the time those agendas are not in sync. The government is proposing to give distinct society status to Quebec and to provide vetoes on a regional basis, but it is not in sync with what the people of Canada want. We can understand why the people of British Columbia, in particular the people of rural British Columbia, are uncomfortable with the current process. There is no legitimate opportunity for them to be involved. This is all going on behind closed doors.

The ratification process proposed by the government is that once an agreement in principle is signed it will be brought to the House for a vote. That means for the most part there will be members of Parliament from the rest of Canada voting on legislation which will have major, long term, far reaching consequences for the people of British Columbia, which has a leaderless, lame duck administration in Victoria that has lost virtually any shred of credibility.

That is the thrust of the motion today. It is in recognition of the fact that the Government of British Columbia has no mandate and has never sought a mandate to be involved in negotiations of this magnitude. It has no credibility with the public. Its administration is in shambles. It is caught up in scandal. The aboriginal people of British Columbia, the ordinary grassroots people, are saying: "We are not represented in this process. The people negotiating on our behalf do not have a mandate from us. We do not feel comfortable with it. We do not feel comfortable that this will ever benefit us. We think it will benefit the leaders. We think it will benefit the negotiators".

We are in the process of entering into agreements which will forever change the landscape of British Columbia. They have the potential to do that.

In canvassing my constituents, which I have taken the time and the care to do, they have said very clearly they are looking for finality and extinguishment. They want an end to the division. The root cause of most of the problems in which native people find themselves is that we have treated them separately from day one. We have never given them the opportunity to be ordinary Canadians. We have never treated them as if they are able and capable of looking after themselves. We have built a pervasive welfare system around native people in Canada which has robbed them of their dignity, their self–esteem and their initiative.

• (1155)

The minister was talking about the poorest of the poor and what we will do about aboriginal housing and about the plight of these people.

Friederich von Hayek talks about the Liberal philosophy and the socialist philosophy, which are virtually indistinguishable in this country, and he talks about fatal conceit. The fatal conceit is that people elected to government somehow feel like they have a God given ability to correct all the problems of people and society rather than letting those people have the opportunity to resolve their own problems.

It is because of these interventionist, elitist, arrogant, top down policies created by government and driven by government, supposedly to solve all the problems, that we have the problems we see on native reserves today.

What we are doing in this process right now, from my window, is creating new and better ways to separate people by race. We are saying the way we kept them separate and distinct and apart from Canadian society in the past has not worked. It has been a failure. The Indian Act is no good. Virtually everybody agrees with that now. We will find a new and better way to keep them separate. We will find a new and better way to give them a status different from that of ordinary Canadians.

In the long run and maybe even the short run that as well intentioned as some members opposite are on this issue, and they feel this will resolve the problems of native people, it will entrench them that much deeper. It will not solve their problems.

As the member for Esquimalt said in his remarks a few minutes ago, we should be considering what is right, doing what will actually work; an encouragement to these people to take control of their own lives on an individual basis and forget about expecting the government to solve their problems because the government has a disastrous track record in that regard.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague's remarks this morning, as I did with preceding speakers.

For the record I will read the subject of the motion the Reform Party put forward today and then talk about the hon. minister's objection to it and why that is. In part it states:

> That the House urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the current provincial government mandate.

The hon. minister said that for the federal government to do that would be insulting. I find that strange and more than a little contradictory because it is the same government that had no problem in arguing quite successfully that the EH–101 helicopter purchase which the Tory government had entered into was not right and we should not be doing that as a nation, that we should not be spending the money on that.

It argued the Pearson airport deal was not right because it was entered into in the dying days of the Mulroney administration and should be cancelled.

It does not find that insulting, to back out of commitments made by previous governments. Yet for some reason the hon. minister seemed to think today it would be insulting the Government of British Columbia to insist that we do not enter into any trilateral agreements with B.C. and the natives of British Columbia in the dying days of that administration. I find it more than a bit puzzling and I wonder if my hon. colleague would care to remark on that.

I note with interest that the hon. minister spent almost his entire 20 minutes bashing Reformers for being aboriginal bashers. I find that puzzling. That type of name calling and labelling is nothing new for Reformers. We have been labelled that and subject to those types of attacks right from the very beginning when we started our party. We are going to insist on carrying forward sensible arguments on this and other issues, even if they are non–politically correct arguments, regardless of how we are attacked or how often ministers openly attack us in the House.

• (1200)

Would the hon. member care to remark on what he has done. One of the things we have heard this morning is that the public is not well enough informed and the expectations of the native people have been raised. What about the awareness? What has this member actually done in British Columbia to bring to the attention of all British Columbians what is happening?

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

He is absolutely right. The minister began his remarks today by having the gall to question the Reform Party for even wanting to debate this issue in the House. He asked, how dare we to even want to debate this issue? Is this not a democratic institution? Is this not what this House is for? But, no, we should not be debating this. Anytime we even raise an aboriginal issue and want to debate it, we are labelled. Frankly that has an odour to it that I cannot abide.

Second, my colleague points out that the minister said that this would be an insult to the province of British Columbia if the government were to accept the motion of the Reform Party. For the benefit of members in the House who do not live in British Columbia, I could tell them how insulting the government of the province of British Columbia has been to the citizens of British Columbia in recent months. Its members have absolutely no regard for the public interest. They put their own interest forward all the time. They are so blatantly ideologically driven that there is no hope they could ever be re–elected as a government in British Columbia.

Yet this very administration is the one that is negotiating behind closed doors, in secret, with the Nisga'a and with other aboriginal groups right now and contemplating, as rumours go, making agreements that are going to have long term implications for British Columbia.

In response to the member's question on what I have done as a member of Parliament and as a representative of the people of Skeena since I was elected, I held a series of four town hall meetings in my riding, in Smithers, Terrace, Prince Rupert and Kitimat. I brought the issue to the people and said that we need to have a public discussion on this.

Subsequent to that, my colleague and I went around the province of British Columbia. We held town hall meetings at Williams Lake, Quesnel, Prince George, Nanaimo, Cranbrook and in several areas in greater Vancouver. We have done as much as we possibly can to bring the issue to the people, something that the province of British Columbia, and I might add, the federal government have never cared one whit about doing, not one whit.

The reason I feel so passionate about this, and I mean this sincerely, is this. What is going to happen if the province of British Columbia and the federal government sign a deal with which the people cannot live? The native people's expectation levels are at an all time high. They have been led to believe that these agreements, once they are entered into and signed, are going to be abided by, that they are going to be honoured. We already have opposition parties in British Columbia saying that they do not intend to honour them.

Think of the tremendous social upheaval we are going to have if governments sign agreements with which the people are not going to live, which the people do not want and will not accept. It is absolutely critical that we do not sign agreements unless we are sure they are going to be supported by the public.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my hon. colleague from Skeena for actually standing up and saying what he wants to do to help those that the minister referred to as the poorest of the poor.

• (1205)

It is interesting to compare both speeches. The minister went on a 20–minute diatribe against the Reform Party instead of stating what he was going to do for the people who he claims are the poorest of the poor in our society.

While we stand in the House talking rhetoric among political parties, those aboriginal people who are on or off reserve that are suffering from sexual abuse, violence and the poverty that they endure, are still out there suffering. We should be ashamed in the House to be seeing that happening.

Previous governments have created for the aboriginal people an institutionalized welfare state. They have done this by giving money to people in the honest expectation that it would help them.

As my hon. colleague mentioned, one cannot keep giving things to people and expect them to have pride and self–respect. Pride and self–respect comes from within one's person and it is rooted in the ability of the person to take care of himself or herself.

Contrary to what the minister said, I would like to ask my hon. colleague from Skeena, and for him to reiterate if he could, that the pursuit of the treaties is constitutionally and legally from the court's point of view, illegal.

What does he propose to help those people on or off reserve who are suffering from the terrible things that I mentioned previously? How is he going to help the poorest of the poor stand on their own two feet and take care of themselves? That is the root of the problem.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. It is very clear that the plight of native people in Canada, the tremendous social problems that we see on reserves, are a direct result of the huge welfare state that we built up around them. It is the arrogance and the elitist notion on the part of government that it can fix problems by throwing money at them and creating new programs and so on that entrenches these very serious human conditions on native reserves.

What is required is for the government to say first, stop treating aboriginals as if they all think and act and want the same things. They are not communists. They are individuals just like we are. They are individuals who have individual aspirations, desires, visions, hopes and dreams.

We need to break that welfare state, start dismantling it. We need to give a hand up to those people and encourage them to get out into the private sector, to become ordinary citizens and provide them with a one–time opportunity to make that transition easier.

We have to understand that the corollary of success is failure. The government cannot guarantee success and it cannot guarantee that people will not fail. That is axiomatic. That is something that we have to live with. It is a human condition. It is natural law, if you will. One cannot guarantee that anybody is going to be successful. All one can do is try to make the conditions as fertile as possible for success to happen.

I believe very strongly that when the government backs out of this interventionist mode it is in right now and allows native Indian people to take the bull by the horns and start controlling their own lives, we will see some failures. There is no question about it. However, we are going to start seeing successes. We will see more success as time goes by.

When we talk about having native Indian people as ordinary Canadians, I am not saying that I do not respect the culture. I respect the culture and I respect that there are differences. Those differences can and should be celebrated, but not celebrated in law, not entrenched in the Constitution, not entrenched in distinctiveness and separateness in law that is going to keep us apart forever.

The gulf between native and non–native people is widening all the time because of the policies of government, not because there is a fundamental problem. It is the policies.

• (1210)

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced he was going to increase access fees for fishermen, but the access fees were only going to go up by 50 per cent for native fishermen but 100 per cent for everyone else. I am convinced the native fishermen did not ask for that. It was this minister who came up with some woolly–thinking policy that this was what he should be doing. What it does is create division. Why is it that we have the problems with the native and non–native fishermen on the Fraser River system? It is because government created a policy that allowed access to a resource on a different basis based on race. That has to be done away with.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing time with my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

The motion put forward is an interesting one and I respect the spirit in which it was put forward. It raises issues going to what is called the lame duck status of government. It is a principle of American constitutional law that I think sensibly could become part of Canadian constitution law, but it is limited in its potential application to actions taken by governments between the dropping of an electoral writ and the return of the electoral writ and the formation of a new government or the continuance of an old one.

Having said that, I would like to enter into discussion of some of the very interesting issues that have been raised. This is a subject, rightly said, of special concern to British Columbia. British Columbia, as we all recognize, is not a province like the others and in the area of land claims we do have elements of distinctiveness that separate us off from the other provinces of Canada.

The substantial absence of treaties is one very important consideration which has led to a proliferation of sometimes overlapping claims. Perhaps this is one of the reasons for the public discussion and the lack always of full understanding of how these complications can be removed.

I leave to one side the issue of the status of treaties, which is something that has always interested me professionally. Do they have international law status, as some argue, or are they simply constitutional documents within the ambit of provincial law?

Elements of concern have been expressed in this debate on which perhaps we could offer some clarification. I was, I think, the first to suggest the implications for Canadian law of the International Court's judgment in western Sahara in 1975 and the two concurring opinions which rested very strongly on the argument made by then counsel, Mr. Bedjaoui who is now the president of the World Court. Let me say that although I think they do raise the intellectual challenge very effectively, which the court has recognized, to the concept of acquisition of territorial title and sovereignty by European colonial powers, they do not necessarily raise any implications as to the dispositions in view of that and in substitution for that. These are issues to which a body constituted on an independent basis like the treaties commission, armed with the facilities for research and the time for thinking, can offer fresh light.

Let me say that it is a misconception to assume that automatically by querying the original basis of acquisition of sovereignty over North America one automatically displaces supervening claims. In fact, in the most recent international law act, the two–by–four treaty, the treaty between the four occupation powers of Germany and the two Germanies about to be reunited, there is a specific clause that effectively saves supervening third party rights. It leaves open the issue of how one balances the claims.

What I am saying is that one anticipates in British Columbia an orderly process of claims adjustments and settlements in which the claims of everybody can be and will be considered if properly presented by counsel as is counsel's duty. As yet no definitive answer can be given, but it should bring some satisfaction to many of the people who have raised these issues with us to know that the orderly process does allow taking into full account the acquired third party rights.

• (1215)

In a sense the legal problems in British Columbia are sui generis. They are peculiar to British Columbia. To a large extent we get into conflicts between different cultural conceptions of law: the European concept of fixed territorial frontiers and non–European concepts which may emphasize mobility and expression of territorial interests in which land is secondary or subordinate to the notion of ethnicity. It is an interesting example of the clash of legal concepts. It is the sort of thing I expect the commission will consider because it will have to be considered in the process of the settlement of land claims.

The issue of the participation and consent of local communities has been raised. It has been asked if there was full consultation. I cannot speak of the particular cases now being cited in the debate, but on the precedent that the federal government followed in the bill which was before the House in relation to the northern territories, there was a very substantial provision for consultation with local interests. I believe there is nothing in the implementation of the commission process which prevents local interests, local municipal authorities and others from bringing forward their views and making their arguments. It is not excluded by the act. The initiative rests with those concerned.

When an independent commission is set up, it takes on a life of its own. It develops its own precedents. It is very much dependent on intelligent lawyer–manship by those people who want to bring forward their own interests and their claims. The commission is a body which has interesting people appointed to it. They are independent in their outlook. I would suggest to hon. members that they exercise to the full the process of making known to the commission the different and sometimes conflicting interests of the different people involved.

One of the great problems in British Columbia which distinguishes it from the rest of the country is that, simply because of the absence of treaties, there has not been the process of the sorting out of claims which I encountered in my previous professional work in dealing with, for example, the province of Alberta. This accounts for the overlapping and competing claims which sometimes, in the superficial extent, exceed the total amount of land involved in a region. This can be sorted out and sensibly, this is the mandate of the commission.

Problems of this sort complicate the matter in the public perception. In terms of the commission, I believe it is an excellent step forward. I am satisfied with the independence and the quality of the people concerned.

I urge hon. members to indicate to their constituents, particularly to the very thoughtful people at the municipal level that the process is not closed. The door is open for participants to bring their interests forward. The commission itself is not in the position of deciding on a dichotomous basis all here or all there. There is room for the acceptance of third party claims. There is room for apportionment of benefits. Following the international law as it has developed since the Western Sahara case, international law itself is in the making. One would expect equitable settlements in which the largest possible range of participants is involved.

• (1220)

It is a new approach to the pluralizing of our legal system and the participation in it. This is better than doing it through the court system as such. Of course, decisions of commissions are also subject to limitation and control by the courts in respect to ultimate constitutional principles. Everything done is under the Constitution and under the charter of rights. The charter of rights as we know is a house of very many rooms.

I compliment the speakers on both sides of the House on the fervour with which they have entered into this debate. I have taken note of the points they have raised, but I believe they can be achieved within this ambitious process that the bill the minister originally introduced involves.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about a substantial absence of treaties in British Columbia. That is correct. The assumption is often made that because there is a substantial absence of treaties and largely a reserve system in place, there is somehow an overriding legal obligation on the part of governments to enter into treaties.

A legal counsel for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development confirmed to me very recently that the current federal government position is that there is no legal obligation or imperative on the part of the federal government to enter into treaties in British Columbia. That is certainly consistent with what I had thought. It is also consistent with the position of the provincial government.

This means to me that government should only be entering into this process if there is something in it for all parties. This is the quid pro quo or trade–off I mentioned in my speech. My first question for the member would be whether that indeed is his interpretation as well.

There was some discussion about an independent commission. I assume the member is talking about the B.C. Treaty Commission. There was some debate about the B.C. Treaty Commission recently in the House when we debated Bill C–107, which is the enabling federal legislation, albeit quite tardy.

The terms of reference of the B.C. Treaty Commission actually leaves it rather toothless. In most areas of endeavour the commission can suggest but it is not very much of a decision maker. The commission is called the keeper of the process. Some things as basic as readiness guidelines for some of the participants in the negotiations were not foreseen at the time the enabling legislation was put together. For example, regional advisory committees do not have readiness guidelines that fall within the terms of reference of the B.C. Treaty Commission. This has been pointed out by many parties as a shortcoming. Therefore, it has no mandate.

What has happened in some circumstances in B.C. is that negotiations have pushed ahead by either the federal and/or provincial negotiators without the regional advisory committees actually being ready. This is quite a handicap and of course creates consternation at the local level. My second question would relate to that area.

The third and final area I would ask the member about would be the role of municipalities which he mentioned. Municipalities are recognized nowhere in the B.C. Treaty Commission terms of reference. There is a separate provincial memorandum of understanding. They are kind of a sidebar arrangement with the province. The municipalities through the Union of B.C. Municipalities are saying that their actual costs already, early in the process, are at least double that which the provincial government is compensating them.

• (1225)

I would say the door is not open. The door is ajar. It is a very unsatisfactory situation. There must be a much better way to approach this subject. Does the member have some suggestions in that regard?

Mr. McWhinney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his very thoughtful series of questions.

On the first point, what we are talking about relates to what I spoke of as the ambiguity in the term "treaties". What one is really seeking is a movement from unwritten or customary law to written law. This could be done by a contract, by legislation or it could be done by something else. The ultimate aim of the process is to reduce to written uncontrovertible form what the legal rights are. The complication I referred to of overlapping claims is virtually inevitable and it has been demonstrated in jurisdictions other than our own when we do not have things written down. That was the big advantage of the treaties in whatever legal category we put them to.

On the commissions, my own experience in administrative law and public administration is that it depends a good deal on the imagination and the civil courage of the commission itself and the players in it. The players include the lawyers and others appearing before it. To a very large extent an ambitious commission establishes its own agenda. It redefines its own mandate. I encourage all parties interested in the equitable disposition of B.C. land claims to try to do that.

On municipalities, the hon. member was right in saying that the specific provision is not there. There is nothing excluding it. Since they are major players in relation to the third party claims, supervening claims, subsequent to any original title, such as it may be, municipalities are directly involved and they are important players in the political processes.

In the previous federal legislation relating to the northern territories there was an enormous amount of provision by the federal government for consultation of local interests. I think the encouragement would be to the municipal councils where they have legitimate interests that they feel they want to express to communicate them. The answer can only be no or "yes, we would love to hear you". I would think in a facultative sense a good commission tries to do just that.

It is law in the making. A good deal will depend on the good faith, good spirit but also the professional preparation that interested parties do. That would be the main message I would encourage our B.C. voters to adopt in this approach.

I thank the member for his questions. I would add that the debate we are having today constitutes in legal terms travaux préparatoires, which simply means that it may be cited as evidence for the future of what the law in this area should be and is.

Mr. Duncan: Mr. Speaker, there is one further area I would like to explore with the member and I will do it very quickly.

There is a lot of concern and a lack of support for the way the negotiations are occurring. There is a lack of confidence in many people because the negotiations are run provincially by an aboriginal affairs department and federally by the department of Indian affairs. People consider it a total conflict of interest which is lopsided.

Could the member comment on that, please.

• (1230)

Mr. McWhinney: Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment specifically. My experience in negotiations in this general area was in situations where there were treaties in force, treaties 6, 7, 8 and 9. There the process of the negotiations was happy with all parties. If there is something at fault here it may go down to the handling of particular cases.

I just do not have the direct information. If there is a feeling of dissatisfaction, maybe that is a matter to take up directly with the commission and to be led as such. The commission would want to satisfy itself that negotiations have been properly conducted and evidence properly assessed.

I commend to the hon. member, if he has information, to bring it to the attention of the commission.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to respond specifically to the motion of the hon. member for North Island—Powell River that the House:

> —not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the provincial government mandate—

Inherent in the motion is the issue my hon. friend referred to recently, which is the lame duck issue that seeks to nullify the powers of any government in the last year of its mandate. This is the most cynical statement I have ever heard from any party of any legislature or House.

Does this then suggest that any process—and one in this case that is so clearly in the best interest of the people of British Columbia and of the aboriginal people—must be put on the back burner for political consideration?

Surely Canadians deserve to know that their governments can make policy decisions that are sustainable and not politically biased but people biased in the best interest of Canadians.

Government serves the people. Whatever the stripe of government, good public policy and the integrity of government as a whole must be kept sacrosanct.

Reformers are suggesting then, or are they, that they do not want to be bound by the decisions legally and morally agreed upon in a trilateral, provincial government, aboriginal people and federal government negotiated contract.

Since the 1800s, that is over a century ago, aboriginal people have been trying to negotiate validity of land claims with the British Columbia government. It has constantly rejected this validity based on the fact that it was a federal responsibility, or this is what it said.

The process has taken so long that finally in 1990 the B.C. government, a Social Credit government, took a major step and began a process to right this wrong. The three parties, that is the First Nations, the federal government and the provincial government, have since agreed to the process, and this is what is happening now.

I hope we will not accept this motion which in effect seeks to further delay the process. The people of B.C., the aboriginal people and the people of Canada have been waiting for far too long.

During the second reading stage of the bill that sets up the commission, members of the third party stood repeatedly and complained about how long the process was taking. Now they are seeking to set up another barrier to the process.

In 1989 we witnessed the end of the cold war and the Berlin Wall coming down. One year later it seemed that another longstanding barrier had been removed, a barrier that had stood between aboriginal peoples in British Columbia and the economic and social development to which they aspired.

Good governments must bring down barriers, not raise them as I see the third party in effect attempting to do with this kind of doublespeak. Future generations may well regard 1990 as a singular turning point in the history of British Columbia's aboriginal peoples, the year in which they were offered a glimmer of hope.

Settling land claims is the single most important thing that can be done in British Columbia to help aboriginal communities. Uncertainty over land claims has been a barrier to economic development for all British Columbians for quite a while. Uncertainty has hindered aboriginal participation in land and resource management. All British Columbians know that when we solve these problems it will mean greater self–sufficiency. It will mean jobs. It will mean employment for the people who have long been disempowered to take their rightful equal place in Canadian society.

In addition to the ownership of settlement lands in the area covered by the treaty, the final agreements may include specific measures to stimulate economic development. This may include resource revenue sharing. This may include sharing of royalties derived from resource extraction throughout the area.

• (1235)

It is not only economic good that we seek in these treaty negotiations. We have seen in the aboriginal sacred summit that began across the river in Hull last week, a summit of aboriginal elders organized by the hon. member for Churchill, that the attachment to nature and to the Creator by aboriginal peoples is a central element of their spirituality. Land claims are more than just economic; they are spiritual to the people of British Columbia's aboriginal communities.

I think the House would agree the decision by the provincial government to come to the negotiating table was of paramount importance. Prior to 1990 aboriginal Canadians in British Columbia were offered no hope and no equality of benefits. I remind the House of some of the developments that led to that turning point because in those developments there is a profound irony.

One key player in convincing the British Columbia government to reverse its historical opposition to negotiating treaties was the minister of native affairs for the province at that time, Mr. Jack Weisgerber. Mr. Weisgerber was a Social Credit cabinet minister when British Columbia decided to negotiate. Today he is the leader of the Reform Party in British Columbia. What irony that the decision was taken by a man who had vision unlike what is being proposed across the House.

In 1989 provincial governments appointed the premiers advisory committee on native affairs. The council travelled through the province and met with bands and tribal councils to suggest a solution to address the social and economic issues facing aboriginal people. They were not seeking to continue to erect barriers. And so the province began the process of coming to the negotiating table.

The advisory council made its recommendations to cabinet in 1990 and shortly thereafter Mr. Weisgerber signed the Nisga'a framework agreement. For the first time in the history of British Columbia a province was negotiating a land claim. Soon the B.C. government was deeply involved in the process of bringing the First Nations to the table.

B.C. participated in the First Nations summit and the province met with the federal government in B.C. By the time Bill 22 that created the legislative authority for the B.C. Treaty Commission came into the legislature, Mr. Weisgerber was no longer a cabinet minister but sat on the opposition benches.

However the new NDP government continued the process begun by the Social Credit government although it was of a different political stripe. By doing so it reaffirmed people's faith in the certainty of public policy free from the vagaries of petty subjective politics.

I quote what Mr. Weisgerber said at the time of the debate in the legislature. He pointed out that the strategy for government in British Columbia for 125 to 130 years had been to deny that a problem with treaties existed, a philosophy it seems the third party still continues to espouse. He said:

> It became increasingly clear to us, as we travelled and met with groups around the province, that if we were going to address the root of the social and economic problems, we had to deal with the land claim question.

This was a bold and visionary conclusion to make. It took great political courage. It overturned the accepted political wisdom of the day. It acknowledged a simple reality. It was a a daring act of great statesmanship by a politician who put the public good before political ideology. I urge members of the third party to take a leaf from that book.

In 1991 a new provincial government, the NDP government, accepted the recommendations of the last government. Also in 1991 a federal government accepted the recommendations of a provincial government that was not of the same political stripe.

Mr. Weisgerber went on to predict to the B.C. legislature that the First Nations would be very able negotiators. He urged the provincial government to negotiate every bit as effectively for the interest of all British Columbians. He said that negotiations had to be tough but fair.

These are the views of a British Columbian who is not only one of the founders of the current treaty process. I have quoted him at length because of the motion by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River. He asked that the federal government not enter into agreements in order to respect the views of British Columbians on the land claims issue as expressed by both major provincial parties. The leader of one of those provincial opposition parties, the Reform Party of British Columbia, is Mr. Jack Weisgerber, the man who in 1990 put justice before politics.

It is clear British Columbians want to get on with the task of resolving land claims and to become a stable environment for economic growth once again. The process is a good one. The aboriginal peoples approve and both levels of government agree. We cannot put the process on hold each time a government nears the end of its mandate. It is unjust, unfair and cruel.

• (1240)

Where would we be today if we had followed the logic of the hon. member's motion? We would actually be a federal Liberal government and an NDP provincial government not taking up a policy that was carried on in good faith because it was in the best interest of the people.

Back in May 1993 the previous federal government had been in power for nearly five years, since the 1988 election. The former Prime Minister had announced his intention to step down and the Progressive Conservative Party was in the middle of a leadership convention. Did the provincial government and the aboriginal summit say at that time: "Wait a minute. Maybe we shouldn't pass this legislation. After all, the federal government is nearing the end of its mandate. Let's wait until the next federal election?'' Did they say that? Of course they did not.

Canadians elect their representatives to serve for a full mandate. The people hope that vicarious politics will not stop good public policy. This would leave to massive destabilization in Canada every four years and to a meaningless international trade and provincial controls. We have seen how this type of political grandstanding brought the United States government to a halt recently.

Let us allow the British Columbia government to get on with its business in a way that it deems appropriate. Let us get back to our own responsibilities for taking measures that will improve the economic and social prospects of aboriginal people in Canada.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about the motion somehow being cynical.

Under normal circumstances a government in the last several months of its mandate does not enter into major binding commitments. If it does so, it is at the peril of the arrangements being cancelled. There is a clear precedent for that in the province of British Columbia and there is a clear precedent for that federally. This administration should know that better than anyone. This administration cancelled the EH–101 project. This administration tried to cancel the Pearson deal.

The province of British Columbia should voluntarily back off. However it has indicated that it wants a deal by January. The likelihood is that there will be an election between March and June. This is totally inappropriate for a precedent setting agreement. There are 47 other agreements being negotiated and this would become the precedent. As I mentioned earlier, $10 billion is the early price tag put on this business.

There was discussion about the Nisga'a framework agreement entered into by Mr. Weisgerber in 1991. I talked about it earlier in my speech. I quoted section 7.1.1 which is often used to say there was no openness in the agreement and that Mr. Weisgerber had agreed to it. I do not have to defend Mr. Weisgerber. However I can read what the agreement says. To me it does not say what it has been interpreted to say. I will read it again:

> The parties will together develop and implement a process of public information and consultation and will attend meetings with such selected individuals, organizations or groups as they may agree will assist in the process of public consensus building, and the parties may separately carry out such additional consultation and communication initiatives as they see fit, including initiatives to obtain a broad range of input and consensus.

Those are hardly cloaked in mystery, secret or non–transparent negotiations.

• (1245)

There is a further interpretation by the member that somehow our motion is suggesting there should not be any negotiations. That is not what we are saying at all. We are saying there should not be no conclusive negotiations, no conclusive agreement during this latter part of this current mandate at the provincial level.

It is a very simple, limited request. The member is misinterpreting it.

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to answer the two points. The first is that is appropriate to create a lame duck government in the last year of any government's term. This is so inappropriate.

This is a process that has spanned two governments. It is a process that began in the last year of a Social Credit government. It was picked up by an NDP government and continues to be carried on. It occurred because it was good public policy. Obviously, good public policy will be seen to be such and it must be a process that can be carried on.

If a provincial government should stop in a tripartite process with another level of government and with a group of people duly set up by their own people to negotiate in good faith, then when the provincial government does that in the last year of its mandate and the federal government does that in the last year of its mandate, once in every three years will we have any negotiation at any signatory. It makes every single level of government ineffective.

It also makes the aboriginal people, who are the third party negotiating with them, wonder whether this is a worthwhile process at all. It makes a mockery of any type of negotiated process.

Second, the hon. member referred to what Mr. Weisgerber said and to the changes in the process of the Nisga'a treaty since Mr. Weisgerber had set it up. He is right.

What Mr. Weisgerber did say, and I listened carefully to the quote, is not that we stop the process but that we continue to refine it as we find flaws in it. That is extremely appropriate.

What this member is asking is that we stop the process that has been on the table. Negotiations are going on. People may come to a conclusion any moment now and we must ignore all of the year's work that has been done to get to that point. This does not make any sense to me. It is an ineffective way for any government, any negotiations to take place.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reformers will be splitting their time from this point onward today.

I would like to rebut one thing the hon. member preceding me said. She seemed to imply that somehow Reformers would be creating a lame duck government, as she called it. In actuality, the NDP in British Columbia has done a very good job of creating a lame duck government all by itself. That responsibility rests with it and no one else.

We are now entering the 21st century. As we look at the B.C. treaty process we have an obligation to future generations of Canadians, aboriginal and non–aboriginal. We must enter into negotiations with a clear view of what we are trying to accomplish. I believe a fundamental objective to any negotiations with native Canadians should be equality.

If there are historical grievances they should be resolved. The end result should be equality, not the creation of two classes of citizens and not the creation of more special rights to individuals depending on race. We are all Canadians and government policy should not be based on guilt or some misguided sense of righting past wrongs.

British Columbians have recognized this. The opposition parties also realize the underlying principles of the current treaty negotiations in B.C. are flawed. It is time to look forward, not backward.

• (1250)

Certainly we must learn from the grim history of past Indian policies in Canada. However, what is the fundamental lesson to be learned? It is simply that policies which have given Indians special rights and status under the guise of protecting them have utterly failed. For many years Indians lost their status and right to live with their families on reserves if they received a university degree or if they defended our country or values in wars overseas. They were not even allowed to vote until the 1960s. Children were taken from their families and sent to foster homes or residential schools. Although Indian communities have known about it for decades, the stories of physical, emotional and sexual abuse suffered by those children are only now coming to light in the mainstream press.

Just this week the church has finally issued an apology for the suffering caused by its members.

That Indians were mistreated, used and abused is well documented. However, it does neither natives nor non–natives any good to dwell on the past. It will not solve today's problems. We must learn from mistakes to make sure we do not repeat them, but it is time to move on.

The treaty process in B.C. is going in the wrong direction. It is designed to perpetuate inequality. In the Constitution Act of 1982 aboriginal and treaty rights were given constitutional protection. That means any treaties we enter hastily into now will be virtually unchangeable, no matter how flawed or unsustainable they may prove to be.

Any legal obligations to Indian communities should be cleared up as soon as possible because until we do, the question of aboriginal title will remain unresolved and the legal uncertainty over the ownership of land and resources will continue.

Settlements must be affordable and settlements must be final. If the federal and provincial governments purport to represent the interests of all Canadians they will only negotiate what the courts have stated the government is legally liable for.

As far as I know, the courts have not said the government has to turn large tracts of land over to native communities. In the Delgamuukw case, as has already been stated, the judges recognized an aboriginal interest in the land but not an outright title. Therefore legally the crown does not have to turn over title to all lands that a band claims as traditional territory, but it does have to recognize certain traditional rights to use those lands.

We must respect these court decisions because they are based on the constitutional protection of aboriginal rights. Therefore any agreements the government signs should fully meet our legal obligations but should not go beyond them. If the government feels it has a moral obligation to offer more, then all such offers should be made outside of the treaty process.

The governments of the day do not have a mandate to incur unsustainable debts beyond their legal obligation in the name of our children. They do not have the right to create citizens–plus by enshrining new treaties which give additional rights based on membership in a particular band or community. This will soon be the 21st century, not the 12th.

I would be very pleased if any member opposite, in fact anybody participating in the B.C. treaty process, could point out where in the Constitution it states we must enter into new treaties. I recognize that existing treaties have constitutional protection but I have not found the section that states we must enter into dozens, perhaps hundreds, more treaties.

Government has a legal and moral obligation to resolve disputes or grievances with all Canadians, whether aboriginal or not. I am not aware of the case law which states we must use a treaty process to do it. In every other segment of our society grievances are settled with some type of finite, quantifiable compensation. Why not Indian claims?

It is long past time that historical differences were dealt with, but the end result should be some sort of cash compensation, not a treaty with constitutionally entrenched special rights or status. Cash settlements would allow individual natives to determine their own futures. They could start their own small business, buy land or put it in the bank for their children if that was their wish.

If land is to be on the table also then it should be transferred to individual recipients on the same fee simple basis as to all other Canadians who own land.

• (1255)

The tax exempt status of the current reserve system afforded by the Indian Act was based on a paternalistic idea that Indians would sell off the land to the first unscrupulous businessman who happened to walk by. Nobody, aboriginal or non–aboriginal, wants the Indian Act any more. That also means getting rid of the tax exempt status. If natives are to participate in today's economy they must participate on an equal footing with all other Canadians.

Anyone who might suggest this would not be just or fair as a settlement is guilty of paternalistic racism. If government or native leaders suggest land can only be transferred as reserve lands held in common, they are suggesting native Canadians are incapable of making sound business decisions and government must still be responsible for protecting native interests because they cannot do it themselves.

What is the legacy of past treaties? First and foremost, it is the reserve system. This was a deliberate policy by the government to isolate and concentrate natives in easily managed groups. It was a bad policy from start to finish. The poverty, low life expectancies, health problems and social problems found on so many reserves across the country cannot be a fluke. Natives from the east coast, from the north, from the prairies and from fishing communities on the west coast are not from the same cultures or traditions. The problems we see on reserves are not because the people are Indians. The biggest part of the problem is the reserve system itself.

I believe first and foremost that all Canadians should have the right to equal opportunities. No one should have special rights or privileges based on race. This means we all pay taxes and we all have access to the same programs. All third party interests should be taken into consideration. This is not what is happening in B.C. today. The majority of British Columbians have grave concerns about the current B.C. treaty commission process.

We must reach just settlements with B.C. natives as soon as possible so we can all move on. These settlements must be final, affordable and must extinguish all future claims to land, resources or special rights and privileges. Without equality we will never have long term social and economic stability in Canada.

The enormous social problems we see on reserves today cannot be addressed through treaties. Treaties and reserves are, in my view, a big part of the problem.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stated there should be direct cash compensation instead of negotiated settlements with aboriginal peoples. Cash does form part of the settlements negotiated with aboriginal peoples. However, cash alone will not provide the kind of certainty and long lasting, enduring settlement necessary in this type of negotiation. This type of negotiation will benefit all of British Columbia in the end because we will be able to put these negotiated settlements to rest once and for all.

Negotiated agreements have been based on a range of benefits. There is a necessity to provide that range to continue to have an enduring and lasting distribution of rights for the native peoples, which have to cover harvesting rights, participation in wildlife and environmental management.

The hon. member said he did not know where there was a legal basis for settlement comprehensive land claims. In 1973 the supreme court ruling in the Calder case acknowledged the existence of aboriginal title in Canadian law. More recently, in the Sparrow case the supreme court recognized a constitutionally protected aboriginal right to fish for food. The courts have emphasized in these cases that the proper way to resolve outstanding claims to aboriginal rights and title to land and resources must be through negotiated agreements.

The hon. member said we should fee simple or its equivalent. That is exactly what we are doing. Perhaps the hon. member might acquaint himself better with what the treaty negotiation process is all about.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member opposite has covered a lot of ground.

• (1300)

She said I said I favoured direct cash compensation and that I did not favour negotiated settlements. That is ridiculous. That is not what I said at all.

I said I was in favour of cash settlements but obviously it will have to be negotiated. How can government come to some agreement on how much cash to turn over to the natives without negotiating it? That is an absolutely ridiculous statement. That is not what I was saying. The only reason she said that was she was hearing, as is so often the case, exactly what she wanted to hear when she was listening to my remarks.

That points to the fundamental problem Reformers have in the House and outside the House. We try to shed light on subjects that are politically sensitive, as so many are, whether outstanding native claims or immigration or gay rights, whatever is deemed politically incorrect to speak on.

When Reformers put forward the policies we want to put forward, we are attacked. If we spend all our time trying to defend ourselves from the statements we heard this morning once again in the House, we will never be able to put forward our own alternatives, which is the function of an opposition party, to put forward alternatives for the Canadian people.

That is the real question here. Will we have an open process? Will we have a process that welcomes input from everyone? Will we continue to see these types of settlements actually being done behind closed doors where there are a very few people included in the process: the native leadership, the native industry comprised of consultants and engineers and lots of lawyers. Will we broaden that to include the people themselves, not only the aboriginal people of British Columbia but the non–aboriginal people in the process and make them aware of what is happening?

Further, the member made a comment about the legal basis of these. What I was referring to is I do not see anywhere where there is a legal basis for entering into treaties. Yes, we have to have settlements. We have to have agreements. I do not see where we have to enter into a treaty which confers on one group special rights, constitutionally entrenched, not conferred on all Canadians.

As long as we have that we will see more divisiveness. We will be driving the wedge between aboriginal and non–aboriginal people deeper and deeper instead of trying to mend the problems of the past that I referred to in my speech and instead of trying to move beyond that eventually.

We cannot achieve equality overnight. The Reform Party is not saying we can wave a magic wand and all of a sudden we are all equal. We recognize that some segments of society, the poorest of the poor, are starting out a lot lower down and we have to give them a hand up. A hand up is not a continual and perpetual handout. The people do not want it and we should not want to give it to them because it is not the answer.

If a handout forever were the answer, certainly spending upwards of $9 billion a year on aboriginal programs within the confines the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and outside would have solved the problem by now.

We are spending in the neighbourhood of $9,000 million on these people. Yes, we all want to see the problem solved, but throwing money will not solve the problem or we would have done it long ago.

It has also been said repeatedly today that a very select few, although a growing industry, are profiting from that, this Indian industry. When I visit reserves in my riding like Fort Ware, a disastrous example of a reserve, I see the assistance that we all so desperately want to ensure gets to the poorest of the poor is not reaching them. It is not doing the job.

No matter how much more we spend every year, it is not doing the job. We have to look beyond that. We have to look for new answers.

• (1305)

The whole thrust of my speech was that in the end the ultimate goal for all Canadians, aboriginal and non–aboriginal, must be equality, the equal treatment of all our citizens.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. I will address the actual decision or policy to negotiate treaties.

This government policy is more advanced in British Columbia than elsewhere across the country. A growing amount of concern is arising in British Columbia as this process takes place. The concern is not only in British Columbia but is starting to spread across the country. There is input today from grassroots aboriginals. Their concern is that this negotiation progress may lead to a situation in which there is just a transfer of power to a more local level where they still would not have any say as to what is going to happen in their lives. On the non–aboriginal side there is a growing concern that we do not know what is being negotiated.

When we look at the concerns arising we tend to think an approach was taken to negotiate versus going to the courts. By negotiating it stays within the parliamentary jurisdiction whereas if it were taken into the legal field it would be within the court jurisdiction. It is still here in the House. This negotiation process is seen to be the route to go.

When we get a good idea we have to market it for it to catch on and be accepted. There was not that communication for this policy and this approach to the situation. The concerns are mounting to a point that the concerns are being expressed in the provincial legislature in British Columbia by the opposition sides.

There have been statements that they may not recognize the existing agreements. I believe the Nisga'a band is the one most advanced and used as the example.

I do not wish to debate all the examples occurring within the negotiation process. I would like to address my remarks to the concerns. They are not only communication concerns from both sides of the table and the public. There is also the whole process of negotiation. If we put negotiation into a management–labour context, the membership knows what is on the table and what is being negotiated. The doors may be closed to the negotiation rooms when that is actually taking place but we still know the types of topics on the table.

The municipalities are suggesting they are not represented at the table. Another comeback to that is the municipalities are represented by the provincial representatives we elect. However, the problem is the information from the negotiation is not coming back to the people or is not even put to the people beforehand so that we know what is on the table, what is being discussed and what the possible parameters are for a subsequent decision. That is one aspect of the negotiation process that is very faulty.

Another problem occurring and giving rise to concern is the various definitions. For example, there are a great number of Canadians who thought this negotiation process would be addressed to existing treaties or the historical treaties. I believe the government approach was to negotiate those treaties and come up with an extinguishment thereof, then satisfy that commitment made in our history and then get on to building life as Canadians in unity. What we are hearing now are things like modern treaties, living treaties, aboriginal rights, extinguishment. We do not really know what these terms mean. This again is causing concern.

• (1310)

When the Hamilton report came out it tried to address the extinguishment and aboriginal rights. One of the things identified in the Hamilton report, or before that, is that when the aboriginals go in to negotiate a treaty they leave all their rights at the door. They go in trying to see what they can get. That is not cricket in negotiations. When a negotiation is entered into, one does have rights somewhere which should be identified. Even between management and labour the previous contract is a starting point.

One of the things that is happening is the concept of rights. What does that mean? The Hamilton report tries to address it with the following point of view. When a treaty is negotiated, the decisions reached by all parties become the rights of all parties and the next time a treaty is negotiated it commences with those rights. The report also suggests we address the extinguishment aspect of this. Once the topic has been addressed and agreed on it is extinguished and no longer comes up. I believe there is an opening clause. If not, there should be an opening clause so that when society changes that can come back to the table.

There is some sort of finality which could address the extinguishment. That tends to give rise to where this modern treaty or the living treaty comes into play. I do not believe this concept was apparent when the original policy was established. Unless we hear more information as to where this kind of thing can lead us, that in itself will provide concern.

To get back to the process and concern aspect of it, there is concern from a parliamentary point of view of actually getting to the point. I do not wish to address the contents of the bill on the B.C. commission at this point. My point is we had a bill come into the House for debate that was actually established by an agreement between three parties that had representatives there. The House was actually debating something that had already been established.

I can understand that the possibility of defeating that bill creates a horrendous amount of work. We would have to backtrack to all that was done before that. However, because these are our representatives, it could possibly have been debated in the House before the parties went into agreement and that there were some parameters set so that we knew what was going to be on that table when the negotiations were undertaken.

Another thing that comes out of this when we are talking about cultural groups again is the process taking place. This concern arises when we hear such things as aboriginals referring to themselves as nations. The obvious conclusion to that would be nations within a nation. The perception of how that would work is unknown. That is a concern to us.

We also must look at the unity point of view. We have on the one hand a negotiation process that could feasibly terminate in this nations within nation concept or be the first step toward that in our future. On the other hand we have a parliamentary kind of process going on with the Quebec situation, which is again a divisiveness kind of thing. I should restrict my remarks to the aboriginal process. But are we creating through this process another possibility to be debating unity somewhere down the line? I have some concerns on that.

• (1315)

What we have to look at in this whole thing—and British Columbia is trying to get the message across to Canadians—is that a lack of information is getting out to the people. We do not know what is being discussed at the table. We are sitting here wondering with what we will be left.

The counter argument to that is we do have representatives there. My point is that they have not come out and discussed things with whoever they are representing and then taken that information back to the table.

To give my comments more clarity, think of management and union negotiations. We know what these people are talking about behind closed doors. We know all the parameters of it, but we know that their discussions will eventually lead to something. We may not get all we want, but we might get part of what we want.

I suggest very strongly to the government that it can no longer negotiate behind closed doors. It has to be up front. B.C. is in a position that it is much further ahead than the rest of the country on this negotiation situation. If we are having problems in British Columbia, then it is going to transfer all across this country as we go along, unless we change some of the things we are doing in the process right now. Municipal governments have to be informed of how their concerns get represented at that table and there has to be a mechanism for that to occur, et cetera.

The other item that has to be put out in general terms is what is this self–government thing we are talking about. Is it a municipal kind of situation? Is it a provincial kind of situation? Will it lead to individual territories within our country, or will it lead to the possibility of future negotiations in relation to unity? These are some of the concerns I have about the whole process.

We should be looking at the British Columbia situation, not only with what is happening today, but where this will lead us in our future, 10, 15, 100 years from now.

Is the Hamilton report strictly based on negotiations and setting the parameters? I would assume it is not far afield from being incorporated into this process as it was commissioned by the minister.

The modern treaty, the living treaty, has to be identified. There has to be some kind of indication to the public, both aboriginal and non–aboriginal, that this negotiation process can be speeded up, that we are not looking at another 20 or 30 years to negotiate individual contracts.

There is concern for the situation in British Columbia and it has reached the ears of the political components in that province. They are also expressing concerns about aspects of this process. I sincerely hope and recommend that the government stop and have a look at what is actually occurring here and coming up with some sort of options, if they choose to follow this policy, in which they can address some of these concerns.

There is one other point I would like to make before I close. A great number of these negotiations are based on the fact that the self–government component of the band will be democratic. Yet for the band to establish that democratic process and hold elections, they really do not have an appeal process to a Canadian election officer, other than an appeal to the minister. This should be addressed as well and bring them into the Canadian process of elections.

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the Quebec referendum process at one point. I recall the Reform Party talking about the need to continue government as usual. However, in this case we are being asked to hold back a process until there is an election in British Columbia. That election could be in the far distant future. It has not been called and it does not need to be called for some time. This appears to be a contradiction in the policy of the Reform Party.

• (1320)

The second point which I want to make relates to the comment which was made about the negotiations being held in secret. It is very clear that any negotiation requires an element of secrecy. It is required when we buy a car. We do not let the bottom line be known right away. However, in the case of the negotiations about which we speak today, the Government of Canada has issued a statement indicating how it intends to ensure that the treaty making process will be open and accessible and how public records will be maintained. In fact, there will be a sharing of information.

I wonder if the hon. member is aware of the statement and what her comments would be on the analogy with Quebec.

Ms. Bridgman: Mr. Speaker, my comment expresses my concern about the situation in relation to unity. There is a unity debate going on between one province and Canada. However, there is the possibility of future unity debates happening with various aboriginal groups if we pursue this course without some clarification of what it means.

Those persons who are well informed on the process and the ultimate resolution may not share the same concerns I do. They may not see the aboriginal negotiation process as possibly leading us to another unity difficulty in the future. If that is not so, please share it with the rest of us in order to allay this concern.

My main message is that in Canada we have two different processes happening which could lead to similar debates in the future.

The second question concerned public information. I agree that there has been an effort made in the last year with respect to providing the public with more information. That stemmed from outspoken people expressing their concerns in the proper circles. However, a lot of the information, if not all of it, is after the fact. We still do not know the conditions we are negotiating. Basically what we are seeing are great claims for land. We do not actually know what is going to happen.

I am suggesting that if we follow our democratic process of electing representatives, we do have those representatives there, but we have absolutely no idea what they are doing until after it has been done. If they looked at the process they certainly could allay a lot of the public's concern by being a little more informative of what their objectives are.

With respect to the delaying of the process, that remark may have been related to political strategy concerning the election. Be that as it may, what I am addressing here is the fact that the delay should be to review what is actually happening because of these concerns. A stitch in time might save nine. The problem will not go away unless we see a concerted effort by those persons involved and the government to come out with an outline of the objectives they are trying to achieve.

• (1325)

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping there would be some Reform members in the House to witness—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows how angry he gets when that comment is made from the other side of the House. It is not permitted to make reference to the presence or absence of other members in the House and I would ask the member not to do it again.

Mr. Telegdi: My apologies, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to support the comments made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on the importance of treaty negotiations. As members of this House are aware, only a small minority of First Nations in the province of B.C. have ever signed treaties with the crown.

On lower Vancouver Island several First Nations signed treaties with Governor Douglas in the middle of the 19th century. By the end of the century the Peace River district was included in Treaty No. 8 signed by the Government of Canada.

In the past two decades the Nisga'a Tribal Council has been actively negotiating with the federal and provincial governments. When these negotiations are completed and an agreement is signed, it will be the first treaty with B.C.'s First Nations signed in this century.

We are approaching the threshold of the next century. British Columbians want to approach the 21st century secure in the knowledge that the unfinished business of the 19th century has been completed.

The land claims of British Columbia's First Nations must be resolved because resolving these issues creates an environment of certainty. Certainty means economic growth and job creation. Settling land and resource issues creates an environment for investment and increased local economic activity.

Over the past few years we have made a great deal of progress toward resolving this unfinished business. In 1990 the federal and provincial governments and the leaders of the B.C. First Nations agreed to establish a task force that would map out a negotiation process that would accommodate the many First Nations in B.C. that wanted to negotiate settlements.

The task force reported on June 28, 1991 with 19 recommendations. All of them were accepted by the First Nations summit, Canada and British Columbia. One of the key recommendations was to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission or BCTC as an arm's length keeper of the process. I would remind the House that the current leader of the B.C. Reform Party was one of the key architects of this process. I congratulate him on his vision and wisdom.

The agreement committed the principles to establish the BCTC through the passage of federal and provincial statutes and the resolution of the summit. As my colleagues know, Bill C–107 was passed by the House last week and has now been put before the other place.

The commissioners began their valuable work on December 15, 1993 and have made considerable progress. Forty–seven First Nations groups are involved in the BCTC process to date. They represent over 70 per cent of the First Nations of the province, with more likely to become involved in the near future.

The BCTC consists of five commissioners, two nominated by the First Nations summit, one by the provincial government and one by the Government of Canada. The chief commissioner is duly selected and appointed by all three of the principals.

The First Nations summit includes all First Nations in B.C. that have agreed to participate in the BCTC six–stage treaty negotiation process. The summit provides a forum for First Nations involved in the treaty process to meet and discuss treaty negotiations. It worked closely with the federal and provincial governments in the development of the treaty negotiation process and in the establishment of the BCTC.

As one of the principles of the process it continues to provide direction along with the governments of Canada and British Columbia. The B.C. summit chiefs believe that negotiation rather than confrontation and litigation is the best way to solve outstanding issues. It is unfortunate that the Reform Party does not think the same.

I would like to tell the House a bit about the men and women who have offered to serve Canada, B.C. and the summit as the BCTC commissioners. Carole Corcoran was elected by the First Nations summit as one of the first treaty commissioners. She also sat on the royal commission on Canada's future in 1990–91 and serves on the board of governors at the University of Northern British Columbia. Unfortunately Ms. Corcoran has recently resigned.

On October 4, the First Nations summit chiefs selected Miles Richardson of Haida Gwaii to succeed Ms. Corcoran as the second First Nation treaty commissioner. Mr. Richardson was a member of the B.C. claims task force which reported to the governments of Canada, B.C. and First Nations on how the parties could begin negotiations to build a new partnership. From 1991 to 1993 Mr. Richardson was part of the First Nations summit task group, an executive body reporting to the First Nations in B.C. on treaty negotiations.

• (1330)

The First Nations summit has also elected as one of its commissioners Wilf Adam of the Lake Babine Indian Band. Mr. Adam is a former chief councillor of the band. He is chairman of the Burns Lake Native Development Corporation and is co–founder of the Burns Lake Law Centre.

British Columbia has appointed Barbara Fisher, formerly general counsel and Vancouver director of the Office of the Ombudsman. She currently practices part time as counsel to the B.C Information and Privacy Commission.

Since last April the Government of Canada's representative to the commission has been Peter Lusztig. Dr. Lusztig has been a professor of finance at the University of British Columbia and also brings considerable breadth of experience from the community. He has sat on the B.C. Royal Commission on Automobile Insurance and the B.C. Commission of Inquiry on the Tree Fruit Industry. In 1991 he also chaired the Asia Pacific Initiative Advisory Committee struck by the federal and provincial governments.

Since last May the chief commissioner has been Mr. Alec Robertson, QC. The legal community is familiar with his past work as president of the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association, chairman of the Law Foundation of B.C. and as a member of the Gender Equality Task Force of the Canadian Bar Association. Mr. Robertson spoke eloquently on Bill C–107 before the standing committee.

The House will recognize that the BCTC consists of five distinguished British Columbians. They are doing excellent work to ensure that the comprehensive claims process moves along in a timely and orderly manner.

The commission oversees the six–stage treaty negotiation process which includes: one, statement of intent; two, preparation for negotiations; three; negotiation of a framework agreement; four, negotiation of an agreement in principle; five, negotiation to finalize a treaty; and six, implementation of the treaty.

The commission assesses the readiness of the parties to negotiate. This involves making sure that the First Nations have the resources they require to make their case. It also includes ensuring that the federal and provincial governments have established regional advisory committees so that the interests of the local residents who are not aboriginal can be heard.

These regional advisory committees are part of an extensive and responsible effort to keep the public and all affected third parties informed of the developments in the negotiations as well as to ensure the advice of all sectors of B.C. society is considered. Other efforts include newsletters, public information meetings, a 1–800 number, numerous speaking engagements, information brochures and other publications, and participation in trade shows. The Sechelt negotiations are televised.

The commission allocates loan funding to enable First Nations to participate in the process. It works with all parties to ensure that they get on with the job in a timely manner. If required and if agreed to by all parties, the commission will assist the parties to obtain dispute resolution services if the negotiations seem to be reaching an impasse.

Finally, the commission helps ensure that the process remains open and accountable. It prepares and maintains a public record on the status of negotiations, and it reports to this House on that status. Its annual reports are tabled in this House. In summary, the B.C. Treaty Commission facilitates treaty negotiations; it is not a party to the negotiations.

I am sure that members on both sides of this House would agree that settlement of land claims in British Columbia is long overdue. British Columbia is home to 17 per cent of Canada's aboriginal population, yet treaties have been signed with only a small minority of First Nations there. The question of land issues surrounding undefined aboriginal rights must be brought to a successful conclusion.

The federal government is committed to settling land claims in a fair and equitable manner for aboriginal people as well as third parties and the general public. I urge the House to vote down this regressive and spiteful motion.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member two questions.

The member made reference in the beginning of his speech to addressing the historical treaties. I agree. We have been 300 or whatever number of years at that. I also express some apprehension with this concept of the modern, living or new treaties, whatever we wish to call them.

• (1335)

Does the hon. member think that the creation of more treaties will put us in a similar situation as the existing or the back treaties have? Would it take us x amount of time to get these other treaties into some state of agreement between all parties?

The next question is in relation to the B.C. Treaty Commission. We understand that body is preparing parties to negotiate and actually does not participate in the negotiation process itself. In the preparation of that body's mandate, would it ensure that the people who are going to the table have consulted with those whom they represent so that they go into the negotiation process with the blessings of their membership, or are they going in based on their opinions?

Mr. Telegdi: Mr. Speaker, the whole treaty process is about making sure we give people a hand up and not a hand out. We want to end the dependence which has taken place over too many years while the treaties have not been solved. The native community has not had the opportunity to make a contribution and be self–sufficient.

There have been many questions regarding the legal basis for settling comprehensive land claims and what their status is. I can say that the 1973 Supreme Court ruling in the Calder case acknowledged existence of aboriginal title in Canadian law. More recently in the Sparrow case the Supreme Court has recognized constitutionality protecting the aboriginal rights to fish for food.

Since 1973, as a result of a number of court rulings the Government of Canada has as a matter of policy negotiated settlements with aboriginal groups that assert aboriginal title and where there is some evidence of continuing title. The Constitution Act, 1982 affirms and recognizes existing aboriginal treaty rights.

We want to end uncertainty associated with unsettled land claims. By addressing it we produce certainty. The production of that certainty would result in jobs and investment and a healthier B.C. economy.

Various studies have indicated that $1 billion in investment are forgone in the resource industries. Thousands of jobs could be made available if the treaty process were to be successfully conclude.

In terms of whether the people are representing their stakeholders, I would say that yes they are. Beyond that I would like to draw attention to the 31 members who are part of the treaty negotiations advisory committee. They virtually cover the whole section of the economic activity in British Columbia: the B.C. Shellfish Growers Association, the B.C. Fishing Resorts Association, sports fishing institutions, the Steelhead Society of B.C., the Union of B.C. Municipalities, the Community Fishing Industry Council, Fisheries Council of B.C., the United Fishermen, northern fishing representatives, the Interior Forest Industry Coalition. There is representation from the unions, the Industrial Woodworkers of America, a fine union I was a member of at one point. There is the B.C. Real Estate Association, the B.C. Federation of Agriculture and the list goes on and on.

It would seem to me that at some point we have to have some trust in the process. We have to end this injustice which has existed, and a costly injustice I might say. All studies have shown that economically British Columbia is suffering from the uncertainty. We want to establish some certainty on this question and give justice to the native people which I believe is long overdue.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that three government members have addressed our motion so far today. If memory serves me correctly, all three of them gave accolades to Mr. Jack Weisgerber, the leader of the B.C. Reform Party. I remember the hon. member's words: "I congratulate him for his vision and foresight". I would certainly agree that Mr. Weisgerber is a man with vision and foresight.

• (1340)

I would like to read into Hansard the following quote: "The vast majority of British Columbians rejected the backroom deal that was Charlottetown. They rejected the constitutional entrenchment of an undefined inherent right of self–government and so do I. They rejected a third order of government for native Canadians enshrined under the Constitution and so do I. We also reject the government's formal recognition of aboriginal title". That is from a speech given on October 4, 1995 by Mr. Jack Weisgerber, the leader of the B.C. Reform Party.

I wonder if the hon. member who is so free with accolades for this gentleman, which are richly deserved, would agree with those statements and that he truly is a man of vision and foresight.

Mr. Telegdi: Mr. Speaker, I referred to the decisions he made when he was a cabinet minister in the government of the Social Credit Party. Clearly, he is a perfect case in point as to how a reasonable person of the Social Credit Party can be transformed into a Reformer who does not make sense.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River. I oppose the motion. I consider it to be ill–conceived. Why do I take that position?

The first reason is that the correct approach to the issue was set out by the government in its red book promises. In the red book the government made it very clear that if we were elected we would be committed to building new partnerships with aboriginal peoples based on trust and mutual respect. We stated in the red book what a Liberal government would do.

We stated that our goal was a Canada where aboriginal people would enjoy a standard of living and quality of life and opportunity equal to those of other Canadians. It would be a Canada where First Nations, Inuit and Metis would live self–reliantly, secure in the knowledge of who they are as unique peoples. All Canadians would be enriched by aboriginal cultures and would be committed to the fair sharing of the potential of our nation. It would be a Canada where aboriginal people would have the positive option to live and work wherever they chose. Perhaps most important, we set out our goal for a Canada where aboriginal children would grow up in secure families and in healthy communities with the opportunity to take their full place in Canada.

As a result, we also said that the resolution of land claims would be a priority. This is our vision and we have been moving step by step to bring it alive. In two years we have already made considerable progress.

On August 10 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the federal interlocutor for Metis and non–status Indians announced the government's approach to the implementation of the inherent right of aboriginal self–government. We have fostered greater economic development opportunities for aboriginal communities through co–management agreements and support for business ventures. We have committed an additional $20 million annually to the Indian and Inuit post–secondary student support program. We have settled some 44 specific claims and we have seen five comprehensive claims come into effect. By any measure we have achieved a great deal in living up to the commitments we made to the people of Canada in the red book during the election.

Perhaps the most complex challenge to the government and to the people of Canada in this area is treaty making in British Columbia. I would like to remind the House that British Columbia is unique in Canada. If I could remind hon. members of the debate which was recently held in the House, it is a distinct society in this respect, in that the process of signing treaties has never been completed. Only a handful of treaties were signed in the pre–Confederation period and they cover parts of Vancouver Island only.

In 1899 Treaty No. 8 was signed with the First Nations in the Peace River area in the northeast of the province. However, in the rest of the province the issues of aboriginal rights remain largely unresolved. First Nations legitimately want to see a resolution to these issues.

● (1345)

We have repeatedly seen the First Nations of British Columbia press for treaty resolution. Until this decade, however, the provincial government had been unwilling to negotiate. It took the position that there was no need to negotiate because whatever rights to land and resources the aboriginal people may have had in British Columbia had been extinguished by an act of the crown.

The result was decades of legal acrimony. The First Nations first sought settlement through the courts of what they had been unable to achieve through the negotiation process. In 1973 the Supreme Court of Canada was asked whether the aboriginal title to the Nisga'a traditional territory had been extinguished in the Calder case. In that case the six judges were evenly split on the question. It fell on a very narrow technical issue in the way in which the case had been brought.

It was very clear from reading the judgments in the case that there was a recognition by the courts of the country of a legitimate claim to aboriginal rights in British Columbia which had to be addressed equitably if we were ever to resolve this extraordinarily important issue.

The courts for their part have expressed repeatedly and in the strongest terms that the issues brought before them ought to be settled at the negotiating table and not before the bar, settled through negotiations and not litigation. Many cases have determined this issue. I cite Judge Macfarlane in one who wrote:

> Treaty making is the best way to respect Indian rights. The questions of what aboriginal rights exist...cannot be decided in this case, and are ripe for negotiation.

He went on to observe:

> During the course of these proceedings, it became apparent that there were two schools of thought.
>
> The first is an all or nothing approach, which says that the Indian Nations were here first, that they have exclusive ownership and control of all the land and resources and may deal with them as they see fit.
> The second is a co–existence approach, which says that the Indian interest and other interests can co–exist to a large extent, and that consultation and reconciliation is the process by which the Indian culture can be preserved and by which other Canadians may be assured that their interests, developed over 125 years of nationhood, can also be respected—I favour the second approach.

I must say I agree. When I was in the private practice of law I had the opportunity of being involved in a case that was very interesting and very instructive in this area. It was the Baker Lake case. It took place in the Northwest Territories. The court also resolved and ruled that the applicants in that case had aboriginal rights, but the court failed to set out what those aboriginal rights were. It failed to set out what the specificity of those rights were.

Therefore the aboriginal peoples in the area were left with the unpleasant situation of knowing they had a right but not knowing whether they could exercise it in contradistinction against mining companies that might be in conflict with their claims and exercise it in contradistinction against other claims.

These issues cannot necessarily be settled by courts of law. The courts may lay out a general provision such as saying that there are aboriginal rights that have not been extinguished. That is a legal issue and an issue a court can rule on.

What is the exact content of those rights and how they will be applied in a modern complex society where there are conflicts between urban and rural uses of land mixed with that of the aboriginal peoples? They have to be addressed in the negotiating process. That is being sought in the circumstances. That is why I agree with what the judge said in the case to which I have referred. I am sure members of the House would agree that the co–existence approach, based upon consultation and reconciliation, is the appropriate approach.

I am sorry, I say to my legal fraternity friends, to suggest that court is not the place to be on this issue. There are places where we do not need lawyers and we certainly do not need judges to resolve them. We need the political will to have people sit down and resolve their disputes with a mutual trust and understanding among them.

It pains me to say that in the province of British Columbia today quality of trust is absent. I happen to come from Vancouver originally. I happen to have the privilege of going back to Vancouver regularly. I have seen the tremendous turbulent summer of pain and protest that took place last summer. These confrontations will not resolve the issues. It is only through negotiation and mutual respect that we will be able to do that. It will not work through an all or nothing approach.

We cannot leave the resolution of the issues for those who have little respect for the law. That is what worries me about the resolution. It astonishes me that a member of the third party would bring forward a resolution suggesting that this issue be pushed over for a couple of years. Basically that is the suggestion.

• (1350)

I have listened to the passionate intensity with which members of the third party speak in the House about the rights of their constituents, about their need to defend their constituents, and about how their rights are not being properly regarded by the government and by the ways in which the laws of the country apply.

What would they advocate to their constituents about the resolution of their essential rights, how their lives will be conducted and how they will be able to earn their living? These rights have been in abeyance in some cases for 30, 40 or 50 frustrating years. Would they go back to their constituents and suggest that they just sit still and put this off? I find that difficult to believe. I do not believe they would do that. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. We should not be treating the aboriginal peoples of the country or of the province of British Columbia any differently than we treat other citizens in this respect.

We have a B.C. Treaty Commission. It establishes a solid foundation for consultation and reconciliation. At the heart of its operations are the coexistence approach and consultative approach. There are those in the House and those in the community who would maintain that the process concedes too much to First Nations. This too is starting to sow discontent.

I have heard radio shows in British Columbia. I have heard members say that 100 per cent of the province is covered by claims of the aboriginal peoples. However hon. members know better than this. We all know that claims are one thing, but to exaggerate them as a threat to the existence of the process is irresponsible. Claims are one thing. They are put forward but they can be resolved not necessarily in a court of law but in a framework of consultation, mutual respect and a desire to achieve a result that will be beneficial for all parties.

If that approach is taken, rather than an in terrorem approach of having huge claims, of the whole province being swamped and taken away from us, we would move toward a much more satisfactory resolution of the issue.

We know there are overlapping claims. The commission knows that is the case. They can be dealt with. We will not move forward by leaving the issue fester for another two years, until after another provincial government election; pushing it off into the future; and allowing the distrust, mistrust and exaggerations on both sides to prevail.

For those reasons I urge the House not to adopt an all or nothing approach. We should give to the British Columbia Treaty Commission its right to facilitate modern day treaties, to assess the readiness of parties to begin the negotiations, to allocate negotiation funding to aboriginal peoples, to assist parties to obtain dispute resolution services at the request of all parties and to monitor the status of negotiations.

In that way we could move the issue onward and start the process of achieving an equitable, just and lasting resolution of an issue that is extraordinarily important not only to the citizens of British Columbia but all citizens of the country who wish to see a harmonious social climate in which to operate.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened quite attentively to my hon. colleague's comments about the Reform motion that has been put forward today.

We really have to describe the reason behind it. Perhaps we have not been explicit enough in explaining it. We feel very strongly that the British Columbia government at this time lacks credibility and does not have the confidence of the B.C. people to continue to proclaim it has a mandate to bring about some very comprehensive claims agreements and new treaties for British Columbia.

I listened to the member say that trust was absent in British Columbia. Certainly it is, but we have to ask why it is absent. I assert that it is because of the bungling of both provincial and federal governments in the past.

• (1355)

Given the claims in the territories which in the opinion of a great many Canadians were very generous, is it any wonder there is concern among Canadians about the extent of the claims in British Columbia?

Mr. Graham: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a complicated issue. The first part of the issue concerns the governance of the country. He is saying that his sense of the political process in British Columbia or that of observers is that the present government lacks credibility.

I do not disagree the present government in British Columbia is in political difficulty. We live in a process whereby that government was elected for a certain term and has certain obligations to serve the people of British Columbia. This is not a new policy that has been brought forward. The argument would stand better both with the public and with the political process if this were some radical departure the present government was proposing, if it were something in the extreme. That is not what is happening.

The commission has been put in place to take the venom out of the process and to get the negotiations moving along. There is no guarantee they will be completed before the government changes, but the process must be allowed to continue.

To use the present government's unpopularity as a pretext to end what has been a long, extended historical process, which for some people has been going on for 40 years, would be unfair to the aboriginal peoples. It would be disrespectful to the political process of the country.

Sometimes in parliamentary debate we exchange views about one another, but I am sure the hon. member would be very unhappy if I were to stand and say that the polls indicated that the Reform Party has x per cent and therefore nothing he says in the House is to have any credibility. The member was elected. He has a right to speak.

That government was elected to do a job. It is doing its job. There is no sense that it will necessarily complete it but we must continue the process. We have a democratically elected process in the country that has established a mechanism by which we are finally seeing some chance for the resolution of these enormously complex, difficult and important social issues.

I for one would like to see the process continue and to see a peaceful resolution achieved. That is why I find it very difficult to accept the basic premise under which the motion has been moved.

The Speaker: My colleagues, it being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), we will now proceed to statements by members.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago I had the pleasure of visiting a dairy farm in Oxford county as the guest of Jim Donaldson of Donaldson International Livestock Ltd., Lubor Dobrovic of the Slovak State Breeding Institute, and George Heyder of the Slovak Holstein Association. Also present was a member of the board of directors of Ridgetown College and the communications adviser of CIDA.

Donaldson International has arranged for training to be provided for key people in the Slovakian dairy industry over the next three years. This $800,000 development project will help to develop a modern sustainable dairy industry in Slovakia.

It is encouraging in the extreme to know that small Canadian businesses, Canadian educational institutions and CIDA can co–operate in such important endeavours.

This three–year project will prove beneficial to the dairy industry in both countries and will build closer ties between Canada and the new Republic of Slovakia.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today is a sad day in that it marks the 20th anniversary of the invasion of East Timor by the Indonesian army. As you know, this invasion resulted in one of the worst holocausts since 1945, with the genocide of more than one third of the population.

Unfortunately, East Timorians are still the victims of one of the harshest political repressions known.

Year after year, reputable organizations such as Amnesty International, condemn violations of human rights in that country. On this sad day, which reminds us that too many human beings die in the name of freedom, the Bloc Quebecois wants to condemn the very timid attitude of the Canadian government regarding the promotion of human rights.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on December 6 the "Stop the Great Train Robbery" bus came to Parliament Hill. This bus was covered with thousands of signatures protesting gross over subsidization of VIA Rail at a time when Canadians are facing crippling government debt.

The bus carried supporters of the protest and a petition containing almost 10,000 signatures. The Minister of Transport had been requested to accept the petition from these concerned citizens but did not even bother to respond to the request.

I accepted the petition, but because it is not in a form deemed presentable in the House for the government I cannot present it here. As an alternative I invite the Minister of Transport to accept it from me outside the doors of the House immediately after question period.

I also ask the minister again to take action to stop VIA Rail from reducing already heavily subsidized fares so it can take Canadian taxpayers' money and use it to compete against customers unsubsidized in the private sector.

The minister can choose to send out a message of goodwill to Canadian taxpayers or he can continue to squander their money. Thousands of people who signed this petition are waiting for his response.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, for more than 20 years successive federal governments have claimed to be fighting inflation and the deficit by cutting corporate taxes, raising interest rates and cutting programs. What have investors done with the interest earned and the taxes saved? They have used their surplus funds to bid up existing stocks to the point at which general stock values in Canada are reported to be up 35 per cent over last year.

To continue generating existing levels of profit, their prices for goods and services provided will have to be pushed up, as will inflation.

If the government is serious about fighting inflation and the deficit, a tax on transactions can both cool inflationary pressures and reduce the deficit. Such a multiple approach to fighting the deficit and inflation might actually work, unlike current policy fixation with high interest rates, low corporate taxes and deep program cuts.

Surely after 20 years of failure to meet even one deficit target it is time to try some things that might actually work.

BANKS

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the big banks would like to sell insurance directly to their customers.

Many Canadians are worried about concentrating economic power in the hands of a few large banks, putting the safety of the financial system at risk.

In changing the Bank Act, the government should be careful not to reduce competition. Consumers would suffer from reduced choice in the financial industry. Banks selling insurance would have an unfair advantage over insurance companies. Insurance companies are not entitled to have the same government guarantees the banks have, including Canada deposit insurance. Banks will also have an unfair advantage if they are allowed to use confidential client information to help sell insurance.

Any changes to the Bank Act must be fair to the insurance companies and must protect the consumer. Banks should stick to their mandate and start lending money to small businesses, the engine of the country's economy.

Rather than letting the banks expand into insurance, we should tax their record profits and force them to lend more money to small businesses.

MALVERN REMEDIAL PROJECT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week in my riding of Scarborough—Rouge River we are completing the last of the work on the Malvern Remedial Project.

This is an initiative to restore a residential area where soil had been contaminated by low level radioactive material dumped during the second world war. Although the problem was discovered in 1980, it has taken 15 years for all levels of government and the community to achieve their goal of removing the contaminants and restoring this neighbourhood of family homes.

We want to recognize and thank the Minister of Natural Resources and the leadership of her officials, the province of Ontario for sharing the cost and purchasing the real estate required, AECL for its expertise, the city of Scarborough, the local advisory committee chaired by Mr. John Brickenden, elected representatives at the municipal, regional and provincial assemblies and, last but not least, the Ontario and Canadian taxpayers who underwrote the costs.

The Malvern/McLure neighbourhood says thank you for this successful initiative. We hope the Malvern Remedial Project can be a successful example of community and government working together to correct environmental mistakes of the past.

MINISTERS OF FINANCE

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it may come as a surprise to our beloved finance minister to learn that last Friday in my riding of Saskatoon—Humboldt there were no less than four individuals passing themselves off as the Minister of Finance of Canada.

• (1405)

The culprits are students from the University of Saskatchewan participating in an annual term project, the brainchild of Professor Marv Painter of the college of commerce, whereby undergraduate commerce and MBA students produce a federal budget.

This year 138 students made up the four teams which presented their government initiatives regarding economic and social policy, taxation, government spending, deficits and debt.

In support of their budget proposals, each group determined the source of revenues, allocation of expenditures and future estimates of GDP growth, interest rates, inflation and so on.

As one of a group of 50 invited to hear the budget speeches, I was very impressed with the effort put into this project and the vigour with which the students attacked this thorny fiscal challenge.

My congratulations to Professor Marv Painter and finance ministers Michelle Cocks, Roger Miller, Curtis McKenzie and Judy Karwacki, and the other students on a job well done.

QUEBEC CULTURE

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Quebecers from all political affiliations were stunned to hear the Prime Minister, a Quebecer himself, say that there is no such thing as a Quebec culture. Rather, there is a French and an English culture which he calls the Canadian culture.

The Prime Minister's simplistic view, which denies the very basis of his motion recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, shows that his roots in the Quebec society and culture do not run very deep. Given the comments made by her leader, it is surprising to see that the current labour minister, a former cultural affairs minister in the Liberal government of Robert Bourassa, has nothing to say on the matter.

Her silence must be a heavy burden on her conscience since, as the proverb says: "Silence is a form of consent".

[English]

QUEBEC

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have no problem agreeing that Quebec and Quebecers are or constitute a distinct society. My problem is with entrenching it in the Constitution. That for me and for many Canadians creates a problem. Why should Parliament resurrect an idea that Canadians voted down in the Meech and Charlottetown accords?

I believe in the equality of all Canadians, that each province, each region and the aboriginal peoples are all distinctive in their own way. But the question of what it means to be distinct has no concrete answer at this time.

Some say it does not mean anything but simply recognizes an historical fact. Some say it means the courts when they are looking at Quebec's laws will interpret them in light of the distinctiveness of Quebec. Therefore it is an interpretative part of the Constitution.

This would be something no other province would have. If we believe in equality, then we do not believe in special powers.

Please, let us not go through this again. Let us get on with rebuilding Confederation with new ideas. Let us look at what the Reform Party has to propose for the future of our country.

MARITIME UNION

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently we have had some strange echoes from the past in regard to maritime union. Let us hear what the past of maritime union has been.

In his thesis on maritime union, John M. Wilkinson posed the question:

> Was there ever in any one, or all three, of the maritime provinces any general or popular movement in favour of their union, as distinct from those inaugurated by official classes, such as politicians or those actuated by profit?
> The answer is that, unless the situation has changed, popular support for maritime union has been virtually non-existent. Even the legislators who in the 1860s agreed to a conference to consider such a union did it without enthusiasm and certainly not in response to the express wishes of their constituents.

Because of its lack of interest in maritime union, Prince Edward Island has been called the reluctant province. History indicates, however, that it has been different only in degree. It has been somewhat more reluctant than reluctant Nova Scotia and reluctant New Brunswick.

Let me assure the House this situation has not changed. A recent poll on Prince Edward Island put opposition to maritime union at 70 per cent—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton.

SEYMOUR SCHULICH

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week a North York investor, Mr. Seymour Schulich, donated $15 million to York University's school of business. His gift will pay for a series of undergraduate and graduate scholarships and up to five endowed chairs to study specific areas of business.

He said he believes every affluent Canadian has an obligation to give something back to the country.

He also suggested the federal government encourage more private donations by providing the same kind of tax breaks offered to American philanthropists, who get tax breaks four times larger than Canadians.

• (1410)

I take this opportunity to commend Mr. Schulich for his generosity and to suggest the government consider his advice very carefully.

Hospitals, schools, libraries and other public institutions can use all the donations they can get.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in every province, Canadians are wondering what they can do to help keep Canada united.

All residents of Brome—Missisquoi, the Carons in Frelighsburg, the Gaudets, the Barabés in Farnham, the Bergerons and the Landrevilles in Magog want to see proposals for change on the table very shortly.

The demand for change is strong in Quebec. And in this connection, Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury who, last Sunday, organized a forum for Canadian unity in Fredericton. This kind of forum which brings together people from all political parties is a way to promote discussion on the changes that are necessary.

I urge all members of this House, whatever their political affiliation, all those who believe in the Canada of the future, to work hard to keep Canada together. As for our differences regarding the administration of this country, we will have plenty of time to express them during the next election campaign. Canada counts.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after doing a hatchet job on the unemployment insurance system and offloading most of the government's spending cuts on the provinces by reducing their transfer payments, the Minister of Finance is now zeroing on his third target: old age security pensions.

Yesterday the minister announced that he would soon be meeting with his provincial counterparts to consider the future of OAS in Canada. These discussions were to be preceded by the tabling of a federal policy paper. The tabling of this document, originally scheduled for 1994, was later postponed until this fall. However, nothing has been tabled so far, and federal cutbacks are to take effect in 1997.

The minister should at least have the courage to be open about his policies and table without delay a document which senior citizens have been waiting for all this time.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my nomination for a place on the executive of the Interparliamentary Union, commonly known as the junketeer travel club, was denied even though it was acknowledged by the Chair as being in order.

At the same meeting prior to the election procedure and in order to deny my nomination, the constitution of the IPU was changed to allow executive positions only for those who "undertake to promote the aims and objectives of the said interparliamentary organization". This will be a difficult task given that the IPU has no aims or objectives.

The IPU is funded by the House and yet it has muzzled free speech, ignored its own constitution and trashed democracy.

My rights as a parliamentarian have been compromised. The reputation of the House has been sullied and I request that all parliamentarians condemn the actions of the IPU and direct the procedure and House affairs committee to investigate this abuse of process.

Even the communists played with more finesse than the IPU.

PIERRE BOURGAULT

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was appalled the other day to read in Le journal de Montréal how Pierre Bourgault, a staunch separatist and confidant of Mr. Parizeau, branded a group of Canadians as racists.

It seems after a Canadian victory on October 30 the separatists had to blame somebody. Therefore Mr. Bourgault stated: "The Jews, Italians and Greeks are racists". Mr. Bourgault further states: "We are not asking them to be sovereignists, we are asking them to be Quebecers". They are proud Quebecers and they are also proud Canadians.

The separatists have now been completely unmasked and their hidden agenda is secret no longer.

He further made reference to the member for Bourassa. When the Bloc member and all other immigrants, myself included, arrived on these friendly shores, who welcomed us? It was Canada. Who gave us citizenship? It was Canada. It was Canada that gave us the opportunity to share in the Canadian dream.

The vote on October 30 was not an ethnic vote. It was a Canadian vote, a vote for unity, a vote for home, a vote for Canada.

EDMUNSTON DIOCESE

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Sunday, December 10, will mark the end of a series of events to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Diocese of Edmunston.

• (1415)

During the past year, a group of volunteers in the diocese, under the able leadership of Jean Pilot, organized a variety of activities for the young and not so young. Thanks to these activities, this event was celebrated with enthusiasm and style.

The final day of the 50th anniversary celebrations will be marked by a solemn high mass at the Immaculate Conception Cathedral in Edmunston, followed by a Christmas concert.

The motto of the Diocese of Edmunston, "Son amour s'étend d'âge en âge", illustrates the optimism and sense of sharing that prevails over any differences that exist in our community.

I want to take this opportunity to wish my constituents a day filled with joy and happiness.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his economic update yesterday, before the finance committee, the minister finally admitted that his government is putting the unemployment insurance fund surplus into the consolidated revenue fund, along with the other federal revenues and expenditures, and will continue to do so, rather than in a distinct reserve fund as the Minister of Labour claims. This admission leads to another, that his deficit for the current year is being lowered artificially with the U.I. account surplus.

Under these circumstances, will the Minister of Finance admit that, because he is taking five billion dollars out of the U.I. account this year, the real federal deficit for the current year is therefore not $32.7 billion but $37.7 billion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought not to confuse annual surpluses and cumulative surpluses.

To give an example, in 1993 when we became the government, the cumulative deficit of the unemployment insurance fund was $6 billion. In 1994, there was an annual surplus of $2.3 billion, which brought the cumulative deficit to $3.6 billion. In 1995, the annual surplus was approximately five billion dollars. This is the five billion the hon. member is referring to.

It will bring the cumulative surplus to only $1.4 billion. The two things must not be confused. We now have a surplus, not of $5 billion, but of $1.4 billion.

Our goal was not to reduce the deficit but to bolster the U.I. fund, which we have done, being good managers.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a good manager knows the contents of his budget.

Although I respect the minister, he is entitled to his shortcomings as much as anyone. He has certainly forgotten that next year he himself has projected taking $5 billion from the U.I. fund during the year. He is entitled to a mistake, so we will give him another chance.

Will this minister, good manager that he is, admit that to bring his deficit, the federal deficit, down to $17 billion in 1997–98, as he has indicated to us, he will need to keep on dipping into the U.I. fund year after year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. member for Roberval. I clearly understand where the confusion lies. What he is really recommending is an accounting process which was in place prior to 1986.

I would simply like to state that prior to 1986 the government did follow the procedure recommended by the hon. member and by the Bloc finance critic. But the auditor general came out with the following opinion in 1986. "In my opinion"—I am quoting the auditor general here—"the unemployment fund operations ought to be consolidated with the government financial statements, with employer and employee contributions added on the reported receipts side, and benefits and administrative costs included with reported expenditures".

Since this had not been done in 1986, the auditor general expressed reservations on the government's financial statements. That year, the government changed to the accounting process we are currently using. I would therefore suggest to the hon. member, if he does not like the way the government is accounting, and if he thinks he is better at figures than the auditor general—and perhaps he is—that he talk to the auditor general.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Two strikes against him now, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance has neglected to point out that, at the time the auditor general made that recommendation, the federal government was contributing to the unemployment insurance fund. That is no longer the case. Two strikes, no hits.

I will give him a third chance. Given the government's reticence to really streamline the federal machine and review all of its finances, will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that, if he does not divert the sizeable U.I. fund surpluses into his budget, he will be totally incapable of reaching his budget targets in coming years?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is capable of convincing the auditor general that we ought to change the accounting method because contributions now come only from employers and employees, we are prepared to examine the situation.

I understand the hon. member's questions but he is constantly quoting the auditor general as if he were quoting the Deity. Sometimes we have to accept that God does things that are not to our liking. Only the Pope is infallible.

Instead of making forecasts, let me point out what we have done to date. The government's operating balance has risen from a $4 billion deficit in 1993–94 to a $17.6 billion surplus this year, a $21.6 billion improvement. Within that amount, there was a $6 billion improvement in the U.I. fund deficit. This means that, looking at the cuts, the reorganization of public finances, less than 30 per cent has come from the unemployment insurance fund, and 70 per cent from government activities, cuts and other steps.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would first off remind the Minister of Finance that the Canadian Institute of Actuaries and almost all employer organizations, including the Conseil du patronat du Québec, are today calling for a separate account for unemployment insurance, separate from the government's revenue and expenditure budget. He seems to have forgotten it at the moment. He is talking about 1988; he should be looking at 1995.

The Minister of Finance has made the unemployed carry a major portion of his cuts to program expenditures and he is now saying that, to reach his new deficit reduction targets by 1997–98, he has to make additional cuts of several billion dollars.

With the Minister of Finance clearly indicating yesterday his intention to go after old age pensions, are we to understand that, as of next year, the brunt of the additional cuts will fall on current and future recipients of old age pensions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, there is a separate account for unemployment insurance, now employment insurance. So there already is one. However, even with the separate account, the auditor general is insisting it be included with our figures.

• (1425)

Second, unemployment insurance premiums have been reduced by a billion and a quarter dollars, as announced by the Minister of Human Resources. This is a huge reduction, which will contribute to job creation.

Third, as regards the old age pensions, I said the exact opposite to what the member is saying. I said that the statements the Prime Minister has already made regarding old age pensions will certainly be foremost in our minds when we draw up the budget.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we put the question to the Minister of Finance and he says that the unemployment insurance surplus is part of the consolidated fund; the next day he says it is not. We do not know which way is up.

I will put the question to him another way. We are giving him his fourth and fifth chances today. Since his government has just grabbed the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund and drastically limited access to it, will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that he is preparing to do the same thing to the old age pensions, that is, in addition to cutting them, he will make benefits harder to obtain?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is possible to have a separate account and still have consolidated funds.

I understand the member's problem. He is an economist, and economists have a hard time understanding accounting. Perhaps the member for Roberval will explain it to him.

Furthermore, we were very clear on the pension funds. Our aim is to leave seniors untouched and to protect the system so it will be there for young people.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, innumerable ordinary Canadians, business leaders, think tanks, economists and the IMF insist that setting interim targets for the deficit is not enough. They have urged the Minister of Finance to set targets for the complete elimination of the deficit within this government's mandate. I am baffled that the finance minister blinked and missed the easy opportunity to do so.

Only relatively small additional cuts are needed to satisfy these Canadians. The interim targets he chose increase the uncertainty about the government's resolve and prevent getting into the virtual cycle of more growth, even faster deficit elimination and lower interest rates.

Why has the minister chosen to subject Canadians to essential surgery but not enough to get rid of the malignant tumour?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best way to answer the hon. member's question is to cite an economist of great reputation whom I am sure the hon. member knows, Carl Weinberg from High Frequency Economics.

In referring both to the IMF and to the kind of measures recommended by the hon. member, he says that the hon. member's advice is geared toward a country that cannot meet its bills or obligations, that is facing all kinds of international actions to try to withdraw money from it. He then goes on to say, showing far greater confidence than the members of the Reform Party, that Canada "is not in that case and therefore should not be subject to those kinds of measures. I think those measures would succeed in bringing the deficit down but with catastrophic economic consequences. I do not think it is warranted to take that kind of extreme action". That is his opinion, that is our opinion, and it is an intelligent opinion.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the many economists and business leaders who testified in front of the finance committee will know they are stupid and do not know what they are talking about.

I am somewhat surprised that the minister did not bring up this strawman comment that to do more would mean slash and burn. I am shocked that on other occasions the minister has attempted to portray all deficit cutting as slash and burn.

We know of the minister's love for hyperbole and the risk it brings, but the minister knows he is knocking a strawman. The IMF, his own advisers and Reform have offered plans that would eliminate the deficit by cutting fat and unaffordable transfer programs. Frank McKenna, Clyde Wells and other Liberal friends of his have shown how to do it.

• (1430)

Why does the minister not follow the consensus advice and examples available to him and make the cuts needed to preserve Canada's social safety net and enable Canadians to get back to work?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Clyde Wells and Frank McKenna would be delighted to be cited by the hon. member. I now look forward to the finance ministers' meeting next week.

The measures that we have taken are going to allow us to protect Canada's social fabric. If one looks at the budget that was brought in by the Reform Party, there is no doubt about how quickly it would get the deficit eliminated.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The members of the Reform Party applaud, but let us look at what they are applauding. They are applauding the evisceration of the health care system. They are applauding the evisceration of old age pensions. They are applauding the evisceration of the program to help small business into exports.

What the Reform Party members are applauding are the basic programs that are going to enable this country to go into the next century far healthier than any other country in the G–7.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the people who came to the finance committee complained about the terrible consequences of the $4 billion cuts that took place last year.

What the minister does not want to admit is that because he cut so little all those cuts were for naught. All $4 billion was eaten up by increased interest costs. That is the issue.

Furthermore, the finance minister's logic needs some help. The first premise he presented yesterday: deficit reduction leads to lower interest rates, more jobs, economic growth and tax cuts. Premise two, which is implicit in the free—

Mr. Young: No, Mr. Speaker, let him go. That was a good question.

The Speaker: I would ask hon. members, both those putting questions and those giving answers, if they could condense them. I would invite the member to please put his question.

Mr. Grubel: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but as a lead off questioner I thought I would get just a tiny bit more.

An hon. member: Even the same as the Bloc would be helpful.

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, if lower interest rates create jobs and lower deficits create jobs, why does the minister not follow his own logic and go all the way and eliminate the deficit?

Mr. Hermanson: Right on.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that lower deficits lead to lower interest rates and to more jobs, but it is simply a function of balance. If we go too far, we are going to cause a great deal more long term damage.

I thought it was expressed really quite well yesterday. The leader of the Reform Party, the member will remember, made an analogy to a fiscal drunk running down the highway. That is probably not a bad analogy to the differences between our two parties. What we are going to do is sober that drunk up. What the Reform Party does is run him over.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1435)

The Speaker: I should tell members we are going to shorten the questions and I am going to help you.

QUEBEC CULTURE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister explained that there was no Quebec culture, but rather an English–Canadian and a French–Canadian culture. Last week, however, the Prime Minister tabled in this House a motion saying that one of the characteristics of Quebec's distinct society is its unique culture.

How can the Prime Minister reconcile the comments he made yesterday with his distinct society motion, when there is an obvious contradiction?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I never said yesterday that there was no Quebec culture. I said that Quebec culture is not necessarily limited to French, and that French culture also exists outside Quebec.

We believe so strongly in a Quebec culture that not only do we talk about it but we also tabled in the House a motion recognizing it. The hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata is voting against our distinct society proposal stating that Quebec is a distinct society by virtue of its French language, unique culture and civil code. This is a motion I tabled in this House to recognize Quebec culture, and Bloc members are voting against it.

I also explained that French culture is celebrated in all of Canada, and I named a number of prominent Canadians of whom francophones in both Quebec and Canada can be proud. I talked about Antonine Maillet, Gabrielle Roy, Roch Voisine, Henri Bergeron, and many others who speak French and have a French culture, even though not all of them are from Quebec. That is what the hon. member does not understand.

If she wants to recognize Quebec's unique culture, all she has to do is to support the motion that will be voted on next Monday in this House.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, frankly, it sounds like there is a Quebec culture on some days but not on others. I would like to know if Quebec culture exists on odd– or even–numbered days. We are stumbling about in the dark.

Does the obvious contradiction between the Prime Minister's comments and his motion not confirm that his motion is in fact a meaningless, empty shell that will not fool Quebecers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian House of Commons is voting in favour of a motion clearly stating that Quebec is a distinct society by virtue of its French language, culture and civil code. It is the best way of putting it. And yet Bloc members are set to vote against it—because they will rise one by one in this House to vote and be recorded as saying that they do not want to support recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. They should be ashamed of themselves.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Minister of Finance does not understand. The whole point of this exercise of eliminating the deficit and the debt is to lead the way toward social programs that we can sustain over the long run and also give people tax relief. That may be hard to understand if you do not pay taxes in this country, but that is what we are aiming for.

Why does the minister insist on prolonging the suffering of Canadians and denying them hope? Why does he do that with this narrow, inch at a time deficit elimination policy? Why does he refuse to completely eliminate the deficit and reduce taxes? Why does he not do his job?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, because I have seen the alternative.

I would ask the members of the Reform Party to take a look at the consequences of their own budget. It is impossible for the Reformers to say that what they want to do is protect old age pensions by reducing the deficit, when their means of getting there are to virtually eliminate the basic foundation for old age pensions.

• (1440)

It is impossible for the Reform Party to say that it wants to protect health care when it would erase the transfers that go to protect health care. It is impossible for the Reform Party to say that it wants to reduce taxes when it would pursue an industrial policy that would make it impossible for the country to create jobs.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is absolute rubbish. The fact is interest payments on the debt are undercutting social programs, which is exactly why the government is cutting unemployment insurance and making all kinds of other adjustments.

If the Liberals had dealt with this in the first year of their mandate we would not be in the hole we are in today. The finance minister has got to start accepting some responsibility. He blew it right from the beginning.

When can Canadians expect to get some tax relief? The minister is saying, trust me. It will be sometime in the next millennium, over the hill and beyond the horizon. When exactly are we going to get some tax relief in this country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the most important kind of relief that this country should look to is a reduction in interest rates.

The member knows that if we were to proceed to a tax decrease right now that the net result would have an immediate impact on the budget. It would not lead to lower interest rates and might well lead to higher interest rates. In fact that is what is happening. That is what all the commentary is about now in those countries in Europe that are contemplating a tax decrease.

We are dealing in a very measured and deliberate way with a huge debt and a huge deficit which this government inherited. It inherited it from a previous government, the government that most of those people, the crypto–Tories over there, probably voted for 10 years ago.

CANADIAN HERITAGE COMMITTEE

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. For the past two weeks, the Liberal members of the heritage committee have objected to the fact that two federal cultural agencies, namely the Canada Council and Telefilm Canada, subsidize artists or productions with a bias towards the sovereignist cause.

Since the Prime Minister skirted the issue yesterday, I am putting the question to him again today. Does he endorse the position taken by government members sitting on the heritage committee, who maintain that granting agencies should now fund artists according to their political opinions?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our policy on the subject is clear. The Canada Council is an independent agency that grants subsidies based on its own set of criteria. The fact of the matter is that the Quebec artistic community has always greatly benefited from the Canada Council, and everyone in the Quebec arts community is very pleased with the objectivity displayed by the Canada Council.

Members may not always be happy with the way a subsidy is granted or used. Freedom of expression is a privilege enjoyed by every Canadian.

It is like when the Canada Council buys paintings for the National Gallery; some like it, others do not. But they are at liberty to do so, and I think that nowhere in the world is the arts community afforded as much independence as in Canada.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not agree that there is cause for concern when the head of the government seeks not only to control the information provided by a government agency but also to provide political guidance on the content of cultural productions subsidized by the Canada Council and by Telefilm Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not see how the hon. member can say something like that, because the law has not changed. The Canada Council is the same as it has always been, and our members are doing a very professional job.

I maintain that members are free to complain when they are unhappy about something, and they have indeed aired their complaints on many issues. That is what freedom of speech is all about. Members who have objections to raise should raise them. That is what they were elected to do. On the other hand, while it has to take their objections into account, the Canada Council is free to act as it sees fit.

• (1445)

I will not ask the members not to express discontent. Government members and opposition members alike are entitled to their opinions.

DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, through access to information I received an audit from April 1994 that revealed the practice of hiring family members at Natural Resources Canada.

In one forestry office alone, the auditors counted 115 people in one year who got their jobs from relatives on the inside of the department. That was last year. This year a new audit says that there is still a major problem that the minister has yet to address.

Will the minister initiate a department–wide audit of contracting in her department to uncover the real extent of the family compact at NRCan, or will she at least get a family member to look into it?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me first point out to the hon. member that the audit to which he refers is an audit of contracting practices that took place during fiscal year 1992–93, before this government came to power.

Let me indicate further that it was this government that undertook an audit in relation to contracting and management practices in the Department of Natural Resources. We determined that those problems existed. We have taken corrective measures in relation to them.

An audit done in June 1995 indicates that we have corrected the mistakes of the past. We have put in place management practices and courses in relation to conflict of interest. I might say to the hon. member that to the satisfaction of the auditors involved we have been successful in dealing with the practices that were identified as unacceptable.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to think that most of the relatives were already hired, but this year's audit also says that bypassing merit to hire family members has become an accepted way of doing business in the department.

It is not acceptable, which is why I asked for the list of contracts the department had investigated so that we could have a look to see how deep this mess was within the department.

Incredibly we find the department did not keep such a list or now it cannot find it. Will the minister undertake to find this list of contracts and table it in the House so we can see whether the problem of nepotism extends to her department?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that corrective action has been taken.

Mr. Abbott: Prove it.

Ms. McLellan: I am quite happy to prove it to the hon. member. I have a list of measures we have taken in my department to correct the situation. I will be happy to share it with the hon. member.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the study commissioned by the CBC on the coverage of the referendum campaign reveals that the French network gave essentially the same coverage to the yes and the no sides, whereas the English network gave almost two thirds of its time to the no side. Yet, the study concludes that both the French and English networks were neutral in their coverage.

Does the Minister of Canadian Heritage agree with the conclusion that CBC's English network was neutral in its coverage of the referendum campaign?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not draw conclusions on studies I have not yet seen. The CBC's board of directors asked for some reports. I am told that these reports were submitted to the board. I still have not received them. I will comment after seeing them.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not want to make a pronouncement. However, given that today's newspapers mention that the French network gave 52 per cent of its time coverage to the yes side and 48 per cent to the no side, while the English network gave 62 per cent of its time coverage to the no side and 38 per cent to the yes side, could the minister make some enlightening comments on these figures?

• (1450)

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know that the CBC's board of directors intends to follow up on the report. Again, I am reluctant to comment on figures taken from a newspaper article. I want to get much more information on the CBC's coverage and on the exact nature of the report.

TORONTO

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the greater Toronto area is home to 4.5 million people. The area has been disproportionately impacted by the recession and continues to lag in the recovery, with negative repercussions for the entire Canadian economy.

The Government of Canada spends millions and millions of dollars in the GTA often in ways people do not see directly. My question is for the minister responsible for the infrastructure program. Will he tell the House how that one program is contributing to economic recovery in the greater Toronto area?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in answering the question I am pleased to note in the gallery opposite a holder of an office that I had the pleasure of holding at one time. I am pleased to note and welcome the mayor of Toronto, Her Worship Barbara Hall, to the House.

In the greater Toronto area we have approved over 300 infrastructure projects involving an infusion of some $755 million, which has created in excess of 11,000 jobs in that area. With the co-operation of Mayor Hall and the Toronto City Council many of these projects have been in the downtown Toronto area.

All these projects, just like all projects across the country, have helped to put Canadians back to work, have helped to strengthen the infrastructure in our communities and to bring in additional investment dollars. They have all been done in a co-operative way, which proves that the federal, provincial and local governments can work together for the improvement of the quality of life of Canadians.

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Canadian Heritage recently made a number of appointments to the board of directors of the Museum of Civilization.

Is he aware that one of the appointments is a senior partner of the lawyer who was responsible for the election campaign of the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs? Yes or no.

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, appointments are made as a result of a very careful scrutiny of the ability of people to exercise office. This is what was done in that case, as with any other appointments in my portfolio.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I may have missed the answer. I was looking for a yes or no. The point is the scrutiny seems to include Liberal credentials because the Liberals continue the old–fashioned discredited practice of feeding their friends lucrative government posts. In so doing they denigrate our public institutions.

Let me remind the minister that the appearance of conflict of interest is against the current code of conduct of public office holders. My question is simple. Did he know this appointment was against the conflict of interest code?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these appointments are scrutinized from that viewpoint as well.

As to the notion that Liberals have no capability to fill any office, the member should remember that the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is Perrin Beatty who did not sit with the Liberals in the previous Parliament.

COAST GUARD

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

At a meeting of the Société de développement du Saint–Laurent on November 23, the commissioner of the Coast Guard refused to rule out the possibility that the cost of icebreaking would be charged directly to the users of the St. Lawrence, which would mean that Quebec shipowners would have to bear nearly half of all the new costs charged to shipowners for Coast Guard services.

How does the minister explain his government's contemplating making Quebec shipowners pay the cost of icebreaking on the St. Lawrence, when this service is free in the North?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member follows the activities of the Coast Guard very closely and he is no doubt aware that it now comes under the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

• (1455)

However, I wish to assure my hon. colleague that the costs that will be recovered in all transport sectors are not going to be limited to those who own ships in the St. Lawrence. Most of the ships plying the St. Lawrence do not belong to Quebecers, nor to Canadians, for that matter.

That said, we will be ensuring that, in all sectors, costs incurred will be recovered from users.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is forcing me to point out that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was not present in the House, and that is why I asked him—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Guimond: Mr. Speaker, does the minister, being responsible for marine transportation, realize that, by charging shipowners using the St. Lawrence the cost of icebreaking, he is threatening the competitiveness of the St. Lawrence ports, and particularly the port of Montreal?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member asked his question, he said clearly that the person in question, the one who made the statement, did not want to rule out the possibility that all costs would be recovered for icebreaking operations in the St. Lawrence.

In the coming days, we will announce the future policy and strategy for the entire marine sector. At that point, we will certainly have an opportunity to properly discuss a question of potential concern to everyone. User costs will be discussed and debated.

I would reassure the hon. member and the people directly affected that no final decision has been made on this yet.

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, members of the House might be surprised to learn that presently there is no effective way to prevent prisoners from harassing their victims from inside their jail cells.

One Vancouver jailbird has been leaving up to 16 messages a day on his victim's answering machine as well as sending letters from the prison even though the court has told him not to.

I am sure there will be an outpouring of sympathy from the Minister of Justice, but the Canadian people would like to know what he will do to stop this harassment and when he will do it.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, new policies are being put in place with respect to access to telephones by prisoners in federal institutions. Work is ongoing with respect to mailing privileges as well.

Would the hon. member, since he did not give me notice of the question, confirm that the prisoner in question is in fact in a federal institution?

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice did not have the opportunity to express sympathy, but I am pleased to hear at least a partial answer from the solicitor general.

I will repeat my question. Since the solicitor general indicates that something is being done, when will he do it, an exact date, and what exactly will he do?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member obviously did not listen to my answer, I suggest he read Hansard tomorrow and consider whether he wants to ask the question again.

CONTRAVENTIONS ACT

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Presently there is no effective enforcement for people who misuse our waterways and endanger the lives of other Canadians. The Contraventions Act, passed in 1992, would fix this situation but has never been proclaimed into law.

Will the minister tell the House how he intends to ensure boating regulations are enforced and Canadian lives are protected on our lakes and rivers?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no member of the House has worked harder in the cause of facilitating the enforcement of safety rules on the waterways than the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka. I thank him for his help in that regard.

It was through the work of the hon. member that I met with the executive of the Muskoka Lakes Association which brought home to me the urgency of dealing effectively with this matter. As a result, officials in the federal Department of Justice have worked with provincial counterparts to put the provincial schemes and mechanisms for ticketing of offences at the disposal of the federal government through the federal Contraventions Act.

• (1500)

I am pleased to say that next week I intend to introduce legislation which will amend the Contraventions Act federally to enable us to use the provincial mechanisms. This not only allows us to keep the waterways safer and have effective enforcement but it also avoids duplication, overlap and needless expense. It serves to that extent the interests of the people of Canada.

MOBILITY RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will know that British Columbia has become a destination province as of late with up to 92,000 Canadians moving to the province, many of them paid for by their own provincial governments, and consequently falling on welfare.

Recognizing that labour mobility is a national issue, would the Prime Minister give some consideration to examining the possibility of providing labour mobility grants to the province of British Columbia to offset some of the costs of 92,000 Canadians moving into the province each year?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It allows me an opportunity to update the House of Commons.

This morning the British Columbia minister of social services, Joy MacPhail, and the federal Minister of Human Resources Development met to discuss the issue relating to residency requirements. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have no choice in this matter. The British Columbia government is contravening the act, particularly sections 5 and 7 of the Canada assistance plan.

As to the idea raised by the hon. member, he can rest assured that ideas such as the one he cited will be part and parcel of discussions that federal officials will undertake very shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the past when profits were made, more jobs were created. In light of record corporate profits in some sectors, the banks especially, can the minister explain why there are also a record number of layoffs? Does the minister have any plan to encourage reinvestment of these profits to create new jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member raises a question that is really one of the most difficult of the modern economy which is that because of globalization and because of new technologies a lot of companies are seen maintaining or increasing their profits, not as a result of increasing sales but because they are cutting costs. They are letting people go. Of course this sets in motion a vicious train of events where one company lays off and then others have to.

As a result of this, the government has embarked upon a series of fundamental reforms in its job creation activities. The unemployment insurance reform announced last week deals directly with that question as do a number of the measures in terms of the information highway by the Minister of Industry and of course the very important activities of my colleague, the Minister for International Trade.

At the same time the fact is we have to get a rising economy. That is why when we embark upon deficit reduction we do it in a balanced way. We do not slash and burn.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of members to the presence in the gallery of two guests: Gregory Rockman, member of Parliament for the African National Congress and Gerhard Koomhpof, member of Parliament for the National Party of South Africa.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it would be appreciated if the Leader of the Government would indicate the order of business until Christmas.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today and tomorrow are opposition days. Votes arising from these days and from other business of supply will be taken at the end of business on Monday, which is when the House will also vote on Motion No. M–26 which completed debate yesterday.

Our first priority next week is to dispose of report stage and third reading stage of Bill C–110, the constitutional amendment bill, that is to say the regional veto bill.

• (1505)

We would also like to refer Bill C–111, the unemployment insurance bill, to committee before second reading, pursuant to Standing Order 73(1). The House should take this as notice of our intention to do this.

On Monday we will probably start with Bill C–111 in the morning and turn to Bill C–110 in the afternoon, that is to say the bill on the regional veto.

We would also like to complete before Christmas as many bills as possible that are now at report stage or third reading stage. There will be ongoing discussions between the parties in this House for this purpose.

I am told the Standing Committee on Finance will have an interim report on budget consultations presented to the House before the middle of next week. We would like to have the House consider the report of the finance committee on Thursday and Friday next week.

The Speaker: I have a point of privilege by the hon. member for Scarborough Centre. I must ask the hon. member, does this point of privilege arise from today's question period?

Mr. Cannis: No, Mr. Speaker. It arises from an incident which occurred this past Tuesday.

The Speaker: Then I would have to receive written notice unless it occurred today. I would be happy to entertain that as soon as the hon. member puts the information into my hands.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA LAND CLAIMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it should come as no surprise today that the Bloc Quebecois has decided to vote against the motion presented by the Reform Party, a motion that of course aims to prevent and obstruct current negotiations.

It is clear, in our opinion, that a variety of concepts are implicit in this kind of motion. It is clear that trilateral negotiations between the federal and provincial governments and the First Nations must be redefined. The First Nations have consistently said that the status quo is unacceptable. They are not alone in that respect. I think that as far as Quebec is concerned, the results of the last referendum indicated that the status quo was unacceptable and that the only option is sovereignty and greater autonomy. Sovereignty will give us that greater autonomy, and we see the same need for autonomy among the First Nations.

The Reform Party's motion also implies a desire to block negotiations for strictly political reasons which I will be glad to enumerate later on. But how could anyone consider putting a stop to a peaceful and equitable process that will redress the injustice perpetrated 150 years ago? We are about to begin a negotiating process, and out of the blue, for purely political reasons, the Reform Party introduces a motion to block negotiations that are peaceful and will correct past injustice.

This is totally unacceptable to us, and as I said before, it should come as no surprise that the Bloc Quebecois intends to vote against this motion. We should remember that cases involving aboriginal peoples and aboriginal rights are probably the oldest human rights issues in Canada. These issues remain unresolved, and this is a chapter of Canada's history that has been left unfinished. Attempts are being made to remedy this elsewhere. Attempts are being made across Canada, and in British Columbia the circumstances seem to have been ideal for bringing these negotiations to fruition.

Now we have a proposal that would simply terminate these attempts. The debate on aboriginal rights started only twenty or thirty years ago and has been pursued openly and with great zeal in the political and public arenas. Unfortunately, this proposal would simply extinguish those rights, blocking the whole process that led up to the current situation where we have all parties in a position negotiate on the same level. This is a proposal we cannot accept.

• (1510)

I want to read the motion, because we feel that the Reform Party is not the only one to blame here. I think the motion reveals the true colours not only of the Reform Party, but also of the Liberal Party. The motions reads as follows:

> That the House urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the current provincial government mandate in order to respect the views of British Columbians on this issue as expressed by both major provincial opposition parties.

I talked with some of my colleagues from British Columbia and I learned that one of the two major opposition parties in B.C. is the Reform Party. Of course, my colleagues hastened to tell me that the national Reform Party does not recognize any provincial subsidiaries. However, I find it strange that the Reform Party would put forward a motion supported by an opposition party in B.C. which happens to have the same name as it does.

We now see the true colours of the Reform Party. But we also see the true colours of the Liberals. I heard my colleagues talk about their opposition to this motion. When we listen to the members of the Liberal government and when we look at the measures they take, we can see the true nature of these people. We can tell by their attitude towards the native people.

When I look at everything the Liberal Party has proposed for the native people and when I see that the B.C. Liberal Party is behind this motion, the first question I ask myself is why has the Liberal Party here, in Ottawa, not contacted its brother, the B.C. Liberal Party, to try to settle this issue.

I think that the current government here, in this House, is hiding behind the public opinion, which, as we may see later on, might well be unamenable to this initiative. Why is it that the Liberal Party and the indian affairs minister have not called the person in charge of the B.C. Liberal Party, one of the opposition parties in that province? One has to wonder about that. Especially since the policies put forward by this government in its famous red book have not even been implemented yet; we think that the Liberal government is dragging its feet on this issue.

The famous self–government policy that was denounced by all aboriginal representatives in Canada is a case in point. This policy was developed behind closed doors, without consulting aboriginal leaders and representatives. We now have a proposal that will be difficult to put in place because it was not approved by aboriginal representatives.

The same goes for the red book promise to create a land claims commission. The other day, a British Columbia member tabled a motion stressing the importance of creating an independent commission. Once again, the Liberal government is dragging its feet on this issue. Even with their speeches opposing the Reform motion before us, we wonder if they are not in fact a little responsible for what is now happening in British Columbia.

This is a purely political matter. If we look at the motion before us, we know that an election will be held one year from now. What does this mean? I see this as a dangerous precedent. It means that the world stops turning just before an election. The things that have been put forward, that have been working for a while, must stop because opposition parties are opposed to them. This is complete nonsense, in my opinion.

When I say that this is purely political, I mean not only for opposition parties but also for the party in office in that province, the NDP, which is going through a very hard time. I think that only 10 or 12 per cent of people intend to vote for them in the next election. This process was also held up by the Premier of that province a while ago, mainly as a result of public opinion because the public is unfortunately misinformed.

In British Columbia, the issue of negotiations with aboriginal people has simply been held hostage by this type of political resolution. I think that such tactics should be condemned.

These people have suffered injustices for 150 years. They have probably been the most patient in agreeing to peaceful negotiations. Today, we are being asked to stop this process, something we find totally unacceptable.

I also raised a number of points during consideration of the B.C. treaty commission legislation by the committee. I raised them because the B.C. commission legislation provides that we should educate the people of that province to dispel the rampant rumours and misconceptions and to set the record straight. I found out the worst misconception when I arrived here as native affairs critic. It came from my Reform colleagues from B.C. who were trying to show me that 125 per cent of the B.C. territory was the subject of land claims.

So I said: "Does this 125 per cent mean that the native people would take over all of B.C. and then push the white people into the sea?" They then explained to me that this figure was mostly due to overlap between land claims, that if we plot these claims on a map of the province, it is clear that their total surface area is bigger than all of B.C.

I think that the people of B.C. must be told that this is an initial bargaining position. Some of my colleagues also expressed their views to the land claims commission last week. They said that some Quebecers sometimes fear that the map of Quebec will be cut up and that native people will own 80 per cent of the territory. But I think that many realize that this is an initial bargaining position. As the negotiations conducted in Canada in the past few years show, a native people's initial position may change by the time negotiations are concluded.

This education work must be done. People also feel that negotiations are conducted in secrecy. What are the current headlines in B.C. newspapers such as the Vancouver Sun? Remarks made by Reformers often exacerbate this kind of paranoia toward First Nations. And this kind of motion goes exactly along the same lines. Members from British Columbia say: "Look, they are going to take 125 per cent of the land and that will cause a great deal of uncertainty. Companies invest less in certain regions of B.C. than others because they are afraid that the land will be taken over by the aboriginals".

That is not how bargaining works. In fact, a six–step process was instituted by the commission, and we should give it a chance to lead to a conclusion that is to everybody's satisfaction. These are the fundamentals of bargaining. You start at the beginning and you end at the finish line, and everyone has to compromise a little along the way to end up with a satisfactory position.

I think it is important also to mention the contribution of the Nisga'a nation to the kind of discussions we are holding today. While legislation was passed last week respecting the British Columbia Treaty Commission, the Nisga'as were intentionally excluded from such negotiations, because they have been discussing vigorously with the government to settle a land claim and a self–government issue. We must always bear in mind the historical background and realize, with the help of examples such as the one I will give the House today, namely the case of the Nisga'a, that it is refreshing to see that First Nations are able to use peaceful tools known to everyone, and used in the British parliamentary system for ages. I am referring here negotiation.

I myself had the pleasure and the privilege to visit the Nisga'a last summer. They live along the Nass River and they never signed a treaty with the government. In fact, this is a characteristic of British Columbia; very few treaties were signed in B.C. That is why the commission was established: to develop a process to encourage every First Nation in British Columbia to enter into agreements with the crown and the province.

So, they never signed a treaty. Yet, they represent about 6,000 people and they are pioneers as regards aboriginal negotiations in Canada. The case of the Nisga'a is a good example of the quest of Canada's aboriginals for legal recognition of their rights.

Let us review a bit of history here. In 1763, aboriginal titles were recognized by the proclamation of King George III. Governments were the only ones allowed to buy Indian land, and could do so only through treaties. As I said earlier, the first nations of British Columbia signed only 15 agreements, and 14 of them deal with Vancouver Island. The Douglas treaty was signed by James Douglas, of the Hudson's Bay Company.

In 1858, British Columbia became a colony. It joined the Canadian Confederation in 1871. At the time, the majority of the province's population was made up of first nation members. Yet, the first nations agreed to share the land with newcomers. The result of all this is that, today, these people are to be found in close to 200 reserves in B.C., while the rest of the land is occupied by white people who develop its natural resources. The aboriginals have been left to fend for themselves. This is why it is so important to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission and give it time to reach agreements with the first nations. However, the Reform Party motion would keep us from doing that.

I will move along in time to get to more contemporary events. In 1910, Prime Minister Laurier promised, in Prince Rupert, that the land issue would be solved. In 1913, the Nisga'a, ever careful when negotiating, sent a first petition to the Privy Council, in London. Some years later, in 1927, in response to that initiative, the federal government prohibited aboriginals from organizing themselves for the purpose of discussing land issues and claims. The government's reaction was: "Listen, there are problems, but we do not want to discuss them, and we do not want you to discuss them". The way things were done at the time is somewhat reminiscent of Reform's 1995 proposal: preventing parties from talking to each other.

I think that what was hardly acceptable in 1927 has become totally unacceptable in 1995. My B.C. colleagues may be surprised to learn that the first native member of Parliament in the Commonwealth was a Nisga'a. The first native member of this House, Frank Calder, is behind the Calder decision to which I will come back later.

In 1955, the native lands committee was re-established thanks to the Nisga'a tribal council. In 1968, the Nisga'a went to court to have their aboriginal titles recognized. In 1973, there was the Frank Calder case I referred to earlier.

After over 14 months of deliberations, the Supreme Court of Canada handed down a divided ruling. Of the six judges who concluded that the Nisga'a did hold aboriginal land titles, three ruled that these titles had expired while the other three decided that they were still valid.

This ruling was important because, in 1972, Pierre Trudeau was still leading a minority government. The opposition parties during and after the ruling urged the government to recognize its obligations and settle the land claims in that province. On August 8, 1973, the current Prime Minister announced that the government was committed to settling the claims.

In 1976, land claims negotiations started between the Nisga'a and the federal government. The claims had been filed almost 70 years earlier. And the province entered into negotiations in 1991. As I indicated the last time I spoke on this issue, at third reading of the bill dealing with the British Columbia Treaty Commission, the B.C. Indian affairs department set the whole thing in motion.

Why negotiate treaties? So far, the status quo has proven costly in terms of energy, legal and strategic battles, but also battles in the streets, on highways and on the reserves. Those who advocate violence to resolve their problems must not be proven right. We have here a nation who keeps believing in going the way of peaceful negotiation. I think we should give them a chance to complete their quest for peaceful negotiation.

• (1525)

The Reform Party is probably motivated by financial considerations, although the motion does not say so. Perhaps we could respond to that that current provincial and federal profits on the land in question are very substantial. I have seen with my own eyes forest harvesting in British Columbia. Natural resources are plentiful in B.C., so money is not the issue. It is more a matter of knowing where the money is going.

Right now, some private interests in British Columbia may be on the side of the Reform Party, or have that party on their side, and demand that motions like this one be debated in the House. Maybe this is the case because the Department of Natural Resources is currently racing against the clock—and I know because I saw it—to get, as quickly as possible, natural resources out of lands that will sooner or later belong to aboriginals. The process is simple: all the natural resources are taken out of the land. Once that process is completed, the government will tell aboriginal nations: "We are now prepared to negotiate to give you the land and its natural resources". But there will be nothing left.

Is this what the Reform Party wants? Why does the Liberal Party not go further? Why does the federal Indian affairs minister not call the Liberal opposition party in British Columbia and say: "Look, forget about that. It does not make any sense. We have to reach a settlement with aboriginal people".

I want to ask the Reform Party—since its members will ask me some questions in a minute—when would be a good time for the federal to sign an agreement with the province and the First Nations. What solutions is the Reform Party contemplating to conclude land claim negotiations in British Columbia? What does it think of aboriginal land titles that have been recognized by the courts?

It seems that, as far as the Reform Party is concerned, there will never be a good time to sign an agreement. As for us, Bloc Quebecois members, we feel that the First Nations should not used as a political pawn. The time has come to put an end to the injustices. Quebecers have realized that and this is why we set up model conventions and agreements on land claims. I ask Reform Party members to do the same, and I also ask Liberal members to put pressure on their B.C. fellow Liberals, so that they do not get involved in a scheme that would prevent peaceful negotiation.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech with interest, as we both sit on the aboriginal affairs standing committee.

The member and other members in the House are misreading our motion. We are saying there should be no final agreement in the next few months because the next few months is the length of time that we expect the provincial government that is currently in place to be there. That is all we are asking for. We are not asking for everything to be thrown out. We are not building a brick wall.

The member talked about 500–year–old grievances. To me that is very indicative of how little people not from the western part of Canada understand about British Columbia and other parts of western Canada. Five hundred years ago was long before contact with Europeans and certainly long before any grievance.

As for the statements that were made about negotiating positions, I concur with the member. That is what negotiating is all about. All of us in our life enter into all kinds of negotiations.

The B.C. treaty process has been in effect since 1993. It has been given a chance to work. The member talked about giving it a chance to work. It has been found lacking. We are asking for some changes. The public is asking for some changes. This will be complementary to the process.

• (1530)

I do realize the Nisga'a have been negotiating for 20 years with the federal government. That is one added rationale why the next two or three months should not have all the importance attributed to them. I fail to understand that. To me it reinforces the point we are trying to make that we should not do a last minute rush on an agreement that will set a precedent for the 47 other negotiations going on in British Columbia.

There was a reference in the member's speech to the royal proclamation. Once again British Columbia is different. The jurisprudence is that the royal proclamation has no implications or ramifications for British Columbia because of the time of the royal proclamation and the age of British Columbia, when it came into Confederation and so on. It has no ramifications in British Columbia.

The member talked about British Columbia as a population that consists of natives and white people. That is so far from reality. British Columbia is probably the most multicultural, pluralistic society in North America. I would not be surprised if it was the most multicultural and pluralistic of almost anywhere other than some parts of South America.

There is every hue of colour and every culture on earth represented in British Columbia. That is significant because we are very used to respecting, working with and living with other cultures, which is pluralistic. We are trying to create a pluralistic society, not one divided.

There was more than a suggestion in the member's speech that we are trying to prevent the parties from coming together. What nonsense. There was a total misrepresentation of the Calder decision. I suggest the member read the Calder decision, not somebody's summary that is a misrepresentation of what that decision actually was and what it said.

As someone who spent 20 years in the resource industry, the forest industry in British Columbia, some of the statements made about the condition of the forests and the logging in the province I find quite distressing. I do not believe the depth of knowledge is—

The Speaker: My colleague, you have used up half the time for comments and questions. I will give the hon. member for Saint–Jean the opportunity to respond.

[Translation]

Mr. Bachand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised several points. I can tell him that, yes, he is right about the multi–ethnic society. I myself have seen the high numbers of aboriginal people in the culturally mixed city of Vancouver.

The aboriginal people are a bit fed up with trying to gain recognition. They have gained cultural recognition, but when it comes to business and finance, to recognition of their right to territorial self–government, to total financial autonomy, the path is a rougher one.

The motion before us is very clear. It asks the government not to enter into any binding trilateral agreement. This means that, in the negotiations with the Nisga'a where we are in the final stages of negotiation right now, if a conclusion is reached they are being told not to sign.

Why not? Because there will be an election in a year, in order to respect the views of British Columbians on this issue as expressed by both major provincial opposition parties. Clearly, totally political motives.

• (1535)

As I was just saying, and I will repeat it here, it is not acceptable for aboriginal negotiations to be held hostage, whether the negotiating process as a whole, or the beginning of the process, or the signature stage. Everything must proceed as set out in the British Columbia Treaty Commission. It absolutely must continue.

This past summer I met with the Chilcotin, the Carrier–Sekani and the Nisga'a, and I have seen the destruction of their forests, both from the air and on the ground. I feel it is urgent for these matters to be settled at the fundamental level, so that agreement may be reached once and for all to remedy this injustice.

It is my feeling that the process currently in place in B.C. is working very well and will lead to a settlement. The motion before us is quite simply aimed at slowing down the entire process, and that is why we are opposed to it.

[English]

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time.

I rise to express my concern and shock at the motion of the hon. member from North Island—Powell River. He asks us to delay the land claims process in British Columbia during the final year of the mandate of the provincial government.

It makes me wonder if he and his colleagues will not be here next year with a similar motion asking us to delay it for the first year of the mandate of the next government while it gets itself organized. It seems to me that in Canada we cannot proceed in that fashion.

The Government of Canada has maintained that providing justice and equity for aboriginal peoples requires two ingredients, self–government and a process for making modern day treaties through comprehensive claims. Canadians have been wrestling with these issues for years. The Reform Party has used the self–government issue to fan the flames of fear and apprehension during the debates over the Charlottetown accord. Now it continues to stir up controversy in British Columbia through its misrepresentations of the treaty process.

I heard hon. members opposite make a great deal of the media reports of the total First Nations claims adding up to 110 percent of the province of British Columbia. The total should not surprise us. Why should the claims not overlap one another? The First Nations have shared the land and its resources for centuries. They have migrated and tapped the resources of different locales at different times.

They have been asked as a part of the treaty making process to describe the geographic area of the First Nation's traditional territory of British Columbia. They provide a map of the traditional areas of their ancestors. This map depicts the territory of a nation as it occupied it historically. These maps are used to provide negotiators with a general idea of what area of land is under question. This is simply part of stage one of the process which is called a statement of intent.

A statement of intent is not a settlement. A claim is not a treaty. A treaty is the result of negotiations, and those negotiations are just beginning. The claims are but the starting bargaining position. No First Nation would expect to receive the entire region described in its statement of intent. The First Nations do not expect a fee simple title to the entire province. When two First Nations have overlapping traditional territories, they will settle the matter as the negotiations proceed. The federal and provincial governments do not participate in negotiating an overlap settlement.

Several members from across the floor, members who ought to know better, have been using the claims to instil fear among British Columbians. They infer that these opening positions will lead to lost property for third parties across the province. They ask British Columbians: "What will become of your summer cottages? What will happen to jobs in the mining and forestry sectors? What will happen to the fisheries?" They raised these fears without adding that the treaty process provides for cottage owners and a broad spectrum of the industries of British Columbia to have a voice in the process.

They neglect to tell the people at town hall meetings or on radio talk shows the Government of Canada consults with a treaty negotiations advisory committee representing many of their interests. They do not tell people no negotiations can proceed until a regional advisory committee has been created to provide the views of British Columbians from that part of the province who are not at the negotiating table.

This pattern of misinformation and fear mongering is typical of the tactics some members on the other side of the House have used to score cheap political points. They have often criticized the government for its dedication to the inherent right of self–government as a cornerstone of the Government of Canada's aboriginal policy.

We have said since the beginning, since the red book that provided our election platform, that we believe the inherent right of self–government is an existing right within Canada's Constitution.

Hon. members across the floor have often made the case that no one has defined what self–government means. That argument has been erected as an obstacle to prevent justice from getting through to aboriginal communities across the entire country. That argument speaks to a kind of mean spirited and narrow minded approach that has thwarted efforts to bring justice to aboriginal issues. It speaks for the tyranny of the status quo. It speaks for the preservation of the paternalism of the Indian Act. Is that what Reform members want to uphold? I like to think not. Do they really want to impede progress, impede the righting of past wrongs, impede certainty for the future, impede economic stability, impede job creation?

All Canadians want the claims settled. They want an end to the uncertainty, an end to ancient wrongs. The negotiations are about how, not whether, the settlements should be resolved.

We want to make progress. One way we are doing this is by acknowledging that the inherent right to self–government is an existing right. We are now negotiating with the First Nations on how that right is to be implemented.

I would like to remind the House of the six stages that a claim must go through before a treaty comes into effect. I think hon. members will observe this is a very thorough process.

In the first step a First Nation files a statement of intent with the B.C. Treaty Commission. The commission makes sure the statement is complete and forwards it to the federal and provincial governments. It is at this stage that the First Nation describes the geographic area in British Columbia it considers its traditional territory. Forty–seven statements of intent have been filed. These represent over 70 per cent of the aboriginal people of British Columbia. That is progress.

Second, the commission convenes a meeting to prepare for the negotiations. All three parties exchange information, consider the criteria, discuss the research they will do to prepare for the negotiations and identify issues of concern. Each party appoints a negotiator with a clear mandate. Each party establishes a ratification procedure, and the parties agree on the substantive and procedural matters that will be negotiated.

This is the stage at which Canada and the British Columbia government establish their own mechanisms for consultation with non–aboriginal interests. One requirement the B.C. Treaty Commission imposes on the two governments is the establishment of a regional consultative mechanism to represent thirty party interests.

When the commission determines that all three parties have met the criteria for readiness, it confirms they can proceed to stage three. This is where all three parties negotiate a framework agreement, a negotiated agenda that identifies the issues to be negotiated, the goals of the negotiation process, special procedural arrangements and a timetable for the negotiations.

So far four framework agreements have been signed and another four initialled by the negotiators. Again, this is progress.

• (1545)

In the fourth stage of the treaty process the parties negotiate an agreement in principle. These are substantive negotiations and the parties examine the framework in detail.

Fifth, the principals negotiate to finalize the treaty. Any remaining technical and legal issues are resolved at this stage. Then, and only then, the sixth stage is the implementation of the treaty. Long term implementation plans need to be tailored to specific agreements.

All commissions agree that significant progress has been made by the treaty process. The B.C. Treaty Commission process is working. It is fair, equitable and open. No one denies that the negotiations ahead will be tough. There are some very complex issues to be brought to the table. However, it is time that we settled these claims so that all British Columbians, aboriginal and non–aboriginal, can get on with the job of building a prosperous society in that province, a society where all groups can enjoy the wealth of resources the province can offer. It will benefit all British Columbians.

It is time to get on with the job. It is not a time for fearmongering. It is a time for fairness and certainty. It is certainly not a time for delaying while we wait for a provincial election which would create a precedent and would be very much uncalled for.

I do not represent aboriginal people who have claims that are hundreds of years old. I represent over 2,000 aboriginal people. Their treaty was signed in 1923, in modern times. Yesterday I attended a funeral in my riding of the first woman Indian chief in Canada. She died at the age of 73. In 1953, when she first became a chief, she was a young woman and a young mother who was concerned about these issues. When she died, only this week, she was still concerned about them. Her mother died two years ago at the age of 103. Throughout her life she was active in trying to resolve the problems of the First Nations in my riding.

The native people would like to negotiate. I think all Canadians would like to negotiate. Every time we have a standoff all Canadians suffer. I am very concerned that the member would bring forward such a motion today.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it might be helpful if the member were to spend a little time in British Columbia rather than in Peterborough. Then he might have some comprehension of what is the content of the speech from the Department of Indian Affairs that he just read to us. He clearly has no concept of what is going on in British Columbia.

When the member says this is an open process, the people in British Columbia, who are concerned about this, which is probably the majority of British Columbians, would ask: What open process?

I am consistently asked: "Who is negotiating for us? Who are they? How were they selected? Where do they meet? When do they meet? I do now know who they are". More important, I am also asked: "What is their mandate? Who gave them the mandate? How do we even know what they are negotiating on our behalf?"

I am inclined to agree with the member that if we have a problem, which we clearly do in this situation or in any situation, that it is very helpful to have negotiations with people who are sitting down eyeball to eyeball.

However, what we have in my constituency in British Columbia is 3 per cent of the people that are represented by people who are constantly in touch with them, who clearly understand what the mandate is and, more important, who go back to their people to report regularly. They also know that they are going to be subject to a ratification vote at the end of the day. Therefore, they know that they have to negotiate in good faith on behalf of the people they represent. The same is absolutely not true of the non–aboriginal side.

I ask the member if he would care to come to British Columbia and maybe we could clue him in a little bit.

• (1550)

Mr. Adams: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that I have relatives in British Columbia who live in Kamloops and I visit frequently. I know the riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley well. I regularly visit the city of Vancouver. I have visited the Peace River country. However, I do not pretend to be a resident of British Columbia. I am a member of the Parliament of Canada and I am concerned about all Canadians.

The hon. member asked who was negotiating. It is the duty of members of Parliament to explain these processes. The B.C. Treaty Commission process is a good one. It is transparent. There has been legislation in the House related to it. It is for the Reform members to explain those matters in detail to the people of their ridings.

I would like to read something and members opposite can guess where it comes from. Perhaps this comes from Ontario too. I am proud to be a resident of Ontario, but I try to represent all the people of Canada. The quotation reads: "Statements made in the House of Commons that native people who live in inadequate reserve housing without running water or basic sewage should simply move away are naive and racist in nature. Those uninformed comments made by Reform aboriginal affairs critic Mike Scott show the true character of his party. Reform members have become notorious for making offhanded, uninformed accusations concerning First Nations". That is by David Neale of the Victoria Times.

"The Reform Party's campaign to kill comprehensive land claims settlements is characterized by its sheer misinformation, its deliberate confusion of separate processes and its shameless manipulation of media that seem ignorant—"

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that we are not to refer to members by their names, even when quoting from a document.

The Speaker: The hon. member is absolutely correct. I would ask the hon. member to wrap up his comments.

Mr. Adams: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to members opposite. They are absolutely right and I apologize for mentioning the Reform member by name.

"The Reform Party's campaign to kill comprehensive land claim settlements is characterized by its sheer misinformation, its deliberate confusion of separate processes and its shameless manipulation of media that seem ignorant of history".

That quote is not from someone outside the province of British Columbia. It was written by Stephen Hume of the Vancouver Sun on April 10, 1995.

The Speaker: On debate, the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria.

Mr. Duncan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been looking at my watch and I thought we had at least three minutes left in the 10–minute question and comment period for the hon. member for Peterborough.

The Speaker: I should tell the hon. member it was ten minutes and five minutes. The other ten minutes are going to go to the hon. member whom I have just recognized.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on this undemocratic motion moved by the hon. member for the Reform Party.

It would seem that the hon. member does not support economic prosperity for British Columbians, as he is suggesting that we delay creating treaties that would remove an obstacle which has hampered economic growth in B.C. for far too long: the uncertainty over ownership of land and resources. That uncertainty has carried a very high price.

In 1990 a Price Waterhouse study asked forestry and mining interests in B.C. about the effects of the uncertainty created by unresolved land claims.

[Translation]

The study's findings are eloquent. In these two sectors alone, the study notes a loss of one billion dollars worth of investments: 300 new jobs in jeopardy, 1,500 permanent jobs on hold, and capital losses totalling $125 million due to uncertainty about the legal status of land and resources.

• (1555)

Since then we continue to pay the price of uncertainty, year after year. It is the price we pay for letting the situation deteriorate and for refusing to sit down with our aboriginal partners and discuss rational solutions to the real problems. That is the price the Reform Party would like us to keep paying.

We now have a chance to do something, to create jobs and to stimulate our economic growth. In September, Marlie Beets of the B.C. Council of Forest Industries had this to say: "Our members know that we cannot afford to ignore the issue of treaties. The forestry industry fully supports the efforts being made to resolve these problems, even if it is concerned about what these treaties may contain".

[English]

The forestry industry of B.C. understands what is involved. It knows that it cannot function efficiently without clear policies. It knows aboriginal rights must be defined clearly so that everyone knows the rules of the game. It knows that the time has come to realize the potential of the province and to extend the opportunity for its people. It wants to get on with it.

The proposition is simple. Treaties will provide certainty and create a better climate for investment and economic growth. This is a reality which cannot be denied. A clear signal will be sent: B. C. is open for business.

Treaties will also provide a land base for aboriginal people and with it a foundation on which to build self–sufficient communities. It will allow aboriginal people to become involved in a range of economic activities which in the absence of a land base have been foreclosed to them.

Commercial activities like mining, forestry and tourism become far more possible to be pursued by First Nations. The growth of strong, self–reliant, economically vibrant aboriginal communities strengthen us all because it will bring positive economic spinovers into non–aboriginal communities.

For too long the aboriginal people of B.C. have been denied both their legal rights from the past and their hopes for the future.

[Translation]

For too long they have suffered as a result of high rates of unemployment, illiteracy, infant mortality and suicide. For too long we have refused to acknowledge their potential contribution to Canadian society. This is an attitude that cannot be justified, and it must stop.

Once rights and obligations have been clearly defined in treaties, all residents of British Columbia, aboriginal and non–aboriginal, will be able to develop the potential of their province and improve their own circumstances. That is good news for forestry workers and miners.

It means a broader tax base, since injecting settlement funds will stimulate the economy and job creation. It also means a reduction in the social cost of poverty and unemployment in aboriginal communities. It means an end to litigation and costly court proceedings and the beginning of co–operation and negotiation.

These historic problems will not disappear at the wave of a magic wand. As long as they remain unresolved, there will be no investment, and the jobs that could and should be created will remain in limbo.

The vicious circle will continue: uncertainty will lead to a reduction in the number of jobs which in turn will increase social problems.

[English]

The cycle of poverty and dependency will continue. These issues simply must be dealt with. We have a choice of how we are going to do it. We can litigate at great expense to the Canadian taxpayer knowing that at the end of this long, drawn out and often bitter process a court is likely to tell us to work out the details ourselves, something very similar to the negotiation process we have now.

• (1600)

Or we could negotiate directly from the outset. Surely it makes good economic sense to avoid costly court battles, which cast each party in the role of antagonist, and approach the issues as partners prepared to give and take in a spirit of trust and mutual respect.

There are real economic benefits in proceeding with treaties in B.C. but at the end of the day the most important benefit will not be felt in terms of dollars and cents. It will be felt in the lives of individuals as they are given the opportunity to contribute further to the greatness of Canada.

The benefits of holding a job cannot always be measured by a point on a graph. Having a job is really about hope. It means having the ability to plan for the future and to realize one's potential as well as to advance one's family. It means having the pride of contributing to the overall health of one's community. Is it better to leave things in a state of confusion or to sit down with our aboriginal colleagues and establish certainty?

Perhaps it is expecting too much to hope the Reform Party's vision of Canada is broad enough to include the first peoples or generous enough to expand the circle of opportunity or far sighted enough to see the wisdom in finally completing this great unfinished business of our history. Surely it is not expecting too much to ask the Reform Party to take a hard headed look at the economics of treaty negotiations and admit that it makes real sense.

Surely even Reformers can see the awful price we are paying for uncertainty. Surely even they can see the benefits of negotiation over litigation. I hope they do see these benefits when it comes time to vote on this motion and that they join us in denouncing this short sighted and meanspirited motion.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, other than the partisan ending to the member's speech virtually everything said is something we subscribe to. As long as the treaties are done right in terms of content, what the member is saying is absolutely correct. We do need to define aboriginal rights and we do need to solve the problems of uncertainty.

There was an earlier reference to the Charlottetown accord. Of any identifiable ethnic or racial group in Canada, once the voting was over on the Charlottetown referendum the natives on reserves more than any other group resoundingly defeated the Charlottetown accord in the referendum. We need to remember that because I do not believe that is in the public consciousness. There are some important reasons why that happened which I am certainly sensitive to. I am not sure everyone in the House is sensitive to those reasons.

There is a 31–member treaty negotiation advisory committee. One of its members was referred to in the previous member's speech, the member from the council of forest industries. Many of the members of that treaty negotiation advisory committee and also some of the members of the regional advisory committees who were referred to by several speakers are the biggest critics of the status quo process. It is important to recognize those items.

• (1605)

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear a question per se. I think researchers from the hon. member's office are providing some of the things he wants to put on the record.

With regard to the Charlottetown accord, the population of British Columbia also rejected the Charlottetown accord. The hon. member should keep his records straight. I want to make sure there is no bias in what is put into the record.

I find this motion somewhat petty. I cannot believe that everywhere we go, in every committee of the House, Reform Party members always take on democracy, democratic rights. Yet they are actually saying in this motion that democracy in B.C. is not alive and well because there is a government that should be calling an election in one year which was not elected in a democratic process and cannot assure and assume responsibility for all its citizens. That is what the motion is implying, that it does not have the mandate and the responsibility and that it was not elected in a democracy.

I do not know if they read what they wrote in this motion. It is an absolute bias. As far as I am concerned it destroys their entire argument and excuse which they advocate in the House and in every committee to put forward their petty politics.

The hon. member who put forth this motion states: "The aim of these changes would be to give aboriginals more responsibility for their well–being, the tools to discharge that responsibility and more accountability for their result". That is from a press release on Reform policy for aboriginal equality and accountability.

I am sorry, but we are dealing here with a motion coming from a member who says one thing one day and another thing another day, just like his leader.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night was an infamous time in Canadian history. The opposition parties in the Ontario legislature conducted an illegal occupation and sit–in of the Ontario chamber. This was unconscionable and I plead with them to consider the example they have set.

I can understand their frustration because being an opposition member facing a juggernaut of a majority government can be disappointing, frustrating and disillusioning.

The Reform Party faced that shortsighted stupidity and abuse of power exercised by the federal Liberal government when it used a pile–driver to ram through the Yukon Indian land claims and self–government in June 1994.

Believe it or not, we now have government in Canada based on race. The federal government has turned over massive sections of law making in Yukon to aboriginal people. Let me put this in the most transparent terms. Aboriginal persons can make certain laws that directly impact non–aboriginal persons, and non–aboriginal persons have no democratic recourse.

• (1610)

In South Africa this was called apartheid when the majority of blacks were dictated to by the minority of whites. What do we call it in Canada when the majority of non–aboriginals are dictated to by the aboriginals?

This is going on in Yukon. The stupidity of the government's ham fisted legislation is that it has constitutionally removed freedoms from aboriginal people in Yukon as well. In part of Canada's Constitution the federal government has delegated law making to certain Indian nations but in turn those nations do not have to construct those laws through a democratic process. Those nations may delegate law making to an individual in the Indian nation.

Both aboriginal and non–aboriginal residents in Yukon can now become subject to certain laws with absolutely no recourse, no democracy. Dictatorship for Canadians enshrined in the Canadian Constitution by the government? It is unbelievable.

This is why the Reform Party has raised the issue of the B.C. treaty negotiations today. B.C. residents, indeed all Canadian citizens, are about to have an agreement in principle that has been negotiated behind closed doors which will be rammed down their throats. It will be an agreement in principle that will be the starting point for a constitutionalized treaty. If there was ever a time to protest, to obstruct, to go to the extreme, this is it.

Unlike the financially driven issues in Ontario that are very serious, the issue of the B.C. treaty process is that the B.C. treaty and the Nisga'a agreement in principle will explicitly impact Canadians' democratic freedoms. The process and treaty will permanently, constitutionally, enshrine some personal rights based on race.

If we do not respect democratic process and combine our protests within the democratic process, we have destroyed democracy. I have asked the MPPs who occupied the Ontario legislature, what is the difference between the 19 aboriginal protesters who occupied a Toronto Revenue Canada office last year or the occupiers at Ipperwash? What is the difference between them and the occupiers of the Ontario legislature? A lot. If the members of the provincial parliament, the law makers, will not respect the law how can they expect ordinary citizens to respect the law? Without respect we have anarchy.

However, this is not a one–sided issue. If the government at Queen's Park or here in Ottawa is bull headed, provocative, uncaring and insensitive to concerns of citizens, as expressed by members of the opposition, it shares an important part of the responsibility for lawless actions.

The Liberals here have such a responsibility. They have a responsibility to really listen and respond. How can I describe my rage that they used a pile–driver to smash personal rights and freedoms of Canadians in Yukon? The Liberals would not entertain a Reform Party motion that would have subjected the attack on personal rights and freedoms of Yukon residents to the Canadian charter of rights.

Reform Party members used every parliamentary tactic in June 1994 available to them to slow the race based, democracy bashing Yukon acts. It became a choice: break the law ourselves to stop the Liberals' stupidity or work within the system and respect this institution in spite of the Liberals' bullheaded stupidity.

For Yukon it is too late but for B.C. it is not. I plead with the Liberals. Listen, learn and recognize that the Liberal process is not only out of touch with reality but, most important, will lead to permanent civil disobedience and racial gridlock.

In my office in Cranbrook I have been approached by aboriginal people. Members of the Ktunaxa nation tell me their negotiators are out of touch with them. These Indian people resent and reject being left on the outside of the negotiating process.

At least these constituents who represent about 3 per cent of the population in Kootenay East will have a chance to ratify a negotiated agreement. They will get one person, one vote, but what about the other 97 per cent? Approximately 70,000 people who will have to live with the treaty will get two persons, their MP and MLA, with two votes. Their MP with one vote in the House will be pitted against members like the member for Peterborough and members from Quebec, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Ontario: one of 295 votes to represent the interests of my 70,000 people.

Do we have democracy when an aboriginal gets a vote but a non–aboriginal does not? I think not.

• (1615)

I suggest the aboriginal negotiators who may presently be considered to be out of touch by their aboriginal constituents are negotiating the aboriginal position with popular ratification of the final agreement in mind. They clearly understand their negotiations will be rejected if they do not reflect the wishes of their constituents.

It is not just an issue of fairness. It is more than enforcing the principle of equality of all Canadians. It is about a workable process that will lead to a real solution to a real problem. If we do not get it right, we will end up with civil disobedience, unrest, racial friction and a giant, tangled, constitutionalized mess.

I am asked constantly as to who is negotiating for the non–aboriginal citizen. People come in to my office and want to know literally who is negotiating for them. They want to know who the negotiators are, how they are selected, where they meet, when do they meet and more important, what their mandate is and who gave it to them. A constituent asked me: "How will they know what I will accept? Why do I not have the same rights as the aboriginal with the ratification vote?" People tell me: "If I have not been part of the process, if my interests have not been explicitly taken into account, I have no interest in the agreement".

Let me clearly explain what this means to the Indian affairs minister and the Liberal backbenchers who are forced to support him. Let me also explain this to the provincial negotiators. If the negotiators knew during the treaty negotiations that their process was going to be subject to popular ratification, they would negotiate in a substantially different way. They would know that their bottom line, that the results of the treaty process negotiations would have to be accepted, in my case by 97 per cent of Kootenay East residents.

Impossible, the Liberals say: "We would never get an agreement". Well that is precisely the problem. Contrary to the Liberals' old party assumptions, Canadians will not have government imposed top down solutions. Let me repeat that Canadians clearly have shown in everything from the Charlottetown accord to the cablevision fee increase kerfuffle last year, that they would not accept those increases and they would not accept the Charlottetown accord. They will not have their future dictated by Ottawa politicians. There we have it.

When talking about the B.C. treaty process of the Nisga'a agreement the facts are the same. If Canadians are not part of the solution, they will be part of the problem and with a vengeance.

The difference between the problems today and tomorrow are two. First, non–aboriginal residents of B.C. are scared, anxious and concerned. They are delaying investment decisions by the truckload. Their apprehension is magnified by the unknown. Tomorrow they will be resentful, surly and unco–operative, with their apprehension replaced by lack of co–operation with the government and a bad attitude toward the people who have special position and privilege based on their race. Second, today we have some flexibility. Tomorrow the decisions will be etched in granite because they will be constitutionalized for all time.

Do we get the picture? We permanently remove one serious problem and immediately replace it with a problem 20 times worse.

We will use the finance minister's comment from question period today. We will use his example of an incapacitated driver racing down a hill. The Reform motion we have put forward would slow down the driver, bring him to a stop and hopefully sober him up. The Liberals will leave the driver racing down the hill until he crashes.

Will the Liberals listen? Will the B.C. NDP government which is on its way out take heed? I doubt it. And more the shame because they are putting the same unconscionable pressure on the Reform Party that the Ontario government put on its opposition. The federal Liberals have a responsibility to be reasonable and they are blowing it.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest and I am sorry that the member did not have an opportunity to speak very much with regard to the motion. He may have spent a little more time on the partisan aspects of political life.

The member started off in his debate referring to the situation in the Ontario provincial legislature. He chastises the opposition members for taking charge of a situation and in fact exercising their right to let their views be known in that elected body.

• (1620)

The member then went on to describe a situation which occurred last June in the aboriginal affairs committee. He said that a piece of legislation had been rammed through the committee. The hon. member will well know that the meeting continued all through the night until six o'clock the next morning. I was at the meeting from about midnight until 6 a.m. filling in for some of my colleagues.

Members of the Reform Party were conducting a filibuster. The filibuster was basically to ask nuisance and nonsense questions on virtually every word in the bill. They kept the entire staff associated with that committee and members of Parliament, about 40 people, tied up in a stuffy room while they asked nuisance questions. It is precisely the same situation. The Reform Party was exercising its democratic right. I do not for one moment believe there was anything wrong with what the Reform members did. They were doing it because it is part of the democratic process.

The hon. member also referred to his frustration. I am sorry the member is frustrated with life in a House which has a majority government. However, we must respect the democratic process. The fact that the government has a majority is a reflection of the operation of the democratic process.

The hon. member well knows that when a government is elected it has a platform which reflects the commitments the party has made to the people of Canada. "If you elect us, these are the things we will do". When the party platform is put into legislation, it is incumbent on the members elected to the governing party to follow the promises they have made.

Does the hon. member not believe that supporting legislation which reflects the platform of a party during an election is respecting the democratic process?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. It is only logical and rational that a party when it forms a majority government would be committed to following through on its election platform. We have no disagreement with that.

However, we have a very fundamental difference of opinion with respect to the fact that the Liberal government has used closure more times than the Brian Mulroney government even thought about. It is ramming through distinct society. It is ramming through veto. It rammed through the Indian land claims. I suggest that a majority government not only has a right to do what it wants to do, but it has a responsibility to opposition members who are expressing the deep, heartfelt concerns of their constituents. Those concerns are falling on deaf ears because of the unslakeable thirst for power of the government.

There is a tremendous amount of fear, anxiety and concern in British Columbia that the cabinet has such a weak representation in British Columbia. There is a tremendous amount of silence on the part of federal Liberals elected in British Columbia. The government is running roughshod with its legislation.

The hon. member referred to the filibuster in committee. He is right; it is legal. I submit to him that the process which the MPPs undertook in the Ontario legislature because they were so desperate goes far beyond the whole process of a filibuster.

What I am saying is that we have reached a point of very acute concern about the heavy handedness of the Liberal Party and in particular, the NDP government in B.C. which is currently on its way out. We are concerned that we are going to have something imposed on the people of British Columbia by people who are fundamentally out of touch with reality.

• (1625)

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will keep an eye on the clock and I hope you will help me out because I am not sure how this will go.

I rise today to speak in opposition to Bill C–107, an act to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission and to speak in favour of our motion to urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last years of the current provincial government's mandate.

In fact, this bill does not establish the treaty commission, it continues it and legalizes it. It is just what we need, another legally entrenched layer of bureaucracy. It is another group of appointees with their own staff to be paid for by the people of Canada. I oppose the establishment of this treaty commission in British Columbia because it is simply not necessary.

In British Columbia we have no treaties. We have a reserve system. The legal entrenchment of this commission prejudges the outcome of the land claims negotiations which are presently taking place in British Columbia.

I can tell you that the people of British Columbia are very concerned about this treaty negotiation process. Just a few days ago I hosted in my riding of Mission—Coquitlam an information evening on aboriginal issues which was attended by over 200 people. They are very concerned that fishing rights and lumbering rights will be bargained away as part of the settlement process. They also believe they should be a part of any settlement process.

Mel Smith, the well known, well respected author of Our Home or Native Land? attended the meeting. He stated that British Columbia has already done its duty to its native people by setting up more than 1,600 reserves. He argues that by doing this British Columbia has discharged any duty it owed to the aboriginal people. As well, the government could compensate the native people with a one time cash payment for loss of hunting, trapping and gathering rights over the lands.

It is our intention to ensure that Canada's native people become completely self–reliant. We would like to preside over the dismantling of the department of Indian affairs, thus allowing aboriginal people to become self–sufficient. This should be the goal for all of us in this House. Yet what do we hear? A lot of name calling from the other side. To become self–sufficient, the aboriginal people do not need a treaty commission.

It is our belief that we should get rid of the Indian Act, giving aboriginals the same right to property ownership as other citizens. Aboriginals should be subject to the same constitutional, federal and provincial laws as the rest of Canadians. They should be allowed to establish municipal style governments and benefit from the same programs as the rest of Canadians.

There is no need for this bill, but there is a need to address aboriginal issues in a timely fashion. I would like to remind members that we are not suggesting we do away with any type of negotiation. Having said this, I wish to draw the attention of the House to certain shortcomings in the bill.

The interpretation section contains a definition of First Nations. They are described as aboriginal people within their traditional territory in British Columbia. The definition begs the question of entitlement to a land base. It can be argued that by the use of the definition the aboriginal people are shown to have a prima facie case of a land claims settlement.

Again, clause 5 does the same thing. It states that the purpose of the commission is to facilitate in British Columbia the negotiation of treaties. In other words, establish this commission and we are bound to have the traditions negotiated, whether there is an entitlement or not. The process has been established.

Clause 5 obligates the commission to allocate funds to allow First Nations to participate in the process. This will be expensive. But in addition to it being expensive, it is also exclusionary.

Funding is not provided for third parties, only the aboriginal people. What about those who oppose the giveaway of British Columbia lands? I guess they will have to finance these interventions themselves. I hope they are able to. It is my understanding that in the borrowing of funds to negotiate there will be an 80:20 split. In that case, 80 per cent will be repayable; 20 per cent will be contributed by whom, the federal government, the provincial government, what part for each one?

Clause 7 of the bill establishes how the commission is to be appointed. The federal government and the B.C. government each get to appoint commissions. I do not see anyone who will simply represent the people of Canada. Are they not important? Are the members opposite saying they do not count? These appointments, all appointments to the Commission, should be subject to the approval of this House.

Clause 18 allows the commission to make necessary bylaws. We are giving the commission power to establish its own rules of procedure. At the very least, these bylaws should be tabled in this House.

• (1630)

Clause 22, the clause which perhaps bothers me more than any other, states that the parties can amend the agreement at any time. This is the British Columbia Treaty Commission agreement which underlies this act. It is beyond me how the bill can allow amendments to the agreement without references to Parliament.

In my last householder I asked the following question: "Do you believe that all Canadians should have equal rights and responsibilities with no special status based on racial or ethnic origin?" Ninety–one per cent answered yes. However, in addition to answering many wrote comments, some of which I should like to share. I have so many comments that I cannot share them all, but I will share some of them.

I have not done anything to the comments. I have not changed their wording. I have not corrected grammar. I have not done anything to them. These are some of the things the residents of my riding in British Columbia are saying: "Anyone born in Canada should have the same rights and be governed by the same laws. This is not true now".

"We all have our own ethnic upbringings but we do not expect to be treated differently from others. I believe that everyone regardless of race should work and pay for their property".

"Governments should put a stop to all the Indian roadblocks. I do not feel the Indian population should have special rights, especially Indians who are abusing their position and rights". There might be something there with regard to fishing rights. There has been tremendous abuse of fishing rights in British Columbia.

"We are all Canadians. We should have the same rights and laws. Practices such as giving natives the right to fish any time for their food as well as to sell those fish is making racial problems". They are. That is a truth. I do not want to sit in the House and be condemned and called names by members opposite for saying the truth. I am getting very tired of it.

"Natives should not get tax free anything. They should work like everyone else. We are suggesting that native people be given a fair chance to stand on their own two feet. Wouldn't you suggest that is the right thing to do?"

Regarding self–government, the Indian Act discriminates against aboriginal people by setting them apart from other Canadians. That is what Reform believes. I do not see how any member in the House could disagree with that. Most native people want the same rights, freedoms, responsibilities and protections of other Canadians. The Indian Act stifles its subjects from having a democratic voice in their own affairs and from having accountability in their own officials.

The inherent right to self–government is an interesting phrase. What does it mean? When Reform MPs rightly ask what is meant by self–government, the previous speaker from Peterborough attacks Reformers for wanting to know the answer. Can we imagine anyone going into negotiations without knowing what all parties mean by the terminology that is being discussed? It is absolutely ridiculous. Instead of the member for Peterborough admitting the common sense of Reform in asking this question, he attacks Reform MPs for asking it.

I have been watching government members in the House for some time now. I wonder what constantly drives them to put down other elected members of Parliament. Is it because they have no answers? They started this terrible debt that is climbing up and up and up. We are trying to deal with it today and they do not have the answers. Are they trying to take the pressure off themselves? Is it because to attack means one does not have to deal with the issues?

The member for Madawaska—Victoria called us meanspirited. She said: "What about democratic rights? Reformers are always on about democratic rights". Yes, we are. We are discussing the democratic rights of all British Columbians and of all other Canadians. The treaty process does not involve a few people. It involves all Canadians. It is time we started to be honest.

The department of Indian affairs has not worked. Can anyone say it has worked? This process which has been encouraged by this government and by past Liberal governments has created a group of Canadians who are dependent on the Canadian government.

Past Canadian governments have created an institutionalized welfare state for native people. This is not kindness. This is cruelty. I wonder how many times we have to say that. It is not the Reformers who are being cruel. The Reformers are saying we should stop all this now, help people, deal with the issues, deal with reality and stop calling names because that does not get anybody anywhere. The House is far above that sort of presentation. It really distresses me every time I hear it.

• (1635)

I spent many years teaching students. I always taught them that in debate, if they do not have something to say, if they cannot back it up or say it in a proper manner, they should not bother saying it at all.

I watch repeatedly in the House people tearing at each other. I would rather hear facts, I would rather hear arguments that are presented properly. I really am discouraged by it.

This morning the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development directed most of his remarks to the right of Reform MPs to raise this issue in the House. Have I missed something here? Are we not all elected equally? How dare anybody question the right of Reform MPs to raise this issue in the House? That is absolutely disgusting.

He proceeded to describe Reformers as aboriginal bashers because we were making him uncomfortable; that is all I can suggest. I guess it is the old story: the best defence is an offence. I have often heard the word racist. It disgusts me too. If members take the time to look it up in the dictionary they will see that it means giving special priorities to a certain group. Reformers repeatedly say that we must all be equal. If we are all equal that is not racist. Some members should start telling the truth in the House. The House is far above the petty squabbling I witness day after day.

Native people soundly defeated the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. What does that say to members of the House? It was not suitable to them. Distinct society, as presented, was not suitable to them.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct a few points.

We passed Bill C–107 regarding the B.C. Treaty Commission. The B.C. Treaty Commission is formed by five people. One is appointed by the governor. One is appointed by the lieutenant governor. Two are appointed by the summit. Then the chairperson is appointed by the three parties I just mentioned.

Truth is always a question of perception. Many times I am very disturbed by the truth the Reform Party raises. I suppose we are not on the same wave length and that is why we are on opposing sides of the House.

I agree to some extent with the member. I am quite distraught most of the time by what is going on in the House and by the lack of kindness we see here.

As for the aboriginal people, it is true we should all be equal. However aboriginal people have been in distress for too long. They are in a situation where they need help. We must start on an equal basis in order to be equal. We have to help them first, put them on an equal basis, and then we can all be equal.

I have two questions for my colleague. She mentioned that in reply to her householder 91 per cent of the people said that they wanted equality. How many people answered her householder? Whenever I ask questions in my householder I always have a very low response.

Does she feel that the comments of her colleague from Kootenay West made on the Liberal caucus of British Columbia were actually kind comments? I take exception to what he said. We have been working very well in spite of the fact that we are so few. We have been able to achieve quite a few things.

Mrs. Jennings: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware that Bill C–107 was passed. I did not get a chance to speak on it and I very much wanted to. With 52 MPs on the Reform side, many of us do not get to speak on the issues we would like to speak on. Since it impacts directly on this I certainly wanted an opportunity to do so.

No one represents the people. I must insist that all the names the hon. member mentioned were appointed, as she said, but who is representing the people of British Columbia? Nobody is.

• (1640)

Aboriginal people have been in distress for too long. Those who know their Canadian history will realize that not just the aboriginal people were in distress in the history of the country. They should know about the Acadians who were torn asunder, who lost family members, who lost their lands, who were sent all over the world and had nothing. Nobody paid them anything. No one re–established them. Nobody did anything. They were good, worthwhile people.

We also had the Loyalists who were driven out of the United States to Canada. They had nothing. They had to leave. What did we do when the Loyalists came to Canada? We did not give them anything to set up. They had to do it on their own. Today they are better off having done that. It makes their lives a lot easier. Too bad we did not do that with the native people.

What about Japanese Canadians? We just took and took. With these examples I am trying to say to the hon. member that we have made mistakes. We admit we have made mistakes, but is it not time to start on an equal basis for everyone? I strongly suggest we should.

Regarding my householders, I keep track and I have been running at a 2 per cent to 6 per cent return. I have about 58,000 in my riding. We do not have them all in at this time because it only went out and we are waiting. We have had over 1,500 returned, so it is 91 per cent of the 1,500. That is the best I can tell the member right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt—Department of National Defence; the hon. member for Mackenzie—Canadian Wheat Board; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Environmental Protection Act—the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—Vietnam; the hon. member for Saint John—National Defence.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to respond to the motion by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

At the outset I must say I find the motion puzzling. No doubt the hon. member means well, but I do not think he has thought through the consequences of the motion. If adopted, parliamentary democracy in Canada will slow down to a crawl. The hon. member asks us to forgo signing land claim agreements because the people of British Columbia may be going to the polls soon. His motion refers to the last year of the current provincial government mandate.

I wonder how he expects any business to get done in a federal state, let alone one with ten provinces and two territorial governments, and soon to be three. In any given year at least one of these governments may be facing an election. On average two and one–half of them will be facing an election every year.

It would seem the hon. member wants to paralyse the decision making process. The convention is that elections are held every four or five years. How do we know which it will be? Should we begin clamping down on a government's right to sign agreements during the third year or the fourth years of its term?

What about the case of minority governments? The pattern in Canada seems to be that minority governments call an election after two years in office. This is not a constitutional principle. It is not even a convention. It is simply a reality of minority government. If we were apply the hon. member's motion in these situations, we would not sign any agreements with a minority government that had been in office for more than one year.

We can imagine the results. A new minority government is sworn in. The new ministry has a few months to become accustomed to power and to learn something about the ropes. Just as it is hitting stride and beginning to get some things accomplished, other governments in the country say: "Sorry, we can't sign any agreements with you. We have to respect the views of your electorate who may be going to the polls soon. They may want to change something".

Yet I hear over and over again from the members of the Reform Party that government must pay attention to the grassroots. The last speaker from Mission—Coquitlam made much of this point. What is their idea of paying attention to the grassroots? The member for Mission—Coquitlam said that we should read the answers to the questions she put in householder and that is it.

• (1645)

It is sort of like following the opinion polls, setting up hotlines so that people can phone in their views. It is town hall meetings and radio talk shows. I have nothing against any of these practices. I do them myself. I commend any effort to encourage Canadians to express their views. We have to understand one thing: taking an opinion poll or gauging the views of the people who phone in to a hotline or having a show of hands at a town hall meeting is not the same as representing the grassroots. The important word is representing.

This is a representative government. We are all representatives of the people of this country. The way I try to do it, and I suggest most of us do, is to get involved, to learn, to listen. We go to committee meetings, we question witnesses and we study and debate those issues which are of particular concern or about which we have some particular expertise.

When I ran in my riding to represent the people, I told them what I stood for, what the party was going to do and what the issues were with which the government would deal. We were fortunate enough to receive a majority of the votes in this country and represent the majority of the seats. Therefore, the Liberal Party in this House is, I submit, the only truly representative body here. That seems to be self–evident. We come from all across the country. We represent every ethnic group in the country, including the aboriginal people. Therefore, we try to represent what the majority of Canadians think and feel about this country.

The grassroots is largely made up of people who do not phone in to hotline shows. They have little inclination to talk to Raife Mair on the radio. They do not go to town hall meetings. They might not have a strong opinion one way or another on a particular issue because they do not know enough about it, that is until they happen to be asked their opinion by a pollster. If the wrong question is asked, the wrong answer will be given.

Certainly most people believe all Canadians should have the same rights. The member for Mission—Coquitlam said that the Department of Indian Affairs has not worked. By today's standards and what we know now, it was an ill–conceived plan. It was a way of integrating another culture and people into ours. We have learned a lot since those days. I would agree very much with my colleague that we should do all we can over time to get rid of the paternalistic attitude of the Indian affairs department.

That does not mean that we can then say that all of us should have the same rights when we are not starting from the same place. If we do not understand that the Indian idea of property is different from ours, that it is culturally different and spiritually different, then we are never going to solve the problem because they will never agree.

Let us hear no more of the self–righteousness of the members of the Reform Party with their claims that they speak for the people. People elected the hon. member from North Island—Powell River on October 25, 1993 just as they elected me. They elected him to represent them. We both speak for the people in our ridings and people will have an opportunity to judge our performance in the next federal election.

The people of British Columbia elected the government of British Columbia and they will have their chance to render their verdict on that government in the coming months. In the meantime, we will continue with the job of governing the country and we have to carry on with the job of negotiating comprehensive claims with the First Nations of British Columbia. They have waited for 200 years to reach these agreements. Most have never had the opportunity to sign an agreement outlining their rights.

This is an historic anomaly in Canada. First Nations in all other provinces and in the territories have treaties, principally because most of the land unsettled is owned by the Queen in right of Canada in other provinces and territories.

• (1650)

The only treaties signed exclusively in British Columbia were concluded before the province joined Confederation in 1871. When the province joined Confederation, all the unclaimed land, except where the Indians had been pushed into reserves, was held by the Queen in right of British Columbia, which is not the same situation across the rest of the country.

This is where the grassroots beyond the aboriginal community can have their say. They are not left out of the process. Neither the Government of Canada nor the Government of British Columbia is interested, hopefully, in negotiating treaties that would ignore the interests of non–aboriginal British Columbians, any more than it is going to ignore the justifiable interests of the aboriginal people.

We do want to get on with the process. We want to remove the uncertainty. We cannot let the process become derailed because this government or that one nears the end of its mandate.

The negotiation of a comprehensive claim is a long and painstaking process. That is how it should be. That is how it has been. That is how it will be. These are very important negotiations. They define how people will function over the long term. They set the parameters for how aboriginal people and their institutions will relate to the federal and provincial governments.

The simplistic ideas we have heard so far this afternoon from Reform Party members seem to ignore completely that the Indian people are a people. They are protected, as we all are, under the Constitution. They have inalienable rights to self–government and they have inherent rights in this land. Those are the things we have to define.

After waiting for more than a century, the First Nations of British Columbia know the value of patience in making sure that the negotiations are done right. Perhaps a little of that patience would not hurt the members down the line.

At the same time, we should not set up artificial barriers by tying the hands of legislators that must pass the legislation to bring the treaties into effect. I urge the House to vote against this motion.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this motion has been misread. It depends where you are coming from sometimes how you choose to read something. Nowhere in this motion does the Reform Party suggest that governments cannot sign agreements in the last year of their mandate.

We are saying that when there is a significant, a major, a costly and a divisive issue, in the same way that the Mulroney Tories in the dying days of their government, low in the polls, signed the EH–101 and the Pearson deals, this is a divisive issue in British Columbia. It is precedent setting and worth billions of dollars. It is totally inappropriate for the government in the last year of its mandate to sign this treaty. In actuality the election is most likely only months away. It will be in the spring.

I want to make it perfectly clear that this is a basic assumption that was promoted by the last speaker and it is incorrect. Nowhere are we saying that, nor is that our intent.

There was a suggestion by the member that only a Liberal government is qualified to govern and only a Liberal government is qualified to judge the issues. I find that very difficult, particularly in the context of British Columbia. That is a stretch of unimaginable proportions.

The member made some statements about lands and about treaties. The significant thing in British Columbia is that British Columbia spent many years after Confederation contributing lands to the federal government to reserve for native people. That was a commitment made at the time of Confederation under the Act of Union. It was an unfulfilled commitment up until 1924. In 1924 the federal government, by order in council, agreed that the province of British Columbia had fulfilled its obligations.

• (1655)

British Columbia has two–thirds of all the reserves in Canada. About 18 per cent of registered Indian people in Canada live in British Columbia. Those reserves contain, within a provincial context, 14 per cent of all lands reserved for Indians. This is not insignificant. It is the crux of a very large issue. There is no legal imperative to negotiate treaties.

We are not saying that treaties should not be negotiated. We are also interested in removing the uncertainty from the landscape and from this whole issue. This is an appropriate way to do it. However, right now is not the time to conclude a final agreement.

Mr. Finlay: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for North Island—Powell River. I listened to his speech, as I have listened to them all. I suppose one might answer a question with another question.

I suggest, in the scheme of things, that two years is scarcely sufficient time for the B.C. Treaty Commission to prove its worth, as the member knows, as he listened as I did to the current head of that commission. Two years ago the commission started from scratch to set up a service organization to get the board together and write some policies. Since it only began in 1993 and we are in 1995, it has had scarcely two years which was not to negotiate treaties. It was, as my friend knows, to start the business, develop the expertise, set up the office and interest the First Nations of B.C. in coming forward to negotiate. Since a little more than 70 per cent of the natives in B.C. are involved in the process now, it seems to me we should give them a little time.

I appreciate the member filling me in with respect to the order in council in 1924. I am little confused about his numbers because I believe he said that B.C. had 17 per cent of all reserves in Canada and then went on to use the figure of 14 per cent. I want to ask him about that.

I also want to ask the member whether the election in B.C. is a foregone conclusion. I thought he might bring up the helicopters and the Pearson airport deal, but if he casts his mind back he will realize that the Pearson airport deal was signed in the midst of an election which the government was losing very badly. The helicopter deal was a statement in the red book and in the platform of the Liberal Party before it was signed. Again, it was within months of the election. I might remind the member that this House had not sat effectively for about a year and a half before that election.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to speak to this shortsighted motion moved by the hon. member from the Reform Party.

This undemocratic motion suggests that the views of British Columbians cannot and are not being respected in the treaty process. I want to correct this ill–informed impression by providing the hon. member and his equally ill–informed colleagues with some facts.

Before doing that, I would like to take exception to something said by my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam. I know Canadian history and I strongly believe that the aboriginals, because of their culture, had much more difficulty becoming part of our society and they still do.

Mr. Hermanson: Did you write that?

Mrs. Terrana: Yes, I wrote that. They have gone some way but they have to go further to be equal. Perhaps my choice of words is incorrect. My hon. colleagues have received a heap of factual information on the treaty process in British Columbia, but they seem bent on seeing things that are not there.

• (1700)

If they are involved in some science fiction movie, we are not in Hollywood, and let us get back to reality. We cannot stop all negotiations for almost one year. What for? Do we want to fool the First Nations once again? What would we accomplish? The treaty negotiation process is well under way.

Around ten teams are now at the framework step which is the fourth step of the process. We are all anxious to see the conclusion of these negotiations. It is important for all of us because the uncertainty has been too severe for years and has caused real hardship in British Columbia.

In B.C. the governments have set up structures to hear, discuss and solicit the advice of province wide interests. The Reform Party seems to ignore that advice is being sought. It wants to perpetuate the fear and concern which we all know exists. The Reform Party needs to understand that debate and discussion can take place without some of the hyperbole and rhetoric easily associated with treaty negotiations.

Let me talk about the consultations. In mid–1993 the federal and provincial governments formally established an advisory committee to advise ministers and senior officials on province wide treaty issues. The treaty negotiation advisory committee is made up of representatives from 31 organizations in British Columbia.

Among those organizations are four fishing industry representatives, five labour union representatives, the B.C. Wildlife Federation, guides and outfitters, the B.C. Council of Forestry, the B.C. Trappers Association, outdoor recreational interests, the B.C. Cattlemen's Association and others.

More important, the members come from throughout British Columbia. They are not all from Vancouver. They come from Smithers, Terrace, Kamloops, Quesnel, Prince Rupert and Vancouver Island. Each brings his or her organizational perspective but also the sense of how their neighbours and communities are reacting to the treaty negotiation process.

The objective of the treaty negotiation advisory committee, TNAC, is to ensure that the interests of the member organizations are understood and taken into account in the negotiation of modern day treaties and to contribute to treaty agreements with aboriginal people which are workable and lasting and have the understanding and support of British Columbians.

Those are high but necessary objectives. Governments are committed to not just hearing and understanding their advice but taking it into account when negotiating.

The federal government not only wants a means by which negotiations can be effectively conducted but also must seek effective and efficient advice from third parties whose interests might be affected by treaty settlement.

TNAC is structured to enable all members to know as much about the issues that could be negotiated and to notify governments of potential problems or concerns.

My colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has attended three of TNAC's bi–monthly meetings. To ensure he maintains a direct relationship to the committee, I serve as the minister's representative to the committee. We are as a government directly and closely involved in the discussion and advice from the TNAC table.

We are all working together, trying to come to an agreement we can all live with. At times it is difficult but with everybody's goodwill we will get there and solve a far too longstanding discrimination.

Because of TNAC things are changing every time we meet. We are listening. It is not an easy process but we are slowly getting there and learning to understand each other. Now we all recognize that 31 members is a large committee and that some issues require more specific discussion. Hence five sectoral committees were established. These committees meet monthly and are divided into lands and forests, fisheries, wildlife, governance and energy, mines and petroleum resources. Recently the energy mines committee folded its work into the governance committee.

An important step in building our understanding of third party interests was the development of interest papers by each of the five sectoral committees. I say a step because issues will evolve and be addressed over the course of negotiations.

Knowing the interests of third parties is a gradual approach but it has a clear objective. We want treaties that work and address the interests and needs of all participants in the economy.

• (1705)

In the year and a half I have been on TNAC I saw great improvement in communication and much better understanding of these complicated issues and better co–operation. In addition, the Government of British Columbia with which we are co–operating very well organizes province wide monthly advisory meetings which are reaching all British Columbians. It is a shame that such intolerance is being promoted by some people in B.C. who do not seem to want to solve the problems.

I will identify a few of the interests common to all parties in the process. Certainty and economic stability were essential. Effective local and regional advisory processes were essential. Access to land base for all economic and non–economic interests was essential. The continuation of government authority in areas of resource management was imperative to successfully concluding practical and affordable land claims settlements.

Both governments have taken these interest papers seriously. As we work through the development of specific negotiating mandates the advice TNAC has provided through these papers will be considered, assessed and integrated wherever possible. Through the consultation process and eventually through Parliament the government will be held accountable for how it has used the advice of third parties.

Now the Reform Party seems obsessed by secrecy even when it no longer exists. In September 1994 I presented to TNAC the minister's position on the openness of the consultation process. The minister accepted the concerns of TNAC members that a confidentiality restriction overly limited their ability to seek advice and direction from their colleagues and organizations. Now the media is invited to all our meetings. That restriction has ended. TNAC members can and do fully discuss information provided by governments to TNAC members.

The B.C. Treaty Commission in its annual reports has talked of the need to consult and for people to know what is going on in the treaty process. Perception can become reality. It only takes a willingness to request some written information because material is available.

The chief commissioner, Alec Robertson, came to the September 1995 TNAC meeting to report to members and hear their concerns about the treaty process. That is another important link in the treaty process. At this time 120 bands representing 79 per cent of First Nations are negotiating.

A couple of weeks ago in Sechelt I met the chief of the Sechelt Band who cheerfully told me how well his framework agreement negotiations are going. He expects conclusion by next August. The Sechelt Band was the fourth to sign a framework agreement, the first step of the negotiating process. I was in Sechelt in August for the signing of the agreement and there was a real celebration.

At the centre is the need to negotiate workable, effective and affordable treaties. Unless those treaties are surrounded and supported by a strong consultation process which provides for a frank and open exchange of information, advice and interest, the objective of publicly supported treaties will be difficult to achieve.

Consultation is important. The government takes the views of Canadians seriously. We want to ensure our policies and their implementation are sensitive to the advice and interests of communities, people and interests which might be affected.

We have to work together, all of us, and through dialogue we can eventually give our aboriginal people the tools necessary to become self–sufficient. For too long they were deprived of their integrity and pride. Their children must be strengthened and the people of the new generation must be able to find a place in society that makes them proud of themselves.

I am pleased to have contributed factual information to the debate today. Consultations are essential to ensuring that negotiations can be successfully completed. I hope the opposition will soon join this consultation exercise. We could all come out as winners.

I conclude with a comment I made in the House on October 19:

> This country can simply not afford to lose another generation of aboriginal people able and willing to make a contribution to this country. The young aboriginal people of today can be our professionals, our trades people, our inventors of tomorrow. They represent our past and our future. If we lose them it will be an incredible waste.

I ask hon. members to vote down this unfair motion brought forward by the third party.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise today to speak in favour of Reform's motion on the subject of B.C. land claims.

• (1710)

I have been listening to the preprinted, standard run of the mill, say the right thing style of speeches emanating from members opposite. Frankly, anyone in touch with the feelings of B.C. can see straight through the facade of the Liberal political correctness going on.

The hon. members for Vancouver Centre and Vancouver East spouted exactly the line we would expect from old line politicians completely out of touch with reality. I have no doubt whatsoever that the speeches of any other Liberal B.C. members are equally as irrelevant. They must have some sort of big sausage machine upstairs. They turn the handle and crank out all this meaningless stuff.

Last Tuesday in Vancouver radio talk show host Rafe Mair read out the names of the six Liberal MPs from B.C. three times. He emphasized the voters of B.C. have to remember the six names. He said: "Remember exactly how out of touch these people are with the voters of B.C.".

Even the hon. member for Richmond, who had a meeting in his riding last Saturday, supposedly to get the feelings of his constituents on the issues, told his voters he would vote against their wishes and that he put their interests after the Liberal Party of Canada. He insulted his own constituents. This is typical of the attitude we hear on issues such as land claims and unity. If it does not fit into the Liberal Party agenda, Liberal members are not interested in hearing what the people have to say.

We can see the same pattern of debate in the motion before us today. Instead of coming to the House with meaningful speeches about the concerns of British Columbians, government members have read from canned speeches prepared by their political masters who live and work thousands of kilometres away from the problems of the native land claims of B.C.

Some government members whose ridings are also thousands of kilometres away from B.C. have claimed or implied that Reform members are meanspirited or that we have some inappropriate motive for bringing this motion before the House. That is balderdash.

Here is some important news for government members. The Reform member for Beaver River taught and lived on an Indian reservation before she became an MP. The leader of the Reform Party worked for Indian bands as a consultant for a number of years before he was elected. The Reform member for Yorkton—Melville has taught on an Indian reservation. The Indian affairs critic for the Reform Party is married to a status Indian.

Mr. Speaker, anytime you hear someone say we are not in touch with the problems, the injustices or the difficulties with Indian land claims, please tell them they are wrong. We probably have more experience and knowledge about the problems than the entire Liberal caucus, certainly a lot more than the minister.

There are large Indian reservations in my riding. I have lived there since 1979. I have had plenty of opportunity to listen to and understand the concerns of both natives and non–natives in my riding.

A government member earlier today quoted from Mr. Hume, an editorialist with the Vancouver Sun. He quoted Mr. Hume as if he were some sort of expert on B.C. opinion. He fell right into a trap. The people of B.C. watching today will laugh. Mr. Hume does not represent the ideas of the people of B.C. Mr. Hume has a special interest of his own and his rantings have no relevance whatsoever to the opinions of B.C. voters. He regularly criticizes Reform, but if his rantings had any relevance we would not have 32 Reform MPs from B.C. He is completely out of touch, just like the government members.

It would be much more productive if government members would abandon their politically correct position, their canned speeches and their closed minds and listened to what we have to say as the true representatives of B.C.

It is not just us; both opposition parties in B.C. have made it clear the whole land claims deal is going off the track as B.C. approaches the next provincial election.

Government members should stop for a moment to say to themselves: "Maybe these B.C. MPs are trying to tell us something important. Maybe I should stop and listen. Maybe I should trust the majority from B.C. telling me there is something wrong here". Maybe they would just say that they should support what we are trying to do here, which is to prevent a terrible disaster from happening if things are rushed through on the eve of a provincial election.

What a treat it would be if government members would abandon their party lines just for one day and help us with a major problem in our province. It is a problem which they cannot understand because they do not have the unique set of circumstances in their province that we are experiencing in B.C.

Allow me to repeat the text of the motion before us today so that members can hear again our deep concern for the problems we have to face. We want the federal government to hold off making any treaties in haste on the eve of the provincial election because there is so much uncertainty surrounding the B.C. government. Everybody has heard of the bingo scandal. The government that is there right now might make some very unwise decisions. Our motion really does not call for too much. It just says:

> That the House urge the government to not enter into any binding trilateral aboriginal treaty or land claim agreements in B.C. in the last year of the current provincial government mandate in order to respect the views of British Columbians on this issue as expressed by both major provincial opposition parties.

That is not too much to ask. I urge hon. members to please support us this one time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.15 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81.

The question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to order made on Wednesday, December 6, 1995, the recorded division stands deferred until Monday, December 11, 1995 at 6.30 p.m.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wonder if I might ask for some direction from members as to whether the Chair should see the clock as being 5.30 p.m. and pursue private members' hour, or suspend the sitting until 5.30 p.m.

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, it is my private member's Bill C–337 which is due to come forward at 5.30 p.m., but I see the other speakers who were scheduled to be here for 5.30 p.m. have not yet entered the House. Therefore, I would ask the Chair to please suspend the sitting until 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 5.20 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.) moved that Bill C–337, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (warning on alcoholic beverage containers) be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, beverage alcohol is the only consumer product in Canada known to cause harm if misused that does not alert the consumer to this fact.

What are the consequences in Canada due to the misuse of alcohol? Based on the most recent data available from Health Canada, the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse and from the Addiction Research Foundation, the facts are as follows: 38,261 psychiatric and general hospital admissions; 17,080 cases of alcohol dependence syndrome; 966 cases of toxic poisoning; 19,163 deaths directly or indirectly caused by alcohol misuse; 10 per cent of all neoplasms or tumours; 5 per cent of all diseases of the circulatory system; 15 per cent of all diseases of the respiratory system; 5 per cent of all fetal defects; 45 per cent of all motor vehicle accidents; 48 per cent of all drivers killed in accidents are killed as a result of alcohol consumption, which means that 2,000 have been killed and over 10,000 injured in only one year; 40 per cent of all accidental falls; 30 per cent of accidents due to fire; 30 per cent of all suicides; 60 per cent of all homicides; 50 per cent of incidents of family violence and one in six divorces are all caused by alcohol consumption.

It is indeed tragic that one in ten deaths in Canada, or the deaths of about 19,000 Canadians are from alcohol related causes each year. All of this is due to the irresponsible use of alcoholic beverages. It is costing Canada an estimated $15 billion each year in higher health, social, justice and lost productivity costs, not to mention the devastating impact on family, friends and society as a whole.

I know the effect that this can have on a family. My own father abused alcohol most of his adult life, but we are not afraid of him anymore. Years ago following one of his violent rages, he lost touch with reality and is living out the rest of his life in a home. I have not seen my father for more than 10 years because he no longer would recognize who I was. Today he has a new family: three bottles of vodka, one for each meal.

Bill C–337 seeks to require that containers of all alcoholic beverages sold in Canada display the following message: Consumption of alcoholic beverages impairs a person's ability to operate machinery or an automobile and may cause health problems or cause birth defects during pregnancy.

There are many reasons that we should have health warning labels on alcoholic beverages. The costs and other impacts of the irresponsible use of alcohol are far too great to ignore. At a time when all governments are seeking to reduce the costs of health, social, justice and lost productivity, we need to pursue, and I stress preventive, rather than remedial strategies. We need to let the consumers know that health experts recognize the hazards of alcohol use. We need to inform consumers about the risks of alcohol use.

Failure to label alcohol when medical drugs, foods, cleaners, solvents and other dangerous products all carry health warnings falsely assures consumers that alcoholic beverages are safe at all times. All levels of governments and the alcoholic beverage industry itself have a social, moral and societal responsibility to reduce the misuse of alcohol. Labelling is a reaffirmation in the ability of consumers to make responsible decisions. Labelling will also promote consumer consistency and indeed will lead to changes in drinking behaviour.

• (1735)

Labels in themselves are an integral part of any comprehensive strategy to promote the responsible use of alcoholic beverages. Any prevention program would be incomplete without these health warnings. In the words of Denny Boyd, columnist for the Vancouver Sun: "The intended purpose of warning labels on alcoholic containers is to act as a consumer lighthouse sending a signal of impending danger".

Labels represent an efficient way to continually remind consumers of the need to drink responsibly. As one element of our overall preventive strategy, it could be implemented quickly and efficiently with the potential of reaching all consumers and with a repeated effect.

I will take a moment to talk about fetal alcohol syndrome. All Canadians are well familiar with the problems associated with drinking and driving and that is due to the relentless education of consumers. But there is another problem virtually unknown yet far more tragic. It is called fetal alcohol syndrome, otherwise known as FAS.

In 1992 there was a study called "Fetal Alcohol Syndrome, A Preventable Tragedy" produced by the House of Commons standing committee on health and welfare. The report states:

> There is no question that maternal alcohol consumption can have devastating impacts on the fetus. The basic fact is that when a pregnant woman drinks, her unborn child drinks also; that is, the alcohol in the mother's bloodstream circulates through the placenta into the bloodstream of the fetus. It is possible the blood alcohol level in the fetus will remain at an elevated level for a longer period than that of the mother because the immature fetal liver metabolizes the alcohol more slowly.

Research shows that 5 per cent of all fetal defects are due to alcohol consumption during pregnancy. According to Health Canada, FAS occurs in about one in 500 live births. Therefore, it is in fact more prevalent than Down's Syndrome which occurs in about one in 600 live births. FAS children can reflect the following: severe neurological disorders, social dysfunction, permanent behavioural problems, reduced lifespan, restricted brain development, learning disorders, hyperactivity, mental retardation, pre and post natal growth retardation, speech and vision impairment and physical deformities.

In addition to retarded growth, FAS children usually display facial distortions, including a small head, small close–set eyes, flattened cheekbones, a very thin upper lip and no groove between the upper lip and nose.

FAS is estimated to cost $1.5 million during the lifetime of an FAS child. FAS is estimated to cost Canadians $2.7 billion each year in terms of increased health, special education and social services costs.

There is another aspect to this. Fetal alcohol effects or FAE is very similar to FAS, with the same range of problems in a less severe form, but without the characteristic facial abnormalities. FAE occurs two to three times more frequently than does FAS.

With regard to the alcohol industry, there is little dispute in the medical profession that alcohol consumption during pregnancy can have harmful effects to the fetus. The message they are trying to get out is that there is no recommended safe level of alcohol consumption during pregnancy and that drinking during pregnancy can cause alcohol related birth defects, including FAS and FAE. Both these diseases are totally preventable. I want to repeat that, both FAS and FAE are totally preventable. In the words of the alcohol beverage industry itself, drinking responsibly could mean not drinking at all.

As part of my research, I took the opportunity to speak with representatives of the Association of Canadian Distillers, the Brewers Association of Canada and the Canadian Wine Institute. I found that their position was very close.

They all support and promote responsible use of their products, to their credit. Industry representatives also note that alcohol has been shown to have health benefits in certain circumstances. I was given examples of programs they already fund and which they felt had better value in terms of the effectiveness of warning labels. They express concern however that warning labels may alarm pregnant women who may have consumed some alcohol and that the resulting fear or stress would result in consequential and negative health problems or even miscarriage.

They all held the same view that they did not think that warning labels would work and that there was no evidence that could prove that they would work.

Finally, they all specifically stated that they would not voluntarily comply with any recommendation to have warning labels on the containers of alcoholic beverages. Indeed they said it would have to be legislated.

The industry's position is clear. It fundamentally rests on the argument that health warning labels will not work. I believe this argument is fundamentally flawed primarily because the proof of effectiveness is indeed in the precedents of Canada, the U.S. and the entire world. Warning or caution labels directly on the packaging of products have been used for years for virtually every potentially harmful product except alcoholic beverages. Research and long term monitoring have proven the effectiveness time and time again. That is why this element of every preventive strategy continues to be used today. Why? Simply because it works.

This is the common sense and practical reasoning. It appears that the industry insists on empirical evidence which it says does not exist. In fact the evidence does exist.

In 1988 the U.S. government passed legislation requiring health warning labels to be placed on the containers of alcoholic beverages. Implemented in 1989, a series of studies have been conducted to detect the impacts on knowledge, attitude and behavioural changes. Although early studies showed little effects, as the years went by literally dozens of research studies have started to show progressively improving results. Here are some examples:

In December 1993 the Journal of Public Policy and Marketing in a report on public attitudes toward alcohol control since the warning labels were mandated in 1988 said: "It is concluded that the label is serving the goal set out for it, to inform the public of the hazards associated with alcohol consumption".

In 1993–94 the International Quarterly of Community Health Education in a report on the awareness and knowledge of alcohol beverage warning labels among homeless persons stated: "Age and level of alcohol consumption were each associated with label awareness and content familiarity suggesting that alcohol beverage warning labels may be reaching homeless persons".

The final example comes from the March 1994 International Conference on the Reduction of Drug Related Harm. In the research paper "Mandated Container Warnings as an Alcohol Related Harm Reduction Policy" it finds: "Within the U.S. results indicate an association between seeing the label and displaying behaviours relevant to limited drunk driving. Limited drinking before driving, 68 per cent, was associated with seeing the label in the last 12 months; limited driving after drinking was even more significantly associated".

The evidence is mounting and very powerful. That is why the U.S. started to use warning labels in 1989. That is why indeed in Canada, the Yukon and Northwest Territories started to use warning labels in 1991. That is why 77.5 per cent of Canadians surveyed by the Addiction Research Foundation in 1994 said they would support health warning labels on alcohol beverage containers. Why? Because Canadians know that warning labels work.

This initiative of having health warning labels on the containers of alcoholic beverages is not a recent subject in Canada. It was first raised in 1976 by the then minister of health, the Hon. Marc Lalonde. In 1992, as I mentioned earlier the House of Commons standing committee on health and welfare recommended warning labels to the government.

How do current legislators feel? On May 23, 1995 the B.C. Minister of Health wrote the following to the federal Minister of Health: "I am writing to you in regards to alcohol warning labels. This was a topic of our discussion at the provincial, territorial ministers of health meeting held in Vancouver April 10 and 11, 1995. There was unanimous agreement that warning labels should be pursued by the federal government".

I repeat, the provincial ministers of health unanimously agreed that warning labels should be pursued by the federal government. In addition, the federal Minister of Health has clearly stated her strong support for health warning labels for the containers of alcoholic beverages.

The alcoholic beverage industry feels the consumer has the burden of proof that health warning labels work. I believe the burden of proof that they do not work must fall on the industry. If it cannot provide that burden of proof, then today I call on the industry to discharge its social, moral and business responsibility and voluntarily comply with this labelling recommendation.

Bill C–337 is the first piece of legislation on warning labels that has ever reached this point in our legislative system. The bill no longer belongs to me. It now belongs to all the members of Parliament.

We cannot afford to miss the opportunity to do the right thing. I humbly ask for members' support to pass Bill C–337 today at second reading so that we may more rigorously pursue the facts through public hearings before the Standing Committee on Health. In this way, members of Parliament who are not in the cabinet can once again demonstrate to Canadians that we can and do make a positive contribution to the well–being of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak in this House to Bill C–337, which amends the Food and Drugs Act. This bill, tabled by my colleague for Mississauga South, is aimed at warning pregnant women and the public at large about the health risks involved in the consumption of alcohol. It also serves to draw attention to the fact that alcohol consumption reduces a person's ability to operate machinery or an automobile.

We agree with the principle behind this bill. It is now recognized, even by the manufacturers of alcoholic beverages, that alcohol abuse can lead to a variety of health problems, impair an individual's faculties and limit their ability to perform certain tasks requiring concentration.

In recent years, society has recognized the danger of impaired driving. This awareness has caused lawmakers to strengthen legislation covering driving while impaired and to provide harsher penalties for offenders. Governments have run public awareness campaigns with the participation of the manufacturers and distributers of alcoholic beverages.

People are also increasingly aware of the risks inherent in the operation of machinery or equipment following the consumption of alcohol. Excessive alcohol consumption over long periods may also cause health problems.

According to the Addiction Research Foundation, alcohol is involved in 19,000 deaths a year through heart and liver disease, certain forms of cancer, suicide and traffic or other types of accidents.

Excessive alcohol consumption also plays a part in vandalism, acts of violence and family problems. The use of alcohol consumption as an extenuating circumstance in the courts recently led to Parliament's legislating against self–inflicted intoxication as an excuse for illegal behaviour.

This said, we cannot generalize and say that alcohol is responsible for all of society's ills.

Most of the members of this House doubtless take a drink in moderation from time to time and enjoy it. It is not the consumption of alcohol that is dangerous or harmful, it is the abuse of it.

• (1750)

According to recent studies, limited consumption of alcohol may even be beneficial to certain individuals, particularly those who may be candidates for coronary or circulatory problems. I am not trying to say that alcohol consumption is totally beneficial, but I would like to point out that the alcohol problems we often hear about are primarily the result of abuse and overconsumption.

The sole exception applies to pregnant women. Recent studies on fetal alcohol syndrome have shown that even moderate consumption of alcohol may involve risk to the foetus, by altering the breathing of the foetus and reducing the flow of blood to its brain.

Negative effects observed after birth include lower birth weight and delays in the child's physical and mental development.

We have just listed many reasons for warning the public against the various problems that may be caused by or related to alcohol consumption. What form should the warning take? Will the bill before us be a solution or a step in the right direction? Should other ways be developed as well to warn people about the effects of alcohol abuse?

Currently there are a number of advertising campaigns aimed at increasing public awareness. In Quebec, for instance, the campaign against drinking and driving has been successful to some extent in reducing the number of automobile accidents related to alcohol consumption. The Société des alcools du Québec launched a campaign under the now well known slogan "La modération a bien meilleur goût", a phrase that has become very popular. During the holiday season, some companies include in their advertising a warning to their customers to drink with moderation.

In addition to the examples I just mentioned, many other ways to increase public awareness have been suggested by various intervenors in the business of selling alcohol. For instance, some licensed establishments now stock non–alcoholic beverages and list these on the menu. Some municipalities may consider posting warnings, in establishments that serve alcohol, against the potentially harmful effects on the foetus of consumption of alcohol during pregnancy.

Recently, there has been a trend towards more emphasis on providing information through health professionals. For instance, urging physicians who treat pregnant women to stress the harmful effects of alcohol during pregnancy. Social workers are also being asked to increase the public's awareness of the potential effects of drinking alcoholic beverages.

Briefly, we must be aware of the important role of prevention, education and other forms of social intervention in making the public aware of problems that may be related to alcohol consumption.

We should also consider the practical aspect. First of all, we would have to estimate the additional cost to producers and distributors and see whether it would adversely affect smaller producers, especially the micro–breweries and brewers of local beers which are a recent development.

It would also be necessary to find out if this measure would make the industry less competitive or violate international free trade agreements signed by Canada.

Of course the money aspect should not cause us to forget our main concern which remains the health of Canadians. However, before implementing a labelling directive like the one provided in the bill, we must be certain this kind of measure would be effective.

Of course, as is often the case, where public health is concerned, it is difficult to argue against the merits of virtue, and that is why we welcome the bill proposed by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

[English]

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in speaking today on Bill C–337, I would like to start by telling a story about Johnny. Johnny was a little fellow who was adopted into a family. This family had enough resources to take on Johnny's responsibilities. They welcomed him with love and care into their home. He had come from a family that had some problems, a broken family.

• (1755)

As Johnny grew he was different from the natural children in this family. His growth was somewhat stunted. He was smaller than the other kids. They thought perhaps it was heredity. When he was old enough to start learning things he seemed to fall behind the other children in the home. He was a very active boy. He had a very strange habit in that he could climb the door frame right to top of the door. He got himself into most peculiar spots in the home. He would climb up on top of the cupboards.

As he got a little older Johnny was hard to control in the sense that he would run away from home and the family would have the police out looking for him. He could be gone for three or four hours and be impossible to find. One day he left home, crawled into a camper down the laneway and found some matches. He built a little bonfire in the camper and lit the camper on fire. This was a neighbour's camper, a most unpopular item.

Johnny loved wildlife. When he was outdoors he was extremely interested in the frogs, the turtles and the insects. He was really happy when he was outdoors.

I am going through his life now. As he got older and became a young teenager it was quite obvious Johnny did not have the mental capabilities of a normal teen. He was stuck somewhere back in preschool in terms of his educational capabilities. He became somewhat aggressive and difficult to handle. He ended up having to become a ward of the government, a ward of the province in which he lived. He had to leave the home that had provided him with love and attention. He had to be looked after by other individuals.

Johnny is now old enough to recognize that he will never hold a productive job. He will always be a responsibility of the government, a responsibility of the province, a responsibility of the individuals who care for him.

It turns out that Johnny's natural mom drank heavily. Johnny was a victim of fetal alcohol syndrome. His mom had so many problems that her life was not complete without alcohol so she drank heavily. Johnny has an incurable problem. His life is completely affected by that early childhood, the time when he was in the womb.

Fetal alcohol syndrome is totally preventable. Early development with alcohol presents birth defects, retardation, hyperactivity, all the things we saw in Johnny. It is totally preventable. All we need to do is make certain that young moms and even older moms when they are pregnant do not drink heavily.

I would like to compare fetal alcohol syndrome to German measles, rubella. How do we treat German measles? We inoculate all women who will become pregnant or could become pregnant. We warn pregnant moms during the first trimester of their pregnancy not to come in contact with German measles. We do rubella tests on them to make certain they have immunity to rubella. We educate and in the instance of rubella we do not have to legislate.

Is legislation necessary in this instance? Bill C–337 calls for putting a warning label on all alcoholic beverages, a warning label that says that consumption of alcoholic beverages can impair a person's ability to operate machinery or an automobile and may cause health problems or birth defects during pregnancies. When should we legislate personal behaviour? When should we legislate what an individual may do in society? We should legislate when there is a third party who has no choice. In this case, with fetal alcohol syndrome, there is a third party with no choice. The infant in the womb has no choice. Legislation in this instance has merit.

• (1800)

I compare this issue to smoking in a public place. In an enclosed place where others are affected by the smoke of a smoker there is a place for legislation.

Reformers generally want to have as small a government and the least intrusive legislation possible. However, in the case of fetal alcohol syndrome legislation may be warranted.

Is this label the way to go? If I were thinking how best to warn women most likely to be affected by fetal alcohol syndrome I would not put a worded label on the bottle, I would put the profile of a pregnant woman on the bottle with a big red X across it. I would direct my efforts toward those women most likely to drink heavily, some of whom are illiterate. In many cases native women are affected by this problem. Some of them would not understand a worded label.

How would I implement such a change? I would first say to the alcoholic beverage companies that legislation would not be necessary if they would comply voluntarily. There is a strong public sentiment for good corporate relationships. I challenge those companies to listen carefully to this debate. Legislation would not be necessary with the proper labelling for fetal alcohol syndrome on bottles. They have shown some willingness to comply by their anti–drinking and driving campaigns. It would be profoundly reasonable to comply on this campaign.

This bill is some evidence that Parliament can co–operate. Reform members are quite keen to see health measures of a preventive nature promoted in Canada. Consequently we will support this bill to the committee stage at this level quite strongly. We are supporting it on my behalf because of my wish for little Johnny to be happy.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to have the opportunity to speak to this problem. I am also pleased that all three parties of the House agree on this issue.

For the last 15 years it has been an issue with which I have been involved as a physician, as an advocate for my patients and as a member of the British Columbia Medical Association lobbying to change public policy.

Canadians from all walks of life in every region have been concerned over the years about alcohol consumption and especially about the abuse of alcohol, not only its effects on society but its effects on the health of individuals. Canadians have always looked to governments to reduce the risks associated with this drug.

These concerns have taken various forms at different times. In the 1980s the major concern was drinking and driving. Governments have acted at the provincial level and at the federal level to take into consideration this issue. The companies that make and market alcohol have been fairly responsible with respect to drinking and driving. Together we have managed to see in this decade that the issue of drinking and driving has begun to take root in the minds of the public and in the minds of the young people who are the most affected.

More recently the major alcohol related concern has shifted to fetal alcohol syndrome and fetal alcohol effect. A parliamentary committee reviewed this topic in great detail and came down with a large number of recommendations, not the least of which was labelling. This was a stakeholder conference. There were three conferences in a row. At the conference were makers and marketers of alcohol who basically had a sense of responsibility toward the issue, although they did not seem interested in going as far as the labelling issue.

FAS is fetal alcohol syndrome, a medical diagnosis that refers to a set of alcohol related disabilities associated with the use of alcohol during pregnancy. It is used to describe a set of physical, mental and behavioural changes in young children who have been born with this syndrome.

Exposure of the fetus to alcohol has a great deal of effect specifically on the fetal brain and brain tissue. It is because of this that we see fetal alcohol syndrome. Different levels of drinking can produce fetal alcohol syndrome. Lower levels of drinking can produce fetal alcohol effect, which is not as full blown a syndrome in that there are not usually physical disabilities associated with it, but the behavioural components are clear.

There are some surveys and information now that are leading us to believe that a lot of people who exhibit anti–social behaviour, who have behavioural problems in school and who fill many of the jails in this country have fetal alcohol effect. We can curb this problem and stop it. It is preventable. One or three in every one thousand children in industrialized countries has fetal alcohol syndrome or fetal alcohol effect. This is a terrible issue that we must deal with.

This is not the only thing I want to talk about because I do not want people to believe that here we are again hitting on any particular social enjoyment we all have. Alcohol is not, unlike tobacco, a dangerous drug if taken according to instructions. We now know there is a level of hazardous drinking that results in the acute effects we see in terms of drinking and driving or using machinery or acts of violence when one is acutely drunk. There is also a certain level of hazardous drinking if done over a period of time. It can lead to hypertension, cirrhosis of the liver and some alcohol induced psychosis in the long term.

We are talking about a drug that has an effect on humans and on the health status of humans. It is time we did something about it, specifically because alcohol is such a socially acceptable drug and specifically because it is a substance we can use appropriately and enjoy in a way that is not dangerous, except of course with the one exception, when one is pregnant. A pregnant woman should not have any alcohol whatsoever.

What we are talking about is a substance we could make safe. How do we make anything safe? When we buy antihistamines across the counter there is a warning not to drink alcohol while taking them; do not operate machinery. On a bottle of Draino there is a warning not to ingest it internally. We know certain things are hazardous when used inappropriately.

Alcohol lends itself specifically to labelling because it is a way we can send a clear message that tells everyone they can use this substance in a safe way or in an unsafe way, and these are the unsafe ways. Warnings on products lead to their safe use. That is what we are talking about.

Health Canada spends a great deal of money on programs for native people and the Inuit people especially, community based programs, to support parents and children who have FAS and FAE.

We also have lots of programs that deal, as any healthy public policy should, with education and awareness because public awareness is the key. We cannot say someone is doing something wrong when they do not have any knowledge it is wrong. Therefore public awareness is the key and this is where labelling comes in.

Labelling clearly says do and do not. It gives a clear, defined parameter within which to work in a safe way to use a substance as in the case of alcohol. While we see that there are a lot of remedial services and support programs, and while we are at the moment increasing awareness and doing education programs in the schools and in communities, working at all levels, federal governments, provincial governments and community based groups are all working hard to stop the abuse of alcohol and the inappropriate use of alcohol.

We have not used one tool sitting in our little box of tools. Many people have said this will be expensive. I do not understand why this will be any more expensive because the alcohol industry, in order to export alcohol to the United States, must put a label that warns of the dangers of alcohol because labelling is mandatory in the United States. Yet we have on one side of a room a whole lot of bottles sitting there with no labels. People are busy sticking labels on them just to send them across the border.

Are the children in the United States any less important than our children? I say no. This is not a major burden we will be putting on the alcohol industry. It is an industry that has shown to be very supportive and very accountable in terms of how it deals with alcohol.

I am pleased the member brought this to the fore because it is an opportunity for us to talk about this issue. Doubters say look at what happened with the tobacco industry. The Supreme Court ruled we should not ban advertising and sponsorship because we have not proven it will make a difference to youth. Whenever members talk to manufacturers and to advertising agencies they always say package labelling confers a great deal of information about the product, and that manufacturers use labels to send us many messages about the image of their product.

If one wants to buy detergent it has to be the kind of detergent that speaks of grandma using it; a nice clean wash with sea breezes blowing through it, one that smells good with lemon and lime and all these things. We always use images to sell our product. Soup labels convey the down home quality. It is always something hearty and the sort of thing we were used to in the old days.

We talk about cigarette manufacturers. They have brought this to a fine art. They are the most expert at turning a product. They talk about youth and vigour. They show how many friends one can make if one smokes. They show how socially acceptable one will be, how great at sport, how wonderful a lifestyle one will gain from smoking.

What is crucial here is the recognition that in many areas no distinction can be drawn between the product as conceived by the maker and the packaging. The product and the packaging are almost the same. That is why manufacturers are often so very resistant to labelling or to putting anything on their product that says the product is not as good as it should be.

I hope everyone here will support the bill. We support it very strongly at Health Canada. We believe if we are ever to prevent the preventable diseases that create a great deal of tragedy in our lives, this is one sure step. We are already half way there. We do it for the United States. Let us do it for Canada.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bill, to which the concurrence of this House is desired: Bill S–12, an act to amalgamate the Alberta corporation known as the Missionary Church with the Canada corporation known as the Evangelical Missionary Church, Canada, West District.

Pursuant to Standing Order 135, the bill is deemed to have been read the first time and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the House.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–337, and act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (warning on alcoholic beverages), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1815)

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I note that members seem to be ready for the adjournment debate. Perhaps we could call it 6.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on October 6, 1995 I asked the Minister of National Defence a question pertaining to the week of revelations at the Department of National Defence. During the week of revelations it had been discovered that senior officials at NDHQ altered documents. The punishment: the department was instructed to investigate itself.

Further evidence revealed that Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward destroyed evidence and obstructed justice. His punishment: he was promoted.

Yet more evidence showed that Colonel Labbé uttered unlawful commands. His punishment: he was put in charge of the army staff college to teach leadership.

In our parliamentary democracy we have what is called ministerial responsibility. It is the minister's responsibility to know what is going on in his department and to take responsibility for the actions of his subordinates.

I pointed this out to the minister. I said that he must have had these events on file. I asked him why he waited so long to act.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence stood on behalf of the minister. He said that he was disappointed that I would dare to ask a question pertaining to ministerial responsibility. Then he told the House something that all Canadians have known for a long time, that the government was so terribly open it was opaque.

According to The Concise Oxford Dictionary, seventh edition, opaque means not transmitting light, not transparent, obscure, obtuse and dull witted. I admire the parliamentary secretary's honesty. This is one instance where a member of the government was not obscure. I hope the Liberal whip was easy on him. He has been unforgiving with other Liberal members of Parliament who speak their minds.

Being pleased with the parliamentary secretary's openness, I asked him if the actions revealed that week were considered examples of good leadership. Sadly the parliamentary secretary went back to normal Liberal tactics. His answer was obscure. He said he did not like the tenor of my question and that he personally had called for the Somalia inquiry while in opposition.

This was all fine and good but he failed to answer the question that Canadians demanded to be answered. I then informed the parliamentary secretary that it was the Reform Party that called for an open inquiry. The parliamentary secretary would have been satisfied with a cloudy internal investigation. He did not protest the minister's attempts to make the inquiry opaque.

Canadians are extremely dissatisfied with the mismanagement of the Minister of National Defence. Whether it is the evidence of cover–ups or the procurement of the minister's gold plated pens, Canadians are demanding change. Since our parliamentary system is based on ministerial responsibility, I asked the minister to resign.

At this point the right hon. Prime Minister intervened. He talked about his personal support for our soldiers. This was not just opaque; it was pure balderdash.

The Prime Minister has been in the House for 30 years. Where was he during unification? Where was he in 1969 when the budget reduced the army from 45,000 to 25,000 and the militia from 24,000 to 13,500? Where was he during the civilianization of the armed forces? Where was he when the regimental system was under assault?

He was a senior official in the Trudeau government on the military dismantlement team.

• (1820)

Regarding Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward and Colonel Labbé, the minister had these reports on file with respect to these events. I ask the parliamentary secretary again why the minister waited so long before he acted. Does the minister consider the actions of these senior officials to be examples of good leadership?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very misguided in his attempts to discredit the minister and the government.

Certainly members on this side of the House know that the platform of the third party has been to use specious and irrelevant petty arguments and half truths for partisan gains which really have nothing to do with the Canadian forces and the issue at hand.

Let us look at the facts. It was a Liberal government that called for an inquiry. It was this government that ensured the inquiry would be public and open. At least the hon. member gave me credit for asking for it two and a half years ago.

It was this government that encouraged people to come forward with the information and to go forward to the inquiry. It was this government that ensured that the Somalia inquiry was provided with complete and accurate information and that relevant documents were made available to the commission.

Not all these actions have been easy. We could have been goaded into precipitous action. I will give one example. Where others may have been attempted to score political points, we stayed the course and waited for the Westray Mine decision so that justice would be done and done properly, without the possibility of it being undone later because of a technicality.

That is one example. These actions point toward good leadership, integrity and willingness to get things done. Now is the time for the commission to do its work and we look forward to its recommendations.

The Canadian forces have a long and proud heritage which we are not prepared to throw away, despite the antics from the other side of the House in the third party. I suggest the third party share the sentiment of all members on this side of the House, especially at a time when we have just embarked on a new program, the first in the history of peacekeeping. I hope they will continue to lend their support for Canadian forces abroad.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, a week ago, on November 30, I rose in the House to question the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food on a recommendation he had received from a senior executive officers committee that he had struck several months ago. It was looking at some of the ideas concerning ownership of hopper cars, the future role of the wheat board in allocating cars in the grain handling system in western Canada and other similar matters.

I tried to make the point with the minister that the recommendation coming from that group was that farmers would be asked to pay an extra $1 per tonne to raise money to purchase between 12,000 and 13,000 hopper cars the federal government now owns. They have an assessed value of $400 million, but the proposal is that the railways each take half the cars for a sum of $100 million which they can raise by imposing an extra fee of a dollar per tonne on the farm sector for everything farmers ship. In the end, after having collected the extra money from farmers, the railways would own the cars.

This seems to be the ultimate bad deal for farmers. If they are paying for the cars, why do they not end up owning them? This is something farmers are arguing. They think the senior executive officers have presented a proposal that is self–serving in the ultimate. We must remember that at least two of the people on the senior executive committee represent the two major railroads.

The basic justice of the proposal is something I was arguing. The minister in his response said he had not made up his mind yet, but I should remember the senior executive officers recommended that there be a ceiling placed on freight increases, other than the $1 per tonne, for 10 years.

I have listened to responses from farmers in western Canada to this remark. They are very quick to remember that it was a Liberal government approximately 97 years ago that promised the Crow rate in perpetuity, and that means forever in anybody's language. It lasted for 96 or 97 years.

• (1825)

The question the farmers have is a very good one. They are saying if perpetuity lasts 96 and 97 years, how long will 10 years last? The answer in coffee row is until the next budget.

They will not buy that and I do not see why they should. It is incumbent on me as a member from out west to remind the minister that his credibility and the government's credibility on promises for grain rates and promises into future activities of the government or any future government is zero after what they have done to the Crow rate and other things considered to be part of the constitution, almost, for Canadian farmers. That is not acceptable.

What is acceptable is to put those 13,000 cars under the control of the wheat board, even if farmers have to pay for them. At least it would let them know they own them afterward and that their agency, the board, can control them.

The board does an excellent job of distributing rolling stock. As I have pointed out, the ownership of rolling stock was thrust on them because of the railways' refusal in the 1970s when the current minister was assistant to Otto Lang. The railways simply refused to buy or rent rolling stock. Farmers and provincial and federal governments were forced to buy rolling stock to keep Canadian grain rolling.

As I have said, the board has done an excellent job of using the rolling stock. It has extremely high turnaround times, meaning that a car is loaded, delivers its load and is returned to the country elevator system faster than any other grain cars in the system. I will give an example using comparable grains. Durum wheat makes 17 turnarounds in a year using wheat board cars, compared to oats which are operated by the open market and only make 12 turnarounds. This gives an idea of how much more efficiency there is under the board controlling those cars and of the savings that result both to farmers and to railroads from that activity.

I recommend the government take very seriously turning these cars over to farmers. Yes, we will pay for them if we have to, but they should be left in the control of the wheat board.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a working group of senior executive officers and farmer representatives in the western grains industry has arrived at a basic consensus about what should be done with respect to government owned hopper cars, car allocation procedures and the role of the Canadian Wheat Board in transportation.

The report will be discussed at various farm organization meetings over the winter. Until farmers have had an opportunity to understand and comment on the recommendations, it would be premature to make a full or final decision with respect to the government's response to the report.

The consensus achieved by this group is certainly remarkable in itself. Only a few years ago many people would have thought it would be impossible for such a consensus to be reached by such a divergent group. It is a package involving a balance of tough but creative compromises and it has to be looked at as a whole, as a package.

The government will respond to this report in early 1996 and is proud of its record of consultation with stakeholders. This is the way we operate and this issue will be treated the same as all the others.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my NDP colleagues and I have been concerned for some time that the Liberal government would not do the right thing in responding to the fine work of the Standing Committee on Environment on the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Since the release of the committee's report last June there have been numerous media reports about how the government would respond. There have also been fears expressed that the Minister of the Environment, who is said to be a supporter of the recommendations of the committee, is being pushed out of the decision making picture by the interests of the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Natural Resources who are said to oppose the same recommendations. In fact, some officials within the industry department said openly that the committee's proposals are a threat to the country's investment climate, costly to implement and grounded on shaky science.

At the same time the Minister of Natural Resources, speaking in the House of Commons on the government's CEPA response in relation to concerns raised by the mining industry said: "At this point I am willing to go on record that, working together, we will ensure a regulatory regime that supports the mining industry".

When we take those comments into account and add to the mix the fact that the government has blatantly ignored the committee's request, indeed Parliament's direction, that a response be provided within 150 days, it is easy to see why concerns about the government's ultimate intentions remain in the minds of all those who care about the future of the environmental regulatory process.

Members of Parliament will remember that on November 21 I criticized the government for failing to table its response. The only answer I received was that the response would be coming within two weeks. It is 10 days later and we are still waiting.

It is possible that the Minister of the Environment is having difficulty getting a favourable response through cabinet. This is the government's most important environmental decision to date.

Few would argue that the 365 page committee report entitled "It's About Our Health" with its 141 recommendations dealing with virtually every aspect of the federal government's role in the protection of Canada's environment is not significant.

May I remind members and the public that is listening that the committee made recommendations for amendments in the areas of toxic substances assessment and pollution prevention, the assessment and regulation of biotechnology products, ocean dumping and coastal zone management, the role of First Nations in environmental protection, the ecosystem approach to environmental protection, environmental management within the federal government, public participation in federal environmental decision making and federal environmental law enforcement.

In a recent article in the Globe and Mail Paul Muldoon of the Canadian Environmental Law Association and Mark Winfield of the Canadian Institute for Environmental Law and Policy said:

> The federal government's response will be a bell-wether indicator as to whether it will take its responsibilities regarding toxic substances and other aspects of environmental protection seriously.
> Based on the weight of evidence known to date, the standing committee recommended that strong action is needed regarding the most toxic substances.
> The departments opposing CEPA reform demand absolute proof of harm prior to any substantive action.
> They are willing to roll the dice with the health of Canadians. The Liberal government must now decide whether it is prepared to do the same.

On October 24, concerned about the comments of the industry officials mentioned earlier, I asked the Minister of Industry if he was going to take the advice of those officials or would he welcome the opportunity to turn Canada into an international leader in green legislation as detailed in the impressive recommendations of the environment committee.

I ask that question again tonight, in the hopes that the government is prepared to confirm its support and indicate to us when its response to the CEPA report can be expected.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for his close interest in the CEPA review. He worked on the committee during the CEPA review. He has shown a continuing interest in it throughout the committee's deliberations and after the report was issued. It is very commendable that he has brought up this issue so that Canadians will be aware of the status of the government's response.

I am sorry the response is late. The minister is in Vienna at the ozone layer convention, which occasioned a further delay. However, the response will be ready extremely soon.

I can assure my colleague that the response will reflect, very honourably, on the recommendations and the thrust of the report of the standing committee and all the principles which have been put forward by the committee. The main program of the committee, as suggested in the report, will be reflected in the response.

• (1835)

I can assure the member that the Minister of Industry, whose law promotes sustainable development, is very much on side in co–operating with the Minister of the Environment to ensure that the report reflects what is the preoccupation of Canadians toward sustainable development and the integration of the economy and the environment, including pollution prevention.

VIETNAM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 4, 1995 I rose in the House to request the Minister of Foreign Affairs to use his good offices for the Government of Vietnam on behalf of nine religious, academic and cultural leaders under imprisonment in Vietnam and waiting retrial.

I had this matter brought to my attention by members of our Vietnamese Canadian community in Vancouver and also in Ottawa and elsewhere. I had followed up with meetings with the Vietnamese ambassador in Ottawa, with communications with our Canadian ambassador in Hanoi and with written representations through our government and others.

I was happy to be able to inform the House in a statement made on November 22, 1995 that the Vietnamese government had acted to release two of the religious and cultural leaders and that they had already left Vietnam and were now in North America.

Canadian foreign policy in its golden era in the immediate post–war period developed and applied the skills of quiet diplomacy, involving patient but firm negotiations and never resorted to gunboat diplomacy 19th century style, which would have been beyond our military logistical capacities anyway.

In the contemporary post–cold war era, when trade and commerce have replaced political military power as the basis of the world public order system, I would ask the minister how he can best continue to promote the development of democratic constitutionalism and the advancement of basic constitutional rights in our new neighbour countries of the Pacific rim.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know the Vietnamese Canadian community across Canada is very appreciative that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra raised this issue not only in the House of Commons but in other fora.

As the Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific stated during question period, Canada's position and our relationship with Vietnam is one of supporting engagement rather than isolation. This is in concert with the rest of the international community. Having a dialogue on human rights remains an important part of our relationship.

When the Minister of Foreign Affairs was in Hanoi in the middle of November, he raised human rights issues with his Vietnamese counterpart, Minister Nguyen Manh Cam. The secretary of state also raised his concerns about human rights in Vietnam during his visit to that country. Furthermore, he had a lengthy discussion about human rights with the Vietnam deputy prime minister during the latter's visit to Canada last year. We also maintain an ongoing dialogue through our embassy in Hanoi and with the Vietnamese embassy in Canada.

Our policy is to speak honestly and forthrightly in appropriate multilateral fora such as the United Nations' third committee, which deals with questions of human rights.

In his speech on Friday, December 1, Ambassador Bob Fowler mentioned Canadian concerns related to religious and political prisoners. In our judgment, maintaining a position of quiet diplomacy bilaterally while continuing to speak honestly in multilateral fora is more effective than a confrontational approach.

We are pleased to see that two prisoners have already been released. I am certain that the hon. member's interventions at the ambassadorial and other levels went a long way toward this release.

We hope our current policy and the hon. member's skills of quiet diplomacy will continue to have positive results.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to address a reply to my question from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. It is about how the government plans on tendering moving contracts in the future.

Currently, only the four major Canadian van lines can bid on moving projects with DND. The others are given a chance to match the lowest bid. The successful bidder receives a volume bonus. Work is then farmed out to companies across the country.

• (1840)

The government proposed to change this system, so that any company from any country would be allowed to bid and the lowest bidder would get all the work. That meant that DND would move toward a one bidder take all system that would create a monopoly in the moving business. It would destroy an industry of over 800 companies across this nation and put thousands of people out of work.

Now the government, thankfully, has changed its mind and is proposing another plan, where a moving company with the lowest bid will receive 40 per cent of the government's business. The next three lowest bidders will receive proportionately less as long as they match the lowest price.

The government currently works with something called GLAC, the government list of approved carriers. If you are not on that list, you are not eligible for government moving contracts. Under the new proposal, that list would be scrapped.

The hundreds of independently owned and family owned moving companies that make up the moving industry provide quality service. They are on that GLAC list. They own the warehouses and the moving vans. They have invested millions of their own dollars in infrastructure.

Last week, Randy Hoyt, president of the Hoyt's Group of Companies from Atlantic Canada, told the public accounts committee that the volume of government business available to each of the GLAC carriers has varied according to their track record. For poor quality, movers are removed from the list or suspended.

This system is serving Canadian taxpayers well and is good for government employees and independent movers. Because they were assured a share of the volume, movers have invested in facilities and trained staff at locations in Canada where service would otherwise not be available. Atlantic Canada is a case in point. There are many towns where these companies have operations and so the public gets competitive quotes when they move.

The government's new proposal will destroy this system and the benefits that go with it. It will also result in thousands of job losses.

Ontario businessman Pat Baird told the public accounts committee that he wants to bid under the proposed new system. Mr. Baird has no trucks, no warehouses, no infrastructure. He has two to three employees and has no financial investment. He made misleading statements to the committee. He told the committee that if he wins the bid, he wants to use rail lines to move government employees. He forgot that we do not have rail lines in many parts of Atlantic Canada. He said that he has a joint venture with CN Rail and CN will be building 300 to 400 new 53–foot containers made up as moving vans. He also said that CN's investment was going to be $26 million.

I have spoken to CN and according to CN it has a verbal agreement with Mr. Baird. If the bid is successful it is prepared to modify, not build new, some old 48–foot containers, not build new 53–foot ones, as Mr. Baird said, at a cost of $4,000 to $5,000 each. According to CN, its commitment will only be $1.3 million maximum, not $26 million as Mr. Baird has stated.

These inaccuracies in Mr. Baird's testimony should serve as a warning. The proposed new tender process should be put on hold. I appeal to the parliamentary secretary and the minister to review this matter. All I ask is to put it on hold and look at it because of these discrepancies and inaccuracies.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the interdepartmental committee on household goods removal services, which I will call the IDC for short, recently conducted a review of the household goods removal service process. It had three goals when it did this.

The first was to reduce the cost and increase the efficiency of an admittedly overregulated arrangement with the industry. The second was to encourage the entry of new competitors into the process. Third was to secure greater savings through the application of economies of scale and consolidation of service.

The committee reviewed the feasibility of using a single supplier, as the hon. member said, for its moving business. The committee's evaluation of the concept after meetings with parliamentarians and others in the business concluded that there was a potential for saving, but insufficient grounds exist at this time to introduce a major change in the process. The information was too soft and the risks were too high.

The committee met with current contractors and other interested parties to seek industry feedback and to include their views in order to ensure that the process was open and transparent.

A new approach to acquiring these services has been developed which represents strong potential for savings, addresses the concerns of the Bureau of Competition and moderates the implementation risks involved.

The basic elements of the changes are: a one year competitive tender fully accessible by any interested party; the lowest bidder will receive 40 per cent of total government business, while the remaining compliant bidders, maximum of three more, would receive 25 per cent, 20 per cent and 15 per cent respectively; the lowest bidder's rate would be used; contractors would not have the right to refuse government moves; contractors rather than the government would determine the infrastructure requirements; and exclusivity rules would be rescinded whereby any carrier could align itself with another carrier, van line for government moves. These changes will take effect in April 1996.

Finally, I want to assure the hon. member and this House that this government is committed to fairness in awarding government contracts while at the same time ensuring that the best possible value for the Canadian taxpayer exists. I assure her that her concerns will be taken into consideration.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEM

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ) moved:

That this House denounce the government for its massive cuts to the unemployment insurance system that limit access to the program and hit young people, women, seasonal workers and immigrants hard.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of pride and with the greatest determination that I table this motion this morning. The official opposition is outraged by the fact that women, seasonal workers, newcomers, any person who is not already on the labour market and all those who are forced to look for work on what is called the new job market are dealt a direct blow by this UI reform, which was so long in coming and which the government did not see fit to make public before the Quebec referendum. In short, it hits anyone who does not have a secure job that pays reasonably well. We know that such jobs are becoming increasingly rare.

That makes a lot of people. One thing is sure, within just a few years, hundreds of thousands of Canadians and Quebecers will be affected. For the hon. members' information, I should mention that, each year, one third of the workforce in Quebec relies on one form or another of UI assistance. Now this inequitable reform hits directly anyone who is not already a player in the system, any new player who might need the kind of collective support provided by a real UI program, as opposed to a bogus program.

From now on, the first time someone apply for UI benefits, he or she will be required to have worked 26 weeks, 35 hours a week, over the previous 52 weeks to be eligible. Anyone who knows anything about the labour market knows how hard it is to meet these requirements. Anyone who has a child, brother, sister, mother or friend who is a newcomer knows how terribly difficult it is to meet these requirements in the world we live in.

Seventy per cent of all part time jobs are held by women. And 40 per cent of them are held by young men and women. In the future, 910 hours of work will be required to qualify, or 26 thirty–five hour weeks, instead of 20 fifteen hour weeks. Let us look at what 910 hours of work mean.

Someone who works part time 15 hours a week can quite simply not meet the requirement over the year. It would take this person 60 weeks, but there are only 52 in a year. On the other hand, if someone works part time 17.5 hours a week, by the end of the year, he or she could qualify. These figures show the scope of the change. This is a major change.

In fact, as I said earlier, many women, young people and newcomers will be excluded. The government boasts that an additional 500,000 people will be covered by the UI system. This is a reference to all the workers who, until now, did not pay premiums and consequently were not eligible to UI benefits, because they did not work more than 15 hours per week.

The truth is that, given the prerequisite, this measure, which, in other times, might have been an improvement, will in fact force these people to pay premiums, without actually being eligible to UI benefits.

From now on, there will be two groups: those in the system and those out of it. This will create yet another obstacle for those who are excluded and who will often have to fall back on social assistance. Eligibility for UI benefits, when one is in the system, will also be based on a number of weeks of employment, which will vary from region to region. The minimum required will be 12 weeks in regions with a high rate of unemployment. In Montreal, it is currently 14 weeks. So, under the new system, a Montrealer will have to work 14 thirty–five hour weeks, instead of 14 fifteen hour weeks.

• (1010)

What does this mean in the case of all the new short term positions and part time jobs? It means that it will take these workers longer to qualify. It also means reduced benefits, since it will take longer to qualify, but the entitlement period will ultimately be shorter.

Once again, this is somewhat like a sure ticket, not to British Columbia, but to the welfare rolls. It must be understood, by the way, that the fact that this reform was carried out without any consideration whatsoever of the social assistance or other programs already in place has resulted in a system that is not better adjusted and co–ordinated than before, but in some ways worse than before.

For those who do not have jobs as stable as the hon. members here—relatively stable at least, for five years—we need to realize that life is not easy. Finding a real job is extremely difficult. This is the case whether a person has an education or not. I know numerous teachers with two master's degrees and a Ph. D. who are still muddling along as best they can, and have had to be on unemployment insurance temporarily in the past. Now they will no longer be eligible.

The same is true for all those who are term employees. New jobs, even in the technology field, jobs with the Internet, in the graphics field and so on, are contracts for X weeks, often not very many. The person may make good money, but after that it dries up and another job is hard to find. That is how the job market is structured.

These measures before us, however, instead of being tailored to the new job market, do nothing more than to take unemployment insurance back to the days when a person had a good job and a good boss, but expected a cycle of layoffs from time to time. Then unemployment insurance was around to fill the gap.

This reform reintroduces, in another disguise, the two tier unemployment insurance scheme that had all of Canada up in arms during consultations on the so–called social program reform. Everyone, including the committee set up by the minister specifically for this, was against it.

Now, with the penalty for "frequent users" as they are termed, a penalty which creates two types of unemployment "pay", depending on whether a person is one of the lucky ones with stable jobs—they have put effort into it too, but luck also enters into it—or one of the unlucky ones who have not managed to have stable employment, there will be two levels of benefits. Two levels, when all is said and done: 50 and 55 per cent. That means that there is constant pressure in favour of decreasing the general level of benefits, each year heading us closer to the U.S. level of 50 per cent of the industrial wage.

This is a regressive reform, that is to say instead of removing the limit on contributions so that people with high salaries, or those who do overtime, may help provide a bridge for those workers who are less fortunate—there was some suggestion of raising that ceiling in the other so–called reform of 1994—instead of going ahead with this, the government is backing away. This is even contrary to what the minister has said, in claiming it was a progressive step. The government is bringing the limit for contributions down to $39,000 per annum. Above that no more is paid into unemployment insurance.

This has a serious economic effect. Let me tell hon. members right off that it is anti–employment. How so? This measure will hit workers and businesses in the so–called labour intensive sector. There will be a reduction in unemployment insurance premiums but also in the solidarity that unemployment insurance provides, since labour intensive businesses which pay high wages will still have an incentive to make their employees work overtime instead of hiring additional workers.

That is not the only regressive aspect of this measure. There is more. Listen to this. The only tax reduction allowed by the government benefits businesses and employees earning a salary of more than $39,000. Until now, they had to pay unemployment insurance premiums but from now on that will no longer be the case. They stand to benefit from a tax reduction that will cost how much? $900 million. It will cost the unemployment insurance account $900 million. So who is going to make up the shortfall? Workers paying premiums for the first time. I did not say first time UI recipients but first time contributors. From now on, UI premiums will be paid on every hour worked.

I explained earlier that this did not mean automatic eligibility. Far from it. But it does mean they will have to pay, those 500,000 or so who are going to pay starting with the very first hour worked. Students who could be exempted previously will have to pay regardless and will not get their money back until they file their income tax return. People who earn less than $2,000 will get the money back when they file their return. Yes, it is easier to administrate but it does not make things easier for Joe Blow.

So a tax reduction for people earning more than $39,000, and for the others a tax increase that will kick in from the very first dollar earned. This is a very regressive measure.

And there is more. I did not mention annualization. What does that mean? It means that, from now on, a young person who has a two–month design contract worth $10,000 will pay premiums on the full amount, but if he gets nothing else in that year, he is not eligible for unemployment insurance, although he paid the full premium on $10,000. Great. You know how much this will put into the UI account? One billion dollars. That is what senior officials came out and told us at our briefing session.

So we can hardly call this reform employment insurance. Despite the announced employment benefits, it is the kind of insurance that will ensure that an increasing number of people will have no other recourse than to go on welfare.

Mr. Nunez: It is poverty insurance.

Mrs. Lalonde: We could call it poverty insurance, and in the case of first time workers, that may well be the case.

• (1020)

Furthermore, in addition to the term employment benefits being a misnomer, they will merely replace a number of active measures that were given rather short thrift. They still exist, but with a difference. Instead of being paid out of the general tax account, benefits will now be paid out of the unemployment insurance account.

So the additional money that will be taken out of the pockets of the unemployed and businesses and workers earning less than $39,000 will be used to pay these new employment benefits but, instead of coming out of the general account, they will come out of the unemployment insurance account.

The official opposition will do everything in its power to stop this reform.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are going through difficult economic times. And that is why people with some economic imagination ought to know where the cuts should be made. They should not be made at the expense of the average citizen who is having enough trouble surviving as it is. There are many people having trouble keeping their heads above water. Unemployment insurance is supposed to be a life preserver. However, instead of helping people to survive—I am not saying the present system is perfect—the proposed reform is based on the wrong economic premise: it is anti-employment. It will generate insecurity and poverty.

As for those described as abusing the system, one thing must be said—and this is something we learned from the economists long ago—no system can be set up without this happening, unless considerable thought is given to the way it will be used. Those who do not abuse the system will, as we say, get it in the neck.

It is not surprising this measure was not revealed before the Quebec referendum. I would add, however, that workers in the Maritimes are also hit hard. I will say one thing, and I will repeat and repeat it: the approach of this government is to cut the number of workers in the labour market where jobs are not stable. It has nothing to do with the workers and everything to do with the labour market.

Instead of looking for the economic means to transform the labour market, the government is penalizing people, particularly those people who live in the Maritimes and Quebec. Quebec is being further penalized because it has a bigger population. The announced cuts of $640 million are added on to the $735 million in cuts to be made this year and next.

Even taking into account the supposed existing active measures, which will, under this program, this so-called reform, now come out of the unemployment insurance account, even here there are cuts of $400 million in addition to the $735 million. This means more than a billion dollars in cuts for Quebec, not to mention the billions also cut in the Atlantic provinces.

When the labour market fails to provide a job for everyone, people are not punished. What suffers is the economy and the development we are trying to work on.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will stop now, but I promise that, though I stop now, I will continue to talk about this reform and do everything I can to block it. It makes no sense for a country like Quebec and for a country like Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1025)

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the hon. member conclude her remarks by saying she had a lot more to say. That was certainly my hope because I did not hear very much that was worth noting.

I have a problem understanding how a member of Parliament who was a very active member of the human resources development committee in which witnesses continually stated to us that they wanted a change to the status quo, could comment to the House of Commons that she still believes in the status quo. She still believes in the system which Canadians from coast to coast, particularly those who are unemployed, have told us is not working. It is simply unbelievable that at this stage of the debate the hon. member would not come up with any proposals that would speak to the modernization and restructuring of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It is also quite fascinating how the member and her party have spent the past two years advocating separatism. They have advocated the notion that Quebec on its own could actually be a more functional society but for some reason or other they have not mentioned that this type of political instability has resulted in job losses in this country. They do not talk about that because they are too busy trying to pretend they are the defenders of the less fortunate in our society.

The hon. member also does not talk about the 100,000 jobs that will be created as a result of the employment insurance changes the Minister of Human Resources Development tabled last Friday. She does not talk about that because it is good news. She cannot relate to positive change in people's lives.

There are also some things she omits, such as the family income supplement where people with dependents will be able to earn up to 80 per cent of average earnings. She does not talk about that because it speaks to helping people. It speaks to giving greater income security for people while at the same time providing them with the tools required to find work.

She also does not talk about the progressive measures that anyone can access. The five tools of the human resources investment fund were outlined by the minister. Those who have had an attachment to unemployment insurance in the past three years, UI exhaustees who were marginalized and were excluded by the unemployment insurance program, will now be part of that.

The hon. member does not want to hear the truth. She does not want to hear that we have worked very hard to build a better system. Bloc members do not want to hear the good news because their agenda is that they do not want success in this country. They want to break up the country. That is the reason.

Canadians need to face the facts. They need to face the truth about who is sitting in front of us: separatists who are not willing to accept that the employment insurance bill means positive change to people's lives; it means people will be given the opportunities to acquire the skills to re–enter the workforce. Bloc members do not want to hear that.

In reference to sustaining the unemployment insurance program, a program that has grown from $8 billion to $18 billion in less than a decade, any rational human being will say that we simply cannot sustain the type of skyrocketing costs this program has put on the taxpayers, the employers and employees of this country. Those are the facts of life.

It is a real shame that the Bloc Quebecois separatists cannot come to grips with reality as we get ready for the 21st century. They do not talk about the premium relief that is being given to employers and employees. They do not want to talk about that because it is good news. They do not want this bill. They do not want the new employment insurance bill to work. That would mean that Canada works. They have no interest in telling Canadians we are improving their quality of life. It is a real shame they cannot intellectually cope with the type of positive changes that are being implemented.

• (1030)

My question is fundamental. Is the hon. member really serious when she says that the employment insurance bill is completely flawed? Why did she omit reference to the progressive measures which exist in the bill? Why did she do that? Is this part and parcel of the separatist plot?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I would first say that, had the government tabled its bill on unemployment insurance before the referendum, you might not have had the displeasure of having to tell us we are bothering you.

You did not dare, because all the improvements you are talking about are largely, and I underscore the word, eyewash. Sure, there are measures, and I mentioned them, but I did not mention the case of insurance, which is supposed to be unemployment insurance, which is taking on airs of family policy and is out of touch with need.

Furthermore, I—

Mr. Bevilacqua: What is your point?

Mrs. Lalonde: Had you read our minority report, you would have seen that we had a point and you would have understood that, if the government had removed the ceiling for benefits, it could have cut contributions further for all business, including small and medium business, which creates jobs.

Instead, the government chose to go with high salary employees and business, big business and high tech and capital business. So it could have helped create jobs, instead of having the imagination and the courage to create conditions to cut contributions without reducing the account.

So, instead, it opted for a position that leaves contributions high, reducing them five cents per $100. Really, for small and medium business this means nothing and for big business and high salary employees it means they no longer contribute to the common good.

I conclude by saying that the surplus in the unemployment insurance account is a hidden tax for those earning less than $39,000. They will have to pay a tax, which we might call a "special deficit reduction tax on workers earning under $39,000". It would be the truth. This is where the truth lies, in our opinion.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that it has taken the hon. member for North York two years to figure out that there are separatists sitting in the House. I congratulate him.

Since the change in government in Quebec has unemployment gone up that drastically? From her speech I take it that it is running rampant in Quebec under the separatist government.

I have listened to members opposite saying what a good job the government has done in addressing the unemployment problem. All the investigations I have done indicate that the greatest employment has been created through patronage appointments.

There are two different seats of power in the country. I have not seen much of a difference in the unemployment rates. Young people in Canada are still searching for jobs. That has not been addressed. They say this tinkering will help. Since I have been here in Parliament I have noticed that when the government tinkers with programs, usually the situation gets worse.

• (1035)

My question to you is: What is the unemployment rate now in Quebec and what was it before the separatist government took over?

The Deputy Speaker: I ask all hon. members to please address their remarks through the Chair rather than to each other directly.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the hon. member that the unemployment rate has dropped since the separatist government came to office. I also want to tell the hon. member that the history of poverty in Quebec is one of the main factors that, in the 1960s, made not–so–young people like myself worry about the fate of Quebec in Canada.

I know that it would take much more time than I have to respond to this, but if the hon. member is interested, I would be delighted to show him that, as you saw during the referendum campaign, there is in Quebec an important consensus among the disadvantaged, the workers, the social forces that are progressive but largely in favour of sovereignty, because many people—it went up to 49.4 per cent, as you saw—feel that the only way they can improve their lot is by taking control of their own destiny.

We know that the economic situation in Quebec has major advantages but also disadvantages that we want to deal with. We want to emphasize our assets. We want to work on eliminating our problems and we feel frustrated by government policies that do not meet our expectations in any way.

[English]

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In recognition of the way the Minister of Human Resources Development has been treating B.C. over the changes to the welfare rules, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House, on behalf of the North Vancouver Riding Association, for me to present to the minister at this time its annual 1995 horse's ass award—

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think that is a point of order. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the antics of a clown are allowed sometimes in the House.

In reading the motion brought by the member for Mercier and listening to her remarks, I am reminded of the old line of Winston Churchill's that "a fanatic is one who can't change his mind and won't change the subject".

What we have seen today is the ultimate act of fanaticism. It showed a total lack of touch with reality, a total distortion of the facts and a total unwillingness to agree to an exchange of reasonable dialogue or exchange of views. It is a closed mind, a reactionary mind and in many cases a misinformed mind.

That is unfortunate when one begins to talk about one of the most important and significant changes addressed in this House. The hon. member for Mercier seems incapable of dealing with legislation on its merits, on its measures, on its proposals but instead relies on the old rhetoric, the old speeches, the old lines without being in touch with reality whatsoever.

• (1040)

An interesting judgment has to be made when listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Mercier. It is a line of thought that we have heard all too often in the remarks of Bloc Quebecois members over the last two years. They have become the party of exclusion. They keep people out. They have become the party which says it cannot bring people in or widen the boundaries but in fact wants to restrict.

[Translation]

The Bloc Quebecois talks about exclusion. In fact, this bill is inclusive and fairer. While 93 per cent of the workforce was covered under the old UI system, 97 per cent will be included in the new system. Because of the inclusion of the new formula many people will automatically be covered by the new employment insurance system.

[English]

That is what is at the heart of this debate. To what extent do we provide good, effective coverage, real support for employment and a fair balancing of the need to create jobs and at the same time protect income?

Let me deal first with the most important result of this reform, which is the part time worker. We listened very carefully during the public consultations and recognized that the labour force has changed dramatically. More and more people now work on a part time basis. They deserve the same protection as everyone else. They deserve the same maternity benefits, sickness benefits, income support, help in getting back to a job and the same security that provides.

Under this program we are providing the formula that would allow half a million part time workers to gain eligibility and the Bloc is opposing it. They have taken a stand today against the rights and responsibilities of part time workers to have the full rights of every other Canadian. That is the basic position of the Bloc Quebecois. Keep half a million people out is the message from the member for Mercier. Half a million people will be denied benefits. Half a million people will not be given the right to gain eligibility. It is incredible but understandable, considering the history of this party. It is an act of exclusion.

Let me give a very practical example. The one thing the hon. member for Mercier seems incapable of offering is actual working, practical examples of how the new regime would develop.

Today, under the existing regime, the basic rule is that if people work less than 15 hours a week they are excluded from the program. They have no opportunity to receive protection on income or maternity benefits. However, under the new regime, someone who works 14 hours a week over a normal work year period would amass a total of over 700 hours which would automatically bring that person into the scheme. It would automatically give that individual the right to maternity benefits, employment benefits and income security. The member for Mercier is opposed to those people being included. She is an exclusionist. She wants to keep people out.

Therefore, all those people who have faced what they call the glass barrier, who have had an artificial roof which stopped at 15 hours, under the prescription of this member, would be kept out. They would have no income security, no protection and no opportunity for re-employment. That is the reality and the truth of the hon. member. She is saying, time after time, "keep these people out, exclude them, keep the parameters and boundaries restricted". That is the true mind of the reactionary. That is the true mind of a person who cannot change. That is the true mind of the fanatic who is not prepared to give up her ideology for the sake of helping more people receive protection.

• (1045)

Let me give another working example, the people who now have several jobs over a period of time. Under the old regime they get credit for only the first job. They cannot make a multiple claim. Someone who works 10 weeks at 14 hours per week and then finds another job for 35 hours per week would not be included. They would not qualify. They would not get the same kind of protection.

Under our new proposal that person who has a series of multiple jobs, whether in construction or in the service industry or anywhere else, would be able to accumulate 700 hours because we are saying the key is every hour counts. As a result they would now be in the program.

Now we have an hon. member from the Bloc saying keep all those people out. Do not give them any protection. Do not give them any income security. This fixation and fanaticism we hear on the status quo, the end result is to be discriminatory.

The hon. member for Mercier is arguing for discrimination against a whole class of workers throughout Canada. As a result many people who are working part time, who do not have that opportunity, would not be given the rights to become eligible and to get the protection.

One thing the hon. member does not include is that under the new scheme if people do not get sufficient hours to qualify even though they have the right, they are entitled to a full rebate on their premiums. They do not pay it.

The hon. member is deliberately giving misinformation in the House because she refuses to recognize that all those people under that new coverage would have full rights to a full rebate of all premiums. It is a really serious charge. People in the Chamber have to ask about the veracity and credibility of a member of Parliament who makes a claim without being prepared to say what is the case.

That could only be a clear, deliberate, malicious, malevolent attempt at misinformation. Coming from that member, I am not surprised because she has been doing it for the last two years. That is the real example.

Over 1.3 million people with part time attachment would be subject to a full refund of all the premiums. That would include people now who pay into the system and get no refund. Over 900,000 Canadians who pay in and get no benefit would now be able to get a full refund of their premiums.

All the nonsense we hear from the opposition, Bloc and Reform, simply means they have not read the act. They do not know how it works and they are deliberately trying to misinform people.

There will be 32 per cent fewer people paying into the EI system than are paying now because of that refund program.

Let me talk for a moment about seasonal workers. Again the member is deliberately and maliciously trying to misinform Canadians because by going to an hour system, by allowing every single hour to count, means many seasonal workers can qualify earlier than they can now.

I was on a radio program yesterday and someone called from the construction industry. He said they work 50 or 60 hours a week. Right now under the old system all one does is get credit for a week. They get exactly the same credit as somebody who works 25 hours that week. The person does not get claim for all those hours.

Right now, if the person is working 60 hours a week, they could qualify under our program within eight, nine or 10 weeks to be eligible, and every single hour counts beyond that. Close to a quarter of a million seasonal workers will be able to extend their benefits several weeks longer as a result of the hour system than what they can do under the old system.

Once again the hon. member for Mercier is arguing for a program that would deny those workers the right to have their season extended, to get better benefits and to be given the full credit for the work they do simply because it is the ideology that gets in the way of good, sound reasoning and practical common sense.

• (1050)

That is clearly beyond the ken of the hon. member to understand. People should get full credit for the work they offer. They should be given the opportunity, the incentive, the reward and the credit when they work more hours to get full benefit as opposed to being denied that credit, as they are under the existing system.

Those quarter of a million seasonal workers who will be able to get extended benefits is another demonstration of how we are including people, not excluding people, as the hon. member has argued to keep people out and deny them their rightful due and their rightful reward.

May I also talk for a minute about the impact on families, women and children. It was interesting that the hon. member seems to have eliminated from her presentation one of the most important innovations of the program, the family benefit supplement. This ensures basic guarantee income protection for all those with families under UI. It is something that has never taken place before.

This will automatically include about 350,000 Canadian families, about 115,000 alone from Quebec. It means they will be able to achieve up to 80 per cent of their insurable earnings. It will mean that on average a single mother with two children who now is under the old UI system, under the new system will be able to receive on average 10 per cent higher benefits. Yet the hon. member condemns in a blanket statement the opportunity for us to provide better protection for low income Canadians under this program.

Furthermore, we have said in the new legislation this same worker could now work during her claim period on UI up to an additional $50 per week without having it in any way taxed back from the program. It means a person on claim can make another $50 and improve their income.

As I said, the real issue for people is income, how much money they can actually get for their families. By offering the incentive again and be able to work while on claim without have any deduction up to $50 can add another substantial portion of income to low income people.

The other exclusion put forward by the hon. member is that women who have taken maternity benefits under the old system to look after their children when they want to come back to work have no recourse. Under our new proposal they would be eligible for all the new employment benefits. They would be able to start their own business, have a training voucher, have a wage supplement, an income supplement, work on a job core program. It is a major assistance for women coming back into the workforce to get those employment benefits which up to now they have not had any access to.

Yet the Bloc Quebecois is prepared to say: "No, we do not agree with that. We do not want to help women coming back to the workforce. We do not want to give them a chance to get back into employment. We do not want to provide them with the kind of support they need".

That again is another act of exclusion by the hon. member for Mercier; deny women the right to get back in the workforce, deny women the right to have extra income protection for their families, deny women the chance to have an extra ability to make money while on claim. All those measures designed to improve the income base of women coming back into the program the hon. member for Mercier simply denies, excludes, rejects and demonstrates once again that ideology and fanaticism are her major problems, not the real point in this legislation. That is the real issue here.

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order or at least to ask you to come to my assistance. There is a limit to being called a fanatic by the hon. member opposite. This has been going on for years. I ask that he withdraw his statement.

• (1055)

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: I ask the hon. minister to withdraw the term "fanatic". I do not think it contributes to the decorum we want to have in the House.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was simply referring to a comment by the hon. Winston Churchill, which has been quoted in the British House of Commons on several occasions.

The Deputy Speaker: If the minister used the term "fanatic" I ask the minister to withdraw it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the term under your direction and I will ask to have the matter checked and we will see whether it is properly within Beauchesne's.

It does not change the argument. It is clear the hon. member feels full liberty in the House to castigate without obstruction. If she cannot take the heat she should not be in the kitchen.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker? That was a sexist remark.

Have him withdraw this remark, Mr. Speaker. Let me tell you I am not the only one indulging in heated arguments, here.

[English]

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Human Resources Development was in the midst of debate. The member opposite rose. She did not rise on a point of order. She should not have been allowed to interrupt the minister. If she was allowed to interrupt, she should have very clearly put her point of order immediately and the Chair should have ruled whether it was a point of order.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to allow the debate to continue without interruption.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed to see a female colleague stand up to support a minister who is telling women to go back to their kitchens.

If this minister thinks he is Churchill, as he suggested a moment ago, let me tell you that he is so ridiculous that he is turning this House into a real circus, or rather a chicken coop.

The Deputy Speaker: I did not understand exactly the last point the hon. member for Mercier raised. I will have to check the blues. If indeed the comment was out of order, it will be dealt with later in the House.

Mrs. Lalonde: I must raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Madam. I and every member of this House clearly heard the minister say something like: "If she cannot take the heat, she should not be in the kitchen".

Mr. Speaker, I formally request that he take this back. It is highly insulting and unacceptable. All women should feel insulted by this. And if it takes a point of order to get my hon. colleague, who is a woman herself, and our male colleagues to support me in asking that the minister withdraw his statement, so be it.

The Deputy Speaker: It is nearly time for oral questions. Does the minister have anything to add before we look into this matter?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to resume the debate. I remind the hon. member that if she were prepared to read history more often she would realize—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: As I said earlier, we will check the blues. If a comment was out of order, we will deal with it later. For the time being, let us hear statements by members.

[English]

Mr. Bergeron: He should apologize.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I am telling you the truth.

The Speaker: Welcome to the House of Commons. Dear colleagues, debate will resume after oral question period. It being 11 o'clock, the House will now proceed to statements by members.

EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to say that as part of the democratic process I will be conducting a public town hall meeting tomorrow with respect to the employment insurance proposals.

This is a very important process for me and every member of Parliament to undertake. We as elected representatives must listen to our electorate and the concerns about legislation that will affect their lives directly and indirectly.

I recognize there is some concern over the intensity of work rule. We as a government must show that we are willing to listen to new options and amend legislation accordingly.

Public meetings also give us the opportunity to gauge what we are doing right. For example, the introduction of insurance benefit clawbacks for high income earners has been initially accepted and supported by various groups.

I invite all my colleagues to hold hearings to get the input of their electorate. I look forward to reporting back to the House on the results of the public meeting on this important issue.

AMATEUR HOCKEY

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks, an unacceptable situation has arisen in Quebec's amateur hockey. The Canadian Hockey Association is pressuring the Quebec Ice Hockey Federation to join its insurance program. The association even tried to force Quebec teams to pay an unjustified surcharge to participate in interprovincial and international tournaments.

In spite of pleas made to the government, asking it to help find a solution to the problem, Quebec hockey groups had to go to the provincial superior court and get an injunction order prohibiting, until December 12, the Canadian Hockey Association from harassing Quebec teams. I ask the Minister of Canadian Heritage, who is responsible for amateur sport, to contact CHA officials, so that they come to their senses and stop harassing Quebec hockey officials.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canada is at a crossroads. We face a profound crisis in the unity of our nation.

I vigorously seek for all politicians to return to the people's agenda instead of the political agenda. The political agenda in Ottawa seeks central power; the people's agenda services closer to home; the political agenda, decisions made by cabinet insiders; the people, decisions made by free votes that express their will; political, big expensive regulatory bureaucracies; people, the minimum intrusion that is possible; political, government will look after our needs; people, leave the tools in our hands and we will do just fine.

The crossroads for Canada looms before us. I am optimistic and enthusiastic. The people always prevail.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to congratulate Tony Morris on being acclaimed president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

Tony has assumed a great responsibility. The OFA is the voice of Ontario farmers. Supported by over 41,000 individual members and 29 affiliated organizations, the OFA presents farm family concerns to governments and to the general public. The OFA has a long history of advocating the interest of the Ontario farm community. Though constituted in its present form since 1970, the OFA can trace its roots back to the Ontario Chamber of Agriculture established in the 1930s.

Agriculture is big business in Bruce—Grey and a major job creator and contributor to this great country of Canada. Given its importance, I look forward to working with Tony to secure the interests of Ontario farmers and rural communities in general.

Again I congratulate Tony Morris.

BANKS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the news is out. Canadian banks have rung up more than $5 billion in profits for the fiscal year 1995. Last year, when the same banks recorded $4.2 billion in profits, the Minister of Finance imposed a one–time temporary tax that was expected to return $100 million to the people of Canada.

Canadian farmers, small business owners, workers, students, pensioners and the unemployed have all been asked to pay more with less return during 1995. The banks can be asked to do no less. Five billion dollars in profits taken from ordinary Canadians during difficult economic times must be treated accordingly.

I call on the Minister of Finance to do as he did last year and impose an excess profits tax on the banks. The additional revenue gained in this way should be applied to job creation programs so that all Canadians, not just the banks, can share in whatever economic growth is taking place in Canada.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as all members are aware, this week the crime bill received royal assent. On average one woman is killed every six days in Canada, often with a firearm at home by someone she knows. The weapon of choice in most cases is a legally owned firearm and 80 per cent of the time the firearm is a rifle or a shotgun.

A study released this week estimated the economic cost of violence against women in Canada at $4.2 billion per year. The recent passage of new gun control legislation is an important step in dealing with the problem of violence against women.

Mrs. de Villiers, the president of CAVEAT, has requested that I thank the Minister of Justice and the government for passing the gun control legislation despite the often hysterical and ill informed opposition.

The new gun control legislation will help to reduce the scourge of violence against women. However it is only a first step. More needs to be done. The government has been providing valuable leadership but all parts of society must co–operate to eliminate violence.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on December 6 the House remembered the 14 women who were murdered with an automatic rifle at l'École polytechnique six years ago.

While Parliament has taken an important step by strictly controlling all firearms, the struggle against spousal violence is far from over. Last week four women were murdered in Montreal, one of them a young mother with the Montreal police. During the summer in one week three women were killed by men in Calgary.

According to Statistics Canada, nearly one out of four wives has been assaulted at some time in her life by her spouse. This must stop. What is needed is a wide range of measures directed at both the symptoms and the causes.

All governments should copy the excellent program announced by Quebec yesterday. Let us continue to apply the same political will that we used for gun control.

QUEBEC CULTURE

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval-Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister clearly told Quebecers that there is no such thing as a Quebec culture. Federalists, like sovereignists, now know that his motion to recognize Quebec's distinct nature is just a smoke screen.

Roch Demers, an avowed federalist, saw the contradiction in all this. Yesterday, he said: "If that reality, namely Quebec's culture, is not recognized, then Quebecers are right to contemplate separating from the rest of the country".

In spite of yesterday's attempt by the Prime Minister to correct his statement, Quebecers now know that there will be no true and substantial recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness.

All this reeks of bad faith, improvisation and expediency.

WORLD PIPE BAND CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every August in Glasgow, Scotland, the World Pipe Band Championships are held. This year Burnaby's Simon Fraser University finished first in the elite competition.

I ask all members of the House to join with me in congratulating each of the band members for outstanding achievement and first class representation of Canada.

The pipers are Pipe Major Terry Lee, Pipe Sergeant Jack Lee, Andrew Bonar, Dani Brin, Richard Brown, Alan Campbell, Colin Clansey, Dave Hicks, David Hilder, Shaunna Hilder, Anthony Kerr, Robert MacLeod, Tamara MacLeod, Robert MacNeil, Bruce McIntosh, Bonnie McKain, Lachlan McWilliams, Derek Milloy, Pat Napper and Bruce Woodley.

The drummers are Lead Drummer J. Reid Maxwell, Blair Brown, Keith Clark, Callum Hannah, Karen Hinchey, Kathy MacPherson, Scott MacNeil, John Nichol, Colin Nicol, Roland Reid, Christine Rickson and Dan Weeks.

These are true world champions.

The existence of such a paper demonstrates the importance of learning and the rich contribution made by foreign languages to Canada on both the economic and the cultural levels.

STUBBLE JUMPERS

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, November 1995 saw an enthusiastic group of actors take to the stage in Prince Albert. Produced by Saskatchewan's newest musical production company, Destiny Productions, delighted Prince Albert audiences enjoyed the world premier of "Stubble Jumpers", a Broadway quality production.

"Stubble Jumpers", a great story about Saskatchewan boys heading off to fight for Canada in the second world war, is destined to become one of Canada's greatest musicals.

The book, music and lyrics were written by Prince Albertan, Reverend Roy Benson. Another Prince Albertan, musician Rich Miller, assumed the role of arranging and musical director. The rest of the creative team consisted of artistic director Darryl Lindenbach, choreographer Gillian Horn and Carole Courtney as vocal coach.

At a time when Canadian unity is being questioned, let us pay tribute to the men and women who fought and sacrificed on behalf of a united Canada.

"Stubble Jumpers" is a great new musical. Broadway has come to Prince Albert and Prince Albert will end up on Broadway.

HIGHWAY 416

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this morning the funding arrangements for completing highway 416 were made public at a press conference in North Gower.

The remaining 60–kilometre link to highway 401 is due to be completed before the end of the century. This important link will contribute greatly to our regional economy, as well as make for a safer and more pleasant drive than on the existing road, as my colleague here will attest.

I am very happy to see that the federal and Ontario provincial governments have come to an agreement on this project and that the political wrangling that had surrounded it is now a thing of the past.

The construction of this final section of the highway will create approximately 2,200 jobs and will contribute to our economic growth.

Job creation and economic growth are some of the goals the government set for itself during the last election campaign. This proves that in co–operation with other governments we are living up to our promises.

PRIME MINISTER'S PROPOSALS

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this morning we learned from a SOM survey that Quebecers are not swallowing the constitutional crumbs the Prime Minister is throwing them. Whether it is his feeble definition of distinct society, his veto right, which is not one at all, or his promise to make federal interference in areas of provincial jurisdiction more discreet, to Quebecers, it is nothing but the typical federal smoke and mirrors.

Yes, two thirds of Quebecers are dissatisfied with the Prime Minister's proposals. The federal proposals are being rejected by Quebecers, regardless of their region. Quebecers are nobody's fools.

This survey was carried out before the government's announcement that the number of regions to which the Prime Minister wants to give a bogus constitutional veto would be raised from four to five. This latest improvisation confirms the people of Quebec's judgment of the Prime Minister's proposals.

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the 1993 election campaign the Prime Minister said: "I have the people and I have the plan". The unity debate and the Prime Minister's handling of it clearly show that he has no plan. Everything from constitutional vetoes to distinct society status has been a stumbling, fumbling exercise in futility.

The Prime Minister is telling Quebecers that his version of distinct society will make them unique and special, while at the same time he is telling the rest of Canada not to worry, that it does not really mean much. His performance reminds me of the movie "Batman Forever", with the Prime Minister playing the part of the infamous Two Face.

We must stop thinking of our country as two of this or two of that and start focusing on the truly distinct concept of equality for all Canadians.

• (1115)

After listening to the Prime Minister's plans to offer a constitutional veto to Quebec, then to four regions of Canada, and today to Quebec, three regions of Canada and British Columbia, he is beginning to sound more and more like The Riddler.

The Speaker: My colleagues, just in case it has not been brought to your attention before, many times when we are on camera the other microphones pick up what is being said around the member who is speaking. I thought I should remind you of that.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during Safe Driving Week and as the holiday season gets into full gear, I again feel obliged to remind my fellow citizens and my fellow members of the dangers that await us on the road.

We can never be too careful, and the slightest slip while at the wheel can lead to tragic consequences. The most sure way of protecting ourselves is by wearing our seatbelts. Hundreds of lives are saved in Canada every year by seatbelts, an encouraging figure, but not enough when some drivers are still not buckling up.

In speaking to you today about highway safety, I know of what I speak. About a year ago, I was involved in a head–on collision which could have cost me my life. I escaped the worst by being buckled up.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the statements under Standing Order 31 by Bloc members, who were complaining that it was not enough, and the Reform members who said it was too much, I would think that the Liberals were very much the happy medium.

Yesterday the Quebec Minister of Finance made a statement at a press conference to the effect that Quebec will be able to balance its budget thanks to increased payments from Ottawa, of all places. The equalization payment program and the Canada assistance plan have added $268 million to the federal transfer payments to Quebec this past year.

It is, however, deplorable that the minister took advantage of her press conference to seek to downplay the value of those programs by comparing them to poverty traps and taxes on development. If one had to apply the minister's logic to the insurance field, we would end up with an insurance plan that paid victims of accidents but to which people would stop contributing—

The Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but we must move on to oral questions.

QUEBEC CULTURE

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after watching the Prime Minister telling all and sundry that his resolution on Quebec's distinct identity would provide guidance for the government's actions and would produce tangible results, we saw the Prime Minister show his true colours on Wednesday, when, as if by magic, Quebec culture no longer existed.

Considering the spontaneity of his statement on Wednesday, Quebecers were not fooled by his about face the next day. They know exactly what the Prime Minister is thinking.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Considering that the government deliberately ignores the fact that Liberal members on the heritage committee are hunting down heretics who mention Quebec culture, does the Deputy Prime Minister realize that by doing nothing, the government has become an accomplice to this witch hunt?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that this week the Prime Minister explained very well the nature and importance of Quebec culture, especially for the survival of French culture in Canada. We are very much aware of that.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the arts community, including Roch Demers, a diehard federalist who campaigned for the no side, does not understand the Prime Minister, or should I say, understands him too well.

Earlier the Prime Minister explained that he did not intervene in the case of the heritage committee because he respected freedom of speech. That is what he said yesterday.

What explanation does the Deputy Prime Minister have for the fact that in this case, the government respects freedom of speech, but when the Liberal member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce publicly challenged the Prime Minister, he was gagged by being forced to step down as chairman of the justice committee? Is there a double standard?

• (1120)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I find rather surprising about the hon. member's attitude is that last week, the immigration critic attacked the Liberal government's immigration policy but remained silent about certain comments made by Mr. Bourbeau. So if he does not like certain comments, he should say so.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister surprises me. Perhaps she should realize that Mr. Bourbeau is not a member of the Bloc Quebecois and that the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, since we cannot refer to him by name, is a member of her party. It seems to me there is a difference, but perhaps it would be too much to ask the Deputy Prime Minister to make those distinctions.

Since a substantial majority of Quebecers feel that the offers made by this government are clearly inadequate, will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that Quebecers have seen through these so–called promises of change and will not be fooled by cosmetic changes like the resolution on distinct society, which in fact changes nothing because it does not say anything concrete or practical or even theoretical, when it comes down to it?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of criticizing the comments of others, I am still waiting for the members of the Bloc Quebecois to criticize what their own leader said about the role of women to bear white children in Quebec. That was never criticized by the Bloc members. When Liberal members make comments, at least we can say their leader did not decide to involve women in a policy to keep Canada white.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Canadian Heritage changed the legislation governing his department. It now denies the existence of Quebec culture. Section 4(1) describes the minister's powers and clearly talks of a single Canadian identity and culture.

My question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Given the government's claims that its resolution on Quebec's distinct nature will guide its actions, does the Minister of Canadian Heritage intend amending his department's legislation to include a reference to Quebec's culture?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will have an opportunity on Monday, at our next meeting, to speak to the existence of a Quebec identity and a Quebec cultural identity, before the House of Commons. At that point I will look to see whether my colleagues opposite rise in support of the uniqueness of Quebec culture. They may remain seated; I shall rise.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are now used to the minister's contorted answers, but I must say this last one was a real humdinger.

In refusing today to amend his legislation, is the minister not proving the emptiness of his government's motion on the distinct society and the fact that it is worth less than the paper it is written on?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, nothing could be clearer than a vote on a unique Quebec culture. I will see on Monday how my colleagues will vote in recognizing it. If they remain seated, it is because they do not recognize it. I will be voting in favour.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask about the unique culture of the Liberal government. Yesterday morning the government's veto bill, Bill C–110, gave two provincial premiers a veto over the Constitution. This morning it gives four provincial premiers a veto over the Constitution.

After limiting debate in the House on the first day of debate, after limiting committee hearings to two days and giving witnesses 24 hours notice, the government now informs us it wants to make a major change.

My question is for the intergovernmental affairs minister. Will the government admit that it should properly consult Parliament, affected parties, experts and Canadians and that the appropriate thing to do is to withdraw Bill C–110?

• (1125)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in fact the government was listening to the advice of the leader of the Reform Party, who only a few days ago in the House said that we should extend a veto to the fifth region and that the fifth region should be British Columbia.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the government calls that listening, it was not listening very carefully. We suggested that it is the people of Canada who should have a say; the provinces already have a say.

The government has just made a major change to a one clause bill. It has admitted that there are unclear legal issues surrounding the bill and it may be challenged in court.

If the government will not withdraw Bill C–110, will the government at least commit to the House that it will not bring in further time allocation, not further limit debate and give Canadians a chance to consider these issues?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to restate that when the leader of the third party gave advice to the House about the recognition of a fifth region for the purposes of a veto, a statement which he made on November 29, 1995, what the Prime Minister did was to respond to good advice from the leader of the third party.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is an incredible exercise in the power of listening. I will say once again that what the Reform Party and the leader of the Reform Party said was that the government should consult the people of all the regions of Canada, not the legislatures and the premiers.

The government has come up with a new definition of unity: We are going to unite Canadians by getting them all against something at the same time. The bill has been rejected by the Government of Quebec and in polls of the people. It has been rejected by the Government of British Columbia, even with the change, and by the Government of Alberta. It has created a firestorm across the west. Aboriginal representatives say they were not consulted. The Government of Saskatchewan said it was not consulted.

Who exactly is it that the government believes it is pleasing with this legislation?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I fear that the hon. member from Alberta is suffering some political amnesia. In the last seven days, in the course of this debate, the leader of the third party rose in the House to speak on this issue. I would like to read what he said into the record because I think the hon. member from Alberta is now—

Mr. Tobin: He is swallowing himself whole.

Ms. Copps: —swallowing himself whole, to quote another member of the government.

The quote reads: "The government has not given priority whatsoever to the concerns and aspirations of British Columbia, the third most populous province in the country. B.C. is not recognized by the government as a region in its own right. The government is prepared to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. When is the government prepared to recognize B.C. as an important province of Canada?"

That is why the Prime Minister, following good advice which he received from the leader of the third party and good advice which he received from members of the Liberal caucus and others, has amended the bill to make it a better bill.

COPYRIGHT

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

On December 22, 1994, the heritage minister and his industry colleague issued a joint press release stating that a bill to amend the copyright legislation would be tabled in the House as early as possible in the new year.

Could the heritage minister confirm that the copyright bill will indeed be tabled before the December 15 adjournment, that is to say within the next seven days?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague does not like to be kept in suspense. I indicated that the bill in question was on a critical path. It still is, and it is making headway. In due course, the bill will be tabled in the House.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister is the one on a critical path.

Does the minister not realize that, according to the Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, this regulatory vacuum resulted in losses of $300 million this year because of private copying and that his inaction is sending the message that the future of our artists is a matter of supreme indifference to him?

• (1130)

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps our colleague has closer ties to the arts community than I do, but I certainly get their message loud and clear. I do not need to go through him to consult with them. I hear them, I listen to them and we will act in their best interest.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Minister of National Revenue, our minister from British Columbia, on his new found influence with cabinet and the Prime Minister.

Will he now try to achieve distinct society status for British Columbians?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member has acknowledged the very important work of the minister from British Columbia, working behind the scenes as we promised in the House he would do.

I can understand the obvious embarrassment of the Reform Party because only about a week ago its leader was in the House seeking the right of veto for British Columbia, not for Alberta.

In a very positive way we have tried to respond to his concerns and in particular to the very sound recommendations given by the minister from British Columbia to the Prime Minister, who ultimately is seeking the approval of the amendment.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think the non–answer from the non–minister will probably reflect the non–votes for the Liberals in the next election in British Columbia.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Given the short shrift British Columbians have had over the years with the closure of Royal Roads, the closure of base Chilliwack, the KAON project, the welfare fiasco of recent times, et cetera, will the minister with his new found influence try to move the government away from knee–jerk reactions toward meaningful action?

The specific one is the west coast fishing strategy, fishing licences and fishing quotas. Will the minister move toward making them fair and non–discriminatory because he understands what is going on in British Columbia?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I hear the word knee–jerk coming from this member, the emphasis ought to be on the latter part of that description in referring to the member.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I ask the hon. minister to withdraw that.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, absolutely.

The Speaker: I accept that. Would the hon. minister like to answer the question?

Mr. Tobin: Absolutely, Mr Speaker, out of deference to you, the House and all the goods knees in the world.

• (1135)

Yesterday in Vancouver in beautiful British Columbia, while the member was here trying to figure out ways to make the federation fail, we were meeting with 80 representatives of the British Columbia fishing industry, trying to work toward ensuring the federation succeeds.

We believe that when people from coast to coast work together, speak together, listen to one another and build together, Canada is a better place. In working together, we will build the country. To the hon. member and his party, they cannot fulfil their political ambitions by trying to climb up on the broken pieces of Canada. It is time to stand up for the country instead of tearing it down.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

As a result of the measures proposed in the minister's bill, UI coverage for workers will be reduced even further. In 1990, 77 per cent of unemployed workers qualified for UI. This proportion has since dropped to less than 50 per cent, and the minister's reform will reduce it even further.

Does the minister not agree that, as the Canadian Labour Congress pointed out in its analysis of his reform, the new UI program will protect only one out of three unemployed workers?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, both the hon. member for Mercier and the CLC are dead wrong in their analysis.

The proposed changes to the program substantially expand coverage. We will be expanding coverage for half a million people who are presently part time workers. We will be extending coverage for seasonal workers by using an hours system so that they can establish eligibility earlier and have longer benefits. We will be extending the coverage of employment benefits for people who have presently exhausted their programs so that they can get back to work.

The net result is to give people a lot more opportunity to return to work, to get credit for the work they are doing and as a result achieve the most important objective, to give people real support in getting a job.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the reform did not include an additional major obstacle in that workers will be required to work a minimum of 910 hours in one year in order to qualify for UI, there could be a semblance of truth to what the minister is saying.

Does the minister not agree that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, I would ask you to please choose your words very judiciously.

Mr. Duceppe: That is very judicious.

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, does the minister not agree that the main reason why 500,000 part time workers were included in the program is to require them to pay premiums even though most of them will never be eligible to benefit?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we pointed out in an earlier exchange, the hon. member has omitted a very important part of the program. Those workers are also eligible for a major refund of all premiums if they do not become eligible.

About 1.3 million part time workers are eligible for a full refund of all premiums paid. As a result, many will be paying less than they do now under the old system.

Once again it points out that when simply trying to defend the status quo, they are totally immune and incapable of understanding the real positive pluses that come by making good, substantial, balanced, equitable reform.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the health minister is a physician from B.C. Some of her colleagues have just built a brand new clinic there. It is innovative and something to be proud of.

Because of her minister, however, that clinic is unavailable to B.C. residents; only to foreigners. Does the parliamentary secretary have any difficulty telling her neighbours waiting in line in pain they cannot access that clinic because of her minister's policies?

• (1140)

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how often we have to say this in the House, but there is a Canada Health Act. It works on the five principles of medicare, guiding principles for the country. Eighty–nine per cent of Canadians, especially British Columbians, support that.

When any province sets up any sort of clinic or anything which contravenes the Canada Health Act the government will act to take whatever steps are necessary to stop it.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a physician:

> Governments which willing undertook the responsibility for funding medicare when there was political mileage to be gained are now reluctant to accept the concomitant financial burden. They try to weasel out of their promise.
> The honest alternative would be for governments to confess to the public that they no longer can, or wish to fund medicare.

Those words should be eerily familiar to the parliamentary secretary. They are published words of hers in a 1990 B.C. journal of medicine.

The Speaker: Questions in question period should relate to the policy or administrative area of a minister or parliamentary secretary.

The way the question is phrased I judge to be out of order. However, I invite the hon. member to rephrase his question.

Mr. Hill (Macleod): Simply, Mr. Speaker, what changed the parliamentary secretary's mind?

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is presuming many things. My mind has always been clearly fixed on the Canada Health Act and the five principles of medicare. Nothing since, before or during my life as a physician has ever changed that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The economic and financial update released yesterday by the minister indicates that the government could have lowered UI premiums to $2.93 for every $100 of insurable earnings and still have collected the whole amount set in the 1995 budget. Yet, the government decided to set the premium at $2.95.

Will the minister recognize that he could have lowered UI premiums to $2.93 and still have met his 1995 budgetary objectives?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is customary to do what we call a rounding off of these premiums. It is clearly the case here, given the minimal difference between $2.93 and $2.95.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the minister said in his document that these premiums could have been lowered to $2.93, I assume he could have done it. But given the minister's estimation that lowering premiums by seven cents, in 1995, would result in the creation of 40,000 jobs, will he recognize that, by refusing to lower these premiums by two cents, down to $2.93, he is sacrificing, based on his own calculations, 12,000 jobs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, the Minister of Human Resources Development clearly said that it was our intention to build a reserve, so as to preserve jobs should an economic decline occur. Indeed, we are well aware that the worst thing that can happen in a period of economic decline is to be forced to raise UI premiums. This is why we are building up a reserve and why we put the UI fund back on its feet by pouring $6 billion into it, over a period of just two years.

The hon. member is absolutely right when he says that lowering UI premiums helps create jobs. This is why the minister lowered the rate, for a total amount of $1.25 billion. This is the way to create jobs.

BANKS

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions.

The banks have reported profits of over $5 billion. In that same period of time, they have raised service charges and also reduced the number of people that serve the general public. What is the secretary of state doing to protect consumers from this oligopolistic practice?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is a question in which a large number of Canadians have an interest.

The government believes that consumers are best served by an environment where financial institutions compete for business and where consumers have access to adequate information.

With regard to service charges, federal financial institutions have to disclose all fees applicable to an account at the time of opening an account. When there is a change in any fees they must give at least 30 days' notice. That is a requirement of federal legislation. I understand that Canadian banks charge substantially lower service charges than U.S. banks for comparable services.

The government is also working with the provinces to improve the consistency of legislation on the cost of consumer borrowing so that the consumer will have better information.

Finally, in our financial institution legislation that is going to be reviewed, we are looking very carefully at consumer issues.

GRAINS INDUSTRY

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, results of the Alberta plebiscite on wheat and barley marketing are crystal clear. Two–thirds of Alberta producers voted in favour of having a dual marketing system, with the freedom to choose to market through the Canadian Wheat Board or outside of the board.

Would the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food tell the House if he agrees with the majority of Alberta farmers that choice for marketing of wheat and barley is a step forward? A yes or no answer would be appreciated.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting how the Reform Party seems incapable of understanding answers that amount to more than one or two words. I hope the hon. member will bear with me while I respond to his question.

As everyone knows, a plebiscite with respect to wheat and barley marketing was conducted recently in the province of Alberta. That plebiscite is not without some considerable controversy. I note that some farm leaders in Alberta, some agricultural reporters in Alberta, some pollsters in western Canada have all raised what appear to be serious questions about the process.

Approximately 16,000 producers participated in the process, out of perhaps 30,000, 35,000 or 40,000 who might have participated in the process. I point out again that this single vote within one province, on an issue that affects all of western Canada and as many as 130,000 prairie farmers, is obviously not a process that can be definitive with respect to this issue across western Canada.

The Government of Canada has established a process to deal with this issue in an orderly and logical way. That is the Western Grain Marketing Panel. It is very well known. I would urge all prairie farmers, including all of those in Alberta, to participate fully and fairly in the Western Grain Marketing Panel.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, farmers are not dumb. Maybe a lawyer thinks they are, but farmers understand very well what the question was and what it meant.

The minister has been pinning all of his hopes on the Western Grain Marketing Panel. In a statement he has slammed the producer vote as being merely academic. He has no respect for farmers who democratically expressed a common sense position.

Why is the minister insulting the intelligence of farmers by thumbing his nose at the clear message he received from over 16,000 plebiscite participants, 16,000 voters?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again I point out to the hon. gentleman that those votes represent about 12 per cent or 15 per cent of the total number of farmers affected by this process.

The arrangement that the Government of Canada has put in place in order for this issue to be fully ventilated in western Canada is a logical and orderly process. It will provide farmers through the Western Grain Marketing Panel with full, fair, balanced, accurate information about all of the issues respecting grain marketing in the west.

• (1150)

It will also provide farmers with the opportunity to debate all of the issues related to grain marketing in a way that is totally transparent, with all the facts on the table. They can consider not only the pros of the marketing debate but also the cons and the consequences so that this issue can be dealt with fairly in the interests of all western Canadians.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A Canadian citizen, Tran Trieu Quan, has been a prisoner in Vietnam for close to two years now, despite the fact that the Canadian government believes he is imprisoned on trumped up charges. The Prime Minister promised to look into the case personally upon his return from Vietnam in November, 1994.

What explanation does the Deputy Prime Minister have for the fact, that more than a year after the Prime Minister's Asian mission, the situation remains unchanged, despite a recent commitment by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Tran Trieu Quan still remains a prisoner in Vietnam?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the treatment of the gentleman in question is, of course, unacceptable to the government of Canada. That is why the Prime Minister himself raised the issue, as did the Minister of Foreign Affairs. We continue to tell the government of Vietnam to respect the fact that this Canadian citizen must be released, because the present position of the government of Vietnam is not reasonable.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, considering the lack of success of government interventions to date, does the Deputy Prime Minister intend to ask the Prime Minister to personally bring up the case of this Canadian citizen with the authorities in Hanoi once again and to demand his immediate release?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Minister of Foreign Affairs, when asked this same question some weeks ago, gave his word that he was pursuing this matter at the highest diplomatic level possible.

You can be sure that the Prime Minister himself, having been involved in this case, continues to be concerned, and wishes to do his utmost to continue pressures on the government of Vietnam.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during my recent visit to Atlantic Canada I heard a lot of criticism of the Tobin tax. One criticism above all the rest is that fishermen are distressed that the licence fees are to be based on gross landed value rather than on net profit. The minister knows very well there is a large difference between gross and net profit.

Is the minister going to listen to fishermen on at least this one small point and ensure that fees are based on net profit, not gross landed value?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the member's visit to Atlantic Canada he certainly was able to generate some reaction from the fishermen, there is no doubt about it.

The executive director of the Maritime Fishermen's Union in reference to the member opposite said words to this effect: Please take your garbage back where it came from. We are not interested in your politics of division. The president of the fishermen's union, a Newfoundlander, Earle McCurdy, in essence said to the member that they are not going to be fooled by these crocodile tears and they certainly will not accept a wolf in sheep's clothing.

Yes, the member made quite an impression on the fishermen of Atlantic Canada and yes, they have an inordinate amount of common sense in dealing with the kind of nonsense proposed opposite.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see this minister gets high on his own exhaust.

I have in my possession a Department of Fisheries and Oceans document which shows that not only is the minister proposing a $50 million tax grab in 1996, but more startling is planning to increase this by a further $20 million in 1997. This will mean that Canadian fishermen will be faced with a $70 million tax bill in 1997.

When is the minister going to start listening to fishermen instead of the self–serving bureaucrats in his department who are advocating this tax so that they can preserve their own jobs?

• (1155)

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it takes a special kind of stamina, one that is clearly exhausting this member's credibility, to stand in the House to ask these kinds of questions.

This is the party—

Mr. Hill (Macleod): You are exhausting.

Mr. Ramsay: When are you going to take the billboards down, Brian?

Mr. Tobin: Listen up, fellows. You might learn something for a change.

This is the party whose leader went to Atlantic Canada and said that it only takes 90 seconds of study to know that the fishery is finished. This is the party that complained about the EI reform which is now under way because the cuts were not deep enough. This is the party that said of the TAGS program, which assists tens of thousands of fishermen who have been hit by the fisheries failure, that the program ought to be cancelled. This is the party whose obvious lust at a shot in a byelection in Labrador has driven it beyond the bounds of decency and common sense. This is the party that will be slam dunked in that byelection with the kind of negative results it deserves.

TRADE

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when one listens to what comes across the floor of the House, Canadians might get the feeling that Canada is not doing so well in export markets.

I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade if he could share with the House Canada's performance in international trade and demonstrate clearly to Canadians how we are winning markets every day.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the first nine months of 1995 Canadian merchandise exports grew by 20 per cent, compared to the same period last year. Exports to the United States rose 17 per cent, but the United States is far from our fastest growing market. Sales to Latin America, including Brazil, have increased by some 29 per cent, to Japan by 32 per cent, to the European Union by 42 per cent, to China by 44 per cent and to all other Pacific nations by 47 per cent.

In 1992 our exports amounted to only 26 per cent of our gross domestic product, but today exports constitute 37 per cent of our gross domestic product.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

On October 30, Canadian Airlines International stopped all its international flights originating in Montreal, preferring to concentrate its operations in Toronto. As a result, Montreal and its very substantial Italian community are deprived of direct connections with Rome. The minister's policy for awarding international routes prevents other carriers from offering this service.

Since Canadian Airlines International no longer offers a service from Mirabel, would the minister agree that his policy for allocating international air routes is discriminatory, since it deprives Montreal of direct connections with all countries for which Canadian has been given exclusive access?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agree that our policy for allocating international routes has had the exact opposite effect of what the hon. member wanted.

I realize this is a drawback. The hon. member will probably say so in his supplementary. When Canadian Airlines International decided to stop their service from Mirabel, at the same time, and I am sure the hon. member was aware of this, Alitalia, the Italian airline, made the same decision. The problem at Mirabel is that there is not enough passenger volume to support a service either by Canadian Airlines International or Alitalia.

• (1200)

What we are trying to do, and negotiations are now under way, is to see how we can solve the problem so as to provide an adequate service from Mirabel to Italy.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as this government continues its adversarial approach with the western provinces over the transfer of federal funds, it ignores the gross inequities it has created through the Canada–Quebec accord.

Under the accord the province of Quebec receives $90 million a year, 35 per cent of all federal funds being transferred for the settlement programs for immigrants and refugees when Quebec is currently only taking 12 to 13 per cent of the immigrants and refugees.

If the government is going to continue the funding program, will it consider renegotiating the Canada–Quebec accord so that the money is going to the provinces that are receiving the immigrants and refugees?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the member for giving me the opportunity to say how our federal system works. The immigration accord between Quebec and Canada is proof that we can have agreements between provincial and federal governments to make this country work.

Concerning the other provinces, the minister is open for discussions. There are discussions going on and I am sure that when the minister returns to the House he will give a detailed answer to the member.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the infamous red book there is a promise by those who were running for government that they would eliminate the GST. The Prime Minister last summer stated that in the February 1996 budget the government would outline a replacement for the GST. No mention was made on Wednesday by the Minister of Finance of GST reform in his finance minister's economic and fiscal update.

Is it still the intent of the Minister of Finance to tell the people of Canada how he is going to recommend eliminating the GST?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government's undertaking in terms of the GST is to obviously have a system that is fairer to consumers and which is easier to administer.

The government has stated that following the desires of Canadians it is our wish to harmonize and to have a single tax, a single base. We are in the course of discussing this with the provinces. Undoubtedly it will come up at the meeting of the federal–provincial finance ministers next week.

I would have been prepared to have discussed it in the fiscal statement. The purpose of the fiscal statement was to give an economic update on the state of the economy since the last budget which is why I did not deal with it and I was not questioned on the matter.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I would like to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Marcello Nunes de Alencar, Governor of the State of Rio de Janeiro.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House a question asked earlier during question period by a member of the Reform Party, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, to the hon. Minister of National Revenue but in a different capacity.

Citation 412 of Beauchesne's states quite clearly in regard to such questions:

> A question may not be asked of a Minister in another capacity, such as being responsible for a province—

The question was asked in contravention of our rules and it was allowed to be asked uninterrupted. I realized that afterward when another member rose to ask a question which was similarly against our rules and that member was ruled out of order.

I would want to report to the House and to suggest to Mr. Speaker that the question asked of the hon. Minister of National Revenue was equally out of order. Therefore it should have been indicated at that time so that all Canadians would know that the minister was unable to answer the question because of the rules of the House which specifically prevent him from doing so.

● (1205)

The Speaker: The hon. government whip raises a perfectly valid point of order.

In listening to the question and not to whom it was directed, it dealt with an issue that is seizing the House right now, the government veto, and I thought it was proper for that time. The hon. government whip did note that on another occasion I declared another question out of order. Because it dealt with the veto and because the Deputy Prime Minister in her wisdom thought she would like to answer it, I permitted it. However I take this under advisement. I thank the hon. government whip for raising the matter.

MEMBER FOR NORTH VANCOUVER

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too want to bring to the attention of the House a statement and an action by the member for North Vancouver before the Minister for Human Resources Development started speaking.

I believe you will find that the member for North Vancouver used unparliamentary language. In addition, citation 501 of Beauchesne's states:

> Speakers have consistently ruled that it is improper to produce exhibits of any sort in the Chamber. Thus during the flag debate of 1964, the display of competing designs was prohibited. At other times boxes of cereal, detergent and milk powder have been ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will find and in fact I believe you observed that the member for North Vancouver produced a trophy of the rear part of a horse and presented it to the minister. At the same time he referred to the minister with the words referring to that part of the equine anatomy.

The Speaker: Order. My colleagues, the first point the hon. member brought up is the use of props. I have asked hon. members on numerous occasions to please not use props. I have asked this of members on all sides of the House. We are equal in here. We are members of Parliament.

Once again I appeal to you that even though you quote from papers, there is no need to hold them up or shake them. I believe that our words stand on their own. I take the point and reiterate to the House, please do not use any props.

With regard to the other point about the horse, forgive me but I did not see the use of the prop and I did not hear the words used. With regard to the words, I will check Hansard and if it is necessary, I will get back to the House.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I felt it was a perfectly reasonable point of order I raised earlier. All I asked for was the judgment of the House under the circumstances—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

An hon. member: Read the book.

The Speaker: Order. I am going to close this matter off right now. Are there any other points of order? There being no other points of order, we will proceed to the daily routine of business.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions.

• (1210)

[English]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 108th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding questions concerning the role of the Senate and its interference with Bill C–69, an act to provide for the establishment of the electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

INDUSTRY

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 11th report of the Standing Committee on Industry on Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade, with amendments.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans on Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada. As vice–chair of the committee, I would like to extend my thanks to the members of the committee for their hard work in connection with this bill. It demonstrates the kind of co–operation we have received in this instance.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Winchester, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

FETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has to do with fetal alcohol syndrome. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Guelph, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to bring to the attention of the House that consumption of alcoholic beverages may cause health problems or impair one's ability and specifically that fetal alcohol syndrome and other alcohol related birth defects are 100 per cent preventable by avoiding alcohol consumption during pregnancy.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation to require health warning labels to be placed on the containers of all alcoholic beverages to caution expectant mothers and others of the risk associated with alcohol consumption.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today, both on the same subject from constituents in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka.

My constituents call upon the government to change the Young Offenders Act and to strengthen certain provisions thereof.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two petitions today, both on the same subject concerning the taxation of native Indians. The petitioners also ask Parliament to halt land claim negotiations and ensure that one and the same law applies equally to all Canadians.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions from my constituents of Annapolis Valley—Hants.

The first petition signed by 30 of my constituents deals with the government household moving service and the need to continue with a policy of dividing the furniture moving business between independent movers on an equitable basis.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to resolve to veto any proposed change to the tendering process of the Department of National Defence and to support the present system of tendering.

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by 211 constituents calling upon Parliament to take steps to keep the synthetic bovine growth hormone out of Canada through legislating a moratorium or a stoppage of the BGH use and sale until the year 2000. These constituents further call for an examination of the outstanding health and economic questions through an independent and transparent review.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLEGED COMMENTS OF MINISTER OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the minister, I must inform hon. members that I have had time to check the blues. I think it is quite clear this is a point of order. The minister said—it is in English unfortunately—that "if she cannot take the heat, she should not be in the kitchen".

As you know, this was an expression used by Harry Truman. It seems the expression is not equally familiar in both languages, but it is an expression.

With our colleagues, we understood it to mean that women should stay at home, or something like that. I just spoke to our colleagues—I think they were not in the House at the time—and we agree it was a misunderstanding. There is no indication, as far as I can see, that the minister said anything against women or hon. members of the female sex.

I also looked at what was said by all members, and I do not think there were any insinuations against women members, as far as I can see. I want to thank all members for raising this point, and we can now proceed with questions and comments.

[English]

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the minister was in the middle of debate on the motion before the House but was interrupted by a point of order and therefore did not complete his allotted time. I trust his time will not be diminished by the time taken for points of order and that he will be allowed to continue so that we may proceed to questions and comments.

The Deputy Speaker: I am told by the Table the minister's time had expired for his intervention. Accordingly, we are into questions and comments.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I request clarification as to whether the time allotted to the minister did include the interruptions for points of order or whether he had used the full 20 minutes to speak.

The Deputy Speaker: I am reminded that if a point of order is raised during an intervention it is included in the 20 minutes.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup has the floor for questions and comments.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to comment on the minister's speech and, in particular, on his statement that 97 per cent rather than 93 per cent of workers will be eligible for the plan.

The Bloc has never said it did not want people to be eligible for the plan. We have always said that unemployment insurance should be one of the tools for creating employment. The government has not offered any other, this reform is its only tool. I think some other tools are missing.

There may indeed be more people paying into the plan, but I would like to know from the minister whether he has had estimates made of the number of new contributors who will be able to benefit from the plan. For people in the regions, where work is seasonal, working 910 hours in a year means working 26 weeks at 35 hours a week.

• (1220)

Even if all the hours are counted, even if people sometimes work a 40 hour week, it will be very hard and will result in an exodus of young people. This will mean that many people will remain on welfare. What I have understood from the reform is that people will have a year to accumulate their 910 hours. The next year, it starts all over again, and we begin at zero. So, there are many people who today are getting unemployment insurance, because their job afforded them between 300 and 400 hours. Now they will have to do 910 hours before they are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

In my opinion, this will mean the following: people who work 12 or 13 weeks in the summer at 35 hours a week will end up with some 400 hours and then will have to leave the region to come up with the other 500 hours. They will have to look for jobs elsewhere. Over three, four or five years this will reduce the population in the region. This is a negative aspect of the reform.

We are not saying unemployment insurance should not be reformed, we are saying that 910 hours is far too much for someone new to the system to accumulate right off in order to be entitled to benefits. It is inappropriate for our economy.

There is one other point I would like to raise. When the minister terms it an equitable reform, how can he say it is equitable for seasonal workers when their benefits will drop from 55 per cent to 50 per cent after about three years, when they will have used up the 100 weeks after which the reduction kicks in? The people affected, therefore, are in seasonal industries, a sector where, through no fault of their own, they have to be on unemployment insurance year after year. They are not guilty of anything, so why must they be penalized? These are people who work in industries with 12, 13, 14, 15 weeks of work a year. They cannot invent more work than that.

So they are being told their benefits will be cut down to 50 per cent. After three years, they will be down to 50 per cent, and for no other reason except to penalize them and push them into other sectors where they do not necessarily have any expertise. Where is the other side of the coin, the guarantee that there will be changes in their regional economy?

Last year, everywhere we went with the human resources committee the people in the regions said they were not opposed to change. They said they wanted assurance that there would be set transitional periods, possibilities of adjusting the economy, of bringing in aspects from new technology, all those things.

But today, instead of a carrot and stick approach, only the stick has been brought out, with no carrot anywhere in sight. There is no sign from anyone in this government, particularly not the Minister of Industry, whose vision of the economy is a century behind the times. There is no vision here of what the positive aspects will be.

I would therefore ask the minister to tell us what percentage of those now under the plan will be eligible under the new arrangements, and what percentage will never be eligible because it will be impossible for them to accumulate 910 hours at any time in their working lives. I feel that this is an important question, because making it so that more people contribute may be very attractive from a budget point of view, but from the human point of view it is equally important to see that people will have enough to live on.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised some very useful and important questions and I would like to provide him with a detailed response. I hope hon. members will listen.

In terms of the question being addressed earlier about part time workers, we estimate that 1.3 million people who have a minor work attachment will now be eligible for a total refund of all premiums paid. That includes 900,000 people who presently contribute benefits but receive no claim or eligibility because they do not have enough weeks.

Those 900,000 people will now be able to receive a full refund on their benefits. In fact, 32 per cent fewer people will be paying benefits into the new employment insurance system than in the old system. Overall, part time and low income workers will be paying $14 million less in premiums in the new system.

• (1225)

Those are hard figures. More people are covered but if they do not receive their full eligibility they get a refund of all their premiums, which means a $14 million saving in premiums for part time workers.

I will deal with the second question the hon. member raised regarding the new entrance requirements for new entrants. I will quote to him because he has quoted back to me several times, with great support, the recommendations of the seasonal task force. The working group told us we should do something about eligibility to stop young people from leaving school to take advantage of the short term benefits of UI to the detriment of their future career prospects.

That was a direct recommendation of the seasonal workers task force. It talked with seasonal worker groups right across Canada.

I recommend the hon. member actually read the legislation rather than listening to his colleague, the member for Mercier.

The new entrance requirement is only a first time requirement. In the second year, if they have worked 490 hours in the previous year, the entrance requirement goes down to the regular number of hours. In other words, if they simply get 490 hours in the first year they are not required to do 900 hours in the next year, as the hon. member asserts. They go down to the regular 420 required hours. I hope that provides some clarification.

I will now come to a very important point. The hon. member made a very good case about the need to help change economies in parts of rural Canada, to help people redevelop new economies, recognizing there are problems.

One of the major elements in the new program is a $300 million transition jobs fund that can be used for the investment in these areas to help small businesses with capital formation, to start new enterprises. It can used in terms of new training programs, new schools in those areas, if that is the choice of people in those areas. Investments can go into new infrastructure to attract new industry.

I recall a discussion I had with people in Atlantic Canada. They were saying there was an enormous opportunity now with the new export potential for developing food processing, food value added manufacturing. They new substantial new sewage treatment plants, new water facilities. This new jobs funds will do that.

I suggest to the hon. member that one of the responsibilities for him as a Member of Parliament is not to rely on the old system because he recognizes, as well as everyone else does, it has been a deterrent to jobs. It has stood in the way of developing new enterprise.

Concerning the new methods we are bringing in, the new employment benefits, $800 million in employment benefits, creating over 40,000 jobs in Quebec at this time, plus the infusion of a new investment fund to start helping those regions to make changes, to adapt, to invest, to create new industries, surely if the hon. member is deeply concerned about people in his own riding would not object to having a new economic development fund to help create jobs and new enterprises in his area. That is what the reform is about, to assist people in that transition and that adaptation to a different kind of economy.

We also do it over a period of time. We are not asking people to go cold turkey into this. We are saying there is a five–year transition. Also in the legislation is a clear requirement for monitoring the impacts, the results, the initiatives which will be tabled in Parliament and will be fully transparent. We will be able to ask in Parliament in 1998 what has happened, what adjustments have to be made, if they have to be made, and what kind of other tools can be used.

This will be an opportunity for members of Parliament to engage in a very clear evaluation of what works and what does not work, to share information and to be part of a process of re–evaluation and monitoring. We are being very open and transparent and clear about it.

Rather than engaging in the wild hyperbole I heard from his colleague earlier this morning, we are putting the onus on the hon. member and others to say let us get the real facts.

• (1230)

Let us get down to what is really going to happen. Let us use these new tools for employment. Let us use the new investment fund. Let us use the new opportunities to extend benefits to part time workers. Let us use the opportunity to extend employment benefits to people who have exhausted their old UI benefits, who want to get back to work but have no assistance right now.

He knows that in Quebec the provincial government has cut off major support for people to get back to work. We are bringing them back in because we recognize that people who have exhausted benefits have as much a desire to go back to work than anybody else.

We are now giving them the opportunity to start their own business, to be able to use a wage supplement with employers to have an income supplement, to have a training voucher if the province agrees, and I hope they will so that we can help people get upgraded.

Employment benefits such as having a job corps in their area, doing reforestation projects, building new infrastructure projects are now available to the hon. member's riding as they are to people across this country.

For the life of me, I find it hard to understand why someone who expresses a concern about jobs for his constituents totally rejects the opportunity of new investment, for new employment benefits, to extend benefits to those who have exhausted theirs, to provide a supplement for families to bring up their incomes, to provide an extension of coverage for part time workers.

All those things are part of the new package. I would think the hon. member would be applauding, supporting and working with us to make sure that the full benefits of all the programs are shared by members of his riding.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the eloquent response by the minister of human resources to the question from the Bloc as to how much the government is providing to the province of Quebec and to other provinces in his vision of the reform of UI.

The motion we are debating today is that this House denounce the government for its massive cuts to the unemployment insurance system that limit access and so on. It seems to me that this type of motion is in line with the pathetic attitude toward this House and this country held by the Bloc. We are trying to build this country and they are trying to destroy it. It fits right in line with all the things they have been doing along the way.

If this is the type of leadership that the Bloc brings to this House I feel rather sorry for the people of the province of Quebec if the member for Lac–Saint–Jean moves over there and starts to lead that province. I feel that they are going to continue downhill rather than climb out of the lethargy of unemployment that currently exists in that province.

I come from the west where Alberta is one of the have provinces. British Columbia and Alberta are a growth area where we are prepared to get up and get the job done. That is the important thing. It is not to sit around and denounce the government. While we do not agree with the way the government is trying to do things, let us acknowledge that it is trying.

I find it rather disconcerting that this Bloc motion again today is to bring down, to denounce what the government is doing rather than putting forward any constructive efforts to try to put the people of Quebec back to work.

If they were to adopt the get up and get at it attitude that we have in the west, they would be a lot better off. The economy would be better off in the province of Quebec. The country would be better off because those people would feel better with a positive attitude rather than with a negative attitude.

As part of the doublespeak of the Bloc Quebecois, two days ago there was the annual general meeting of the Interparliamentary Union in the West Block. This is an organization that I sometimes call the junket club and the travel club courtesy of the Canadian taxpayer. For $20 one can buy an annual membership in the Interparliamentary Union and the government throws in half a million dollars to top it up in order to cover the cost of travel around the world. I have been a little critical of the value we are getting for the money that is spent.

• (1235)

As a result the Liberals and the Bloc typically have joined forces to change the constitution of the organization to say that only those who agree with the aims and objectives of this organization are allowed to sit on the executive. As I mentioned in the House yesterday, the communists handled it even better.

The point I am trying to make today is at that annual general meeting the Bloc supported the Liberals in changing the constitution to deny accountability. We asked the members of the Bloc why they were supporting the Liberals on this issue. They said that they loved to travel around the world to promote Canada. We were shocked.

What are they doing within Canada? They are destroying the country. I believe they should be held accountable for that. I thought it was absolutely disgraceful that they would take Canadian taxpayers' dollars that are paid in B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and the four eastern provinces and run around the world courtesy of us, accomplish absolutely nothing, enjoy it, then come back and say "we love to promote Canada".

However, as soon as they put their feet back in this country they are tearing it apart, knocking it down and trying to destroy it. Let us recognize where the Bloc is coming from. The attitude of its members is that anything which interferes with their opportunity to spend Canadians' money while they follow through with their objectives is to be applauded. I denounce them for that type of attitude.

This motion is strictly for consumption in the province of Quebec. I listened to the debate by the Bloc member. Typical of their attitude, they want Canadians to pay more so that they can receive more. In a totally lopsided argument they want to ensure that money flows one way from the rest of Canada to them. Yet they are so spoiled that they want to break away and build some kind of sovereignty association that continues this idea, however false. It is totally false that we would think about supporting them should they ever separate from this country.

During the referendum the member for Lac–Saint–Jean who was leading the yes forces said: "Remember, they will punish us because we're the ones who are getting the unemployment insurance while all the rest are getting the investments credits". I say to them now is the time to get off their posteriors and get back to work. They should not worry about unemployment insurance but think more about employment. That is what the rest of the country is doing.

We have seen the Minister of Human Resource Development change the name of unemployment insurance to employment insurance. I do not think that words are going to do very much. However, perhaps the idea is a small step in the right direction.

The UI reform that is being proposed is a continuation of this centralist, top down, one shoe fits all approach by the Liberal government. It is not going to work. More tinkering with the system is not what we need. There is nothing that is radically new in the bill brought down by the Liberals. There is nothing refreshing. There is no rethinking of UI. Yes, they have expanded a little bit. Yes, they are going to refund some premiums to some people. Yes, they are going to cover some more groups. Yes, they are going to do a few things.

The Liberals have just massaged unemployment insurance around the edges. They have not said that for the past 20 or more years unemployment in this country has hovered around 10 per cent. It does not matter how much money is spent on the program. Unemployment seems to hover around 10 per cent. If we look around at other countries we find that unemployment is significantly lower. With our friends to the south of us unemployment consistently runs to about 3 per cent less than ours. We must spend more money to fix our problem and yet unemployment continues at 10 per cent.

What is the problem? Perhaps the problem is that there is not enough incentive to work and there is too much incentive not to work. Why does the Minister of Human Resources Development not have a new approach to UI rather than just expanding it around the edges.

I will give a couple of examples and perhaps the Minister of Human Resources Development can take notes. I was in Atlantic Canada last year talking to some good Reformers down there. There are lots of Reformers in Atlantic Canada. This Reformer was telling me that when she was young going to college there were all kinds of summer jobs in Atlantic Canada for students:

in the hotels, in the restaurants. The tourist season was on and there were all kinds of opportunities.

The last year she was in university the Liberal government, 20 odd years ago, changed the rules to say: "We will now pay unemployment insurance to seasonal workers". Housewives came out of their homes, worked for four months, spent eight months at home. It absolutely destroyed the labour market for the kids coming out of university. That is a simple situation of cause and effect.

I know there are many families in this country who depend on seasonal work and unemployment insurance for their livelihood. It is not that I am denigrating that, but when the rule was introduced 20–odd years ago it should have been foreseen that not only would it cause dependency on UI in a seasonal environment but that it would destroy employment for university students who needed to make some money during the summer. We aggravated the situation.

However, we keep tinkering to try to resolve the problems that we created, rather than looking back and saying: "Look at the Pandora's box that we opened".

The young people in this country are motivated, enthused and they are want to work. They do not want UI. They want jobs. Remember the great theme of the government prior to the last election: jobs, jobs, jobs. They waved the red book and said: "This is going to be jobs, jobs, jobs. Vote for us and there are going to be jobs everywhere".

The President of the Treasury Board is the minister in charge of doling out the $6 billion in borrowed money to try to create some jobs. He appeared before the government operations committee to explain the wonderful success of the jobs, jobs, jobs program and the wonderful success of the infrastructure program because now the country is $6 billion further in debt. We all hoped that we were going to get something wonderful for this significant investment.

He told us the infrastructure program created 8,000 permanent jobs which is $750,000 of borrowed money per job. We would have been better giving the interest on the money to the people and telling them to stay home. They would have had a lot more money and we would have been a lot less in debt.

Now we have the Minister of Human Resources Development tinkering to change the UI program to help those people who did not get a job even though they were promised one in the last election. There is something wrong here. There is something wrong with what the Minister of Human Resources Development is proposing. There is something wrong with what this government has proposed. By the way, it has not proposed very much in the last two years. However it did put us $6 billion more into debt to create 8,000 jobs.

• (1245)

Where are the young folk? Their hope is waning. Their motivation is waning. They are becoming discouraged, and the Minister of Human Resources Development says: "If you get a part time job we will cover you with EI". That is not what they want. They are motivated and they want to work.

A constituent came into my office a few months ago. He was an enthusiastic young gentleman with a university education. He was willing to work. He had done all kinds of volunteer work. He had spent 600 hours a year volunteering to help the RCMP. He had a dream of becoming a mountie. Can he? No. He is a white male. Reverse discrimination has killed his dream.

The Minister of Human Resources Development says: "I have a program for you. It is not called unemployment any longer; it is called employment. Sit at home and we will send you a cheque". He is a young intelligent fellow who wants to work and contributes to the country of his own free will by volunteering because he wants to get ahead. He wants to do the best he can for himself. He thinks he has a future ahead of him, but employment equity slapped him down.

That is the type of thing at which the Minister of Human Resources Development should be looking. The young, the motivated, the intelligent and the educated should have every opportunity to get ahead. It does not matter who they are, what they are or where they are. If the minister would appreciate that, we would have a lot less need for the program changes about which he is talking.

I talked about the need for some innovative thinking. Today when a person pays unemployment insurance the employer has to pay that amount multiplied by 1.4. There is a direct relationship between what the employee pays and what the employer pays. It is a total, fixed, absolute relationship.

There are employers who on a continuous basis turn their employees over to the UI system. They are seasonal employers. We read about one of them in the Globe and Mail yesterday. General Motors uses UI when it shuts down the factories for retooling and so on. On a regular basis they are turning their employees out to the UI system, hoping it is okay, and hiring them back when they want.

Why do we not recognize that some employers use the system a lot more than others and change the premium according to risk? It is a fairly simple situation. We could count the number of T4s issued at the end of the year, count the number of pink slips issued during the year, find the ratio, determine whether it is a high risk employer or a low risk employer and grade the premium accordingly.

That would give the employer the incentive to keep staff during slack times. It might even give the employer the incentive to create new work during slack times. The employer knows that if he uses his business experience to extend the employment of his employees he will be rewarded. That is what it is all about. Rather than a bureaucrat in Ottawa saying what the rules are, the decision making should be made on the shop floor by the manager.

The same also applies to the employee side. What about the employee who loses his job, who is laid off for whatever reason and runs out to get a job right away? He is motivated. Then there is the other employee who will say: "I am covered for a year. I will take three or four months off and then I will be slow about looking for a job". He will be employed within the year, before his UI runs out.

• (1250)

What about the seasonal worker who says: "I am quite content to sit at home during the wintertime because I happen to be a greens keeper on a golf course?" Since there is not too much grass to cut in the winter he is not required to look for a job in the winter. UI will carry him.

Since this person is a frequent user of UI he should pay a higher premium than the other person who has stable employment or does not use UI very often even though he changes jobs. We could grade his premium to give him the incentive to stay employed rather than being on and off UI.

It is a relatively simple situation. We grade people on income tax when the employer knows their deductions for income tax. I think the same type of situation could be used for UI. I throw that out for the minister's benefit. I am am talking about a new approach to UI, a decentralized approach to UI, something that merits being explored.

While the minister may have taken a small step on UI reform, he missed the wonderful opportunity of taking a great step forward. Along with his colleagues he has totally and absolutely failed in delivering the electoral promise of jobs, jobs, jobs. This is why we still have a 10 per cent rate of UI and why his program, as changed, will not work.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member's discussion. I found it odd what Reform Party members say on this issue. I remember when they first came to the House and how they were to make a positive contribution. They were to support the government.

This piece of legislation is very important for the domestic economy and for making our manufacturing sector competitive within the world. The unemployment insurance rates in Canada are some of the highest in the western world. Many people feel that because of their attractiveness to some extent the rates have had a significant effect on our ability to compete.

I recall in my own practice as an accountant dealing with small businesses. There was an ongoing problem of people refusing to take jobs at a time when they were already receiving unemployment insurance benefits because the cost of physically travelling to the place of employment or having to employ babysitters, et cetera, meant they would receive less than by sitting home and drawing benefits. In some ways this piece of legislation lowers those benefits in recognition that we have reduced the competitiveness of our labour force.

I listened to Bloc members go on and on about the need for underpinning the social structure of the country and possibly workers in Quebec. The Quebec Manufacturers Association recently published a study showing that competitive labour rates within that province were some of the worst in Canada, which makes its ability to compete worse than that of many other provinces. As a consequence it creates a situation of continued unemployment.

The hon. member said that we missed an opportunity. I also heard him say that he wanted to devolve. I think devolve is the operative word of the Reform Party today. Let us call devolve what it really is. It means to destroy or tear down a system which creates labour mobility and allows people to move from province to province to seek employment. Would he reflect on the history and recognize the positive initiative that has been taken by the government to increase our competitiveness in international trade, to keep the underpinnings of a mobile labour force and to recognize the object of employment is to get people back to work and to increase their skill levels?

• (1255)

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, the new buzzword is employment. Unemployment has gone away. This must be to hide behind the fact that the whole concept of jobs, jobs, jobs has failed and people are still unemployed.

It would be wonderful if all the people who thought they would get jobs and voted for the Liberal Party because it promised them jobs had employment. However they do not and it is unemployment insurance we are talking about. It does not matter how they want to dress it up.

I am glad the member recognized that perhaps our UI programs have been a disincentive and have hurt our competitiveness around the world.

We are debating a motion put forward by the Bloc from the province of Quebec. I remember reading an article some months ago about MIL shipyards in the province of Quebec unfortunately running out of ships to build. The average wage in the shipyards was $34 an hour. They were not competitive and could not get any more orders. They wanted the federal government to give them some work, to build more ferries that we really did not need, until such time as they could re–engineer the productivity of the factory to allow them to break into the international shipbuilding market.

MIL Davie did not have a hope of breaking into the international shipbuilding market because it was paying its workers $34 an hour. They are now out of work. Where are they? They are part of the package of unemployed people the minister of human resources is trying to help.

We have to provide incentives at the managerial level in the workforce. I did not say anything about devolution in this situation. I said we should put the incentives where they can be managed, at the managerial level of the workforce. I also gave a proposition on how we could look at it. I was surprised and disappointed that the member continued to hang on to the idea of centralist decision making: one shoe fits all; the people in the big wide world are incapable of making any decisions for themselves; it has to be done here in Ottawa. As a businessman I would have thought he would have realized that there is a great benefit in giving people control over their own lives and control over their own decisions. The whole government is missing that opportunity time, time and time again.

That is the unfortunate truth and that is why we are in a mess.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague from St. Albert. I wondered at the start whether or not he was talking about the motion before the House. I have lots of comments about that but I will only make one. He complained about the IPU and said that only people who agreed with the aims and objectives of the organization were permitted on the executive.

My hon. colleague represents the party that is constantly pointing out that if hon. members representing Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois are here they are not following the aims and objectives of Parliament, which is obviously to do the best we can for the people of Canada. I am not sure how he can have it both ways. He also mentioned his vendetta against those members who travel on some of these things to learn about other parts of the world and so on. Yet I notice he is very interested in competitiveness around the world and Canada's competitiveness, providing jobs. I do not know how he thinks we will achieve that by sitting at home in Prince Alberta and gazing at our navels.

He has said all decision making is here in Ottawa and that the bill does not address that. The bill replaces 39 programs, which certainly suggests the people in Ottawa know best where each program should go with five which put a great deal of decision making with the local people. In my riding people are already taking advantage of this.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I thought the member for Oxford had been around here for a couple of years. I have been around here for a couple of years. I thought he was elected the same time as I was.

To think Bloc Quebecois aims and objectives in the House are the same as those of the rest of us, where has he been? Its objective is to destroy the country and the House, while I would hope the objective of the rest of us is to build the country and strengthen the House. Let us get that absolutely clear. If the member for Oxford has not realized that yet, please tell him to wake up, Mr. Speaker.

On the IPU, we have thought police in this town and the constitution of the IPU was changed by the Liberals and the Bloc, not by Reform. We voted absolutely against it. They voted to say only those who agree with the aims and objectives of the organization are allowed to sit on the executive. Who is to police this? I asked the chairman who is to police this. I guess it is something called osmosis or it percolates up to the top where your ideas are better than my ideas or you are right and I am wrong.

The constitution does not say how the IPU is to police this new rule. I stand up for the taxpayers of Canada who are throwing half a million dollars into that junket club so that these Liberals and Bloc members can run around the world and bring back pieces of paper to table in the House to collect some dust. They call that building on experience and improving our competitiveness around the world. Again I say to the member it is time to wake up.

We cannot afford it. They should not be doing it. We have to get real in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my speech, and considering previous comments, perhaps it would be wise to repeat the text of the motion before the House today. The hon. member for Mercier moved:

> That this House denounce the government for its massive cuts to the unemployment insurance system that limit access to the program and hit young people, women, seasonal workers and immigrants hard.

The word Quebec does not appear in this motion. The motion clearly includes all Quebecers and Canadians, especially people in the Maritimes, and I will get back to that in a moment.

First, I want to say that my comments today also reflect the results of consultations I have conducted since last Friday in the form of a series of conferences, including three telephone conferences, mostly with people from my riding in the Gaspé region. There is a consensus that emerges from these consultations which, in addition to the unions and workers, included employers, members of the Chambers of Commerce and people from all walks of life.

Several aspects of the reform proposal have their merits. For instance, the fact that low-income families will have a chance to get higher benefits. However, there are major aspects that need changing, and they are part of the consensus I will share with you.

First, the requirement of 910 hours of work for first-time contributors to the unemployment insurance plan. Previously, to be eligible, the maximum requirement for a first-time contributor was 20 weeks, 15 hours per week, which adds up to 300 hours.

• (1305)

Applying the same principle to these proposals, the government could have said 700 hours, the maximum for regions where the unemployment rate is not as high. But that is not what they did. They set the maximum at 910 hours, to be eligible for the plan.

This means that someone who works 35 hours a week will have to work 26 weeks full time to be eligible, in one year. If the following year you are back to square one, this means, as it says in our motion, young people and women—because in most cases women or young people who enter the labour market will be hit hard by this measure—seasonal workers, plus those who arrive on the labour market and immigrants getting their first job in Canada will all be affected.

What was the rationale for setting this number of hours? How could Liberal members, elected on a platform that stressed jobs, have done that? The best way to get someone a job is to give him an incentive to work. The proposed system will ensure that people who have worked 600, 700 or 800 hours will have to go on welfare as a matter of course. That is not a big incentive to work.

I think something should have been included to give people a taste for better benefits, something worthwhile. So, in addition to not providing any job creation program with the choices it made, and not proposing a way to transform regional economies, the government is waving a stick and telling workers they will have to work 910 hours; that is the way it will get them working longer. But first there have to be jobs.

I think our motion constructively criticizes this position, and the government will have to fix up its requirement of 910 hours. This is the consensus of the people in a region such as eastern Quebec. Why? Because it will lead to an exodus of young people as well. It will swell the numbers of young people who have been leaving over the past 10 or 15 years.

If somebody works 20 thirty-five hour weeks, he will have 700 hours. He will be short 210 hours, but there is no work in his region. Where is he going to find work? He will have to move to a major centre. This will reduce the regional economy in a number of sectors.

This measure severely punishes the regions, it is backward looking and must be withdrawn.

Another point we agree on is the need to eliminate the penalty against seasonal workers. Give me one reason why employment in a seasonal industry, such as forestry, fishing or tourism, should result in punishment for the worker whose benefits will be reduced according to his use of the unemployment insurance plan?

Why is it this way when it is not the case for workers in an industry that is not seasonal? This, to me, is totally unacceptable. I see it as an insult to Canada's regions as well, although their development of seasonal industry has been praised. Their contribution to the Canadian economy is readily accepted, and then, suddenly, the rules are changed and the people penalized and no job creation adjustment program is provided.

This leaves a group of very perplexed members, including the Liberal members for the maritimes, members such as those from St. John's East, Annapolis Valley—Hants, Madawaska—Victoria, Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine in Quebec, all those who come from ridings hit hard by this policy, which offers no remedy to change the situation. I am willing to bet that, when the policy is reviewed in three years, as provided for in the legislation, it will be assessed as having a disastrous impact because there was no program to revitalize the economy of these regions as they were being penalized.

It will have taken three more years to arrive at the same result. I think we might as well correct the situation right away.

I would like to show you what this will mean for people, not in theory but in real life. Someone who works 12 weeks at an average salary of $500 a week can now receive benefits equal to 55 per cent of his or her salary, or $275.

• (1310)

Under the new program, this person will have to work more hours per week for a longer period in order to qualify for benefits that will drop from $275 a week to $214. We in this House make good money. If our pay cheques were reduced by $50, it would not be so bad, we might be able to live with it. However, if someone's earnings fell from $275 a week to $214, he would wonder how he could feed his children every day of the month.

This kind of money is on a par with welfare. You think this is an incentive to work? This is totally unacceptable and I think that the government should use the time when the bill is in committee to correct these problems. The people affected should be able to tell the government what it means in real life to go from $275 a week to $214, to make the government understand how the bill would affect them in real life.

Especially since, with the reduction in the number of weeks of work required to qualify for UI, the end of the tunnel is welfare. What a great incentive.

My arguments are not only those of someone from eastern Quebec. They concern everyone in Quebec and Canada. Away from the centre every area will be affected by this and confronted to it. We must all join in condemning this government proposal and in seeing to it that changes are made.

We could assume that, perhaps, the government had no choice but to go about it this way. Perhaps there are financial constraints holding it back. But now this: a lower limit. It makes no sense. In the past, the contribution limit was $42,000 in salary. In the future, the limit will be $39,000. This means that highly paid workers, the higher middle class and highly paid workers will be contributing—listen to this—$900 million less to the UI fund.

This government claimed to be here to create jobs and help the jobless and those whose skills were not adequate for the labour market to find a job. So what did the government do? In its reform, one of its most regressive initiatives, it lowers the ceiling and, as a result, highly paid workers will be contributing $900 million less to the plan.

Do you know where the government will take the missing $900 million? In the pockets of new contributors, those who did not make contributions before, who will now have to work for 910 hours to qualify for benefits but who, while making contributions, if they work ten hours a week during 50 weeks, for a total of 500 hours in the year, will not be fully refunded.

These measures are unacceptable. The UI program may be in need of a reform. It might have been a good idea to set up an employment insurance system. The problem is that the government gave a nice label to a reform that only seeks to make cuts and help reduce the deficit. We are still wondering: if this is the contribution of UI claimants to help reduce the deficit, then what will others be made to contribute? What will be the Royal Bank's contribution, considering it made one billion dollars in profits last year. One billion is more than small change. It is more than the difference between weekly UI benefits of $275 and $214.

The government will have to show that it is also going to get money from those people. In the meantime, it must amend its reform and it must do so urgently. One wonders what prevented the government from introducing, before its reform or at least at the same time, a job creation policy or a regional economic diversification initiative. What prevented the government from showing people that it was going to take positive measures to ensure that regions such as eastern Quebec can get on the new technology express and fully adjust. Why did the current government not take such action?

Why is it bent on targeting only the most vulnerable people? It would have been nice to hear something like: "As regards our young people, we will, in certain regions, set up job creation programs that will allow them to gain a first year of solid experience, to develop their entrepreneurship, and to see if they want to become entrepreneurs".

Let us look at one of the five aspects of job creation dealing with self–employed workers. Basically, it is a very good program permitting someone on UI to start a business. Interesting experiments have been tried under this program. But now, with the 910 hour requirement for first time applicants, a lot of people are going to be left out in the cold. But, if these people were eligible to UI, they could put forward a business plan, start their own business and eventually take some pressure off the unemployment insurance system instead of remaining dependent on it.

It seems to me that this reform lacks originality, initiative, and the new ideas which might have been put on the table and which we would have hoped to see in here, especially after nearly two years of consultation. This is another part of the reform that should be scrutinized.

Last year, I toured Canada with the human resources committee. We went across Canada to find out what kind of reform people wanted. Nowhere did I hear: "The number of hours to become eligible to UI benefits should be increased, seasonal worker benefits should be diminished". Nowhere in Canada did I hear this kind of thing.

However, I was told, for example: "True, there might be some economic problems in certain areas; some things have to be fixed, and we must be given the means to do it". But, do not present us with a fait accompli, as the government is doing.

What kind of effect is this going to have on regional economy? Take the Maritimes, for example; those of you who represent ridings in Atlantic Canada, figure it out: three years from now, all your seasonal workers will be down to 50 per cent only. They speak in terms of 20–week periods. A 20–week period does not mean a reduction of one per cent a year, it means a reduction of one per cent of the salary each time one receives unemployment insurance benefits for 20 weeks. Therefore, in three years, there will be 5 per cent less benefits paid in the regions.

The spinoffs of that will not be job creation but quite the opposite. When jobs are created, another more convenience store opens somewhere and another service job is offered to someone. But these cuts produce the opposite. There will be less money in our economy so there will be less jobs of that kind, there will be more people on welfare, through one program or another, and more people will leave the region.

Instead of breaking the vicious circle that leads to an exodus from the regions, measures like this will tighten it and the result will the opposite of what is expected. This reminds me of the disheartening experience I had last year somewhere in Newfoundland, in an employment centre, where I found a document in a display case. It was a Human Resources Development Canada document that encouraged people to move, to give up and to go live somewhere else. That does not ensure the future of a country, be it Quebec or Canada. A healthy country is one which capitalizes on its resources and develops them and one which gives recognition to people who work.

If seasonal workers are blamed for the situation their industry is in and for the fact that they cannot work for a longer period, the mid term consequence will be a lack of manpower in part time industries. The tourist industry already has that kind of problem. I can tell you the new plan will only make it worse and will further widen the incredible gap existing between available jobs and unemployed workers who do not have the skills and training to fill those jobs. The hon. member for Mercier has moved the motion before us because of this whole reform.

The government, through massive UI cuts, limits access to the program and sets goals that are the very opposite of those we should have in a society such as ours and our society should be judged by, that is the best use possible of its human resources.

The current Liberal government perpetuates the ways of the previous government it ousted. People voted for change, but the government has fallen back into the same old ways. It is high time you woke up, and swept out the bureaucrats that come up with such proposals for cabinet. You have to get rid of them, because the current government will be judged not necessarily on the way the richer people are allowed to prosper and the more talented are allowed to perform, but rather on the way it ensures that society reaches its full potential, that all Canadians can make a useful contribution and be proud of what they are doing in building something worthwhile together.

If you continue to penalize the people in this way, you will achieve the exact opposite of what you are looking for.

I challenge the government to let the Standing Committee on Human Resource Development travel to Atlantic Canada and throughout Canada, even to the large urban areas, to talk to the people and realize that seasonal workers are not the only ones who will be affected by the decrease in benefits. The government has now decided to clip the wings of the workers who are in the 20 to 30 year age group and who have not had the opportunities that we have had, and that is totally unacceptable.

So, if the government wants to check if its reform makes a lot of sense and if it does not believe the points I just made, it only has to talk to the people to find out what they think. You will see that it will come back with a totally different reform than the one now before the House.

I hope that the Liberal government will take advantage of the holiday season to reflect on this, propose changes and ensure that Quebecers and Canadians can continue to be proud of the balance between the citizens, and realize that the future does not depend on development in big cities, on a lower unemployment rate in Montreal and Toronto, but on the premise that Canadians and their families from sea to sea to sea are satisfied and happy with what they are contributing to.

I think the government has tabled something that needs to be reviewed. That is why the House should condemn the government for its cuts to the unemployment insurance program. This should be in particular the responsibility of the members, who might have reviewed the reform a little in their caucus and may have had the time to express some points. Today, we will see if the members, especially those from the Maritimes, stand for the Liberal Party or for the people they represent.

[English]

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to question the statements made by the member to the House. I suspect he might have selectively read from the reform, rather than reading it from one end to the other.

The hon. member asked a question about the whole issue of incentives for employment and for job creation. He indicated in his speech that he could not see any incentives. I want to ask him about that because I have difficulty understanding that he read this document.

I see items such as $800 million being put into specific programs to encourage employment. I look at wage subsidies to encourage employers to hire people, particularly those who need to be trained. I look at earning supplements to top up wages to encourage people to get back into the workforce rather than having to collect benefits.

The hon. member talked about the self–employment initiative program. That was in UI. It continues to be in the UI reform. It is an excellent program which is going to create a lot of employment. The hon. member suggested that people would not be able to use it because they would not be able to get onto the program. In fact, half a million people who were not eligible for the program because they were part time workers are now going to be eligible for the program.

The member keeps going on that there are no incentives. People are going to be rewarded for every hour they work and for every effort they make. The benefits are based on hours worked, not on weeks. A whole series of things in this reform encourage people to work. It gives them the incentive to work. It gives them financial support to work.

• (1325)

The hon. member totally ignores those things. He fails to look at those parts of the employment insurance reform which will result in opportunities for people to get a job. The fact is that this is all taking place within a financial context which he totally wants to ignore. He will not look at those things.

My question to the hon. member is very specific. Why do you ignore those things in the UI reform? Why do you ignore the $800 million which is being added to the $1.9 billion that already exists to create employment not only in English Canada but in your province of Quebec as well? Why are you ignoring those things? Why will you not talk about those things? Why will you not admit—

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask that questions be put through the Chair, not directly to the member.

[Translation]

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, my first response to this remark is this, and I think it is important. The member asked me why we have not read the reform proposal from cover to cover, why we do not have all the details.

There is a contradiction between the member and his government. The government has used closure to limit the debate to three hours on Monday. It is muzzling us because it does not want a real debate on this bill at second reading. It is doing that because it wants to hide this reform before the Christmas holidays, so that we will have to go home without having had the time to show Canadians that it is unacceptable.

About the $800 million, it is obvious that it is not $800 million at all since it is just money being transferred from the consolidated revenue fund and the unemployment insurance fund. The government has tried all week to confuse us on this issue, getting quite confused itself in the answers of the various ministers. It is certainly not today that it will succeed in convincing us.

I want to make a last comment. It is simple and obvious. Go back to your ridings to explain to the people that the 910 hour minimum requirement is reasonable. Ask your constituents if they think it is reasonable to require that people who participate in the unemployment insurance program for the first time work a minimum of 910 hours in order to become eligible. You will all come back with the same answer after the Christmas break, or maybe even next week.

Is it reasonable to require that these new workers—I am talking about our young people, about women who enter the job market, about immigrants who come to Canada—work a minimum of 910 hours when the previous requirement was 300 hours and when the highest requirement for people who are already contributing to the program is 700 hours? Is it reasonable to impose a 910 hour minimum requirement to those people to whom we claim to want to give an incentive to work, when it is obvious that this kind of measure will do exactly the opposite? We will see within a year that a vast majority of people will be discouraged. This will stimulate the underground economy and force Canadians onto welfare.

If the government has not understood that, it will have to make some adjustments; otherwise it will have to face a lot of angry people. As Gilles Vigneault once said, "it will have quite a storm on its hands".

[English]

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have great difficulty understanding why the Bloc does not want to look at the initiatives surrounding employment which are being brought forward by these reforms.

Are the Bloc members aware that the insurance program will cover 500,000 more people? Are they aware that the family income supplement will go to 350,000 low income families? Are they aware that 380,000 workers will have their premiums refunded? Some 2,700 workers will be eligible for two additional weeks of benefit. About 45,000 seasonal workers who currently are not eligible for UI will, despite making payments, become eligible under this new act.

Are they not interested in putting people back to work? Do they not see that this reform of ours on the employment side is doing just that? I ask the hon. member to tell me and tell the House why he and his party cannot see that these changes on the employment side will be very beneficial for the whole country.

[Translation]

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking the same question I asked the minister this morning. He said that there would be 500,000 more contributors to the program. We all know that there will be 500,000 more contributors, but what we want to know is how many of these 500,000 people will ever get benefits.

How many will pay and never benefit from the program? I am very surprised. Many of the questions we would like answers to are like this. Before the referendum, the government did not want to introduce this bill, because it had to be looked at carefully. Today, they are in a great hurry. They want us to pass this legislation on the double.

What is behind this new position of the government?

The Deputy Speaker: It being 1.30 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81, proceedings on the motion have expired.

Pursuant to an order made Wednesday, December 6, the business for the current supply period will be concluded on Monday, December 11 of this year at 6.30 p.m.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): moved that Bill C–323, an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (order of discharge), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on my Bill C–323. Prior to the last election I served as a probation officer and family court counsellor in the ministry of the British Columbia provincial attorney general. I served for over 20 years. I spent each day working with the Canadian Criminal Code and I learned firsthand the system's weaknesses and strengths. I also discovered the loopholes that aided offenders to walk when they should have been properly held to account. Far too often I saw justice not being served. The criminals were benefiting and the victims were not served. There was little neglected victims could do. Advancing the plight of victims of crime is one of the motivations for me to serve in the House.

When constituents in New Westminster—Burnaby elected me as their representative in 1993 I made a commitment to take a firm stand on behalf of the victims of crime. Whether changes to the Canadian Criminal Code or to some other statute, I promised something would be done to protect the public and to change the balance of the operation of the law to be more in favour of victims.

On May 1 of this year I had the distinct pleasure to introduce Bill C–323. Today there is even a greater satisfaction that the bill was deemed a votable item with a chance of becoming law. Small changes such as those in Bill C–323 may not sufficiently change the overall system to the way we would like but it certainly represents a good start.

Approximately a year and a half ago a Vancouver area lawyer approached me with a concern that a loophole in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act was enabling offenders to be relieved of their commitment to pay civil court judgments. It was a loophole that was causing victims further suffering. It was clear that a simple amendment to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act would eliminate the possibility for a person to use personal bankruptcy to escape from any owed damages awarded in civil court. Thus I have been working to bring forward my private member's bill.

When a person commits an assault or battery, a wilful act that harms another, the victims can sue for damages through a civil lawsuit. However, under the current BIA if the offender claims bankruptcy after being found liable in court the damages awarded to the victim are cleared, causing the victim to once again suffer hardship.

• (1335)

Subsection 178(1) of the Bankruptcy Act lists various things an order of discharge does not release a bankrupt person from. The law has long recognized there are some things that cannot be forgiven and will remain. It takes into account alimony, maintenance and support of a spouse or child, debt arising out of fraud, embezzlement or a fine, penalty or restitution order imposed by a criminal court in respect of an offence.

Therefore according to the way the act currently reads a bankrupt person cannot be relieved of paying a traffic fine yet can be relieved of paying damages for something like sexual assault. I do not think any member of the House would disagree that the statute must be changed as soon as possible. We must provide some appropriate balance.

In April I read an article in the Vancouver Province newspaper about Sherleen Hackett who was awarded $145,000 in damages for sexual abuse by her stepfather on June 28, 1991. Stepfather James Hackett was ordered to make payments of $500 a month. According to the article he made one full payment of $500, four payments of $100, and then filed for bankruptcy. It was as easy as that to turn the legal system on its head.

Allow me to cite several other examples so that those following can fully comprehend the severity of the fundamental flaw in this statute. Tammy Carr of White Rock, B.C. sued her stepfather for sexually assaulting her for six years and was awarded $42,513. Her stepfather, David Graham, filed for bankruptcy six months after the judgment. Payment to date: none.

Cynthia Shefford of Alexis Creek, B.C. was awarded $357,743 by a supreme court jury for the sexual abuse committed by her father, Leonard Klassen. The father was ordered to pay his daughter $500 a month for 12 years. Three months after the trial Klassen filed for bankruptcy. Payment to date: none. The amount of Shefford's award is the largest awarded in the country to date, but what good is it to have such a record amount if not a penny is received by the one who needs it most, the victim?

My bill would make a simple amendment to subsection 178(1) of the act, as part (a) of the act currently says that an order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from any fine, penalty, restitution order or other in similar nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order imposed by a court in respect of an offence or any debt arising out of a recognizance of bail.

Bill C–323 would make an addition to this part:

> An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from any damages in respect of an assault or battery awarded by a court pursuant to a judgment rendered in a civil proceeding and any interest on the damages before or after judgment ordered by the court or payable by law.

The amendment is a brief but fundamental change to the act. Not only would it strengthen the statute in legal terms, it would strengthen the public's view of the operation of Canada's justice system. Some of the imbalance and absurdity in law would be removed.

I do not think many Canadians know debtors may currently avoid substantial payment on sexual assault judgments by making an assignment in bankruptcy. However, as more and more people file their cases in the courts, public awareness will increase. The more our legal system gives the offender a loophole, the more disregard will arise.

If nothing is done to such a small section of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act the justice system as a whole will be in danger of being viewed as completely in disrepute. The sad thing is Canadians already look at our justice system and think it is not reflective of them.

One need look only at the Young Offenders Act to see examples of ineffectiveness. The government continues to claim what it is doing will save lives and make Canadians feel more safe. In the last two years the Liberal government has made several changes to the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act, and yet my constituents still complain to me they feel afraid to walk the streets.

The government says these changes need time to be implemented but I believe it knows that all the time in the world to discuss and defer will make absolutely no difference to the crime statistics. The criminal law changes made so far by the government are anaemic and do not sufficiently respond to the desires of mainstream Canadian values.

• (1340)

The situation is similar to that with intersections and street lights. Before a municipality will put up a street light at a busy intersection it waits for a certain number of serious accidents to occur. If no accidents occur, it is believed a street light is not needed. Usually someone has to die first.

Therefore a responsible government would address a problem before it gets out of control. The amendment in my bill should have been introduced years ago or at least near the time that such cases were coming before the courts.

This is the job of federal departments. There are legal experts who must know the bankruptcy act inside and out. They knew there were loopholes in subsection 178 for years but until now nobody has addressed them.

In 1992 British Columbia's legislature took a lead with this issue by amending its own limitation act. The amendment removed any limitation period for bringing action for damages for sexual assault. This is interesting in that the issue was addressed in a provincial legislature in 1992 and yet it takes the federal government another three years to address it at the federal level.

The government is not in the vicinity of the eight ball at all. It has not recognized as a matter of urgent priority those victims suffering because of legislative inadequacy.

In 1994 an ad hoc committee of women for reform of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act submitted a discussion paper on why subsection 178(1) needs to be amended. I will summarize some of the benefits it believes will result by amending the act.

It avoids a negative public perception regarding the impact of bankruptcy on sexual assault judgments and consequent disrepute of the act. It sends a clear message to sexual abusers that the act cannot be used to avoid payments as a result of judgments.

It deters abusers by eliminating a means of escaping the cost to be paid for sexual abuse. It provides greater certainty for victims, the courts, trustees in bankruptcy and the superintendent.

It provides a greater likelihood that victims who are able to realize civil judgments will be able to pay for their own treatment and will be less likely to be dependent on an already overburdened social services resources.

It provides consistency with current federal initiatives to lessen the burden on the social safety net. Abusers will be made to bear the costs of the victims' recovery process rather than society as a whole or the victims themselves.

A lawyer friend of mine who suggested the amendment has been pressing both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Industry to make such changes that I have included in my bill.

I will read a letter the Minister of Industry sent to my friend on April 6, 1995:

> My colleague, the honourable Minister of Justice, recently sent me a copy of your letter of August 16, 1994 recommending that the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act be amended to include awards of damages in serious assault cases among those not released by a discharge in bankruptcy. I regret the delay in replying to you.
> Your letter is quite timely, as I am now considering a number of possible BIA amendments to be included in a bill targeted for introduction later in the spring or in the fall. Among the amendments under consideration is one along the lines you have proposed. Your letter argues strongly in favour of such an amendment, and it will be given due consideration.

Thank you for bringing your concerns to the government's attention.

On November 24, 1995 the Minister of Industry introduced Bill C–109, which included amendments to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, including a change to subsection 178(1). I applaud the minister for his recent initiative. I wish the change could have come about sooner, but I understand the minister wanted to make many amendments to the act besides my proposal.

On page 61 of Bill C–109 and carrying over to page 62, there is a small section that reads:

Subsection 178(1) of the act is amended by adding the following after paragraph (a): (a.1) any award of damages by a court in civil proceedings in respect of an assault;

The minister's bill finally attempts to fill in the loophole, but I am suggesting my wording is better. The government bill deals only with the word assault, which is from the Criminal Code. My bill deals with both assault and the purely civil tort created from the historical term battery.

It also deals with interest on moneys on such civil awards, which the government bill overlooks. I am also now suggesting that in view of further advice, the term interest on moneys awarded should apply to the whole section 178, not just to the assault award section as suggested.

In addition, the bill should include the term wrongful death.

• (1345)

Currently the government bill envisions that an assaulter will not be cleared of civil liability damages and bankruptcy, but if the assault is serious enough to eventually cause death then the offender becomes free. The inherent message is for the perpetrator to do more harm and actually kill the victim. Then the civil liabilities will not survive the bankruptcy. That angle must also be covered.

I have discussed these provisions with the minister. I will be looking for some positive moves from him in the next week. He should publicly promise to approve the appropriate clauses of Bill C–109 so that perhaps I might find it acceptable to withdraw my bill and have the government fully take over my initiative.

So far the minister has appeared co–operative and open to discussions. I compliment him for bringing Bill C–109 forward. It is a technical clean–up of many outdated sections of the old statute which was based on reviews and consultations that were started by the Conservative government of the last Parliament. The minister has appropriately built on that beginning and we look forward to speedy passage. I hope I will be able to report to Parliament that as legislators we will get this thing done.

Victims of crime should wear no political label. I commemorated again for our party on December 6 the national tragedy of the murder of the 14 women from Montreal. The 14 roses on display in the Commons lobby on December 6 were a sober reminder of the obligation of Parliament and what it owes to victims of all kinds from every region of the country.

The platitudes have reached high levels in the House for years now about the remembrance of December 6. Yet little in actual legislation has been passed that directly uplifts the plight of victims. However, with my bill we have a practical and concrete chance to act positively. We will see if the Liberals social philosophy can measure up to the expectations of mainstream Canadian values and the hopes and aspirations of Canadians even from an ignored British Columbia.

I am being very direct in my comments, for the hopes of hurting children and grandparents were dashed by uncaring Liberals on the justice committee this week when a private member's bill from the member for Mission—Coquitlam granting grandparents legal standing in divorce courts was summarily dismissed. It was shot down by the government after many brave Liberal backbenchers dared defy cabinet signals on the bill and actually voted for change. They voted for the real people's agenda. They voted for the people. Then the top down Liberal mindset took over and the old style political games were played by the government against the hopes of ordinary people.

Here we have it again: Liberal members not supporting victims. They cannot deny it. Their jaws are quivering, but their votes are now forever part of the parliamentary record. The pattern runs deep with them. It has been allowed to run too long for our country's well–being.

Can one wonder when I reflect the cynicism about government from my constituents? They feel government is something done to them rather than for them. In mock amazement the justice minister said to me on national television that I was too cynical when I recounted to him a few of the missed justice system reforms that he as the minister had chosen not to pursue. I cannot be too hard on him. After all he has an educational handicap in that he is a lawyer.

Here is another initiative placed right in the lap of the Liberals, private member's Bill C–323. This measure is not supposed to be handled in a partisan manner. The country is watching. I hope the House will get it right this time and fully support the kind of initiative I have brought forward to help victims of crime and have perpetrators pay for and restore what they have done. Let us have offenders directly accountable to victims.

I am encouraged that uncharacteristically of Liberals the Minister of Industry might not be as misguided as the justice minister when it comes to being in touch with mainstream Canadian values. We all know how good people can become rather strange when they acquire an extensive legal education and then call themselves lawyers. This minister seems reasonable enough to spread the credit around and advance the people's agenda rather than merely a Liberal agenda. In view of the early signals I have received from the Minister of Industry, I am hopeful that my bill, or more correctly the people's measures, will get to the next stage.

I urge members to dig deep, overcome themselves, be generous of spirit and support a good idea. I am also calling upon the Minister of Industry to give the proposals most serious consideration.

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C-323, an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

• (1350)

It has been two weeks since the Minister of Industry introduced Bill C-109, an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act.

The bill contains more than 70 amendments to the BIA. The amendments fine tune the laws regarding commercial bankruptcy and introduce new features involving consumer bankruptcy. The legislation has been designed to assist Parliament in its three-year review of the BIA.

The House welcomed the opportunity to look at the bankruptcy laws in more detail. After all, Canada's bankruptcy laws must protect the interests of borrowers, lenders, insolvent practitioners and government. These interests are so varied and complex that over the decades bankruptcy laws have been very difficult to reform.

Bankruptcy laws are an integral part of the framework legislation that established the rules of the marketplace in which buyers, sellers, lenders and borrowers can make transactions with confidence that the law will treat them fairly.

Among the issues covered in Bill C-109 was the treatment of court fines in assault cases in the event of bankruptcy. The government proposed that people who had been accused of sexual or physical assault should not be able to turn to bankruptcy as a way of avoiding penalties imposed by the civil courts. Fines for physical or sexual assaults become non-dischargeable in the event of bankruptcy under Bill C-109.

The legislation is now before the House and when it is in front of the committee, the committee will have the opportunity to study it in detail and to make appropriate amendments.

One such amendment should be the proposal before us today, that section 178 which lists non-dischargeable debts also includes the following:

> —any damages in respect of an assault or battery awarded by a court pursuant to a judgment rendered in a civil proceeding and interest on the damages before or after judgment ordered by the court or payable by law.

The key difference between Bill C-109 and Bill C-323 is the addition in the hon. member's bill of including interest on damages as part of the non-dischargeable portion of a bankruptcy debt. This is an excellent amendment. I commend the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby for it.

I would like to see the same principle applied to all categories listed in section 178, not just the assault cases. I would prefer to see the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act amended so that either the interest issue is addressed specifically in each category or, conversely, have it addressed generically so that it is clear that it applies to all categories listed in section 178.

I do not believe debate on a private member's bill is the most appropriate place to make these changes. All of us are concerned about the efficient allocation of House time and I would rather see the issue discussed in committee when it reviews Bill C-109. That being said, I congratulate the hon. member for his worthwhile contribution to the amendment of Canada's bankruptcy laws.

Too often in the House we fail to acknowledge the perceptiveness and integrity of suggestions that come from the other side of the floor. Perhaps this is one reason Canadians have become impatient and cynical about politicians. They see us perform during question period. They are witness to the bickering and sniping that show politics at its worst.

What Canadians do not see in the clips from question period that make the nightly TV news is that behind the scenes and in committee there is a common purpose among members of the House. We are working hard to make things better for Canadians.

Perhaps we ought to make more of an effort to congratulate one another in public. Behind the curtains we often have a kind word for our colleagues on the other side of the floor. Sometimes we will ruefully congratulate them on a political point well scored. The time has come for us to acknowledge without shame when members across the floor come up with good ideas that ought to be a part of government policy.

This is one such occasion. I commend the hon. member for his work on bankruptcy reform. I look forward to hearing what he will have to say to the committee if he agrees the committee is a more suitable forum for his ideas to be discussed.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the bill introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I listened carefully to the hon. member's arguments. Members with whom I spoke in the Bloc Quebecois, and I personally, are in favour of this amendment. It is clear that individuals who are ordered in civil court to pay damages in respect of an assault or battery or any another act that could lead to a conviction in civil court, should not be able to shirk their responsibilities by declaring bankruptcy.

Like our government colleague, I think this amendment to the Bankruptcy Act is admissible and useful.

There is also the aspect of interest payments which may be useful in an amendment to the bill introduced by the minister on the same subject.

However, I was less inclined to appreciate the arguments presented by the hon. member to justify his amendment. I agree there is a problem. In Canada, individuals convicted in civil court of causing damage as a result of violent acts or sexual abuse should not be allowed to escape the consequences of their actions. However, I think the hon member—and this is just a comment—was putting his amendment in a rather negative context.

There was a lot of talk about crime, a list of people convicted of sexual abuse or acts of violence was mentioned, cases were cited, and so forth. Perhaps the climate in my riding, in my region, and even elsewhere in Quebec is not quite the same, but I have not met many people in my area who are afraid to go out at night for fear of being assaulted or abused. These things can happen, of course, but they are not so widespread that they can be used as arguments to justify otherwise quite worthwhile amendments.

The hon. government member also noted that, last November, the Minister of Industry tabled in this House a bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act. This bill is much broader than the amendment proposed by the hon. member because it kind of overhauls the Bankruptcy Act. Like the hon. member who spoke before me, I did notice that there is an identical clause in the bill introduced by the Minister of Industry and in the bill presented by our colleague from the Reform Party today.

I even think that, had it realized this sooner, the committee in charge of determining which bills shall be considered as votable items might have decided that this bill was redundant in light of the minister's bill.

When I went over clause 105, a little paragraph further down caught my eye. It has nothing to do with this debate, but I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are quite lenient on the issue of relevance. I do not know if my colleague from the Reform Party saw this paragraph that makes it more difficult for students who are out of school but are unable to find a job to declare bankruptcy.

• (1400)

They are told they cannot do so within two years of finishing their courses. This is, I feel, an aspect which merits attention perhaps. I wanted to bring it up here in the House, and my party will debate it when the time comes. I believe that, after all of the Reform member's justifiable severity concerning people getting out of their responsibilities after a civil judgment, he ought to focus the same amount of energy on the student situation in order to determine whether there is a problem. We know that in Canada, and in Quebec, my region in particular, getting into the work force is a huge problem for students.

I feel therefore, that in the bill to be introduced by the Minister—I know I am not in order, but I feel this will have to be examined carefully. It is all very fine to want to be strict, to want to see people pay their debts, but one still needs to have a proper understanding of the situation. My colleague has justifiably pointed out that people found guilty in civil suits ought not to be exempted.

Looking at the student situation, however, we become aware that the minister's bill is very severe, considering that at the present time the job market for young people in Canada is very bad, and when it comes right down to it, one realizes the amendments proposed by the minister are unfavourably biased against students. A student who is unable to pay his debts after graduation is judged initially as in some way guilty of fraudulent intent in not wanting to repay his government loans. This is, I feel, not the case for the large majority of students. The bulk of young people forced to declare bankruptcy at the end of their studies do so because they really cannot pay.

Certainly there are some people who will take advantage of such possibilities to commit fraud. However, as was said this morning concerning the whole unemployment insurance issue, when a system is put into place there are always some people who will try to cheat, but it is my belief that not everyone using the system ought to be tarred with the same brush as the dishonest few.

I hope that the government will take this into consideration when the time comes to examine this legislation, particularly since the unemployment insurance reform will mean that students who have terminated their studies will be hit hard by that as well. We realize that a student completing school and finding a first job will have to work 910 hours in order to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Lots of students today are on contract, and it is rare that anyone gets 910 hours in one go. Young people will not qualify. If they cannot qualify, they cannot pay their student loans. If they cannot pay their student loans, they will have difficulty meeting their obligations. Under the amendments to the Bankruptcy Act the minister has tabled, young people will not be able to pay and therefore will not be able to declare bankruptcy and will be unable to pay. It is not clear where they will end up.

In any case, I hope that, when the committee reviews the legislation, it will look carefully at the amendment the member proposed, because I think it is acceptable, but I hope it will also look at other aspects of the legislation, which are tightening and toughening up the system. Basically, Canada's entire social system is becoming harsher. It is our whole way of looking at our young people in school and people having difficulty finding a job.

Our whole approach, that of Canadians and of Quebecers, is getting tougher. We accept the situation, because it is always being presented in the light of our difficult economic situation, but still, in such a situation, things have to be taken into account, as I suggested my colleague should have done in connection with the whole issue of crime and its control through more severe measures.

We have to take things into account as well in our attitude toward Canadians and Quebecers who need a little more support from the government in times of greater economic difficulty. I thank you for having tolerated my wandering slightly off the topic of debate.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise on behalf of the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to speak in support of Bill C–323, an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (order of discharge).

I begin my remarks by congratulating my Reform Party caucus colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, on the fine job he has done in bringing this legislative proposal forward for the consideration of the House. In my view, all members of the House should be quick to rally in support of this bill.

Very simply, the changes to the bankruptcy laws being proposed by my colleague would prevent persons from declaring bankruptcy in order to escape paying civil damages for an assault or battery they have been found to have committed by a Canadian court. Clearly, Canadians want the members of the House to support changes in our laws that will protect the victims of crime in our society.

Canadians have demanded measures that will address the damage done by violence in our homes, our streets and our playgrounds. We on this side of the House were elected on a mandate to bring changes to the criminal justice system. The wave of support for the Reform Party of Canada which swept across the west in the last election is based on the demand by the Canadian electorate for changes in the way our society deals with crime and, in particular, violent crime.

I take this opportunity to give fair warning to the Liberals that this wave of support for the Reform Party of Canada will sweep across the nation in the next federal election. I have no doubt about it.

The efforts of my colleague will not go unnoticed by Canadians. He has introduced a private member's bill which seeks to add civil damages awarded in respect of an assault or battery to the debts listed in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act which cannot be released by the act. Again, I congratulate my fellow British Columbian for his efforts on behalf of all Canadians and the Reform Party of Canada.

Canadians know that the Liberals have proposed changes to the bankruptcy laws of our country. Canadians are aware of the gutless and poor legislation the Liberal Minister of Industry has presented in the House. In true Liberal Party fashion the government is ramming the changes to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act through the House on a fast track like it has with so many other bills.

Bill C–109, the weak and cowardly Liberal government changes to our country's bankruptcy laws, was introduced and read for the first time on November 24, 1995. It was read the second time on November 28, 1995. That is four days later, for the Liberals across the floor who are counting the days on their calendars. Bill C–109 will become another bright light on the Christmas tree of Liberal red book broken promises. Bill C–109 will be rocketed through the House like a missile, with no debate, or as little as possible, no amendments, no regrets and no apologies.

Bill C–96 creates a new department for the federal government. The creation of a new department is a far cry from the demands of Canadians to reduce the size of government. The new department is exempt from having to submit an annual report. The books are being hidden by the Liberals.

Bill C–101 is another bill debated in the House. It was a collection of weak and ineffective changes to the Railway Act. That bill was so far from what stakeholders in the industry wanted that it was worthless.

Bill C–107 was another great debate for the Liberals. It was cast in stone. It could not be changed, not one word. There was nothing to debate. The Liberals passed it in a matter of days, patted each other on the back and congratulated the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for all the hard work he had done to steer the bill through the House.

Canadians are absolutely amazed by Bill C–62. It is so seriously flawed the Liberal minister is scrambling to make changes to the bill even before it gets sent to committee.

If the Liberals care to pay any attention to my warning of their fate in the next election then they should endorse my colleague's bill. Bill C–323 will go a long way in fighting violent crime in our society. The victims of these crimes need the resources it takes to recover from the violence that has been committed against them. The perpetrators of these violent acts are using the country's bankruptcy laws as a convenient tool to get away with their crimes.

Do the Liberals really want to be known as the political party that stands 100 per cent in support of the segment of society that uses violence as a response to events in their lives? Do the Liberals really want to be known as the political party having the guts to stand up to the perpetrators of violence? Or do members of the House want to be known for saying to perpetrators of violence: "You cannot hurt someone and just walk away". This has to be said to those who beat up on women, to those who punch smaller persons, to those who sexually violate another human being, including children.

That is what Bill C–323 is asking us to do. It is asking us to deal with bullies. It is asking us to stand up for those who have been hit by a bully. This is elementary. This bill is trying to put on the statute books something that we all learned in the school yard.

The Liberals have already chosen not to do what this bill is asking. I hope that people watching me right now will pick up a pen and write down on a piece of paper Bill C–323, then go to their phone book, look up the phone number of their Liberal member of Parliament and phone him or her. Tell them that you want to register your vote as a yes for Bill C–323 on your behalf. This is to make sure that bullies are punished.

I am willing to put politics aside on this one. We need to protect the people in society who have been victims of violence. We are talking about violent acts which have been proven to be committed. Courts have decided how much the person perpetrating the violence owes the victim. The aggressor laughs at the court order, declares bankruptcy and walks away from the terrible damage done by the violent action. The victim who is probably already paying high medical bills, losing time off work or is being affected in any number of sad, tragic ways, can do nothing. They are stripped of their ability to recover because some smart lawyer has figured out a way to exonerate the client from having to pay for an act of violence.

I cannot believe that on behalf of my constituents I am standing here today and literally begging the Liberals to listen. I am asking them, on humanitarian grounds, to support something that is so basic that any Canadian with an ounce of morals or integrity would support it.

Most Canadians would be surprised to know that those committing violent acts can get off scot free through the bankruptcy laws. Any self–respecting Canadian would say: "Let's put a stop to that today".

Canadians cannot believe that the Liberals ignored the chance to do something about this situation with the proposed changes to the bankruptcy laws. The Reform Party's private member bill, C–323, has been on the Order Paper since last spring. The Liberals knew it existed. They chose not to include this idea in their amending bill introduced just last month. This is shameful. This is embarrassing. Canadians are very disappointed.

• (1415)

I am the national defence critic for the Reform Party of Canada. I have served in the Canadian Armed Forces. As a matter of fact I am still on the supplementary reserve list.

The Canadian Armed Forces is famous throughout the world for standing up to bullies. We did this for 30 years in Cyprus. We are peacekeepers. We are known for having a fair and just society. We are admired for our willingness to take our notion of right and wrong to virtually every corner of the planet and assist in keeping peace, preventing bullies from hitting on people and getting away with it.

I am proud to support Bill C–323. The Reform Party of Canada is proud of my colleague's bill. The people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, whom I represent, are proud to have me speak in favour of the bill.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak to the private member's bill put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

This legislation is a clear example of a good idea whose time has come. In fact, the idea of amending the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act so that people who have been accused of sexual and physical assault cannot use bankruptcy as a way of avoiding penalties imposed by the civil courts has also been raised by government legislation.

Bill C–109 was introduced a couple of weeks ago. Under it, fines for physical and sexual assault become non–dischargeable in the event of bankruptcy. The legislation before us takes this idea one step further and it is a good step. Under Bill C–323 the pre– and post–judgment interest on awards would also be non–dischargeable. I want to commend the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby for his foresight in closing this loophole. This is an excellent amendment to the laws regarding bankruptcy.

The hon. member's bill inadvertently opens another loophole. Section 178 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act refers to a number of instances where debts are non–dischargeable. Among them are alimony payments, child support and fraud.

In cases where the courts award pre– and post–judgment interest in these other circumstances, I do not think the bankrupt should be able to escape these obligations simply by declaring bankruptcy. Nor do I think this was the intention of the hon. member when he tabled this legislation.

The bill after all seeks social justice. It is an endeavour to make sure that those who have incurred debts and interest charges by order of the court cannot escape their obligations by declaring bankruptcy.

I am certain that if the hon. member had the opportunity to redraft the legislation, he would do so in a way that would close down the loopholes for the bankrupts listed in section 178. I would suggest to him that the surest way of having his recommendation adopted would be to withdraw Bill C–323 and resubmit his proposal as an amendment to Bill C–109 now at second reading.

I am convinced that the amendment will be welcomed by the committee. We have already heard expressions of support from both sides of the House. We all know that the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby has hit upon an excellent idea and a worthy amendment and we all want to see it incorporated in law as soon as possible.

That is why I support the principle of Bill C–323 but I cannot support the bill as it now stands. I encourage the hon. member to withdraw Bill C–323 and present its substance as an amendment to Bill C–109 at committee. There it will be incorporated into a bill that has been designed to address the broad spectrum of both consumer and corporate issues that relate to bankruptcy.

Many of the amendments to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act contained in Bill C–109 are aimed at redressing an imbalance between consumer debtors and their creditors. The legislation puts more pressure on debtors to rehabilitate and to act more responsibly by repaying their debts. For example, as we have discussed in the House before, most consumer bankrupts are discharged nine months after bankruptcy. Even if they start obtaining surplus income, it is costly for creditors to get back what they are owed.

• (1420)

Under Bill C–109 consumer debtors will be required to remit a portion of their surplus income, the income which exceeds the minimum cost of living. The creditor will not have to go to the courts to receive his due.

The legislation also covers student loans. Some students have declared personal bankruptcy upon graduation as a means of discharging their student loans. Under the new law, students will continue to be able to declare bankruptcy but their student loans will not be discharged for another 24 months.

Under the new amendments, insolvent spouses may submit a joint proposal for bankruptcy. This will help save time, cut costs and streamline the process. Former spouses will no longer be able to use the bankruptcy laws as an easy way to get out of making support payments. Spousal and child support payments become provable priority claims.

The legislation also contains measures to ensure that low income families will not lose their GST credit refunds. Such refunds will be exempted from seizure in the event of a bankruptcy.

All these are good amendments. Among the good amendments is the proposal to ensure that people who have been accused of sexual or physical assault do not use bankruptcy as a way of avoiding penalties imposed by the civil courts.

The hon. member has added a very useful amendment to this last provision. I look forward to discussions in committee on it if he is willing to withdraw his bill.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all laws passed by Parliament are designed to deal with inefficiencies and injustices created by free and voluntary interactions among people. Canada's Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act is no exception.

People dealing honestly and with the best of intentions borrow money from others in order to establish businesses or carry them over periods of temporary insolvency. In this world of uncertainty, occasionally the best made plans of borrowers go wrong. They are unable to meet the repayment schedules to which they have committed themselves.

Historically, creditors used to have powerful instruments of coercion to assure that debtors make every effort to repay their debts. The stories of debtor prisons are the stuff of Dickens' novels. They have done much to influence our thinking about the injustices involved in the old, harsh methods of dealing with debtors.

These attitudes are that debtors unable to pay their debts are in trouble for reasons beyond their control. They typically are poor and need to be protected from rich creditors. Moreover, it is not in the interests of society that individuals who have hit a streak of bad luck should be stigmatized for life and forever unable to get back into business or even just mainstream life. The conditions described in Dickens' novels were that the poor were stripped of everything. They were stigmatized. Indeed those were bad times and some changes were needed.

The existing Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act reflects social attitudes. It makes it possible for individuals to declare bankruptcy to escape the social and economic penalties that historically were imposed on debtors. In Canada and in most industrialized countries today, debtors can clean the slate, walk away from past mistakes and start all over again by the simple act of asking courts to declare them bankrupt.

Canadians believe generally that these rules are desirable and create a better society. They also believe that bankruptcy itself and the stigma attached to having declared bankruptcy are sufficient deterrents to abuse of the privileges granted under the law.

• (1425)

I might note that there are significant differences between countries. I understand that in the United States, some successful businessmen who today are millionaires brag about the fact that they have been bankrupt at least two or three times. One of the significant cultural differences in the United States, Canada and Europe is that we typically do not have these kinds of entrepreneurs that go around saying it was quite all right to have been bankrupt a couple of times.

Mr. Forseth: They have no shame.

Mr. Grubel: My colleague whispers into my ear that they have no shame. I personally think this is reflective of a more dynamic, risk taking society which has all kinds of benefits for creating wealth and generally raising the income of citizens. However, there are always excesses.

As is the case with so many well–intentioned laws, this law on bankruptcy has been shown to have a number of unintended consequences. This law is subject to increasing abuse, especially as the memory of the disgrace of debtor prisons and social ostracism are receding from the public conscience.

Bill C–323, the amendment to the bankruptcy act introduced by my Reform Party colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, is aimed at curbing one of the unintended consequences of what otherwise is a well–intentioned good act. If accepted it would reduce the ability of individuals to escape responsibility for the payment of fines which have been imposed by civil courts in response to damages caused by violence, typically against women.

The intention of the existing legislation clearly was not to open bankruptcy as an avenue which could be used by violent offenders to escape the penalty which society through court actions has imposed on them. This private member's bill is consistent with public sentiment on this subject. I support it and urge members of this House to pass it.

The proposed legislation continues to protect innocent victims of bankruptcy from the historic, often unjust and socially undesirable consequences of excessive penalties. Making sure the perpetrators of violent acts against people are duly convicted in a court of law and required to pay a fine is not equivalent to bringing back debtor prisons. It is a necessary and in my view highly desirable act that would restore equity and would close a loophole in the existing law.

I have every confidence in the ability of those entrusted with carrying out the intent of this act to distinguish between cases where bankruptcy is designed to escape responsibility and where it is the result of genuine bad luck. The risk of mistakes in such decisions is worth the social benefit in terms of greater equity envisaged by the designer of this bill. I urge that his ideas receive the assent they deserve.

The Deputy Speaker: I wonder if we might agree not to see the clock until the next member has finished his submission. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the speech of the hon. member for Capilano—Howe Sound who said how different our culture and our attitudes are toward bankruptcy. I do not believe that is the case.

For example, members of the Reichmann family, in the pursuit of some of their objectives not only within Canada but also internationally, used the protection of chapter 11 of the United States and also our own creditors arrangement act. Many of our countrymen are alarmed and curious to understand how it was possible, after all the smoke had cleared from that period of time in our history, that over 2,500 employees of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce had lost their jobs, but at the same time many of the executive staff were promoted and that today the Reichmann family still has partial ownership of Canary Wharf. These are the people that my Reform colleagues would like to support, I suppose.

I will now move into the area of this bill. It was a very honourable presentation by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. Rather than take the time of the House today, I can state that it was never the intention that this act be abused by people trying to escape societal obligations. I believe it is very appropriate that the member bring forward this legislation at this time.

The question seems to be whether it is appropriate that this bill go forward. Another bill is currently being debated, Bill C–109, a government bill, which overlaps and has some similarities to this bill. When I try to compare these two bills, I discover that their differences are twofold. One is that the member's bill talks about assault and battery, whereas the minister's bill talks simply of assault.

My reading of the word assault would include the definition of the word battery. I do not believe that is a significant difference between Bill C–109 and the private member's bill.

The other difference, as I understand it, is that the hon. member includes the concept of interest related to awards or judgments in the area of assault and battery. That would be different from the existing bill of the minister.

I am not a lawyer, but I understand in law that when we specify in one aspect of the bill a specific such as interest, that by definition a judge will assume that we meant interest only in that area and that some of the other areas of the bill would not have interest judgments attached to them. As a consequence, I believe we need to either amend the existing legislation in Bill C–109 which talks about interest, so that we are clear that interest is included in all the categories, or we need to delete the interest adjustment aspect from the member's bill.

The bill presented by the member is a good one and deserves the support of the House, but it is a matter of time allocation. This House is very busy. We have been putting through a lot of legislation recently and I am sure the government has much more legislation to present in the new year. We have to find a way in which we can do this efficiently.

It seems to me that the most efficient way to handle the matter would be for the member to move an amendment to Bill C–109 at committee stage. Indeed, I would be happy to support the member in that initiative.

Today I would have to say that I have to oppose the bill, not because I oppose it in principle, not at all. I support the initiatives of the member. I would oppose it simply on the grounds of time allocation.

I believe there are many members on this side of the House that would support the initiatives of the member to bring forward amendments to Bill C–109 during committee stage, dealing with the aspect of interest.

The Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

QUEBEC'S RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, in accordance with international law, recognize Quebec's inalienable right to choose its political destiny and consequently its right to self-determination.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sorely tempted to dedicate my speech to the member for Kingston and the Islands. You will understand how proud I am to make this speech, because constitutional dialogue requires a discussion, not of a distinct society but rather of what is as plain as the nose on our face, what is an accepted fact and a sociological reality: Quebec is a nation.

As you know, when international law recognizes the right to self-determination, the holders of that right are individuals who together are characterized as a people and form a nation.

First and foremost, let me state that on this side we are totally convinced that Quebec is indeed a nation, which is to say it has its own vernacular, controls its territory, has its own legal system, and possesses a proud history which is the focus for its collective feeling of belonging. Obviously, there is a fifth element in Quebec's right to self-determination, a collective desire for it.

I feel that it would be important, to say the least, and one of the most positive indications for our future, if this House were to acknowledge this morning that Quebec is a nation and therefore entitled to self-determination. An examination of international law shows that the right to self-determination means specifically the right to freely choose a collective destiny. Most often, but not always, this takes the form of a referendum process.

I trust that all of the hon. members speaking in this debate will acknowledge that Quebec is blessed with highly democratic and up to date legislation on public consultation. No parliamentarian could object to the fact that Quebec held a referendum last October. Nothing could prevent Quebec from holding a referendum in 12 months, 26 months, 3 years or even six weeks if it so desires, to determine freely its collective future.

There is a paradox here, because to foreign observers, even those well up on the Canadian political scene, constitutional reform has been central to the political debate in this country for the past 30 years. When we started talking about constitutional reform 30 years ago, there were two tendencies. One said patriate the Constitution first and include a Canadian charter of human rights. Mr. Trudeau chose to take the same position during the eighties, but the fact remains this was already being discussed in the early sixties.

There was a second tendency, mainly in Quebec, to say that the important thing was not necessarily patriating the Constitution which at the time, I may recall, had no official French version while half of its sections were already obsolete, so Quebec's political leaders said, and I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will remember this, that the important thing was not necessarily—that was how Quebec's leaders felt at the time, in any case—to patriate the Constitution but to revise thoroughly the balance of Canadian federalism, which meant reviewing sections 91 and 92.

This would be the position held by all Quebec's leaders, whatever their political stripe, from Jean Lesage onward. Among those who succeeded Lesage, there would be this insistence that for Quebecers, the crucial point was not the Constitution as that last trace of colonialism but the fact that Quebec should have a certain number of powers which were sadly lacking. It was on this basis that constitutional reform was to begin.

Of course the process, which would go on for 30 years, gave rise to a number of political doctrines. Some people became experts on the subject, including Richard Arès, who spent much of his life examining the national question. Of course there were many others, and we can say that during the past 30 years, constitutional reform has given rise to three major political anchors for Quebec.

In the 1960s, the idea that Quebec should have a special status was picked up by Gérard Fillion, who, at the time, was editor in chief of Le Devoir. This marked the first attempt to amend the Constitution and to change the colour of the constitutional debate. With Le Devoir, Gérard Fillion and a number of other intellectuals, it was felt that all of Canada's institutions required reworking. There was even talk of the Senate. There was increasing discussion obviously of an official languages act as well. There was a feeling of special status. In other words, the fact that Quebec, in addition to being a province, was a nation and had a special responsibility towards all French speakers in this part of North America had to be recognized.

• (1110)

With this idea of special status, it became clear that Quebec had to be seen to be a French society in a binational context expressed in all of Canada's major institutions.

This idea was set aside to some extent and gave rise, a bit later, about five years later, to the idea of associated states. Those who remember the political and constitutional debate in Quebec will remember this idea. The idea of associated states or two nations, on an equal basis, involved the idea of full equality, an idea that reached a much fuller and much more concrete conclusion with the idea, proposed by the Parti Quebecois and its president and founder René Lévesque, of sovereignty association.

The common denominator, however, in these three ideologies, these three constitutional doctrines, is that Quebec is a nation. Each time a Quebec premier went to the constitutional table, it was in this context. There is a reason for us to always make this claim as one of Quebec's constitutional demands, including in Victoria.

I found that a little funny. As some veteran members of this House will recall, the Victoria formula was not only about regional vetoes but also about giving Quebec more power over language and social policies. According to then Premier Robert Bourassa, however, that did not go far enough.

Will the House of Commons, which is supposed to be a fairly accurate reflection of Canada, have the courage to recognize that there are two nations in Canada and that one of them will therefore probably move toward full and true sovereignty? This, of course, will be achieved through a referendum to be held in the coming months.

Yet, it is difficult to understand how, 30 years after initiating the debate on constitutional renewal, we are now considering Bill C–110, which all but ignores the major constitutional demands traditionally made by Quebec. Even without going as far as recognizing Quebec's right to sovereignty in a bill, how can a Prime Minister such as the one now in office, who has been a key witness to the events of the past 30 years in Quebec, believe that he will satisfy a single Quebecer with a bill offering nothing but a hypothetical veto that is not even enshrined in the Constitution.

What prevented the Prime Minister and his government from considering Quebec's major constitutional demands and ensuring that federal spending powers are defined in Bill C–110, for example? For the past 30 years, this has been part of a set of demands that have been renewed by every successive administration and government.

If the Prime Minister had been serious, he would have included a minimum of demands in Bill C–110, namely to limit federal spending powers, resolve the issue of residual powers, give Quebec more power over language matters, and recognize that Quebec is the only authority on language.

Even the Pepin–Robarts report, that Pierre Elliott Trudeau liked quoting from ad nauseam, recommended, besides a Confederation Chamber, the notion of recognizing Quebec as distinct, because, through its National Assembly, the Quebec government is the only real government ever to have been run by francophones in this part of the country. What would have kept the Prime Minister from recognizing that Quebec does have, regarding language, certain prerogatives?

The key issue of manpower is also at the heart of Quebec's demands. But this issue does not basically mean that, within the context of national standards, the Government of Quebec will be allowed to manage a program. That certainly was not what all the people who, in the past 30 years, recognized the need for Quebec to manage what could be call globally labour market policies had in mind.

Now the situation emerges where Quebec is told: "You will have the right to take back manpower programs, provided however that your program is compatible with our national standards". That is the crux of the problem.

How can they think that national standards could be established regarding something as changing and fluctuating as the labour market, when we know full well that, even within an economic space as small as the Quebec economy, labour market policies vary from region to region. The reality in the Gaspesian Peninsula is not the same as in Montreal. We find ourselves in a relatively disturbing situation, to the extent that those who launched the constitutional debate, those who worked to ensure that Quebec is treated more fairly and more in accordance with its status as a nation within Confederation, now find themselves with a constitutional proposal that is disappointing to say the least.

We could have gone a lot farther. That is part of the list of demands. What keeps us from recognizing Quebec as a distinct society? The term "distinct society" is absolutely meaningless. Just ask Library of Parliament researchers to go through the literature on international law. They will not find a legal basis to the effect that we are a distinct society. That concept is absolutely meaningless in terms of what Quebec truly is and in terms of its nationhood.

The government, and in particular the Minister of Justice, who seems somewhat reluctant, will have to take notice of that. We understand that the Minister of Justice may not be the best informed person regarding claims made by Quebec in recent years, but there are well informed people in cabinet, including the Minister of Labour, who has some experience in the Quebec political arena, and who may miss it at times. In any case, there are people in this government who know very well that Quebec is a nation, that it has a right to self–determination, like any other group forming a people and a nation, and that nothing will keep Quebec from holding another referendum when it chooses to do so. Quebec will hold a referendum when it has democratically decided to ask its citizens to make the inevitable choice.

In a debate like this, we cannot help but think of someone like André Laurendeau. In some respects, André Laurendeau is like a spiritual father to the Bloc Quebecois because he too, in his days, believed it was important to have a sovereignist front right here in this Parliament, to protect Quebec's interests.

For several years, André Laurendeau was the member for Montréal—Sainte–Marie. He accepted Lester B. Pearson's invitation to co–chair the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission. When he and his team tabled the preliminary report, the white paper, I think he understood something which is at the heart of the present political and constitutional wranglings in Canada. You will recall that he wrote "Out of disappointment will come the irreparable". The irreparable, of course, is sovereignty.

André Laurendeau had clearly understood that the federal regime's inability to acknowledge that there are two nations which must be treated as equals, that there are two nations in fact and in law which must engage in dialogue and treat each other as perfect equals, and that from this inability of the federal regime and those who personify it to recognize those two nations the irreparable will ensue. The irreparable will be—already is—that feeling. There is great satisfaction in seeing that in less than a decade the sovereignist option has made a ten per cent gain.

There are not many examples of an idea which was initially perceived as being really marginal ending up with democratic backing that has become more and more solid; it is now headed toward a majority.

We are not wrong in this. I would like to state in closing that we in Quebec are committed, as is the rest of Canada, to engaging in a dialogue on the basis of what we are, through and through, which is a nation. Discussions between nations are on a totally equal footing. That equality will be made official in a democratic referendum, which will be Quebec's next rendez–vous with destiny.

It is my belief that today's debate ought to afford an opportunity, particularly on the government side, for recognition that Quebec is a nation, that it is entitled to self–determination, and that this right to self–determination justifies its demands for full and complete sovereignty.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have read the hon. member's motion and listened to him very carefully. Despite his sincerity I have to tell him and the House in the strongest possible terms that there is no provision in international law which would recognize Quebec's effort to become a separate, independent state.

In the months leading up to the Quebec referendum on October 30, many statements were made regarding international law and the right to self–determination. Unfortunately those statements have led to confusion and especially a false impression that international law gives Quebec the right to secede from Canada.

Quebec has no right to secede from Canada unilaterally either under the Canadian Constitution or under international law. There is no principle of international law according to which Quebec has the right to secede from Canada. This is the conclusion that was reached by five international law experts who produced a study on the question at the request of the National Assembly's 1991 commission on Quebec sovereignty.

As one author put it in that recent study on self–determination, the inhabitants of Quebec do not have a legal right under international law to secede from Canada.

What then is meant by the right of self–determination? A statement of the right is found in various international documents. For example, the charter of the United Nations states that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and the self–determination of peoples.

The 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights state that all peoples have the right of self–determination. Affirmation of a people's right of self–determination is also found in the United Nations 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations.

We must note immediately that these documents speak of people's right to self–determination, not the right of a province, not the right of a county, not the right of a city. In Quebec there are several peoples: the descendants of New France, the aboriginal nations, the Inuit, the descendants of the British settlers and many immigrants who simply call themselves Canadians. We have to be very clear on that point.

Within the Canadian federation there is one province of Quebec but there are many peoples in that province, a point to which I will return in a moment. The first question to be answered is what does the right of self–determination mean? This is a difficult question which may be best answered by first looking to what is not included within a right of self–determination in international law.

Most important, a people's right of self–determination is not the same thing as a people's right to secede from an existing state. In most situations the right of self–determination must be exercised without causing any detriment to the territorial integrity or political unity of existing states.

The United Nations 1970 declaration on friendly relations states that the exercise of the right of self–determination must not dismember or impair, totally or partially, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent states. This means that a right of self–determination must, except in unusual circumstances where a people is subject to a non–representative government, be exercised within the context of existing states. A people's right of self–determination then means the ability to participate fully and freely in the democratic process of governing the existing state. Certainly the population of Quebec participates fully and freely in the democratic process of governing Canada. This was the conclusion of the five international law experts who prepared a study for the national assembly's 1991 commission.

Canada is a federal state in which the province of Quebec has its own national assembly that exercises exclusive powers under the Canadian Constitution over such important subjects as property and civil rights, natural resources, education, health and social services and the administration of justice, among other things.

At the federal level, representatives from the province of Quebec hold roughly one–quarter of the seats in the House of Commons. Many of Canada's prime ministers, including the current Prime Minister, have come from Quebec. Quebec is and has long been well represented in the federal cabinet. The Leader of the Opposition is also from Quebec. Quebecers, therefore, play a large role in governing the nation both through their own national assembly and through their representation in the federal Parliament and government.

Quebec has its own legal system, based on French civil law. Quebec is always represented by three of the nine appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. The current chief justice is also from Quebec.

Quebecers also benefit from a strong set of cultural and linguistic guarantees under the Canadian Constitution, under federal legislation, such as the Official Languages Act, and through various programs and activities. Cultural initiatives are strongly supported by Radio–Canada, the Canada Council, the National Film Board, Telefilm Canada and other Canadian institutions. Therefore, the population of Quebec enjoys everything that a right to internal self–determination implies.

Since self–determination is a right of people, there has never been a consensus exactly on what the term people means. To some, people is synonymous with the population of a state, such as the Canadian people, especially where the entire population of the state participates fully and freely in the governing of the state. Others take a broad view that the term people means any group that meets certain basic criteria, such as common language and history, along with a sense of collective identity.

Given these different views of what the term people means, it is not self–evident that the political entity known as the province of Quebec, which embraces a diverse range of people and a diverse range of cultures and linguistic groups, would qualify for the spectrum of people able to assert the right to self–determination.

Quebecers have had a direct say on their future within Canada through two referenda held in Quebec in the last 15 years. In both 1980 and 1995 a majority of Quebecers reaffirmed their commitment to Canada and rejected attempts to break up the country. Even had the result of the referendum been yes to the question formulated by the Parti Quebecois government, international law would not have recognized the yes vote as a legal basis for the creation of a new state.

International law demands that a political entity meet several specific criteria before it can be considered a state. Along with satisfying these criteria, a political entity trying to achieve statehood must also receive international recognition. Recognition by other states is both an acknowledgement that the new state meets the criteria of statehood and an expression of willingness to enter into relations with the new state.

Therefore, any movement toward the independence of Quebec would not only be without legal foundation in international law, it would have to meet the legal criteria for statehood and the practical necessity of international recognition, which in both cases would be extremely difficult.

In conclusion, and in response to the motion before the House, there is no right in international law for Quebec to secede from Canada. To imply otherwise, as this motion does, is to depart from international law in contravention of Canada's right to continued existence.

• (1130)

Those who support such a proposal as is before the House today are living in an unreal world of illusion and misrepresentation. I suggest the House reject this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the Reform Party to speak against this motion on Quebec's right to self–determination. I want to thank the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for presenting this motion and thus recognizing the right of this federal Parliament to debate and judge this question.

[English]

In speaking against this, it is the position of the Reform Party that Quebec has no inherent right under international law to self–determination because it is neither a colony nor an occupied country, and that the Quebecois are probably not a people within the meaning of international law. For this I cite almost exclusively the work of the Bélanger–Campeau commission on the sovereignty of Quebec. The strongest argument in support of the view that Quebec is neither a colony nor an occupied country is found at pages 382 to 383 of its report:

[Translation]

"According to those who support Quebec's accession to sovereignty, the right to self–determination constitutes the basis of the alleged right of the Quebec people to form a distinct state, but pursuing the same reasoning, many of their opponents and the spokespersons for most aboriginal peoples take the position that:

[English]

If Quebec can opt out of Canada then obviously sections of Quebec that preferred to remain part of Canada could opt out of Quebec.

[Translation]

This analysis is based on a postulate we believe to be erroneous, according to which the right to self–determination implies the right to independence".

[English]

The report then suggests on pages 419 to 422 that the principle of self–determination implies the right of people to participate in shaping their political, economic, social and cultural future, and that due to the principles of respecting the territorial integrity of states, self–determination could result in independence only in the rarest circumstances.

The report suggests the principle really only applies to non–autonomous or colonized people who have been recognized as such by the United Nations. This is clearly not the case in Quebec.

[Translation]

And this quote again from page 422: "On the evidence, that is not the situation of Quebecers nor that of the various minorities within Quebec's territory".

[English]

For non–colonial peoples, self–determination has "at least for now stopped being a principle of exclusion and became one of inclusion; the right to participate. The right now entitles peoples in all states to free, fair and and open participation in the democratic process of governance freely chosen by each state". The report goes on at page 425 to endorse this position.

[Translation]

Another quote: "One cannot reasonably maintain that Quebecers are colonial people nor that they are deprived of the right to their own existence within the Canadian federation or exercise their democratic rights. Consequently, the Quebec people have no legal basis for invoking the right to self–determination to justify a future accession to independence".

[English]

The conclusion of the report is clearly stated:

[Translation]

"From the legal point of view, a possible accession to sovereignty by Quebec cannot be based on the principle of the equal rights of peoples and their right to self–determination, which implies the right to independence only in the case of colonial peoples or of those whose territory is occupied by a foreign power".

[English]

The second point is that the Quebecois are not a people within the meaning of international law. Even the Bélanger–Campeau commission is not sure whether the Quebecois constitute a people.

At page 418 the commission recognizes that the Quebecois can either be French speaking or English speaking. At page 425 the commission states:

• (1135)

[Translation]

"Some authors have tried, with some success, to establish the existence of a Quebec or, alternatively, French Canadian people".

[English]

Although the commission is not explicit, undoubtedly its members were aware that for the purposes of international law, a nation is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as follows:

> A people, or aggregation of men, existing the form of an organized jural society, usually inhabiting a distinct portion of the earth, speaking the same language, using the same customs, possessing historic continuity, and distinguished from other like groups by their racial origin and characteristics, and generally, but not necessarily, living under the same government and sovereignty.

Obviously given the ethnic and sociocultural make–up of modern Quebec society, only the pûre laine Quebecois could arguably be considered a people. While they constitute a majority of the Quebec population, they do not constitute a majority in each region of Quebec. This produces a curious result, that if the Quebecois pûre laine are a people and if they have a right to secede, they could not claim the right to territorial integrity. Therefore Quebec separatists cannot have this both ways.

If the strict definition of the word people is applied, only the aboriginal people in the north would likely qualify. This is clearly not in the interest of sovereignists and quite probably the reason why the Bélanger–Campeau commission did not explore the point further.

While Quebec does not have the right to self–determination, this does not mean that whatever Quebecers decide in a referendum is unimportant from a democratic standpoint. We in the Reform Party have said it is very important. However, the Government of Quebec would also have to admit to the importance of a large number of Quebecers opting for federalism. So far it continues to be a majority. Even if a minority opted for Canada this would also constitute an important democratic fact which the Government of Quebec would have to take into account.

From the standpoint of the Reform Party and I believe from the standpoint of the majority of Parliament, the motion is not based on international law or fact. Quebec does not have the right of self–determination other than by negotiating its future in Canada and with the rest of Canada.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Hochelaga for a sparkling address which had the added advantage of reminding me that I have been there before. My colleague, the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, also brought me back to time past.

I advise the hon. member opposite to beware of experts and especially people who claim the title of expert. I was also invited and gave evidence as an expert before l'Assemblée nationale de Quebec on these and related issues. I admire and respect the five experts who have been cited very often by the Quebec government and others for their different interpretations. They are experts but I would have thought in other domains than those in which they gave their opinions which might suggest that perhaps l'Assemblée nationale did not do its homework.

I have little difficulty in returning to the point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, in international law. There is no explicit joining of the right of self–determination which is a comparatively recent principle of international law with the fission or break–up of existing states or with the outright entry into independence.

If we trace the history of this principle, it is related, as so many things in contemporary constitutionalism are, to Emperor Napoleon and the liberating ideas of the French Revolution which sometimes are put forward without necessarily the intentions of the founders.

The spirit of liberalism, the spirit of nationalism and the spirit of independence are somewhat antinomic and conflicting principles of the heritage of the 19th century, the 19th century of the French Revolution, and carried through into the 20th century in Woodrow Wilson's 14 points. I suppose the apogee of the concept of self–determination as a historical imperative, not a legal one, meaning the break–up of large multinational states, was reached in the Treaty of Versailles.

The tragedy is that it was a principle carried historically to its logical and perhaps foolish conclusion. Most historians today would trace as one of the causal factors of the conflict in World War II the creation of a vacuum in central Europe by the creation of a plethora of mini states, incapable of forming common economic policies and incapable of co–operating militarily to resist the larger threats from the east and west, from Nazi Germany and from the Soviet Union.

This is one of the reasons why in San Francisco in 1945 the principle of self–determination represented a learning from the lessons of history and less enthusiasm for the categorical imperative that some had asserted: that every time one is identify as a nation or a people—the terms in the UN have been used interchangeably and somewhat confusedly—one did not have to break up a state to assert one's right of self–determination.

The classic demonstration of this is the principle that the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce referred to, friendly relation and co–operation among states. It was a symbolic ending of the cold war. It is the last great act of east–west relations. It supplements the United Nations charter. It is a code of conduct between communist Russia and the west when the cold war is still on.

It contains this very important historical exception. It was agreed by all parties that there was nothing in the principle of self–determination put in the declaration of friendly relations requiring the break–up of existing multinational states, specifically federal states like Canada and the claimed federal state, the Soviet Union, which specifically were adverted to in the friendly relations conference agenda.

One can find it over the whole 10 years of the history of this. It was pleasant to be reminded of it. I wrote several books that I thought were persuasive on this some years ago and it is nice to have them brought back.

Let me come back to present reality. If members look at the situation in Bosnia, at Yugoslavia, I suppose some might even argue that what has happened there is worse than what existed before, a centralized authority imposing unity on a multinational society.

If self–determination led to the break away, members can see the rule of reason emerging in the current settlements. One saw immediately with the Vance–Owen plan for Bosnia 11 cantons on the Swiss model, and one said it will not work. There is no legal imperative requiring it. It historically does not make sense.

As one follows, as Secretary General Boutros–Ghali has, the trend away from Vance–Owen to Owen–Stoltenberg to what we could call the Clinton or the Dayton plan, there is the 11, now down to 3. The implicit element in it is that two of the three may rejoin their neighbouring states, their so–called mother states.

What we are really saying is we live in a period of historical transition where the main historical currents are contradictory. The trend to supra–nationalism, the imperative of larger and larger regional supra–national associations, economic, political, replacing the old military one, is accompanied by a fragmentation which most historians would regard as a pathological condition today.

The future of the world community is not a series of little Basutolands, enclaves within larger states; nor is it breaking up viable economic political units into a plethora of smaller units. It is basically in recognizing that the lesson of today is constitutional pluralism. People can work together. A state that can successfully combine several different peoples or nations, if one wants to use those terms interchangeably, is a stronger state.

The unity comes from the diversity in the original sense of the term used by the great Austro–Hungarian and late Israeli philosopher who coined the term community of communities. It is that larger concept.

To a certain extent when self–determination is preached there is the false statement that international law requires it. It does not. International law is neutral. In a certain sense it is running counter to the preferred view of how history is unfolding: an interdependent world community and larger and larger associations transcending national frontiers, rendering nationalism in its pathological sense out of date, and making Bosnia–Hercegovina and the conflicts there an absurd survival at the end of the 20th century of an anarchic past that is better left behind. The nation state has been the master institution of western European thinking for the last 300 years, but it is out of date.

• (1145)

This is the biggest lesson. There is no international law imperative here. There are lessons of history but there are good historical trends, trends that rest on sound scientific evaluation of the past, and there are the bad lessons. It is for us to choose on this basis.

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for presenting this motion, which I have here before me, and all other members who gave very well documented presentations on the subject.

It would be interesting to see the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce patriated to the National Assembly, if he tries to run for election once Quebec has opted by way of self–determination to obtain its sovereignty.

Historically, the Canada of today, of 1995, which is also the Canada of 1867, was created with the consent of the partners who joined the Canadian federation.

You will permit me to quote the first "whereas" from the British North America Act of 1867. It reads as follows: "Whereas the Provinces of Canada [Upper and Lower Canada], Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom".

There are, however, three other "whereas" clauses. The first "whereas" is crucial. The text continues: "The Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled"—that is the Parliament of the United Kingdom of 1867. The imperial Parliament of 1867 would never have enacted the British North America Act without the consent of the colonies, of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the Provinces of Canada to form the Dominion of Canada, as we know it now.

So the consent of the colonies already established at the time of Confederation was vital to the existence of the Canadian federation as we know it today. Its existence is contingent on the continued consent, at least of the well–defined colonies that made up the preconfederational British North America and that were joined by the colonies of the Pacific coast, essentially today's British Columbia and, in 1949, the Dominion of Newfoundland, which decided to join the Canadian family.

We can see from the documents approved by the imperial Parliament following the Charlottetown and Quebec City resolutions that the consent of the colonies at the time was fundamental to the creation of the present federation. If constituents withdraw that consent at some point—and the real constituents are those who were asked in London: "Do you give final approval to the Quebec resolutions we agreed on?"—and this is what the British Parliament did in 1867. This was within their right; for all practical purposes, they ratified the Quebec resolutions by giving them force of law. For all practical purposes, the imperial Parliament gave up its legislative authority over British North America in 1982.

As my colleague for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve pointed out earlier, Quebec has, of course, a people, a language, a territory, a history, rules and regulations, legal institutions, and a common will to live together, which are the basic requirements in exercising the right to self–determination.

I want to focus on the issue of territory. As we recently heard, our Reform colleagues, in particular their leader—I think the hon. member for Calgary West put less emphasis on the issue, since he felt uncomfortable with his leader's position—, would like to turn Quebec into a Switzerland–type country, that is to say, full of holes with enclaves and removable parts. This essentially amounts to asymetrical federalism at its best.

I see that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands belongs to a totally different school of thought; he is already fully committed to Quebec's right to self–determination.

Although the hon. member for Calgary West was uncomfortable about explaining his party's position, he still referred to this Swiss–cheese Quebec, this Quebec full of holes.

One of the basic elements of the right to self–determination is territorial control. The Quebec National Assembly, our provincial legislature, has control over the territory it was given under the acts that led to establishment of the 1912 boundaries, according to the interpretation given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1927. These are the present boundaries of Quebec, stretching from the Outaouais to the Magdalen Islands, and from the Gaspesian Peninsula to the Abitibi. This territory is clearly defined, here, with the Ottawa river, as well as with the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the U.S. border and the polar circle.

These are clear boundaries, over which the Parliament of Quebec has absolute power, and no one is challenging that. When we hear Quebec being described as Swiss cheese, full of holes, with enclaves, corridors and ports that would remain under federal jurisdiction, that does not reflect the reality.

No one is disputing the authority of the Parliament of Quebec over the entire territory of Quebec. Every rule of international law recognizes that a people, a nation has authority over the territory under its control at the time it achieves sovereignty.

If the people of Quebec had voted yes to the question put to them on October 30, there is no doubt that Quebec would have control over the entire territory of Quebec. No one is denying that every RCM, municipality and local government in Quebec is subject to the legislative and constitutional authority of the Parliament of Quebec under section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

That being said, in order for the territorial integrity of Quebec to be affected, the suggestion—I would say the seditious suggestion—would have to made that some portions of Quebec rebel against the legislative authority of the Parliament of Quebec, which neither Reform members nor our other colleagues in this House are suggesting.

I think that the greatest lesson we were taught by the October 30 referendum and will be again in the future is the fundamental respect not only for our institutions and our territories but also, fundamentally, for the people. Because sovereignty is not something that happens first and foremost at the institutional level but fundamentally at the grassroots level.

Because we have been living for decades, and even centuries, under a regime that largely reflects British values and precedents, we have a tendency to rely more on institutions than on the peoples for whom these institutions exist. However, when a people wants to achieve self–determination, there is a basic obligation to respect that fundamental choice.

• (1155)

On October 30, Quebecers said no to the question put to them. And it is with the utmost respect for democracy that everyone accepted that decision, even though it was, for all intents and purposes, made by the smallest of majority.

In a democratic system, the rule is 50 per cent plus one. In this case, it worked in favour of the no side. Had the results been reversed, the Prime Minister himself said that he might not have recognized them. But the rules cannot be set once the game is over.

These rules must be agreed on before the beginning of the game. For example, it would be preposterous if, during a final between the Toronto Maple Leafs and the New York Rangers, the governors of the league decided, at the end of the best of seven series, that the series would now be a best of nine, because Toronto won. Again, the rules are established before the game begins. And the rule here is that the people is sovereign.

I am pleased that the hon. member for Saint–Henri—Westmount, who is here and who supported Bill 150 in Quebec's National Assembly, which affirmed Quebec's right to self–determination, now sits in this House, because she will hopefully convince her colleagues from the Liberal caucus of the validity of these claims.

This said, I will have an opportunity later today to speak at the report stage on Bill C–110 and to talk more about the bogus veto the government wants to give every man and his brother.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving right of reply to the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, under whose name the motion we are presently debating stands, I want it to be very clearly understood by all members of the House that his will be the last words spoken on the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I consider our debate particularly rewarding. I believe the word "gall" will pass in parliamentary language, but I will use the word "nerve" instead. It takes a certain amount of nerve on the part of our colleague and continued friend for Calgary West for him to rise in this House and say we are not a people, because, as the people of Quebec watching will have understood, the member, in his sometimes unparliamentary spontaneity, clearly said that he did not consider Quebec was entitled to self–determination, because Quebecers were not a people. I find something extremely disquieting in the desire to engage in dialogue on this basis.

I realize that there has been a federalist movement in this House and throughout our history. It is entitled to be heard and to speak. I do not think, however, that you will find many in Quebec, whatever the family, who will not acknowledge that we are a people.

Quebec's parliament, the National Assembly, has in three official documents acknowledged that Quebecers are a people and, in doing so, has accorded the province the right to self–determination. These documents, which have been fairly unanimously approved are: the act to establish the commission to determine the political and constitutional future of Quebec, the act respecting the process for determining the political and constitutional future of Quebec and the motion of the National Assembly of 1991.

When I was a student, I read with pleasure, whether the reading was assigned or optional I read with equal pleasure, the writings of the member for Vancouver Quadra, who joined with Senator Beaudoin in writing a book. I thought he belonged to a school that recognized Quebecers as a people. It is true that our being a people does not automatically entitle us, under international law, to the right to secede. What prompted the five legal experts to conclude that we did have the right to secede was the rejection of the 1982 Constitution. There is a convention in international law which says that a people cannot decide by itself it has a right to self–determination unless that right has been recognized. As part of their grounds for determining the right to self–determination under international law they used the fact that Quebec did not ratify the 1982 Constitution through the most legal of channels possible.

• (1200)

At any rate, as the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve I understand, as do my colleagues, that in a democracy one cannot be more sovereignist than democratic. One is equally sovereignist and democratic, but by virtue of being as sovereignist as we are democratic, we are well placed to understand our right to hold a referendum in the future. No smoke and mirrors on the part of the federal government can deny Quebec the right under a law passed by the National Assembly, a law on public consultation, to go to the people and offer them the opportunity to choose and to mandate their government to achieve to sovereignty.

When that day comes and there is a majority behind that mandate I am sure our colleagues, both in the government party and in the Reform party, will understand that they have no choice but to sit down at the negotiating table and engage in a dialogue on the basis of total equality, nation to nation, as should have always been the case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

[English]

Later today the House will go through the procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill. In view of recent practices, do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

On the Order: Government Orders:

December 1, 1995—Minister of Human Resources Development—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development of Bill C–111, an act respecting employment insurance in Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C–111, an act respecting employment insurance in Canada, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to refer the new employment insurance bill to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development. By referring the bill directly to the committee, we signal our commitment to invite and engage the largest amount of direct public participation.

This bill was derived from the very extensive public consultation which has taken place over the past year. The work of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development has pulled together much of that information and has provided extraordinarily valuable input toward the development of the original legislation. It is our hope that by giving the committee the earliest opportunity to listen to Canadians and hear their various points of view, we can improve the legislation even further and ensure that we get an active and involved commitment and engagement.

We all recognize that this is important legislation. It affects the lives of millions of Canadians. It is a major restructuring and modernization of a bill which will provide for new opportunities for people to get work and to have a hope of once again being employed.

We have come up with an approach which has been carefully constructed and is balanced and fair. It may not satisfy one special interest or the other but it does provide a proper equitable balancing of interests across Canada. We believe the bill is consistent with what Canadians want. We listened very carefully to them and we listened very carefully to what the committee said.

What we have heard is directly reflected in many of the recommendations and parts of the legislation. It upholds our responsibility to ensure the program is based on solid insurance principles while at the same time provides a strong combination of incentives which enable people to get back into the job market. It is about jobs; it is about people. It is about jobs finding people and people finding jobs. It has shown that we as a government and as a Parliament can construct a new system. We can restore for many Canadians an opportunity to once again become full participants in Canada's labour market.

• (1205)

If it is shown, as I believe it can be, that legitimate improvements and constructive proposals are needed, we will look to the committee to bring those ideas forward and apply its judgment and wisdom in that application.

For example, in the last week or so we have heard that some areas are concerned about work patterns in parts of Canada. We hope that the committee will take a careful look at that.

Minority groups have expressed concern that they will not have full access to training because of the new development of transferring training to the provinces. Some are concerned that their rights be protected. We certainly hope the committee will take those matters into account.

We are also very interested in how the transitional jobs fund will work to create good, solid, long term jobs for people who are in high unemployment areas. Again, we expect and hope that the committee can provide major guidance in this area.

These are just some of the issues I believe the committee may want to look into.

We should not lose sight of the hard evidence that has been provided throughout the debate which has been encouraged over the last week. The House and the committee will be looking at how the new program will extend eligibility for coverage under the program to over 500,000 Canadians, something they have not had before. We demonstrated that the change of going from a weekly to an hourly based formula will be equitable, particularly for tens of thousands of seasonal workers who work long hours for short periods of time and who could not qualify under the old system, or who were not given full credit for all their hours of work.

We have also spoken about the innovative family income supplement which has been widely approved across the country. It will provide 80 per cent of benefits for families of low income, those earning under $25,000, mainly single parents, by introducing a form of guaranteed annual income which has been talked about in this country for a long time. As a result, over 350,000 low income families will receive on average 7 per cent to 15 per cent higher benefits in the new program than under the old program. This is a true, progressive, liberal minded initiative.

[Translation]

I mentioned new partnerships with all levels of government and the opportunity for federal, provincial and municipal governments to concentrate their efforts where it counts, at the local level, in our communities, while respecting the responsibilities of all concerned.

[English]

In the brief time I have today I want to go back to the importance of developing this partnership for jobs, bringing the levels of government together to work in common, harmonize and work in partnership so that we can help create employment for Canadians in every part of Canada.

A key impact of this reform has to do with income. Not benefits but income. Providing ways for people to earn more money, to sustain themselves, their families and their communities is a key component of the objectives of the program. Many unemployed Canadians need more than just income support as a bridge between jobs. The new employment insurance system will build a better, stronger, wider bridge to help them make a more solid, long lasting connection to the work world.

The employment benefits we are proposing are made up of five new back to work measures and provide real, positive help to get people back into jobs. We have tested these measures and we know they work. We know that wage subsidies can help level the playing field for people facing a disadvantage in the workplace, especially women and young people.

I want to underline that we are seeing a 70 per cent to 80 per cent improvement in job retention, allowing 14 to 15 more weeks of work and up to $5,000 more a year in income earnings. This is far more than would be received under a benefit program.

[Translation]

Self–employment assistance will help people start a business. During the past two years, this program has helped 30,000 individuals start their own business and thus has created 60,000 jobs for Canadians.

[English]

Also in these employment measures are the job partnership projects. For example, one in New Brunswick is now enabling 1,000 older workers who lost their jobs in the forestry industry to go back to work, particularly in reforestation, rebuilding a resource, replanting for the next generation. They are now involved in passing on their skills and doing so in a rewarding and satisfying way.

• (1210)

There is also the individualized skills, loans and grants which, if the provinces agree, will enable people to use the opportunity to upgrade themselves so that they can get the new jobs available in the new economy.

Another tool, the income supplements, will increase the incomes of people by encouraging them to take jobs sooner. For example, this will help unemployed single parents to get back on their feet and gain new skills and experience. The early analysis of a self–sufficiency project we have been running in British Columbia and New Brunswick shows that the average hourly starting wage during the first year was $7.63 and that one–third of the participants were making at least $2 more than the minimum wage. Thirty–five per cent of single parents offered supplements leave welfare to work within a year compared to an average of 2 per cent or 3 per cent under normal circumstances. Again it shows that the tools work and work effectively.

We will be investing $800 million on these five extra tools of savings. This will be added to the existing $1.9 billion of our programs. There will be a total of $2.7 billion in helping people get jobs. Those who dismiss this reform as mere cuts should reflect on this number and what it represents in terms of new opportunities for Canadians. It means that 400,000 unemployed workers will get additional help to find a job. Therefore, those who are opposed to such reforms are basically saying to over 400,000 Canadians that they do not want to help them.

This legislation is designed to provide the opposite, to provide a new bridge and a new tool. I can only say we are very much looking forward to the active and engaged work of the committee. We hope it will provide us with an opportunity to hear the best judgments and accumulated ideas of Canadians and in particular, to let the committee help formulate the legislation in a way that can most effectively service its basic opportunity, which is to get people back to work.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I simply want to advise the House that for the purposes of this debate, hon. members are entitled to 10–minute speeches, without questions or comments.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition deeply regrets that the government should resort to this exceptional procedure and thus deprive the public of information, of a debate, televised for the benefit of individuals across Canada, on this extremely important bill.

At this stage, according to the usual procedure in Parliament for dealing with bills, we would normally be at second reading, and the official opposition would be entitled to one 40–minute speech, followed by 20–minute speeches by as many members as wish to speak. We could then propose amendments and keep the public informed.

The official opposition and the third party play a crucial role in ensuring that citizens are aware of the subject and substance of a bill as important as these unemployment insurance reforms which, over the years, will affect hundreds of thousands of Quebecers and Canadians.

However, within the very short time frame we have been allowed, we will hardly have time to say that this bill, despite all the denials of the minister and his attempts to claim the opposite, and despite the improvements he will make in the bill, and we will certainly participate in that process, that basically this bill is aimed at making more savage cuts in benefits for the unemployed.

• (1215)

This $2 billion in drastic cuts is in addition—I can never repeat it often enough—to this year's cuts of $735 million in Quebec and $620 million in the Maritimes. Quebec will lose another $640 million by the year 2001.

Contrary to what the government implies, $800 million of this additional $2 billion will not be set aside for other active measures, as the information papers we have been given clearly specify. It is right there in black and white.

The truth is that this $800 million from the UI fund will replace the $600 million that used to come from the consolidated revenue fund, which means that, in reality, all of Canada will get only $200 million more over five years. What is true is that $600 million will come from the UI fund rather than the consolidated revenue fund, as indicated in the papers and information given to us by senior officials during the briefing.

The reality of this bill is that qualifying for UI will become much more difficult for women, young people, seasonal workers, new immigrants, and all those not already eligible. It will become much more difficult in a labour market of precarious, short term jobs that often arouse feelings of anxiety, frustration and despondency in those trying to make a living in such a market.

This reform targets certain classes of persons. It is directed at specific job markets, starting with the Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

Looking at the charts prepared by senior officials of Manpower and Immigration Canada, we are astounded to find that certain classes of persons, namely repeat claimants, seasonal workers and newcomers, are indeed larger in eastern Canada and Quebec.

I think it is safe to say, at any rate, this is not a matter of human nature because this would mean that human nature has special characteristics in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec that it does not have in western Canada. It is not human nature that is different, but the job market.

The official opposition will be participating very actively in this committee. Not only will we listen to every person or group of persons who want to come and tell us what is wrong with the UI plan and who expect this plan to really be an employment insurance plan but we will also denounce, every chance we get, this unhelpful attitude of hiding a deficit cutting measure behind fancy rhetoric.

• (1220)

The official opposition will make every effort to ensure that workers, in fact any person who may have to rely on UI, can have access to it in the way that is the most beneficial to them. Yes, some active measures are required, and we in Quebec have implemented such measures and asked for such measures to be implemented, so that people can have access to benefits derived directly from premiums paid by workers and businesses.

Having listened to the people of Canada and Quebec, we know that these active measures designed to help people find a job must not in any way take the place of jobs. We were told right across Canada, because we did tour the country, that the real issue is employment. It is not the will of people to work: it is employment.

Sure, we must do everything possible to help people qualify when there are jobs available. However, we must also stop making the jobless feel guilty by saying that it is their fault, particularly in light of the dramatic increase in the number of people actively looking for work, who can no longer tolerate not being able to live decently, have some hope, and have some stability in order, for example, to raise children.

This bill seeks to introduce twisted family policy measures, and we do not hesitate to say so. What is needed is a true family policy. As for the UI program, it should help by bridging the gap between jobs. Active measures should be left to the decision makers who are best able to decide. Quebec, as we know, wants to have total control over manpower policies.

It is unfortunate that the government withheld the information that would have put Canadians on track, in terms of the reforms needed, instead of merely making speeches that do not reflect reality.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the history of unemployment insurance in Canada dates back to 1919 when the concept was first discussed. It finally became a legislated labour market institution under the government of Mackenzie King.

Let me read some of the quotes from that great debate in 1940 which focused on the original intent of unemployment insurance:

> We recommend to your government the question of making some provision by a system of state social insurance for those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to work, whether the inability arises from lack of opportunity, sickness, invalidity or old age. Such insurance would remove the spectre of fear which now haunts the wage earner and makes him a more contented and better citizen.

I have a second quote:

> How much unemployment there will be and over what period it will last is impossible to forecast. But, whatever it be, there must be a great deal of unemployment which can only be dealt with in one of two ways: either by a considered scheme of insurance or by state doles, hurriedly and indiscriminately issued when the moment of crisis arrives. There can be no question which is the better way. State doles lead straight to pauperization. A well devised scheme of insurance preserves the self-respect of the worker and assists and encourages him to supplement it by provision made industrially through an association.

• (1225)

I am well aware that we are debating a motion to refer this bill to committee prior to second reading and that the government will tell us that doing so is supposed to provide the committee with greater opportunity to make amendments to the bill. However, as we all know, the fact is that this mechanism which the government introduced into the standing orders shortly after taking power, has been consistently used to limit debate in the House and as a mechanism to speedily move controversial legislation through the parliamentary process in a manner which minimizes opposition.

I vehemently oppose sending the bill to committee prior to second reading. I believe that every member of Parliament should have an adequate opportunity to speak to the bill in the House of Commons, where they may both pose and respond to questions from their colleagues and opposition members. By drastically limiting debate, the government is demonstrating its complete disdain for such a parliamentary process.

Nevertheless, this is a House of free speech and I have written something which reflects my view of Bill C–111. Goodness knows, it is always a challenge to pique interest in House debates. In any event, I give the House my version of the 12 days of Christmas.

On the first day of Christmas the Minister of Human Resources Development, known as HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us one more long awaited non–reform. Carried along on the mantra of job creation, we received our year end Christmas gift: employment insurance.

On the second day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us two hard working Canadians who, despite their considerable financial contributions to UI over all of their working lives, died without ever having received a penny of benefits: taxed to the grave.

On the third day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us three French Canadian leaders who, to no one's surprise, babbled on incessantly about Quebec and how unemployment in Quebec was distinct from all other unemployment in the rest of Canada and who felt, as always, that no one understood them.

On the fourth day of Christmas, the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us four calling premiers from the Atlantic region; calling for this, calling for that and finally, completely worn out from all of the calling, the minister of HRD called it quits to reform and went back to tinkering.

Five suffering regions, formally known as ten equal provinces, are all demanding more from less. Regional development boondoggles remain an active ingredient in the magic of creating jobs, jobs, jobs.

On the sixth day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us six government strategists laying future plots for further tax grabs. After all, the implementation of the employment insurance scheme does not begin until July 1996, with a phase in period to full implementation extending to the year 2000.

On the seventh day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us seven assistant deputy ministers swimming in UI cash surpluses. These new found friends of the finance minister will help him meet his deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP in hidden taxes, EI premiums and not reduced spending.

On the eighth day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us eight milking tax collectors who targeted the part time worker, the working mom and the small business owner. So much for tax relief; just continued taxes on the tax oppressed.

On the ninth day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us nine drumming seasonal workers who expressed outrage at being encouraged to accept available jobs in the shoulder season. The government forgot to mention that under the new rules, claimants can still receive UI benefits equal to as much as 110 per cent of their earnings from employment.

On the tenth day of Christmas the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us ten piping journalists who heralded the miracle of changing UI to EI and gave us the new meaning of "un".

• (1230)

On the eleventh day of Christmas, the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us 11 dancing parliamentary committee members who, as the good Liberals they are, followed Government Orders to limit debate and refer Bill C–111 to committee before second reading, another promise broken by a government whose promise was for openness.

On the twelfth day of Christmas, the minister of HRD, having no understanding of the meaning of insurance, gave us 12 leaping bureaucrats to promote jobs and growth. They called this new program the job fund. This $300 million initiative is sure to sustain at least the 12 jobs enjoyed by these bureaucrats.

Merry Christmas.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the motion before us today, since it will allow us to consider Bill C–111, on employment insurance immediately.

With this motion, the government shows the importance of this legislative measure and the need to immediately undertake detailed consideration of its content.

The proposed reform is a very complex one. It has been discussed for months and months now, openly and publicly across Canada, and if there is one consensus that has emerged from these consultations, it is to give a new orientation to the entire unemployment insurance program.

It was quite a challenge: how to give a new direction to unemployment insurance? During these consultations, a number of ideas were proposed. What we have before us today represents a real change of direction, a major reform of what used to be unemployment insurance. It needs to be really well understood, which is why we shall need to take all of the time available in committee to study this change of direction and to ensure that the bill before us will really meet the objectives we have set.

Those objectives are, of course, part of our overall job strategy. I believe that each and every person in this country understands just what a priority it is for all Canadians have jobs, to keep their jobs, or to create jobs. Unemployment insurance reform was considered in that overall context. It is but one element in this government's strategy for maintaining jobs and creating new ones, not a strategy in itself.

Over the years, we have seen that the unemployment insurance program as it existed led to a number of problems. First of all, we have seen how very quickly the costs have risen. Just think, in 1982 the program cost $8 billion, while by 1995 it was up to $16 billion. With the passing years we have seen the program being overused. When I say overuse, it is certainly not my intention to blame workers who receive unemployment insurance benefits, as the official opposition seems to imply, but it is a fact that over the years, the unemployment insurance plan had become more like an income support plan. We also found that the system was overused by employers to the extent that it influenced their hiring approach. That is why we had to get back to the basics.

We also found that over the years inequities had developed in the system. It was designed at a time when employment was widely available, when people worked from 9 to 5, 35 hours a week. That is no longer the case in 1995. So a number of inequities had developed in the system, and I am thinking more particularly of part time workers. Working part time has become a way of life, so how can we make the system available to part–time workers as well?

We also found that the system tended to favour those on higher salaries, when we looked at how benefits were distributed. Could we restore a measure of equity to the unemployment insurance system? That is why what we have here is a thorough reform. This is a new system that wants to give workers and employers an incentive to maintain jobs and create jobs.

So there are three important elements in this reform. Number one: unemployment insurance benefits; number two: employment benefits, and number three: a transitional job creation fund to help the most disadvantaged regions in our country. I think this reform is comprehensive in its approach to these dimensions.

I would like to say a few words about employment benefits, because since this reform was announced by my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, we have heard a number of views on these employment benefits, how they will be implemented, how we will work together with the provinces to give our workers an incentive to be on the labour market and our employers an incentive to maintain jobs.

I think it was very clear that in this reform the government was intent on developing pro–active employment measures. That is why it has specifically identified five employment benefit measures. The government intends to develop, implement and evaluate them with the provinces. So, imagine my surprise at discovering last week that the Bloc Quebecois in its opposition day motion was criticizing the unemployment insurance reform, saying it increased overlap and duplication.

I must say that I could see our friends opposite had not yet read the bill, because the reverse is clearly true. We are in fact trying to avoid overlap and duplication. I also heard it said that the federal government wanted to supervise the provinces, because the bill defined requirements for employment measures. So, here again, you can imagine my surprise.

The bill talks of guidelines. There is nothing about national standards. It talks about guidelines. There are six different guidelines. Let us have a look at them and see how a provincial government could object to them. The first really aims at avoiding overlap and duplication. Clause 57 of the bill provides that we are to aim for:

> (a) harmonization with provincial employment initiatives to ensure that there is no unnecessary overlap or duplication;

That seems clear. Every effort must be made to ensure that there is no overlap but rather complementarity when a province already has employment measures.

• (1240)

In this regard, as far as Quebec is concerned, I must tell you that it is quite a challenge, because there are now something like three service delivery networks in Quebec. There is the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, which has offices in all regions of Quebec; the Travail Québec centres, which are scattered throughout the province; and the Employment Canada centres.

Even within the province of Quebec, there is an obvious need for harmonization between the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, the Travail Québec centres and the Employment Canada centres.

This is one of the guidelines; there are five others that show our desire to be as flexible as possible. I cannot see how a province could object. But again, this bill will be referred to a committee for consideration and we will see how it can be improved.

Looking at the overall impact of this bill on all Canadian provinces and at Quebec's situation, I can tell you that Quebec comes out ahead. At the present time, for every dollar contributed, Quebec receives $1.33. After the reform, for every dollar contributed, it will receive $1.31. Quebec will still come out ahead.

In addition, like any other province, Quebec will have control over employment benefits, as it has always demanded over the years.

Both sides must show some goodwill. In this regard, I want to commend the open–mindedness of Quebec's Minister of Employment who, unlike the Bloc Quebecois, agreed to sit down with us to determine how we can provide better services to Quebec workers.

In conclusion, I hope that the committee will help improve and enhance the bill before us.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is not how I had originally planned to start my speech and, even though we are given only ten minutes, I would like to share my first reactions with the Minister of Labour.

She claims to have been very surprised by our response. She did not look that surprised when I saw her on television over the weekend, as she addressed a group of Quebecers, including members of the Liberal Party of Quebec, who reminded her and the public at large of the consensus in Quebec in favour of seeing all the money earmarked for employability development and occupational training measures as well as all employment–related services be handed over to the Quebec government, which must be in charge.

In our view, being in charge does not mean being responsible for implementing national standards or reaching national goals imposed by the federal government. This is a clarification I wanted to make at this stage. In a way, the Minister of Labour tried to divert the debate onto that subject. I would like to come back to the substance of this bill, such as the objectives that the Minister of Human Resources Development outlined this morning.

He started by saying: "You know, we are taking a special measure in the House to ensure that this bill goes to committee as soon as possible". He made this appear to be positive.

It should be pointed out, and you know that it is, Mr. Speaker, that this is an exceptional measure, a type of measure that this government has used three or four times already over the past two years, supposedly to speed up the process. We must look at the context.

If consideration by the committee was so urgent, and I am putting the question to the government, why did it wait for so long after tabling the green paper and after last year's tour, to bring this bill back to the House? The government waited for something called the Quebec referendum on sovereignty.

• (1245)

It waited for the referendum, because it knew that introducing a bill that provides for cuts totalling some $2 billion, including $600 million in Quebec, might influence the outcome of the referendum. So, the government waited until after the referendum. Still, it could have tabled its bill a few days, or even a few weeks after the referendum. Instead, the government brings this legislation back to the House on the Monday of the last week before the Christmas recess.

Why? To get a better idea of what Canadians think of the bill. Oh, sure. The minister knows full well that December is like the summer months. The media are less interested in such debates, and the public does not read the papers or follow the media as much, because it is busy doing other things.

The government has the nerve to say that it is to make things easier. Come, now. The human resources committee will probably sit this week. What does that mean? Interested groups will be asked to submit briefs in January; in short, those wishing to present such a brief will have to take time during the holiday season to prepare a brief, have it approved by their officials, and make sure it gets here before the deadline. This is not democracy, it is just the opposite.

It is an old trick used by many bodies. I have seen it used by municipal governments, namely to present controversial projects during the Christmas or summer holidays. It is an old trick often used. It is not very clever, it has been done before, and anyone with any degree of critical sense can see right through it.

We are being presented with this and, of course, we will attend committee proceedings. But for the sake of this, we are sacrificing the debate which should have taken place in the House, starting with 40 minute speeches followed by 20 minute speeches by as many members as were interested in expressing their views, from both sides of the House, the official opposition, the government, and the third party.

But instead, the government wants to consult. The parliamentary secretary might remember the consultations we held last year in December. The weather was not very cold yet. We started in mid–November and kept at it until the Christmas holidays. We went all over the place, in every major city, and no one, no organization supported the government 's position, on the contrary. Between 75 and 80 per cent of the people we heard were against the government's proposals.

And this is supposed to be a government that listens? No, Mr. Speaker, it does not. It does remember, though. Last year, in every city it toured, it was met with protests. It remembers and is thinking: "If we act faster, we might hold the hearings in Ottawa, and people will appear in committee there".

I challenge the government to go and present its UI project in major cities. I bet it will not do it, hoping to proceed unnoticed, in the deep of winter. The committee will get briefs from national organizations, but not from citizens. I remember the last hearing, last year in Bathurst, when Acadians came to tell us how difficult and dangerous it would be for this part of New Brunswick. They feared the worst, because of the cuts the government said it would make somewhere. This time, we are not going to do the same.

As opposition critic for training and youth, I would like to take the last few minutes I have left to tell you how much damage this bill will do to young people in particular. The minister was saying: "This bill is very progressive". I say this bill is regressive. The minister was talking about fairness for everybody, I say that, on the contrary, it is unfair for young people. Why? Because from now on, to be eligible to unemployment insurance, you will need 910 hours of work, instead of the current 300 hours.

This bill is not only bad for young people, it is also bad for women who re–enter the workforce. After raising their children, many women would like to get a job, but they will be in the same situation as young people. This legislation is also regressive for new immigrants looking for jobs after landing in this country.

• (1250)

The 910 hours mean 26 weeks at 35 hours per week. This is a considerable number of hours.

Before that 20 fifteen–hour weeks, that is to say 300 hours of work, were enough for first time claimants to qualify for benefits. After the reform you will need 26 thirty–five–hour weeks, that is to say 910 hours of work, to be eligible for benefits.

Before the reform 12 fifteen–hour weeks, or 180 hours, were enough to qualify for benefits in areas of high unemployment.

After the reform 28 fifteen–hour weeks, or 420 hours of work, will be necessary to be eligible for benefits in areas of high unemployment.

Before the reform, people who were already entitled to unemployment insurance and who had worked 20 fifteen hour weeks, or 300 hours, were able to collect benefits in low unemployment areas. After the reform, they will be able to collect benefits if they have worked 20 thirty–five hour weeks, or 700 hours.

Here is another case of inequality. For frequent users, namely people who have been on UI three times in five years, there is an absolute guarantee that their benefits will be reduced by at least 1 per cent each year, which is at least 5 per cent in five years. This category of unemployed workers will definitely lose out. And the government says yes to equity? What the minister is saying about equity is that a number of people who were working less than 15 hours a week did not have to pay UI premiums. Now, everyone must pay from the first hour of work. However, there is no guarantee that they will be able to benefit from it, quite the contrary.

According to the Canadian Labour Congress, in 1970, 77 per cent of unemployed workers were covered by UI. This percentage would be less than 50 per cent today. The Canadian Labour Congress estimates that, with the reform, two unemployed workers out of three will not be eligible for benefits. Is that equitable? Is that progressive? I say no.

Since you are inviting me to do so, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by pointing out that if this reform had been known in detail in the form of a bill and if a real consultation was still going on in an appropriate context and an appropriate period, and if this period had been established before the Quebec referendum, I tell you sincerely that we would now be talking about other things in this House, because this reform would not have been adopted.

[English]

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against the Bloc motion being debated today. The reforms of Canada's unemployment insurance are not only overdue. In many ways they do not go far enough and are too complex. While the reforms will impose hardship on some Canadians, they will at the same time bring much larger economic and social benefits to society as a whole.

I make this judgment after much study. In my career as a professional economist I was deeply concerned with the economic and social effects of unemployment insurance. In the mid–1970s I published a number of studies and organized an international conference that examined the effect of the level of benefits and ease of access to UI on recorded unemployment rates in Canada.

A few years ago I published a study that argued the large gap between Canadian and U.S. unemployment rates, which first appeared in the early 1970s, was caused by the increased generosity of our system initiated by Canadian reforms at that time. Incidentally the co–author of this study was Dr. Josef Bonnici, a former student of mine who is presently the minister of finance for the Government of Malta.

In February 1996 I will participate in a major conference of social scientists which will re–examine the issue of Canada–U.S. differences in unemployment rates to be held in Ottawa. My work on the effects of unemployment insurance on unemployment was fundamental economic theory which in turn guided reproducible econometric measurement co–authored by several colleagues and experts in this field.

• (1255)

Our results were verified by the economic council. It is fair to say that today even the left leaning part of the chattering class of academics, journalists and other intellectuals has accepted the validity of the basic premise.

Assar Lindbeck, a famous Swedish economist who is a strong supporter of social democratic policies, recently published a paper in which he noted that social support programs like unemployment insurance induce the creation of institutions and ethical norms which increase the demand for the support programs.

The chattering classes in the past tended to infer from my analysis that I recommended the abandonment of unemployment insurance. I never did. The policy issue has always been the correct level of UI benefits and ease of access which maximize overall social welfare. There is no doubt the more generous the system is, the higher is the welfare of those receiving the benefits. However, on the other hand, the higher the benefits, the higher the unemployment, the higher the premiums payable by workers, the higher the risk of dependency of habitual users, and a host of other economic and social costs.

For a long time the political culture in Canada has resulted in the denial that these costs exist or, if they exist, that they are largely relative to the benefits received by unemployed.

About 15 years ago I was asked to be a guest on "Cross Country Check–Up". The views expressed during that period on the subject were most extreme. However, most important, as Claude Forget told me after he found that his report on the issue was ignored by the political system, the case for a less generous system has no political constituency quite simply because the economic and social benefits are diffused and poorly understood.

Those suffering from the reduction of benefits are clearly identified and well organized. No political party in Canada could afford to make the system less generous. This was true until recently when the Canadian debt and deficit began to threaten the very existence of all social programs.

The shift in the perceived political payoff from doing nothing and making UI less generous has not come easy to people like the Minister of Human Resources Development who used to deny vehemently even the existence of insurance induced unemployment and other costs. The timid and convoluted reforms to which his ministry gave birth reflect the struggle he had in admitting that these undesirable effects not only exist but are very costly to society.

Let me return to the Bloc resolution being debated today. It is true, as it states, that UI reforms will make some Canadians worse off, especially those in seasonal industries. However, my long and intense study of the UI system has convinced me that these reforms at the same time bring substantial benefits to many other Canadians so that overall welfare has increased. This certainly has been the finding of a number of royal commissions which looked at the question.

A basic theorem in economics is that under conditions like these, where some gain and some lose from a given policy, the government should offer assistance to those who have been asked to carry the burden of adjustment. After all it was a government created system, not their own fault, which caused them to enter these seasonal industries in excessive numbers and at non–economic wages. At the same time the rest of society which benefits from the changes may be expected to pay for easing the costs of transition for those asked to bear them.

For this reason I take the opportunity to urge the government to stick to its reforms and possibly strengthen them while at the same time make more generous provisions to ease the pain of transition felt by those affected adversely and directly by the reforms.

• (1300)

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion made by the Minister of Human Resources Development to refer Bill C–111 to the standing committee.

We have every reason to move forward with a thorough examination of this bill by a committee of the House. We have every reason to allow an early public review of its provisions. We have no reason to hold back and nothing to gain by preventing the broad consultations necessary with such an important piece of legislation.

All members of this House recognize that this is a very important bill. It has been the subject of vigorous debate and intense questioning from all sides, yet throughout the debate we have seen something very rare: the unanimous agreement on the central point of this legislation. We all agree that we need to reform the old UI program. Throughout all the debate and questioning, no one has suggested that the status quo is acceptable. No one has suggested that we can afford to leave things as they are. Everyone has spoken of the need to find a better way to help unemployed Canadians.

This rare unanimity reflects a broad consensus throughout the country. More than 100,000 people who took part in the consultations said we need a better jobs system for Canadians. Almost nine out of ten Canadians told us we need a fundamental overhaul of the old UI program to make it work. Provincial leaders, business groups, professionals and community organizations have spoken clearly over the past weeks about the need for change. Bill C–111 presents a clear and progressive agenda for change.

Now we have an opportunity to hear from Canadians about this agenda. Members of the House have an opportunity to subject the bill to the rigorous examination of standing committee hearings. We have an opportunity to use our time well over the coming weeks to make the debate on Bill C–111 more inclusive, to open up the process, to consult and to listen before we proceed with the legislative process when the House resumes.

It would be inexcusable to delay these consultations. Every day we delay we put jobs and hope for thousands of Canadians on hold. Every day we delay we are perpetuating a UI program that is not only out of date but is actually hurting the people it is supposed to help. We are perpetuating a system that leaves too many Canadians stuck in the past when what they need is a springboard to help them change, adjust and adapt to the future.

The new jobs system, employment insurance, will make it easier for people at risk to work longer and encourage employers to keep people in their jobs longer. Think about what that means. Think about what it means to the 400,000 Canadians right now who find themselves stuck in a constant rut of getting from one benefit program to another.

If the new system can get those people just one additional work week, we will save the entire system $50 million, money we can plough back into the system to turn that one extra week of work into two, two weeks into four, four weeks into eight. Instead of a cycle of joblessness we can create a new cycle of employment and hope for almost half a million Canadians who want to work and deserve an even break.

That is what this new jobs system is all about. Think what it means for the thousands of people who can move into new jobs created by small businesses across the country. Right now the old UI program is killing those jobs every day. A survey of small businesses in Atlantic Canada tells us that employers just cannot compete with the UI system for workers.

With our new jobs system we will cut insurance premiums, the tax on jobs, to assist them. We will create a system that supports employment and job creation instead of one that perpetuates unemployment. Think of what it means to the hundreds of thousands of job seekers who will get direct help through new employment benefits, help that is more effective, that is more flexible, that will get results faster than anything they can get now.

• (1305)

With wage subsidies, each year we will be able to help some 65,000 people get off benefits and into jobs. Studies show that these subsidies can help each one of these people increase their income and gain an average of 17 additional weeks of employment each year.

With earnings supplements we can help make work pay for some 75,000 workers each year, people who deserve more than the old UI treadmill. We know from joint pilot projects with New Brunswick and British Columbia that these supplements get results and help people secure their place in the workforce.

We will help thousands of Canadians each year create their own jobs through self–employment, a key driving force for job creation and growth in the new economy. Studies show that by providing the right kind of support at the right time, people who were without work can create businesses that last and create new jobs by hiring employees.

We can create new job creation partnerships, mobilizing the resources of the provinces, community groups and organizations across the country to help people adapt to the demands of the new workplace, increase their earnings and gain the independence that only a job can provide.

We can work with the provinces to help individuals through skills loans and grants, giving more opportunities for people to make a real investment in their own future, to get the kind of skills required to enter the job market of the 21st century from a position of strength.

We can make this kind of assistance, all of these employment benefits more accessible to more people: to some 500,000 part time workers who are not even covered by the UI program; to people who have simply been abandoned by the old system, marginalized by a system that does not reflect the realities of the 1990s.

Employment insurance is not just another version of the old UI program. It is truly Canada's jobs system for the 21st century. It is part of this government's agenda for jobs and growth. This agenda for jobs and growth is on track and it is working. We are getting the deficit under control in reality, not just in rhetoric. By 1997–98 the government's new borrowing requirements in relation to the size of the economy will be at the lowest level since 1969.

We are matching deficit reduction with an all out drive for job creation. Over the past year we generated almost half a million full time jobs, more than in any year since 1987. That is what this government was elected to do. We were given a mandate to get Canada and Canadians back to work. Bill C–111, employment insurance, is part of our agenda to fulfil that mandate.

Canadians need the opportunity now to review Bill C–111 through the kind of forum that only a standing committee of the House of Commons can provide. We can give them this forum now. We have no reason to put this very important review of an extremely important piece of legislation on hold. We owe it to Canadians to move forward. I urge all members of the House to support this motion so that we can look to the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is my duty to take the floor today to support the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Mercier.

We are now seeing the aftermath of the Martin budget tabled last February. As we feared, and it is even worse in the opinion of many, the unemployment insurance reform hits the most vulnerable among us.

The people in my riding, Lotbinière, already have an axe to grind against the Minister, Mr. Axworthy, who, with his reform, has deprived them of the services of the Victoriaville employment centre. In the middle of July, thousands of my constituents were by my side in an effort to save personalized services near their homes. We got the assurance that that minimum would be maintained.

However, since then, the minister has been avoiding me and any opportunity to meet with me in order to settle the issue. I can tell you this was a prelude to the harmful effects of the Liberal government's reform.

• (1310)

People were afraid, and rightly so, that their employment centre would become a mere booth, which would have forced them to drive over 100 kilometres to get person to person services; you can imagine their reaction now that the reform is truly coming to light.

Before dealing with manpower development, I would like to warn people against the series of measures that, for the most part, are to come into force on Canada Day, the 1st of July. It is already a sad day, the government chose the date well. The Axworthy reform will hit those most in need hardest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I can understand that it is a slight oversight, but we must always refer to our colleagues either by their riding's name or the name of their department, not by their family name. I would simply ask the hon. member for Lotbinière to abide by that rule.

Mr. Landry: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. An impact study by the federal government demonstrates that people whose income is under $25,000 will be those hardest hit. This shift in policy by a supposedly Liberal government follows the lead of the Ontario and Alberta governments. It is hard to come to grips with the fact that the people opposite are not Conservatives.

The government resorts to policies that smack of the Reaganism of the 1980s, and are still being advocated by the American right wing. Apparently, some Canadians have been contaminated.

It is an understatement to say that the most disadvantaged among us will be affected. Women, young people, and part time workers will be subjected to a treatment that is far from benign. Considering that 1.5 million part time workers are women, that women make up 70 per cent of the part time working force, that one third of them would prefer to work full time, that 40 per cent of part time workers are under 24, you can tell which groups the Liberals are targeting. Eligibility criteria will drive them onto welfare.

The qualifying period will be increased from 12 to 28 fifteen hour weeks, or from 180 to 420 hours. Part time workers working from 15 to 35 hours a week will be hardest hit. This new eligibility criterion will impact most on women, young people and new UI claimants, that is those asking for assistance for the first time.

These people will have to work 26 thirty–five hour weeks, or 910 hours. In fact, eligibility requirements will triple for those who are filing their first application. As I said, this will greatly impact on women and young people, whether at the end of their schooling or when they return to the job market after a long absence.

Moreover, while the government is trying to make us believe it is ready to withdraw from any direct commitment in manpower training, it is in fact ignoring the consensus reached in Quebec about the transfer of federal resources and powers.

The minister and his leader claim they are withdrawing from manpower training, but in fact they are once again suggesting what the then Quebec premier, Daniel Johnson, a Liberal, had described as a bargain agreement back in 1994. Under the bill introduced last Friday, if there is no agreement with a province, the money invested in training could be given directly to individuals.

How can Quebec adopt an efficient manpower policy— which is what everybody wants, even the National Assembly, unions and employers—when Ottawa could go over its head and get away with it? In the previous legislation, the minister did not have the power to make agreements with one province or a group of provinces. From now on, it will deal with anybody it chooses. Provinces will be considered in the same way as municipalities or local organizations. Previously, under the national legislation on training, the minister had to consult with provinces before launching a program in this area of jurisdiction. Now, no limit is placed on federal actions. The sky is the limit.

If we look at the way the federal government does things, it seems highly improbable that it will eliminate overlap and duplication in the area of manpower training. The 1994 offer provided for the withdrawal of the federal government with financial compensation.

• (1315)

Under the Training Loans and Grants Program, Ottawa will bypass the Government of Quebec by giving directly to the unemployed funds that used to be transferred to the provinces. André Bourbeau, the Quebec employment minister in 1991, has condemned this tactic, declaring that what was unacceptable was that this approach was a total improvisation despite the fact that, more than ever before, government actions regarding manpower training must be planned and based on priorities.

Two years earlier, the Forum for employment had been a decisive step in the claims of Quebec regarding the transfer of responsibilities in manpower training.

As I said earlier, it was at that time that partners in the Quebec labour market, namely unions, employers and the government, agreed to ask that Ottawa hand over all of the responsibilities regarding manpower training.

No later than last week, the National Assembly of Quebec unanimously passed a resolution asking for the withdrawal of the federal government and repatriation of funds invested by Ottawa in manpower training.

Yet, both governments agree that changes are needed to manpower training programs. Minister Axworthy did declare, on page 30 of his discussion paper on the social program reform, the following, and I quote: "However, the system now is too hit–or–miss. That's why the results have been inadequate—There are too many mismatched programs, with inconsistent rules and too much red tape—Programs offered by different levels of government are often not coordinated. In short, the system must change."

In fact, the control that the federal wants to keep is only a pretext. Ottawa wants to use the $5 billion UI fund surplus to meet its deficit reduction targets. This clearly means misappropriating premiums paid by employees and employers, nothing more and nothing less.

Last Friday, the Conseil du patronat du Québec, whose members are definitely not sovereignists, asked Ottawa to leave manpower training to Quebec. So, if one considers what has been happening in the past few years, one realizes that men and women from all parties, of all political stripes, are demanding control over manpower training. I say it once again, I believe that Quebec or the Yukon, or any Canadian province, is in a better position to really know what is needed.

So, I wish that one day the federal government, as well as the hon. members opposite, will understand that not only manpower training, but also all related areas should come under Quebec's jurisdiction. Money should not be given directly to the unemployed, but, for the sake of a consistent policy, we should be given all necessary tools and levers. When I say tool chest, of course I mean all the tools we have inside it as well. Not just the box, but the contents, are needed for the thing to really work. Like the tools in their chest, people too need to find a fit within a province, whatever the province.

Whether that province is Quebec or one of the maritime or western provinces, I think we are all grown up enough to do our homework on our own. Only this past week the Conseil du patronat du Québec submitted a document, the stated purpose of which was to prove that federalism can work very well with decentralized manpower training. I am not worried in the least; over time the federal government will learn, and our friends across the way will realize that there is a place for everyone. Let us give to each his due. Then those with jobs, those without jobs, everybody will be happy.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to oppose Bill C–111 because I see this as the government playing political football with the UI system.

I had the opportunity recently of doing a householder questionnaire in my riding with regard to UI. Out of 1,110 replies, 608 said the government should get out of UI and turn the entire program over to joint management, as it is already being funded by employers and employees.

• (1320)

I have to go along with that when I look at the cost of administering the unemployment act today: $1.2 billion taken right off the backs of the working people. It is too unmanageable.

If there are concerns in terms of the unemployment insurance program, it should be left up to the people who are contributing directly to it, the workers and the employers, not the government. This government, along with the other governments, has done absolutely nothing with regard to correcting unemployment.

Out of that survey, 436 or 39 per cent said to tighten up and streamline the existing programs; 675 said to give employers and employees greater say in how it is run; 633 said to have the same qualifying period across Canada and forget all these differences; 628 said to shorten the period people can collect; 608 said to establish a separate fund for fishermen outside of the UI program; 569 said there should be a longer qualifying period but only 369 or 33 per cent out of 1,110 said to lower the amounts people can collect.

From this survey there seems to be a widespread awareness with regard to seasonal workers. In my constituency there are a number of seasonal workers in agriculture, tourism and forestry. These are the three biggest areas in my constituency. These are the three biggest contributors to the UI program. They see nothing here that would do anything to help that situation in order to collect.

Families are hard pressed in Canada today. We look at what is going on. We wonder what has really happened here. We have forced both parents out into the work world in order to pay rising taxes. We have lost the total concept of family unity because of government policies.

I regard this tax grab by the government as just another policy, another penalty to put on the working people, another way to keep the government satisfied with the way it lives and not the way the working people of Canada have to live.

Why are so many people unemployed? What has the government been doing for two years? This is the question out there. We can talk to educated people coming out of our universities. They are the people looking for work. What has the government done? Its fancy spin doctors put in all kinds of things they have done, this and that, but the bottom line is the unemployment level is still there and the people on welfare are still there.

There is a mine waiting to come into production in northern B.C. It is called Kemess. There has been a large amount of money spent on the exploration work of this mine. There are a lot of people waiting, a lot of jobs waiting. They went through the whole scenario, through the provincial jurisdictions. They went to every office they had to go to.

The province passed the environmental part of it. It passed everything. It signed off. It told these people to go ahead. Now comes the federal government. Here comes this caring, sharing, worrying federal government. It says: "We checked this lake out and there are nine pair of bull trout and so this mine cannot go ahead". Five hundred jobs this caring, sharing government has put on hold; $350 million. It means nothing to the people in the House sitting over there. Do we really have much faith in any program regarding unemployment which the government can bring in? I think not.

Where has industry gone? What has happened to our jobs? We spend too much. The government spends too much so it has to raise taxes. When we raise taxes we drive industry out. When we drive industry out we have high unemployment.

We listened to the government. It made promises in its beautiful fancy red book. It was presented on a platter for the people to look at so they could judge the government. This was before the election. It mentioned the GST. The GST has hit employers something fierce. They spend a lot of their time after hours trying to collect taxes for the government while not getting paid for it.

They have no more holidays like they used to have. Again it takes away one or both from the family so the government can feed off the taxpayer. The government promised it was to get rid of the GST. Liberals stood on the platforms all across the country. They swore to the people out there because they wanted their votes. They said the GST will be gone within two years. If I remember correctly the Deputy Prime Minister offered to resign; another unkept promise and the GST is still there.

The big fear now is maybe the Liberals will try to introduce something else twice as expensive. They say they will change the name: UI to EI, unemployment insurance to employment insurance. I ask the hon. members on the other side, what is the cost to the taxpayer of the government's changing a lousy name in order to introduce this?

Why could you not still call it unemployment insurance and make your changes, because one of you wanted to get a little star on a book beside your name? That will cost us another million dollars or so. You think people out there are stupid. They are not stupid. They know exactly what you are doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt any member at any time but I ask members for their co–operation to direct all their interventions through the Chair and not directly across the floor at one another.

Mr. Stinson: Mr. Speaker, I ask members on the other side if they really think the people out there, the taxpayers, the working people, the people who have to give up their home lives in order to support the government, do not know what is going on. I think they know full well what is going on. The government will have to answer to them in a few years, unfortunately. In Canada that is what it takes, years and years of trial and error.

Here is another example of government regulations. The cost of logging on the British Columbia coast has gone from $67 per cubic metre in 1992 to over $100 per cubic metre today. Does government, federal and provincial—we might as well throw it in because it is one and the same—forget these people have to be competitive in the world market in order to sell their product? I think it does. When jobs shut down, when companies shut down we have unemployment.

It is nice to sit here and talk about how concerned we are for the Canadian people as we chase their jobs out through regulations, through overtaxation. We can sit here and pat ourselves on the back and say what a wonderful country we have. It really makes one wonder what a wonderful country we have.

We have a government that does not know how to live within its means. It can only raise taxes in order to survive. It says "this is a big deal, we are cutting here. The employee will not have to pay as much". It forgets it jacked the prices up for two years running. It jacks them up 7 cents and cuts back 5 cents. It is a five–year increase no matter how one looks at it. However, the government thinks we will overlook it because of the 5–cent reduction. People have a long memory and the government will have to answer to them at the next election.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada, I am pleased to rise to speak to the motion to refer Bill C–111 to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

While the proposals to reform the UI system contained in this bill will impact on all parts of Canada, it is widely recognized that the new system will have a significant impact in the Atlantic provinces.

By referring the bill to the standing committee, members of the House and many other concerned Canadians will have a full opportunity to review and discuss the legislation. For my part, I believe it is important that the special needs of Atlantic Canada be considered and understood and that the capacity of the measures presented in the bill to meet these special needs be understood. The standing committee will offer the appropriate forum to do that.

I am convinced that as Canadians better understand the new approaches being presented and the special employment generating measures contained in the bill, they will recognize that there are substantial advantages to be gained from this legislation, both individually and collectively, for our region. At the same time, the committee offers an opportunity to bring all our unique perspective to this debate to make sure that these changes look after the interests of Atlantic Canada and Atlantic Canadian workers.

In moving the new employment insurance act from the House to the standing committee, and in considering how we can best serve the needs of Canadians, there are a number of points that should be kept in mind by our colleagues in the House, by the members of the committee and by all concerned Canadians affected by this legislation.

To begin with, we should recognize the important role the Minister of Human Resources Development has had in developing this comprehensive new program. In particular, he should be congratulated for having already given Atlantic Canadians his full attention in these matters. He has taken the time to meet with us in the Atlantic Canada caucus. He has met with the provincial premiers. He has met with business and labour leaders from Atlantic Canada. He has met with many others who have asked to have their special needs considered.

There has been no shortage of consultation between Atlantic Canadians and the minister and his officials as they grappled with this very complex situation. I can only say that the minister's office has replaced my wife's phone number on my speed dial as the first call that I make for the last three weeks.

The minister has consistently shown a personal willingness to consider various and often directly conflicting points of view with an open mind and has demonstrated a capacity to understand and integrate them. It is my personal impression that he has shown a great deal of integrity in dealing with these issues and that he realizes there is a special concern for unemployed people in Atlantic Canada.

I would like to identify some of the very specific benefits of the new EI bill. First, the new bill will give broader coverage. According to the department as many as 500,000 more people will have access to employment insurance than had access to unemployment insurance. That is a huge improvement that comes as a result of the shift from weeks of work to hours of work as the measure to establish eligibility for benefits.

Atlantic Canadians have a short season where people can find large numbers of hours of work. Therefore, it is very important that all of those hours receive credit when establishing eligibility for benefits. By using hours rather than weeks, all of those hours will count in establishing the minimum requirement for benefits and also in establishing the duration of benefits. That is a big improvement.

We also have low income protection so that those people who, through no fault of their own, cannot find enough work in the course of a year to establish an income that would sustain a family can get relief. This new legislation on the threshold of the child tax credit offers the opportunity for up to 80 per cent in replacement income which is another significant improvement over the unemployment insurance program of the past.

Also, there is going to be a clawback on the high income side. I am very supportive of this. Employment insurance is designed to meet two needs, to serve two purposes. First, if one loses a job, employment insurance is designed to give income while one seeks employment. A second function is performed by employment insurance. It sustains a workforce in communities, many of which are in Atlantic Canada, where there is not sufficient income through employment to keep a family year round. Through the employment insurance program incomes have been supplemented to keep that labour force in place and keep those communities alive.

The argument for income supplements cannot be applied to high incomes. It does not serve that function. Therefore I am very supportive of a graduated clawback and I am pleased to see it in the new bill.

The employment benefits that are unrelated to the income benefits of which there will be five replacing 39 will be locally administered. The department in Ottawa will not be deciding on a whole series of programs, budgeting for those programs and then sending the package, in my case, to the local office in Fredericton. Rather it will be determined what are the criteria for those five programs and the local office can decide which of those five programs makes the most sense in my community and in my region. That is a big improvement. It will mean a lot more flexibility for the local office.

Another important point is that by distinguishing between eligibility for income benefits and eligibility for employment related benefits, many people who were ineligible for benefits in the past will be eligible if they have been on employment insurance over the last three years or the last five years in the case of maternity benefits. This is a big improvement.

In the past people would exhaust their benefits while they were in a training program, or in some other kind of a program and they would no longer be eligible. Now they will be eligible for the duration of that program.

In many cases the workers exhaust their benefits before their seasonal jobs start again. If someone is working in a park, in the woods or in a fish plant and draws a certain duration of benefits those benefits are exhausted but the fish plant does not open again for three weeks, four weeks and in some case ten weeks. Those people will now be eligible for the employment benefits in the package. They will have the opportunity to receive other kinds of programs that will allow them to supplement their incomes and therefore not have to go on income assistance.

Probably most important is that all members will have the opportunity to speak to additional improvements to this legislation. That is why I believe it is going to committee before second reading, so we can express to the committee the needs of Atlantic Canadians. I would like to speak specifically to the question of consecutive weeks as the method by which the rate of benefit is calculated.

I would make the suggestion to the committee when the bill gets there that all the weeks where work is involved should be considered when establishing the rate or the income level against which the benefit should apply. It is very important to recognize that in Atlantic Canada very often work comes in pieces. There are spaces in between those pieces of work. People could work in the spring, have the summer off and then work again in the fall. All of that work should be considered. Otherwise many people will be paying premiums on employment that will not be factored in when calculating income to establish benefits. That is very important. I hope the committee will be sensitive to this issue. I understand the minister made reference to it when introducing the bill. I see that as a good sign. I hope the committee will take it under consideration and make that improvement in the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part today in the debate at second reading of Bill C–111, an act respecting unemployment insurance in Canada. I should point out immediately that I and the rest of the Bloc will be voting against this bill, which is underhanded, unfair, regressive, anti–social, anti–worker and above all anti–unemployed.

This new program will be called employment insurance instead of unemployment insurance. It could just as well be called poverty insurance, or destitution insurance. The government has finally tabled its unemployment insurance reform, which it kept hidden until after the Quebec referendum on October 30.

Basically, as a result of this bill, eligibility criteria will be much stricter and frequent users will be severely penalized. The first victims of these cutbacks will be young people, women, seasonal workers and immigrants. Program cuts will total two billion dollars annually, including $640 million in Quebec.
