Mr. VALLANCE: Time is up.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to speak a moment more.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member who preceded me that probably the fewer the quotations, the product of other peoples' brains, made by hon. members, the better will be the discussion. This House of Commons is a fairly accurate cross section of the men and women who comprise the population of this broad dominion. It must reflect the moods and desires of those men and women. I believe that individuality may be better shown by accepting responsibility for our own statements than by reading from books the statements of others.

During the course of this debate we have heard the statements of hon. members both to the right and the left of Mr. Speaker who are suffering from the Russian jag. We have to take a realistic viewpoint of what is going on in that country, the forces that brought about the revolution, and the reasons for it, with which the Russian people and no others were thoroughly familiar. That country will work out its own destiny in its own way. May I observe that while in Russia there is poverty amidst scarcity, in this broad dominion there is poverty amidst plenty.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Which is better?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some one has asked which is better. I reply that poverty amidst plenty is at least a challenge to our good sense and our leadership.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Is it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe it was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) who made the observation a few evenings ago that this resolution was a challenge to democracy. I believe the challenge to democracy comes from the other side of the house. Certainly democracy would be challenged if the attitude of the men and women in constituencies such as West York were truly reflected by the statements made by their representatives in the House of Commons. Members of the house have been forbidden to speak in the city of Toronto. Then they say that this resolution is a challenge to democracy. We have heard a great deal about freedom of speech. I have fixed opinions along that line; if I had my way there would be a forum in every town and hamlet of Canada in which men and women could express their opinions unfettered by those who disagreed with them. That is a good old British custom. I have before me a clipping which gives an account of a parade of 100,000 people which only a few days ago passed through the city of London and held a meeting concerning unemployment. If they can do that in Great Britain, it is only reasonable that we should be allowed to do it here. I want to say, however, that freedom of speech carries with it responsibilities. I do not believe any individual or group of individuals who preach the overthrow of democractic institutions, as we know them have a right to that freedom of speech. In my judgment it is only logical the democratic institutions should protect themselves from forcible overthrow. There is in my opinion a licence for freedom of speech. I make that observation because the statement is made that labour members are to some extent connected with the Third Internationale. I want to make this perfectly clear, that there is as much difference between the labour movement of this country and the tactics of the Third Internationale as there is between atheism and Christianity.

Mr. BAKER: What is the difference?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think we will all agree that very few know what the future holds for this country, or any other country for that matter. Fundamental changes have to be made to meet the problems that confront us. Within the precincts of this house a man that the Prime Minister of this country admitted was one of the brightest financial minds in the world to-day, Sir Josiah Stamp, made the observation, and members of this house applauded it, that he felt that we shall reach a stage halfway between our system and the Russian system. That is the opinion of a responsible man of the world who at least knows the way he is going.

Some have spoken of confiscation. Good heavens, why talk about confiscation? It is going on all around us. Among the people I pass my life with, their houses and everything they possess is being confiscated at this very moment, through circumstances over which they have absolutely no control. Yet hon. members talk about confiscation. I want to say this, speaking for myself as an individual and without undertaking to represent the viewpoint of the labour movement of this country, that I am absolutely opposed to confiscation by the state. Any man who would suggest such a thing is not in his right senses, in my judgment.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am looking at you. I believe the changes contemplated by this resolution should be made gradually and through the recognized constitutional channels. I believe they must be founded on conviction and on enlightened public opinion. I would remind you that cooperation or collective effort brought us through the greatest conflict in history, enabled the countries of the commonwealth to emerge successfully from the most destructive war that we know of. That is why I believe that the resolution is not so destructive as implied by some hon. members who have taken part in this debate. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) who spoke the other evening and said so much about the rights of the individual, I understand is a lawyer by profession—

An hon. MEMBER: That is no crime.

Mr. MITCHELL: Someone says it is no crime. But I want to say this, that the legal profession has developed out of the control of the individual by the state, in the progress of mankind from his lowliest stage up to the present. It deals with the law which controls the individual, defends him, prosecutes him, within the framework of the state. I sincerely believe that social control has made a greater contribution to the life of the people of this and all civilized countries than did the rank individualism that some people would have us drift back to.

I believe this depression has reached the stage at which plain language should be used. I believe that one can love his country and yet use plain language and face facts. Some people think that a kind Providence is going to stick his hands through the clouds and pull the chestnuts out of the fire for us. Gentlemen, it is not done that way. We got ourselves into this difficulty and we have got to think ourselves out of it.

Mr. PRICE: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will come to that in a minute. I am not unmindful of the difficulties that stand in the way of the ultimate realization of the principles enunciated in this resolution. I believe they will have to be met, as other problems in life, by trial and error. I believe that the social and economic forces of this country are subject to change, the same as any biological organism. We have had change since the dawn of history, improvement in social conditions, cultural conditions. More ample educational facilities have been provided. Surely few among those who strenuously opposed this resolution appreciate how far we have progressed from nineteenth century individualism towards the ultimate adoption of the principles enunciated in this resolution. In my judgment public control and regulation as they have developed are all to the good of the body politic. In the province I come from we have the hydro-electric system, one of the greatest examples of practical cooperation one could wish to see, though I may say that it may be wrecked by the private ownership mentality that we have seen displayed recently in the absorption of the assets of the Dominion Power and Transmission Company and the Abitibi Power and Paper Company. Such incidents have the power to destroy the influence of that wonderful undertaking. Then we have the Canadian National Railways, often criticized by hon. members here, but I think you will agree with me that it was taken over by this country because private enterprise completely fell down. We had reached the stage where no money could be made out of it and the child was left on the doorstep of the Canadian people. Personally I still believe that the Canadian National Railways will reflect credit on this country when we return to more normal times.

Then there is the radio, as mentioned by my colleague, the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). In medicine again we have a good example of the desire of the individual to make some contribution to the wellbeing of his time, where the incentive is not profit. Think of such men as Mackenzie, Osler, Pasteur, Harvey and Lister: thse men made great contributions to the science in which they were engaged, and they did so without any hope of enormous rewards. I have often thought that if the problems that affect us economically and socially were attacked with the same vigour and with the same high ideals in view, for the uplift of men and women in this dominion, we should soon be out of the trouble in which we find ourselves at the present time. Medicine knows no country; in fact, the profession lays down the principle that any discovery made by one of its members must be passed on for the good of all mankind.

Take the question of public health. Here great strides have been made. Lives have been saved through the insistence of the state that the scourges that afflict mankind shall be eliminated. There are one or two figures which I would give with regard to my own city, to show the effect of medicine on public health as expressed in a cooperative way in that community. In 1905 the annual death rate was 14·4 per thousand, and in 1932, 9·4; the infant death rate in 1905 was 158·5 per thousand children born alive, and in 1932, 56·7 per thousand. In connection with tuberculosis the death rate in 1905 was 120·9 and in 1932, 43·2, and in 1905 there were 20 deaths from typhoid fever whereas in 1932 there was but one death, and this person was infected while out of the city. Diphtheria has been practically eliminated.

A question has been raised with respect to the constitutional difficulties that confront the country in meeting the problems that have arisen from the depression. I am not unmindful of this but I would point out that it is constitutional difficulties that sometimes kill the individual. I believe that the constitution of this country as embodied in the British North America Act is just as amenable to change as anything else. The fathers of confederation, living as they did in a world where transportation and communication were so much slower than they are to-day, did a remarkably fine job; but if the problems arising in our industrial and agricultural structure in the year 1933 are to be met, I think it is absolutely necesary that the act be amended to cope with many of these problems on a national rather than a provincial basis.

History has taught us that it is best to build on experience and tradition rather than to trust entirely to abstract principles. It is seldom possible to predict what will happen under new conditions. Taking a broad point of view of the difficulties that face us to-day, I am of the opinion that there are two avenues of approach to our problem. We have either to scrap the present industrial system and go back to industry on a smaller scale and more individualism, through pure economics of laissez faire, or we have to plan and utilize our potentialities for the maintenance of the present productivity of the country. In this connection I would quote a passage from the report of the committee which was appointed by President Hoover to deal with social trends. The report states:

> The committee suggests that there might in time emerge a national advisory council, including scientific, educational, governmental, economic (industrial, agricultural, and labour) points of contact, or other appropriate elements, able to contribute to the consideration of the basic social problems of the nation. Such an agency might consider some fundamental questions of the social order, economic, governmental, educational, technical, cultural, always in their interrelation, and in the light of the trends and possibilities of modern science.
> It is clear that the type of planning now most urgently required is neither economic planning alone, nor governmental planning alone. The new synthesis must include the scientific, the educational, as well as the economic (including here the industrial and the agricultural) and also the governmental. All these factors are inextricably intertwined in modern life, and it is impossible to make rapid progress under present conditions without drawing them all together. . . . Fully realizing its mission, the committee does not wish to assume an attitude of alarmist irresponsibility, but on the other hand it would be highly negligent to gloss over the stark and bitter realities of the social situation, and to ignore the imminent perils in further advance of our heavy technical machinery over crumbling roads and shaking bridges. There are times when silence is not neutrality, but assent.

The foregoing is from Review of Reviews and World's Work, arising out of the report of the committee appointed by President Hoover, and this is the comment of the reviewer:

> To all those who contributed to the success of the committee's work, and to the committee itself, the volumes will be a lasting credit. Americans may some day have occasion to feel that President Hoover's conception and inauguration of the work marked one of the high-points in his presidential career.

In my judgment, the state must take the lead. We find today that the leaders in finance and industry have fallen down. They are busy handing out advice and at the same time putting on the brakes on any governmental action. I am firmly convinced that so great is the drive of circumstances and events that the impetus to collectivism cannot be checked. Men and women of all schools of thought see the inevitable logic in this; they realize that this must happen if civilization is to be saved. In my opinion the state is the only stable thing left, it must be said in fairness that the state is one of the few institutions which has not gypped the investor. If I may visualize the drift of events, I see the establishment as part of our national life of agencies to direct and plan industrial stabilization, to establish minimum prices, to set up standards of quality, to reform the monetary system and to subordinate credit to industrial needs.

Much was said to-day by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) in connection with Philip Snowden, now Lord Snowden. He received some measure of praise from both speakers. Looking over my files to-day I came across a copy of the debates in the British House of Commons covering a discussion almost identical with that now being held in this house. Apparently we are just ten years behind the times, because this debate was held on March 20, 1923. Mr. Snowden moved the following resolution:

> That, in view of the failure of the capitalist system to adequately utilize and organize natural resources and productive power, or provide the necessary standard of life for vast numbers of the population, and believing that the cause of this failure lies in the private ownership and control of the means of production and distribution, this house declares that legislative effort should be directed to the gradual suppression of the capitalist system by an industrial and social order based on the public ownership and democratic control of the instruments of production and distribution.

Mr. HANBURY: That government was in power for years after that and Philip Snowden could have put that resolution into effect.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Liberals had a platform, and so had the Conservatives.

Mr. HANBURY: That government could have put that into effect.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just make that observation in passing. Those who took part in that debate are well known to hon. members of this house. The participants were Sir Alfred Mond, Mr. E. C. Grenfell, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Briggs, Mr. Arthur Henderson, and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who closed the debate.

A question such as this should be discussed without rancor. I say that because I believe that within the next five years the drift of legislative effort and the functions of parliament will be in the direction of the purport of this resolution. We cannot go back, the nineteeth century has passed with all its practices. This House of Commons, not necessarily this government, in meeting the problems arising out of mass production and agriculture and industry, will move in the direction of the purport of this resolution. I am not one of those who says that this can be done in a day; I am not one of those who go out and kid the people that that can happen. In 1930 we saw the spectacle of what happened when claims were made that certain things would happen if a certain government was returned to power. I believe we must take an evolutionary course. There are those who say that this civilization will crumble around us, but I want to make this observation: We differ fundamentally from such earlier civilizations as those of Greece, Rome and Carthage, which were built upon the sufferings of the great proportion of the population of those days. We have built up a magnificent educational system and that I believe will be the driving force which will insist that the legislators of this country meet the problem of today, that the machine be controlled instead of permitting the machine to control us. It is even within the realm of possibility that the present government will take some steps in the direction we suggest before it again goes to the people.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members will have observed with a great deal of pleasure that the hon. member who last spoke, the member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) is not proposing to support this resolution. As the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) pointed out, the resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should immediately take measures looking to the setting up of a cooperative commonwealth—

The hon. member who has just spoken evidently is not prepared to endorse the resolution to this extent; the greatest length to which he is prepared to go is to move gradually in that ultimate direction. The house no doubt also noticed that the hon. member, commencing his remarks by criticizing the hon. member for East Algoma for reading the opinions of eminent economists, ended them by himself reading a long screed from the Review of Reviews.

As a preface to what I wish to say upon the motion, may I assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who is responsible for the motion, that if I refer to his organization by its initials, C. C. F., rather than by its full and formal name of Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, it is not because I wish to disparage in any way the organization, its founder or its supporters, but because the name is so fearfully and wonderfully made that I distrust my memory. I am rather reminded of the child who was christened by its proud and fond parents, under the impression of a tremendous destiny lying in front of it, with the name Sampson Agonistes Smith. No child could possibly survive that name, especially if, as afterwards happened, a bad attack of rickets left him in the position where the mode of his progress was that the right leg had to say to the left, "You let me go by this time and I will let you get by next." Of such an infant the only anticipations any of us could possibly form would be gloomy forebodings of his early demise.

The resolution which the hon. member and his supporters are urging the house and the country to endorse, appears to me to be in essence a conclusion that must depend for its validity upon two premises. The first is that our present social structure and economic and financial system have so completely collapsed that even if we could restore them, we should not attempt to do so. The second premise is that the new organization, the C. C. F., is capable of doing what the old system failed to do, extracting us from our present situation and insuring us against its recurrence at any future time.

These are two rather extravagant statements to make; but they are the two premisses that are essential to the conclusion of the resolution and both of them must be proved. If the present system has not broken down, then there is no need for us to look for a substitute. If, on the other hand, it has broken down, but the proposed substitute is not able to do any better, then wherever else we may look for a substitute, it will not be in the southeast corner of this chamber. Therefore I disagree with my hon. friend, the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), eloquent and plausible as he is, in his assertion that it was the present system and not the C.C.F. that was on trial. He kept reiterating that statement so often, that the only impression he left upon me was that he was trying to convince himself of its truth. "We are not on trial," he said, "it is the present system which is on trial." That might be true if the sole aim of those who are urging this resolution on the house were to displace the existing system. But they know they cannot stop there; they cannot leave us with a vacuum. We have not yet arrived at the splendid isolation of the position of that mythical Ford car which was able after dropping its engine on the road still to keep running on its reputation. We have apparently, according to hon. gentlemen in the southeast corner, no reputation to run on. They are not merely attempting to displace the present system. What they are really attempting to do is to substitute their system for the present one. Under those circumstances, surely the onus rests upon them of proving the validity, worth and efficacy of the system which they wish us to adopt.

They are not merely dethroning Charles I and then executing him to prevent the possibility of a monarchical reaction placing him back again on his empty throne, but putting a commonwealth in his place. I may remind my hon. friends that the commonwealth which followed Charles I did not last very long. It lasted practically just the length of the lifetime of one man; and it lasted that long only because he, the man who founded, headed and governed it, was one of the greatest men of his day in England and raised the prestige, name and power of England among the nations of the earth, and yet a man of such broad vision that, despite his theological views, he was able, without any idea of irreverence, to write to the Assembly of the Scottish Presbyterian Church: "I beseech you in the bowels of Christ to think it possible you may be mistaken." The hon. gentlemen come to us really with the suggestion that we should throw out the water we now have because it is dirty and inadequate, and they resent our saying to them: Before we do that, will you please prove to us that the water you wish us to take in its stead is any cleaner or more adequate. We certainly refuse to throw out the water we have, even though it be dirty and inadequate, until we know we are going to get in its place something better.

I have listened to some of the speeches that have been made in support of this resolution and have read others of them, and I have yet failed to hear or to read from statements made either inside or outside the house, any real evidence of the truth of either of those two premisses. I invite the house to consider them for a few minutes. Previous speakers and others who will follow me will deal with other aspects of the question, will examine the structure and the principles of the proposed commonwealth with a view to criticizing them and showing their inadequacy, or will deal with other aspects of the subject. I do not propose to take that course; I propose to follow one specific line of thought and to confine myself to it, that namely, suggested by what I have said, that before this house should be persuaded to make any change in the way of the suggested substitution, it should have proved to itself beyond any reasonable doubt the two premises which I have mentioned.

Let us take the first of them: that the present system has so collapsed that it is incapable of functioning, and that even if we could restore it, we should not do so. Is that true? Well, it is certainly true relatively. I am not going to deny that. Indeed, none of us would deny it. Not that we are opposed to admitting what we know to be true, but we regret that it is true. I have been rather wearied in listening to some of the speeches that have come from the southeast corner of the house, and particularly to the reiterated suggestion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and her perpetual question: "I wonder, do hon. gentlemen opposite realize?" Well, we do realize. I can assure my hon. friends and the lady member for Southeast Grey that neither has she nor have they a corner on the powers of observation or of intellect or of the faculty of sympathy. We both observe and understand, appreciate and sympathize with those who are suffering in the present situation. Indeed, some of us think we understand a good deal more about it than do some hon. members who are so careful and anxious that we should properly appreciate the situation. We have seen the suffering which it has induced and continued, not in rural districts where that suffering is least, but where it is worst, in the hearts of some of our cities. We know all that the farming community of this country is suffering; we do not deny they are suffering and we do not deny them sympathy in their suffering and the expression of a determination to do whatever lies in our power to mitigate it. But we say: If you want to find the greatest degrees and the most desperate forms of suffering, you will find them not in the country parts of this dominion, but in the hearts of our cities. The first proposition is relatively true and nobody on this side of the house attempts to deny that; as a matter of fact, nobody anywhere in the house or of any party attempts to deny it. But is an admission of the present situation, deplorable as it is, tantamount to admitting that the present system is responsible for it? I am prepared to go the length of denying that the admission of the existence of the situation implies any responsibility for it of the present financial or economic system of this country or of our present social system. Its causes are of a nature vastly different. Even were I to go further and admit that our present economic and financial system is incapable of extricating us from the present situation and putting us again upon normal lines, that would not be an admission that it was responsible for the present situation. You are proposing to scrap a system which has been built up through generations and centuries, not from the motive of greed, as suggested by some who are constitutionally misanthropic, or by others who have become misanthropic by reason of the hard conditions through which we are passing, but which has been evolved scientifically with a view to elaborating a system that shall be in the best interests of the world as a whole; which through centuries has built up the civilizations of all civilized countries of the world, and which has drawn together the four corners of the earth by the trade facilities which it has afforded as well as by the facilities for social intercourse which it has made possible. And by reason of the influence which it has had on the devolopment of trade and social intercourse it has bred, perhaps more than any other factor, a sense of the solidarity of the human race and of the oneness of the human family, which is the greatest asset we possess.

Now it is proposed to scrap all that. Why? Because it has broken down lamentably. Surely it is a pertinent question to ask, why has it broken down? Surely you are not going to scrap it without asking and answering that question to your satisfaction. Has it broken down by reason of inherent defects which render it incapable of functioning under normal conditions and in normal times? Has it proved itself under normal situations unable to fulfil the purpose for which it was designed? Or has it broken down because suddenly it was brought face to face with abnormal conditions, conditions so abnormal that the mind of man never conceived that they could possibly exist? Has it broken down because a strain and burden was imposed on it which no system ever before in the world's history was asked to bear? If that is the explanation, then, Mr. Speaker, we are all astray when we attempt to put upon it the responsibility which hon. members who are behind this resolution seek to place there. It has broken down by reason of an abnormal strain that no system ever devised or that could be devised ever could have stood, the strain which has followed as a result and aftermath of the war. For four years the civilized nations of the world were blasting into nothing gigantic masses of wealth, and not merely destroying that wealth itself, but in its destruction destroying also other forms of wealth; and by the end of the war period there had been heaped up huge, almost inconceivable burdens of international debt on every civilized nation that was imbroiled in that war directly or indirectly. Our financial and economic system had to meet that strain, and in every country in the world it broke down. The great creditor nation to whom was owed a sum which is only a matter of figures on paper, because nobody can conceive of it in his mind, refused to accept anything but gold, and there was not enough gold in all the treasuries of the world to pay that debt. It refused to take goods in payment, and under those circumstances the system broken down. Is it any wonder that it broke down? Is not the marvel rather that it did not break down long before it did, and that the collapse was not more complete and more disastrous than it actually has been?

Let me use a homely illustration. Suppose one of my farmer friends wishes to break part of his farm which had never been broken before. He purchases a tractor and a gang-plough. I go to him when he is commencing to operate, and I find him beside the tractor and the gangplough using language which he would not wish his parson or his wife to hear—his parson particularly, because his wife probably would be more used to it. I ask him, "What is the trouble?" He replies, "See for yourself. There are the tractor and the gangplough broken down, and I put nearly $2,000 into this outfit. Just when I started to break the ground, the machinery broke down." I reply to him, "I do not wonder it broke down. What did you think you were ploughing? This is not just ordinary prairie land with a few prairie boulders, which your tractor and plough can uproot and roll to one side. What you are asking your machinery to do is to plough through the granite ribs of the earth itself. You cannot do it. If you will stop blasting the tractor and the gangplough and the implement dealer and start to blast the rocks, you will be a little nearer the mark. What you need is not a tractor and a gangplough, but dynamite."

That has been the whole trouble with the financial and economic situation not merely of Canada but of all the countries of the world with which Canada economically is inextricably bound. We have been trying to make the system do what it was never designed to do, and it has broken down in our attempting to do so.

Let me look at the other proposition of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. That proposition is that it is capable of extricating us from the present situation and ensuring us against its recurrence at any future time. Both of those propositions must necessarily be proved. If the cooperative commonwealth is not capable of extricating us from the present situation, it is no good; and if after we have been extricated from the present situation, assuming that that happy condition it attained, if we cannot be assured that the same unfortunate situation will not arise again in the future, again it is no good. Therefore I say that both propositions must be proved. Are they true?

In order to ascertain how far these two propositions are true, you will have to look at the causes which created and are continuing the present condition. What are they? They are too many for me to enumerate them all, and they are too intricate and involved. I shall confine myself to the three major ones.

The first, as I have already mentioned, are the enormous war debts. Nobody denies that, nobody perhaps except a few gentlemen in the southeast corner of the house. The whole of the rest of the world admits that these are the basic cause of our present situation. Well, how is the adoption by the Dominion of Canada of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation going to help here? There are only three solutions to the war debt problem. One is complete cancellation; another is the reduction of the war debts and the payment of the reduced sum; and the third is payment in full. Suppose the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people adopt the C.C.F. and place it in power; would that influence the United States one little bit to cancel the war debts? Suppose that Canada adopts this resolution, not merely in this house, but that the whole country rises up and calls the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre blessed, what is going to happen in respect of the reduction of war debt payments? Do they think the United States will reduce her war debts any quicker on that account? Take the third case—payment in full. Will the adoption by Canada of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation help the other countries of the world to get rid of this terrible load of debt from which they are suffering? Will it induce the United States to take goods instead of gold? I have only to ask that question to receive the answer, if not from the lips, at least in the minds of hon. members. Everybody knows that, just as stated in the citation read by the hon. member for East Algoma, these conditions are worldwide, and cannot be altered by a change in the domestic structure of any one country. To suggest that they can is absurd. If that be true, how much farther would we have gone towards the real solution of our difficulties or the real removal of the basic troubles from which the nations of the world are suffering to-day? Not one inch.

What is the second cause of our trouble? In my view it is the growth and elevation of tariffs and quotas which resulted in large part as an aftermath of the war. Nations which through generations had been struggling for nationality at last achieved their objective or were granted it as a result of the victory of the allies over the central European powers. Consequent upon the intense spirit of nationalism which burst into flame as a result of the victory of the allies and the espousal of their cause by the victors, not merely did these new nations build up barriers of trade and enact their quotas to make themselves economically independent and become robust and industrialized, but the older nations of Europe—Germany, France and Italy—determined also, by reason of the influence and the lessons of the war, to become economically independent, at least in some lines of industry. They built up their tariffs and made statutory their quotas.

Then apart from any influence of the war, other nations developed their tariffs; particularly our great neighbour to the south, whose policy has always been one of high tariffs, and who from the introduction of the Hawley-Smoot tariff in June 1930 showed how far she was prepared to go in that direction. Do hon. members realize that returns indicate that as a result of and since the operation of the Hawley-Smoot tariff the trade of Canada has decreased $900,000,000? Can we suffer such a decrease and still expect to continue on an even keel, without disruption and a disturbance of the equilibrium of our financial and economic structures? It is utterly impossible.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the hon. gentleman tell us how much loss there has been in the trade of the United States since the introduction of that tariff?

Mr. GOTT: It has dropped 67 per cent.

Mr. BURY: I intended to state that my figure of $900,000,000 was not confined to one year, but represented the loss over a period of years.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. gentleman did not get—

Mr. BURY: I must ask the hon. member to allow me to finish my remarks without interruption, as I have only forty minutes at my disposal. I do not care whether the figures of our trade losses due to tariffs are with one country or with several, or amount to $900,000,000, $800,000,000 or $700,000,000. I simply ask: How could this country stand that loss? If hon. members would like to have some figures, I may tell them that in wheat alone, in a period of three years our income depreciated by $677,549,715. I think that justifies my statement that depreciation in trade is one of the major reasons for the financial condition in which this country finds itself to-day.

Will some hon. member tell me how the adoption of the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is going to affect favourably to us the fiscal policies of any foreign nation on the face of the earth? Will it induce the United States to lower her tariffs against Canadian goods? Will it induce France, Germany or Italy or any of the other nations of Europe to make changes in their fiscal policies or to sweep away or reduce their quotas? Everybody knows it will not. Then, what good can the C.C.F. do us in this respect?

What is the third cause operating to create and continue present conditions? I think it is the operation of our old friend, the law of supply and demand in overstocked markets. I am not going to argue between overproduction and underconsumption; one is but the obverse of the other. I do not care which term hon. members prefer. One fact remains true, that because of overstocked markets and the operation of the law of supply and demand we are not getting the prices we ought to get for our products. To-day we are suffering from two things, lack of adequate markets and lack of adequate prices. If we could supply those two deficiencies we could politely bow the C.C.F. out of the doors of this chamber. We would not need to listen to its advocates, charm they never so wisely. The farmers of this country would not feel they needed it, and would not touch it with a forty-foot pole.

Briefly, let me survey the statement of our wheat carry-over. By one authority I find that the world carry-over is 800,000,000 bushels; by another, namely the United Grain Growers, 699,000,000 bushels. The bureau of statistics gives the figure of 632,000,000 bushels. I do not care whether it is 600, 700, or 800 million bushels. The fact remains that the carry-over has had an effect on the price of wheat. I am not a farmer. Hon. members will say, "what in the world do you know about it?" I shall read the opinions of two authorities, notwithstanding the criticism of the hon. member for East Hamilton. I have in my hand a publication of the Searle Grain Company, Limited, which contains an article headed "The Searle Farmers' Index." While some hon. members may not accept this authority, I am prepared to back it up by an authority they may be more disposed to accept. In this publication I find the sentence: "In course of time, as the burdensome surplus disappears, the price of wheat will certainly rise." So, it would appear that there is at present a burdensome surplus which under the law of supply and demand affects the price of wheat. I now turn to a very interesting booklet called The Grain Market Situation, published by The United Grain Growers Limited, from which I read the following:

> Roughly speaking, the world carry-over is larger than comfortable by from 300,000,000 to 350,000,000 bushels. This excess is less than ten per cent of the annual production and consumption of the great producing and consuming countries of the world and may be considered as the approximate equivalent of a month's consumption in countries outside of Russia and China. It does not seem remarkably large in relation to the possible variation in world production from year to year, but it is large enough to have a very important effect upon prices. And its location is also of importance.

I ask again for the third time,—not with any hope of receiving a practical answer—what in the world will the adoption by the Canadian people of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation do to affect the stock of wheat in the world, to raise the price of wheat, to prevent the carry-over being excessive? What in the world will the adoption of a domestic policy of this nature in Canada do to improve the world's market for wheat or for any other commodity? Again I come back to the same truth; world conditions can never be altered or influenced by the domestic policy of one nation of ten million people.

What about the other proposition? If the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation cannot deliver us from the present awkward situation, can it guarantee that we shall not get into it again? Surely the same answer applies. If it was world causes that created the present situation, how can the domestic policy of Canada stop the operation of the same world causes in the future?

Or put it in another way. Assume that Great Britain and the countries of the empire had adopted the cooperative federation in 1912 and that we were now in August, 1914, what would have happened? If we had gone to war—but hon. gentlemen in the corner may say we should not then have gone to war. There they and I differ, and we shall differ to the day of judgment. I am not arguing with people who say Great Britain should not have gone to war to honour her pledged word. I say if we had gone to war—and I am perfectly certain that the masses of the people of Great Britain and every part of the British Empire would again endorse the action that was taken in 1914—if we had gone to war what would have happened? Precisely what did happen then; the enormous purchases of war material, the accumulation of gigantic war debts, the enormous demand for reparations. The cooperative federation would not have helped us one little bit. The same conditions would have occurred as did occur between 1914 and 1918.

Is there, then, nothing that this country and this parliament can do? I am not a pessimist and I am not a fatalist; I do not believe in a policy of laissez-faire or drift or muddling through. I think there are things this parliament can do. But I think those things are along two lines. There are two instruments or forces that this and every civilized parliament always has had, always will have; two instruments or forces by which progressive legislation has always been worked out. Those are the forces of legislation and morality, the only two forces that will ever get a nation out of a predicament such as this—social legislation, wise social legislation, informed, influenced and inspired by high morality.

I am not afraid of social legislation; I am not afraid of the word socialism even. I am not the slave of a word. But I want to know what is behind the word. I want to know what you mean by socialism. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), with his usual eloquence, made a very true statement the other day as to the attitude and history of Great Britain, especially England, on social legislation. If I may say, with deference to him, his statement was absolutely correct. The most shining examples of social legislation that stand on the statute books of England to-day were put there by Conservative governments. Mr. Sidebotham, in his Political Profiles of British Public Men, writes of Herbert Spencer that he "used to call socialism the new Toryism because both accepted the theory of the omnipotent state."

Let me give you an illustration of social legislation from the history of my own land. The great social problem that faced my country for years was the land problem. Two solutions were suggested. One was the Liberal solution, represented by the policy of that grand old statesman, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the policy of continuing the relationship of landlord and tenant and merely giving the tenant three things, what they called the three F's: fair rent, fixity of tenure, and free sale. The tenants would have remained tenants forever and the landlords, landlords forever. Then came the Conservative government, and with the Ashbourne Act of 1885 said: No, that is not good enough; we will buy out the landlords and make the peasants of Ireland the proprietors of their own holdings. And the great Ashbourne and Wyndham and other land purchase acts followed, purchasing the lands of Ireland on the credit of the British government for the people of Ireland, at a cost of probably 180 millions sterling, the greatest social land legislation that stands on the statute books of any nation on the face of the earth.

We believe that the state exists for the individual, not the individual for the state. We have no fear of social legislation. We have a long way yet to go, but we have come a long way. I was glad of the reference made by one hon. member bidding us, in effect, to have a long vision, not to look merely under our own feet but to look back at the road we have travelled, the development and evolution of the social legislation of the past. We will go on as we have in the past until the reign of righteousness and justice and social equity prevails in this great dominion.

Mr. CAMERSON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) stated that the House of Commons affords a good cross-section of Canadian public opinion. Since that is the case we ought to be able as members of this chamber to debate the problems of the nation in an honourable way. I think the statement a very laudable one, but I believe on the whole it is not necessary to make such a statement in this house, for I have been in different parliaments of the empire and I say that I believe we have in Canada one of the most democratic parliaments in the world.

To debate a public question in the house or out of the house it is said one must pay attention to three fundamentals. One is that we must not lose our head. Sometimes hon. members do. Another fundamental is that a man ought to know what he is talking about. Psychology says: Man, know thyself. Knowledge is power. And lastly we are told that we ought to be able to think while on our feet. Now I believe that the majority of members in this house measure up splendidly to these three outstanding requisites of public speaking.

Listening to-night to the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) I am not sure whether I got his point of view exactly. I got the point of view of the hon. member who sits behind the Prime Minister of Canada—I have heard him speaking in this house since 1926 and I pay attention to what he says—I got this point of view, that the economic and industrial and political order as it exists to-day in Canada is practically collapsing. I do not believe any such thing. It almost borders, if it does not actually border, on insane socialism. Now that is not a fact. I believe that the Canadian people have all kinds of reserves, mentally and volitionally, to make a comprehensive and successful attack on the problems that confront this dominion to-day, and I believe that when they get down to cooperative and thoughtful action they will be able to make such a frontal attack on our problems that to a large degree they will be solved, and our social and political order will remain intact. That is the conviction I have, and when I hear hon. members in this chamber telling anything else it reminds me of a happening of the Civil war in the United States—

An hon. MEMBER: Are you that old?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, are you? For the benefit of the hon. member I will say that the incident I am about to relate is part of continental history, and I hope he will take that for granted. When things were black for the north, when the south was moving forward to victory, as many people thought, and when the fear seemed to dominate the American nation that slavery would be enthroned and the rights of humanity lost, deluged in blood, what did the great Lincoln say? Did he get up before the American nation and as a great leader declare that all was lost, everything was undone, and that stark defeat looked the people straight in the face? No. Lincoln showed himself to be a great leader, and if ever there was a time in the history of Canada now is that time when we ought to show that we have equally great leaders in political thought and also, outside the House of Commons, fearless leaders of the Canadian nation. Lincoln did not say that everything was lost; he took it for granted that God was in His heaven and that all would finally right itself in the world. He acted on that belief and the day was won for the north, so that slavery was abolished and the right of man to hold property in man destroyed forever. I have no doubt that with the right type of leadership Canada can be led out of this threatening morass and put on her feet, and if she is I know that she can go forward, rejoicing in the days to come.

I listened carefully to the arguments of my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), and I may say that I think a good deal of that hon. member. I like to think well of every hon. member in this chamber. I like every hon. member to play the game, and if he plays the game honourably with me I will play the game with him. If, however, as members, we differ in certain lines of thought, that should make no difference, for we are working for the upbuilding of a greater Canada. But what did that hon. gentleman say? He said that the forces productive of revolution in Russia was Russia's own business. I hardly think that is correct. That is not Russia's own business. Directly, it is true, but indirectly it is not. No nation can live unto itself. That is the foundation to a large extent of our economic nationalism to-day, which is fundamentally wrong and which has put the world almost on the road to ruin. That is the same foundation of empire nationalism in an economic sense, and that too is just as unsound as economic nationalism. Consequently, when Russia undertakes a great social and political experiment, I think the other nations of the world have a perfect right to size up that experiment and discuss it from every angle, national as well as international. So that if Russia has been brought into this debate I do not think it is the fault of hon. members opposite, and I am sure it is not the fault of hon. members composing the Liberal opposition. In my opinion the responsibility must be placed entirely on those who sit in the southeast corner of this house, the members making up what is known as an economic class group. Therefore, I place the responsibility for that type of argument where it belongs, and I do it right now because, inasmuch as it has to be done in any event, it might as well be done in the House of Commons.

The hon. member also said that unemployment is a challenge to democracy. We all admit that it is and, as I have said, democracy accepts the challenge. Canadian democracy accepts the challenge, and if we cannot get from one party that leadership which will face that challenge squarely and put an end to unemployment, then the people will certainly get it from another party. The hon. gentleman said further that free speech should be an accepted fact. Well, you cannot have real democracy without freedom of speech, freedom of discussion and freedom of the press. But to have freedom of thought is not to have revolutionary thought; it is not to have revolutionary objectives nor revolutionary sentiments. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to stand up for freedom of thought in Canada, but I am the last to admit that there is any saving element in Russia that can tell me anything about freedom. No one can tell me that we can get any greater freedom of thought than we have by looking to Russia. Our fathers handed down to us that precious heritage and we do not have to go to Russia to find it. We had it long ago, and the Liberals of Canada did their part in gaining it.

In concluding his speech the hon. member for East Hamilton said he believed in state leadership, state control of certain activities, and then he referred to what he described as "rank individualism." I am going to deal with this so-called rank individualism before I am through. I shall not have time to develop my argument along the line of sound individualism as completely as I would like, but I am going to discuss the question nevertheless, and I am not going to classify individualism in the way the hon. member for East Hamilton classified it. I am not going to cast a slur on individualism by speaking of it as rank individualism, but I am going to uphold sound individualism as the foundation of a sound state. It is not rank individualism but essential individualism that is required for any ideal democracy. As far as the Liberal party is concerned—I am not speaking for hon. members opposite—I think that as a whole we sympathize with these gentlemen. They have certain grievances, they see certain fundamental weaknesses in our government, in our industries and in our social order but although we sympathize with them in a way, we differ entirely in the matter of mapping out an objective and the manner of reaching that objective thereby removing these grievances from the minds of the people of Canada. We differ entirely in that way. We sympathize with them, as we should, but since they have gone out and have dared us to political battle—they are organizing in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta—since they have told the country at large that they are not going to cooperate either federally or provincially with the wicked Grits or with the Conservatives; since they have challenged the Liberals and the Conservatives of Canada to political battle upon great national issues, as far as I am concerned, I am going to accept that challenge. I did it before and I intend to do it again.

The resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is in three divisions. In the first part he says that the existing economic arrangement is responsible for unemployment. We have had unemployment since the world began and I guess we will have a large degree of unemployment until the world ends. I am the last to say that if you have unemployment you must place the blame absolutely upon the economic order. Standing as I do for a practical and ideal individualism, where any failure occurs, such as unemployment or anything else, I must place at least part of the blame upon the individual as an answerable entity. It may be all right to place some of the blame upon the economic order, but the mover and supporters of the resolution place the whole blame upon that order. We know why they do this; it is an extraneous and selfish effort to get into power. They do not tell the people of Canada exactly why they make that statement. No. Unemployment is not a new phenomenon; the responsibility for this unemployment condition has many angles.

In the second part of his resolution the hon. member states that the depression at home and abroad indicates that our social and economic order is fundamentally unsound, and he then goes on to argue what ought to be done. That is only a worthless and purely fictitious statement, it does not prove that our economic order is fundamentally unsound. If things are wrong in Canada, before we place the responsibility upon any order, political, economic or financial, we must go back and place the responsibility primarily upon the voters who brought such a structure nationally into being. The order is not to blame. If there is any blame to be attached to anyone, the people of Canada must accept responsibility for the social, economic and political edifice erected in this country. They have been building this structure since confederation; they have been building up the Canadian nation and if things are not as they ought to be, then I say that the responsibility is largely upon the people. The cure is not to demolish our order overnight. Rather should men and parties go out and direct the people, inspire them to truer electoral decisions, help them get their mental machinery oiled and working more thoroughly so that when the day of voting rolls around, apart from any party our people as a whole, those in the maritimes, in industrial Canada, in the west and across the mountains, will render a verdict that will make this economic and political system more sound and more capable of meeting the strain it has to bear.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 10, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Milton Neil Campbell, member for the electoral district of Mackenzie, consequent upon the acceptance of an appointment to the tariff board.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 23, respecting the Saint Nicholas Mutual Benefit Association and to change its name to "Ukrainian Mutual Benefit Association of St. Nicholas of Canada."—Mr. Luchkovich.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) that the following motion having been called twice and not proceeded with, be restored to the order paper:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

Motion agreed to.

POTATO EMBARGO

On the orders of the day.

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any information has been given to the government with respect to the embargo against Canadian potatoes?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton gave notice of this question, and in reply I believe I could not do better than to read a communication I received from the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries of the United Kingdom. It is as follows:

Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries,
10 Whitehall Place, S.W. 1.

January 27, 1933.

Dear Mr. Weir,—

You will, of course, remember that in accordance with a promise made to you by my predecessor, Sir John Gilmour, Mr. J. C. F. Fryer, director of the ministry's plant pathological Laboratory, visited Canada last October, in connection with the Colorado beetle question.

Before I come to the subject of his investigations I should like to express to you, and through you to all those with whom he came in contact during his tour, my sincerest thanks for the cordial reception accorded to him, and the ungrudging assistance in every direction which he received throughout his visit.

I have now gone into the matter with him with the greatest interest and care. I was greatly impressed by his account of the keenness and efficiency of the staff of your department, and of the precautions which they are prepared to take against the risk of the transmission of the Colorado beetle with potatoes consigned from the dominion. I do not doubt that the measures proposed or contemplated would be likely to reduce that danger very materially, but nevertheless I am forced to the conclusion that we cannot take the risk involved by accepting potatoes from any region where the Colorado beetle is known to exist. I can only ask you to believe that it is with very real regret and after the most anxious thought that I have arrived at the decision that the prohibition cannot be removed and I hope that you will appreciate that it is the only policy that I can pursue consistently with my responsibilities in connection with plant pests and diseases. It is a generally recognized policy that has been consistently followed by my predecessors in regard to all countries where the beetle exists and, much as I should like to, I cannot see my way to make an exception even in your case.

Mr. Fryer has also reported to me the measures which you contemplate in order to prevent the export to this country of apples infested with the apple fruit fly. Much to our pleasure, it has not so far been necessary for us to place any restrictions on apples imported from the dominion. The discovery of an infested consignment last October, was, we hope, only an isolated case; and after considering Mr. Fryer's account of the steps you are taking, I have decided that it will not be necessary to impose any restrictions during the 1933 season unless the sampling of consignments on arrival in this country reveals the presence of the pest.

Yours very truly,

Walter Elliot.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Is that the answer to an order for a return?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is my understanding that papers are being prepared for the return.

SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): May I call the attention of the government to the fact that for many months a vacancy has existed on the supreme court bench of Nova Scotia. I understand there is considerable congestion in the court, due to the shortage of judges and to illness, and that the public service is being impaired. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when we may expect announcement of an appointment to fill this vacancy.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I think I can assure my hon. friend that an appointment will be made to fill this vacancy in the very near future.

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I desire to direct a question to the acting leader of the government in the absence of the Prime Minister. For the last two weeks, in the press of the United Kingdom and also in Canada, especially the Toronto Globe, is featured an apparent conflict between the High Commissioner and the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the acting leader of the government whether, if the High Commissioner has disobeyed orders from his chief, he will be recalled?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is frivolous and should not be answered.

Mr. SANDERSON: On a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to keep order; we are not going to argue about it; I have ruled that his remarks are out of order.

Mr. SANDERSON: On a point of order —

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order involved.

Mr. SANDERSON: But, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege involved at all.

Mr. SANDERSON: If Your Honour will permit me, the acting leader of the government was on his feet to answer my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: That makes no difference whatever.

DEPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the government a question with respect to some rumoured deportation cases. The Minister of Justice kindly said he would draw it to the attention of the immigration department. Inasmuch as it is rumoured that these deportations are to take place in a few days, I think we ought to have some information.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I regret that owing to the illness of the acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) I have not been able to communicate with him, but I will try to do so before the next sitting of the house and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. HEENAN: In view of the illness of the minister, will the Minister of Justice undertake on behalf of the government that these deportations will not be effected?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I will not give any such undertaking.

Mr. HEENAN: If the acting Minister of Immigration remains ill—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

AIRPLANE LANDING FIELDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Temiskaming): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). During the preliminary session the government made a statement to the effect that landing fields for airplanes would be constructed throughout Canada. We received that announcement with great joy in northern Ontario, but so far I am notified that no work has been done. May I ask what is the intention of the government in this matter?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member is in error in saying that nothing has been accomplished. There are certain camps of the nature he mentioned under way in northern Ontario. The full plan has not yet been put into effect. I will be glad to get a complete statement of the present situation and send it to my hon. friend.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) when he intends to introduce legislation implementing any or all of the recommendations of the Gibb report?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): A bill is under consideration at the present time.

DEPUTY MINISTER OF MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): May I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) when the position of deputy minister is going to be filled?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The appointment of deputy ministers comes under the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So you have nothing to do with it in your department?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

CHARTERED BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I wonder if I might draw the attention of the government to the fact that an order for return was passed on the 17th of November last, and ask whether it might not be brought down.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Salaries, $177,534; contingencies, $27,800.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, there was an understanding that no item involving salaries would be taken up by the government until disposal of the bill in relation to the Salary Deduction Act, 1932.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry, I did not know that.

Hudson bay railway and terminals—construction and betterments (including E. B Jost at $2,250), $967,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister be good enough to give the committee a general statement of the progress of the Hudson Bay Railway and terminal?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): This vote is for the continuation of the work that has been going on for some years at Churchill and on the Hudson Bay railway. The work that has already been done consists of the railway itself which is in very excellent shape; I did not visit it last year, but I did the previous two years, and the roadbed was in splended shape though every spring, because of the heavily frozen section of the country through which the railway runs, there are a number of sink holes and that sort of thing. Consequently it still requires a good deal of money to be spent upon it. So that half of this vote is for the rehabilitation of the Hudson Bay railway itself from The Pas to Churchill as well as for maintenance and operation during construction. It is hoped that after this year or next year the railway will have been so well ballasted that these sink holes will no longer develop. At any rate, it is in good shape.

The other work that has been done is at Churchill itself. At that port we have an elevator of two and a half million bushels capacity; we have a dock eighteen hundred feet long; we have a freight shed that was more than adequate to handle the freight last year, we have coal-handling facilities, and the harbour is well dredged, except for one item that is included in this vote for dredging this year, and which it is expected will complete the dredging required at Churchill. The general work there is in excellent condition. The traffic that went through the port last year was well handled in every way. A large portion of this item is for the completion of the water supply, the engineers having found that they had to go four or five miles from the townsite of Churchill to get fresh water. They had to connect up a number of sloughs into a fairly large lake of fresh water, which acts as a reservoir, and from which they bring water by a pipe line just above the ground. It is surrounded or is being surrounded gradually by moss to protect it from freezing. That, briefly, is a sketch of what has taken place there. I shall be glad to give any further information that is needed.

Mr. EULER: What has been the total cost of the Hudson Bay railway, including terminals, and how much loss was incurred last year, including interest on capital expenditure?

Mr. MANION: The total investment on the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill terminals, and in respect of the deserted Nelson terminals, is, in round figures, between $53,000,000 and $54,000 000.

Mr. EULER: Including interest?

Mr. MANION: No, that represents actual expenditures that have been made. I doubt whether I can give anything like an exact estimate of the cost of traffic last year. There was not very much traffic. Two and a half million bushels of grain was handled and a small amount of other merchandise went through. The two and a half million bushels went out in ten steamers, including the one which was sunk in Hudson straits, and a small amount, about three hundred and some odd tons, of general merchandise came in. In addition to the traffic which went out of and came into the port, there is a good deal of traffic up and down the line in between and to the port itself, and of course, in a sense, it is really at the expense of the government. The revenue and expenditures of the railway itself last year, if one leaves out maintenance, were pretty well balanced. There was an actual loss of three or four thousand on operation and it is expected that there will be about the same loss this year. Of course, there was no maintenance charge, which amounted last year to about $64,000, and which should be charged up to the operation of the road. There is interest on investment, which is not included.

Mr. EULER: It will cost the treasury each year, as a net loss to the railway, something between two and three million dollars. Would that be approximately correct?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: Yes. Of course, the interest alone on $50,000,000 would be two and a half million dollars, roughly, so that that was a direct charge upon the exchequer of Canada. In regard to the operation of the port, there is, naturally, a loss, because so far we have not charged either elevator or port charges on any of the traffic going through. I may say frankly however—I might as well say it now as later, because I have had a number of letters from the west with regard to the matter—that the question is still under consideration as to what we shall do in that regard in the coming year. The elevator handled last year two and a half million bushels, and there were no elevator charges imposed upon that grain, no port charges by the port. It is probably only just that charges should be applied to freight going through that port, as to freight going through other ports in Canada. However, the government is considering the whole matter. No definite decision has been reached yet as to these charges, but I believe there will probably be some charges on a low scale this year with respect to the elevator, if not on the whole port. The government wishes as did the late government, to give every encouragement to the utilization of the facilities at that port. We believe that since we have spent so much money there it would not be wise, for the sake of a small amount, to do anything that might cripple the port. And of course the west is fairly strong in its demands along these lines. Some of the eastern and probably some of the western ports are not so enthusiastic over the rates being so low.

Mr. EULER: Does the minister anticipate any substantial improvement in the immediate years to come?

Mr. MANION: In traffic?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Well, my hon. friend can guess at that as well as I can.

Mr. EULER: Not quite. Is there any traffic coming in?

Mr. MANION: Two years ago we handled two ships and last year ten. That is an increase of 500 per cent. It illustrates very well the futility of using percentages. At any rate, we did handle ten ships and I myself believe quite frankly that there will be an increase. But the whole trade of the world is in such a deplorable condition to-day that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I do not know why my hon. friends should cheer; I am not glad that it is so. I do not know why they should be pleased that world trade is down.

An hon. MEMBER: We blame you.

Mr. MANION: Anyone who does not admit that world trade is in a deplorable condition must be more dense than some of my friends of the cooperative organization to the right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You are not so dense as you used to be.

Mr. MANION: I am glad that I too am improving. I think there will be an increase in traffic; at least I hope so for the sake of the expenditures that have been made. Before elections one can prophesy, but it is not well to do so afterwards.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Can the minister give the committee any information at all regarding the prospect of insurance rates being lowered on the route, or has the sinking of the Bright Fan knocked all this on the head?

Mr. MANION: My expectation is that insurance rates will certainly not be higher than they were last year, even taking into consideration the sinking of the Bright Fan. I believe that the report of the commission that investigated that matter will offset any harm it might have done the route. Whether there will be much of a decrease, however, I doubt. I made inquiries and I am informed that the loss of the Bright Fan will about wipe out the premiums which the insurance companies have so far received on traffic. Naturally, the imperial shipping committee will not be enthusiastic about lowering rates. At the same time, the government, through the Marine department, which handles that branch of the work, has been impressing upon the Canadian High Commisisoner in London, and, through him, upon the imperial shipping committee, the importance of lowering insurance rates, and I can assure my hon. friend that the government will do everything it can to have the rates brought down. I do not think, even though the insurance rates are high, that they are sufficiently high to interfere with reasonable profits to such ships as go into Hudson bay, especially if they get cargoes each way. I am informed that the ships that have already gone in have done much better in the same length of time than they would have done if plying to other ports. I should not like to give that as absolutely authentic, but the shipping men so inform me.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister is aware of the attitude of the hon. member representing The Pas and of other persons who have been up in that country, with respect to the causes of the sinking of the Bright Fan. It is generally conceded that it looked around a few days and then banged into that iceberg for some purpose or other. I do not think the idea was to do damage to the route; I think it was to collect insurance upon an old boat which had been insured very heavily. These rumours should be settled and I was wondering if the government had taken any steps, either when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was over in England or otherwise, to get at the bottom of these statements. I have no doubt the minister will tell us all he knows about it.

Mr. MANION: This government did every thing which I think a government was required to do; it investigated the whole matter. The result of the investigation was that the ship had not been handled very well, that the only lookout was a boy of eighteen years of age. To anyone like myself, or my hon. friend, who is not a sea-dog, that fact would seem to condemn the handling of the ship. As to looking around for an iceberg, as the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) so picturesquely expresses it, we must realize that the ship is at the bottom of the sea, and it would be rather difficult to find out if it did really look around for an iceberg. I am afraid that is one question that will have to be left to later ministers to explain. We did everything we possibly could. We made a thorough investigation by a commission. The work of the commission, which was well done by the commissioner and the counsel appointed by the government to assist him, has, I think, undone any harm from an insurance standpoint which the sinking of the Bright Fan may have inflicted upon this route.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the minister know whether this boat was heavily insured, and if the insurance was paid? Did Lloyd's or whoever insured the boat pay this insurance?

Mr. MANION: I am sorry, but I cannot give my hon. friend that information. I did hear that the ship, although not an old one, was not in the best of condition. However, that is only hearsay, and I should not like to be quoted authoritatively in that regard. The ship was not particularly valuable, but no ship is valuable at the present time. Unfortunately this government has had to sell ships much below the cost price, and other steamship companies and governments have had to do the same thing. I imagine that if I had a ship full of grain and it was well insured, as long as no lives were lost I would not weep very much if the ship hit an iceberg. Beyond that I should not like to go.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot allow the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to make the insinuations he did with regard to the sinking of the Bright Fan. The fact that a ship is old and is well insured is no reason why an hon. member should get up and say that the vessel was cast away and that the captain had committed barratry. Everyone knows there are icebergs in Hudson bay; everyone knows there are dangers in Hudson strait, and this accident should not be used as capital either in favour of or against the Hudson bay route. The statement should not be made that this ship deliberately ran into an iceberg. The minister has apologized because he did not think there was sufficient lookout upon this steamer, but I would refer him to his own youth. He could see better when he was eighteen years of age than he can to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Much better politically.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I missed that one; as it seems to be good I should like to hear it.

Mr. DUFF: In order to satisfy the curiosity of the former Minister of Agriculture, the minister said that perhaps there was not sufficient lookout upon the Bright Fan when it struck the iceberg because only a boy of eighteen years of age was acting as lookout. I want to say to the minister that that boy had as good eyesight as the minister himself had when he was eighteen years of age, before he turned Tory.

Mr. MANION: I was very young.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope no reflection is being cast upon the chair.

Mr. DUFF: Not at all. With my slight knowledge of marine matters I would rather trust a boy of eighteen as lookout than either the minister or myself at our ages. I would rather trust him than the former Minister of Agriculture, who, although he can see, is a little deaf in one ear; he would not be able to hear the iceberg blow its fog-horn. We should not stress the fact that because one vessel has been lost there may be danger in Hudson strait or Hudson bay. I hope that this route can be proved to be a satisfactory one, and no apologies are necessary from western members or anyone else, whether Liberal or Conservative. The Liberal government helped to build this route, it spent considerable money both in Port Nelson and Churchill; the Conservative party continued that work and are trying now to complete it. There is nothing to apologize for; the fact remains that we have spent the money and we must find out whether or not this route is a proper route.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Has the hon. member lost any of his boats?

Mr. DUFF: No. Because this boat was lost coming out of Hudson bay, it should not be said that the captain or his officers were to blame for the accident. I wonder if the minister could tell us the insurance rate on grain from Churchill to Liverpool, and also if the government pays any proportion of the premium either to the insurance company or to the shippers?

Mr. MANION: Although I think I could give the approximate insurance rate, I would be only guessing. I will get the information for the hon. member before we have completed this item. I should like to quote from the report of the commission that investigated the loss of the Bright Fan. It reads?

> The court thinks that a proper lookout was not kept on the Bright Fan. There was no expressly appointed lookout and for some minutes before the collision with the iceberg apparently the only person on the ship who had any opportunity of seeing the approach of danger was the helmsman, an apprentice of eighteen years of age.
> The ship was proceeding at full speed but having regard to the visibility, as to which the evidence is not very satisfactory, the court is not prepared to find that the speed was excessive.
> The court cannot too strongly intimate that a lookout should be maintained under all circumstances by some person or persons whose sole duty for the time being is to keep a lookout. It appears that such was not the practice on this ship. Under the circumstances disclosed in this case the court regrets that it is unable to exonerate the master and first officer of the Bright Fan from default contributing to the loss of the ship in failing to see that such a lookout was maintained.

Mr. IRVINE: What court was that?

Mr. MANION: That was the commission appointed to investigate the sinking of the Bright Fan, Mr. Justice Mellish being in charge. Like my hon. friend who has just spoken, he is from Nova Scotia and knows the shipping business, having had much experience in admiralty matters. He was assisted by other officers, but unless it is necessary I would not like to give their names.

Mr. DUFF: I do not wish to criticize the report of the commissioner, who is one of the outstanding judges in the maritime provinces, but I would state that in the case of a tramp steamer like the Bright Fan there is no necessity to have two men as lookouts. The man at the helm can see through the window, whether or not it is up, practically as far as a man on the bridge. In addition to that, the first officer was on deck. I was very anxious to attend the meetings of the committee; I heard all the evidence and I was very much impressed by the captain. I have no hesitation in saying that he was a good seaman and did everything he could to get the proper directions from the N. B. McLean, so that he could avoid icebergs. There was a sufficient lookout when there was a man at the helm who could see ahead. This apprentice, this eighteen year old young man, was on the bridge and the first officer was on deck, but just at the moment the accident occurred, the latter was on deck attending to his duties, so I do not think it fair to say that the Bright Fan was lost because there was not a sufficient lookout. It is just an accident such as happens every day in the marine world. Neither the Hudson Bay railway, nor the Minister of Marine nor the Minister of Railways should be blamed for the accident.

Mr. MANION: In justice to the owners of the ship, since I read the other clause, I should like to read a couple of remaining clauses that in fairness to them are worthy of being put on record. They say at the end of their report:

> Although no specific question has been submitted in respect thereto, the evidence raised some points as to which it is perhaps proper an opinion should be expressed.
> In the first place the court is of opinion that there is no evidence on which to conclude that the loss of the ship can in any degree be attributed to the improper use of intoxicating liquors—indeed the evidence would lead to a distinctly contrary conclusion.
> In the next place, it cannot on the evidence be said that the loss was in any way contributed to by any defect in the equipment furnished for the safety of shipping in the locality. Indeed—such equipment has in the court's opinion, been shown to be distinctly helpful and useful.

And the other question, number five, states:

> Was the vessel in all respects in a good and seaworthy condition when she left Churchill on the 25th September?

I may say that the answer to the question is in the affirmative. I do not wish to do any injustice to anybody in the matter. The full investigation and the report upon it are at the disposal of the committee and the members of the house. I do not think it is my duty to give my opinion on the finding of the commission.

Mr. McINTOSH: Was not a further investigation held at London? If so, what about the conclusion there? Can the minister amplify it?

Mr. MANION: I know of no investigation at London. If one had been held, I imagine the Maritime department or I would have been advised, but I do not know about it.

Mr. DUFF: The British Board of Trade held one.

Mr. MANION: I have no record and therefore can give no information.

Mr. McINTOSH: Could the minister get the record of that investigation, or will he try to get it?

Mr. MANION: I shall endeavour to do so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the government paid any insurance on the cargoes?

Mr. MANION: No, the government had nothing to do with the insurance. So far as the payment of it is concerned, the insurance was paid by the owners of the goods and the owners of the ship.

Mr. McGIBBON: I mean, since the port opened? I do not mean on that particular cargo.

Mr. MANION: I do not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. McGIBBON: Since the opening of the port of Churchill, has the government paid insurance on grain or any other goods?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. SPENCER: Was the Bright Fan sunk in broad daylight?

Mr. MANION: No; if my recollection is correct, it was four o'clock in the morning, a fairly good day, with good visibility, although the judge says that the evidence as to visibility is inconclusive.

Mr. SPENCER: In which direction was the boat going?

Mr. MANION: It was sailing toward England. It was going out of the port.

Mr. BRADETTE: There came to my notice last fall the fact that the Manitoba government is going to supervise the new townsite of Churchill. I believe this is a step in the right direction, because in northern Ontario we had an example of a great deal of speculation in the opening of new townsites. I see the government is trying to do away with that. The question I wanted to ask is the following: Are government buildings in Churchill, including terminal elevators and all buildings pertaining to the Canadian National Railways as well as their terminals, to be exempt from municipal taxes?

Mr. MANION: All government buildings and property are exempt from taxation throughout Canada. I assume the situation will be the same in Churchill as elsewhere.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe the question is not rightly answered. In my section the Canadian National Railways constructed private houses in competition with private individuals. The question came before the board of railway commissioners, and the result was that these houses were to be taxed municipally in so far as the schools were concerned. I hope a similar condition will not exist at Churchill. I am alluding more particularly to private houses and boarding houses. In our section we carried on for at least fifteen years without receiving school taxes. This is a matter that should be taken up now so that no anomaly will exist.

Mr. MANION: I assume the hon. member is stating that houses which were built by the National Transcontinental in that section pay no taxes. That is what he stated.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I suppose this is on the same ground that the National Transcontinental is a government railway, although, of course, it is being operated by the Canadian National, but the Canadian National Railway itself pays taxes in various places throughout Canada, the total amounting to between four and five million dollars. They are government railways in my hon. friend's section and for that reason they probably would not pay taxes, although I cannot state so definitely, but I presume my hon. friend is well informed on the matter.

Mr. BRADETTE: In our own section, for a number of years dwelling houses for railroad officials and employees were built in competition with private owners—I might instance Cochrane—and it took us quite a long time before we received, not so much the municipal taxes as the school taxes. This anomaly was remedied a few years ago. I hope this administration and the Manitoba government will see that no such injustice occurs at Churchill.

Mr. MANION: The government has no intention of building private houses or boarding houses. Any buildings we have at Churchill will be of the kind we have at present, such as elevators, docks, sheds or buildings of that sort.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice in this estimate an item of $2,250 for E. B. Jost. What did he do to entitle him to this amount of money?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Jost is assistant engineer of the department, but in addition to that he is senior hydraulic engineer. This $2,250 has been paid to him now for nearly ten years, and paid in exactly the same way. If my hon. friend will look up the estimate of last year, he will find the same item. It was begun, as a matter of fact, under the late government. I am not saying that in any critical sense. Mr. Jost is our authority on the many water power leases on the canals throughout Canada, so that he is paid in two separate ways, although it is put into this item as it has to be put somewhere. Personally I imagine this $2,250 should be inserted in one of the canal items, but this is of no importance as it has to be passed by the Auditor General.

Mr. VALLANCE: What other salary, if any, has he?

Mr. MANION: He receives $4,920 in addition to this. Of course, there would be ten per cent deducted from both amounts.

Mr. McINTOSH: Does he reside at Churchill?

Mr. MANION: No, he resides here.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I should like to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), that two or three men were on deck when the Bright Fan collided with this iceberg. That is not the fact. The only man on deck or on any part of the deck where it could be seen was the boy at the wheel. The second officer was in the chart room. In connection with any remarks I have made in respect to the Bright Fan I have no apology to make and do not intend to make any. My considered opinion was that the boat was deliberately scuttled. I am still of that opinion and I shall go to the grave with it. As far as the fairy picture painted by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough is concerned, I cannot say as much for Captain Oliver. In my opinion he is one of the biggest reprobates that ever came into my constituency, and I think any hon. member who reads the evidence carefully would come to the same conclusion about him. I know quite a lot about the actions of the crew of the Bright Fan at Churchill, and I could bring affidavits here as high as this desk to prove my statements. I am sure that some of my friends in the corner to my right will be interested in this point. One of the commissioners asked Captain Oliver if he had a standard steel watertight bulkhead between holds Nos. 1 and 2, and he replied, "Yes." Then he was asked "Should that not have kept your ship afloat until the salvage steamer arrived?" Captain Oliver replied that the wheat had swelled in bulk and forced the steel bulkhead. Imagine wheat swelling in ice cold salt water in two hours and forty minutes sufficient to break down a steel bulkhead! Anyone who has had anything to do with wheat will know how absurd such a statement is. I have had no reason whatever to change my mind about the sinking of the Bright Fan, and as far as the Bright Fan looking for an iceberg is concerned, if hon. gentlemen will read the evidence they will see that previous to striking the iceberg the Bright Fan sailed only sixteen miles in six and a half hours, although she was a seven knot boat.

As regards the insurance, I do not know the exact figure paid on the hull or on the wheat, but I do know that there was an extra premium of $7,000 charged on each one of the ten boats that went in there, or $70,000, and the insurance carried on the Bright Fan was somewhere around that figure. So there was no loss to the insurance companies even if they had to pay the insurance on the hull, and whether they have done so or not I do not know. The whole evidence in the inquiry has been tabled, and I would ask any hon. members who still have doubts about the matter to read it very carefully before making any more funny statements. If they knew as much as I do about the matter they would have equally as strong an opinion as mine.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think there is much necessity for continuing this discussion as far as the Bright Fan is concerned. I have tried to speak a good word for the Hudson bay route in spite of the fact that I was never in favour of it, but when anybody comes here and says that Captain Oliver deliberately cast his ship away, I think I have a perfect right to get up and defend Captain Oliver and his crew. My hon. friend from Nelson seemed to complain because one of the steel bulkheads in the ship did not close properly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DUFF: He said that the wheat swelled, the bulkhead opened, and the ship sank.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Do you believe that? Do you believe that wheat would swell in two hours and forty minutes in ice cold salt water?

Mr. DUFF: Whether the wheat swelled or not, or whether the bulkhead closed or not, I would remind my hon. friend of the sinking of the Titanic when none of the bulkheads closed. It is quite possible that in stowing the cargo, the bulkhead was not closed. Perhaps the machinery would not close it. But it is not fair to say that Captain Oliver—my hon. friend did not say this in so many words—deliberately either opened the bulkhead or left it open so that the Bright Fan would sink when she struck the iceberg, which Captain Oliver, according to my hon. friend, was evidently looking for all that night. The Bright Fan, my hon. friend says, went sixteen miles in six and a half hours.

Mr. ERNST: The rate of an ox team.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend comes from Lunenburg where they use oxen. Instead of blaming Captain Oliver for going only sixteen miles in six hours, crawling along like an ox team, as my hon. friend from Lunenburg suggests, coming from a county which has the best sailors in the world, my hon. friend ought rather to get up and compliment Captain Oliver for going at such a rate because it shows that he was a good sailor. I have read the evidence, and I heard Captain Oliver give his testimony, and the evidence shows conclusively that the visibility was not good, and after he got word from the McLean that the iceberg was in a certain position, he proceeded very slowly because he did not think it was safe to make speed. He should be commended for his caution. I say that nobody has a right to get up in this house as my hon. friend from Nelson has done and make such charges. He would not dare to make the statement outside of this house that Captain Oliver cast his ship away, because of certain things that he says he knows happened in Churchill. It is all right for my hon. friend to make these statements on the floor of this house, but I say it is not fair to Captain Oliver or any other seaman to say that he deliberately cast his ship away and went looking for an iceberg just to get the insurance.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I have said outside of this house what I have said here. Nobody has ever accused me of lacking courage in any of the statements I made. I repeat that Captain Oliver was the biggest reprobate that ever came to Churchill. I am informed he was drunk when he came in there, he was drunk all the time he was there, and he was drunk when he left there.

Mr. DUFF: How do you know?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I can get affidavits to prove it. And furthermore, he sold whisky or permitted it to be sold all the time he was there. Captain Oliver knew nothing about what speed the boat was making that night because he was in bed.

Mr. DUFF: Where else should he have been?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): My hon. friend said that he was taking extra precautions and all that kind of thing. It just shows that he does not know anything about it. As far as the bulkhead is concerned, Captain Oliver swore that it was closed before the cargo was put in, and the port warden also examined the boat and passed it as seaworthy. He swore it was watertight. But the fact that Captain Oliver swore that the wheat swelled and burst the steel bulkhead I think should convince anybody as to the character of his evidence.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If all this is true, why was the insurance paid on the boat?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Who knows that insurance has been paid on the boat? I do not know. As a matter of fact I understand that the board of trade in the old country is holding a further inquiry. Whether it has yet been held I do not know. Nobody has told me that the insurance has been paid.

Mr. ERNST: Insurance is often paid because of other risks carried in the same company.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough asked about the rates. The freight rates are 3s. 9d. per quarter on grain going out of Churchill. The insurance rates are four per cent on the cargo if the ship has a gyro compass, and five per cent where there is no gyro compass, and the rate on the ships themselves is 2s. per gross ton. That is the best information I have, and I think it is correct.

Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur): A few moments ago the minister in reply to the hon. member for North Waterloo referred to the indebtedness incurred at Churchill. What I wish to know is whether the indebtedness is included in the general indebtedness against the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MANION: No. While in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals it is included in the general indebtedness, it is not part of the Canadian National railway indebtedness. The Canadian National railway handles the road for the government as our agents, and we pay the losses, but the indebtedness is not included directly in the Canadian National railway accounts.

Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur): Just one further question. What advantage has the port of Churchill over other grain shipping ports such as Saint John or Victoria?

[Mr. B. M. Stitt.]

Mr. HANBURY: Or Vancouver?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Or Quebec?

Mr. MANION: Up to the present Churchill has had an advantage over these other ports in not having any port or elevator charges. But of course that is a temporary arrangement which obviously will have to be corrected in the very near future. It is my personal opinion that it is only fair that all Canadian ports should ultimately be on an equal basis. It was thought by the government however that in view of the fact that there were only a couple of ships coming in, and that they were test shipments, there should not be any charges imposed. Therefore up to the present there have not been any charges, even on the two and a half million bushels of grain which passed through the port last year. But in the near future it will be but fair to have the same type of charges imposed upon the port of Churchill as are imposed on other ports, but the charges should be at a rate equal to the lowest existing in any port of Canada. I think that would only be fair, in view of the large investment of the government in the development of this port, and in view of the fact that the western provinces are anxious to give it a fair trial. I believe those rates, comparable with rates obtaining in other ports, should be the lowest possible. There is no doubt that in the near future rates will have to be charged.

Mr. HANBURY: Assistance has been given to other ports in Canada, and I can see no reason why Churchill should not get a fair share of it. I should like to ask the minister to refer again to the loss in operation, which I think he said amounted to approximately $3,000. I do not think that gives a fair picture of the situation.

Mr. MANION: That applies to the railway.

Mr. HANBURY: But it does not give a fair picture. We should have the figures showing the gross revenue and expenses.

Mr. MANION: I believe I have the figures before me. The following are the estimated expenses and revenues for this year, based on the operations of last year:

|---|---|
| Estimated expenses.. .. .. .. .. | $338,650 |
| Estimated revenue.. .. .. .. .. | 335,000 |
| Estimated operation deficit.. .. . | $ 3,650 |

The items of expenses are:

|---|---|
| Train operations | $112,900 |
| Train operations for wheat haul | 101,600 |
| Mechanical staff | 37,000 |
| Agents and operators | 13,700 |
| Heating shops, and so on | 16,100 |
| Pumpmen | 10,700 |
| Auxiliary rental | 12,700 |
| Water stations, fuel, and so on | 7,000 |
| Miscellaneous | 4,500 |
| Staffs, supervision and engineering | 22,450 |
| Total estimated operating expenses | $338,650 |

The estimated revenues for this year are:

|---|---|
| Freight wheat haul | $210,000 |
| Other freight | 69,000 |
| Passengers | 40,000 |
| Express | 4,000 |
| Mail and telegraph | 5,500 |
| Miscellaneous | 6,500 |
| Total estimated revenues | $335,000 |

These figures indicate an estimated operating deficit of $3,650. I do not wish my remarks to be misconstrued, but I should like to explain that a good deal of that traffic is freight which has been handled for the ports by the government. It is natural that the railway company should receive credit for any freight handled in that way. I point out further that these rates do not include maintenance charges which are ordinarily included in the operating expenses of a railroad. Therefore I may say it is a set-up figure. So that those are the estimated expenditures and revenues for the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. HANBURY: I was interested in learning, if the minister has the information before him, what portion of the revenue is from Churchill to prairie points, or other parts of Canada?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I do not understand the question.

Mr. HANBURY: I was wondering if the minister had information to show what portion of the revenue was derived from merchandise coming into Canada through the port?

Mr. MANION: Practically nothing. The whole revenue, so far as that is concerned, was derived from the two and a half million bushels of wheat shipped out, plus some small quantities of flour and other lines of merchandise. The wheat was the big item, amounting in all to about two and a half million bushels.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: How long was the port open during the 1932 season?

Mr. MANION: It is open from about the middle of July until about the middle of October.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: If possible, I should like to have the exact dates.

Mr. MANION: I shall endeavour to get them, but hon. members will realize I cannot have all information before me for which hon. members are asking. I shall endeavour to get it before my estimates are closed.

Mr. GERSHAW: Some business men appear to be anxious to get lots in the townsite for business purposes. To whom should they apply?

Mr. MANION: The Manitoba government, by whom the townsite is handled.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there any directing effort on the part of the Department of Railways and Canals towards the opening up of the townsite?

Mr. MANION: We have nothing whatever to do with the townsite. We handle the port, but so far as the townsite is concerned, it has been handed over to the province of Manitoba, and they will have complete control of it. In consultation with them, however, we did offer a number of suggestions.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are making all necessary efforts to build up a trade into and out of the port. Has the minister any information to give the committee concerning the success of those operations up to the moment?

Mr. MANION: The province of Saskatchewan has appointed two men, Mr. Ireland and Mr. Smith, to solicit traffic for the port of Churchill. I will be quite frank and say that some of the citizens of Saskatchewan took the stand that the Dominion government or the Canadian National Railways should appoint traffic solicitors for the port of Churchill. I took the responsibility of stating that it was no more the duty of the Canadian government to solicit traffic for the port of Churchill than to solicit for the ports of Halifax, Vancouver, Montreal or Quebec, and the further stand that since in the last few years the Dominion government had spent about $54,000,000 on the port, and since the province of Saskatchewan would be the chief contributor of any freight going into or out of the port, they might very well spend $10,000 on the appointment of traffic solicitors, thereby avoiding any criticism which would be levelled at a Dominion government for appointing such officials for one port and not for others. In the end they adopted the same view, and as a result have appointed the two gentlemen whose names I have mentioned. Their chief duties are to solicit freight and traffic for that port.

Mr. McINTOSH: One question more—I thank the minister for his information. I think the attitude taken by some people in western Canada is that the government of which the hon. minister is a member quite often has the belief and acts upon it that it is right to support infant industries by protection. As this is an infant port, perhaps a little protection would not do it any harm.

Mr. MANION: I think the government has been giving it very generous protection. I do not believe that if the government which my hon. friend followed were now in power it would think of giving it greater protection than it has had. Both in construction, maintenance and operation the Dominion government has given exceedingly generous treatment to the whole road.

Mr. BOWMAN: May I suggest to the minister that he continue that generous support for a little while longer, until the seaport has been given a fair trial? The very fact that the loss of the Bright Fan did not injure the insurance companies to any greater extent than the premiums paid would indicate that future business should prove profitable to the extent of about one hundred per cent. Possibly after the road has been used another year or two the insurance rates will be lowered. Until that time comes I suggest that the port be given the generous assistance that the government has given in the past. May I ask the minister whether or not there will be an official opening this coming season?

Mr. MANION: I am sure the government will continue to give fair and reasonable and just treatment to the port. No government, whether of this stripe or some other, would feel that $54,000,000 should be invested and then the result of that investment be unfairly treated. I am sure that this government will see that fair treatment is given to the port in every possible way. As to an official opening, it was hoped that there would be an official opening in 1932, but there was the imperial conference, and the opening of the Welland canal which had been already delayed a year; as my hon. friend knows, there was much to be done, consequently it was put off. But the government will give every consideration, and I think favourable consideration, to the question of an official opening of the port of Churchill this coming summer.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MacMILLAN: Is it the intention of the government to transfer the Hudson Bay Railway to the Canadian National Railway so that it may become an integral part of that system?

Mr. MANION: That has not been considered by the government as yet. I think if I were one of the managers of the Canadian National Railways, until the Hudson Bay railway showed that it was going to pay its way I would object to taking it over as part of the Canadian National lines, because their deficit now would appear to be sufficient from their standpoint, without adding to it. However, that is a matter which will ultimately have to be considered. I suppose in the course of years the Hudson Bay railway will ultimately become part of the Canadian National system.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is it not a fact that a lot of dead horse railways in eastern Canada have been taken over as part of the Canadian National?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I certainly think there were a lot of railways of that type taken over by the Canadian National in the years that are past, roads that the Canadian National would be very much better without. That is all the more reason why they do not want to take over any more non-paying railways until they show a prospect of carrying themselves.

Mr. MacMILLAN: If one part of the country is going to benefit by the taking over of deadhead railways by the Canadian National, then to build the Hudson Bay railway and attribute its losses directly to that railway is doing it an injustice.

Mr. EULER: I had not intended to say anything in regard to the Hudson Bay railway being incorporated into the Canadian National system, but I quite agree with the minister that if I had control of the Canadian National I would not care to have the Hudson Bay railway saddled upon the Canadian National system. I will also agree that some railways have been taken into the Canadian National system that perhaps should not have been. I fear that some people might be glad to see a losing proposition like the Hudson Bay railway incorporated into the Canadian National system for the mere purpose of enabling them to point the finger of scorn at the principle of public ownership. Something has been said in regard to the desirability of giving a fair trial to the Hudson Bay road. If that means that it is desired to try out the Hudson strait route, whether ships can navigate it safely and for a substantial part of the year, well and good. Otherwise I would say that it was not giving it a fair trial, a trial that means much, if you do not conduct that trial under the same conditions under which it will ultimately have to operate. If the government is going to pay port charges and so on, I say that is not giving it a trial upon which one can rest a fair judgment.

Mr. MacMILLAN: Do you object to it?

Mr. EULER: I am not objecting to giving it a fair trial.

Mr. MacMILLAN: Do you object to the assistance they have given?

Mr. EULER: I do not even understand what my hon. friend is driving at. Usually I do.

Mr. MANION: He asks if you object to paying the port charges.

Mr. EULER: There is one other question that I desire to ask. The minister stated that some two and a half million bushels of wheat went out during the past summer. Was that the product of the year 1932? That is, is it possible to ship grain out by this route in the same year in which it is produced?

Mr. MANION: I do not know what year's grain that was, but generally speaking I would say that it is not practicable—I do not say not possible—to ship grain out in the year in which it is grown, because the navigation season as so far determined is a little on the short side. And this will answer the question of my hon. friend the member for Kindersley; the hon. gentleman asked me about the opening and closing of the port last year. I have obtained the figures for him. The steamship Sierentz came in on August 14, 1932. That does not say that a boat could not have come in sooner, but the first arrival last year was August 14, and the last out was the Pennsilvia, which left on October 10, 1932. That would be a period of just under two months. The previous year the port was certainly open a good deal longer than that, and I think also this past year. But those are the dates of first arrival and last departure. They are all we can go by.

My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked a question at an earlier time in regard to past years. Unfortunately I could not lay my hand on the figures at the time, but I have obtained them since. The actual revenue in 1931 amounted to $387,870.76 and the expenses to $389,077.19, the loss being $1,206.43. That was less than the estimate for the coming year. In 1932 the revenue—in round figures—was $577,000 and operating expenses $612,000, so that the loss was $35,000. But they estimate a little more grain this year, I think about three million bushels, and they figure that this year it will be the amount I put on Hansard a few minutes ago.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I am afraid an entirely wrong impression is being left on the eastern mind in regard to the payment for the construction of this Hudson Bay railway, and that it is being used very much to the detriment of the railway. The impression is that it has cost Canada, eastern Canada chiefly, the sum of $54,000,000. That is absolutely incorrect. What happened was that some years ago Hon. Frank Oliver, then Liberal Minister of the Interior, brought in a bill which became law setting apart certain lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta which were sold for the purpose of building the Hudson Bay railway. I have here a report from the assistant deputy minister of the Railways department, and I am going to put it on Hansard for the information of my hon. friends from the east:

During the ten years the provisions as to preemption and purchase were in force, the Department of the Interior disposed of preemptions approximating 12,763,040 acres, including entries since cancelled, and, as purchased homesteads, 1,322,840 acres approximately, including entries since cancelled.

The lands were sold at $3 per acre. The total sum for which these lands were sold was: preemptions, $38,289,120, approximately; purchased homesteads, $3,968,520, approximately.

Amounts actually received up to February 28, 1930 (the last date upon which I received information from the Department of the Interior) on account of these purchases have been:

|---|---|
| Preemptions.. .. .. .. .. .. | $18,697,346 35 |
| Purchased homesteads.. .. | 3,294,840 42 |
| Total.. .. .. .. .. .. .. | $21,992,186 77 |

Balance owing by purchasers:

| | Approximately |
|---|---|
| Purchased homesteads.. .. | 150,000 |

From this it will be seen that instead of the government of Canada being called upon to foot a bill of $54,000,000, we in the west have built the road and have been mighty little of a burden to the rest of Canada. When hon. gentlemen tell us that we are away behind, needing relief and wanting this, that and the other, while they themselves are getting millions of dollars every year for ports and marine services, although we do not get a cent, I want to tell them that they are away out. We are paying our own way and are drumming up cattle to ship over this road. I said to the people of Regina, "Get busy yourselves and secure traffic for that railway. To hang with the east; we will build up that road ourselves anyhow." I am as good an easterner as I am a westerner, and I can tell my hon. friends that we in western Canada are prepared to assume the responsibility that is ours. We are going to do our duty. Make no mistake: that Hudson Bay railway will be a mighty big success in a short time. It is successful now, and we are going to keep it going regardless of what others say or do.

With regard to the Bright Fan, I have had conversations with people who know something about these matters, and they are very much amused at the statement that has been made that the grain swelled and broke the bulkhead. People who are conversant with these things tell me that this is absolutely silly. The grain was dumped into compartments between the bulkheads but it was all open at the top. The only thing that was on top of the grain was a lot of bags, so that if the grain did swell it would move in the direction of least resistance, which would be upwards; but the darned thing did not go up at all. A statement of that kind is absolutely absurd. The fact is that a ship went down that should not have gone down. I was not there but, from what I have heard, I am sure the ship should not have gone down. That disaster must not therefore be held against insurance rates, and if anyone tries to keep up the rates on that account, we are going to be heard from.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: If I heard the question and answer correctly, there was a wrong impression in regard to the shipment of the current season's crop out of Churchill. I understood the ex-Minister of National Revenue to ask whether the crop of the current year could be shipped that year, and I understood the minister to say that it could not. That is far from being correct. It may be that a large part of the shipment via Churchill may not be the current year's crop. I am located 126 miles west of Saskatoon, which is in the middle of the province and about 40 miles from the Alberta border. I had my grain threshed on August 30 and 31 last year. It was in the elevator and was shipped immediately afterwards, and I was not the first to have my grain threshed; they were threshing their grain ten days before that. So that grain threshed in the latter part of August, according to the minister's statement, has all of September until some time in October—October 10 last year—to get there and be loaded, and he said that the previous year the port was open much later than October 10. Generally speaking, the time until which the port is open may be placed between about the middle and the end of October, and that being so, with grain threshed the latter part of August or early September, I do not see why a large part of the current crop cannot move out of the port during the same year.

Mr. MANION: I do not want to be misunderstood. What I meant was this. Generally speaking, I think I am right in the answer I gave my hon. friend (Mr. Euler). I do not question the statement made by the hon. member that if the grain is harvested by the end of August some of it could be shipped out. Some would be shipped in normal times through Churchill—

Mr. HANBURY: Theoretically.

Mr. MANION: No, even in practice. But even so, if one waited for the crop of that year to go out of Churchill, one would waste two months of a short season. The port opens about the middle of July and closes about the middle of October, so that a crop harvested at the end of August would probably not be shipped out of Churchill until the middle of September, two weeks after harvesting, which would be quite expeditious, and if we attempted to wait for that there would be two months from the middle of July until the middle of September which would be lost. Therefore, a large proportion of the grain that has gone or that will go through Churchill will certainly be the previous year's grain. That is not a serious matter at the present time with hangovers of 100,000,000 bushels. Some difficulty was experienced last year by people who tried to get grain shipped through that port, though fortunately for the port, the Continental Grain Company made the proposal to us of putting in at least 2,000,000 bushels and shipping out at least 1,000,000. They put in well over 2,000,000 bushels and shipped most of it, and one or two other companies shipped a small quantity.

My hon. friend from Muskoka asked a question with regard to future costs added to those I have already given. When I mentioned that figure of $54,000,000, that included this year's estimate of expenditures, and that will represent to a large extent the completion of the port so far as traffic of the present type is concerned. If the traffic became heavier, we should require more freight sheds and coaling facilities, greater elevator facilities, more docks, and so forth. I am referring to it as an up-to-date port, capable of handling fifty per cent more shipping than was handled last year. The port is in pretty good shape considered from that angle. The elevator will handle many times the amount of wheat handled last year. In reply to the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) I would say that I have no quarrel to make with the statement he made; I am quite familiar with it. I am not endeavouring in any way to differ from him or to argue that the port has been treated too generously. It must not be forgotten that the land set aside for the purpose of the Hudson Bay railway belonged to the Dominion government at the time it was set aside. I cannot even remember what government was in power at that time, but this land was set aside before the natural resources were turned over to the provinces.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In connection with the figure of $54,000,000 given as the expenditure in connection with this port, could the minister tell the committee how much of that was expended at Port Nelson?

Mr. MANION: That amount includes the expenditure at Port Nelson, which was something between six and seven million dollars. I think this amount is a legitimate inclusion because it was all spent in connection with the building of the road.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What proportion of that was for the elevator?

Mr. MANION: About $1,500,000. Replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) I may say that I have been informed by one of the officers of the department that the last two cargoes which went out last year were composed of that year's crop. This would seem to indicate that a particular year's crop can be handled through the port in the same year.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Could the minister put on record the exact figures in connection with the expenditure at Port Nelson?

Mr. MacMILLAN: There was great difficulty last year in obtaining cargoes to be shipped through this port. We in western Canada asked to have this railway built and port facilities provided, but, strange to say, the grain interests have paid little heed to the request that cargoes be shipped through Churchill. If my memory serves me aright, the minister had to go out and dig up some cargoes to be shipped through this port. I think it is just about time the western cities and their boards of trade woke up and did a little digging themselves for cargoes.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) asked the capacity of the grain elevator. While I cannot give him the exact figures, it is something in the neighbourhood of one million bushels per day. This is a two and a half million bushel elevator with four loading belts, and it can run the grain through pretty rapidly. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) asked the exact expenditure at Port Nelson; it was $6,274,217.88.

Mr. EULER: No salvage at all?

Mr. MANION: That is the net cost; there was a certain amount of salvage, but not very much.

Mr. BOWMAN: Replying to the hon. member for Kindersley, the minister gave October 10 as the date upon which the last boat left the port. Was the port open for navigation longer than that date?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN: Has the minister any idea how long the port was open for navigation?

Mr. MANION: We obtain information from time to time from the officials of the Department of Marine as well as of the Department of Railways and Canals. This information may be that the strait is open upon a certain day, but navigation from Churchill does not depend only upon the strait being open. Churchill bay is fed by fresh water streams and freezes up more quickly in the fall than does the salt water out in the bay and in the strait. Consequently the closing of navigation depends upon the harbour of Churchill itself. If the traffic warrants it later on, it is possible that ice breakers may be used to keep the port open for a longer period, but that has not been found necessary as yet. In the spring the reverse applies; the port is open before the strait because the ice comes down from Fox channel and interferes with the ships coming in. It is all a rather complicated picture, but the officials of both the Department of Marine and the Department of Railways and Canals, are continually making records in an endeavour to obtain accurate information over a period of years as to just how long the port can be kept open. I think at the moment it can be stated definitely that there is at least three months of safe navigation, although less than two months were used last year, and it is quite probable that the period of navigation will be lengthened in the years to come.

Mr. BOWMAN: It is quite evident that with the elevator capacity this port can handle probably 25,000,000 to 30,000,000 bushels of grain safely in a season.

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have been waiting for an opportunity to have another say in this matter. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has left the chamber, but I would like to say to him that I would be quite willing to sit at his feet to learn about the wonders and dangers of shipping. I do not pretend to know much about these matters, but one does not need to know very much to know that a "lookout" is no good on a ship unless there is an occupant in it. There was no occupant in the lookout of this ship when it struck the berg. The statement was made by Captain Oliver of the Bright Fan that the bulkhead of this boat was shoved over because the wheat swelled up after being two and a half hours in cold salt water. Whoever made that statement either did not know very much about wheat or he must have been as full as a goat himself. The captain was comfortably asleep downstairs somewhere—I know you do not call it that in a boat—and there was a boy of eighteen at the wheel. The one who should have been at the wheel was down having a cup of coffee. That seems to be a lackadaisical way to run a boat supposed to be in dangerous waters, especially when they had been told by radio that there was a roaming iceberg nearby which had not been properly parked. I think the whole thing is a disgraceful incident, and instead of protecting these men they should be exposed all over the world. This ship should not have been sent out without a gyro compass. Unless the minister does a little more to find out about these things, I am going to have something further to say later. In former years I had something to do with this port of Churchill being finally chosen and I am not going to allow this thing to stand. I congratulate the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) for sticking to his guns and puncturing some of these cock and bull stories about the bulkhead bursting because the wheat was wet for two hours and a half. That is absolute nonsense. If the government want to protect their own hides in this matter, I would recommend that they get busy with London. I wonder if they have sent over a copy of this tabled report of the commission with regard to the Canadian investigation. It should have gone overseas. The insurance companies should know the result of the investigation. We would not have received it if it had not been for some members who were curious to know what was in it. Indeed, I do not think we would have had it at all had it not been for the hon. member for Nelson.

Mr. MANION: That is not quite correct. The report was tabled last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We would not have had the evidence had not some hon. member prodded the government a bit.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member can get off more mistaken statements than anyone else, but when he said that the government had to be prodded, the government did not have to be prodded by either the hon. member for Nelson or my hon. friend himself. If a wreck occurs and there is any question about it, the Marine department of whichever government happens to be in power investigates it. An investigation in this case followed in the usual course; the government required no prodding at all. The government does not require to "protect its hide," as the hon. gentleman so elegantly expressed it, so far as the port of Churchill and navigation through Hudson strait are concerned. The government has done everything to support the route. I have no doubt the Marine department have long ago sent the report to England.

So far as anything further to be done by this government regarding the sinking of the Bright Fan is concerned, the government has done everything a government would ordinarily be expected to do. It has made a thorough investigation. The report has been against the Bright Fan, against the operation of the vessel, as I have put enough on record to show. Certainly the British shipping people, who are the best in that line in the world, do not require any special prodding to check up insurance rates, taking into account the Bright Fan and the navigation of that ship. I just wish to correct the implication that the government has been in any way remiss in its duty in handling this matter. The government is just as anxious as any could be for the port to be a success. No government would want to see $54,000,000 spent upon any project without any return from it. I can assure my hon. friend that the government is doing everything it can to have the insurance rates lowered—I pointed that out very much earlier in the afternoon—and it will continue to do everything possible to have insurance rates lowered and to have the Churchill route given a fair and just trial.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad the minister assures us that the government took the initiative on something. The information we have is that it was the hon. member for Nelson who initiated the investigation, but whoever initiated it, I want to give him the credit.

With regard to sending the report and the evidence to London, what use was the investigation otherwise? The minister was not going to table the evidence until the hon. member for North Battleford got after it, and he had to get after it at least half a dozen times before it was tabled. I read the evidence, hurriedly, I admit, but I read enough to get a grasp of what bunk was put up by the captain in regard to the bulkhead. I was curious to know why he was talking in that way if he had a really valid excuse for the water getting into the rest of the boat. He must have known that could not be accepted as a reason for the bulkhead going over. I say again to the minister that we shall expect him to get busy and find out, first, whether that insurance was paid by the insurance companies; further, if there was another investigation on the other side of the water with respect to the matter, and if so, what was the result of it? Or was it a case of this crew being turned loose on the public to victimize them again in the next boat that wants to take a nosedive in the waters of Hudson bay; if they know they can make away with their boat by getting on a drunk at Churchill and having a little investigation at Ottawa, the cost of them is not very much if they are going to get the insurance for their vessel. Shipping, especially old junk, is quite plentiful now, and it is the duty of the government—and I shall impress it upon them—to see this matter to a finish and satisfy us as to just what happened and why, and if this boat was sunk purposely. The hon. member for Nelson stated in the house that he believed the evidence would demonstrate that the boat was sunk deliberately. The government has this from one of its own supporters, not from me; I am just making my contribution as to what I think the government should do, because I intend to hold them responsible if they do not take further action in regard to this matter. We want our insurance rates lowered and we cannot get them lowered by sinking vessels either by accident or design along the route. It was well known that an iceberg was in the vicinity. The N. B. McLean had notified that ship by radio and yet we find the captain drowsing away in his bed, the man that should have been at the helm drinking a cup of coffee and an eighteen year old boy, who might well have been on the lookout, being at the wheel. That was the situation. I am not a mariner, but I have been on salt water long enough to know when a boat is in danger, the captain never leaves the bridge. He sleeps there without undressing.

Mr. RALSTON: No, he does not sleep.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, he rests in the chart room, or whatever you call it. I do not care who denies it, because I have seen a captain do so. I was on a boat coming from Jamaica and for two or three days in succession the captain never left those quarters nearby and had his meals brought there. There are coral reefs around there and a heavy sea was on. All I know about the matter is that men who have charge of ships, whether freight or passenger, do not loaf in bed or sip coffee away from the helm under those berg conditions of which they were warned. I do not think the crew could have been sobered up after the spree they had at Churchill.

There is another matter that should be investigated. Why should boats be permitted to leave the other side without a proper compass? I do not know what the port regulations are along this line. I know it costs a good deal to buy these gyro compasses, but if there is a proper compass, why are regulations not made to compel these boats to carry it? If the N. B. McLean had not been near the spot, these men might all have gone down or they might have got to the Labrador shore. But perhaps that is another story. Possibly they cannot be made to buy these gyro compasses; but what is the use of them if the boats do not use them? The captain gave evidence that the compass he had was of no use to him, so that it was no better than the lookout. Just imagine going through there without a compass as well as without a lookout! The matter requires much fuller investigation. These men have to get certificates; well, they should be stripped of their certificates, demobilized and sent elsewhere, not on stormy waters or even calm waters.

Another matter. When insurance is quoted, it seems always to be quoted on a quarter basis, eight bushels, and in English money. I used to be able to reduce English money to dollars and cents, but I have not seen enough of it lately to do any mental arithmetic in that respect. Could it not be quoted on the same basis as on our side, so much in dollars and cents per 1,000 or 100 bushels or per bushel, whatever is required? That would be a great convenience.

My deskmate and the minister had a little dialogue on a matter that has not been made quite clear, as to sending out wheat the same year it is grown. Possibly there will be at least two months of that in an ordinary year. In a year like last year, our wheat would have been at Churchill harbour by the first of September and could be shipped from then to the first of November at least. We are not worrying about that at all. It will help to take the peak load at a time when the other ports are busy. Besides, right now there must be between fifty and sixty million bushels of wheat at the head of the lakes.

Mr. MANION: Probably more than that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is sixty million bushels, and nobody is perspiring blood over that. So why should there be so much agitation and anxiety about two or three million bushels being held over at Churchill? There are some two hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat in Canada right now awaiting export, and some of that two hundred and fifty million bushels is in ports open all the year round. So we should not get into a state of agitation because two or three million bushels are held up at Churchill in the same way. There has been no difficulty on that score, I can assure any doubting Thomases. It has not been demonstrated yet just how good the Churchill route is going to turn out, but we do not want any more Bright Fan incidents making it more difficult to get reasonable insurance rates. I consider that the insurance rates have everything to do with the success of that route. The minister told us last year that the insurance rates on the Hudson Bay route were five or six times greater than on the St. Lawrence route. I think they have been lowered slightly since, judging by a press statement the minister made last summer, but I believe the rates on the Churchill route are still four times greater than on the St. Lawrence. The minister will correct me if I am wrong. That is a tremendous handicap. There is a great advantage in distance for the Hudson bay route, and we want to make the most of that. I would point out that the government of which I had the honour to be a member did its best to develop the Pacific route. It was not until after we came into power that the Pacific route did very much wheat business. After the Panama canal was opened it was quite a number of years before our wheat or anything else went out of Vancouver or Westminster or any other Pacific port in any quantity. But we had elevators built there, established commissions in control of elevators, and had Crowsnest freight rates established, so that Alberta wheat sought out that nearest outlet to the sea, and it was not long before Vancouver was humming with wheat shipping. Sometimes there was so much wheat going there that shipments had to be diverted elsewhere. I am not appealing for the Hudson bay route any more than I appealed for the Pacific coast route, and I hope the minister will not take umbrage at anything I have said. I think he is doing fairly well, considering the mighty little encouragement he must be getting round about him, especially in his own constituency of Fort William, when he attempts to help along a rival port. I quite appreciate that. While it is not his place to do it, I think that either the Minister of Marine or the Prime Minister should lose no time in placing this whole matter before the insurance authorities in London and getting all the information available on the subject. That is what I would suggest at this stage, and I shall expect something to be done, otherwise I shall be constrained to have another word to say later.

Mr. MANION: At this late hour I do not wish to take up much more of the time of the committee, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that this government is leaving nothing undone. What the hon. member for Melville has just suggested I am quite sure has already been done by the Department of Marine. It was their duty, and I have no doubt whatever that the whole report has been forwarded to England long ago.

I wish to take exception to the suggestion that there was any difficulty in getting the report tabled. We had no reason in the world for keeping it back. We were in no way responsible for the sinking of the Bright Fan and in no way interested in protecting Captain Oliver or anyone else. It is our business to do everything we can to get the insurance rates down, and we have done and will do everything we can in that direction. I am sure that next year when the estimates come up again we shall have reports of any investigations that have been held in connection with this matter in Great Britain. Personally I have had no intimation of any investigation being held over there, but the hon. member for Nelson has stated that he understands that an investigation is being held, and I have no reason to doubt that his information is correct. May I say on his behalf that no constituency has a more loyal member, and there has been no more loyal supporter of the Hudson bay route, and no harder worker for it than the hon. member for Nelson.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: He has been very enthusiastic about the route at all times, as naturally he would be, because the success or otherwise of the route will probably mean the making or breaking of his section of the country. He is a hard working member and deserves the commendation not only of my hon. friend but of the whole house because of the work he has done for that route.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I was quite interested in a remark made by the hon. member for Nelson about the sinking of the Bright Fan. He said that the ship started out from Churchill looking for an iceberg to bump into, and that finally it found one, and sank in consequence. He also stated that the captain was a reprobate and a drunkard. In view of that fact possibly a lot of bootleggers may be handling grain from that port, and the bulkhead may have given way through an explosion when moonshine was being manufactured on the boat.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood from the minister's figures as to the cost of operation that maintenance of way was not taken into account. May I ask him if anything was taken into account for rolling stock and equipment, rentals, and whether the Hudson Bay railway, or the government on behalf of the Hudson Bay railway, owns the rolling stock and equipment or rents it from the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MANION: The equipment is rented from the Canadian National Railways, and the cost of that equipment is taken into account. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the maintenance charges are not taken into account. Nor have we been charging up interest to the road.

Item agreed to.

Canals—Welland ship canal—construction and betterments, $1,992,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister the total cost of the Welland canal to date, and the total interest charges on our entire canal system every year?

Mr. MANION: The total cost of the Welland ship canal, in round figures, is $128,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister the interest charges on the entire canal system of Canada?

Mr. MANION: The cost of the entire canal system, including the Welland canal, is in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a billion dollars, about $250,000,000. So far as interest is concerned, it is not charged up to the canals, but is incorporated in the general consolidated revenue accounts of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My impression from some figures I received was that the total cost was somewhere around $236,000,000, and I think that last year the interest charges to the Canadian taxpayers were $12,000,000. Has the government ever considered the advisability of installing a toll system on our Canadian canals? Shipments of our grain from Vancouver to the old country pay $1.20 a bushel passing through the Panama canal, and 72 cents a ton in ballast, or a net average of nearly $1 a bushel. Last year a profit of $7,000,000 was made by the American government on the Panama canal system, of which the port of Vancouver contributed roughly $3,750,000. Of course, I know about the old treaties, but if American shipping is to use our Canadian canal system to the extent of 1,750,000 tons out of a total of 17,500,000 tons, which were the figures last year, without paying a single cent in tolls, I would suggest that the question of installing a toll system be seriously considered by the government. Here is the wheat of western Canada shipped out of the port of Vancouver paying on the average $8,000 per cargo passing through the Panama canal, including freight both ways, and I am suggesting to the minister and the administration that we might give very careful thought to the adoption of some toll system on our Canadian canals, so that we would not be losing the revenue we are losing to-day. Also there should be a policy of equalization between west and east. At the present time the western grain shippers are paying a large amount in tolls to the American government.

Mr. MANION: The matter of tolls has not been considered by the government, because in 1903 all canal tolls were abolished by agreement between the governments of the United States and Canada. Up to that time tolls had been charged. It is true that tolls are charged on the Panama canal. Any change in the present arrangement however would have to be by arrangement between the United States and Canada and it is possible that the United States would not agree to a change.

Then, too, if tolls were charged on the Canadian canals there would be the danger of sending through the United States ports a much larger proportion of Canadian grain than now goes through them. Up until recently from a quarter to a third of Canadian grain had been shipped via American ports. If shipping tolls were charged on Canadian canals the shipments through American ports would certainly be increased. Then there is this further point to remember, that the best canal at the Soo is the American canal, and is used by Canadian boats. In ordinary times the Soo canal carries more traffic than any other canal in the world. It carries two or three times as much as the Panama or Suez. By far the greater proportion of the traffic goes through the American locks. I am prepared to admit that canals present a complicated question, and there are reasonable arguments on both sides. I notice that a financial paper of Canada has been waging an extensive campaign on behalf of tolls, and there is another argument from the standpoint of the railways. I should not like to commit myself however, because it is not a question which has come before the government in a definite manner, and as I said before, any arrangement which could be made there would have to be an international agreement.

Mr. CANTLEY: The free use of our canals undoubtedly will have to be reviewed, and some other arrangement made between the United States and Canada. What are some of the facts? American coal is being transported without charge through canals which cost this country great sums of money. The eastern provinces are not in a position to send coal westward. Canada is thus practically subsidizing every ton of American coal which comes into Ontario or Quebec, by offering free passage through canals which cost us about $300,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and including free dockage.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, including free dockage. I submit that condition of affairs should not be allowed to continue indefinitely. Then, there are other factors to which I might refer, but on this occasion I will not do so. Consider this for a moment: Outside of the province of Ontario the canal expenditures in the Dominion of Canada are very small. For instance, in the province of Nova Scotia we have only half a mile of canal, costing originally about $600,000. If we are to allay unrest in the different provinces these matters should be considered and conditions rectified. When, on previous occasions, the vote for canals was before us, I thought of making a statement, but refrained from doing so. For years I have been amused at the arguments made in this house by some western members about the Hudson Bay route. I made the statement half a dozen years ago—perhaps I am out of order, but I shall repeat it now—"that when the year came that our western friends could bring ten ships into Hudson bay and get them safely out again I would admit that the navigation of Hudson bay was feasible." As yet that has not been done. We will have to wait twenty years before it will be done. The past two seasons were exceptional. Wait and see.

Mr. EULER: I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, concerning tolls on canals. Ten or twelve years ago I asked in this house what logical reason could be given why a canal system should be constructed at the expense of the Canadian people, at a cost of over $300,000,000, and should be used by private interests entirely free of charge. I could see no reason for it. The only reply I received at that time came from the Minister of Finance, and was to the effect that it had always been done. That did not strike me as a very good reason. Particularly in these days, when the government is in need of revenue, unless the treaty with the United States entirely forbids, I do not see why at least there should not be a charge made for the use of canals which would pay for their maintenance. That is done in connection with the Panama canal, and in other parts of the world. I believe the average charge of sending a vessel through the Panama canal is about $4.000 or about $8,000 on a return trip. They are receiving a return of about two per cent on their investment. I would not ask for a greater return, but would suggest that surely we ought to charge sufficient to pay for maintenance.

The minister has stated that a treaty was made with the United States in 1904 providing for equality of treatment. I do not know whether the treaty goes so far as to say that there shall be equality of treatment only so far as United States vessels are concerned. I would say: Yes, let us have equality of treatment. I would say that the Canadian ship owners who use Canadian canals should pay a fair charge or toll for such use. The canals are used by private interests and for private purposes. I suppose I may expect criticism from my western friends for my attitude in this direction, and there is no doubt they will be disposed to criticize me for what I said about the Hudson Bay railway. That is quite all right; I accept their criticism. A short time ago it was hinted to me because of my criticism of the Hudson Bay railway I might expect criticism from them concerning the Welland canal. They may criticize the Welland canal as much as they like; for my part I think it was a foolish expenditure. It will never be of any great use until it becomes a link in a complete St. Lawrence waterway system. Although I may be out of order, I must say that I hope the government will not go on with the St. Lawrence waterway scheme for a good many years to come or until we are in a better position financially than we are to-day. I suggest that the government approach the United States with a view to providing for the payment both by Canadian and United States owners of a fair sum for the use of the canals.

Item agreed to.

Canals—improvements, $433,600.

Mr. MALCOLM: What was the cost of the official opening of the Welland canal?

Mr. MANION: The work was done mostly by the employees who took part in construction and, as has been suggested to me by the Minister of Justice, much was done more or less as an act of charity and mercy. At any rate, nearly everyone who contributed to the opening ceremony gave his services free. For example, there was some radio broadcasting, and the companies interested charged nothing but their bare expenses. The ship which came through the canal was supplied by the Canada Steamship lines. They loaded the boat and brought it down without any cost, although they did not require it at that time. There was a little bit of decoration, because the Governor General was there, and naturally the show had to be put on in reasonably dignified form, but the cost altogether, I think—I am speaking from memory—was about a couple of thousand dollars, a small amount in consideration of the fact that the total cost of the canal was about $128,000,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister give the house the percentage of Canadian tonnage that used the new Welland canal in comparison with American tonnage?

Mr. MANION: It has not been divided that way, but there was a good deal more tonnage through the canal last year, and I think a good deal more Canadian than in previous years. I happen to know that there was a lot of tonnage to Toronto and Hamilton that previously had gone by rail: I remember the railways were protesting against it. Last year there went through the Welland canal 8,500,000 tons of freight.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister tell how much of the 8,500,000 tons was Canadian? Could he secure the information?

Mr. MANION: I will be glad to supply the information later, but I doubt if I will be able to supply it on this item. I do not know when I shall be able to have it.

Mr. MALCOLM: I asked the question, in view of the remarks of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). There is a strong feeling in the minds of business people of this country that the cost of the Welland canal, a rather substantial investment for this country, will bear much heavier on the Canadian taxpayer than on the American, whereas the advantages will be in the aggregate very much more to the American shipper than the Canadian shipper. I would not like to say I would advocate the institution of tolls on our canal system, but the fact must be borne in mind that if the whole St. Lawrence waterway system, of which the Welland canal is a part, is to be made free it is altogether probable that nine-tenths of the use of it will be by vessels of American registry and about one tenth by vessels of Canadian registry. I think before one can intelligently discuss the question whether or not we should impose tolls on tonnage going through the Welland canal we would have to have some information as to what the proportion of tonnage is between the two countries and an estimate of what it may be in future.

The other argument which the minister referred to, namely the loss to our national railways by virtue of the Welland canal diverting tonnage, is an argument probably strongly in favour of tolls on the canal system. Iron ore consigned to Hamilton and lake Ontario ports used to provide a very considerable tonnage for the national railways from the Point Edward docks near Sarnia. I think those familiar with the movement of iron ore know that there are many thousand specially built ore cars lying idle on sidings since the Welland canal was opened last year, the ore now comes through the canal without paying any toll, with a distinct saving to the shippers of the ore from the upper lakes. I think the minister would be well advised to secure all the data he can as to just what the loss is to the national railways by the diversion of tonnage through the free canals; and also what the tonnage through the canal system has been, divided between Canadian and American ships. With that information before us we will be in a much better position to deal with the question of tolls.

Mr. McGIBBON: Do you not think you would also have to take into consideration the Canadian tonnage that goes through the Panama canal?

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend knows that the Panama canal charges tolls.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not more on Canadian than on United States ships.

Mr. MALCOLM: We pay the same.

Mr. MANION: I will gladly endeavour to get the information asked for.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if the minister is absolutely convinced of the urgency of this particular item. It looks this way to me; we are supposed to have completed a canal costing $128,000,000; we opened it a little while ago. We now propose to vote nearly $2,000,,-000 more, I presume to pay for what has already been done. Then we propose to add to that nearly half a million for improvements. Is it not possible to defer these improvements in view of the financial stringency that exists? Half a million dollars is not large in comparison with the total cost of the canal, but it is when you consider the interest on the capital sum.

Mr. MANION: This item is not for work on the Welland canal alone. There is a certain amount of it to be spent on improvements, for instance, docks, such as are built on the Welland canal, and from these there is a very good return. We find that docks for handling oil and package freight pay a good charge, in fact some of them it is estimated pay for themselves in a very few years. The Department of Railways and Canals has an income from various things of this kind, including small water powers on the different canals, amounting to about $1,000,000 a year.

This item that my hon. friend speaks of is made up of improvements on many of the canals; for example, the Murray canal, a small canal near Trenton, a small item, $1,700 for reinforced concrete two-path bridge over a little creek. These canals were built over the last seventy years or more at a cost of a quarter of a billion dollars, and of course unless we wish to let them close up altogether we have to keep their walls properly in repair, there are bridges over them that we must keep in repair, there are docks to be built on most of them, but from them we get an income. Things of that sort we cannot get away from. This year it is a little higher than last year, but generally speaking it has been cut down materially. In addition to that Murray canal there is on the Carillon and Grenville canal a pair of lock gates to be replaced, another pair of a different height; reconstruction in concrete of the end of a guide pier at the upper entrance of this same canal, altogether amounting to about $16,000. On the Lachine canal, there is the renewal of the lower entrance of the south lock. I think that is the part hit by a steamship last year and badly smashed. We got damages from the steamship company by suit. Then a scow is required costing $4,000. On the Ste. Anne's lock there is the complete refacing in concrete of an old crib on the north side, costing $4,400 and the rebuilding of the upper lock gate, $4,850. Many of these structures that are being rebuilt or repaired are twenty, thirty or forty years old and simply have to be repaired unless we let the canals go into disrepair. Then there are the Soulanges and Trent canals. On the Welland canal there is an item of $85,000 which really, I think, may justly be charged to capital account; it is the filling of the old Welland canal through the city of St. Catharines. We have unwatered that, the new canal is now being utilized, the old course makes an ugly scar right through the riding of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). The people of St. Catharines claim it cut their city in two, which it does, and I think, in spite of the hilarity of my hon. friends opposite—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I think, in spite of the hilarity of my hon. friends opposite, it is a very just claim, and I might say we had quite an argument. But when it is pointed out that right through the centre of the city of St. Catharines there is that ugly gap that fills in with stagnant water from the old locks, I think it can be justly said that it is the duty of the government to put in some ordinary filling. There will be some salvage from it because this land through the centre of St. Catharines will in consequence belong to the government.

Mr. RALSTON: Any sale for it?

Mr. MANION: I imagine it will bring in a fair return because St. Catharines, as someone beside me says is no mean city. As regards the Welland ship canal, there is an item of $118,000 in connection with the completion of a wharf at Welland South. That is one of the items I mentioned as bringing in a very good traffic return. The ships passing through all these towns all pay for dockage facilities. Tonnage is charged on every one of them, and my engineers inform me that in this particular instance the work will pay for itself within a comparatively short period. These items are all necessary, or I can assure my hon. friend that they would not have been in the estimates. The estimates have been pared down considerably but these are necessary expenditures in various sections of the canal system of the country.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is being spent on the Trent Valley canal, and what is the revenue?

Mr. MANION: The amount is $89,000, but it is scattered from Murray canal at one end right up to nearly Georgian bay at the other. It is a long canal. As to income, I grant that there is not much except what we get from the very small power sale on the canal. Most of these canals, like the Rideau canal going up to Kingston, for instance, are used largely for tourist traffic, and the people in the neighbourhood claim that motor boats from across the line provide fairly heavy traffic, which gives a direct revenue to the people and an indirect revenue to the government. In these times, it might be argued, we might let the canals go to ruin, but it would hardly be a popular move. The people are of the opinion that since they have been built and they have their advantages, even if only from the standpoint of tourist traffic, they are worth keeping up.

Mr. RALSTON: The item is unintentionally deceptive in the heading, which suggests maintenance. I do think the minister might well have hesitated a little longer before putting in $85,000 for filling up the old canal, and calling that improvements. I do not think this is the year to spend money for such purposes. In Montreal there is a considerable gash across the face of the landscape and I have not heard anyone suggest that it should be filled up.

An hon. MEMBER: It is better left open.

Mr. RALSTON: Someone might say the same about this canal. The $118,000 is a revenue-producing item but there are a number of other items to which the minister has not referred. We are sitting here blithely voting away money although we do not know where it is coming from. I think every effort should be made to cut down the estimates as far as possible.

Mr. MANION: I agree with much of what the hon. gentleman has said, but it does not follow that because these items are in the estimates the money will necessarily be spent. Last year we were down hundreds of thousands in our expenditures, and that is true of nearly all departments. The Public Works department was down markedly. We estimate that a good deal of the money now in the estimates will probably not be spent; it is there in case of emergent need. There is also the argument that if the government shuts down entirely on all these works it will encourage private corporations to follow suit, and John Maynard Keynes argues that instead of shutting down on public works governments should spend generously. It is a debatable point. Personally I do not think that the government should absolutely close the doors on all public works, though I agree with my hon. friend that we have to be careful in times like these, and I think the government is being exceedingly careful.

Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur): The minister referred to an agreement with the United States whereby no tolls were to be charged on canals. In that agreement is there any provision for its termination or is it for a fixed length of time?

Mr. MANION: The agreement provides that the ships of the two countries shall be treated in the same manner but by mutual consent the arrangement can be terminated at any time.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada —maintenance and operation, $250,080.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to renew the representations I made last year with regard to an appeal which was taken from the Board of Railway Commissioners to the Privy Council of Canada, and which is still before council. That appeal relates to the equalization of grain freight rates as between Quebec and Halifax and Saint John. The case was appealed considerably over a year ago. It was taken to the Board of Railway Commissioners and then to the Privy Council of Canada, and at that time I understood that a general assurance was given that the matter would be disposed of. It is still held up. At the present time, although the old differential was one cent as between Quebec and Saint John and Halifax, by a decision of the board the rate is 18 cents and the maritime ports are asking that the differential be made the same as it was before the new rate was given to the port of Quebec. I would urge upon the government the disposition of this matter. If it is really intended not to deal with it or to give a decision, then the maritime ports are entitled to a declaration to that effect.

Mr. MANION: The matter for one reason or another has not been disposed of, but I may say that I was informed, though quite unofficially, that the present arrangements were altogether satisfactory to those who were asking for the appeal to be disposed of. That information may be entirely wrong but at any rate the matter will be dealt with in the near future. Did I understand my hon. friend to refer to American ports?

Mr. RALSTON: I said maritime ports.

Mr. MANION: Because I was going to say that the rates as they stand to-day are really on an equal basis from the head of the lakes in Canada to the maritimes, and from Duluth and Chicago to American ports. The rate my hon. friend speaks of, the Quebec rate plus one cent, is the only one that is out of line. I may point out that the Canadian railways have taken the attitude that even if that rate were put on the same basis as the Montreal rate, the one cent differential would not increase the amount of grain going through the Canadian ports. We hope however that the amount of grain going through the Canadian ports will be increased materially as a result of the agreements entered into. As regards the decision, the question has not been brought to my attention recently but I shall look into it. I agree with my hon. friend that appeals of that sort should be disposed of. However, he must remember that the governor general in council of the government is not a rate making body, and it is a very difficult thing to handle a subject of that kind. So far as I know, no government in the past has ever made a rate after an appeal from the railway commission to the privy council; in practically all cases the matter is referred back to the commission. It is true that in the case of the Crowsnest pass rate this was done, but otherwise parliament has not been in the habit of considering itself a rate making body. There is perhaps no question in the whole Canadian domain more complicated, more technical and more difficult to deal with than that of freight rates.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate the assurance of the minister that the matter will be disposed of. The situation was that the grain rate to Quebec was substantially reduced. Previous to that reduction there had been a one cent differential between the rate to Quebec and the rate to Saint John and Halifax, and after the reduction was made the maritime ports asked that the same differential be put into effect. This would have made a substantial reduction in the rate to those ports. So important was it regarded that the board of trade and the harbour commission of Halifax united in an application to the board of railway commissioners. There was also considerable newspaper agitation about this matter. The decision was adverse and the matter went to the privy council. I have not heard it suggested that this matter be abandoned or that it is not of interest. The same situation exists to-day as existed at the time the application was launched. If the minister has any intimation of this kind, it seems to me, in justice to the government and to the country, that it ought to be made known. There should be a disposition of the matter one way or the other.

Mr. MANION: The information I have is quite informal, but it may be entirely correct. I happen to have in my pocket a map which I have found very useful showing the rates between ports. It is worth remembering that recently a reduction was made in rates from the Canadian head of the lakes to maritime ports. This rate is now five cents lower per hundred pounds than the rate from Duluth and Minneapolis to New York, and five cents lower per hundred pounds than the rate from the Canadian head of the lakes to New York. There is certainly a differential favourable to the maritimes. The special rate given to Quebec by the board of railway commissioners was 18·34 cents per hundred pounds, and it is argued that this rate, plus a differential of one cent, should be carried through to Saint John and Halifax. This would make a 19·34 rate as against the present rate of 30 cents. It might be interesting to note that since the lower rate went into effect to Quebec the amount of grain handled through that port has not increased, and it is quite possible that if this rate plus the differential were continued to the maritimes it might not prove to be any better for those ports.

Mr. RALSTON: All I ask is that it be tried.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services—including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily, $50,900.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the explanation of the increase of nearly $9,000 in this item?

Mr. MANION: The increase represents the difference between an item of $14,000 required this year for surveys and inspections, Beauharnois, and a decrease of $5,010 in the amount provided in last year's vote and not now required. The vote is made up as follows:

Administration of department, $3,822.

This includes such things as communication services, personal services, supplies and materials and small travelling expenses. Then there is:

Government officials' cars, operation and maintenance, $26,078.
Governor General's cars, repairs, $7,000.
Surveys and investigations, Beauharnois, $14,000.

I can give further details if my hon. friend so desires.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does that item as to official cars include the private cars of the ministers?

Mr. MANION: There is exactly the same number of private cars for the use of ministers. The same service is maintained but occasionally the cost of repairs would be more one year than for another.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is there an increase in that item?

Mr. MANION: There may be, but my deputy apparently cannot give the details. I can promise my hon. friend that these details will be furnished before the estimates are completed.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister allow this item to stand?

Mr. MANION: Gladly.

Item stands.

Surveys and inspections, canals—including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily, $9,300.

Mr. POWER: What does this vote cover?

Mr. MANION: It is to cover any surveys or special or extraordinary investigations which may be made. It is an annual vote and has been voted for many years. If there is a special investigation in connection with a canal or other special work, this vote is used for the purpose. The details of the expenditures to November 30th last year are as follows:

| Communication services | $1,376 19 |
| Miscellaneous current expenditures | 39 50 |
| Personal services | 42 48 |
| Supplies and materials | 618 37 |
| Transportation | 48 13 |
| Travelling expenses | 12 25 |
| Contracts and agreements | 306 95 |

The total expended last year to November 30 amounted to $2,443. As a matter of fact, the item has been put in for a number of years and is left there, but rarely spent.

Item agreed to.

Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances payable under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payments during the period January 1, 1933 to March 31, 1934, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $29,000.

Mr. MacLEAN: Will the minister give a full explanation regarding this money that is voted each year to supplement pension allowances? It seems to be hard for our railway men in the maritimes to understand it, and it is a great deal of trouble trying to explain it to them. I cannot understand it.

Mr. MANION: In a word, it is because the minimum pension was formerly $20 and, because of the cost of living, it was raised to $30. Consequently, the cost to the government is greater than it used to be. If the hon. member so desires, I can read the statement which will explain the matter a little more fully.

Mr. MacLEAN: Do I understand that all men who receive pensions get $30?

Mr. MANION: Yes, under the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act, they receive a minimum of $30. They may receive more. The minimum pension, as I say, used to be $20 and it was increased to $30. It was because of the difference between the $20 and $30 that the item had to be inserted. It is an item which costs the railway a good deal more than that. I do not know that I can give the exact figure. At the present time this amount of $29,000 is for the difference in the amount of pension.

Mr. MacLEAN: Quite a number do not receive $30. Would that be because they did not have the length of service, or would it be for some other reason? Some receive $22, $24, $25 and so on. They want to know why they do not receive the $30.

Mr. MANION: My deputy, who is a railway man, says that none of them receive less than $30. If my hon. friend will give me a specific case, I shall gladly look into it. My information is that the lowest pension received by anyone who has a right to a pension, is $30.

Mr. MacLEAN: I shall be glad to write my hon. friend and give him the information.

I do not know whether I would be in order in referring to this matter now, but last year there was a very serious railway accident in my locality and claims for compensation are still pending. I do not know whether the minister has any information about the matter, but I hope, if it is brought to his attention, he will give it his sympathetic consideration, because it was a very serious accident where many lives were lost. The men were called out and the blame apparently rests on the railway for carelessness in some form for the loss of those lives. I think every consideration should be given to the claims.

Mr. MANION: I may point out to my hon. friend that of course the government or the minister has nothing whatever to do with a case of that kind; it is one which is in the hands of the railway company. Anyone in an accident on the Canadian National has of course the same redress as he has were the accident on the Canadian Pacific. Generally speaking, I think both railways endeavour to be fair and just to people who have suffered in an accident. I shall gladly draw my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the railway company, but that is all I can do, because, no matter how sympathetic I may be to the unfortunate people who were in the accident, I have no control in the matter.

Mr. SANDERSON: Before we pass to the next item, I should like to ask the minister whether the salaries of the board of railway commissioners, as authorized by statute, are subject under the income tax, to the ten per cent reduction?

Mr. MANION: They are treated just the same as other government employees.

Mr. REID: With reference to the board of railway commissioners, in the session of 1931 I brought to the attention of the house the question of who was to enforce decisions given by the board. It was pointed out that in British Columbia a decision had been given and the Canadian Pacific for two years had refused to pay any atttention to it. I believe some teeth should be put into the act so that when appeals are made before the board and a decision is given, there should be some power or authority to see that the judgment is carried out.

I understand another case arose last year when an appeal was made by interests in Quebec and a decision was given whereby the rate from Quebec to Saint John was lowered. The Canadian National has complied with that, but the Canadian Pacific has not. My understanding was that the board of railway commissioners was set up to conduct matters equitably between the people of Canada and the railways, so that if an injustice arose either way, an appeal could be made. If an appeal is made for an increase in rates and a decision is given by the board granting the appeal, the increase simply goes into effect and the only redress we have is an appeal to the governor general in council. But where the decision is against the railway company, the latter can simply ignore the decision. If we are to have a board of railway commissioners to act equitably between the people and the railways, teeth should be put into the act so that when a decision is made, there will be some authority to compel the railway to comply with that decision.

Mr. MANION: There is in the board of railway commissioners exactly the same authority as there is in any other court in Canada. Once they give a decision, that is a judgment of the court, and an order is given that it shall be carried out. It is true that the railways may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on a question of law, and that appeal might delay the carrying out of the order. If my hon. friend would visit the board, as he has a perfect right to do, and ask the secretary to explain why such an order was not carried out, I am sure he would be given the correct information. I cannot give it because I know nothing about the case. I have no more control over the board than I have over any other court in Canada. I have heard no complaints that orders of the board are not being carried out. If the hon. member will take the matter up with the board, I am sure the secretary will explain the matter as I am not in a position to do.

Mr. REID: I took the matter up in connection with freight rates, and the information was given me that the Canadian National had carried out the order making the rate eighteen cents a bushel. The Canadian Pacific simply disobeyed the order, and their rate is thirty-five cents, with the result that twice the quantity of grain has been shipped at the cheaper rate. The point I want to bring up is that on many occasions when the board has made a ruling, the Canadian Pacific has simply ignored it. If we are to have a costly court such as the board of railway commissioners, there should be some authority behind it. The only recourse we have is to the governor general in council.

Mr. MANION: The governor general in council has no authority over an order of that kind. I can hardly believe the Canadian Pacific would maintain a rate double that of the Canadian National, because in that case the Canadian Pacific would get no business; the Canadian National would get it all.

Mr. REID: There was a case in British Columbia two years ago.

Mr. MANION: If the hon. member will write me about it, I shall be glad to make inquiries, but neither the government nor I as minister have any power over the board of railway commissioners. It is a court and carries on of its own authority. Of course it is true there are appeals from that court to us after a judgment is given, but once their judgment is given, I think there are methods whereby the board can easily insist on the judgments being carried out. If my hon. friend will draw the matter to their attention, I am sure they will see to it.

Mr. REID: I shall endeavour to find out.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister advise us whether, in the case of an appeal against a lower rate, the board has a right to allow the existing rate to stand until the appeal is settled? Where by a decision of the board a higher rate is granted, that rate automatically goes into effect and those complaining have a right to appeal. The case pointed out by my hon. friend is that the ruling of the board was for a lower rate and the railway appealed against the rate and did not apply the lower rate to the tonnage offered pending decision on the appeal. I am asking the minister has the board of railway commissioners the right to allow the existing rate to stand while the railway companies are appealing against a lower rate order.

Mr. MANION: I presume the board has that right, but I should not like to express a legal opinion upon a matter of that kind. But suppose the board had ordered a lower rate, and that lower rate was sustained, I presume that the people who had paid the higher rate would be entitled to compensation.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the payment of salaries and expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, including D. W. McLachlan at $1,350 and G. W. Yates at $1,089, $38,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the item members of the civil service?

Mr. MANION: Yes, both Mr. McLachlan and Mr. Yates are members of the civil service, but for many years, even under the regime of my right hon. friend, they were given this special allowance, and in order to legalize the payment it has to go through the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point was that I think the item should include the words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." Otherwise I imagine the Auditor General would not have the right to pay these amounts because under the Civil Service Act the members of the service are precluded from getting any additional compensation for anything unless parliament specifically states otherwise.

Mr. MANION: Without arguing that those words should be included in the item, I take it that once the item is passed by parliament the Auditor General will be justified in permitting these allowances to be paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have always understood that it was necessary to include the words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act."

Mr. MANION: If that is the case, they will probably be without the allowance for the coming year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any possibility of the treaty with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway coming before parliament this session?

Mr. MANION: I should not think it is likely because it is generally understood that until the treaty has been adopted by the United States it will not be dealt with by this parliament, and it is hardly likely that the treaty will be adopted by the United States congress at its present session, although I understand that it was reported from committee to the United States Senate within the last couple of days.

Mr. MacLEAN: Have not representations been made to the minister to have the operations of the car ferry steamer not charged to the Prince Edward Island division? I understand that representations have been made from year to year by boards of trade throughout the maritimes that these operations be charged to capital account.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is wrong in saying that they are charged to the Prince Edward Island division. They are charged to the Intercolonial as a part of the operating expenses of the Canadian National railway, and they would appear in the deficit of the railways. I have had such representations made to me as the hon. gentleman mentions, but quite frankly I am of the opinion that the Prince Edward island people are not particularly wise in taking that attitude. But they do take it, and it will have to be considered.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie, the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

Monday, February 13, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table several orders in council passed in pursuance of the relief legislation which I was unable to table on Friday last.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code (unlawful associations).

He said: This is the bill which I sought to introduce last year. It seeks to repeal the section of the criminal code dealing with unlawful associations. Legislation along this line was introduced as far back as 1922 and 1923. A somewhat similar bill was introduced by Mr. McMaster, then member for Brome, in 1925, and a bill for the repeal of this section was introduced by the government in 1926, 1928, 1929 and 1930, and on all occasions passed this house. In 1929 it failed to pass the Senate by only three votes.

When we first introduced this bill some years ago it was said that the matter was a dead letter and would never be used. However, at the present time there are some eight men in Kingston penitentiary, serving sentences because of the violation of this legislation. I may say that so startling is the extent, so radical the character of this legislation that these men, guilty of no overt act whatever—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: At this stage it is not permissible to argue the bill, but merely to explain its provisions briefly. Discussion of the merits may take place upon the motion for the second reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I took occasion to read carefully the rules, and I think there is no prohibition whatever of an explanation of this bill at this stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Speaker has ruled that there is.

Mr. SPEAKER: All the hon. member is permitted to do at this time is to explain the provisions of the bill. I think that has been done. The merits can be discussed on the second reading. If the hon. member is ready, I will put the motion for the first reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit there is nothing whatever in the rules to prevent me speaking at this time on the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled on the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I must appeal against your ruling. I submit Your Honour is under obligation to point out the rule that prevents me speaking at this time. I did so last year. After careful consultation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: In rule 38 will be found the motions that are debatable. The motion which the hon. member now introduces is not included among those, and is therefore not debatable.

Also I refer to rule 71:

When any bill is presented by a member, in pursuance of an order of the house, or is brought from the Senate, the question "that this bill now be read a first time," shall be decided without amendment or debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit it is not debate if I explain my bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was talking about people who are now in the penitentiary because of the provisions of the criminal code, which has nothing to do with explanation of the bill he seeks to introduce. I must ask the hon. member to conform to the rules and usages of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows quite well he is not trying to do so and is not doing so. He has explained what the bill now before the house is about, and I am prepared to put the first reading of the bill, not to listen to a debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, you said that I know I am not conforming to the rules of the house. I say that is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member to order. I have no desire to impede his legislation or cut off debate, but unless the standing orders of the house are conformed to, no business can be transacted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the moment I am on a point of order. You said, Mr. Speaker, that I knew I was not conforming to the rules of debate. That is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite apparent, the Speaker having read the rule to the hon. member and he having a complete understanding of English, must know he is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is merely the Speaker's opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member to order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to explain—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish the motion put for first reading?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to explain the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have had a sufficient explanation. Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25 to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: The object of this bill is to limit the hours of duty of guards in penitentiaries to eight hours a day, and to fix the same limit for hours of labour by the convicts.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POSSESSION OF FIREARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) as to whether the government contemplates introducing legislation at this session further to restrict the possession of firearms.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The question of such an amendment to the criminal code is under consideration. That is all I can say to the hon. member.

DEPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I am sure we are all glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) back in his place looking so well. I was wondering if his attention had been directed to the question I brought forward with respect to some proposed deportations and, if so, if the hon. gentleman is in a position to give any statement to the house at this time.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question directed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) was drawn to my attention, and I have had an opportunity to go into the records in connection with the cases referred to. I may say that I doubt the wisdom of spreading upon the public records the details of these deportation cases. One reason, among others, for this feeling, is that these unfortunate people have relatives, and I do not think it is desirable to advertise their misfortunes. Nevertheless I am going to answer the question of the hon. member.

The first case, that of a man known as Tom Kirbride, whose correct name I think is Joseph Kirbride, falls within section 40 of the Immigration Act, which reads:

> Whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen or person having Canadian domicile, shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practising prostitution, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute or who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute or who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or who has been convicted of a criminal offence in Canada or who admits the commission prior to landing or entry to Canada, of a crime involving moral turpitude, or has become a professional beggar or a public charge or practises polygamy, or has become an inmate of a penitentiary, gaol, reformatory, prison, asylum or hospital for the insane or the mentally deficient, or an inmate of a public charitable institution, or enters or remains in Canada contrary to any provision of this act, it shall be the duty . . .

and so on. As I have said, this case falls within this section; the man was tried in our courts and convicted of one of the offences set out in this section. A court of inquiry sat on the case under the Immigration Act; an appeal was entered and I ordered his return—I think properly—to the country of origin.

The next case is that of a man by the name of J. Waldon. A careful search of the records of the department has not disclosed that any such person is under observation.

The next case is that of John Harris and family, who were ordered deported by a board of inquiry after having become public charges. I reviewed this case. The board of inquiry was quite within its rights in ordering the return of these people to their country of origin. But after carefully going into the question, on January 13 last I decided that in this case it would be proper not to invoke the order of deportation. I think probably the family will become established here.

The other case is that of Fred Booth. This case is still under investigation by the officials of the department, and as yet I have not been called upon to pass on the question of whether or not this alien should be returned to his country of origin.

EXECUTIVES IN BRANCH PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), who is also the acting Minister of Immigration, whether it is the intention of the government to allow United States industrial concerns having branches in Canada to dismiss Canadian executives and replace them with American executives brought from their plants in the United States. I am asking this question because I have received information, which I have reason to believe is true, that General Motors of Canada and some other United States concerns have dismissed practically all their division heads who were Canadian citizens, and have replaced these men with executives from United States plants. Some time ago I spoke to the minister privately with regard to this matter, and I trust that he is in a position to answer this question to-day.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I can assure the hon. member that nothing is further from the mind of this government than to permit such a practice as has been suggested. There are occasions when it becomes necessary in the ordinary course of business practice to permit the entry of persons skilled in particular trades or activities. Since I have been acting as Minister of Immigration I have endeavoured at all times to seek the best possible sources of information when applications come to the department with regard to the entry of persons who are said to be necessary to the carrying on of a business. On many occasions, as hon. members opposite know, I have referred to members of this house, and under my hand I have a list of persons whose entry into Canada has been recommended by members on both sides of the house. I do not know that it would serve any useful purpose to read these names, but I would be very glad to show the list to any hon. member who might desire to see it. I think I have a right to rely, as I do with confidence, on any recommendations that may be made by any member of this house with respect to matters of this kind. I have rarely found that any member has been careless in his advocacy of the admission of a very necessary skilled man in the carrying on of the industrial life of this country, and I hope it will continue so. But I can assure the hon. member that at no time would the government countenance the dismissal of the Canadian heads of industry, even in a minor capacity, to be replaced by someone from a foreign country. The subject is an intricate one. It is most difficult for one completely to encompass the complexities of all industries in this country, but I can assure the house that my officials and myself will take every possible action towards preserving to the Canadian workman and to the Canadian heads of departments in industry the position which is rightfully theirs.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government will submit to this house the agenda of the World Economic conference, which I think has been released outside Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have not yet received any official agenda that has been agreed upon. When it is received it will be laid before the house if the house is in session.

SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN

INTERPRETATION OF PROVISIONS OF BRITISH IMPORT DUTIES ACT 1932

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the government received yet any definite information from the government of Great Britain as to what rules, regulations, orders and so forth must be complied with by shippers of Canadian grain to take advantage of the British preference?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The government has received no further regulations than those which were placed upon Hansard during the discussions upon the agreements. There has been no change in the statute law of Great Britain. The Imports Act still is as it was when the agreements were signed, and the statute provides—and the agreement follows the statute—that grain must originate in Canada and be consigned from Canada to the United Kingdom, to receive the benefit of the preference. As regards the shipments that have gone forward from New York, the first one was not satisfactory from the standpoint of the identity of the grain. The second one, while satisfying the authorities as to identity, was not consigned direct from Canada but was consigned from Canada to another country, and some weeks later was reconsigned from that country to Great Britain, and therefore did not come within the provisions of the Imports Act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about later shipments?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the one I have just mentioned.

WHEAT MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): On Friday, February 3, I directed a question to the Prime Minister in regard to the establishment of a national wheat marketing board. The Prime Minister replied that there had been no consideration given in an international way to any domestic policy of this nature. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether his government has given any national consideration to this question. If so, will he make a statement to parliament and the country.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No consideration has been given to the matter at this particular time nor at any other time. It will be within the memory of hon. members that in 1930, and I think in the previous year or years, efforts were made to induce the government to establish a national wheat board. Those efforts did not succeed; they have not yet succeeded.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PURCHASE OF LABRADOR FROM NEWFOUNDLAND

*Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Has the government of Canada had any correspondence with the government of Newfoundland with respect to the return of Labrador to the province of Quebec?

2. If so, is the government in a position to reveal such correspondence and the result of such negotiations?

Mr. BENNETT: This question I should like to answer orally because there is another matter in connection with it which was referred to on a previous occasion, and to which I desire to make passing reference. I can only say that the government received a photostat copy of a letter purporting to be addressed by the Secretary of State, the Hon. J. C. Puddester, of the government of Newfoundland, to Joseph deChamplain, Esq., Newfoundland Hotel, St. John's Newfoundland, under date October 13, 1932, and a letter dated November 16, 1932, signed by F. C. Alderdice, premier, addressed to Mr. deChamplain. The first letter reads:

Dear Sir:

Your letter of the 12th instant, concerning sale of Newfoundland-Labrador to the Dominion of Canada, was brought to the notice of the executive government at the meeting last evening, and in reply I am to say that the government will consider any concrete proposal that you may bring to them during the next sixty days.

Yours sincerely,

J. C. Puddester,

Secretary of State.

The second letter, dated November 16, is as follows:

Dear Sir:

Answering your letter of the 15th instant.

If the government of the Dominion of Canada is prepared to open negotiations for the purchase of Labrador, I shall be pleased to place any proposition in this connection before my colleagues.

Yours sincerely,

F. C. Alderdice

In that regard it will be recalled that on January 30 the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) asked me a question as to whether or not any proposals had been made looking towards the political union of Newfoundland with Canada. The question was asked without notice and I answered:

. . . no correspondence of any kind. Last fall, after a conference took place here, I think a personal letter was written to me by the Prime Minister of Newfoundland stating that if the matter were to be considered, ample opportunity would be afforded for discussion, something of that sort.

I think the words I used were, not "a conference" but "the conference," referring to the Imperial conference, because there was no other conference between us. I have looked carefully into the subject and I find that my memory was correct when I said that there was no communication of any kind, official or unofficial, between the premier of Newfoundland and myself, or any member of the government, with reference to the union of that dominion and Canada. The only communications were those touching Labrador, in the form of photostat copies of letters addressed by Newfoundland ministers to Mr. deChamplain.

TOTAL BONDED DEBT OF CANADA

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What is the total bonded debt burden of the Dominion of Canada including federal, provincial and municipal authorities and corporations?
2. Of the above amount, how much is due during the present year: (a) in the United States; (b) in Canada; (c) in England?
3. Of the federal government's direct obligations, how much is payable (totals and percentages): (a) in Canadian funds; (b) in U.S.A. funds; (c) in sterling?
4. Of the federal government's guaranteed obligations how much is payable (totals and percentages): (a) in Canadian funds; (b) in U.S.A. funds; (c) in sterling?
5. Of the provincial government's direct obligations how much is payable (totals and percentages): (a) in Canadian funds; (b) in U.S.A. funds; (c) in sterling?
6. Of the provincial government's (guaranteed) funds, how much is payable (totals and percentages): (a) in Canadian funds; (b) in U.S.A. funds; (c) in sterling?
7. What is the total interest payable on Canadian bonds in 1933: (a) in Canadian funds; (b) in U.S.A. funds; (c) in sterling?
8. Of the total federal government's direct and guaranteed obligations for 1933, how much is for principal and how much for interest?

Mr. RHODES:

1, 2, 5, 6 and 7. Not of official record.

3. (a) $2,013,201,570; 74·13 per cent; (b) $391,040,900; 14·40 per cent; (c) $311,668,137; 11·47 per cent.

4. (a) $63,492,000; 6·36 per cent; (b) $620,-035,000; 62·18 per cent; (c) $313,788,000; 31·46 per cent.

8. Dominion debt: principal, $279,971,850; interest, $132,804,100.

Dominion Guaranteed debt: principal, $2,-376,552.86; interest, $45,125,064.12.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: As regards this question, the government cannot assume responsibility for the correctness of figures except with respect to the Dominion of Canada, because provincial, municipal and corporate borrowings are not registered with the dominion in any sense, and the government can but rely on information that is equally available to the hon. gentleman who asks the question.

GOLD PURCHASES

Mr. BLAIR:

1. How much gold did the Dominion government buy from the province of Ontario during the last fiscal year?
2. How much did they pay per ounce for this gold?
3. How much gold did they buy from the other provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will observe that this question is duly answered in the form in which it appears by saying, "none." What the hon. member probably means is the gold produced in the province of Ontario because no gold was purchased from that province, it not being a seller of gold.

Question stands.

ADVANCES TO SOLDIER SETTLERS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What is the total sum of money to date for all advances made to soldier settlers including land purchase, removal of incumbrance, permanent improvements, purchase of stock and equipment, seed and feed, breaking, food and other supplies?
2. What is the total amount of principal, and the total amount of interest (separate items) repaid by soldier settlers to date?

Mr. GORDON:

1. $117,670,711.02.

2. Principal, $33,305,517.61; interest, $15,-859,400.17.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

Mr. COOTE:

1. How many officers are there at present in the Royal Canadian Air Force?
2. How many of these officers are above the age limit as set forth by regulations?
3. How many officers were released from the Royal Canadian Air Force on April 1, 1932?
4. How many of the non-permanent officers released have been reengaged and granted permanent commission?
5. How many of the above officers thus reengaged are returned men?
6. How many of the above officers thus reengaged are married men?
7. How many hours' flying have been carried out at Camp Borden from April 1, 1932, to January 1, 1933?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. 103.
2. The age limit prescribed for the Royal Canadian Air Force is subject to certain exceptions. Six (6) officers are above the nominal age limit, but on this account are not ineligible for continued employment.
3. 78.
4. 5.
5. None.
6. None.
7. 1,399 hours 40 minutes.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. HEENAN:

What is the total amount paid out since the beginning of the unemployment relief measures in 1930 to date for: (1) public works; (2) direct relief, in the following places: city of Toronto, Ontario; city of Winnipeg, Manitoba; city of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario; city of Port Arthur, Ontario; city of Fort William, Ontario; town of Kenora, Ontario; town of Fort Frances, Ontario; town of Sioux Lookout, Ontario; town of Dryden, Ontario?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

| Department of Labour: | 1Public works | 2Direct relief |
|---|---|---|

GOLD PRODUCTION

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. How much gold was produced in Canada during the years 1930-31-32?
2. What amount of money did the government pay in premiums to gold producers during the same years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What was the total gold production of Canada during 1932?
2. What was the total amount paid by the government to producers by way of premium in 1932?
3. What is the total amount of the monetary gold stocks in Canada at present and how distributed?
4. What is the total amount in value of gold exported to the United States since the passing of the order in council, October 19, 1931 (giving dates)?

RADIO COMMISSION—STATEMENTS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

Are the statements issued by the Radio Commission at Ottawa published in French?

Mr. BENNETT: This question cannot be answered because of its indefiniteness. If the hon. gentleman will amend his question to particularize just what information is asked for, it will be answered.

Question stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE—SALE OF SHIPS

Mr. REID:

1. Has the government sold any ships formerly used by the Canadian merchant marine?

2. If so: (a) what ships have been sold; (b) what was the sale price agreed upon for the various vessels sold?

3. Has Japan purchased any of these ships?

4. Have any negotiations taken place in regards to the disposal of vessels belonging to the Canadian National Railways?

5. If so, is it the intention of the government to dispose of any of the said boats?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—APPOINTMENTS

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. How many appointments did the Civil Service Commission make, in the province of Quebec, since July 28, 1930?

2. To what positions were these appointments made?

3. What are the names of the appointees?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GOLD EXPORTS

Mr. COOTE:

For a return showing: (a) the total amount of gold exported from Canada since September 21, 1931; (b) the names of the various persons, corporations or banks by whom the export was made; (c) the amount and date of export in each case; (d) the different amounts of gold purchased by the government since September 21, 1931; (e) the names of the parties from whom purchase was made; (f) the date of purchase and the rate of premium paid in each case; (g) the names of various persons, corporations or banks to whom gold was sold, the date of sale, and the price or premium received by the government in each case.

LOUISDALE, N.S., WHARF

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence accounts, vouchers, payrolls, and other documents, showing all expenditures, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act or otherwise, for a new wharf at Louisdale, Nova Scotia.

PORT MALCOLM, N.S., WHARF

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence accounts, vouchers, payrolls, and other documents, showing all expenditures, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act or otherwise, for a new wharf at Port Malcolm, Nova Scotia.

LOWER ARDOISE, N.S., BREAKWATER WHARF

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence accounts, vouchers, payrolls, and other documents, showing all expenditures, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act or otherwise, for a breakwater wharf at Lower Ardoise, Nova Scotia.

ROCKDALE, N.S., BREAKWATER EXTENSION

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence accounts, vouchers, payrolls, and other documents, showing all expenditures, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act or otherwise, for a breakwater extension at Rockdale, Nova Scotia?

GREEN ISLAND LIGHTKEEPER

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, and other documents, regarding the appointment of one Amede Boudreau to the keepership of the light station at Green island, Nova Scotia, with all papers in connection with the said appointment, including advertisement, application forms, reports, etc., from the Civil Service Commission.

For a copy of all correspondence, including telegrams, letters and other documents, exchanged between the Minister of Marine or any member of the government and any person or persons in Nova Scotia regarding the dismissal of Harry T. Boudreau, a returned soldier, from the position of lightkeeper at Green Island, Nova Scotia;

Also any documents on file regarding an investigation into the conduct of the said Harry T. Boudreau by William Noblett, a commissioner appointed for that purpose.

DOMINION NOTES—NON-PAYMENT OF GOLD

Mr. COOTE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams or other orders issued to the assistant receivers general since September 21, 1931, instructing them not to pay out gold for Dominion notes on presentation.

[Mr. Coote.]

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Mr. VALLANCE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between any members or officials of the federal government and G. G. Serkau or any other person or persons in connection with the proposed exchange of Canadian cattle for Russian goods.

LAC VERT, SASK., POSTMASTER

Mr. TOTZKE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents in connection with the dismissal of the postmaster at Lac Vert, Saskatchewan.

PETITE RIVIERE, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all correspondence, including letters, telegrams, and other documents, as well as payrolls and other accounts, showing the expenditure on the breakwater at Petite Riviere, Nova Scotia, during the years 1931-1932.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA—EXCHANGE OF CATTLE AND OTHER COMMODITIES FOR PETROLEUM AND OIL

Mr. SPENCER:

For a copy of all correspondence between any member of the government and any other member of the government, and between any member of the government and Mr. G. G. Serkau or any of his associates in connection with the proposal to exchange Canadian cattle and hides for Russian commodities.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, so far as its relevant portion is concerned, this motion is covered by No. 13, moved for by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). Communications between members of the government are considered as privileged.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I submit that this motion is not covered by No. 13 except to a degree only. No. 13 goes much farther than does this motion, it asks for all correspondence, telegrams, letters and so on, which would include innumerable resolutions and expressions of personal opinion which are not asked for under this motion. Hon. members in this corner of the chamber are anxious to secure this information as early as possible, and with that end in view this motion has been limited to government documents.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not pass two resolutions dealing with the same subject matter in the same sitting of the house. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) points out, if No. 13 is taken literally it will mean the copying of every telegram and letter which anyone felt like sending from any part of Canada. However, as I have pointed out, this resolution cannot be complied with because it asks for privileged communications. Correspondence between any member of the government and any other member of the government cannot be obtained by an order of the house.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask that this motion be amended according to the suggestion of the Prime Minister?

Mr. SPEAKER: The two resolutions could be combined as it would appear that No. 13 will give the information required.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think—

Mr. SPEAKER: This resolution is not debatable and the hon. member neither moved nor seconded it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the government is willing to accept the amended motion.

Mr. SPENCER: I want to get this return as early as possible. This motion asks for less than does No. 13, and that is the reason I included it upon the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion will stand

Motion stands.

THE FRUIT ACT

PROTECTION TO CONSUMERS

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) (Translation) moved:

Whereas progress and science compel fruit and vegetable growers to use poisonous substances called "insecticides" in order to protect their products;

And whereas these chemical agents are not wholly affected by weather conditions and remain on these products, especially on fruit, and this fruit is largely consumed in its natural state;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, legislation designed to protect the consumers should be enacted.

Mr. Speaker, the terms of one of the clauses of the Imperial economic conference agreements suggested to me the moving of this resolution. May I, however, state that I do not intend, in the course of this debate, to discuss the merit of this treaty from all angles, but simply from the standpoint of hygiene and trade.

At the outset of the session, parliament ratified a trade convention with Great Britain by which the latter grants us a preference of $1 per barrel of apples exported to her markets. To our producers and to many among us this treaty seemed advantageous. However, owing to tariff changes on chemical fertilizers and various agents used by fruit and vegetable growers to protect their trees and plants, and because these same fruit and vegetable growers are now at the mercy of the notorious trust of chemical fertilizers, known as the Imperial Chemical Corporation, of London, whose ramifications extend throughout the world, to Holland, Baltimore and the U.S. under the name of Dupont de Nemours Ltd.; in Canada, to Hamilton, Beloeil and Halifax, under the name Canadian Industries, I must consign to the future the care of determining whether it will be to our advantage or not; these considerations, however, are outside of my subject.

From a sanitary viewpoint, Great Britain will not permit Canadian fruit to reach its markets, unless Canada exports a strictly graded and sound fruit, in keeping with the regulations of the country, and, moreover, conforms to the international margin allowed; that is, the proportion of insecticide spray on the peels of apples should not be more than 0·01 grain per pound of fruit, therefore, the fruit should be treated, which requires further outlay for machinery, neutralizing equipment, labour and additional hands.

Being a member of the medical profession and representing a population entirely composed of consumers; moreover having some knowledge of the physiological action of toxic substances used, such as insecticides, a poison which partly adheres to fruit, notwithstanding atmospheric agencies, I am bound to recognize the soundness of England's legislation against the possible dangerous effects which the trade of untreated fruit, consumed in its natural state would give rise. I therefore, deem it my duty, wholly in the public interest, to submit, to-day, this question to Parliament.

All are aware that in the course of a season fruit growers must often spray their trees and fruit to guard against the ravages wrought by insects. The standard preparation which is universally used is a solution of lead arsenic. Sometimes a solution of copper cyanide is resorted to but only occasionally. These poisons adhere to the leaves of the trees and fruit but gradually or partially disappear under the action of wind and rain. Further spraying is resorted to and science even advises the spraying of trees and fruit sometimes previous to the picking.

We find in the 1903 reports of the Bureau of Researches, at Washington, at its Agricultural Experimental Station, that a commission of experts was appointed to investigate the quantity of poison remaining from the spraying of orchards by arsenical lead. The result gave 1 gramme, 429 milligrammes of $A^2O^3$—of arsenical trioxyde—per kilogram after the fruit was picked. Later, in 1914, following numerous trials, these experts stated in their reports that the quantity of toxic substance found in the residue of the fruit sprayed varied and is entirely controlled by the weather.

In 1925, under Great Britain's threat of placing an embargo on United States fruit the Department of Foods and Drugs, at Washington and the State of Indiana, amended their legislation to facilitate the fruit trade, and agreed to conform with the requirements of the international margin allowance, which restricts the deposit of arsenical trioxyde to not more than 0·01 grain per pound of fruit exported. In their reports, for the same year, these experts state that the deposit resulting from spraying is far more dangerous, if precipitation is slight, and spraying has been more frequent.

Those interested in this question will find in the Agricultural Journal, of Victoria, Australia, December number of 1931, that Great Britain made representation to the Australian government because their apples showed visible traces of arsenical lead, and owing to this, the Australian apple growers sustained considerable losses, as a result of a too imperfect cleansing of their fruit.

In the same report, the United States experts advise the producers not to use oil in their insecticide solution, because the cleansing of fruit is too difficult with this ingredient; they deny the contentions of those who state that the quantity of poison found in the spraying deposits is too small to be a danger to health, and categorically assert that arsenic is small doses, absorbed during a certain period, and especially in combination with a lead salt, is very deleterious.

The physiological action of arsenic in small doses produces no violent effect; its action on the organism is imperceptibly slow and insidious; its accumulation is easy and elimination difficult. It is with much precaution that this drug is used in therapeutics against certain diseases, owing to its dangerous action, because, when the symptoms of poisoning appear, the life of the patient is in danger.

The formula of this world wide insecticide, consists in 2 pounds of arsenical lead per 100 gals. of water. In the course of a season the fruit grower performs a number of sprayings and each one leaves a deposit which keeps on accumulating. The quantity of toxic substance deposited on the fruit cannot possibly be uniform because during a dry season the quantity will be greater. In the Maritime Provinces, where rain is more frequent, the quantity would be less, while in British Columbia where rain is less frequent, the quantity would be greater. Fruit on the lower limbs of trees, subject to more spray, and less exposed to rain and wind than the upper limbs will retain more of these toxic substances, and when analysed, will be more open to criticism. There is no doubt that the public consuming fruit uncleansed and in its natural state, such as grapes from the Niagara district, runs serious dangers. Legislation enacted by those countries, which I mentioned, and their continuous researches, analyses, reports and the opinions of experts on the toxical deposits from the spraying of fruit trees, make it a question of the utmost importance.

Notwithstanding the restrictions of other countries, under our present system, each year, in summer and especially in the autumn season, millions of tons of fruit are shipped to our large centres and delivered to our homes; each day, we see on our streets, honest vendors unwittingly selling fruit bearing traces of poison; we witness children, so fond of fruit, innocently playing about with poison in their hands. When the medical profession tells us new diseases are spreading, the origin of which is unknown, such, for instance, as infantile paralysis; when they admit the greater frequency of sudden deaths, irrespective of age; when certain cases of illness develop under new forms, I state that it behooves the authorities to seriously look into everything affecting human life.

There is no legislation covering our domestic trade of fruit. One wonders to what door must we knock to obtain the required reforms so as to keep pace with science. Must we address ourselves to the Department of Agriculture or that of Health? The question is unsettled. We have no research bureau as other countries have, in this respect. It is time to follow the lead of Great Britain, the United States and other countries and enact up-to-date legislation, bearing in mind that human capital is the most precious asset we possess.

From the viewpoint of trade, the cleansing of fruit, especially of our apples, is a condition, a strict regulation which must be adhered to in our exports to Great Britain, if we wish to take advantage of the preference of $1.00 per barrel of apples.

There exists in England an act governing the trade on fruit with a view to protect the consumer; the act prohibits—subject to prosecution—the sale on British soil of fruit which by analysis indicates the presence of more than 0·01 grain of arsenic or toxic substance; that is what is known as the international margin allowance. Australia and Nova Scotia have had a bitter experience, in the past, of this legislation.

Apart from this, there are regulations governing the grading of apples as to uniformity and quality, this requires more labour and hands. However, the process necessitated in cleaning the fruit gives rise to a serious problem. Indeed, this process, the only one recommended, consists in washing the apples in a solution of ½, 1, 2 per cent of hydrochloric acid during a few minutes, with the addition of sodium chloride either heated or not. These various operations require the use of special machinery, receptacles and neutralizing agents, this means so much more outlay, not mentioning the time and further hands required, before ever benefiting from the $1 preference per barrel of apples. Moreover, the Canadian apple grower must compete with the world prices on the English market.

There exists no substitute to arsenical lead as an insecticide approved by experts. Sometimes a certain quantity of oil is added to this solution; however this is not advised as the cleansing is more difficult. The dry cleansing, although making the fruit more attractive, requires much time, is little effective, as it removes but 30 per cent of toxic substance, leaving a deposit greater than allowed by the international margin, and can only be applied to certain fruits, and, therefore, not practical owing to its limited effectiveness. The only practical method is that of washing the fruit, which is a more economic process as to time and results, and has been adopted in all countries where fruit is grown on a large scale such as in the United States, but especially, in Australia.

The outlay mentioned will naturally increase the cost of production considerably. I, therefore, cannot see how our fruit growers can compete with the world prices, when they have to face this further outlay, unless our governments cooperate generously by grants, thus helping them to hold the British market and benefit by it.

I had the opportunity of visiting many districts where fruit is grown, and nowhere did I notice the necessary installations in connection with the cleansing of fruit to meet export requirements.

It is quite clear that an extensive campaign of education among the people must be undertaken, so as to profitably carry out this system of cleansing by washing, which varies according to the peel being more or less thick, and, so as to also teach them the proper time to pick the fruit and do their cleansing immediately before the storing of the fruit, in order to avoid the formation of wax which decreases the permeability of the deposit resulting from spraying, and, therefore, makes the cleansing more difficult.

The fruit growers absolutely require encouragement, otherwise they may be tempted to curtail their spraying, especially just previous to the picking of the fruit, as a means of economizing, saving time and dispensing with the cleansing; they will thus expose their fruit to the ravages of maggots and, in the end, they will nevertheless be forced to clean the fruit, after having sustained losses.

It is quite evident that Canadian fruit will only be sought on the English markets on condition it is uniform, of superior quality and well cleansed. Such a condition can only be realized by utilizing the process mentioned which naturally increases the cost of production, and, by a campaign of education which may be successful if the interested provinces lend their hearty cooperation by exhibitions, lectures, and publications.

At all events, I think that the question deserves the attention of parliament, and I trust that the government will find it possible to introduce the necessary legislation both in the interest of public health and Canadian trade.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, legislation dealing with the subject matter of this resolution already exists in the Agricultural Pests Control Act, 1927, under the provisions of which insecticides must be registered with the Department of Agriculture in order that these poisons may be checked for compliance with the guarantees and standards of quality, samples being taken and analyzed. The insecticides are analyzed chemically and tried out in the entomological branch for effectiveness. Doctor Macoun, Dominion horticulturist, states that there has never come to his knowledge any case of poisoning in connection with the use of these sprays and that horticulturists feel these sprays are essential if our fruit is to be harvested in the best possible form for market. In conclusion he says:

> It would seem, from all past experience, that further legislation in Canada designed to protect the consumers of fruit is quite unnecessary.

In addition a great deal of investigation has been done with reference to the content of arsenical poison used in sprays in British Columbia where irrigation is used. It is felt that in eastern Canada and outside the irrigation area the precipitation itself is sufficient to remove any danger from this use of arsenic sprays. The result of the investigation carried on by Doctor Shutt, Dominion chemist, is set out in the English Analyst, volume 51, 1926. This is his summary:

Summarizing the tabulated data, it will be seen that approximately one-half the samples were entirely free from arsenic, that roughly one-sixth showed traces of arsenic in amounts less than one ten-thousandth of a grain per pound, a negligible quantity, and that one-third contained arsenic in quantities ranging from one ten-thousandth to one one-hundred and ninetieth of a grain per pound. With the heaviest amount of arsenic found, namely one one-hundred and ninetieth of a grain per pound, it would require three pounds, or one dozen apples of average size, to supply the minimum medicinal dose of arsenic, and twelve pounds, or four dozen apples of average size, to supply the maximum medicinal dose.

The results of this inquiry furnish satisfactory evidence to the effect that a very large proportion of Canadian sprayed apples is entirely free from arsenic and that in those cases in which the presence of arsenic has been detected, the quantities are negligible.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The mover of the resolution (Mr. Deslauriers) has drawn attention to the importance of close supervision of insecticides or the various substances which are used to destroy insects on vegetables and fruit, and he asks that the consuming public be protected by legislative action from the danger of poisoning or injury from such substances.

I quite agree that it is important that there should be safeguarding legislation, but I would point out that safeguarding legislation exists at the present time. If members will turn to the Food and Drugs Act, they will find that paragraph (f) of section four provides:

Any fruit or vegetable dangerously contaminated with any poisonous substance, whether added with intent or not, must be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act.

Under this legislation there is in the Department of National Health a staff of chemists working, analyzing and investigating such specimens as come before them. There are something like twenty-seven health inspectors throughout the dominion, and when any such case of poisoning or even rumours of poisoning is brought to their attention the case is referred for investigation to the laboratories, existing not only in Ottawa but at four or five other points throughout the dominion. I have made inquiries in the department and I am informed that certainly within recent years no case, no report of a case, of poisoning has come within their observation. Repeated examinations have been made during the past few years regarding celery, not so much the Canadian product, as the large amount of celery imported from the United States, and regarding which there were complaints some time ago. That has been under the observation of our chemists and the celery has been analyzed.

The same is true of apples. In the years 1925 and 1926 numerous observations were made regarding the presence of poisons on apples. At the present time, grapes and wine are being analyzed by the departmental chemists. So far as we can learn in the department, no reports have been made of poisoning within recent years or ill effects arising from these insecticides being used on vegetables and fruits. But should the occasion arise we have at present the legislative machinery and inspectors and chemists whose duty it is to analyze these products for the presence of injurious substances.

I do not gather what further protection the mover of this resolution would advocate, beyond perhaps a certain washing of fruits and vegetables, but as I understand from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), and indeed as we all know, many of these substances are, while not completely, at all events I think sufficiently removed by rain and weather conditions. I do not think that with our present knowledge there is any further step in a legislative way that can be taken for the protection of the public against these insecticides, and after hearing this explanation and what the procedure is, perhaps the mover may consent to withdraw his resolution, particularly in view of the fact that very little complaint is made regarding ill consequences from the use of these insecticides.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The proposal to protect the consumer is very commendable, but another point of view that has not been touched upon is the effect of poisonous sprays on the honey industry. Many of our citizens have gone in for keeping bees, and the honey industry has reached considerable proportions. Fruit blossoms open very early in the spring and the bee keepers are desirous that the bees should have full advantage of nectar from the blossoms. When the blossom is sprayed for protection against insects the bees, trying to obtain the nectar, are poisoned. Apiarists have had considerable losses through the apple sections of the country. This mortality in the hives should be given consideration, research should be made to find a way to obviate this loss to our bee keepers.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is obvious that this motion asks the house to declare for a principle already established by legislation. That being so, the government cannot accept it. Under the existing legislation effect can be given to the principle for which the hon. gentleman very properly contends. That being the case, I think the house will realize that the purpose will be served by the hon. gentleman withdrawing his motion, and if it is necessary to make any amendment to existing legislation to meet the condition he has outlined it would be the duty of the government to do so, and, as I think the minister has clearly indicated, that is what the government would do.

Mr. DESLAURIERS: Drop the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent, the hon. member withdraws his resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

WESTERN FREIGHT RATES

REDUCTION OF DOMESTIC RATES ON GRAIN AND GRAIN PRODUCTS

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products, moving from any point in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from any point, to another point, in any of the said provinces be adjusted, or reduced, by at least fifty per cent (50%) of the differential, as now exists, between domestic and export rates.

He said: Speaking to a similar resolution last year, I endeavoured to point out to the house the necessity of giving some consideration to the farmers of western Canada by way of reduction in domestic rates on grain. I will not go into the whole question to the extent we did last year, but I would suggest that there is an argument that has not yet been presented with respect to interprovincial shipments. I believe the debate last session proved beyond doubt that we have reached a time when this question should be given consideration. The house was informed by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) on February first, and again on Thursday last, that he would within a few days make a statement or explanation with respect to a proposed reduction in rates that might amount to say, fifty per cent of the differential; it may be his proposal will effect the purpose of my resolution. Therefore I do not consider it necessary at this time to cover all the ground. However, I would like to refer to the appeal that was taken from the decision of the board of railway commissioners handed down in 1927, which appeal has not yet been heard. Following the debate last year I think the western members were all of the opinion that that appeal stood in the way of any action being taken. They decided that they would, during the recess, make representations to their respective provincial governments to see that this appeal was heard. I myself interviewed the government of Saskatchewan and tried to impress upon them the importance of having such action taken. The fact that we did make representations to the provincial governments and that the argument last year was so conclusive, I think, caused this question to be brought before the interprovincial conference here last month and also the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals last Thursday. How far they agreed on that occasion, or how far the minister will go in his statement to the house, I do not know; he may give effect to my whole resolution. That would be a splendid thing.

The second part of my resolution, which deals particularly with the shipment of grain from one point to another within a province, I think is very important. There is no doubt that in the very near future there will be a vast change in the system of agriculture in western Canada. We have from year to year a considerable carry over of grain. This has always been a problem, in its effect upon price especially during the last four or five years. Many suggestions have been put forward for the solution of the problem of how we should eliminate or decrease that surplus. One suggestion has been that the acreage sown to wheat in western Canada should be reduced. I do not favour a reduction of the gross acreage seeded to grain; rather I favour a switching from wheat to coarse grains. If in the near future the exchange difficulty, which at present somewhat hinders our trade with Great Britain, is corrected—and this may be done sooner than any of us think—then the farmers of western Canada will be only too anxious to change to a system of more diversified farming in order to develop that trade with Great Britain.

I would suggest that we advocate a reduction in wheat acreage, together with a change to the coarse grains. There are some 280,000 farmers in western Canada growing wheat. If each farmer would seed thirty acres less to wheat and put in coarse grains or fodder crops instead it is easy to see that there would be a reduction in wheat acreage of some 5,400,000 acres which, at fourteen bushels to the acre, in a normal year would mean about 76,000,000 bushels of wheat. I think this would materially assist in reducing the surplus. This land would be seeded mainly to barley and oats, and if diversified farming were practised the farmers would require more pasture and more fodder crops for their cattle. If the farmers of the west intend to take advantage of the agreements passed by this house last November they will have to change their system of farming, and if they do that they will need these coarse grains to feed their cattle, their hogs, their dairy herds and their poultry. I should think, in addition, that the increasing demand will be found in the province of British Columbia; the farmers in the Fraser valley and other parts of that province will be only too anxious to take advantage of the trade agreements we recently adopted. So of necessity a great deal of grain will be shipped between different points in the prairie provinces in order to feed the stock, as I have outlined.

There is another point which might be developed in favour of interprovincial shipping. In the near future we may have a provincial milling industry, so to speak. I think the Department of Trade and Commerce would be well advised to endeavour to develop more trade with the orient in regard to flour. I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is doing everything possible to develop trade with foreign countries, but I think the flour milled in western Canada—which is the highest grade flour in the world—should be marketed in the Orient as a product of western Canada. At present the flour milled from our wheat is distributed through the orient by the millers of Japan, who do not produce the best grade of flour, so the people in the orient have not become accustomed to the kind of flour we produce in Canada. There are great possibilities in regard to trade in flour, and I think a milling industry should be built up within the provinces. If this were to happen it would be necessary to have a lower interprovincial rate covering the shipment of the by-products, the bran and shorts, in order to make them available to farmers feeding stock.

I think it is generally agreed that interprovincial rates are too high, but I do not wish to develop that point just now. We all know the difficulties our railways find in carrying on at the present time; we know how they view any proposal with regard to the reduction of freight rates, but at the same time we must remember the difficulty with which the farmers of the west have been faced and the losses they have sustained in the last few years. They have put up a gallant fight against the greatest odds with which an agricultural people were ever faced, and they have carried on with courage and confidence.

[Mr. E. E. Perley.]

I believe that to-day the morale of the western farmer is just as good as, if not better than, it was a year ago, and he is prepared to go forward, showing the same initiative and feeling the same hope, confidence and courage with which the pioneers of the west laid the foundation for the agriculture of the present day. It is up to us to do everything we can to encourage our western farmers, and I think a reduction in the domestic rates would be extremely well received.

I do not wish to carry the argument further at this time, as I will have an opportunity to speak again before the debate is closed, but I do wish to suggest, that half a loaf is better than no bread. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals the other day I hope he may find it possible to support this resolution, so I will leave the argument at this point.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) has made a statement with regard to this resolution, and in view of that fact I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MANION: I thought the hon. gentleman was going to speak to the resolution. Before the motion is put I should like to make just a short statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member pressing his motion for the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like a statement from the minister if possible.

Mr. BEYNON: If the minister wishes to speak I will withdraw my motion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) I will have only a few words to say at this time, and those few words will be practically a repetition of what I said a few days ago with reference to a bill introduced by an hon. gentleman opposite.

At that time I pointed out that at the interprovincial conference there had been some discussion regarding this matter, and I said we had come to a compromise agreement which I thought at the time and still think, will be satisfactory to the western provinces. When I made the statement the proposal as outlined by the railways had not gone forward to the western provinces. The proposal was to have been put in writing and submitted to myself and I was to forward it to the four western provinces which were represented at the meeting held in my office dealing with the matter during the interprovincial conference, at which meeting there were the Minister of Agriculture for this government and the representatives of the provinces in question. Since that time the proposal of the railways has come to hand and about a week ago I sent it on to the provinces, and only on Saturday I received from the premier of one of them his acceptance on behalf of the province which perhaps is most concerned in the matter, although I do not know that one can specify any particular province as being more concerned than another.

The compromise arrangement was something along this line. The export rate was a little less than half of the domestic rate on grain going west to Vancouver. Take for example the rates from Edmonton and Calgary to Vancouver. The domestic rate was 41½ cents and the export rate only 20 cents, and it was an actual fact that grain could be sent to China more cheaply than it could be transported to Vancouver. It was an obvious ground for complaint from the standpoint of the west that such a condition of affairs should exist. A year or so ago, when the appeal against the decision of the board of railway commissioners first came before me and the other members of the government, I discussed the matter with the railways and suggested that they make a compromise proposal. At that time I did not succeed in getting them to make such a proposal. The matter remained in abeyance until this later meeting at the interprovincial conference, and the railways finally agreed to a proposal which every representative of the west agreed would be acceptable. That proposal was that the rate from Edmonton and Calgary, instead of being 20 cents for export and 41½ cents for domestic, should be reduced on feed grains, that is, grain used for poultry and, I believe, cattle feed, to about 50 per cent, or a little more than 50 per cent in fact, of the differential, and that all other rates throughout the west on feed grain going west should be reduced in about the same ratio. That was the proposal they finally put forward to me and which I sent on to the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The new rate is 31 cents?

Mr. MANION: The proposal was that the rate on grain from Edmonton and Calgary instead of being 41½ cents should be 30 cents per hundred pounds, which seemed a reasonable compromise.

The railways have pointed out continuously, and with truth, that the rates on grain in Canada are the lowest in the world for the distance. They admit that the export rate westward is a good deal lower than the domestic rate, but that is the general attitude they took. They actually claim that the export rate does not give them an opportunity to make any money on grain exported.

Mr. HANBURY: The eastern movement is cheaper than the western.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that is correct. The export rate from Vancouver is very low, and they claim that if there should be a change, instead of the domestic rate being lowered the export rate should be raised. Further, they pointed out that if one interferes with the general rate throughout the western provinces and applies their proposal throughout the whole of the western provinces to interprovincial movements of grain, it will so confuse the whole rate structure, which is already confused enough, that it will call for a complete rearrangement of that structure for the western section of Canada.

I do not know that I have anything further to say except that, as I have observed, one of the provinces has already wired me accepting the proposal and taking the attitude that it will be entirely satisfactory to that province. I have every reason to believe, from the opinions expressed by representatives of the other three provinces who were present, that these provinces will take exactly the same attitude as the one which has already replied to my communication. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who has moved the resolution that, pending receipt of replies from the western provinces to the communication which I forwarded to them, he might withdraw his resolution after adequate discussion. I invite hon. members on both sides to continue the discussion ad libitum, but after the mover has taken advantage of his right to reply, I suggest that he might withdraw the motion, because both he and his seconder will have accomplished what they set out to do, namely, to bring before the house and the country the need of some change in the rates as they now exist. I entirely agree with their suggestions, as proven by the compromise arrangement to which I refer.

I will not take up more time but I trust that hon. members, while desiring to put on record their views in regard to the rate structure in the west, will bear in mind that the provinces of western Canada will in all likelihood accept the arrangement proposed by the railways.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): It was not my intention to say very much at this stage because, as the house knows, I have a bill on freight rates which has received first reading; but there is another matter to be dealt with now, and it would clear the atmosphere so far as we in British Columbia are concerned. We have been seeking for the past few years for some reduction, and we should like to have the appeal disposed of which has been before the governor in council since the fall of 1930. I refer to the appeal with regard to rates on wheat, which was heard before the board of railway commissioners and, following their decision, taken to the governor in council. So long as that appeal remains undecided, no further appeal can be taken or heard by the board of railway commissioners.

The appeal which was taken to the board of railway commissioners had reference to rates on grain. British Columbia, in 1931, appeared before the board with an amended appeal, asking that a reduction in freight rates be given on coarse grains or cheaper grains, and they were told that no appeal respecting grain, either No. 1 wheat or coarse grain or grain of any kind for that matter, could be heard so long as that appeal was before the governor in council.

This matter is quite important and I should like to hear from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways what is likely to become of it. Personally I should be glad to see it disposed of. If the 50 per cent reduction materializes, it will no doubt be accepted. Indeed, anything is acceptable; half a loaf is better than no bread. While we are all glad to have the 50 per cent, it does not mean that we are satisfied, but every one of us will be pleased with the reduction if it goes into effect. I have been allowing my bill to stand waiting for a full statement from the Minister of Railways, and I think that something should be said regarding the disposition of the appeal which has been before the governor in council since the fall of 1930. As long as this appeal is not disposed of it precludes us in British Columbia from going before the board of railway commissioners with an amended appeal asking for a reduction in the rates on coarse grains.

Mr. MANION: I think I can answer the hon. member's question with one sentence. The other day he asked a question about this matter and I replied that as soon as we knew the reply of the western provinces, the appeal would be disposed of.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, provided that no other hon. member wishes to speak.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

[Mr. Reid.]

BANK ACT

PROPOSED REVISION BY BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE IN RELATION TO MONETARY REQUIREMENTS OF DOMINION

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the banking and commerce committee should be instructed to study the Bank Act preparatory to its decennial revision and that the committee be instructed to consider the Bank Act in relation to the monetary requirements of the dominion, and in particular to report to this house on (a) the advisability of final departure from the gold basis; (b) the issuing dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling; and (c) on ways and means of reducing the internal debt so greatly increased by deflation.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, part of this motion has been considered already by this house. On a point of order, sir, I think it will be within your memory that when the motion was made to consider the Imperial trade agreements a similar point was taken up and upon an analysis of the record I think it will be found that the proposals then put forward were similar to the subject matter of this motion. The house has voted upon the advisability of final departure from the gold basis, the issuing of dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling and on ways and means of reducing the internal debt so greatly increased by deflation. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will remember that he voted for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) which provided that there should be a deflation of the dollar to the level of the pound. The records of the house will show that the discussion upon these last three points was very general and very extensive indeed. The speeches were interesting even although in many instances they were entirely beside the point. I submit that this motion must necessarily involve a very limited discussion. I have no desire to limit the hon. member in making a motion, which we are not prepared to accept, that a committee of the house be instructed to do certain work, but I think his motion should be recast in order that the will of the house should be expressed with respect to the matter.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order; I suggest that the resolution is entirely different from the subject matter of the discussion which was held previously in this house. I recall the amendment moved by the hon.

member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and I agree with the Prime Minister that it embraced, in principle, certain matters contained in the resolution now moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. The hon. member now asks the house that the banking and commerce committee should be instructed to study the Bank Act preparatory to its revision next year, this study to be made along the lines of certain economic proposals given in the resolution. I suggest that the discussion held in this house upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod was an entirely different matter from asking this house to refer the whole question to the banking and commerce committee for discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall take this matter under advisement. I shall have to compare the amendment with the resolution now before the house. In the meantime, I suggest that the debate might proceed.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, every ten years this parliament is given the opportunity to revise and improve the Bank Act and to decide whether or not the charters of the banks shall be continued for another decade. It is safe to say that since the present Bank Act was originally drafted there never has been so much public interest centered in its revision as at the present time. During the last decade in particular the importance of credit in its relation to the economic life of the state has advanced to the very forefront of world thought. The war turned the spotlight upon the financial institutions of the world, not only because of the vast increases in debt which followed but because the nations which were financially improverished in 1914 suddenly found sufficient money to carry on the most expensive undertaking of all history. It was found that the masses of the people were much better off, economically speaking, during the four years of war despite the wholesale destruction of life and wealth than they were during the peace which followed and had preceded the war. It was noted that when the war was over and men returned to peaceful avocations even though the production of the various nations was vastly increased the economic position of the masses of the people was worse than it was during the great conflict. The inquisitive mind naturally began to ask how it was that the nations which could not find money with which to provide food and clothing for their people in January of 1914 found the money with which to engage in war in the fall of that year and to pursue that war upon a scale more gigantic, more destructive and more costly than any war in preceding history.

May I digress for a moment at this point to emphasize the fact that some hon. members still argue that the destructive character of the great war is responsible in a large part for the present depression, and may I refer in particular to the statement of the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury). The hon. member claimed that the war was the cause of the present depression. Those who listened to the hon. member and those who have read his speech will recall that he mentioned three causes for the present depression. The first was the great war, the second, over-production, and the third tariffs. The hon. member absolves the economic system from any culpability with regard to the present situation but he unwittingly placed a burden of the blame upon his own party. The point I wish to draw to the attention of the house is that while the hon. member tried to make out that the war was the cause of the present depression, in the same breath he stated that we were suffering from over-production. Surely, if the war had been the cause we would have had under-production, people would have been in want because goods were not being produced. But how, then, could he argue, since over-production had resulted, that the war was in any way responsible? The war did not destroy money; it destroyed goods which were made and paid for by the use of national credit during the war and therefore could not be a cause of the present depression. The interest of Canadians in financial questions was aroused by the inquiry instituted in 1923 by this parliament. The resolution which at that time marked the extent of the reference to the committee of inquiry was not taken seriously by the house; indeed, it was regarded as a joke by some, but even at that time it was not so regarded by the people of Canada.

May I summarize just as briefly as possible my argument on that occasion. It will be found on Hansard of February 22, 1923, at page 626. I argued at that time that there was insufficient financial credit to effect the distribution of goods produced in Canada; that such insufficiency of financial credit was inevitable under the financial policy so unquestionably followed by the banks and also because we were producing under a profit system; that these combined agents brought about a condition under which sufficient purchasing power was not distributed during the process of production to buy the output within a given time; that it was folly and madness to limit the issuance of financial credit to the amount of gold which we had or might obtain, since gold discovered or undiscovered bears no sensible relationship to either the producing or the consuming capacity of the nation; that the national credit, which is the nation's power to produce and deliver the goods as, when and where required, was, if properly used, adequate to distribute the national production; that the national credit was monopolized by a few individuals who operate for personal gain and who are not responsible to anyone but themselves for the financial policy which they put into effect; that the policy of private bankers is wrong because it is based on gold, because it treats money as a commodity and thus prevents money from functioning as a means of exchange and because the whole system is a debt creating one and therefore points to an inevitable collapse; that at least the financial policy, if not the actual operation of banks, should be controlled by the government, instead of the government being controlled by the bankers' policy, and that the continuation of a bankers' policy would be disastrous.

All the arguments of that time, ten years ago, were ignored by the administration. Evidence of men like Major Douglas of London, England, Professor Irving Fisher of the United States, Mr. Neal East and Mr. Bevington of Alberta and others was quietly buried in the archives of parliament. The government of that day, like others since, decided to take the advice of the bankers. This, in my opinion, is like a judge, before pronouncing judgment, deciding to take the advice of the accused. What hardship, what unnecessary suffering and sacrifice the Canadian people would have been saved had the government taken the warnings and advice which were given to the committee that investigated this subject in 1923, and in particular the warning and advice of Major Douglas of England. May I refer to the evidence at page 443 and quote just one or two sentences which appear in the closing remarks of Major Douglas before the committee. This is taken from the journals of the House of Commons in 1923. He said:

> My own object in coming here is to make clear that I personaly am convinced that if you go along the lines that you are following at present, and if you continue along these lines for any considerable period of time—I am not going to tie myself down to date—but for my own part, and I think my opinion is being shared by an increasing number of people —I am perfectly certain you are heading for the most terrific disaster that the mind of man can conceive.

That was ten years ago and we are much nearer the predicted disaster than we were then. Indeed, as an hon. member has suggested, we are in that position at the present moment. Major Douglas made that prophecy, if I might call it such, after he had presented to the committee elaborate data indicating the entire inadequacy of the financial system, followed by both this country and Great Britain, to meet the industrial and economic needs of the times.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. gentleman read his evidence before the Macmillan committee?

Mr. IRVINE: I have read the evidence before the Macmillan committee of the gentleman to whom reference has been made; I have read the Macmillan report, and I think it would be wise if parliament should decide to have a commission something like the Macmillan one investigate this subject and report to the house before the Bank Act is finally revised.

Mr. POULIOT: Is that professor a minor or a major prophet?

Mr. IRVINE: I shall not enter into the whimsies of my hon. friend. May I refer to the illustration given by Major Douglas and the evidence which has been mentioned. I refer to this because it will, perhaps, present clearly and succinctly what is at least one of the financial difficulties in Canada to-day. On page 464 of his evidence he likens money and its function to a railroad with the ticket system limited to the passenger capacity of the railway. He goes on to point out that if one or more people were to secure a privilege to deal in railway tickets, that is to say, to try to get four or five railway tickets in exchange for two or three, there would likely come a time when you would find passengers waiting for an opportunity to go on the train, with empty seats in it, and yet no tickets to permit those would-be passengers to go aboard the train. That is an excellent analogy of the present economic situation in Canada where we have an abundance of goods and a great consuming capacity among the people and yet we have not the ticket system, if you like, the money system to enable the people to acquire the goods that they desire so much to use.

I do not on this occasion desire to advocate the Douglas or any other system; I am not going to put forth the merits of any particular proposal of financial reform. The time to do that will be when parliament becomes convinced that the present financial system is wrong and when it deliberately sets itself to the task of devising and inaugurating a better one. My object to-day is to have a committee of the house investigate the whole use of credit in relation to present economic conditions and to report its findings prior to the extension for another ten years of bank charters.

What if the bankers' advice should after all be wrong?

Hon. gentlemen of this house who still are convinced that the bankers' advice is right, "I beseech them," in the language quoted by the hon. member for East Edmonton, "in the bowels of Christ to conceive it as possible that they may be deceived;" and if they are deceived and the bankers' advice is wrong, we are just about to place in the hands of the bankers for another ten years a charter to carry this country on a wrong course for that period of time. Who will take the responsibility for that? Surely we ought to be absolutely certain that the policies of the bankers of Canada are right and that there be no mistake in our judgment in this regard.

I submit, sir, that it is positively dangerous for any government to follow the advice of bankers. Emerson, writing of the secret conclaves in which the Dean and Prebends of the cathedral communed with the Holy Ghost as to whom to appoint to the vacant bishoprics, said that invariably the dictates of the Holy Ghost coincided with the recommendations of the queen. Similarly the policy of sound money coincides with the wishes of the bankers of this and other countries. But the advice of bankers throughout the world has been wrong so invariably that we can no longer have confidence in it. Internationally we have as examples of misinformation and bad advice by bankers the Dawes plan, followed by the Young plan. Again, bankers journeyed all the way from Great Britain to Australia to put that country on the wrong track. Australia, however, decided to follow the advice of the British bankers just a little way, and then discovered that it would be disastrous to follow their advice completely, and so they diverged from it slightly, and to the extent only of that divergence Australia profited from the advice of the British bankers.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. IRVINE: No, I refuse to be questioned at the present moment.

We have also the statement of the Right Hon. David Lloyd George in the House of Commons in Great Britain on February 12, 1931, when he was warning the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that right hon. gentleman who has since been called the Iron Chancellor, but who might more appropriately have been designated by some softer material, that he should not be afraid of the bankers. Mr. Lloyd George concluded by saying of the bankers, "They have been wrong every time."

Then we come to the tragic acceptance by the present Prime Minister of Great Britain of the advice of the bankers in that country. I believe that history will show that that was the major mistake made by that right hon. gentleman. Even before the election precipitated to secure popular sanction for the bankers' policy was over, the policies of the bankers in Great Britain were proven to be in error.

This parliament, then, should be able to advise itself on questions of credit and to dictate policies to the bankers, rather than have the bankers dictate policies to us. The investigation which I request by the resolution now before the house will tend to increase our knowledge of the subject and remove us from the necessity of having to accept the erroneous information of interested parties who are desirous of maintaining the present banking system largely for personal reasons. The resolution specifies that we should investigate the whole monetary system with a view to seeing to it that the monetary requirements of the Dominion shall be safeguarded. I want to make just one comment on that, Mr. Speaker. Between September, 1928, and September, 1932, there was a great depletion of credit in circulation in Canada. Very often we hear hon. members of this house saying that there is just as much money in Canada to-day as there ever was, and that therefore for us to argue that we are short of money bespeaks great ignorance. But let me point out to the house that in the period mentioned, from September, 1928, to September, 1932, there was a reduction of $584,000,000 in loans by our banks and a reduction in deposits of $362,000,000, which makes a total reduction for the period of $946,000,000 in circulation in the Dominion of Canada. There is no provision in the Bank Act, so far as I can recall, by which the bankers of this country can be compelled to maintain a definite relationship between the credit in circulation and the volume of goods on the market to be purchased by the people of this country, and those are the important factors for us to keep in mind in dealing with any monetary policy.

In the next place, the resolution suggests that we ought to investigate the advisability of departing from the gold basis. Now I know that we are not on the gold basis, but we seem to have an unfortunate hankering after it, and to wish to keep as close to a theoretical gold basis as possible. In doing so I believe that we are being misled. In this connection let me quote a resolution which came before the House of Lords on December 15 last. The resolution moved by Lord Melchett read as follows:

That, since under modern scientific conditions productive capacity is unlimited, and since the existence of indigence and unemployment throughout a large portion of the population demonstrates the fact that the present monetary system is obsolete and a hindrance to the efficient production and distribution of goods, in the opinion of this house the government should bring forward immediate proposals for the economic reforms necessary to enable the subjects of this realm to enjoy the benefits to which their present productive capacity entitles them.

In discussing the resolution Lord Melchett argued that the gold standard had been abandoned and would never be returned to, and further he prophesied that there was no hope of finding any way out through the proposed World Economic conference. May I also note in passing that while the resolution discussed in the House of Lords demanded that the government should immediately inaugurate a financial policy that would be calculated to distribute to the British public the advantages of the productive system which they had achieved, the resolution which is now before this parliament merely asks that we should investigate with a view to finding out whether it would be advisable to have such a policy. The resolution which was presented to the House of Lords was defeated by only four votes.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the vote?

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry that I cannot give the right hon. gentleman the actual figures, and I do not know that it matters. Even if there were only eight members present, the fact remains that the resolution was defeated by four votes.

Mr. POULIOT: Lord Melchett wanted to replace the gold standard by watered stock of Nickel.

Mr. IRVINE: If you cannot keep the hon. gentleman quiet otherwise, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to name him or get him out of the chamber. He is a bother to me.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member before interrupting should ask for permission to put a question.

Mr. POULIOT: When I asked for permission he refused.

Mr. IRVINE: Surely any hon. gentleman has a right to refuse to answer a question. I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but I am trying to present a case which is not so easy to present as my hon. friend may imagine, and when he interrupts in the middle of a sentence it is difficult to answer him.

The House of Lords defeated by only four votes a resolution more drastic than this. Might it not be expected, in this parliament, which no doubt imagines itself far in advance of the House of Lords in modern thought, that a resolution to investigate would be willingly accepted?

Thirty-two countries of the world, I believe, have already abandoned the gold standard. Although I am not going to argue it now, I believe that by adhering as closely as possible to the gold standard we have suffered disadvantage, at any rate the subject is a matter worthy of investigation. We are not all as convinced, as the government is, that it is wise to stay as close to the gold standard as we are. The government may be right, I am willing to admit the possibility that I may be wrong, but I do not think it is unreasonable to ask that the government give us the opportunity to investigate.

The resolution suggests also that we investigate the advisability of bringing our dollar to a par with the pound sterling. I am not blind to the tremendous difficulties which from the beginning of its term the administration has had to face in dealing with our relationships and obligations to other countries. Again I say that I am not entirely sure that the government is right, and surely it is a question for investigation.

In this connection the Financial Times of December 30 last presents a table showing Canadian bonds falling due in 1933, federal, provincial and municipal, amounting to $603,406,000 and corporation bonds amounting to $79,994,000, making a grand total of $683,400,000. These are payable as follows: in United States funds, $266,649,000; in Canadian funds, $378,108,000, and in British funds, $38,643,000. It will be seen from these figures that an alteration in the value of our dollar would be rather to our advantage, since we would be at a disadvantage only in respect to the $266,649,000 payable in United States funds, and would be at an advantage in respect to those payable in Canadian and British funds, not to speak of other factors which would have to be taken into consideration and which might give us an advantage. For instance, I cannot see why a reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar would not give us an advantage in the British market, making possible the benefits which the government tried to secure in their trade agreement with Great Britain. Depreciation of the dollar to par with the pound would also have the effect of increasing our trade with the United States or other countries which might have their currencies on or near the gold basis. It is possible, of course, that the United States would immediately raise their tariff to prevent that; they might even place an embargo against our goods. But if nothing so drastic were done, Canada would be at a great advantage in export trade and thus be in a better position to meet her obligations in the United States in United States funds without losing the exchange at all.

One other thing I desire to emphasize. It is proposed to postpone the revision of the Bank Act for a year, a course of action which I think would be very wise, provided the government afford us opportunity to study the problem in the meantime. Indeed, I had intended to include in my resolution a proposal to defer the revision if it had not been mooted by the government. The revision of the Bank Act is a tremendous task, and it would be to the advantage of this house and the country if during the remaining months of the present session we had a committee, perhaps the standing committee, investigate the whole financial system, with all possible facts and data brought before it to guide it in dealing with these debatable points, the gold basis and the reduction of our dollar to a level with the pound. Thus the government and parliament would be enabled to reach a safe conclusion for proceeding next session with the revision of the Bank Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the point of order raised with regard to the regularity of the motion, it seems to me that the paragraph lettered (b), and reading as follows—

> The issuing of dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling—

—has been fully dealt with already by an amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and seconded by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) on November 2, 1932, in these words:

> —and subject also to establishment of parity of the Canadian dollar with the British pound.

At that time the same matter was discussed that is sought to be brought up now under different wording.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I discuss that point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe the hon. member has already discussed the point of order. I would suggest that the words contained in paragraph (b) be deleted from the resolution, otherwise I shall have to find the whole resolution out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry to do so, but I would ask the unanimous consent of the house to the withdrawal of that section. If it is in order I should like to carry on with the remainder of the resolution.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was about to say that the hon. gentleman had been so moderate in his statements and had not traversed the ground previously covered so well, that so far as I was concerned I had made up my mind that if this paragraph were deleted the debate in connection with the resolution might continue. So far as the government is concerned it is satisfied to let the debate continue, with the deletion of those words in regard to which the judgment of the house already has been sought.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does that meet with the approval of the house? If so, it will be so dealt with.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The resolution now before the house, introduced by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and seconded by myself, asks for three things, but since one paragraph has been ruled out I shall deal only with the two remaining.

I do not intend however to deal at great length with the third paragraph, which reads:

> . . . on ways and means of reducing the internal debt so greatly increased by deflation.

I can also assure your honour that I do not intend to present the same or similar arguments that have been brought forward during previous debates, especially during the fall session. Before coming to the gist of my argument, however, I should like to touch on paragraph (c) very briefly. In my opinion the question of internal debts should be dealt with at once. I think the house will agree that the government did a very fine thing last week when they accepted the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), which had to do with the great burden of debt in Canada. In my opinion this should have been done quite some time ago, because unquestionably these debts are crushing the very life from our people. It would have been difficult enough to meet the debts without having added to the present burdens the increase which has been brought about by the drop in commodity prices.

Paragraph (b) has been ruled out, so in passing I will say only a word or two with regard to it. I have no definite idea as to what amount of notes would have to be issued in order to depreciate the Canadian dollar to the level of the British pound, but I am firmly convinced that it would have been greatly to the advantage of our trade if our dollar had been so depreciated. I believe this should have been brought about some time ago, and I think we would have obtained a great advantage if this had been the case at the time the conference met in Ottawa. To-day there are some twenty-five or thirty countries which have adopted this course of depreciated currencies while only some five or six of the prominent nations have maintained what is understood as the gold standard or basis.

Australia and New Zealand have certainly strong convictions in this regard. I do not know how it was done, but they have depreciated their currency on a line with that of the pound sterling and, as a matter of fact, have endeavoured to keep below the level of sterling. The argument has been brought forward that Canada is in a somewhat different position from those two countries in that we have borrowed so much money in the United States. That might be true, but the fact remains that most countries have depreciated their currencies, and instead of a world scramble for gold now we have a world scramble for depreciated currencies, which have enabled these countries to overcome almost all tariffs which have been raised against them.

Consider the case of Japan, which has learned how to get her goods over high tariff walls. That country has issued paper currency with a silver coverage, and it may interest the house to know that to-day Japan is shipping considerable goods to the United States, as well as to Canada. I am going to mention only four or five articles to show how this has worked out. I believe Japan is landing rubber boots in the United States at 34 cents a pair; rugs at 6 cents each; grass rugs six by twelve at 92 cents, and last year Japan exported to the United States some 54,500,000 light globes. As everyone knows, Japan has depreciated her yen; to-day the seller can get almost five yen for a dollar. That represents a premium of about 135 per cent on each dollar's worth of goods sold in the United States or Canada. In my opinion Canada is and has been at a distinct disadvantage because of the fact that her dollar has remained tied up to the gold standard, and it is generally recognized now, I believe, that the Ottawa conference agreements are of little value so long as we remain on the gold standard. Whether or not it is done deliberately I believe that ultimately our dollar will be forced much lower than it is at the present time. I believe this will be the case and the quicker the better perhaps for our trade.

[Mr. Reid.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first paragraph of this resolution and the one with which I wish to deal particularly, has to do with the advisability of finally departing from the gold basis. I differ somewhat from the mover of the resolution, who believes that we do not need any metallic substance, such as gold or any other precious metal, as a base for our currency. I take the view that we need gold and that we need something else as well. I realize also that one school of thought believes that neither gold nor any other precious metal is required for currency, or even as a base for currency, and I am not overlooking the fact that to-day currency is not based entirely on bullion. In my opinion, however, we must have some unit of value. The process of individual barter is too tedious and too complex. It is true that many years ago, in the days of primitive civilization, the barter method was followed, but it was not long until that method was discarded; as civilization developed and the wants of mankind increased, it was found necessary to have some unit with which to measure not only goods but services as well, and I do not believe anyone would seriously consider going back to the days of barter. It is universally agreed, I maintain, that we must have some token or unit of value, some standard whereby we can measure our everyday exchanges or services. I admit that we can and do use paper as money to-day, but the majority of the people have the utmost confidence that behind all that paper there is something much more tangible. It is true that the confidence of the people themselves enables us to use this paper and to conduct our business transactions with paper in the form either of dominion or of bank notes or cheques, because of the inherent and fundamental belief that the paper issued is a real unit of value and can be readily exchanged. Since the beginning of civilization the token of value has been the precious metals, either gold or silver, or both. And there can be no better tangible unit or yardstick, and certainly none in which the peoples of the world have greater faith. Silver and gold are both precious metals; they are not base metals. They have been in use for centuries not only as tokens, like cheques or dollar bills, but as tokens plus something else, as coins having a material value, a commodity, if you like.

The gold or single standard which we are on to-day, and which is the monetary basis of the remaining six prominent nations, did not come about by mere accident. Up to the year 1861 Great Britain and other countries had been using silver as the token of value.

In 1860 she was using gold also, but in that year she went off gold entirely and adopted silver as the unit or token of value. Although she had gone off the gold standard, she still used silver, and I believe that the word sterling itself comes from the use of silver.

In 1873 Great Britain forced the United States off the gold standard, although the United States was then using silver as its unit of value and as its currency. It is interesting to know that after the lapse of some sixty years the United States, which was forced off the gold standard in 1873, now practically controls the gold supply of the world, with the result that almost all countries with the exception of perhaps six have now abandoned gold and adopted something else, we are not sure what. It may be goods or credit; I am not quite sure. At any rate, the gold standard was not brought about by accident but in my opinion by design. The bankers and financial manipulators recognized that with a single standard such as gold they could better manipulate and control the financial affairs of the world for their own advantage. They felt that it would be to their advantage to have a single standard such as gold, and that in my opinion was one of the main reasons why leading nations went off bimetalism. The reason, in my opinion, was that manipulation could be more easily practised. Silver was deliberately demonetized in 1925, and we heard no cry in those days about interfering with the sacred rights of the people, although sixty per cent of the people of the world were almost ruined overnight. In 1925 Great Britain forced India, with a population of 800,000,000, to accept the gold standard. I have here a report of a meeting that took place in the city of Vancouver at which this statement was made on reliable authority regarding Great Britain and India:

> India, the great repository of silver, was placed upon a gold bullion standard in 1926. Adoption of the gold standard left an amount of silver rupees to be disposed of variously estimated from 400,000,000 to 600,000,000 ounces. The law provided that this stock be sold within a period of ten years. From then until now, India has disposed of some 80-100 million ounces.
> Thus a large surplus still over-shadows the silver market. India, in daily practice, remains a silver-using country, and her people find their personal fortunes measured in terms of silver in its ratio to gold, reduced by about one-half, and this fact alone is regarded by many as a contributing factor to the prevalent unrest.
> Mexico has reverted to the silver standard, the silver peso now being the only legal tender, and so we find about one-half the population of the world are silver users, and think and trade in terms of silver.

The surplus silver thrown into the world's market in 1925 and 1926 practically impoverished 1,200,000,000 human beings. China, with her 400,000,000, and India with 800,000,000, had their purchasing power suddenly taken from them. This surplus silver thrown suddenly into the world market brought the price of silver down from around $1.25 an ounce to something like 32 cents, and so we witnessed a world scramble for gold. The only medium of exchange, Mr. Speaker, which 1,200,000,000 people had was taken from them over night, and that by direct and deliberate manipulation of the financial and banking interests of the world.

We have reached an impasse in our trade relations to-day. Tariff barriers have been raised by almost every country and goods and produce are at a standstill, so that they cannot move from one country to another. This is due in large measure to tariffs. Only a few countries, practically speaking only two, have gold, although we are supposed to be on a gold standard. We can neither exchange our goods nor obtain this one precious metal to pay for any goods we do buy. We see to-day the spectacle of the United States and France with practically two thirds of the world's gold supply lying idle in their vaults, while tariff barriers have been raised against any goods coming from other countries. These countries which have not the gold are denied the right of purchasing goods because they have no gold to pay for them.

There is only, roughly speaking, $11,000,000,000 worth of gold bullion in the world, two-thirds of which, as I say, is held by France and the United States, and now we have the other spectacle of a wild scramble with depreciated currency. The question then arises: What shall we do? That is the question before the nation to-day. If countries will not agree to lower their high tariff walls so as to allow the free interchange of goods and if nations cannot pay with the recognized unit or yardstick, which to-day is gold, what shall we do? My answer, and the one which I put forward for the consideration of the House, is this. Stabilize silver and go back to a bimetal standard, using both silver and gold as the unit of value or measure. This is not a new formula; it is not something new but something that has been advocated by many men before. I do not know whether it has been advocated in this house but I do know that it is not a new theory. The use of silver is as old as the hills themselves and it has always worked well. Even to-day over sixty per cent of the peoples of the world use silver as the one unit of value or measure stick for services.

Others refer to a managed currency based upon paper alone. That might work all right domestically where and so long as we have confidence in one another, but paper alone would not be acceptable as between nations, the majority of which still believe in precious metals which have not only an intrinsic but a commodity value as well. The stability of prices is a very desirable thing at the present time, and I would point out to the house that over a period of years, taking the wholesale price of 550 articles, silver has varied only some fifteen per cent, while in that time gold has varied or increased one hundred per cent. There is a very close relationship between silver and commodity prices. In 1919 wheat was selling at $2.56 per bushel and silver at $1.25 per ounce. We have never had a standard to compare with the silver standard, and I ask the house to compare the stability of silver with what has happened in the case of gold. In 1928 one ounce of gold would purchase seven or eight bushels of wheat; to-day that one ounce of gold will purchase sixty or seventy bushels. In 1928 one ounce of gold would purchase one ton of potatoes, while to-day the same ounce will purchase five tons. In 1928 one ounce of gold would purchase one hundred gallons of milk in the Fraser valley; to-day it will purchase over two hundred and twenty gallons. Let us also consider the gold standard in relation to labour. In 1928 one ounce of gold would purchase five days of labour at $4 per day; to-day that same ounce will purchase fourteen or fifteen days of labour at $1.50 per day, which is the average price for labour being paid in British Columbia.

There is a fear in the minds of some that silver would flood the world, but I claim that this would not be the case. I have obtained the figures showing the production of silver, and they show that since 1492 the total world production has been only fifteen billion ounces. If silver were worth one dollar per ounce to-day, which it is not, we would have only fifteen or sixteen billion dollars worth of silver. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, the production of this metal has not varied, and the surplus to-day is only some 250,000,000 ounces.

Fifteen or sixteen to one was the basis or ratio used in bimetalism. This ratio was based upon the production of the two metals, and the ratio of production has not changed during the past four hundred years. The production of gold and silver for the last five years likewise shows that the ratio of fifteen or sixteen to one of gold still maintains. Again, bimetalism is not capable of indefinite expansion; whilst the supply of silver is plentiful it is not unlimited. At the present time twenty-five or thirty countries are off the gold standard, while six very important ones still remain. Those countries still on the gold standard cannot trade with the countries which are not, unless they inflate or depreciate their currency. I realize unlimited paper inflation is fraught with some difficulty. Paper as money would not be accepted by other countries. It has no barter or intrinsic value; it is not a commodity like silver or gold. The precious metals are much sought after in the orient and in India with its population of 800,000,000. If we had either silver coinage or paper money with silver as a coverage basis, we would have a sound money. It would not be a fiat money; it would have a real commodity value. As I said, over sixty per cent of the world's people would be very glad to have all the silver coinage or bullion we could give them. Silver has a value as a precious metal; and, what is very important, the people have confidence in it. Many of us would not be adverse to having our pockets filled with silver coins or even to having a supply of silver at home. It is the bankers and the creditors who object when we speak of any inflation, either by paper or by silver. They consider it no crime to take two dollars now for every dollar of debt created a few years ago, but their cry is of holy horror when inflation or depreciated currency is mentioned.

The stabilizing of silver upon a currency basis would add to the basic wealth of over half the world's population. It would help those countries which were ruined when they were forced on to the single standard of gold. Many countries are forced to sell their goods upon a silver standard and buy back in terms of gold. In other words, we refuse to use the unit of value or the yardstick of over half the world's population and then by means of tariffs we refuse to admit the goods or products of those countries.

In my opinion the stabilizing of silver at fifteen or sixteen to one would accomplish two very important things. First, it would check the rise in the value of gold and so stop prices from going still lower. A few moments ago I gave a comparison of what one ounce of gold would purchase in 1928 as compared with what it would purchase in 1932 or 1933; this stoppage of the lowering of prices would certainly be a very desirable thing. The stabilizing of silver would also raise the purchasing power of 1,200,000,000 people, everyone a potential buyer of our products, if we would only let them. Are we going to sit and wait until our standard of living is forced down to the level of those people or are we going to do something which will raise their purchasing power so that they will be able to purchase the goods which we have to sell and which they would like to have but cannot?

It is true that bimetalism might not solve all the world's problems, but it would be a real step in the right direction. We would be giving the people sound money, we would be giving them the kind of money which has been used since the days of Christ. Silver money has always worked well for the people but not for the manipulators and financiers.

I have no great faith in the statements of prime ministers or premiers who tell us that we cannot do this or we cannot do that in case something fearful might take place. In 1929 Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain, informed the British House of Commons that it would be disastrous for Great Britain to go off the gold standard. He said that calamity would befall the nation; that it was unthinkable Great Britain should go off the gold standard. Nevertheless she has done so; she has depreciated her currency thirty per cent and yet no calamity has resulted. As a matter of fact, Great Britain during the last year has purchased more food supplies than she did when she was on the gold standard in 1931-32, employment has increased to a considerable extent and her export trade has also increased. So when I hear prime ministers saying that we cannot do this or we cannot do that with our currency, I am always mindful of Ramsay MacDonald making that straight statement to the House of Commons in London.

We have plenty of silver and many silver mines, but while we have gold mines, we have not enough gold mines to supply the gold that even this country would require to pay her debts or interest outside. Japan, as I say, has issued coinage based on silver. Germany, France, China and India are all buying silver. Why not Canada? Why can we not be bold enough to take a step along those lines? Great Britain has now declared, that for many years to come she is not going to go back to the gold standard. Why cannot Canada, which has plenty of silver, use it as straight currency or as bullion to stabilize prices as was done before? Or are we going to drift and wait until our dollar is forced down as it ultimately will be? Why cannot we now take some steps that will enable us to trade with other nations, especially when one considers that less than half the world is endeavouring to do business on a small and inadequate amount of gold while the greater part of the peoples of the earth are still using silver as its basis or unit of value? This is what the Canadian gold dollar has to fight to-day in the world's markets:

|---|---|
| Great Britain | 45 |
| Japan | 135 |
| Spain | 137 |
| Norway | 55 |
| Sweden | 47 |
| Denmark | 55 |
| Brazil | 64 |
| Chile | 101 |
| Argentina | 65 |
| Peru | 47 |
| Mexico | 52 |
| India | 45 |

Mexico uses a silver coinage. This list does not include Australia and New Zealand, which are at present beating us in the markets, not only of Great Britain but of the orient and in all countries with depreciated currencies.

To-day other countries are finding a way into United States markets in spite of high tariffs. Are we going to hesitate about getting into the scramble of depreciated currency, or take a step towards a system that all through the ages has been one of the best so far as exchange of values is concerned, namely, silver and gold, or bimetalism? Japan, to my mind, is a more serious competitor than is Russia in world markets. She has brought that about by depreciating her yen to one-fifth of its previous value. One way to protect ourselves is by stabilizing the price of silver. This would immediately raise the price of silver all over the world and the purchasing power of 1,200,000,000 people would also be increased. This would automatically raise the cost of goods produced in those countries and would help to counteract the dumping of cheap goods into other countries. It would also help to stabilize prices. Bimetalism would do all I have stated and I should like to hear hon. members who may follow voice a contrary opinion, or tell the house of any better, safer and more practical scheme.

I have not gone into every detail, but I would urge the house seriously to consider broadening the basis of our unit of value and adding silver to that of gold. Something must be done and done speedily, and I am suggesting what I believe to be a way out, or at least a very important step in that direction. We have clung too long to the single standard. As I have stated, some twenty-nine countries have taken action of their own accord and we shall very soon be forced to take similar action, because it is almost impossible for us to trade or compete with those countries which are already and are still bent on using depreciated currency and do not forget that Great Britain has depreciated her currency by some thirty per cent.

In closing I should like to quote from a message issued by Pope Pius XI in 1931, as follows:

> How poor, paltry, stupid and unpardonable the voices of certain great bankers of the old and the new world crying for lower wages and lower standards of living for the hand and brain workers of the white race to enable the shipyards, mills, factories, farms and mines of the Aryan world to compete with the semi-slave workers of Russia and the orient!

I ask in all seriousness that the committee on banking and commerce give earnest consideration to the suggestions which I am now putting forward and that we make a move in favour of bimetalism, using silver as well as gold.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Prior to the dinner hour, debate was following along the line of consideration being given to our Bank Act when it comes up for revision either this year or next. Not being a member of the banking and commerce committee, and not finding it possible to be there when the revision takes place, I am glad of the opportunity to take some part in the discussion on this resolution. I think it would have been most unfortunate had the debate been ruled out of order.

In the debate this afternoon one of the speakers dealt with the possible merits of bimetalism. I was much impressed by his arguments, and possibly there is considerable force in them.

I found when I got home during the Christmas recess and held meetings among my constituents that, particularly at this time, there seems to be a general feeling in favour of reforms of some sort in our monetary system. The agriculturists of western Canada are very wide-awake and well versed in governmental matters; they feel that something should be done to help them in their present situation, and perhaps one line of thought which their minds take more than any other is reform in banking and finance, or monetary reform.

A number of criticisms may be offered against our present financial system. I do not think it helps us at all to refuse to recognize these criticisms. On the contrary, I think it is good for us to hear them, and if there is a remedy for any of the defects in the present system, we should be open to receive suggestions and provide a remedy.

One of the criticisms that I heard when I was home during the recess was the cost of putting into circulation last November $35,000,000 of currency. I have often been asked, why was it that it cost the government so much to put that amount of money into circulation? I think we here are all aware that that money was put into circulation in perhaps the only legal way in which it could be done, namely, through our existing banking system; but for that small operation of circulating $35,000,000 of their own money the taxpayers of Canada have to pay to the banks one per cent for a period of two years, or a total of $700,000. People find it hard to understand why it should cost so much. They also ask this question: That amount of money is put into circulation for two years, and after that time has elapsed, what is going to happen? Will the loan be extended for another year, or for two years, carrying the same charge of one per cent? If so, it will mean a further charge of $350,000 if extended for one year, or $700,000 if for two years. Or will the loan be retired? If so, it will mean that we shall have to tax ourselves to raise another $35,000,000 to retire the original loan.

I find, too, a good deal of criticism from the struggling agriculturists in regard to the profits which our banks are making at the present time. Even though our primary industries find it extremely difficult to exist, let alone make any profit, we find by the last financial statement of our banks, dated December, 1932, that their dividend rates are very substantial, one bank declaring a dividend of eight per cent, seven of them ten per cent, and one, the Bank of Nova Scotia, declaring a rate of fourteen per cent. There was just one bank in the dominion, Barclay's, which did not declare a dividend, and it operates in only a very small way.

Another criticism is the difficulty that governmental and other organizations, as well as private individuals, experience at times in raising money for any legitimate purpose. Perhaps some of us are not aware that some of our institutions have considerable difficulty in raising money, and when they do raise it, they have to pay a rather high rate of interest. When I was home in the Christmas recess, a municipal corporation close to my own home town was taking steps to raise money by way of scrip. This practice has not become very common in Canada, but at least one small urban centre in Alberta is now on its second year of issuing scrip. That is, they issue their own paper for services performed, and the business men carry that paper over until the taxes come in and the paper is redeemed. This municipal corporation in my constituency, comprising ten townships, is now working along that line, interviewing merchants in two of the larger towns close to the organization with a view to having them carry that scrip over until the tax money is available in the fall. They are taking this course, not because the banks will not lend them any money, but in order to get away from the substantial interest charges which the banks would make for lending the money.

We know that our banks pay a very low rate of interest on deposits, a matter of three per cent, and there have been rumours recently that the rate is to be decreased to 2½ or possibly 2 per cent; yet the interest rate charged to individuals or corporations in our own west runs from seven to nine per cent. In fact, a municipal corporation generally pays 7½ per cent, and a private individual 9 per cent.

Another rumour I have heard is perhaps more serious. There may not be any foundation for it, but it is that our banks are making undue profits out of the present exchange situation between Canada and the United States. I would not say that that is a fact, because I do not know, but I do know that there are rumours to that effect. Possibly the pending litigation in reference to the city of Calgary will bring out whether or not they are well founded.

The most serious criticism that may be offered in regard to banking and finance is the decrease in our note circulation, both dominion and bank notes. I have taken the trouble to compare the amount of notes in circulation in the year 1921, when the second last decennial census was taken, with the amount in circulation in 1931, when the last census was taken. I also have the figures for December, 1932, the latest I can secure. It is alarming to note the decrease in circulation of bank notes particularly during the past ten or twelve years. Without giving the aggregates I will give the per capita circulation. In 1921 it was $30.58 of dominion notes. In 1918, 1919 and 1920 there was an even higher per capita circulation than that; in 1919 it was $35.47. In 1931 it had decreased to $14.01, and in December, 1932, it had further decreased to $13.01. Of bank notes, in 1921 the per capita circulation was $22.15. In 1931 it had decreased to $13.68, and in December, 1932, there was a further decrease to $12.25. Putting those figures together we find that the total per capita circulation in 1921 of both dominion and bank notes was $52.73. In 1931 it was $27.69, and in December, 1932, $25.26—a gradual decrease during the last ten or twelve year period.

I might point out that a large part of the dominion note circulation was composed of notes of high denominations not in the hands of the general public but rather used as a circulating medium between banks. They were of $1,000, $5,000 and $50,000 denominations. In 1931 there were over $100,000,000 of these. Taking that away it leaves a little over $40,000,000 in 1931, or $3.90 per capita circulating among the people. Add that to the circulation of bank notes, $13.68, and you have a total per capita of $17.58.

Here is something I would like to point out in regard to dominion notes: The value in circulation remained fairly steady from 1919 to 1931. In 1919, excluding the larger notes from $50 to $50,000, the dominion note circulation was a little over $35,000,000. In 1921 it was almost $34,500,000; in 1931 a little over $35,000,000. You can see that the value of dominion notes actually in the hands of the public remained fairly uniform. Of bank notes, in 1919 there were nearly $219,000,000; in 1920 nearly $229,000,000; in 1921, $194,000,000; in 1931, $142,000,000, and in December, 1932, a little over $127,000,000—an actual dropping off of bank notes. Putting it in another way, if we take 1920 as representing 100, in December, 1932, the bank note circulation was only 55, a drop of 45 per cent. There was also a large dropping off in bank loans; I think that was mentioned by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). From 1929 to 1931 there was a drop of 25 per cent in bank loans, amounting to more than $550,000,000.

This to my mind constitutes a weakness in our banking system, or perhaps a number of weaknesses, that if possible some means should be found to correct. As one holds meetings among his constituents, he finds many ideas advanced. One is that we should nationalize our banking system, some will say socialize it. Various remedies are put forward for correcting the evils that the people know to exist. May I briefly put before the house what to my mind would be a means of correcting these evils, at least to some extent? I have in mind the system of banking which is in operation in Australia. I do not purpose going into it very much in detail, because in 1928 there was a debate in this house on a resolution proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and at that time I dealt in some detail with the Australian Commonwealth bank. Any person interested in that system of banking will find in the debates of 1928 much useful information.

The act to incorporate the Australian Commonwealth bank was passed in 1911, and the bank opened for business on January 20, 1913, just a little over twenty years ago. In my speech in 1928 I outlined the operations of the savings bank, giving the number of depositors and the amount at credit of depositors from the commencement of operations until June 30, 1925. Following on from that date I find that the number of depositors increased, so that at June 30, 1930, the number was 1,329,701 and the amount at credit £49,562,874. At that time I also showed the general business of the bank, indicating the losses or profits each year from the commencement until June 30, 1925. For the first two years of the bank's operations there were slight losses, due to the heavy expenses of getting the bank under way, but after that there was a steadily rising profit each year, so that for the year ended June 30, 1925 the net profit was £4,989,230. For the year ended June 30, 1926 the aggregate net profit was £5,456,551; for the year ended June 30, 1927, £6,057,514; for the year ended June 30, 1928, £6,766,415; for the year ended June 30, 1929, £7,514,935; and up to June 30, 1930, the last year for which I have record, the net profits were £8,336,124. You will note that there has been a gradual increase in profits each year from the end of the first two years up to the last year for which I have any record.

An important feature about this Australian Commonwealth bank is that half the net profits are placed in the bank's reserve fund and the other half are credited to the national debt sinking fund. In other words, the money does not go into the hands of private people in the form of dividends. Perhaps the most important point is that in December, 1920, the bank was given control of the Australian bank note issue. Here is something worthy of note. Notes is circulation on June 20, 1925, totalled £53,890,226, and of that total 42 per cent or £22,633,894 were held by the public. On June 30, 1930, five years later, the notes in circulation totalled £44,914,326, of which total 50.2 per cent or £22,546,991 were held by the public, almost the same amount that was held by the public five years previously. The interest paid by the Australian Commonwealth bank, in its savings department, is 4 per cent on the first five hundred pounds, 3½ per cent on the next five hundred pounds and 3 per cent on the next three hundred pounds. This rate compares very favourably indeed with the straight Canadian rate of 3 per cent, regardless of the amount of money deposited in the bank. There are twenty-one cheque-paying banks in Australia, including the Australian Commonwealth bank, and they are all making profits. There are twenty privately owned banks which are making handsome profits, as is evidenced by the dividends they have declared, ranging from 8 per cent to 16 per cent per annum.

It would appear to me, Mr. Speaker, that a Dominion of Canada bank could be launched and operated, following the example set by Australia, with no expense to the country after the first two or three years. We have heard some of the leading members of the great Liberal party refer to the possibility and perhaps the advisability of establishing a central bank. I do not know just to what they refer, whether it is to be similar to the Australian Commonwealth bank, owned and operated by the government, or similar to the federal reserve bank of the United States, which is something else altogether. I am not sure whether our Liberal friends are agreed as to the kind of bank they desire, or as to how it should be operated. I am sure, however, that it will be a good political bank, and that it will be formulated in a way calculated to attract the support of the people at the next general election. I would seriously suggest to them, however, that to follow the example of the Commonwealth of Australia would be safe, sane and sound. Already in our post office savings account we have $23,328,998, as of August 31, 1932. The province of Ontario savings branch has deposits totalling some $27,000,000, and the province of Alberta has a savings account of almost $11,000,000. These three accounts represent a total of more than $61,000,000, and in addition there is a provincial savings account in the province of Quebec as well as a local savings bank in the city of Montreal. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that funds such as these could be collected very readily in order to start a Dominion of Canada bank, which could handle our dominion, provincial and municipal accounts, including those of towns, cities and rural districts. Such a bank could handle also school district accounts, the funds of church organizations, and so on. The first business done by the Australian bank was almost exclusively government business.

As I see it, a number of distinct advantages would result from such a move. The most important advantage, of course, would be that such a bank could control the issue of all notes in Canada, and we would not have the fluctuation in regard to bank notes that we have seen during recent years. Just as the dominion note issue has been kept fairly steady for a number of years, so if we had a dominion bank controlling the entire note issue there could be a uniform supply of currency kept in the hands of the public year after year. Such a bank also could regulate and control interest rates. It does not seem a good business proposition to the public that they should get 2½ per cent or 3 per cent for their money while the private banks lend that same money at 7 per cent, 8 per cent and 9 per cent, enabling them to declare large dividends even in this time of depression. In addition, in the circulation of any large sum of money there would be no need to pay commissions, as was done last fall. That $35,000,000 would have been put in to circulation and there would have been no necessity to pay a commission to any private corporation. Such a bank probably would make profits, even as the bank in Australia makes profits, but no private individual would get rich because of those profits, which would be credited against our ever-increasing national debt. I am sure we are all agreed that this is one place where we need to have something credited if we are ever to liquidate that debt.

In addition to all these points, Mr. Speaker, such a bank would help to offset the present tendency to issue scrip. I do not know whether or not our banking institutions are at all alarmed because of this tendency, but if the depression continues for another year or two I think we will see a number of corporations issuing scrip. Only a month or so ago the city of Calgary talked of issuing scrip to the amount of a million dollars, and I am not sure that they have given up the idea even yet. At all events there is a growing feeling in the municipalities of western Canada that the issue of their own scrip offers a way out of their present difficulties.

It may be said that this proposal, if adopted, would involve a considerable expense, but if the government would review the history and progress of the Australian Commonwealth bank and take particular note of the ever-increasing profits shown by that institution during the last seventeen or eighteen years, I think they would be convinced that this is a good, safe, legitimate and profitable business for the Dominion of Canada to undertake.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution which has been brought before the house by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). In doing so I should like first of all to direct attention to the fact that the largest single item in the estimates now before the house is the sum of $137,500,000, representing interest on our national debt.

This resolution asks for a review of the monetary requirements of the dominion. We are not going to solve the problem of deficits, which unfortunately we have had with us in the past few years, by simply adding on taxation in an effort to make both ends meet the following year. Two years ago we were unfortunate enough, owing to various circumstances, to have a shortage of $94,500,000. We tried to meet that deficit by extra taxation, with the result that the following year we were $119,000,000 short. We are not therefore going to solve the problem this year, if we find ourselves short again, by simply adding to taxation. It costs between $365,000,000, which is the figure for this year, and something like $400,000,000, to run the business of the country, and it has often seemed to me very strange that we should do this enormous amount of business through private institutions, as we have done through the private corporations known as banks. There are various purposes for which we have to obtain money—uncontrolled expenditures, administration and public works, and so on—and the only way we have of getting the money is by taxation, by borrowing, or in other words mortgaging the future of the country, or by issuing money. Unfortunately, and I say this advisedly, we have issued far too little, with the result that we have steadily added to the debt through unnecessary borrowing.

This year we are going to pay in interest no less than $4,800,000 more than we did a year ago on the national debt alone. At the same time we find ourselves with an extraordinary unemployment problem, in round figures 700,000 to-day. I cannot help thinking that the views expressed by the London Chamber of Commerce would, with the slight change of one word, suit our situation exactly We should aim to restore and expand the purchasing power of the people of Canada, without which unemployment must remain and defaults, national and individual, must increase. I quote:

> When once a fair price level has been restored, to eliminate, so far as may be practicable, fluctuations in price level due to monetary causes.
> To remove the causes which are inducing nations to strangle world trade by tariffs, quotas, exchange restrictions, et cetera.

We have heard to-night a good deal with regard to the advisability of starting a central bank. This apparently is becoming a more popular topic as time passes, and I think that the public will eventually demand a central bank, just as it demanded the government inspection of banks. Needless to say, the banks will oppose it, even as they opposed government inspection. They finally accepted the government inspection of banks after we had the disastrous failure of the Home Bank a few years ago. Public opinion then was sufficiently organized to make the government realize the necessity for that legislation. Naturally a central bank is not wanted because at the present time, without one, the banks have enormous power and can also make considerable profits. With a central bank that power would be largely taken away from them and needless to say they would not make as big profits because the government would do its own banking. We can readily understand therefore why, as private institutions, they oppose a central bank of rediscount. When we get a central bank however we do not want to have it as a bankers' bank but as a real state bank to do government business. Looking back to 1930, I notice the amount of loans the banks made at that time according to the Canada Year Book, if you allow seven per cent on the total amount of loans made, they would have made a profit in interest equal to their paid-up capital.

I want to say a few words now with regard to the departure from the gold basis. The public are beginning to realize that, as has been pointed out by Mr. McGeer, K.C., of British Columbia, supported by Professor Plumptre, gold is a myth and has been for quite a long time, and has a value only for those people who do not understand it and therefore think that some value does attach to it. They do not appreciate the fact that if all the gold in the world sank to the bottom of the Atlantic the world would go on just the same. It would be simply a matter of a few cables the day after the ship had sunk, and we should not be much worse off.

In 1932 the gold held in Canada was $143,500,000, and notes and legals amounted to $315,500,000, while the deposits were equal to nearly $2,000,000,000. These figures alone show the absurdity of the belief that people can get gold if they want it, in anything but a very minor quantity.

I have often felt that the public were misled by the fact that so much stress is placed on the working of the Dominion Notes Act, because although under that act we allow ourselves to issue $50,000,000 of notes with a 25 per cent backing of gold, holding dollar for dollar of gold behind further issue of notes. But we undermine that act entirely when we begin to use the Finance Act, because under the Finance Act the banks are allowed to take various securities to the treasury board and by placing that security as collateral with the treasury board to get dominion notes on a safe margin, although no gold is necessary in this case.

During the last eighteen years the banks have obtained from the treasury board no less than a little over $4,000,000,000 in this way. The rate varies. It has been down to as low as three per cent, and therefore the more we use the Finance Act in this respect the less percentage of gold have we behind Dominion notes. I mention this not because I think it necessary to have gold behind dominion notes but simply to show how foolish it is to stress the Dominion Notes Act while at the same time we bring the Finance Act into operation.

Banking to-day—and if we have the investigation this should be kept in view—is a bookkeeping system. Altogether too much emphasis is laid on coin and notes that are issued. We are all aware that money is a bookkeeping system, that new money is written into existence through loans and the buying of securities, and written out of existence by cancellations and the selling of securities. I have often wondered what was the value of the central gold reserve. If we have an investigation this matter should be looked into. Anyone who watches what is in the central gold reserve from time to time will find that there is often far more paper money in the way of dominion notes than there is gold. However, that was not the case upon November 16, for which date I have the figures, when there was a little over $11,000,000 in gold and $10,300,000 in dominion notes. One who has not followed this subject might ask how the dominion notes got in there. The explanation is that when the banks take various securities to the treasury board and obtain dominion notes under the provisions of the Finance Act, they can put those notes out to the public or they can take them to the central gold reserve, leave them there in lieu of gold and issue their own notes or promises to pay against the dominion notes. As long as the bankers have the free use of the Finance Act, apparently they are not worrying about using the central gold reserve in this manner. I remember having an interesting conversation in 1923 with Mr. McLeod one time president of the Bank of Nova Scotia. Apparently he had had a good deal to do with starting the central gold reserve and it was his intention that only gold should be placed there against which the banks could issue extra notes from time to time. He was quite worried and irritated at the way the reserve was being used and he said to me:

"It is not a central gold reserve any longer; it is nothing more or less than a gilded reserve."

In looking at the present crisis we have to recognize the fact that our problem is distinctly a money one. It is not a matter, as has been stated so many times upon the floor of this house during the past two or three weeks, of making goods or giving services. Unfortunately we have more than we can distribute of both. There are two reasons why we cannot distribute. The first is the inequality of income—some have more than they can spend and many others have not enough to spend—and, second, there is not sufficient of the medium of exchange to enable business to carry on. Our railroads are in a very unfortunate position to-day, but rather than bonus them or increase freight rates we should provide traffic. Traffic will be provided just as soon as the people have a purchasing power wherewith they can trade with each other.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, very little use has been made of the third method of making money, that of direct issue. It was used in 1914 to the extent of $26,000,000, and when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) decided in 1930 to vote some $20,000,000 to help out the unemployment situation, it was suggested that a similar thing be done. Unfortunately it was not done. We took $20,000,000 out of the state purse; we taxed the people that amount on the one hand to give to the unemployed on the other. What we needed at that time, as we need to-day, was not a transfer of money but rather more money. A few months ago we borrowed some $35,000,000 from the banks and issued dominion notes to them to an equal amount, losing $700,000 on the transaction in the course of two years. It is such things as these which should be looked into very carefully.

A suggestion was made behind me this afternoon with regard to bimetalism. Personally, I am not very much enamoured with bimetalism, but I am willing that the whole matter should be gone into by the banking and commerce committee. I am glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words in support of this resolution. I think it is a good one and I believe considerable benefit would be derived from a complete investigation.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations in connection with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). This resolution is in four parts, the first asking that the banking and commerce committee be instructed to study the Bank Act preparatory to its decennial revision. It seems to me that that portion of the resolution is far too vague and nebulous; it really means going over every single clause in the Bank Act without any special instructions being given in any particular direction. The next three parts of the resolutions are definite in their terms; they ask that the committee report on the advisability of final departure from the gold basis—the matter under discussion this evening; the issuing of dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling—which matter, I understand has been ruled out of order—and ways and means of reducing the internal debt so greatly increased by deflation.

At the outset let me say I regret that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) saw fit this afternoon to raise a point of order in regard to this resolution, referring to the amendment moved in the early part of this session by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I submit that that amendment was entirely different from the resolution we are now discussing, which refers to a specific matter, the issuing of dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling. The hon. member's amendment was to the motion for approval of the trade agreement between Canada and Great Britain and sought to add the following words:

—and subject also to establishment of parity of the Canadian dollar with the British pound.

This afternoon the right hon. gentleman suggested that certain observations had been made by hon. members on this side of the house during the debate in connection with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod. Upon looking up Hansard of November 2, 1932, I found that the only observation made specifically in connection with the amendment was made by a member of the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). The minister went out of his way to commend not only the hon. member but the purport and nature of his amendment. I should like to quote from his remarks as follows:

On the other hand, I could cite a number of addresses that have been exceedingly helpful, exceedingly instructive, and I might say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Coote) that in the main his own address was, in my opinion, a reasonable and valuable contribution to the study of the problem.

And again in the same debate:

I think we should first dispose of this motion,—

The motion to implement an Imperial conference agreement——which merely gives the house the opportunity to proceed with the study of the agreements in detail, and then the proposal of my hon. friend could very properly be considered as a major problem in itself.

With all due respect to the right hon. gentleman I suggest that all that part (b) of this resolution asks is that this house study the question as a major problem. The minister then continued:

Speaking for myself alone, I can assure him that I am prepared to give this matter the most careful consideration and study. I am anxious to cooperate with any hon. member in the study and possible achievement of a solution of this problem.

Nothing was said on this side of the house until the vote was taken later on the same day. We have a somewhat anomalous situation; on the second of November, a member of the government tells the hon. member for Macleod that he welcomes a study of this major problem of placing our dollar upon a parity with the pound sterling, yet to-day when an hon. member to my left seeks to have the banking and commerce committee do the same thing, he is met with a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood things. We have voted already upon the matter this session and I raised the point of order in order to prevent duplication. Otherwise there would be no end to the discussion in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My point is that we have not. Unfortunately, this afternoon I was not allowed to give my views on the point of order. On November 2 the hon. member for Macleod moved an amendment to the motion of the Prime Minister that the Imperial conference agreements be implemented. The words, as I recall them, were "subject to the establishment of a parity with the pound." This clause (b) of this resolution is something quite different.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not know whether the hon. member is quite in order in discussing the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not quarrelling with the ruling. I am just explaining why I was not allowed to establish my point of order. Clause (b) reads:

The issuing dominion notes sufficient to depreciate our dollar to the level of the pound sterling.

In other words, clause (b) is specific. The other was only generic in the conclusion which the hon. member for Macleod sought to establish—parity with the pound. I maintain that clause (b) of the present resolution and the amendment of November 2 are entirely different.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Might I deal for just two or three minutes with the resolution before the house? It asks the banking and commerce committee practically to deal with the financial structure of the Dominion of Canada. As far as I have been able to analyze modern economic thought in this and other countries, there are at the present time two main schools—and we have them possibly in every party in the house—dealing with the fundamental causes of the present crisis. There is the school which was termed by Edie in his great book Banking and Prosperity, the school of the industrial equilibrists; that is the school which thinks tariffs are at the root of everything with regard to trade. There is, on the other hand, the monetary school of thought, which is very prevalent at the present time and gaining in strength, that believes the present economic crisis is primarily a monetary one. My opinion, for all it may be worth, is that these two schools are not irreconcilable; you can dovetail the economic thought of the school of industrial equilibrium into the economic thought of the school of monetary reform. It is an economic axiom that the value of your dollar must in the final analysis depend on trade, but when your trade is locked and stifled and is not allowed, on account of the economic policies and narrow nationalism pursued by the various nations, to ride free, you can do much by way of monetary solution to override the difficulty inherent in the trade policies at present being pursued.

In this evening's paper I saw an announcement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, wherein he suggested the program for the pending conference in Washington between the government of the United States and the government of Great Britain, and dealt with six major problems. Four of the six, as I recall them, dealt with the monetary structure of the empire and of the United States, so that when the Prime Minister of Great Britain outlines the problems that are to be studied—and I think the agenda is the same as that which is to be studied at the world economic conference—we should have very soon a pronouncement of policy from the administration in regard to what submissions the Prime Minister is going to make on behalf of Canada before the world economic conference in May.

What happened at the imperial conference? We had great hope of what Canada might do and say but—and I do not think I am saying anything radically wrong in suggesting this—the monetary policy of this dominion was made subservient to the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the final report of the committee is practically an acceptance of the main submissions of the chancellor. Let me suggest this to my right hon. friend: Although the main economic doctrine of the mother country may, so far as the main economic principles are concerned, apply to Canada, the economy of Great Britain is in radical ways different from that of Canada, because Great Britain for years and years has been in control of the international market. What is the situation in this country? I am not blaming any government particularly for this, but we are to-day financially economic vassals of the great republic to the south of us. The tragedy of the situation, as I see it, is that various governments, according to their own well considered policies and doctrines, have been trying to orient the trade of Canada—and I am not criticizing them for that—to the empire and to Great Britain. Yet, when they try to tie our financial policy to that of England and the empire, our greatest critic is the Prime Minister who would like to be termed the foremost champion of imperial preference and trade. For one, I am convinced that you cannot separate financial policy from trade policy; that is, the policy in regard to our external trade from that in regard to our international obligations. Recently we have been considering the crushing debt which we owe to the republic to the south of us. The Prime Minister has throughout the country been making speeches—and I am not criticizing him for that; I am only stating facts—in which he has been saying to the people of Canada: "We have honoured all our maturing obligations in gold." Is that exactly true?

Mr. BENNETT: I said, in terms of the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In terms of the contract. That must be nearer the truth, because the terms of the contract actually call upon the nation which is to honour the contract to meet its payments in gold or pay them in services or go through a process of refunding, so that Canada has not and cannot meet her maturing obligations in gold. How could we do so with our gold production last year amounting to only $73,000,000, and with our tremendous debts payable in gold by our federal government, our provincial governments, the Canadian National Railways and public corporations? I find that our gold coverage last Thursday was 39·3 per cent, or roughly $70,000,000 for a note issue of $180,000,000. Where is your sound money? This reminds me of the Latin phrase, Vox et praeterea nil, or "sound and nothing more." Where is the sound money when I produce my dollar bill for which I am entitled to get payment in gold? Where was our sound money when Calgary, the right hon. gentleman's constituency, asked for gold for her good Canadian notes? Could Calgary obtain Canadian gold? We have no sound money according to the tenets of the right hon. gentleman.

Last year he made a very fine statement. He said that we have roughly $50,000,000 guaranteed by a partial coverage of 25 per cent in gold, $49,000,000 protected dollar for dollar in gold and the rest, $71,000,000, I think it was then—I am not sure of the exact figures now—covered, as he said, by the security, character and integrity, of what? Of the Canadian people. I refer my right hon. friend to the finest economic report ever made in any country, the famous Macmillan report of two years ago. The right hon. gentleman has the pleasure of being very well acquainted with the brilliant and distinguished chairman of that committee. Sir Josiah Stamp said in regard to it that a committee of such brilliance, ability and distinction never before functioned in any land. What was the finding of that committee in regard to this great question of gold coverage? One of the specific findings of the Macmillan committee, implementing the findings of the gold committee of the League of Nations, was that a gold basis was no longer required for internal currency. That is not the fly-by-night theory of my hon. friends to my left or the radical opinion of some of us who sit on this side; it is the well-founded opinion of my right hon. friend's own brilliant economic friends in Great Britain, that you must dissociate once and for all your domestic currency from your external obligations. What does that mean? If the right hon. gentleman told us here, as he did in April of last year, that outside that $99,000,000 the consideration was the security of the Canadian nation, and if the Macmillan committee said that you can have a safe note issue amounting to one-fifth of your total bank deposits, what does that mean? If your economic policy in Canada is sound, it means, according to the scientifically economic analysis at which that committee arrived, we could have on the same basis of the security and integrity of the Canadian people, a note issue in this country of one-fifth of our total bank deposits, or one-fifth of $2,000,000,000, as of last year, or $400,000,000. It would mean $200,000,000 more than the $180,000,000 which you had according to the return which I got from the Minister of Finance yesterday. That is not printing money. That is simply arriving at a careful policy of a managed currency, on a scientific basis, as promulgated by the ablest economic committee that ever sat in modern history. We cannot be blamed if we see some merits in a careful policy such as that.

I do not like the word inflation. I think it is a dangerous word, and inflation a dangerous policy. But what have we had in Canada during the last few years? Under the craziest financial structure in modern history, through the Finance Act, we have had inflation in this country under the Conservatives from 1914 onwards, and during the Liberal regime from 1921 to 1929. We have had a modified policy of inflation during the last three years, under the terms of the Finance Act, and at the same time, strange to say, we had the biggest deflation in the history of Canada, caused by what has been mentioned by some of the speakers here to-day—the contraction of credits by the banks of this dominion.

That brings me to the point I wish particularly to emphasize to-night. Any policy in regard to currency, any policy in regard to credit control, must be built around a new central organization which is going to regulate the whole policy of banking in this dominion. I do not think any party should go unduly to the left or be unduly Conservative in financial policy. I believe there is as much danger in uncontrolled inflation as in adhering to this fictitious policy of sound money which the Prime Minister and his government consistently advocate. The safe and sound and sensible policy is to take the middle way, to establish a central organization of experts enjoying the confidence of the government and of the Canadian people; because the day has gone by in Canada when the people will tolerate a condition under which the ordinary mercantile functions of Canadian banks shall be associated with the policy of banking credit and financial control which the banks now possess. The control of credit must be taken away from the banking institutions of Canada. When I say that, although I have the greatest admiration for the record of our Canadian banks, I would ask, why should they not have a wonderful record and be marvellously secure? There are only nine or ten of them now where formerly there were twenty-five, and they enjoy the biggest financial monopoly in the history of modern civilization, with the entire credit of the dominion treasury behind their every move. So why should they not have done well?

My right hon. friend, dealing in Toronto with this question of bringing the dollar on a parity with the pound, asked how it could be done? He knows quite well how it could be done. It has not been difficult for other nations to do—

Mr. BENNETT: Unless they were insolvent or short of currency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Prime Minister said that there was no need to go on a parity with the pound unless you were insolvent or short of currency. Neither one nor the other obtains in Canada, he said. I am not so sure. I fear much, and I hesitate to say this, that within the next few months the right hon. gentleman will hear from some of the western provinces which may have to ask for very generous terms in order to meet their obligations, or else be faced with defaulting on their bonds. We cannot afford to pay, and we cannot pay, our present debt and our present interest charges in the Dominion of Canada, and the sooner we wake up to the facts of the situation the better for us. Our interest on the national debt was $12,000,000 before the war. It was $135,000,000 last year, and this year it is $137,500,000. There are two and a half billions of national loans, including funded debt, railways and other operations, $7,582,000,000 of obligations, of bonds payable in gold, and the entire amount of gold in the different countries of the world amounts to between $11,000,000,000 and $12,000,000,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: We owe over eight billion dollars in bonds.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I accept the correction of my hon. friend. Perhaps the other figure included private corporations. The total gold supply in the world is between eleven and twelve billion dollars, and how can we possibly meet our maturing obligations in gold? It cannot be done. The greatest necessity before parliament is to meet the situation of our public debt and our private debt with courage and vision. The Australian people met the situation last year, and we must do it. We must write down our debt.

I advocate a big conversion loan in this dominion. We must summon up the courage and the patriotism of the Canadian people, and I would also advocate that earnest consideration be given to modifying our financial policy by the issue of dominion currency. It was done during the war. Why not do it now in the war against poverty, misery and unemployment which we are waging to-day? The security of this dominion is as good as ever it was.

I also suggest that we commence a wholesale cut in interest rates, commencing with savings bank deposits, and have a cut right across in the interest rates charged by mortgage, trust and loan companies. Let us have a debt and interest readjustment upon the principle of equalization of sacrifice throughout the dominion. The farmers have already practically sacrificed their all. Almost all the lumber companies in my province are on the verge of bankruptcy. The producer has paid his price. Why not let the moneyholder now come under the principle of equalization of sacrifice in this great crisis?

So I appeal to my right hon. friend to be good enough some day in the near future to enunciate to this house the policy he intends to present to the world economic conference on behalf of Canada. I suggest to him that he give most careful consideration to the advisability of a great national conversion loan, a voluntary loan by preference, but compulsory, if that is necessary. It was compulsory in Australia to the extent of seventeen and a half million pounds. The remarkable thing about the situation in Australia was this. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) told us the other evening that the financial situation in Australia was much worse than in Canada, but here is the record of Australia. Out of a total of 556 million pounds, there was converted immediately by application 490 million pounds; by effluxion of time 48½ million pounds, leaving only 17½ million pounds to be converted compulsorily. The compulsory element is to be regretted if it can be done voluntarily. The point I am trying to impress upon the house as forcibly as I can is that in my humble judgment we cannot meet our present indebtedness, federal, provincial and municipal, unless we summon up the entire strength and resources of the Canadian people. It is no use talking of a policy of sound money so long as I cannot get gold for my dollar when I present it to the bank. Suspend, if you like, the redemption of dominion notes in gold.

The question has been asked, how can we establish parity with the pound? It can be done in two ways. It can be done by giving up the policy of unnecessarily buttressing the Canadian dollar to keep it as close to the American dollar as possible, which has been followed by this administration for the last two and a half years.

Mr. BENNETT: We have not done any such thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has been done either deliberately or as a result of the financial policy of this government. That has been the result in any event. If that is not successful, follow out the scientific analysis of the Macmillan committee in England, and go in for a policy of a managed currency, which is the distinct and deliberate policy recommended by that committee to the British government. Have the British people suffered from abandoning the gold standard? They may be asked as the price of an international debt settlement to consider returning to the gold standard, but I venture to suggest that such a return will not be considered by the British nation for many, many years to come because, after all the juggling by international financiers, as is so well described by Einzig in his various books, and which continued from 1922 to 1931, Britain has an acute and painful knowledge of what happened in the realms of international finance. She has survived the shock and is to-day on the upgrade, and I believe she will be the first country to emerge from the present depression. Why? Because her economic advisers have told her that the present economic crisis is primarily a monetary crisis. I tell my friends who believe that tariffs are the only panacea for all the woes of the present economic upheaval, you must have the two factors working hand in hand; you must readjust your financial structure and recast the powers of the banks, give them full scope in ordinary mercantile pursuits to follow in security and integrity the banking practices they have so well developed, but take from them, once and for all, the control of credit and currency in the Dominion of Canada and the power over the note issue. We are living in changing times. I am sure if my right hon. friend would give up his attachment to the fallacy and fiction of "sound money" and deal immediately and fearlessly with the tremendous problem of meeting our debt and interest obligations, he would have the grateful regard of the Canadian people.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not rise to proceed with the debate. The Minister of Finance is prepared to deal with this resolution, but he is indisposed. If when the motion is again called he is not in his seat I shall take his place and make a statement. In the meantime, in order to preserve that situation, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

PROPOSED USE OF SURPLUS WHEAT FOR RELIEF—SALE ON LONG TERM CREDITS TO DISTRESSED COUNTRIES

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville) moved:

Whereas unemployment, scanty clothing and hunger throughout the land continue to be all too prevalent; and

Whereas, this persistent economic depression not only adds to the growing relief requirements in many centres, but also subtracts from the number of voluntary contributors, many of whom are now feeling these social efforts growing more and more beyond their capacity to carry;

Therefore, be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this parliament the government of Canada should place a sufficient quantity of our surplus wheat stocks, at the disposal of the Red Cross, welfare bureaus and other similar organizations, to supplement and more fully take care of the food requirements of the unemployed, the poor and the hungry throughout Canada.

And be it further resolved, that the government of Canada take such steps as are necessary and expedient to explore the possibility and practicability of selling on long term credits a substantial quantity of our embarassing wheat carry-over to China, or any other available country where poverty, hunger and misery prevail.

He said: I think this motion is quite capable of being understood, and there is nothing original about it. It has the advantage of having been tried in our neighbouring republic and found quite satisfactory, and no reason occurs to me why it may not prove equally satisfactory in Canada, with such variations as may be found necessary to suit our peculiar requirements. I suppose there is not an hon. member in this house who during the last two or three years has not been confronted with this question: How do you account for it that in this land of plenty people are in want and going to bed hungry? I used to be somewhat provoked at that question myself. Last summer when I was in the elevator in our town I found a farmer expatiating very vigorously on this situation, taking the ground that someone was to blame for it, though he did not mention who that somebody was. He enunciated the doctrine we hear so frequently, that the difficulty is not in production but in distribution. I made a proposal to my brother farmer: How would it be if you and I should start out on this new method of distribution? The next load of wheat we bring to town suppose we start distributing it among the villagers, some of whom are bound to be hard up this coming winter. About twenty-five bushels would feed a family of five; one load of seventy-five bushels would take care of three families. You try that out with your next load, and I will do the same with mine, and see how it works. "Oh," he said, "I cannot afford to do that." "Well," I said, "that is about the way with me; the cheaper wheat is the more I have to sell to get a bit of money."

That is true of the individual, but it seems to me there are certain further duties that devolve upon the national government. I know its burdens are heavy; our provinces and some of our municipalities are also near the end of their tether. The Dominion government has done remarkable work in the way of relief, first in one form, then another, and now in direct relief. So have the provinces and the municipalities.

In the United States they had accumulated a large surplus of wheat through the federal farm board and the stabilization committee. They carried that load openly, everyone knew about it, and finally it became such a tremendous burden that they gave a lot of it away to get rid of it, distributed a large quantity through the Red Cross and similar organizations and sold some on long term credits to Germany, China and other countries. I think it is practically all gone now, so one of the great burdens on the market has been removed, although without appreciable effect as yet upon the price. However, if we follow suit and some other country does the same, eventually we shall get this great burden of carry-over wheat removed, without which we cannot have a restoration of prices. What better purpose can we put it to than to help out people less fortunate than ourselves? The burden is weighing very heavily on the voluntary givers. In this city, in which surely you will not find a larger percentage of out-of-works than elsewhere, over $130,000 was contributed last fall to take care of the poor and hungry, and so all over the country. Wherever I have been I find there are getting to be more and more to feed and clothe and less and less people able to provide for them; therefore the burden is getting heavier on both individuals and governments. Well, it occurred to me, why could not we follow the example of the United States in the distribution of this surplus wheat?—seeing we have followed their example in acquiring it, in a laudable desire to hold up the market. Possibly that object was attained to some extent, but the fact is that wheat was grown in such volume that it has become an embarrassment to every country that carries it; it hangs like a millstone around our market's neck.

However, the amount distributed to organizations such as the Red Cross and welfare bureaus and relief organizations would be comparatively small. We have ten million people in Canada; say there are one million on relief—there are not now, but possibly there will be in a year—it would only take about five million bushels to provide them with all the bread they require. It would relieve the local authorities, however, to that extent. That has been done in the United States and found satisfactory and I see no reason why it should not prove satisfactory in Canada.

Then a further proposition is to sell or barter to countries that are less fortunate than ourselves substantial quantities. That will appreciably reduce our carry-over and tend to bring the price back to normal. I mentioned China in the resolution, but it need not be confined to China; why not India—they sometimes have famines. I understand that in northeast China 25,000 people were flooded out over a year ago and are largely on relief.

The objection has been taken that farmers in other countries where we sell this wheat would complain that we are flooding them with cheap wheat. I think that should be avoided as much as possible; it might be sold in such parts of China as are on relief as a result of that great flood. The same applies to India. And what would be the objection to selling some to Russia? We have been selling some through the regular channels of trade. A year ago there were substantial shipments from the Pacific coast to Russia. No objection was made to that, and I do not think there would be to this. Russia is reported to be short of wheat not only for bread purposes but for seed. I do not think it would be good policy to sell wheat on long terms to Russia for seed to compete against ourselves; that might seem too much like turning the other cheek, nevertheless, if they are short of wheat for flour or flour itself to feed the people why should we not supply it either on barter or on long term credits? Do you not think we would be more likely to make a friend of Russia? I take the ground, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot solve this problem of wheat without the co-operation of that country. We cannot do very much in the way of reducing acreage or following any other systematic plan designed to reduce production to something like the consumption requirements of the world unless Russia is a party to the arrangement. Without raising that controversial question of putting an embargo on some of the products of that country, do you not think Russia would pull better with Canada if we in a friendly way cooperated with her for a change, instead of continuing our present policy?

Mr. BENNETT: Who broke the world wheat market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never knew Russia to break it as much as we did ourselves or to sell wheat as cheaply as we did. Let me answer further my right hon. friend: Every country in the world making a sale of wheat to-day has to do a measure of dumping; it has to beat out the other fellow in regard to both price and quality. You have to make a market by selling quality at a price the buyer cannot resist; in other words it is a buyers' market to-day with all that that implies. Russia may have done that at one time; I do not doubt but what she did, but we have done it since. That is the unfortunate part of the whole situation.

Let me enumerate some of the advantages of compliance with this motion. At least it will be a humanitarian way of disposing of our surplus. We should not destroy our wheat, as some countries are said to have destroyed their overages; I would utterly oppose anything of that kind. If it is axiomatic that this surplus must be substantially reduced before there can be any restoration of prices to anything like normal, surely there must be some way by which we can get rid of our wheat. For the sake of argument, Mr. Speaker, I will admit that if present prospects materialize there is a chance that we may reduce this overage somewhat by next fall. The United States crop seems to be very indifferent, and Russia is in the same position. The Argentine and Australia probably will get rid of their carryovers by next fall, or hope to, but I do not think that will apply to us. Probably we will have the largest surplus we have ever had, though some people estimate otherwise. Perhaps I am not sufficiently optimistic; competent men have stated during the last two or three years that soon we would see a better day with regard to wheat prices. Well, they have been getting better the wrong way; they have been getting no better fast. We have reached the point now where we are giving away five bushels of No. 1 wheat for a dollar, and it is time we thought seriously about this huge carry-over. The whole trouble with our calculations in this regard is that just when we think Russia will cease to export wheat because of her home requirements, she starts to export; she becomes an exporter of wheat when it is well known that later in the same year she will have to import wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: While the population dies of starvation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is right, but she is forced to adopt that course. That puts all our figuring astray, and I have no doubt that some other unexpected contingencies would appear in other countries as well, as they so often do.

a friend of such country upon whom we may be glad to call some day for a market. These countries needing wheat at intervals are the countries with immense populations and an immense capacity for consumption. When they get stable governments, as I hope they will some day soon, they will become great consumers of our products. In the meantime let us cast our bread upon the waters, and in a few years it may return unto us in the form of valuable markets.

In the second place, this method will remove the reproach—which I feel quite as much as though I were a member of the government—that all the public men in the country cannot find some way to answer this everlasting question of why distribution is not more perfect when production is so wonderful. If this house will adopt this proposal we can remove in some measure at least that reproach. I am not wedded to this particular method; anything better will suit me, but let us do something that will reduce our carry-over and at the same time help meet our increasing requirements with respect to relief all over this dominion This plan will create a market for several million bushels of wheat; it will lessen the embarrassing carry-over; it will supply the railways with additional business. That is perhaps a small item, but it is of importance. In addition, this will lessen the demand on voluntary contributions.

Those are the advantages I see in this method, Mr. Speaker. Now let us look at some of the disadvantages. In the first place, it will be abused, but unfortunately that is always the case. Every good thing like this is more or less abused. It does not matter whether it is relief or seed grain; I have never seen any government capable of carrying on anything of this kind so perfectly that some little abuse has not crept in. When you analyze those abuses, however, and compare them with the volume of business done, you see that they do not amount to very much after all. Recently we all have read in the press what has been going on in a certain town in this province. That sort of thing will happen, but are we to withhold help from the people in need because two or three localities may abuse that help? My experience, which covers many years, has been that you will always find abuses when anything is being given out by the government, and I suppose that always will be the case until we attain that high degree of civilization to which my friends to my left refer so often. We hope and believe that day will yet come, but it is not here yet.

Another objection is that whole wheat cannot be disposed of by some relief bureaus, nor flour either, as many relief applicants insist on ready baked bread. We are not committed to the distribution of whole wheat; it may be distributed in the form of flour, but whole wheat has certain advantages not possessed by flour. It is a healthful food and can be converted into a larger variety of cooked foods. Again, I was met with the argument that in many districts the people buy their bread and do not know how to bake it, so that neither whole wheat nor ordinary flour would be of use to them. I am afraid that is true, but I think it is about time people learned how to bake bread and many other household requirements all over again. To-day I inquired at the old Knox church, which is now used as the administrative centre of the relief bureau in this city, and which was thronged with people applying for their orders for supplies. I found that the National Council of Women and other similar organizations have started instruction classes designed to help those who wanted to learn how to bake bread and do other kinds of cooking. The practice of buying bread and of purchasing other foods in small cartons and cans became general because people could afford to do so, and many of the old practices of home cooking have almost disappeared. I think this is a time to revive many home duties similar to what we did during the war. We should start as many of these old practices as possible, giving the people a new zest in life and affording them some employment as well. Let them make their own bread. If the women have so many children that they have no time to bake, then let the old man learn how to do it. He has so much time on his hands now that he can tell the government and everyone else how to run things. Well, let him get busy and learn how to make bread. Many of us in our bachelor days made bread out in the west, and what man has done man can do.

Another objection made is that people are not familiar with the uses to which whole wheat can be put. During the war the government distributed many leaflets and publications showing the various uses to which certain foodstuffs could be put; they pointed out a variety of dishes that could be made from rhubarb, for instance, and fish. The same could be done with respect to this commodity. You can make muffins or porridge or coffee and many other commodities that would be very healthful.

Another objection sometimes heard is that it would interfere with the volume of business done by local bakers. That is a real objection, because the bakers are doing this business now; but it seems to me that the interests of the many will have to be regarded as paramount and will have to take precedence over interests of the few. I do not think the bakers would object very much. They have a pretty good business, I fancy, and if they lost this business knowing that it was for the benefit of the many I do not think they would object strenuously. I am trying to discover all the objections that can be advanced and to weigh the advantages against the disadvantages.

A gentleman in the west who held the position of trade representative in China drew my attention to the fact that the Chinese papers within the last six months or year have been complaining on behalf of the farmers of China that that country was being made a dumping ground for American and Canadian wheat at such low prices that their own farmers were being injured.

Mr. BENNETT: And Australia principally.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. I suppose there is something in it, but it is one of those things we seldom think about. We look on China as a far distant country in which half the people, as I am informed, scarcely know where the next meal is coming from. Nevertheless they have enough farmers to grow more wheat annually than Canada does, and they are wondering just how far the wheat growing world will go in its effort to make a dumping ground of China. As I have indicated, however, there is no reason why this wheat could not be directed into those areas which are flooded out, and if China does not want it perhaps India could take it, or Russia might want it. So that that difficulty could be got over. You can always find difficulties if you look for them, but we should consider the advantages that accrue to any proposal such as this. We cannot disabuse our minds entirely of some selfish ideas, and naturally we want to help our own people first. The whole movement as I see it is primarily to get rid of this ghastly carry-over and to bring about normal conditions and favourable opportunities in regard to price and at the same time help others. After you have done that it will not be long before the farmers will be making a little money and the banks will again feel like making loans, because the people will be able to pay them back. Certainly you cannot pay a loan to the bank with wheat at 20 cents, which is the figure that prevailed in western Saskatchewan. I believe it is about 25 cents now. As soon as you pay a loan to the bank it creates a feeling of confidence, so that the banks will begin lending and the mortgage companies will not worry you until at least you are more on your feet. Business will start to move, credit will be restored and you will give the railways profitable business. Some of our wheat will not move under our present freight rates. We are not asking for any increased freight rate for export wheat but if it gets lower they will have to, because the wheat simply will not move into consumption.

As regards the destination of the wheat, I do not care where it goes to. I would not consign it to the place we speak of when in anger, but I object to its being wasted when there are hungry people at home or abroad.

A certain amount of propaganda has been indulged in, and properly so, on behalf of reduced acreage. Under the export quota basis, which will involve another system of oversight on the part of the three provinces that grow so much wheat, it will not be an easy matter to carry out. It depends on the cooperation of four or five other countries with ourselves. That always takes time, but this other matter of salesmanship is one between ourselves at home and the individual country with which we transact business. I hesitate at reducing acreage by deliberate arrangement until we first adopt the two methods I have mentioned, of feeding our own people bountifully, thus relieving the local people of some of their contributions, and also relieving the government of some of their embarrassing carry-overs. That should be done first, I think, before there is any systematic attempt to reduce acreage. As a matter of fact acreage will be reduced to some extent anyway this spring under the ruthless principle of the survival of the fittest. We have come to that stage where many farmers in the regional areas find that it just pays in a good year to grow grain but does not pay in a bad year. These areas are being closed to cultivation. They are left to grow grass and weeds and many farmers are unable under their own steam to put a crop in. Acreage reduction would have happened sooner had it not been for the large areas of newly settled land in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan and to a lesser extent in northern Manitoba, coming into development to take the place of the southern areas going out of cultivation.

The point I want to make is this, that until we do get rid of the overage by these or other means there will not be a very forceful argument for a systematic cooperative policy with other countries for reduction of acreage. I suppose we all have a little superstition in our make-up; I know I have. There is a superstition among farmers that if you go out and kill a litter of young pigs, on the ground that it does not pay to raise them, if you kill them at birth, you will not have luck with your next litter. I do not know whether there is anything in that, but certainly I should not like to try the experiment of destroying the wheat overage. I would rather sell it on generous terms to anyone who would enable us to get it out of here so that it might do some good instead of a lot of harm to ourselves where it is now.

I hope I have couched my remarks in such language that neither the Prime Minister nor any other member will be offended. I could not help referring to Russia because it is I think the key to the whole situation, and I referred to it as mildly as I knew how. I have no doubt the government realizes, as we all do, that we are facing a serious situation in Canada, as well as the world over, and if I can contribute the smallest quota to help matters in the way I propose or otherwise I am satisfied. But even if you blot this out and give me something that looks better, I will put up both my hands for it. We are continually being faced with the odium—we get it in the press, from the pulpits and on the streets—that as legislators we do not know how to get this abundance of goods to those who need it most.

If the house were in committee of the whole I should be very glad to answer any questions, but I invite a full discussion on this matter. This stigma should be removed. Notwithstanding all the assistance which has been given, this great pyramid of carry-over wheat has grown until it is at the point of drowning us. Did you ever see, Mr. Speaker, a bunch of cats thrown into a stream with stones around their necks? Those stones were meant to act as sinkers, and they generally succeeded in sinking the cats. We have a buyers' market millstone around our necks just as effective, and it is dragging us as sellers down to the very depths.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Motherwell) upon the very excellent address he has made, an address which reflects credit not only upon his humanity but upon his discernment. Nothing is more encouraging to those who at this time have to carry an unduly heavy load than to have those normally politically opposed offer suggestions as to how best the difficulties can be met. The fine spirit manifested by the hon. gentleman in his address is, I think, very satisfying and pleasing to all of us. He has had much experience; he has seen the growth and development of our country; he has seen a great territory which once produced an abundance of wealth become almost as desolate as the desert; he has seen people who had excellent homes—notwithstanding the statements made, not many of them according to the census returns were covered by mortgages; things were not as the advocates of blue ruin would have us understand—find those homes rendered almost valueless.

Last year when the federal government found that a very large part of the population of the province of Saskatchewan, a population which had been well-to-do, had had three successive years without a crop, we treated the matter as a national disaster, just as in times gone by we had voted money to assist in caring for those who suffered from disasters in the islands of the sea and in far distant foreign parts. We regarded it as a national disaster; and it may strike some hon. members as amazing that there was less said about this than would have been expected. The government has been very sparing with propaganda in dealing with this matter. It has not advertised what it has been endeavouring to do; it has been doing it without advertising. Over 300,000 people in the province of Saskatchewan were being cared for by the federal government during a part of last year. We were not desirous of publishing that to the world, but we were desirous of having this house know that in conformity with its unanimous opinion, its view so strongly expressed that a national disaster should be treated as such, we had set in motion the machinery which gave, shall I say, at least comfort, clothing, food and fuel to that population. It was a great achievement which reflected credit upon those responsible for the administration, and I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman has seen what has been done.

Assistance has been given in other provinces. One of the forms of assistance suggested last year was that we should purchase a quantity of wheat which would be milled to ensure plenty of flour being available for those who were in want. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do that a diet of boiled wheat is not one upon which humanity long lives; it brings about physical diseases and disasters which are apparent very quickly. The small mills in the communities in Saskatchewan felt that they could take care of the situation by grinding the wheat in a manner which would be satisfactory to the population that lived nearby. A large quantity of flour was purchased and distributed under conditions which I think have not been subject to criticism. This was distributed to the needy population of the western provinces, of Saskatchewan in particular.

The answer, therefore, to the first portion of the hon. gentleman's resolution is this:

All the wheat that was necessary, nay, more than could be used by the needy population and others in western Canada, has been supplied by the Canadian producer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the right hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. BENNETT: It follows therefore that it would not be possible to sell more wheat; the Red Cross or any other organization would not make a further distribution of wheat possible because wheat in the form of flour has been distributed so that every person has had plenty. It is quite true that in the United States the federal board did distribute, I think, 85,000,000 bushels of wheat through the Red Cross to be used for milling purposes and for distribution, but unfortunately, according to the last report, the farm board lost the huge sum of half a billion dollars. No person has received more than he could consume and no person here has received less. I submit that nothing that could be done in that direction would in any sense lessen the overages or the carry-over of wheat in this country at this time.

In so far as it is possible to give effect to the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman, I assure him that they had been given effect to before he made them; they had been acted upon by those charged with responsibility for relief. To a large extent the wheat has been milled at the local mills scattered throughout the province. My memory does not serve me as to the exact number of mills engaged in this work, but it is quite substantial. In the first place a contract was given to the large mills upon the ground that they would be able to discharge the obligation of distribution perhaps a little more readily than it otherwise could be done, but in other cases the local mills are taking care of the situation.

I fear that nothing that could be done in this direction would sell an additional bushel of wheat, would bring comfort where there is any lack of it, supply food where it is required; in other words, these things could not be done to a larger extent than is being done already. I say that because I desire again to pay tribute to the fine spirit which the hon. gentleman has manifested and the earnest effort which he has made to find some solution of what he regards as a pressing and difficult problem. But I assure him that the action which has been taken is such as to give effect to the very views which he has expressed.

Upon the second point I am bound to say that last year there came to me personally an offer—whether it was a bona fide offer or not, I cannot say—that we should arrange for the purchase of large quantities of wheat to be shipped to China, and the price proposed was twenty-nine cents at Vancouver. We did not seriously entertain the proposal; for, if long credits are to be granted, obviously they would be better granted to those who are not engaged in war. That, at least, is the thought we had in our minds. In addition to that, if long credits are to be granted, they should not be granted on terms fixing the price of the commodity at the figure I have indicated. Therefore, so far as China is concerned, we did not make any sale, for the government of Canada has no wheat to sell. It has no farm board that is the owner of wheat to be disposed of in any part of the world. All it could do would be to provide the means whereby the wheat could be purchased from the Canadian cooperative wheat sellers; for they and they only have any large quantities of wheat representing the carry-over to which the hon. gentleman referred.

Other communities made proposals to those who had wheat to sell. In some cases, at least so I am informed, they proposed to purchase wheat on long term credits and in some instances reasonable credits were given. But I was very glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that in the name of humanity it was not to be expected that we would supply seed grain to Russia on long term credits to enable her to destroy the price of wheat in the future as she had done in the past. That would probably be agreed upon by everyone. The hon. gentleman, who perhaps has followed this matter with much greater interest than any other hon. member, said at once that necessity compelled the offering of wheat by Russia at a price which constituted dumping. I have already told the house of my own knowledge of what took place some years ago in connection with the price of wheat. Whatever else may be alleged by those who desire to support a position, this must be admitted, that the attitude taken by the soviets in the disposition of wheat was responsible for the primary break in price. From that there can be no escape; it is a matter of common knowledge. It can be ascertained as accurately as one can ascertain anything the correctness of which he desires to demonstrate. It is true, as the hon. gentleman has said, that as a result of that action Canadian wheat prices suffered, because Canadians offered wheat at similar or lower prices. Necessity, the law of supply and demand, fixed again the price, but when you have a commodity offered for sale without regard to the cost of production and competitors endeavouring to sell the same article, they must accept the market price that is established by those who, as I have stated, sell without regard to the cost of production. That, unfortunately, is true throughout.

Just let me mention three commodities in regard to which that has happened in this country—wheat, timber, fish. When I heard the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) this evening in his admirable address, make reference to the bankrupt condition of the timber operators of British Columbia, my mind at once reverted to that contract which was offered a few weeks ago in Great Britain, whereby it was provided that, whatever fall in price may come about, Russia will go still further and thereby, regardless of competition as such, regardless of the cost of production as such, destroy the possibility of a market being made in Great Britain for British Columbia timber.

As regards fish, there are within sound of my voice hon. gentlemen who are thoroughly familiar with the situation. When the hon. gentleman added a rider to his suggestion with respect to the sale of Russian wheat, I thought he was taking a correct course, if he would pardon me for saying so and not understand me as commending his remarks to the attention of the house. The position is this: There has been overproduction of wheat in the world. If I were inclined to do so I think I could explain to the house the reason for this. Wheat was a commodity that during the war was capable of being converted into new wealth on perhaps the easiest terms of any commodity in the world. The grower ploughed, harrowed, sowed, reaped and sold, and in one season new wealth was produced on a very large scale, because the prices paid for wheat during the war were, as the hon. gentleman said, very high. For some reason it was thought after the war that conditions that prevailed during the war would be continued and wheat would be supplied by Canada, Australia and the Argentine in increasing quantities to the former warring nations that were then at peace. But, alas, the fact is that in practically every country in Europe that had been engaged in the war, they began to devise methods, by the use of chemical fertilizers and otherwise, whereby they might increase their production of wheat, and at the same time they imposed high tariffs against importations of wheat from other producing countries. The result was that in one year France, as hon. gentlemen know, exported 15,000 tons of wheat to Great Britain, thus breaking the Canadian market there. The Danubian provinces sold large quantities of wheat to nearby territory; Hungary was an exporting country and even Germany produced more than she required. The consequence was that markets that had heretofore been available for Canadian wheat were no longer available. Then came the situation to which I have just referred, so far as Russia was concerned. Regardless of the wants of her people, regardless of the necessity of the preservation of them from hunger and starvation, wheat which could be easily converted into money on the English market was rushed there and sold at a price that bore no relation to the cost of production, the result being that all the rest of the world suffered. As regards Australia, where wheat is sold in an entirely different manner from Canadian wheat, where it is all bagged, and is somewhat softer in quality than much of our wheat, a market was found in China and other parts of the orient. With the depreciation in currency, an increasing market is being found in Japan, because the wheat that has thus far gone to that country has been bagged wheat and not wheat in bulk such as we ship out of our elevators.

The problem that confronts the Canadian people is that propounded by the hon. gentleman, namely, the disposition of the surplus production of wheat in Canada. Last year, when the season ended, the producing countries had on hand, without any new crop, sufficient wheat to meet the entire requirements of the importing countries. It was in furtherance of the very thought which the hon. gentleman has expressed tonight that a wheat conference was held in London at which informally the Russian government was represented, and certain conclusions were reached. The hon. gentleman knows better than I that the same disposition on the part of the wheat producing countries has been expressed unofficially, as to the necessity for lessening the production and acreage. In this country the acreage could not be lessened by the action of this parliament except by resorting to export licences or methods of that kind, because it is solely a matter of property and civil rights within the purview of the provincial power. The matter has engaged the attention of the wheat producing countries of the world, the Argentine, Australia and European countries, and they have expressed the view that some action might be taken; but obviously that action, in which selfishness must play a very considerable part, is difficult to make effective because the extent to which there shall be curtailment of production is a question that is looked upon from a different angle by each of the wheat producing countries. I suppose the house is familiar with the fact that a bill recently introduced in the congress of the United States contemplates the possibility of making curtailment of acreage the test or standard by which a certain bonus is to be paid to those who restrict production. The bill has not yet passed. I suppose it is difficult to say what its fate will be, in view of the fact that the present congress will end its labours at the end of this month.

I can assure the hon. gentleman, first, that every step that can be taken to increase the consumption of Canada wheat by Canadians has been taken. It has been taken in various ways. The use of wheat in larger quantities has been impressed upon the Canadian people, and in the matter of relief it may well be said that perhaps we have been over generous in so far as the distribution of flour and wheat and agricultural products is concerned. That complaint has been made, but I assure the hon. gentleman that one of the reasons why there has been a generous disposition of agricultural products, including wheat and flour—I should say flour rather than wheat—is that it lessened the quantity of wheat which was left in the country for sale and which found and could find no market here.

Secondly, no action that could be taken through the Red Cross or any other voluntary organization could in any sense increase the quantity of wheat that could be consumed, or could in any sense lessen the quantity available for export. Lastly, every effort that could be made consistently with the maintenance of any price level at all for wheat has been made. I know of no case in which there has been the slightest hesitancy, shall I say, on the part of those who control the supplies of wheat to sell if the opportunity offered at the current market price. The only case of which I have any personal knowledge was when a suggestion was made for the sale of substantial quantities of wheat on a long credit basis but at a price several cents below the market price, and of course it would be impossible for the Canadian government to assist in the consummation of such a transaction.

I trust without going into the question of relief at this time, which I know the hon. gentleman does not expect me to do, and without amplifying the remarks I have ventured to make regarding the general principles which have governed us in the utilization of Canadian products, that the hon. gentleman will realize that no good purpose would be served by pressing the resolution beyond the purpose that has been served already of having enabled him to make clear his desire to assist in every possible way, by suggestion or otherwise, in the solution of the difficult problem that confronts the Canadian people through their overproduction of a great world necessity. I think that every purpose that can be served has been served by the address which the hon. gentleman has made. I thank him for affording the opportunity of bringing this matter to the attention of the house, and I trust that he will agree that the motion may now very properly be withdrawn.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has mentioned the proposed sale of a certain volume of wheat to China has he any information that China or her representatives in making the offer which he admits they did, and which I know they did, to buy a certain volume at 29 cents a bushel, stipulated any certain grade?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly there was a grade suggested. I have not the papers with me, but my memory is that was No. 4 or No. 5. I make that statement with a reservation, so I may be able to satisfy myself that it is correct.

Mr. VALLANCE: Was I correct in the statement I made to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night when his estimates were up that the volume suggested at the time was 50 million bushels?

Mr. BENNETT: That would not agree with my memory at the moment, but I will see if I can satisfy myself on that point. I suggested that the proposed purchaser, whom I had never seen before, communicate with those who had wheat to sell, and I did not charge my mind very seriously with all the details of the proposal. I suggested that it be put in such shape that it could be dealt with by those who had wheat to sell. I shall be very glad to look the matter up and refresh my memory. At the moment I do not think it was 50 million bushels, but it may have been.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): I have been astonished, Mr. Speaker, by the statements of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). Before this house adjourned for Christmas some statements were made in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with regard to certain relief camps in the west. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) also made reference to the same matter. Being interested in the camp in the Riding Mountain national park I felt it my duty to go out and see what the actual conditions were. I found the men in that camp employed, well fed and well taken care of, and with not a complaint of any kind whatsoever. So the statement as made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre before the Christmas adjournment was not correct.

In my trip west I went through to Victoria, and accompanied by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Plunkett) I motored forty miles to look at the Outer Point camp. I sat down and ate a meal with the men, as good a meal as you could eat any place in Canada. Those men are well cared for, well fed with food of the very best quality. I looked at the supplies in camp and found that they were of the very best. I came to Victoria island and motored out some thirty or forty miles to Langley. I went into the camp there and I can say that the statement as made in this house by the hon. member for New Westminster, when he referred to the purchase of some wheelbarrows and to certain conditions said to exist in that camp, was entirely wrong. It was also unfair in view of the conditions as I found them. I also visited with Mr. Rogers of Jasper Park, who has a large number of men in a large camp there. These men are also well taken care of and well fed. I asked the men openly if they had any complaints to make, and they said, "No, none whatever." I felt satisfied that the men were being well fed and well taken care of.

I visited the city of Winnipeg and found conditions there the same. Then I went to Toronto and went into the little mission on Yonge street, where I saw four hundred men being fed food of the very best. I asked if they had any complaints of any kind to make and they said, "None whatever." They were being well taken care of. The only thing they wanted was work, but they realized the conditions.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say that this country is doing its very best for the unemployed. It is feeding them well and taking care of them, and surely there is no reason whatever for any such motion as is now before the house. I have stated the conditions as I found them in the various camps from Ottawa to Victoria. I am sure that Canada is doing her duty on behalf of these men, and if only hon. gentlemen would visit these camps I am sure they would not make the statements they do on the floor of this house. I heard the hon. member for New Westminster speak of a machine that was in use where these men were on relief, and he said that you had to go seven or eight miles to turn it around. Mr. Speaker, you can turn that machine around on a quarter of an acre of land. I saw the machine myself, just to check up on the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster. These rash statements that are being made are all erroneous. They must be made for some purpose, and I cannot understand what the purpose is unless it is to capitalize on the present day conditions. It must be that; it cannot be anything else. I cannot understand why the hon. member for Melville would put a resolution such as this on the order paper. If he would visit the different camps as I did, I am sure that he would change his views entirely.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but as the hon. member has seen fit to drag my name in, I am challenging the statements he has made. I was not aware that he was a self-appointed investigator for any government to go out and look over camps. I know this, that the man appointed by Senator Gideon Robertson in the first instance made several serious charges to the provincial government and to the lieutenant-governor at Victoria, asking that a full inquiry be made into the misspending of funds and wasteful extravagances.

Regarding wheelbarrows, I might say that when the inquiry took place after a statement was made in this house by myself, the government at Victoria in their inquiry admitted that there might have been 450 steel wheelbarrows but that it was a distributing camp. I am, however, glad the hon. member visited there, because he did actually find the steel wheelbarrows there and they are still there.

When he says no complaints were made I would like to read one complaint that was published just after he was supposed to have visited this camp. This is from the Vancouver Province of January 29. It says that "in January two men drove up in a big car; one of them, very well dressed and with a big ring on his left hand, came into the shack to change his socks. He was covered with mud. After the man in the relief camp had helped to scrape the mud off the well dressed man, the latter handed him a big nickel." I can think of no one that could be but our hon. friend, and I am surprised that he would come back and make statements like that in the house. I would like further time to debate this, because I am not taking back any statement I made on the floor of this house regarding the misspending of money for relief purposes during that time. I have no complaints about the camps now; the men, I believe, are well looked after and, I believe, well fed. In my criticisms I never made any complaint regarding the treatment of the men in the camps.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MULLINS: I gave no one a nickel. I am not so small as that. The statement made by the hon. member is altogether wrong.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken already.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I was not aware that this resolution was to come up tonight or I might have been provided with fuller details than I have with me at the moment. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has discussed the measure chiefly from the standpoint of disposing of the accumulated surplus of wheat. It is not my purpose to discuss it from that standpoint but rather to indicate what might be done in view of the experience of relief committees in the United States in making use of a product we have in such abundance. It has been my good fortune and pleasure to come somewhat in contact with the system followed over there. True, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out, we in Canada are not in quite the same position as they were. The movement for the use of whole wheat was begun in a very small way in the town of Oberlin by one who had had some experience in its use in the early days in Manitoba. It began with wheat cracked in ordinary small hand mills. The movement grew larger and larger, and quantities of wheat were sent in from the surrounding country. Instead of using hand mills I saw them using two old cast off coffee mills and a farm grinder driven by electric power. This was in the town of Lorain, Ohio. At this time the movement had gained considerable momentum. The Prime Minister has said that boiled wheat will not keep people in good condition for very long. It may be that boiled wheat is not a very attractive diet, but it was clearly demonstrated that wheat ground in this primitive way could be used for the making of different products that were very attractive. I myself ate cookies and pancakes and muffins made from wheat ground in this manner. After the movement had been under way for some time application was made to congress to pass a bill granting, in the first place, forty million bushels, and I happened to be in Loraine when the first car of that wheat arrived from Chicago. I think the last word I got was that nine or ten cars had been used in that one town alone. The movement spread all over the United States, until now I understand they have absorbed all the wheat that was held by the farm board.

I can agree pretty largely with the statement made by the Prime Minister that this particular movement would not relieve the farm surplus in any great degree, but I wish that relief committees in the various parts of Canada who are carrying on voluntary relief would investigate what has been done along this line in the United States. They would find that the sometimes meagre funds at their disposal could be used to very great advantage. I know the statement was made by the relief committee of the city of Cleveland that they had reached the end of their voluntary offerings, and then they received the wheat from the farm board. If my memory is correct they made the statement that this wheat would save them about $50,000 in that one year.

I believe this movement for the use of our wheat by relief committees already has begun in Canada. Shortly before I left home the announcement was made that if farmers would contribute quantities of wheat it would be ground and sent to the relief committee in Winnipeg. I do not advance this suggestion in the hope that it will take care of any great quantity of our surplus wheat, but I am quite satisfied that if the relief committees throughout Canada would investigate what has been done, see the various ways in which whole wheat flour may be used and the attractive dishes that can be made from it, they might find themselves able to carry on their relief work more satisfactorily than at present. I have not the slightest doubt, in spite of what the right hon. Prime Minister has said with regard to all cases of need being cared for adequately, that there are still many people in our cities who would be glad to get larger supples than they are receiving at present. While I was in the town of Lorain I saw the people come to the place where the wheat was being ground; they received supplies of the flour, and they expressed great satisfaction with what was given them. So it must not be supposed that this proposition simply involves giving wheat to people to be boiled, as might be taken from the words of the Prime Minister. That wheat was ground and the flour baked in such a way that no one, no matter what might be his tastes, need object to making use of what was furnished. If my words could be brought to the attention of relief committees in various cities of Canada I should be very glad to put them in communication with those who initiated the movement in the United States, and who have followed its course during the last two or three years. I may say that from time to time I am in communication with those who began the movement, and I am quite satisfied that it has been eminently successful. As I said before, our government has not on hand a large store of wheat such as that held by the farm board in the United States; the circumstances are quite different, but I believe it is quite possible that relief committees in our cities might take advantage of what has been done in the United States in order to use their funds, which in many cases are all too inadequate, to greater advantage.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think perhaps a few words might be said, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this wheat surplus which is bearing so heavily on the market. Before I address myself to that phase of the resolution, however, I should like to make just one observation in regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). In the first place I would say that no matter how complete might be the adaptation of his suggestion in Canada, it could not very seriously affect the quantity of wheat which we have for sale. At the same time, I agree that it would be desirable to stimulate the consumption of wheat and wheat products in Canada, which is such a prolific producer of wheat.

May I make just this further suggestion to my hon. friend and to others who may be interested in his suggestion: Would it not be very fair to suggest that the relief organizations right in the heart of the wheat producing area, such as Regina, Winnipeg or other western cities, might try the plan which has been put forward so admirably by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and the hon. member for Lisgar? Perhaps it would interest the house to know that a large corporation in this city, about as far removed from interest in or the production of wheat as any organization could be—I refer to the Canadian Bank Note Company—issued a most admirable brochure on the very subject which my hon. friend has mentioned. They had a dietitian work out a number of very excellent recipes using wheat, and I am sure they would be glad to place that brochure at the disposal of any organization interested. I do suggest very earnestly, however, that this plan might be tried in one of the great centres of the wheat growing area, and then probably it would spread rapidly to other centres.

In his resolution the hon. member for Melville refers to two matters, to the first of which I have just made reference, and which I think was very well covered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). The second suggestion is:

> . . . selling on long term credits a substantial quantity of our embarrassing wheat carry-over to China. . . .

I wish to refer to this suggestion for a few moments. My hon. friend from Melville said: "Let us sell the wheat on any terms; get rid of it at any price". I submit to my hon. friend, though perhaps he was indulging in a superlative, really for the purpose of impressing the point—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I point out that I suggested this plan as an alternative to doing nothing? I said it would be better than just letting the wheat pile up.

Mr. STEVENS: Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of my hon. friend the possible danger in such a suggestion. As a matter of fact I rather deplore any suggestion of the kind going forth from this house, because I am afraid it will have a depressing effect upon an altogether oversensitive world market. Canada ought not—and I hope to demonstrate this in a moment—do anything that will give the impression abroad that we are in the position of having to sell wheat at any price. If we did that in connection with only five million bushels, which would not help a great deal when we are handling three hundred million or four hundred million bushels, it would inevitably depress the price for another forty million, fifty million or perhaps seventy-five million bushels. This market is an exceedingly sensitive organism, and the one thing we have been trying to do in Canada is to hold the marketing of wheat on a stabilized and what we might call an orderly basis. I can say this, I think, with confidence: I am sure that those who have followed the market with care, as I do daily, will agree that the Canadian marketing system has not beared the market unreasonably during the past year, but they have never refused to sell wheat when it was asked for by any market in the world. It would be deplorable were we to adopt in any sense the suggestion that we should sell wheat and sell it at any price.

To bear out what I have said, I wish to give to the house some rather interesting data. The test of what we are doing with our products is to be found after all in the way in which we are getting them out to the markets of the world. I have here a tabulation which I will read to a sufficient extent to warrant my asking that it go on Hansard in detail, so that the house can get it in its present form. For the moment I will indicate the facts disclosed in this document. It is a ten-year tabulation of the export of wheat and wheat flour. The two are combined; that is to say, the flour is treated as wheat. It covers the ten-year period from 1922-23 to 1932-33 and gives the months of August to January right down to January, 1933. Let us take the month of January by way of illustration. In January, 1933, we marketed, in round figures, 16,500,000 bushels of wheat, and the other years run as follows: 14,000,000; 17,000,000; 10,000,000; 16,000,000; 16,000,000; 18,000,000; 25,000,000; 7,000,000; 11,000,000; 10,000,000.

If you take the average for ten years for this six months period you will find that Canada marketed 150,000,000 bushels in that period over a stretch of ten years. This year we marketed 160,000,000 bushels, or 10,000,000 bushels more than the average for the ten years. Then take the last five-year period. The average for that period was 144,000,000 bushels, whereas we marketed this year, as I have already said, in the six months indicated, 160,000,000 bushels, showing that at the present time we are pressing out wheat to the markets of the world at a more rapid ratio than the average for the ten years or the average for five years. My hon. friend therefore may take it for granted that Canada is not piling up a surplus from any lack of effort to market.

Following is the table:

†In each of the eleven crop years, the increases in stocks of Canadian wheat in United States positions between August and January, have been deducted. When Canadian wheat moves into store in the United States, it is counted as an export. In the present year a smaller amount of Canadian wheat is moving through United States ports and consequently our export figures for 1932–33 are somewhat lower than they would be if normal quantities of Canadian wheat were in store in the United States.

5 year average 1927–28 to 1931–32..... 144,817,938 bushels.

I agree with the observations that have been made with regard to the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Melville. It was an admirable speech, delivered in splendid spirit, and whatever I say is said in the same spirit in which the hon. gentleman presented his resolution. He made the statement that this surplus is bearing us down, and I think he used a rather interesting simile when he said that it was drowning us just as you might drown a cat.

Mr. BENNETT: A cat has nine lives.

Mr. STEVENS: As the Prime Minister says, a cat has nine lives.

Mr. VALLANCE: We are on the last one now.

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. gentleman will follow me for the next ten minutes I will endeavour to disabuse his mind of that depth of pessimism into which he has floundered. We are not being borne down or overwhelmed with an unreasonable surplus of wheat at this time. I venture to say that even with the large crop we have garnered this year the carry-over will not be more than it was last year. It may vary a little up or down but I do not think it will be much over; in fact I think it will be a little under. But circumstances outside of Canada are entirely different this year from what they were a year ago, so that even if we do have such a surplus at the end of the crop year it will be under conditions distinctly advantageous to Canada and not as they were in the previous year.

Let us look for a moment at the world situation as it is to-day. I have given it a great deal of very careful study and I base these observations upon the fullest possible information available. The world situation is this. Europe is bare of wheat, and that does not apply merely to the large centres where wheat is normally gathered, such as Hamburg, Antwerp, Rotterdam, Liverpool, and so on. I mean the country supplies of Europe. It has been the practice for centuries over there to carry in the stack considerable quantities of wheat on these small farms. It has been a common practice for many years, but owing to two factors, first the bonuses in the way of high tariffs that have been given to the producers in Europe, and secondly to economic pressure, the farmers of Europe have sold off this supply.

Now it should be borne in mind that this supply hitherto held upon the farms in Europe has never entered into the statistics of the various countries when figuring on wheat. This first came to my attention some months ago when I was making a careful analytical study of the figures of production and consumption of wheat, and I found the discrepancy. It was very difficult to understand it, but after we had given it a great deal of study we found that this invisible surplus in Europe, which has been there normally for centuries and consists of a quantity estimated as between possibly 200,000,000 and 500,000,000 bushels—I think it is impossible to estimate it exactly—we found, I say, that this invisible unaccounted surplus has been fed on the market during the last three years particularly and accounts for the discrepancy in the figures we have had before us from time to time.

Bearing out my suggestion in that regard, there was a report issued the other day by Broomhalls, and although I am speaking from memory, not having it before me, I think I am safe in saying that in that report he pointed out that the stocks in Europe, visible and invisible, were largely exhausted; and he intimated, I think, that they were at their lowest point in the history of buying countries. He made the further observation that now was a good time to replenish these stocks because of the low price of wheat throughout the world. That is to say, in the buying countries the stocks of wheat normally visible and those that were invisible have been substantially if not almost wholly exhausted.

Turning to the other side of the question, we find that the winter wheat area of Russia is below what it has been in recent years; that is, the acreage that has been sown and the condition of the wheat during the fall months of November and December have fallen off. The land is not in good condition and the acreage is not as large as it has been, by a considerable number—I saw a figure the other day showing a diminution of 4,000,000 acres. Many of these figures one must not take too seriously, but it is a certainty that there has been a substantial diminution of acreage in Russia. Now the spring wheat area in Russia is known among agriculturists as in foul condition, owing to new methods of farming and the rather disturbed conditions of the last four or five years. There has been a growth of weeds which is familiar to many of our western farmers, who know how difficult it is to produce a good crop under such conditions. It can therefore be reasonably asserted that Russia will not be a serious competitor, certainly not if she feeds her own people in the next year or two.

We come next to the Balkan area, in part an exporting country although upon occasions it is an importing country. It is a heavy producer of wheat and the winter wheat area, although not seriously injured, is reported to be in a subnormal condition.

We turn from that to the Argentine. The present Argentine crop is a fair crop as far as quantity is concerned, but it is below normal in quality. Argentine wheat is one of the chief competitors of Canadian wheat, and I venture the assertion that it will not be on the markets in its higher grades to the degree expected a few months ago.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is only one grade of Argentine wheat, F.A.Q.

Mr. STEVENS: There is more than one grade.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is their average wheat.

Mr. STEVENS: The point is that that grade is not up to normal.

We come next to Australia. This year they have a crop of good quality, but it is their third or fourth successive good crop, which is an abnormal number of successive good crops for that country. There has been a substantial increase of acreage in Australia, the present crop having been taken off an acreage some 2,500,000 acres above what it was in previous years.

The United States has been one of the depressing factors in the world markets for the last three years because of their very large surplus. I neglected to point out that in 1928-29 all the producing countries of the world had phenomenally large crops, and in addition Russia entered the market in the manner referred to by the Prime Minister a moment ago. All the countries were left with large surpluses, the total amounting from 350,000,000 to 400,000,000 bushels above what they were able to get rid of in the world market. I think the United States have been quite reasonable in their methods of marketing during the last two or three years; they have certainly not been unreasonable. The present crop of winter wheat in the United States is in a subnormal condition. A reduction in acreage has been referred to, but in the case of the United States there has been a greater reduction by nature than could be achieved by any constituted authority.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What does the minister mean?

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to the winter kill. The effects of this blight have been tantamount to a very substantial reduction in acreage. It is unlikely that the United States, even with a good spring crop, will have any more wheat than is necessary to supply their own needs. At the most there will be only a small surplus.

Canada has had a very good average crop. In some sections it was poor, but on the whole it was of good average. As I indicated a moment ago, if I had expected this matter to come up I would have had the precise figures before me. Our wheat has been got out to the markets of the world in an excellent manner. Prices have been low and depressed but there has been a fair demand and our wheat has moved out better than in recent years. I think we are justified in saying that the marketing or the disposal of Canada's crop has been very satisfactory, other than in price.

We come now to the situation which may be faced next year. I say without much hesitancy that there is no likelihood of a depressing surplus this coming crop year, that is, after the midsummer period. Undoubtedly there is enough wheat in visible supply to take care of the world's needs, but, taking it by and large, there is not a surplus beyond what has in the past been looked upon as a reasonably safe margin. With one exception all the factors are present for an advance in the price of wheat, and that exception is the depressed and dislocated economic position of the buying countries. The buying power of the people in the purchasing countries undoubtedly is dislocated and subnormal, again using that term. All this is keeping down the price of wheat. I think the price of wheat is held down more by the inability to buy or the fact that people do not wish to buy than by the actual surplus of wheat visible on the world market. The outlook is not too blue and our people should face the present situation with a degree of reasonable confidence. I do not think it would be a good thing to have a sudden rise in the price of wheat or other commodities, but certainly an accretion in the price of wheat and other commodities is desired by all.

If we launch upon a policy of definite curtailment of acreage, I think there is a danger of stimulating still further the production in the buying countries. It must be borne in mind that the buying countries such as France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and other small European countries have in recent years, by means of quotas and high tariffs against foreign wheat, tremendously stimulated the production of wheat within their own boundaries. I do not think it would be wise for the producing countries artificially to advance the price of wheat by a curtailment of acreage. If this matter is to be discussed, to my mind it ought to be discussed with the purchasing countries sitting in. We must bear in mind that wheat can be grown anywhere between the Arctic and Antarctic circles; it can be grown quickly; it can be produced in such countries as Persia and northern Africa. A very considerable quantity is produced now in northern Africa to supply France with a portion of its requirements. If the big producing countries were to adopt a policy of unduly and artificially advancing the price of wheat, there would be that reaction.

My hon. friend suggested the marketing of some of our wheat in China, but there are one or two things that ought to be said in regard to that. Some months ago a group of clergymen waited upon me to advocate this very thing. Their views were based entirely upon humanitarian grounds; their suggestion was motivated, I think, purely by a desire to have some cheap food given to those whom they conceived to be starving in China. We went into this matter with considerable care; we did not lightly dismiss it. I took the trouble to have our officers who are on the ground give it close attention and study. But in China certain conditions now obtain which make it physically impossible to get the wheat to the desired objective. For instance, let us take last year's flood area of which we are aware. I was told by men of repute, whose word could not be questioned, that it would be impossible to get in there, because lying between the seaboard and those areas were numbers of substantial army organizations with ambitious generals who were exercising jurisdiction over large provinces and who would intercept anything passing through. So that really had we done this the wheat we sent into China ostensibly for the relief of private persons suffering in some interior point would have been sequestrated by ambitious war lords who would use it for the purpose of supporting their armies. Of that I do not think there can be any doubt.

Another point in regard to the placing of wheat in China is this: It is not, I think, generally understood in this country that most of the wheat and flour that enters China goes through the Shanghai area. That is perhaps one of the largest milling centres and also one of the best organized business centres in the world. They think of these things purely and simply from a business standpoint. They are at present buying large quantities of wheat. They are jealously guarding the trade within, shall I say, the ambit of the area in which they are able to trade, and there is little possibility of passing flour or wheat through that area and distributing it, in any satisfactory way known to us, in sections either served by them or beyond the circle of their influence.

So I want to assure the hon. member for Melville that we have not failed to study the question, but we feel the suggestion is impracticable. At the same time I should like to point out that very substantial quantities are now being sold to China, although Australia is selling much larger quantities than we are, the reason being the use to which the Chinese desire to place wheat or wheat flour, namely, for what is known as noodles or for the pastry type. They do not use light yeast bread to the same degree as we do. What we are trying to do, through the influence of trade commissioners, and so forth, is to stimulate the use of bread wheat and bread flour there; but the chief purpose for which they use wheat is to make soft wheat products such as noodles and confections. The consequence is that they prefer Australian wheat to ours, but there is this comfort for us in the fact that the larger the quantity of Australian wheat that finds a market in the orient, the less the pressure upon the Liverpool and European markets, so that whether it is sold one place or the other makes comparatively little difference. Nevertheless we are sending very substantial quantities of wheat and flour to Japan and northern China. We have recently opened a new market in the Dutch East Indies, and in many other places we are extending the market for Canadian products and doing everything we can to enlarge their sale.

It has been suggested by the Prime Minister that possibly the hon. member, seeing that we have had this prolonged discussion on his resolution, might withdraw it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe a number still want to speak.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will you call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 14, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITION—MR. WILSON

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition from the milk producers of Wentworth county in which they request that all reasonable and effective measures be taken in order to revive the dairy industry upon a basis equally advantageous to the producer and consumer, and that some equitable arrangement can be made whereby the producer of milk will be paid for his milk and milk products a price which at least covers the cost of production and provides for a profit on a par with that earned by the dairies.

DEPUTY MINISTER OF MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): On Friday last the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) told the house that the appointment of deputy ministers was under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister, so I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman why the position of deputy minister of marine has not yet been filled.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I suppose the answer is because no appointment has been made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is not an answer. Why has no appointment been made?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO ANNUAL REPORT AND ITS SUBMISSION TO THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if he can state when the report of the national railways will be presented to parliament.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have had no word yet, but I will make inquiries and let the right hon. gentleman know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the intention to constitute a committee to deal with the report and national railway matters, as has been the practice in previous years?

Mr. MANION: That is a matter for the house. In view of the legislation now before the Senate, which will later be before the house, I hardly thought it would be advisable to proceed in that way, but of course that is my own opinion. It is for the house to decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What difference can the Duff report make in the consideration of these matters in detail by the committee?

Mr. MANION: The reason is that the Duff report suggested that the committee should not meet as it has met in the past. There are some suggestions which should be dealt with before that committee meets again, but of course that is only my own opinion again.

[Mr. Wilson]

REPORTED PURCHASE OF RAILWAY DOCK AT VANCOUVER BY FIRM OF COAL MERCHANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In view of recent head-lines in the Vancouver newspapers I should like to ask whether any representations have been made with regard to the sale of the Canadian National railway docks in Vancouver. This question has been asked before, and I wonder if the minister is in a position to make a definite statement at this time.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have no definite information.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked a question with regard to the agenda of the monetary and economic conference. I told the hon. member that I had received no official copy of the agenda, but a draft annotated agenda has been issued by the League of Nations, and I fancy it is now available to hon. members here. So far as I have been able to ascertain I have not received any extra copies as yet, but a draft has been received.

PENSION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) whether it has been decided as yet to introduce legislation based upon the report of the committee which investigated the working of the Pension Act?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): It has not been decided, but I think it quite likely that legislation will be introduced. I cannot make a definite statement to-day.

TOBACCO COMBINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): A few months ago representations were made to the government with regard to an investigation into a suggested combine in the tobacco industry. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) whether any steps in this direction have been taken.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I consulted with the registrar under the Combines Act some weeks ago, and he has been assembling the material touching upon the question. He will proceed with his investigation, and in due course—and I hope it will not be too long delayed—his report will be made.

BROADCASTING OF SEDITIOUS SPEECHES AT STATION CHLP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire from the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), whether he has been informed that certain seditious speeches were delivered under the patronage of the "Fédération des clubs ouvriers" at the broadcasting station CHLP, "La Patrie," Montreal, and, if so, whether measures have been taken to prohibit such speeches.

Hon. Mr. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Marine, so far as I know, has received no official information that seditious speeches were made at any broadcasting station.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act —Mr. Murphy—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 2—Royal Canadian Mounted Police to be game officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When the committee adjourned I understand the specific question under consideration was that asked by my hon. friend the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) whether the Minister of Justice would consider specifying individual members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to be migratory bird officers, instead of a blanket authority conferred upon the whole force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I remember the discussion that took place. I think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth urged two points; one in regard to clothing members of the police with magisterial powers. I am inclined to agree with the objection which he took in that respect. I do not think that members of the police who are designated as officers under the Migratory Birds Convention Act should be clothed with the powers of magistrates. And as I read the act now carefully I do not think the act gives them such powers, though that power was conferred upon those who were appointed under the present act.

On the other point that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth urged, that certain members of the mounted police force should be designated in each province as inspectors under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, I have discussed this with the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and he is utterly opposed to the suggestion. He says that if such a proposal were adopted the tendency would be for members of the force to imagine that was their particular work, and they would disregard other services which they were called upon to perform. He says it is one of the cardinal rules of the force that its members shall enforce in general all the laws of the country or the province, and shall not be designated for any specific branch of the service. We have the preventive service, for instance; in certain provinces they do work under the liquor laws. He is utterly opposed to segregating any part of the service for any special law enforcement, and he objects for that reason to the proposal made by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth. He says it will be far more satisfactory to allow the whole force to become inspectors under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, so that it will become the duty of every member to enforce that as well as other laws.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When this act is passed, will the enforcement of the provisions rest with the Department of Justice or with the Department of the Interior as heretofore?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it rests with any department I would fancy it would rest with the Department of Justice, because the Migratory Birds Convention Act enforcement has now been transferred by order in council to the Department of Justice, being the department in control of the mounted police. I assume that all prosecutions would be under that department in the future.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask then if all the officers will be transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Justice?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That has already been done.

Mr. MURPHY: The Migratory Birds Convention Act, interpretation clause states that the minister for the purpose means the Minister of the Interior; that has not been changed. The order in council simply transfers to the Department of Justice the police work, carrying out the regulations, dealing with illegal shooting.

In order to clear the matter up I will read the clause of the order in council, being P.C. 2283—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When was that passed?

Mr. MURPHY: Friday, October 14, 1932. The clause reads:

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Justice and under the provisions of section 2 (a) of chapter 165, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is pleased to order that the responsibility for the police work in connection with the enforcement of the provisions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act and regulations thereunder throughout Canada be and it is hereby transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. All other responsibilities under the said act to remain with the Department of the Interior.

According to the terms of the order in council the Department of Justice, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, will be charged with the police duties, but other phases of the act will continue to be enforced by the minister of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What will the other responsibilities be that will remain with the Department of the Interior when the actual enforcement of the provisions of the act is transferred to the Department of Justice?

Mr. MURPHY: The Migratory Birds Convention Act was passed following an agreement between this country and the United States for the conservation of the wild bird life of this continent, dealing solely with migratory birds. There are many other duties beyond that of merely police work in protecting the birds from illegal shooting during certain seasons of the year. It is a much broader question, it deals with the conservation of the wild bird life of this continent, which is very important. One phase of the duties would be the establishment, as has been done, of sanctuaries throughout Canada where no shooting is allowed. Also studies of the habits of these birds, in order that a proper understanding may be had of them with a view to necessary regulation or legislation for their conservation and increase. Merely protecting them from illegal shooting is only a small part, I would say, of the duties of the Department of the Interior in conserving these birds.

Mr. BRADETTE: That does not do away with the argument I advanced the other day about conflict of jurisdiction. I do not want to go over the ground again, but I believe I showed the other day that in the application of that law there will be conflict between federal and provincial jurisdictions. I believe that could be cured by an amendment, after the words "game officers"— in districts and territories where the federal government has full jurisdiction.

I know from personal knowledge of many occasions in northern Ontario when conflict has arisen—not open rivalry, because I say here that all mounted police are glad to work in cooperation with municipal and provincial police. But I believe there is an anomaly there which should be remedied. Surely the federal government does not want to interpose its authority where a province has full jurisdiction. I believe that amendment would do away with a lot of criticism and things that have happened in the past.

The Minister of Justice in answer to my question said it was within the authority of the federal government, in the case of an international treaty of this nature, to impose upon the provinces the application of that law. So why the conflict of authority? I do not see the necessity of it, and I take it the Minister of Justice and also the Minister of the Interior want to avoid any friction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my hon. friend's anticipation of friction is purely imaginary. His amendment would confine the federal jurisdiction to what we know as the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The rest of this country is allotted to the various provinces who have sovereign rights in their respective portions. There is no conflict of jurisdiction with regard to an international treaty, the federal government being vested with power to carry out in the various provinces the provisions of such treaties. I cannot imagine that there will be any conflict between the provincial and federal authorities with regard to this particular convention. If my hon. friend's amendment were to carry the jurisdiction of the federal authorities would be confined to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Protection is not nearly so necessary in those parts of Canada as it is in the more settled portions where there are more sportsmen and more guns. It is to protect the migratory birds in these districts that this convention is framed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two observations with regard to this bill. In the first place I am opposed to a division of jurisdiction between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice in connection with the enforcement of the provisions of this bill and the conservation of wild game. I am opposed also, by inference, to the suggestion which, according to the Minister of Justice, has been made by the commissioner of the mounted police to the effect that it would be a bad principle to appoint specific men by name. I have the greatest respect for this officer but I contend that parliament should decide these questions and not any gentleman who happens to be the head of the mounted police. I do not say it is deliberate, but there does seem to be a tendency to take away from various departments of government certain powers which are turned over to the mounted police. It is possible to go too far in this direction. The provisions of the old bill were better in every way. Under the present bill I think there will be a conflict in authority. It is all very well to say that it is only the policing that is being vested in the Department of Justice, but the fact remains that there were very few complaints against the old game officers under the Department of the Interior. I am afraid too much authority is being vested in the mounted police. Last year they took over the preventive service, it is now being proposed that they shall take over the migratory bird service and next year it may be something else. I wish to sound a word of warning against the vesting of too much authority in the mounted police of Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, supplementing what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has so well said as to there being no conflict of jurisdiction in these matters, I wish to say that the provinces and the dominion have always worked in the fullest cooperation. There has been no conflict in enforcing the provisions of the act or establishing closed seasons during certain periods of the year. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) fears that the jurisdiction is being divided, but may I say that we are only doing now in the maritime provinces what has been done in all parts of Canada during the past years. Last year the mounted police took over the duties previously performed by the provincial police in the provinces of the west. The enforcement of the police regulations of this act, if I may so term them, was carried out by the provincial officers in the western provinces and last year this work was taken over by the mounted police. We are only doing now in the maritime provinces what has been done throughout the rest of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that done specifically or generally?

Mr. MURPHY: It has been general in each province. In the province of Ontario the provincial police officers have been in the main enforcing the police regulations of this act, as was the case in the western provinces until last year, when the provincial police duties were taken over by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do not think there is any basis for the fears of my hon. friend.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) I agree fully in so far as the taking away of further rights from the provinces is concerned. As one who delights in spending as much time as he can during the proper seasons in the bush and on the streams, I think it is a great mistake to change the officials who have been administering this law. In the districts with which I am acquainted, I think the law has been administered very efficiently. It has been my good fortune to have travelled extensively in the Gatineau valley and north of Maniwaki, and I have always found that the officials in Quebec were looking after their duties in a most efficient manner. I have the greatest admiration for that very wonderful corps called the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and I know how efficiently they discharge all duties entrusted to them. I have no doubt that they would be able to carry out such duties as are required under this act in an efficient manner as far as the urban and more thickly settled districts are concerned, but I do not think this would apply to the more thinly populated sections. These game wardens travel by canoe and on foot over every inch of their country, they have the qualifications and the aptitude to discharge their duties, and I do hope that these men will be maintained in their present positions. I do not think the mounted police would be able to perform these duties as efficiently as the present game wardens.

Mr. BRADETTE: With all due respect to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) I must tell him and the house that I know from personal experience that there have been many instances of conflict between the two authorities in northern Ontario. I should like to quote from Hansard at page 1777. I asked the minister the following question:

I would ask the Minister of Justice: This act we are dealing with being an international matter, is there in the constitution machinery which will allow the federal government to ask the provincial governments to apply this act?

The Minister of Justice replied:

There is a provision in our constitution that in regard to international treaties the federal government can enact laws imposing upon a province whatever is necessary to carry out an international obligation. This being an international obligation, a matter of treaty between Canada and the United States, the federal government is empowered to pass such laws as are necessary to put it into force in the various provinces of Canada.

When you have two police bodies, the provincial police and the mounted police, there is bound to be conflict if they are both given the same jurisdiction. I should like to inquire of the minister if the officers of the mounted police would be also justices of the peace?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: If they are to have no jurisdiction in the imposing of fines, then the conflict would not be so great.

Mr. CASGRAIN: For the reasons mentioned when this bill came up before, I think it is my duty to protest once more against the enactment of this legislation. As I pointed out at that time, I think this power, if put into force, will have the effect of depriving of their livelihood many humble people in my constituency who earn their living by having been appointed under the authority of the Department of the Interior to enforce the law under the direction of Mr. Lewis. It is not fair of the government to take such action. I see in it also a certain kind of propaganda the government wants to spread, because when these officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are appointed to patrol a whole district, they will have in a way a say at election times. Although I do not know whether all those who have been appointed of recent years to the mounted police are of any one political party, there is no doubt that when they will have charge of the enforcement of the law in those districts, they will be much more severe on the people there than would the officials who were formerly appointed. Those who were appointed before under the direction of Mr. Lewis were men who knew the territory in which they were serving, and so far I have not heard of any complaint against them or against the work which Mr. Lewis has been performing in that district.

As I said before, the government in these matters every year brings in too much legislation giving most extensive powers and territory to cover to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he said that year after year new legislation is introduced giving broader powers to the mounted police. I may put it in a word, as I said the other day, that the government seems to have gone mad on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do not think the government will gain anything by amending the law in the way they want to do.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): In looking over Bill No. 19, to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act, it would seem to transfer to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the enforcement of the recommendations contained in the Migratory Birds convention. I understand that laws are passed in this house and then most of them are left to the provinces to enforce. In our province of Quebec we have special legislation covering the protection of migratory birds and game; we have also our own game keepers appointed under provincial laws, to enforce our legislation. According to the proposed measure, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are to be made game wardens. The result will be, for instance, if a mounted police officer, appointed under this legislation as a game warden, sees at a railway station or a wharf, some game, he will bring the offender before a police court magistrate. Then the court will be open to receive a writ of certiorari, and a writ of summons and a petition declaring a statement of claim that the legislation that is being passed this afternoon should be declared ultra vires.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill does not propose to interfere in any way with the local game laws of any province or with the enforcement of those laws. The only proposal in this bill is to change the nature of the inspectors from civilians who have been appointed heretofore to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I gathered from the minister's remarks that those police officers were not to be magistrates, but I see section 2 reads:

Subsection one of section 5 of the said act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"All members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shall, for the purpose of this act, be ex officio game officers."

I see that section 5, subsection one, at present reads as follows:

The minister may appoint game officers for carrying out this act and the regulations, and may authorize such game officers to exercise the powers of a justice of the peace or the powers of a police constable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those are the ones appointed in that way. I made the same mistake as my hon. friend has made. Those were game wardens appointed under the act as it stood:

The minister may appoint game officers for carrying out this act and the regulations, and may authorize such game officers to exercise the powers of a justice of the peace or the powers of a police constable.

The mounted police are not appointed by the minister. They are appointed, according to the amendment, as follows:

All members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shall, for the purpose of this act, be ex officio game officers.

Consequently they will not be justices of the peace.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior what the relations will be between the chief migratory game officer and the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In the maritime provinces, for example, there is a chief migratory game officer, Mr. Robie Tufts, of Wolfville, Nova Scotia, and in that province there are some 150 members of the mounted police who are under the control of the Department of Justice. Will Mr. Tufts have authority to select any one or more of the members of the mounted police and direct them to go into particular locations, watch for offenders and lay charges? In other words, are they to be under his direction? If so, have you not officials who are controlled by the Department of Justice under the authority of superior officers who are controlled by the Department of the Interior? Perhaps the minister could explain that.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not anticipate any difficulty on that score because we have in the western provinces an official of the department in the person of Mr. Munro who exercises the same powers as does Mr. Tufts in Nova Scotia. We have also in the person of Mr. Lewis at Ottawa a permanent migratory bird warden who exercises for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the same powers as do these other two men. These men simply cooperate with the police force, whatever it may be, in enforcing the regulations in regard to illegal shooting. There should therefore be no difficulty in the matter. The chief officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and Mr. Tufts will no doubt work in close cooperation, and Mr. Tufts from his long experience will be able to advise that officer as to the steps which should be taken to protect those birds. But as regards the mounted police taking orders, certainly they will take their orders as such from their superior officer in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems to me that is going to interfere with the administration of the act.

Mr. MURPHY: It does not.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very important that the chief migratory game officer should have a deciding voice as to what information should be laid and what prosecution should be undertaken. By this legislation his powers are taken away from him. If this is to be the effect; if he has cooperating with him and not working under him officers who are charged with the duty of apprehending offenders and laying informations and yet he has not any power over those officers, then you are going to have a division of responsibility which does not make for good enforcement of the act. I do not know anything about conditions in the other provinces, but this is very important in the maritimes and perhaps more important in Prince Edward Island than in Nova Scotia. I am not sure whether Prince Edward Island is policed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the same condition will arise there. I am of opinion that the enforcement of the act will not be as effective with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police not subject to the authority of the chief migratory game officer for the district as it is under the present system. In my own province the chief migratory bird officer is an enthusiast and he commands the respect of everybody who knows anything about the enforcement of the act. He knows from experience the sort of men who will work efficiently under him, and he has built up an efficient staff which now is going to be taken away from him entirely, and instead he is to be supplied with certain officers of another department over which he has no actual authority, and he is going to be charged with the administration of the act in his district. It seems to me that this change will not make for efficiency.

Mr. GOTT: I should like to make a brief observation to the house, and that is that if there were a few more game conservationists throughout Canada of the kind found in my riding you could dispense with all your Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers and all your game wardens. It is in the county which I have the honour to represent that Jack Miner has established his bird sanctuary, and I challenge all the representatives in this house to show that all your game wardens and all your mounted police officers can protect more birds than Jack Miner does in his sanctuary.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Has the Minister of Justice received any objection from the attorney general of the province of Quebec to the passing of this act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, none whatever.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is very convenient sometimes not to have a legal mind. Personally I am not very much concerned over the legal aspects of this bill. I think myself that the bill is a decided step forward, and the only thing the matter with it so far as I can see is that it does not include non-migratory birds as well as migratory.

Mr. MURPHY: They are under provincial law.

Mr. HOWDEN: So much the better. I come from a province which boasts one of the finest game birds in the world, the prairie grouse.

Mr. ERNST: The prairie grouch?

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not believe there is any better game bird in Canada than our prairie chicken in the fall, but I regret to say that we have had on two or three occasions to close the season for grouse hunting for a period of several years because the birds have become so depleted. I honestly believe that the depletion was not caused by legal hunting, but because certain citizens of Manitoba insisted on shooting the birds in season and out of season all the year round. To a very large extent the rural citizens in certain districts of Manitoba—and I do not blame them so much because they feed the birds—shoot the prairie chicken twelve months in the year. As is well known, the mounted police have the habit of going out and getting their man which the old game wardens did not have, and I think it is a mighty fine thing to have the mounted police on the trail of the offender under this act.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Has section four been passed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, it was passed the other day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In this privileged corner of the house one can hardly hear what is going on because the proceedings are often conducted in an undertone. If section four has been passed, I am very sorry because I intended to make certain remarks upon it.

The CHAIRMAN: The section was passed the other day, but if the committee has no objection the hon. member may speak on the preamble.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1.—Truant officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister explain this section?

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member doubtless knows, we have both residential and day schools established on the reserves throughout Canada for the purpose of educating Indian children. The services of a truancy officer are not required to any great extent, if at all, for the residential schools, but in the case of the day schools the services of a truancy officer are sometimes required. On some of the reserves we have special constables who perform this duty among their other duties, but on other reserves there are no such special officers, and it has been the custom in the past to appoint members of the mounted police for this duty. This section simply blankets in the force to carry out this duty wherever their services may be required.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister explain what the powers of a truancy officer are as defined in the section?

Mr. MURPHY: Subsection 3 of section 10 of the act reads:

> The Superintendent General may appoint any officer or person to be a truant officer to enforce the attendance of Indian children at school, and for such purpose a truant officer shall be vested with the powers of a peace officer, and shall have authority to enter any place where he has reason to believe there are Indian children between the ages of seven and fifteen years, and when requested by the Indian agent, a school teacher or the chief of a band shall examine into any case of truancy, shall warn the truants, their parents or guardians or the person with whom any Indian child resides, of the consequences of truancy, and notify the parent, guardian or such person in writing to cause the child to attend school.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Evidently this section is directed towards day school attendance?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister considered the objection there might be towards having a uniformed mounted police officer going to an Indian home to ascertain whether or not the children have been detained by action of the parents? I am inclined to believe that the proposed section is drastic?

Mr. MURPHY: In years past mounted police officers have performed those duties in various places. As I said a moment ago, on certain reserves we have special constables, but on others we have not those constables, and in such cases need the services of some officer. I must say the phase of the matter to which the hon. member has referred did occur to me in connection with the proposed amendment. My view however was that for years past mounted police officers have been performing very wide duties, and enforcing many laws throughout Canada. I cannot conceive that the sight of a mounted police uniform, one which must be familiar to the eyes of all Canadians including Indians, would raise any undue alarm in the breasts of those people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention of the government to formulate a similar provision with regard to the Doukhobor children who refuse to attend school?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a hard nut to crack.

Mr. MURPHY: The enforcement of attendance of white children rests with the provincial authorities.

Mr. BRADETTE: I know of reserves in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec where they have their own school boards. I believe that condition applies at Caughnawaga, and at some points in Ontario. It may be that the proposed change will conflict with local laws, because if I understand school legislation properly, and more particularly in connection with the province of Ontario, the school board has power to appoint truant officers, and the same legislation would apply to reserves. I do not suppose it applies at points such as Caughnawaga where there are only Indians, and where there may be no school boards. In the older reserves, however, it is my information that there are school boards, and that those bodies have the power to appoint truant officers. What provision is to be made in such cases?

Mr. MURPHY: If the children are attending school there will be no difficulty.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it proper to teach children to have no respect for authority?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite well aware that this matter has given the department some considerable worry. The fact that on the one hand school teachers are paid, schools established, and on the other that parents connive to prevent the attendance of their children at school, must present real difficulty. The only question which arises in my mind is one concerning the advisability of uniformed officers performing the duties of truant officers. I can well imagine that in some instances where they perform special duties, they might do so without difficulty. I am doubtful however as to the advisability of this measure, and while it may be necessary to send mounted police officers to reserves to enforce laws, the matter now under discussion is of a somewhat different nature. I do not know what the experience of the minister has been, but my experience in the administration of the act was that the fault was usually that of the parents, and never that of the child. The parents keep their children away from school, a difficulty which does not arise in connection with boarding schools, but arises in connection with day school attendance. I believe it is inadvisable to use Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers for the performance of these rather petty duties.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was represented to me by officials of the department that for the last ten or fifteen years it has been the custom of the Department of Indian Affairs, in connection with attendance at day schools, to appoint the member of the mounted police who happened to be in that neighbourhood, or nearest to it. I presume that practice was adopted for the purpose of saving money.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mounted police officers are not on the reserves, unless sent for special duties.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I referred to the officer nearest at hand.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have been on the Six Nations reserve, at the request of the minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe when the hon. member was in charge of the department police officers visited the reserves. The police are changed from time to time, as they are moved around. To get rid of the difficulty of swearing in a new man as a truant officer it was proposed to insert a general clause in the act allowing any officer to act as a truant officer. I am informed that in some districts there are truant officers who are not members of the mounted police force, but are acting in the capacity of special constables. It has been represented that the proposed change would have the effect of saving some money, and would make general a practice which has been developing throughout the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I have high respect for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a body of men of which we ought to be proud. I feel however that if the present legislation were passed we would be encroaching upon provincial rights, and would be going beyond the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, which provides:

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education.

And so on. That is the principle of the section. The people in any province are subject to the provincial laws concerning education. I may be wrong, but I am taking this opportunity of placing my views before the committee. If I am wrong, so much the better. In the province of Quebec there is a Huron reserve, in connection with which there is a school commissioner and a school board. Rightly or wrongly—and I think rightly—in that province we are opposed to compulsory education. A truant officer or a Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable could, under the proposed legislation, enter one of our reserves and enforce compulsory education, contrary to the laws of our province. For that reason I believe we are on dangerous ground. There is but one matter in connection with education left to federal power, and that pertains to the rights of minorities. It would seem that that section of the British North America Act has been forgotten on many occasions. It is my view that making a Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable a truant officer, and conferring upon him special power concerning Indians, is encroaching upon a matter which should be left entirely in the hands of provincial authorities. The British North America Act is an imperial statute and is supreme; in this committee we are bound to respect every clause of it. In a matter of school rights, which, by our constitution, are left entirely within the control of the provinces, we should be very careful before interfering or extending further authority to Royal Canadian Mounted Police or other truant officers. The bill before us relates only to Indians, but in the light of section 93 of the British North America Act I doubt very much, if we have any authority to create truant officers to act in any province against the laws of that province. I ask the committee to be very careful before making a definite decision.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to support every word that has been said by my hon. friend from Montmagny. This is not only a matter of school rights; it is also a matter of the rights of parents, and as a French-Canadian I am rather afraid. If my hon. friend from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) were Minister of the Interior, for instance, would he consider the French-Canadians as Indians? Would we be looked after by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? I have been arguing for liberty. I have great respect for my good friend the Minister of the Interior and also for my friend the Minister of Justice; I should be very sorry to be unpleasant to them, but the rights of the provinces must be respected, and the rights of individuals must be respected as well. I wonder if we are taking the right course now. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are looking after migratory birds; now they are to look after the Indians. What will be next?

I would suggest that legislation of this kind is nonsensical at this stage of the session. We are here to deal with the problems which concern the nation, but this question does not interest the nation. We are wasting our time discussing it, but we have to discuss it in order to defend the rights and privileges of our Canadian citizens. The Indians were the first inhabitants of this country. They do not have the right to vote, but they are fellow citizens. I think it is a very bad thing to open the door through which our liberties may disappear. To-day it is the Indians; what will come next? That is the whole question.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Riviere du Loup station.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad to say that the Riviere du Loup station has been fixed, and well fixed. I only suggest to the minister, who is an able man, that he should not pay too much attention to suggested legislation submitted to him by people who like to split hairs. There are people in the country suffering from hunger; our farmers cannot sell their products. Let us deal with those questions. The other day the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) dealt very courageously with the condition in which agriculture finds itself.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps my hon. friend will pardon me; there seems to be some objection to this clause, so perhaps we might let it stand and proceed to something else not quite so controversial.

Section stands.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Consent of agent required for sale or barter.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to ask the minister if in these cases the property belongs to the government or whether the ownership is vested in the Indian.

Mr. MURPHY: Without expressing a dogmatic opinion on the point, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the ownership would remain with the Indian, although I must say that the department does sell the Indian's crop for him. He is not allowed to do it himself without a permit from the department, but the proceeds of the sale inure to the Indian concerned.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister be good enough to tell us if the agent has the final say as to price?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, as a matter of practice, but any matter can be submitted to the department for final decision by the Superintendent General. As a matter of practice the prices are usually determined by the Indian agent.

Mr. McGIBBON: Do the Indians know they have that right of appeal to the department?

Mr. MURPHY: I must say that, generally speaking, they are pretty well advised as to their privileges.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The only change I see in the section is that now you are going to hold the Indian liable as well as the purchaser.

Mr. MURPHY: That is correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are not taking away the right of the Indians to barter one with another.

Mr. MURPHY: Not under this section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have you had any difficulty in this connection, with the Indian going off the reserve to sell his produce.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, that has been brought to the attention of the department on quite a number of occasions.

Mr. BRADETTE: In this section I see the words "shall sell or otherwise dispose of to anyone other than a member of the band." I believe there may be some difference of opinion as to the meaning of the word "band." How would the department define the word? Would it include the member of another tribe who married into the tribe concerned? Is there any distinct definition?

Mr. MURPHY: The word "band" is defined in the act, and if my hon. friend desires me to do so I will be glad to read the definition.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Have complaints been received with regard to the administration of the act as it stands at present? Has there been trouble through sales made by the Indians?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any complaints before him at the moment?

Mr. MURPHY: I cannot give my hon. friend any specific instances at present, but I have been informed by officials of the department that Indians, knowing of these restrictions, have taken their grain or cattle from the reserve to other places to be sold in contravention of the act. Under the terms of the act as it has been in force, only the person who made the purchase was liable and there was no penalty for the Indian who committed the offence, although he was well aware of the offence he was committing, and in some cases was more familiar with the restrictions than was the person making the purchase. By this amendment we are simply making the Indian liable for the offence as well as the person who purchases from him.

Mr. CASGRAIN: These amendments seem to affect only the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the territories. Are there any restrictions similar to these in the province of Quebec, or have any complaints been received from the province of Quebec?

Mr. MURPHY: As I told my hon. friend a moment ago, I cannot give him specific cases at the moment, but most of the agricultural reserves, if one might use that term, are located in the prairie provinces. If memory serves me correctly the majority of complaints that have reached the department have emanated from those provinces.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister does not recall any coming from the east?

Mr. MURPHY: Not to my knowledge, though there may have been some.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to ask a question about ownership by individual Indians. It has always been my impression that animals, implements and so on placed with the band by the government belong to the band as a band and do not become the property of any individual Indian.

Mr. MURPHY: I am speaking without the advice of my official, but in regard to ownership of cattle which have been purchased from time to time either by the government from parliamentary appropriations or from band funds, I am not certain in the first instance as to where the ownership rightfully belongs. But I can tell my hon. friend this, that when cattle, placed in charge of the individual Indian, are sold the proceeds go to the individual Indian.

Mr. DUPUIS: I notice that section 3 of the bill provides for an amendment to the act concerning sale of cattle, whereas section 4 relates to the sale of grains, roots and crops; then section 9 provides for a penalty. As the minister explained it, this affects only the western provinces. May I call to the attention of the minister the reverse aspect of that. I am ready to admit that this amendment is an improvement in this respect, that the Indian will be liable to punishment if he sells his cattle or crops without the permit of the agent, but there is no provision of the Indian Act for any penalty or responsibility when the Indian buys from white people. For instance, an Indian may buy an automobile or whatever he likes, and as the hon. minister said a few minutes ago he is quite conversant with his irresponsibility, he laughs at his creditors. It goes further than that. I have a reverse in my riding, at Caughnawaga. As a matter of fact the majority of the Indians are good citizens, honest, industrious and very skilful in certain kinds of work; but, as in any other community, a certain number being familiar with and taking advantage of their impunity under the law do injury to the whole community. I suggest that where Indians take advantage of their irresponsibility the law should require them to pay for whatever they buy or whatever damage they cause. I have in mind an instance of an Indian farm with, of course, no fences or ditches around it, situated in the neighbourhood of the property of a citizen of the parish of St. Constant. If cattle happen to pass from one farm to another an animal may be seized by the Indian and sold for his own use. If the owner of the animal takes action against the Indian and tries to execute his judgment he is just laughed at; the Indian is not responsible! If we apply to the department the department answers,—very rightly, because the law is so construed:—We have nothing to do with that. So the irresponsibility of the Indian under the law is abused by those on the reserve who do not respect the law at all.

In summing up my remarks I would like to know from the hon. minister if it would not be advisable to insert in the act a section covering such cases.

Mr. MURPHY: As to the responsibility of Indians generally for debts contracted in the ordinary course of business, I would imagine that all merchants and others having dealings with Indians are fully aware that in selling to an Indian on credit they are taking long chances. In other words, the Indian is considered as a minor, a ward, and the only method I can conceive of whereby that particular Indian could be made responsible for his debts would be to enfranchise him and make him a citizen, in which case he would be amenable to the laws and subject to be sued in court.

As to the other point, the straying of animals on reserves, there is provision in the Indian Act whereby such animals should be impounded, as they are in any other locality, and after due advertisement sold. I cannot conceive of an Indian, merely because an animal has strayed on the reserve, selling that animal and using the proceeds, without being subject to procedure in the courts.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is the fact.

Mr. MURPHY: I cannot argue the legal aspect, I am not a lawyer, but I think that would be only common sense and I believe good law.

Mr. DUPUIS: In answer to the argument of the hon. minister, when he compares the Indian to a minor, if the law so regards him the comparison should be continued. An individual who is a minor has a guardian and if the minor does something wrong the father or guardian is responsible for his act. But in the case of the Indian the Department of Indian Affairs takes no responsibility for the mischief the Indian does. So I believe there is something wrong. Then the hon. minister says that people in general must know that when they deal with an Indian they deal at their own risk. As the minister knows, these Indians do not always stay upon the reserves. They come to Montreal or to Laprairie and it is hard to tell them from white men. Many of them own automobiles, they obtain licences and go driving through the country and when an accident occurs they attempt to escape liability by saying to the injured party, "I am not responsible, I am a minor."

Mr. BURY: So does a minor.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is the answer given to many who suffer injuries in collisions with the cars of these Indians. The extent of the damages may amount to two or three thousand dollars, it may be that even a death occurs, but they attempt to escape liability in this manner. I must say that many of these Indians will try to cover any damages which might occur, but there are some of them who try to escape. I do not think that the Indians or the Department of Indian Affairs should be above the law in such matters.

Mr. McGIBBON: I endorse what the hon. member has just said. I do not see why a colour line should be drawn; I see no reason why certain Indians should not be given the franchise. Many of them are very intelligent, many conduct different kinds of businesses. Those who fought in the war were enfranchised but in many cases they have brothers and sisters who are just as intelligent and as ambitious as they are. I suggest to the minister that he consider seriously the enfranchising of those Indians who are capable of exercising their rights. There are two bands in my riding made up of intelligent and industrious people. They follow different lines of occupation and yet they are treated as minors or wards of the government. I remember very distinctly one bright boy coming to me and telling me how he was handicapped because he was an Indian. He was very ambitious and had saved enough money to buy a motor car, but he found he could get no work to do. When he applied for work he was told that as the work available was for relief purposes and as he was a ward of the government he could not be given anything to do. He was very ambitious and ready and willing to work, yet he could obtain nothing. Providing an Indian has the necessary intelligence, I think he should be given the rights of citizenship. I suggest that many white men are not capable of exercising their rights, and I think an effort should be made to see if we cannot make a better citizen out of the Indian.

There is another matter I should like to take up with the minister, although it may not be exactly germane to the present discussion. I think the department should exercise greater care over the health of the Indian. I am told that throughout the northern parts of Ontario tuberculosis is sweeping the Indians into eternity by the hundreds. A doctor visits these Indians once a year, he leaves certain medical supplies but in the meantime they have to doctor themselves just as they have to feed themselves. As long as they remain wards of the government, the government has a responsibility which should be exercised in as humane a way as possible.

Mr. MURPHY: I might mention that section 7 deals with the enfranchisement of Indians.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I hope the minister is going to give the committee an explanation in connection with the payment of debts by Indians. A man came into my office last week who had sold a horse to an Indian for $150. He could not obtain payment and had obtained a judgment to get the horse back. He had had to pay his own costs and found he was unable to regain possession of the animal. He wanted to know if he had to lose everything or if the department would not interfere.

Mr. MURPHY: For the information of the hon. member I would direct his attention to section 105 of the act, which reads:

> No person shall take any security or otherwise obtain any lien or charge, whether by mortgage, judgment or otherwise upon real or personal property of any Indian or non-treaty Indian, except on real or personal property subject to taxation under the last three preceding sections: Provided that any person selling any article to an Indian or non-treaty Indian may take security on such article for any part of the price thereof which is unpaid.

As I read the act, any person selling a binder, a horse, a pig or any chattel to an Indian has a right to take a lien upon that property in order to satisfy his just debt.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Does that mean that the lien must be registered with the department?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not meddle much in the affairs of other counties; however, as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), has previously made inquiries in connection with the post offices of Témiscouata, he will no doubt be pleased by my inquiries in connection with the distribution of patronage in his constituency which have reference to purchases made for Indians. The following is what seems to have transpired:

> You must, no doubt, be aware that the government, in these hard times, grants to the Indians of Notre-Dame-de-Lorette, as a sustenance allowance for their families . . .

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): I think the hon. member is drifting away from the subject.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I state that this article refers to the sale—

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): I am aware that it is a question of sale, however, it has no connection with the assistance granted by the Department of Indian Affairs, it simply is a question of sale between Indians and between white people and Indians.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Indians sold scrips or orders in that locality and now the system has been changed. The section refers to sales which take place on Indian reserves, and I am, at present, discussing the sale made on a reserve.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member will have an opportunity of discussing this question when the house considers the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs or the administration of the funds set aside for Indians. I do not wish to appear discourteous to the hon. member, but I do not think that the discussion is in order, so far as section 3 is concerned.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, section 3 reads as follows:

> Section forty of the said act, as enacted by section five of chapter twenty-five of the statutes of 1930, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—
> No person shall buy or otherwise acquire from any band or irregular band of Indians or from any Indian and no Indian shall sell or otherwise dispose of to any one other than a member of the band, any cattle or other animals of any kind from any reserve in the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or the territories without the written consent of the Indian agent.

The following is an explanation of sections 3 and 4.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): Section 3 cannot cover a case which may have occurred on the Huron reserve of Quebec-Montmorency; according to the strict wording of section 3, this only refers to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and to the Territories.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The letter which I wish to read contains also strict wording—

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): I think the hon. member might postpone his remarks until the estimates of this department are brought down.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am very sorry indeed, I thought that it would interest you, sir.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): It does.

Mr. BRADETTE: I fully appreciate the second clause in that section of the act, but it seems to me it is a little too restrictive; the conditions of marketing are too strictly defined. I am referring to the fact that the federal government is assisting in connection with stock raising and so forth. There is no doubt that in some sections of the country the Indians of these reserves are increasing production. According to the spirit of the act they are supposed to offer their produce only to their own band. Now, with overproduction they have the same problem that confronts the white man. The white man has to sell his surplus to the outside world and the same principle applies to the Indian. How can this be accomplished if the Indians are not permitted to sell to anyone except their own people?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is, I think, in error in what he is stating. There is nothing to prevent an Indian, whether on an agricultural reserve or any other type of reserve, from selling any of his produce if he has a surplus. All he has to do is to apply to the agent for a permit or ask the agent to sell the goods for him, and this will be done.

Mr. REID: I think it was last year I brought to the attention of the minister a question of the responsibility of the government in regard to Indians who own motor cars. This is a very serious matter. As the minister well knows, the Indians have forsaken the cayuse and are using four-wheel chariots. I have under my hand the report of a case where a man, his wife and four of his family were almost killed through the recklessness of Indians driving a motor car. It is true those Indians had been using some loganberry wine before setting out. They were later taken before the court, one of them being sent to gaol and the other fined. At the present time, at least in British Columbia, before one is allowed to drive an automobile, he has to have a driver's licence and a licence for his car.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. gentleman is speaking to the question before the committee.

Mr. REID: That is true; the clause before the committee does not deal with the subject I have introduced, but there is not in the bill any clause dealing with it specifically, and another hon. member speaking before I did, raised a similar question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The second reading of the bill was dispensed with especially in order that its general principles might be discussed as well, in committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not aware of that. I am only aware of the rules and regulations of the house.

Mr. REID: I believe I am quite in order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can bring this question up when we go into supply. It does not come under the act.

Mr. REID: I am suggesting that some regulation be put into the act.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is speaking of a specific case in British Columbia. This clause applies only to Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or the territories.

Mr. REID: It applies to wards of the government and certain actions of Indians as such.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee must adhere to the rules and regulations, otherwise we shall not make progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the last two bills, second reading was dispensed with so that members would be entitled to discuss any feature of the Indian Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not quite right. On the second reading, the principle of the bill is discussed, not the details.

The CHAIRMAN: On the second reading, the principle of the bill may be discussed. On the third reading, my hon. friend is entitled to introduce any amendment he wishes and to discuss the question he desires to bring before the house, but he cannot disregard the rule that discussion in committee is limited to the clause under review. The discussion must be relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely the principle of the bill is the regulation of Indians who are wards of the state and any question may be asked of the minister in regard to the regulation of those wards. My hon. friend is bringing up a very important and material point in regard to wards of the state. Surely you are not going to eliminate discussion in regard to that.

The CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend is quite right, but he knows very well that in committee discussion must be strictly relevant to the section under review. If no section before the committee covers the point which the hon. member wishes to raise, he can, on third reading, bring in an amendment to add what he considers is lacking or discuss the bill when it is being finally passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are on section 3 and I find in this section clause 40 where reference is made to an irregular band of Indians. My hon. friend was referring to just that very thing—Indians who are irregular in their habits. Therefore I think he is in order in bringing up the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: If my hon. friend will read further, he will see that it refers to the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or the territories.

Mr. REID: I am willing to bow to your ruling, but an hon. member who preceded me brought up a similar question.

The CHAIRMAN: And I stopped him and referred to section 7. So far as I am concerned, I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no objection to the hon. member making the remarks he wishes.

Mr. REID: I am glad I have the indulgence of the minister as well as of the chairman. This is a very serious matter in some districts. As I say, I have before me the report of a case where a man, his wife and family were almost killed through Indians who had been using some loganberry wine which perhaps was too strong. While they were driving along at a reckless speed, they ran into this man's car. They were arrested, one being sent to gaol for sixty days and the other fined. At present in British Columbia an ordinary citizen, before he is permitted to drive a car, must have a driver's licence and also a licence for the car itself. But an Indian may purchase a car, either outright or on time, and he is let loose, so to speak, throughout the country. He knows he is a ward of the government. Under our laws it is true that the ordinary citizen may drive a car on the public streets without its being insured. If his car is in an accident he cannot run it again until he takes out insurance fully protecting the public. It is not so with the Indian. He may have as many accidents and cause as much injury as he likes, and nothing can be done against him because he is a ward of the government, so long as the government does not allow the injured party to sue. As the Indian is the ward of the government I believe the government should be responsible for the actions of its wards, just as a father is responsible for the actions of his minor children. But if the government cannot see its way to making such an enactment, it at least should be provided that after an accident the agent should be empowered to refuse the Indian the right to use his car again on the highway. The minister last year said that he would give this matter some consideration, and I would ask him now if he has done so, and whether he has in contemplation regulations to protect the public against the recklessness of Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member has stated, he did draw this question to my attention some months ago, but I think he is in error when he states that an Indian can drive a motor car on the public highways without a licence. He may drive it on the reserve without a car licence or a driver's licence, but once he leaves the reserve, unless I am greatly mistaken, it is necessary for him to take out a car licence and a driver's licence.

The hon. member also raises the point of the Indian being an irresponsible party in case of a motor car accident, and he suggests that there should be some provision whereby the Indian would be held responsible. May I draw attention to the fact that there are many white people driving cars to-day who, if they are involved in an accident with their car, have no property which can be seized in case of a judgment against them not being settled. They are in just the same position as the Indian in that respect.

Mr. REID: Not quite.

Mr. NEILL: The white man has to have car insurance.

Mr. MURPHY: In some cases, but not in all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a matter of fact, the Indian comes under the provincial law the moment he leaves the reserve.

Mr. REID: The white man can only have an accident once without taking out insurance, but an Indian can have accidents repeatedly.

Mr. MURPHY: Not off the reserve, because the provincial authorities would have the right to refuse him a licence for his car and a driver's licence, and in that way the Indian could be made amenable to the provincial law. So I think the hon. member is wrong in his contention.

Mr. NEILL: Might I explain that? The white man is, like a dog, entitled to only one bite. In British Columbia, for instance, I think the white man is allowed to have only one accident before taking out insurance fully protecting the public. The people in British Columbia at any rate have recognized that they must protect the public against these accidents caused by irresponsible people. While the law as it stands is good so far as the white man is concerned, I think it should be amended to make it even more strict so that a man cannot cause an acident with his car once without the public being fully protected against damages. As it stands now, the white man must satisfy a judgment against him before he can run his car again. That is the inducement to take out insurance. More than that, he has not only to pay the judgment against him, but he cannot run his car again until he puts up a sum of money or takes out an insurance policy guaranteeing that he will be good for any future accidents in which his car may be involved. Where the law is lacking is that it should have in it this insurance principle to begin with. A man may be running a motor truck for his livelihood, and because he is involved in an accident he is deprived of his livelihood by a judgment, say, of five or six thousand dollars, which he will never be able to pay very probably, and he is thereby deprived of ever running a car again. Even where he is able to pay the judgment, he has to take out insurance.

While the minister is probably correct in saying that once the Indian leaves the reserve he comes under the provincial law as to driver's licence, car licence, and so forth, he is not responsible financially. In my own home town a white man was very badly injured in a motor accident by an Indian, and under ordinary conditions he would have got a judgment of perhaps two thousand dollars against a white man, but he did not get a cent because the man was an Indian. Now that Indian is not going to be warned by that accident, because he did not suffer in any way, and he can go out and do the same thing to-morrow. We want to see the Indian put on the same basis as the white man in regard to responsibility. In British Columbia at least, and I understand that Ontario is following very much along the same lines, we are guaranteeing the general public against serious material loss caused by irresponsible or careless drivers, but when it comes to the Indian we are absolutely hopeless and helpless.

Mr. MURPHY: With the general remarks of the hon. member I am rather in agreement, but I do not quite agree with him in his conclusion that there is nothing to prevent the Indian who has had one accident from going out again and having another. The granting of the car licence and the driver's licence rests with the provincial government, and if the Indian is not considered by the provincial authorities a responsible party to put in control of a motor vehicle, all they have to do is to deprive him of his licence, and he is thereby deprived of the right to drive his car on the highways of the province. I think, therefore, the hon. member is wrong in his contention.

Mr. NEILL: But the civil law does not exist for the Indian, and that is the trouble. A man may cause serious damage with his car and yet not be deprived of his licence, and in the case of the Indian you have no recourse against him under the civil law. The civil law is taken away so far as the Indian is concerned.

Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur): I have not heard the whole discussion but I have not yet heard any explanation of the limitation in this section. Why is it confined to the reserves in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the territories? Why does not this provision apply to the other provinces in which there are reserves?

Mr. MURPHY: When this clause was first drafted, if my information is correct, it was drawn with particular reference to those provinces because it has been the policy of the department for a number of years to encourage the Indians in the western provinces named in this section to establish themselves by cultivating the land. It is there that the Indian who formerly obtained his livelihood through the chase, or by other means, has been induced to take up the arts of agriculture, and in order to protect him during this process of transition from a nomadic state to that of a farmer it has been considered necessary to protect him in the disposal of his produce. That is the reason why these particular provinces are mentioned in the section.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. minister and some hon. members have spoken of the irresponsibility of the Indian in the sale of his produce and in regard to automobile accidents. I am afraid that this discussion will leave the public under a false impression that the Indians are responsible when they are outside the reserve. That is not the fact. But if I am wrong I should be very pleased if the minister would amend the legislation so that it would be absolutely indisputable that an Indian outside the reserve is responsible and that if he causes an accident or if he buys something he comes under the law just the same as the white man, who can be sued and judgment obtained against him. If that is the fact, I should like to hear from the minister, and if not I beg, ask or pray that some amendments be made to the law for the protection of the public.

Mr. MURPHY: I believe the hon. member has read more into my remarks than I had intended to, or in fact did, convey. In no place in the Indian Act is the Indian described as a minor or a ward. I realize that those are terms generally used when speaking of Indians, but at no point in the act are they so described. Under the Indian Act he is described solely as an Indian. In some cases by treaty, and other cases by other means, he is given certain privileges, if they may be so called. Concerning the responsibilities of Indians on reserves, I should like to make some observations. If an Indian who has suit brought against him for damages has property off the reserve, he is in the same position as a white man, but not in cases where his personal property is owned on the reserve.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I have been a lawyer for some time in the province of Quebec, and I believe the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville is labouring under a mistaken idea. The Indian is under the same responsibility as a white man; he has the same criminal responsibility; he cannot be granted a motor car licence unless that licence be issued by provincial authorities. He is subject to all the traffic regulations and motor laws of his province. If he causes damage, he is responsible. If he has property, his responsibility is the same as that of a white man who has property and causes damage. If he has no property we come to the old French dictum: Là où il n'y a rien le roi perd ses droits: "Where there is nothing the king loses his right." If the Indian owns the automobile, in the event of his causing damage, it can be seized.

Mr. DUPUIS: No.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The hon. member is mistaken. In a case such as he has described the minor, or the Indian who is supposed to be a minor under the law, would be responsible. He is responsible for the damage he causes just the same as any other man would be. The father would be responsible only when he was aware of the minor's action, and when he had such action under his control and did not prevent it. Otherwise there could be no responsibility against a father. The minor must take the responsibility himself, and action could be taken only against him. It is the minor who pays and is responsible for the damage he causes. In the same way a man who sells to an Indian knows very well what he is doing, and if he sells to one who has no goods or no property he must take the risk, in the same way as if he were selling to a white man, or to a minor who cannot contract. Nobody is supposed to ignore the law. But if an Indian has property, or if an object which he sells has a lien against it, under the law he is responsible. Therefore, unless my understanding is incorrect, I do not see how the cases outlined by the hon. members for Laprairie-Napierville and New Westminster can be dealt with by amendments to the Indian Act. Further than that, I believe no amendment to the Indian Act could interfere with the enforcement of provincial traffic or civil laws. Those remedies rest entirely within the control of the provinces. The only action we could take would be to change the statutes pertaining to Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think Ontario law has gone that far.

Mr. DUPUIS: Ontario law, but not Quebec law.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, and Quebec law. I have had some experience pleading for Indians.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the hon. member for Montmagny would permit me I should like to refer to a case in which the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville appeared. I refer to an action which arose from an automobile accident occuring outside a reserve. The client of the hon. member suffered personal injuries and also damage to his car. He tried to sue, but was informed that the Indian was a minor and was not responsible. I believe the department told him he had no recourse. The hon. member for Montmagny has said that the Indian is on the same footing as the white man; in my view he is mistaken. Particularly is that so in the province of Quebec, and I believe his interpretation of the law would be as incorrect in regard to the other Canadian provinces. The stand taken by the Department of Indian Affairs is to the effect that Indians are not responsible. They hold that if an Indian, the owner of property, goes outside a reserve with an automobile and causes damage, but returns to the reserve, he is above the law, and nobody can sue him. To be more accurate, he could be sued, but there could be no execution against him.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I believe the hon. member is wrong in that.

[Mr. LaVergne.]

Mr. DUPUIS: Seizure of the car could be made only when it is outside the reserve. I believe if the hon. member would inquire from the minister he would learn that my information is correct.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I am not quite certain, but I believe that under the act any bailiff can enter a reserve and seize the personal goods of an Indian.

Mr. DUPUIS: No.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That is a matter however which is subject to discussion, and I must say I have heard arguments and have had judgments both ways. I am inclined to believe that if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville had gone to the court and not to the department he would have got redress.

Mr. DUPUIS: I have obtained judgment in court, but could not get execution.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not know whether I should blame the Indian, the judge or the lawyer; I am sure however it was not the lawyer. As the hon. member knows, there are some bad judgments handed out. The responsibility of the Indian exists absolutely within the law; he is responsible civilly and criminally. So far as civil responsibility is concerned there is no difference between a white man and an Indian. The point is to know how much of the damage can be repaired. In that case again the Indian is in the same position as the white man who has no money or property, or whose automobile is not paid for. I must close my remarks, because I must not set a bad example by being out of order myself.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member's remarks are most interesting.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I believe the Indian should be enfranchised, and so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, with special reference to Two Mountains, St. Regis and Caughnawaga; I believe they could claim franchise. They are here under special treaty with the King of France. At the time of the conquest they became subject to governmental authority, just the same as the other inhabitants of the country. They are British citizens, just the same as we Canadians of French origin. I understand, however, that many of the Indian bands in the province of Quebec do not want the ballot; they prefer to be wards of the nation. They have certain privileges which they do not want to give up for the fallacy, shall I call it, of the ballot. Of course usually the ballot does good, but sometimes it goes astray. I do not think we can do anything here to meet the complaints brought up by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville and the hon. member for New Westminster. These matters rest entirely with the provinces. If an amendment were passed here certainly it would be ultra vires; it would be encroaching on the rights of the provinces.

Mr. REID: I do not wish to delay the committee, but I should like to ask one question which might clear up a lot of doubt. My information is that an Indian, though he may own property on the reserve, cannot be sued for damages outside the reserve. That is my information, and that always has been my opinion. The Indian can be prosecuted and put in jail, but I understand that he cannot be sued for damages. I should like to ask the minister whether or not that is correct.

Mr. MURPHY: Not being a member of the legal fraternity or a judge I do not know that I am in a position to give a categorical answer to that question. However, my information would lead me to the conclusion that an Indian may be sued, though I am not altogether certain that if a judgment were obtained in favour of the plaintiff it could be enforced. My information is to the effect that if an Indian owns property outside the boundaries of a reserve he is in the same position as a white man. Property within the reserve would be exempt from the enforcement of such a judgment, but if in the opinion of the court such property did not belong to the reserve—a motor car, for instance—it might be seized in execution of the judgment.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Roads.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask the minister if this gives the Superintendent General authority to over-ride the Indian council.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, I think it does.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not the act before me, but I thought that in all cases the Superintendent General had power to over-ride the actions of the Indian councils. I just wondered why you should ask for this particular power.

Mr. MURPHY: At present there is nothing in the act which gives the minister any such specific authority, and that is why we are asking for it now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was referring to the general authority possessed by the Superintendent General to control the Indians and their councils if the occasion should arise. The only reason I asked the question was because I wondered why this particular case should be specified.

Mr. MURPHY: It was to enable the Superintendent General to deal with any particular case that might come up in connection with the location of a road.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I agree with the principle, but here is the point: I understood that the over-riding clause was general in its application to the whole act; it is an arbitrary right, but I believe it is necessary. My fear is that you will be asked to specify all cases in which this right exists. If you simply take one case and say it is necessary for the Superintendent General to have the authority to over-ride the council with respect to any road or road allowance I am afraid you are weakening his authority generally under the act.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am just a little curious about this section. Why should the Superintendent General have the right to say where a road should go within a reserve, when he probably never sees the reserve and knows nothing about it.

Mr. MURPHY: Of course the Superintendent General would act upon the advice of the surveyor who determined in the first place the proper location for the road. Certainly the minister would avail himself of all possible information before making a decision.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am interested in the application of this section, and I should like to preface the question I am about to ask by stating an actual case. In my constituency there are seven reserves, four of which come under what is known as the Crooked Lake agency. Crooked Lake is in a widening of the Qu'Appelle valley; it is about a mile and a half wide and about fifteen miles long. On one side of this lake there is a splendid beach, and many people living in the southeastern part of the province have established cottages at this point. In order to get to their camps they have to cross a portion of the reserve at the west end of the lake. From time to time they have had considerable difficulty with the Indians on the reserve, since they are really trespassers when they cross. Two years ago we presented a petition to the department in an effort to get a road put through the reserve, but on that occasion the Indians refused to consent to the proposition. I should like to ask the minister whether, under this section, it would be possible to take any action in this respect. There are about thirty camps in this vicinty, and I should like to know whether it would be possible for the government to open a road through the reserve which would give these people access to the beach.

Mr. MURPHY: This amendment was not designed for the purpose of giving the Superintendent General authority, generally speaking, to override the desires of the Indians. It was rather designed for a purpose such as this; suppose it is in the interests of the Indians to locate the road through that reserve. We send a surveyor from the department for the purpose of locating that road, which they themselves are willing to have constructed. The surveyor makes a report to the department as to the proper location of that road. But for some reason a few Indians may object to that location. Their reasons may or may not be well founded. In those cases it is considered by the department that the authority should rest with the Superintendent General, after receiving the best advice he can get, to determine the location of that road.

Before giving a specific answer to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle I would say that any minister charged with the responsibility of conducting Indian affairs would have to give very serious consideration to the question whether he should, in direct opposition to the general wishes of the Indians, place a road through the reserve for the sole benefit, shall we say, of white people. It was not the intention in drafting this amendment to give to the superintendent that power, or to exercise that power in that particular way, but rather to exercise it in the way I have indicated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite agree with everything the minister has said on the case cited by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle. If agreement could not be secured from the Indians the Superintendent General has authority to do these things. He may not exercise that authority, but it is given him by the act. My only reason for asking about the insertion of this particular clause was to learn why it was taken out of the general provisions of authority and segregated as dealing with roads only. I can cite a number of cases in which this particular question has arisen before. We have had difficulties with the Indian council, who are not in agreement with the provincial authorities usually when these projected highways have to pass through their reserve.

[Mr. E. E. Perley.]

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend will permit me, this is really to deal with roads in reserves for the benefit of the Indians, but not having reference to provincial highways, in respect of which expropriation powers can be exercised.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought the Superintendent General had this power. I have not the act before me, but he has very wide powers. My curiosity was aroused to know just why they are asking for this specific power.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

STATEMENT OF MR. NEILL—ALLEGED MALADMINISTRATION IN MARINE DEPARTMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish, before going into supply, to bring to the notice of the house a question of maladministration in a department. I am sorry to see that the minister in charge is not in the house, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau).

In these days when the government is at its wits' end for money, when cuts have to be made in almost every estimate, and when economy has to be practised to the extent that it almost becomes false economy, it very much becomes the government and the several departments to be particularly careful to prevent anything that savours of waste, uselessness, abuse or graft, to avoid what is called even the appearance of evil. The policy I have adopted in such matters if such have been brought to my attention has been this; I would bring the matter complained of to the attention of the particular minister, and if he took steps to rectify it, to get restitution from the parties concerned if it were a case of money improperly spent, and to check the abuse complained of, I was satisfied with that and the matter went no further. I did not bring it to the floor of the house or the public platform and seek to make political capital of it. Some of the minister's colleagues are aware that I have acted in that way. But, in a case where they refuse to take any action, propose to brazen it out as justified, then I think it is my duty to bring the matter to the attention of the house, not only as a warning to others but to demonstrate to my constituents that I at least have no part or parcel in the transaction complained of.

Through nearly all these matters of complaint, in my district at any rate, I find running the black thread of the abuse of government patronage; government patronage somewhat crudely manipulated through the agency of a gentleman who is euphemistically described as the government representative in the district of Comox-Alberni, in sharp contrast to the representative of the people, the man they elected to represent them in parliament. This system, or lack of system, is of course entirely subversive of the democratic form of government under which we are supposed to live. It leads to autocratic and almost despotic use of power for which there is no authority granted by any section of the people. We were told in bygone centuries that kings governed by divine right. But this is beyond that, they do not even pretend to have divine right, they derive this power, which is too often a temptation to abuse, from the mere fact that they are associated with some political party.

The instance to which I wish to draw attention centres around a man whom I am not going to name because I do not wish to hold him up to public obloquy too much. I will merely describe him as Mr. Man. He possesses a somewhat peculiar entity. A couple of generations ago theological circles were much exercised by consideration of the true meaning to be ascribed to the idea of the Trinity. Did it really mean what it said or was it a figure of speech, the idea of three in one and one in three, yet not three, but one and yet not one, but three? I am confronted with the extension of this puzzling doctrine to this gentleman because of the combination of identities. It is not only a case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, it is a sort of square-root problem because he possesses not one entity but four, yet he is not four men but only one.

The first official appearance, and in which he does not appear as a returned man, is that of mail carrier. This position was formerly held by a married man and was given to this man without advertising or without recourse to the Civil Service Commission. He draws only the sum of $10 per month, not a large amount but nevertheless there are thousands of single men to-day in British Columbia and probably in other parts of Canada upon relief who receive only $6 per month. I am sure that a man receiving $10 per month would have to have very strong political pull in order to obtain any relief.

One would think that this might suffice, but there is a second reincarnation in which he appears, and again not as a returned man—that of provincial road foreman on relief work. This is a sort of intermittent position, it runs on a sliding scale. If any other of his positions come into the landscape and he is afforded an opportunity of earning some money, the relief work is shut down and the men sent home until he has completed the work upon his other position or positions. when he has nothing else to do he returns to the relief work.

His third identity, again not as a returned man, is as a patrolman. For some years he has held this position which operates for four months in the year and pays, I believe, $90 per month. I understand there is a section in the Civil Service Act which states that a man shall not hold two positions. I do not think it says a man shall not hold four positions, but apparently it was not contemplated that such a thing would happen. It might be thought that a man working four months in the year and receiving $90 per month might well be able to make way for someone harder up than himself. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that anyone in British Columbia would have to possess very strong political pull to be able to get any relief while holding a position bringing in $350 a year. I said he was not a returned man, but he displaced a returned man. This man had a particularly fine record both as a soldier and as a patrolman, so much so that the permanent officials complimented him upon his work. My statement can be checked up when I say that there was not the least tinge of suspicion of any political action on the part of this man which would justify his being let out or not being reappointed.

So there are three positions which we find Mr. Man occupying. One would think that that would suffice, but we find him, again not as a returned man, in another reincarnation, as contractor to the government of the day. Before I give the particulars of this position perhaps I should refer to another situation which may explain the other four. This man was prominent in politics and during one of his periods of employment as patrolman he took four days off in order to attend a political convention—the government paid him for those four days. Perhaps this political association explains in part the other four activities which providence has been so kind as to bestow upon him. Contractors have been known to lose money even when dealing with a government but I do not think anyone would be so foolish or so ill-advised as to lose money when allowed to write his own ticket. This man was allowed to write his own contract which stated very definitely the money he was to receive and very indefinitely the work he was to perform in order to receive that money. The work he was to do consisted of repairing some five bridges on a trail, each one four to six feet wide. The usual method adopted in such a case by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) would be to have an engineer report upon the necessities and requirements of the work. The marine department has an engineer directly in charge of this work and located not very far away. One would suppose that specifications would be prepared by an engineer and tenders invited and that, all things being equal, the lowest tender would be accepted possibly with the requirement that a bond be furnished that the work would be carried out.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of dominion work?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, these bridges are on a life-saving trail managed by the Department of Marine and under direct charge of its engineer.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What trail is that?

Mr. NEILL: On the trail between Bamfield and Pachena. One would have expected that all these reasonable and sensible regulations would have been carried out in disposing of this matter, but in fact none of them were—I am told that an estimate of a sort was made by a certain gentleman I have the very highest regard for this man in his own particular line of business, he is a man of outstanding ability in that regard but he is not an engineer; he is not qualified to do work of this kind, more especially when there is an engineer in charge of the work. One might appreciate very highly the abilities of an astronomer but one would not employ him to design a cathedral. I put small weight upon the estimate obtained in this regard; I think I am justified in saying that the principal criterion was the man's own tender.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Do I understand that my hon. friend does not want to mention the name of that contractor?

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to do it in the house. The hon. minister is well aware of this matter, why bring this man before the public? I will name him if I am required to, but I have my file going back as far as last October. If the minister is not aware of this man's name, he should be. Here is my letter upon the subject two pages in length; have I got an answer to that? No, of course not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does not my hon. friend think that he should give the name of that man? In fairness to the house I think my hon. friend should have told the minister concerned that he intended to bring up this matter to-day upon the motion to go into supply. I am sorry that he did not, because he knows very well that a minister cannot keep in his mind all the details of his department. Usually all communications go to the deputy minister, not to the minister himself. Unless the minister is advised that a matter concerning his department will be brought before the house, it is very difficult for hon. members to get the whole story. Had I had at least an hour's notice, I could probably have given an answer to my hon. friend. In fairness to the house, he should have given that notice and at least he should give the name of that contractor.

Mr. NEILL: The minister asks why I did not advise him that I was going to bring this up. I shall reply: Why should I? Perhaps he was not in the chamber when I explained that my policy was not to bring these matters up in the house, but after I have brought a case to the attention of the minister, without redress, as a last resort I introduce it here. When you cannot get replies to letters and representations, that is the time to bring a matter up in the house as the last court of resort.

He has said that I should give the man's name. I am not charging the man with anything; I am charging the department and I am giving the department's name and the minister's name. He knows the name; he has the correspondence. I have the file before me. I have been writing to the minister since October. If, sir, you rule that I should give the name, I shall do so; there is nothing in the world to prevent except that this man is a very faithful and loyal friend of the party opposite and I did not want to make unnecessary trouble. If the minister insists, I shall give it before I finish, but I cannot see what particular benefit there will be to anyone because I am not complaining of the man. He did what any man would do. You cannot expect a man to refuse to take four jobs if he can get them. I am complaining of the department that permitted this sort of thing. That is my grievance.

There were no specifications; there was only the contractor's own bid, very vaguely expressed in loose language. The price was an extravagant one. He stipulated, and quite properly, that all material for the job should be furnished by the government and delivered on the road. He also stipulated that he should be paid half the price in the middle of the contract. Therefore he had absolutely no investment; he was out no money and certainly he took no risk. He did not have to buy material and he did not have to pay labour, because he stipulated that it should be paid when he was half through. There, is however, in the tender one provision that I should like to read. He says:

> This figure $1,000 will mean contingent with good weather. That means the start must be made about the middle of August and that the work would be completed by November 1.

That, I take it, is two and a half months which he thought would be about the time necessary in the middle of summer. The job was actually completed, not in two and a half months, but in one month, showing how much quicker he did it than he had anticipated. The best information I have—and I shall not be too definite on this point, but I believe it to be correct—is that he employed three men, one of whom got about $80 out of it, another one somewhat less and a third about $60, making a total of $220. But to leave a wide margin for any doubt or error, let us say that it cost $300. This leaves him a clear profit of $700 on a $1,000 contract, not an investment of $1,000, because all he invested was his time for one month, or, say, $100. Thus, he makes a profit of something like 700 per cent. Seven hundred dollars a month comes to $8,400 a year, which is almost as good as being on the tariff board, and this in addition to these other side lines which also brought in their recompense in due or undue season.

The minister complains of my bringing this matter up at this time, but I am doing so before his estimates are reached. They are not going to be the first ones taken, as I see the Minister of National Defence is ready to go on, so that the minister will have ample opportunity to secure his information and make such defence as he can. I shall anticipate some of it and also my answer. I shall be told that the contractor was a very nice man. I have been told that. I do not deny it; I never did deny it. Highwaymen have been known to be of jovial character. Bill Miner, who robbed the Canadian Pacific, was in private life a man of estimable repute. and was teaching Sunday school a week before he robbed the train, so that a defence of that sort does not cut very much ice. Then we will be told that he is a very good bridge builder. That is nonsense. He is or was a fish buyer. The good bridge building that was done was done by one of his employees. Then we are told that he had to supply the tools and camp equipment. That sounds as if he had to invest a great deal of money. Everybody who lives in the bush on the west coast of Vancouver island owns an axe and a cross-cut saw which, with perhaps the exception of a canthook, are about all the tools needed. But do not let it be forgotten that I pointed out earlier that this man was a provincial road foreman, so that he would have access to the road foreman's tools, and he would not be out of pocket a nickel for providing the tools for the job. As for the camp equipment, they lived in a government house rent free practically the whole time, so that the camp equipment did not cost him very much. As the house was empty, there was no reason why he should not live in it, but one does not need to put very much weight on the cost of camp equipment in his contract.

Then we are told the reason the man got the job in this way was that the department, animated by a very proper desire to deal with the local unemployment situation, stipulated that only local men should be employed. Well, I have the tender before me and it contains nothing about employing local men. But that argument falls to the ground because there were plenty of local men there. The job could have been put up to competition and local men could still have got it; it could still have been stipulated that local men should be employed. There was no reason that this particular man should get a contract at $1,000 when it was worth about $500, in order that local men should be employed. I guarantee that if this had been put up for tender locally, the government could have got it done for $500 and probably less.

It may be said that I am taking up the time of the house over what is, after all, a petty graft of $700. Yes, but it is illustrative. If the contract had been for a million dollars, the rake-off would have been $700,000 which is quite a large sum. If they do these things in the green tree, says Scripture, what shall be done in the dry? For days here we have sat and listened to comments made—and I joined in them, so I am not complaining of them—by hon. members on both sides, on what was termed the theories, the vague theories, if you like, of a body known as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. But if one hundred men had spoken for 100 days on that subject they would not have done the party to my left the harm that this incident has done them good. Or to put it another way, one hundred men talking for a hundred days cannot undo the harm to our political system which this incident has done in the minds of the people, because people are in a touchy mood just now. Unfortunately the man who is hungry or on the verge of hunger, hard up, bitter with the loss of his money or position, does not reason with all the philosophy of a university professor, and cannot take his broadminded view of things. The man who has no work and who is told that he has to make $6 a month keep him, the married man who is told that he has to keep his wife on $3.50 a month—these are facts in British Columbia—the man who sees work left undone that ought to be done from every consideration, the man who sees no prospect of work either now or for some long time to come—these men I say are in no humour or mental condition to think it all out and apportion accurately the blame for such a deal. They will not entirely blame it, as perhaps they should, on the government representative who is primarily responsible, or on the minister or even on the government. But unfortunately they do ascribe it, not to the abuses of the system, but to the system itself, and they are very apt to say, and I know that they do say—"To perdition"—they use a shorter word—"with the whole system." But it is not the system that is at fault, but the abuses of it. The minds of these men form a very fertile seed-bed for doctrines, not of our friends to the left of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but of a far more destructive character. They are ready to listen to any form of communistic ideas because they are so disgusted with that sort of thing.

That is but one instance, and a small one. Multiply it by a score for the district I represent, and then multiply that again by 244 for the other seats in this house, and can you wonder that there is discontent and unrest and dissatisfaction, and leanings towards communism, and people saying: "They are all rotten; let us wipe the whole lot out." They include me because these things cast discredit on us all, and the people do not discriminate. They do not say that this man is wrong and that man is right; they simply say, to h— with the whole thing, and they are apt to fall into the clutches of people standing by who are only too ready to inject this bolshevist communist doctrine into their minds. That is one of the unfortunate features of this thing.

I have laid the matter before the house, and as I said in answer to the minister a moment ago, if he had replied to my letter on the subject and said that he would take steps to check it up—the thing is going on to-day, because this man has two jobs; he is a patrol man and a mail contractor—I should not have had to bring it before the house, but the minister did not take that step, and now he protests because I bring the matter up here and says that I am unfair and that I did not tell him. I did tell him, and he might have known that if I did not get redress I would take the matter to the highest court. There is the situation, and I hope that the minister will reply. I shall be interested to hear his answer. He does not have to give it now. He will have time to communicate with his officials, and perhaps we shall be able to get the information later in the evening.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Civil pensions—life pension to Robert Allen, $269.52; life pension to Walter Pettipas, $515.90; life pension to Florence Walker and children, $450; life pension to Arnold Truman Townsend, $420; life pension to Michael Mountain, $420.

Mr. GRAY: Are there any new items here?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): No, these are all old items.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like the minister to explain this vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The pension to Robert Allen is for injuries received while a civilian employee awaiting enlistment in the mechanical transport in 1916. The life pension to Walter Pettipas is for loss of sight due to an explosion at Halifax in 1916. The life pension to Mrs. Florence Walker is for the death of her husband killed by an exploding shell in the performance of his duty at Fort Clarence, Halifax, in 1923. That pension had been higher, but has been cut down this year owing to one of the daughters having reached an age where she is not eligible for the allowance. The pension to Arnold Townsend is for injuries received on the Canadian Government Steamship Constance in 1917. The pension to Michael Mountain is for injuries sustained on His Majesty's Canadian ship Festubert in 1926. All these are cases which do not come under workmen's compensation because of the employees being in the government service, but the pensions are calculated at workmen's compensation rates for the province.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—National Defence —militia services, $74,000; naval services, $500.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Ever since the war there have been a number of claims turning up from time to time which would have been settled immediately after the war had the claims then been presented; for instance, claims for separation allowance, war service gratuity, and pay and allowances. This vote also includes the upkeep of the historical section entrusted with the compiling of a history of the war; the supply of war medals, and so forth. There is also an item of $19,000 for war graves of men who die from war service but are not under the care, when they die, of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. COOTE: What progress is being made with the preparation of the history of the war?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Very good progress is being made, and we expect that the first general volume will be published during the current year. This vote includes an item of $6,000 to pay for the publication of 5,000 copies of the first volume.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is mention in the vote of appropriations not required for 1933-34. What were those appropriations required for before?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They do not have to do with this department, and never had to my knowledge.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then why put them under this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not tell you. They have nothing to do with this department. It is simply the way the estimates are compiled.

Mr. STEVENS: Appropriations that appeared last year and are not required this year always are mentioned in this way in the estimates presented to parliament. It is in all our estimates, and has been for years. It is a matter of form followed by those who compile the item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But we ought to know the details.

Mr. STEVENS: To show details would only clog up the records.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not expect the details on the record; I want the minister to tell us what they are.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It has nothing to do with the department.

Mr. GRAY: Were they there last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, for years and years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not the information concerning last year's estimates before me.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is compiling the history of the war?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is under the direction of Colonel Duguid, who is in charge of the historical section.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has he an assistant, or is he doing the work alone?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: He obtains all necessary assistance from the historical section.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the work be published in both English and French?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no provision in this vote for publication in both languages.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to ask the minister to see to it that when the history is completed it be printed in both languages.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is a reasonable request, and I shall consider it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When the publication is issued, will it appear in both languages?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot promise it under this vote, but I can see the reasonableness of the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. McGIBBON: When will the Book of Remembrance be completed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should prefer to answer that question under the next vote.

Mr. GRAY: Under the vote now before us there would appear to be a decrease of half a million dollars. In my view that is the net result of the figures shown in the item. In addition to the half a million dollars there is a further decrease of $8,000. In the estimates presented last year a decrease of $3,217,500 was shown. I may be dense, but I should like to know why this item is carried year after year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My only reply would be that so far as this item was concerned only $82,500 was voted last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was the $500,000 required for use in the fiscal year 1932-33? If so, how was it spent? From the estimates we might be led to believe that the government is saving half a million dollars, whereas I believe the minister will admit that such is not the fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The $500,000 was not voted for my department last year; there is no doubt about that. The fact is it was not voted at all in the main estimates.

Mr. GRAY: Last year there was a decrease of $3,217,500.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My impression is that formerly the item concerning the adjustment of war claims had to do with some other departments which are not now interested, and that the Department of National Defence is the only department now needing the money.

Mr. GRAY: I suggest the item be allowed to stand for further explanation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I also am of that opinion.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know whether since the war any publications have been made by the historical section?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, there have been some. It has been responsible for circulating to Canadian participants chapters of the British official history of the war, and for editing same. It has assisted regimental historians to write and publish acounts concerning individual units of the Canadian expeditionary force. It provides historical and biographical information as called for and is arranging material necessary for the completion of the Book of Remembrance. In addition to that it has published a number of historical monographs for official purposes.

Mr. COOTE: Is the first book to be published this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, the first general volume this year.

Item stands.

Battlefields memorials, $76,500.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This vote has appeared in the estimates ever since the conclusion of the war, and concerns the money made available for the erection of memorials in France and Belgium, of which there are eight. Seven of them are now completed, the only one remaining for completion being the one at Vimy.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the reason for the decrease?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The masonry work on the Vimy memorial is entirely completed. All the stone is in place, so that the only further expense is that connected with finishing and sculpture work. The cost of the stone and of putting it in place is now paid for.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code (unlawful associations).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I stated when this bill was introduced, Mr. Speaker, it proposes to repeal section 98 of the criminal code, dealing with unlawful associations. Apparently there has been a very great deal of misapprehension with regard to the purpose of the bill; I think a good many people are not quite aware of the exact character and far-reaching extent of the section which it is proposed to repeal.

Let me say that a number of efforts have been made to have this section of the criminal code repealed. I introduced legislation along this line in 1922 and in 1923. Mr. McMaster, then the member for Brome, introduced a similar bill in 1925, and the Minister of Justice under the Liberal administration introduced bills repealing this section in 1926, 1928, 1929 and 1930. In 1929 the bill failed to pass the Senate by only three votes, so those who now speak so strongly against anyone who would venture to repeal this section of the criminal code must remember that the matter has been very fully discussed in this house again and again, and that it found favour with a majority of the members.

In the earlier days, when we sought to get rid of this piece of legislation we were told that it was a dead letter, that it never had been used and probably never would be used. As a matter of fact, however, there are now some eight communists in Kingston penitentiary who were convicted under this legislation. I should like to point out that these men did not commit any overt act whatever. They were not convicted of urging the use of force, nor were they convicted of using force.

They were convicted of belonging to an association which was said to be affiliated with a body in Russia which did believe in the use of force; on that type of evidence they were convicted. If my understanding is correct the general spirit of British law is absolutely opposed to that kind of legislation. We have been taught that a man can be convicted only when he has actually committed some crime, but these men have not been convicted of any crime. They were convicted for holding a certain belief, and I say that is something quite new in British law.

The various labour bodies have protested from time to time against this legislation, not because they were favourable to communist doctrines but because they felt that the law could be used against trade unions; its terms are very broad indeed. I may say that they also feel that the legislation is wrong in itself. Not only the labour bodies have protested; other organizations have protested as well. In June of last year the Montreal and Ottawa conference of the United Church adopted a resolution in this connection, and I understand that the resolution was endorsed by the general council meeting at Hamilton, although I have not documentary proof in that regard. This is the resolution that was adopted at Montreal:

> Concerning a communication from the Canadian Labour Defense League, complaining of police repression of freedom of speech; of the arrest of labour leaders, their transportation far from home to Halifax, and the attempt to deport them without trial; and of the harshness of the criminal code in relation to alleged unlawful associations.
> Your committee would report that it has had no opportunity to investigate the cases alleged violence against workmen and labour organizers, cited by the Canadian Labour Defense League; nor does it think the conference the best body to undertake such investigation.
> Your committee nevertheless recognizes;
> First, that efforts of the working masses to improve their lot, and even to effect a different social order, are inevitable in the present situation.
> Second, that the necessity for serious changes in the social structure is widely recognized in intellectual and professional circles everywhere, and in the commercial community itself.
> Third, that the Christian church would be untrue to herself, a traitor to humanity, and an ally of reaction, if she were indifferent to the present tragic situation of the labouring masses, and their efforts after self-betterment.
> Your committee therefore recommends that the Montreal and the Ottawa conference memorialize the general council and request its own presbyteries to make earnest efforts through their relevant boards and committees to secure:
> 1. That freedom of speech receive such safeguards in Canada as it has long received in Great Britain;
> 2. That disturbance of the peace and other violations of law among the foreign born be dealt with as in the case of the Canadian born; and that they be not made a pretext for the expulsion from Canada of people lawfully resident here, whose real offense is their social views;
> 3. That representations be made to the government of Canada concerning the harsh and unreasonable features of the criminal code dealing with alleged unlawful associations, and especially concerning section 98, clause 3, which says:
> "any person who wears, carries or causes to be displayed upon or about his person or elsewhere a badge, insignia, emblem, banner, motto, button, or other device whatsoever indicating or intending to show or suggest that he is a member of, or in any wise associated with, any such unlawful association, shall be guilty of an offense and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years."
> 4. That efforts be made to secure that police authorities everywhere do not yield to panic, and the violence which panic produces, but that they recognize that firmness, with patience and understanding, are the qualities required in our distressed and critical days.

I submit that when such disinterested bodies as conferences of the United Church undertake to go that far in protest, it ill behooves any member of this chamber simply to brush aside such considerations. It seems to me that we must face the need for the revision of legislation that in its essence is opposed to the general principles of British freedom.

The legal aspect of this question is dealt with quite fully in the August 1932 number of the Queen's Quarterly, in an article by Mr. F. R. Scott, of the department of law of McGill University. Mr. Scott points out that:

> The communist party is a lawful and recognized political party in almost every civilized country to-day. Its members are sitting in parliaments in France, Germany and Czechoslovakia; it once had a member in the English House of Commons; in Canada, besides the fact that it has contested Dominion, provincial and municipal elections frequently, it was at one time represented on the Winnipeg city council. Only in Italy, Japan, Poland and some of the more reactionary Balkan states is the party completely outlawed. By the Toronto verdict Canada has allied herself with this group of select reactionaries. She is the only country amongst them which claims to be a democracy.

Mr. Scott then goes on to discuss the legal aspects of the case. May I point out that it is not a novel thing for men to hold that under certain circumstances the use of force is justifiable? A great many writers on law have held that in certain instances the use of force is ethically justifiable, and is the last resort of every free man. I am not taking that position; I simply point out that the use of force is frequently justified.

I should like to give an instance—If I remember aright, I cited it once before in this house in another connection—that occurred in my own city of Winnipeg, as reported in the Manitoba Free Press. Mr. R. B. Graham, K.C., was proposing a toast to England, the occasion being the usual St. George's night dinner of the society over which the president, Mr. Jackson Dodds, O.B.E. presided as chairman. Music was furnished during and after the dinner by the regimental band of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. Mr. Graham is reported to have said in the course of his address:

> No nation ever became truly great save by successful sedition and revolution. The lamp and the torch and the tumult have overcome tyranny. The signature of King John was placed to the Magna Charta, wrenched from him by the nobles; revolution led King Charles to the block; the corn law riots—these were crimes against the law and seditions, but no one hangs his head in shame because of them. "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," were no mere catchwords as in the French revolution, but the expression of the earnest striving for the substance that lies behind the words.

My point is that if the use of force under certain circumstances is so well recognized by our own leading men, and has been so generally recognized all down through the years, it seems very like persecution to set up a law that permits a certain group of men whose opinions are repugnant to the majority of people in Canada to be persecuted simply for holding that in certain contingencies resort must be had to force.

I should like to call attention to the very far-reaching character of the clauses of the act. Section 98 reads:

> Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force . . .

I submit that that word "force" is altogether too broad in this connection. It may be that the government feels it necessary to take precautions against men who deliberately set about to organize military force or to bring about governmental changes by physical force. But, why not say so? This force may mean what is generally termed moral force. It may be used to cover what is often called intimidation. In connection with an historical trial in the west the judge took the ground that any group of people, such as trade unions, that attempted to force its opinions in any way upon the public would be guilty of the use of force; that is, the strength of trade unionism exercised in an ordinary strike, without any recourse to violence, would bring the people behind it under the terms of this act.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Again, the second clause reads:

> Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association, or held or suspected to be held by any person for or on behalf thereof may, without warrant, be seized or taken possession of by any person thereunto authorized by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and may thereupon be forfeited to His Majesty.

There again I would call the attention of the house to the fact that it is not necessary that such property should actually belong to such an association; it is sufficient that certain people should think it belongs to the association. So long as somebody, the proper people, suspect that there is something wrong, suspicion becomes the ground upon which action may be taken, and then the property may be seized and confiscated. I submit that is contrary to the spirit of British law. We have always been told that men ought to be accused on certain definite grounds and regularly tried, and that it is only then that anything can be done with their property. But in this case their property can be seized without warrant and confiscated. It is a very far-reaching measure; it takes away anything like the liberties which we all thought we enjoyed.

Again, coming to subsection 4:

> In any prosecution under this section, if it be proved that the person charged has—
> (a) attended meetings of an unlawful association; or
> (b) spoken publicly in advocacy of an unlawful association; or
> (c) distributed literature of an unlawful association by circulation through the post office mails of Canada, or otherwise; it shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he is a member of such unlawful association.

I am not a lawyer, but I have always been taught that a man is considered innocent until he is proven guilty. Here he is considered to be guilty unless he himself can prove he is innocent. I cannot see how we can justify legislation of that kind.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the hon. member if he is aware that there is legislation of that sort upon the statute books of, I think, every province?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am aware it is here in the code; I say I do not think it is justified.

Mr. GEARY: Liquor, motor vehicles.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the hon. member does not mean that this is justified because there is other vicious legislation. I am aware that in some cases the police are given wide powers to act in case of suspicion. It may be that in liquor cases, it may be presumed, if a man has liquor, unless there is evidence to the contrary, that it is contraband or whatever it may be. There may be the possibility of justification in such cases as that. It is an altogether different matter when a man can be tried and held to be guilty of unlawful association simply because he has certain literature in his possession.

Mr. GEARY: I was wondering if my hon. friend knew how legislation similar to that had been interpreted in the courts? The burden of proof still lies where it was and the presumption of innocence is still the same.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not very familiar with court procedure but I think it is clear that any magistrate who happened to be unfavourable or prejudiced could use this legislation in an unfair way. Subsection 5 reads:

> Any owner, lessee, agent or superintendent of any building, room, premises or place, who knowingly permits therein any meeting of an unlawful association or any subsidiary association or branch or committee thereof, or any assemblage of persons who teach, advocate, advise or defend the use, without authority of the law, of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, shall be guilty of an offence under this section and shall be liable to a fine of not more than five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for not more than five years, or to both fine and imprisonment.

It is quite true that the phrase "who knowingly permits" has a safeguarding effect, but on the other hand it might be very difficult for such an owner to prove that he did not know the character of the organization which was meeting in his hall. It is not merely one particular organization that is declared to be unlawful; this subsection covers any subsidiary association or branch or committee thereof. As is well known to hon. members of this house, there are what are really subsidiaries of the communist party. One branch devotes itself to the defence of its members who may be arrested, while another is engaged in the industrial fields in organizing the trades unions and so on. It would be quite easy for such a subsidiary wishing to hold a meeting to represent itself as an independent organization and later on be charged with being a subsidiary of the communist party and hence an unlawful organization. The owner of a hall where such a meeting had been held would be liable to a heavy fine or imprisonment. As I stated last year, the police have attempted to frighten hall owners so that many of them will not take the risk of permitting meetings to be held within their halls. When someone comes along and attempts to rent their halls, they say: "This may be unlawful; I will not take the risk." Many lawful organizations have found it impossible to find a hall wherein to hold a meeting. Subsection 6 reads:

> If any judge or any superior or county court, police or stipendiary magistrate, or any justice of the peace, is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any contravention of this section has been or is about to be committed, he may issue a search warrant under his hand, authorizing any peace officer, police officer, or constable with such assistance as he may require, to enter at any time any premises or place mentioned in the warrant, and to search such premises or place, and every person found therein, and to seize and carry away any books, periodicals, pamphlets, pictures, papers, circulars, cards, letters, writings, prints, handbills, posters, publications or documents which are found on or in such premises or place, or in the possession of any person therein at the time of such search, and the same, when so seized, may be carried away and may be forfeited to His Majesty.

Here we have what has generally been considered as a reprehensible practice, the general search warrant. The house will note that the grounds for issuing this search warrant are contained in the words "reasonable ground for suspecting." Who is to determine just when the ground is reasonable? I can well understand a magistrate thinking there was reasonable ground for suspecting any party which was not of his own faith. The section goes even further; it says: "reasonable ground for suspecting that any contravention of this section has been or is about to be committed." Such a clause to my mind is absolutely outrageous. If anyone suspects that a crime is to be committed, he can act forthwith. It is against everything we have been taught of British law and fair play.

An hon. MEMBER: Wait until the house burns down, is that the idea?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You cannot convict a man of arson before the house has burned down. Certain religious bodies might be subject to the provisions of this subsection. If we may judge by certain publications of their critics, they suspect everybody of being guilty of the most fearful crimes. Subsection 8 reads:

> Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, sells or offers for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind, in which is taught, advocated, advised or defended, or who shall in any manner teach, advocate, or advise or defend the use, without authority of law, of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, as a means of accomplishing any governmental, industrial, or economic change or otherwise, shall be guilty of an offence, and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

Here we have the law written in very wide and dangerous terms. If a bookseller should read the advertisement of a publisher in England and send for his book, not knowing just what was in it, and that book should advocate force, then he would be liable to twenty years in prison. There are scores of books in our parliamentary library of that very nature. I do not know what would happen to me if I should return some of them through the mails; I suppose I would be liable to a twenty year sentence. Subsections 9, 10 and 11 read:

9. Any person who circulates or attempts to circulate or distribute any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication, or document of any kind, as described in this section, by mailing the same or causing the same to be mailed or posted in any post office, letter box, or other mail receptacle in Canada, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

10. Any person who imports into Canada from any other country, or attempts to import by or through any means whatsoever, any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind as described in this section, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

11. It shall be the duty of every person in the employment of His Majesty in respect of His Government of Canada, either in the Post Office Department, or in any other department to seize and take possession of any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document, as mentioned in this section, upon discovery of the same in the post office mails of Canada or in or upon any station, wharf, yard, car, track, motor or other vehicle, steamboat or other vessel upon which the same may be found and when so seized and taken, without delay to transmit the same, together with the envelopes, coverings and wrappings attached thereto, to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The officials of the customs department and the post office are to be turned into a set of spies. Everybody is supposed to be on the lookout for anything that might come under the category herein enumerated. The reason I have been so urgent in my request that this legislation be repealed is that I believe it is un-British in character and may easily lead to very great abuses.

May I call attention to the sentence which, according to this legislation, may be imposed, that of twenty years. Several years ago in the case of sedition the term was lessened from twenty to two years. I fancy sedition is just as serious a crime as that of belonging to an unlawful association, but sedition is now punishable by only a two year penitentiary sentence, whereas this crime of unlawful association is still punishable by a twenty year penitentiary sentence. There does not seem to be any real reason for the difference in the length of sentences provided for these offences.

I do not know it is necessary for me to say that I am not an advocate of force. I have repeatedly in the house opposed the use of force and I shall continue to do so. But I do not believe we should be unfair even to those who hold the other view, and certainly I do not think we should proceed to convict men for simply holding certain beliefs, unless they commit some overt act.

One other word before I resume my seat. I have no interest whatever in the Communist party as such. In all our recent elections I have been opposed by the Communist party. Some of my colleagues think I am very stupid to do anything at all that would give the Communist party a chance of carrying on in this country. I am not urging the repeal of this legislation in order that there should be a free advocacy of the use of force in Canada. I do say, however, that under other sections of the criminal code there is ample provision that if a man advocates the use of force, he may be arrested, tried and convicted, and then, if he is a foreigner, he may be deported. But I protest against designating a certain group as an unlawful association and I protest against this legislation which may so readily lead to serious abuses.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on many occasions during recent years the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has made an effort in this house to repeal the section of our criminal code known as section 98, which deals generally with the subject of sedition. If I remember correctly, the bill which he attempted to introduce into the house last year was a much more modest one than that which he now proposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I correct the hon. gentleman? I attempted to introduce this bill, but was not permitted. Later on I introduced another of a more moderate character.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bill that I recall provided, so far as the main section 98 is concerned, merely that the word "physical" should be inserted before the word "force", to make it clear that what was intended was physical force. The other amendments, as I recall them, were to modify or repeal some of the subsections of section 98 which the hon. member has discussed in his speech to-night. The hon. member has this year grown more bold, and now proposes to wipe out the whole section.

Section 98 had its genesis in, I think, the session of 1918. I remember on that occasion I was chairman of a special committee of the house to which the draft bill was referred, and I believe the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was also a member of that committee. The committee held several meetings at which there was more or less prolonged discussion, and when a conclusion was finally reached, I think there was a majority of only one in the committee in favour of reporting to the House of Commons the bill as it stands on the statute book to-day. After the report was received by the house, it was adopted and legislation was subsequently enacted which still stands as section 98 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Notwithstanding the fact that this legislation has been in operation in Canada for something like fifteen years, prosecutions under this section have been, we are happy to say, extremely rare. I believe the section was invoked at the time of the Winnipeg strike in 1919 and certain convictions then took place. I am not aware that the section was invoked again until about a year or a year and a quarter ago in the city of Toronto where certain prosecutions occurred of individuals who were charged with belonging to the Communist Association of Canada. In these prosecutions eight men were convicted under section 98. The conviction was appealed from the trial court to the Court of Appeal of Ontario; the latter court confirmed the decision of the trial court and found in precise language that the Communist Association of Canada was an unlawful association under terms of section 98 of the criminal code, and the eight men who had been convicted were sentenced to terms in a Canadian penitentiary. I am not personally aware of any other prosecutions under that section, or, if such did take place, I am not aware that any other convictions were registered.

It has been represented throughout the length and breadth of Canada that section 98 as it stands upon the Criminal Code of Canada to-day is in some way aimed at and directed against what we recognize as trade and labour associations. Such is not in any respect the case. The section has no application whatever to those organizations which we know as labour organizations and so far as I am aware no labour organization and no trade union has ever been prosecuted under section 98; it is not intended that any should be. I do not believe the provisions of the section have ever been invoked against labour organizations or trade unions in any part of the dominion, but the section has been invoked against associations which may be described unlawful, and unlawful for the reason that they are associations which advocate the use of force, violence and intimidation as a means to change the laws and to subvert or overturn the government of this country. It is for this reason that section 98 declares such associations to be unlawful and if any association is proved to be an unlawful association, the consequences follow; the law takes its course and the members of such associations are convicted and imprisoned.

In the year 1918, when this law first appeared upon the statute book of Canada, there was considerable unrest throughout the dominion, and section 98 was aimed to check unrest and secure peace and tranquillity. Unrest is perhaps too mild a word to use, having regard to the strike which took place in Winnipeg in May 1919. I will admit that two or three years after the enactment of section 98 war conditions in Canada had considerably subsided and unrest had to a large extent vanished. I think probably for four or five or even six years after the war, indeed up until the year 1929 or 1930, there was little or no occasion to invoke the aid of section 98. But if there was reason to pass such a section in 1918 there is certainly reason to keep such a section in force in the year 1933. We know, and I need not occupy the time of the house in stating it, that there is very serious unrest in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and in some instances of a very alarming nature. We know that there are a number of dangerous organizations and associations operating throughout the length and breadth of this dominion to-day under a variety of names. I was glad to hear my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre describe one organization, namely the Canadian Labour Defence League, as a subsidiary of the communist organization which has already been declared by the courts of Ontario to be an unlawful association under section 98.

I am sufficiently aware of the activities of the Canadian Labour Defence League to say that it is the communist society of Canada operating under another name. I have evidence in my department which would convince any man that my statement is correct, and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that throughout the length and breadth of this dominion the Canadian Labour Defence League is operating to-day in a most insidious manner. Where the league gets its financial support I do not know; I can only surmise; but financial support it certainly has. I learn of the activities of this association through petitions from every quarter of this dominion. I am not overstating the case when I say that I have hundreds and hundreds of them. I have now ceased to acknowledge receipt of them. I merely hand them over to the mounted police in order that a record may be kept of the names and addresses of the people who sign them, and I make this statement so that the petitioners may know what I do with them. I have received some petitions in which it is stated that the petition must not be sent to the Minister of Justice but to the head office in Toronto where the names will be registered and compiled so that the Department of Justice may not know the names and addresses of those who signed it. Some of these communications have inadvertently been sent direct to me. I can assure the house that in long petitions there does not appear a single Anglo-Saxon or French-Canadian name—nothing but names of foreigners, unpronounceable names for the most part. I do not know all the ramifications of the Canadian Labour Defence League, but I believe that it is closely identified with or affiliated with the Friends of the Soviet Society, another society which is operating throughout Canada, particularly in Ontario and western Canada, and which also favours me with its demands and its petitions. I know from information compiled through the agency of the mounted police that these societies are operating in almost every corner of western Canada, and the literature which is circulated, and which I attribute to these societies is most scandalous and most seditious, and in many cases, blasphemous and obscene.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if there ever was a time in the history of this country when section 98 was justifiable as a part of the criminal law of this country, this is certainly the time. In my judgment section 98 should be maintained. May I quote for the benefit of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre a remark of the apostle Paul, who says: "But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully."

Section 98 is not in any sense a hindrance to any right thinking person. Section 98 places no restriction upon any citizen of this country who is worthy of the rights of citizenship. A person who does not advocate force or violence or terrorism need have no fear whatever of section 98. I shall not discuss the various sub clauses of the section because upon the second reading of a bill the only matter which should be discussed is the principle of the measure, not the details. I maintain that the enacting words of section 98 merely provide against the advocacy of force, violence, terrorism and intimidation, and we must not permit such things to go unheeded in this Dominion of Canada. The other subsections of section 98 to which my hon. friend has referred are merely to enable peace officers to carry out that law and to furnish the proof necessary to obtain convictions. These subsections are in no sense extraordinary provisions. The provisions in regard to search and in regard to the possession of unlawful or illegal literature are ordinary provisions, similar to many others which will be found in various parts of the criminal code. The allegation that a man under certain circumstances may be presumed to be guilty by reason of the fact that he attends unlawful meetings or has in his possession unlawful literature is not a novel provision in our criminal law. Such provisions exist in respect to a great many sections of our criminal code. They occur also in respect of some of our provincial laws, our liquor laws, also in our highgrading laws, and in respect of the drug act passed by this parliament, under which the mere possession of certain prohibited drugs is sufficient evidence upon which to convict a man unless he can establish his innocence. Therefore the special provisions particularly referred to by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre are by no means extraordinary or novel provisions in the criminal law of Canada.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there is anything more that I have to urge in regard to this matter, other than to state that under the conditions as they exist to-day in the Dominion of Canada, and many of which have come directly to my knowledge, in my judgment this section should remain as it stands to-day upon the statute book. I know that there have been times in past years when the matter has come up in this house when I looked upon the repeal of this particular section as a matter of indifference, and I think on one occasion I stated in this chamber that I believed that this particular section had perhaps survived its usefulness and that there was no further necessity for it. But at that time there was no communist agitation in Canada such as exists to-day. The Canadian Labour Defence League had not entered upon its activities. In fact the Canadian Labour Defence League only started its activities when the communist society was banned as an unlawful society in the Dominion of Canada by the courts of Ontario. I know that the Canadian Labour Defence League and the Communist Association have their affiliations cutside the Dominion of Canada. I know this from threatening telegrams which I have received myself. I have been informed by telegram that 150,000 communists in New York are watching me, and I forget how many hundreds of thousands in Chicago—all these telegrams were inspired, I believe, in the city of Toronto.

Another matter I will state to the house incidentally. No sooner did the disturbance take place in Kingston penitentiary last October than I was flooded with telegrams and petitions from every quarter of Canada almost before the riot was well under way. These messages were all framed in practically the same language, and I am satisfied they were all engineered from the city of Toronto. I mention these things, Mr. Speaker, to impress the house with actual conditions and with the necessity of maintaining section 98 as it stands on the statute book to-day. For the reasons I have given I propose now to move that this bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anybody would charge me with being a communist. I am opposed to communism, to its methods, to what it advocates and what it preaches. If I thought section 98 of the criminal code were necessary to prevent the advocacy of force, violence or intimidation, the things upon which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has expounded this evening, I should be in favour of it. I do not think, however, that such a provision was necessary in the Criminal Code of Canada. The minister has referred to petitions bearing foreign names which have been sent concerning certain people who have been convicted in the courts. May I tell him that the people who have been seeking the repeal of section 98 do not belong to any of those associations, and are not people with foreign names.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I have thousands of them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: During the time I was a member of the government of Canada I was present on numerous occasions when representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress and other labour associations and organizations, came to the government to submit their programs. They were men devoted to law and order. They were men like the President of the Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. Tom Moore, whom nobody would accuse of being a communist or even a socialist. These men have always asked the government for the repeal of section 98, because they were afraid that through certain interpretations of it their rights might be violated.

Mr. McGIBBON: You did not repeal it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; but on five occasions as Minister of Justice I introduced a bill which, after all, was the same in substance as the one introduced at this time by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not think I was a barbarian or a rebel or anything of that kind, but I did it. Further, the House of Commons always supported the bill, and during the session of 1930 nobody on the opposite side of the house opposed it; it was carried unanimously, with no objecting voice. If it is a crime to-night to favour the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, all hon. members who sat opposite me in 1930 and supported the bill introduced at that time—because they did not oppose it—were guilty of a similar crime.

Sedition was crime prior to the amendment of 1919. Under common law sedition has always been a crime. In Great Britain on various occasions demands have been made to define sedition in the way it is done in section 98, or in some other way. But after debate in the British House of Commons, and after a commission had reported concerning the advisability of defining sedition, it was found better to leave it under the common law without arriving at a definite description of what it might be. The same thing happened in this country. The commissioners who prepared the criminal code had a section defining sedition, but after debate in this House of Commons it was found advisable and considered better for every purpose to leave sedition as it had been under the common law. Many sections were inserted in the criminal code which covered every circumstance. I refer the house to section 88, which deals with unlawful assemblies, although we have heard the Minister of Justice wax eloquent on the necessity for section 98, the purpose of which is the prevention of unlawful assemblies. Section 130 deals with seditious oaths, section 132 with seditious words, seditious libel or seditious conspiracy. Under section 135 we have provision with regard to libel of any foreign sovereign. In 136 there is provision against the publication of false news. I blame more particularly the House of Commons of 1919 for having withdrawn the then section 133. That section, which no longer appears in the criminal code, read as follows:

133. No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith—

(a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or,

(b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof, or in either house of parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada, or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in the state; or,

(c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

Surely any citizen, British or Canadian, has a right to do those things which are mentioned by the old section 133 as not being seditious. Unfortunately that section was repealed in 1919.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member whether or not that section was restored?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it was not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Unless I am mistaken, it was restored several years ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the hon. member is mistaken. It was not restored, but I tried to restore it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret interrupting the debate, but under standing order 15 the time for dealing with private and public bills is limited to the hour between eight and nine p.m. That time has now expired.

SUPPLY

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

National Defence—militia services, $74,000; naval services, $500—$74,500.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an explanation concerning the item dealing with the adjustment of war claims to which reference was made prior to the adjournment. The $500,000 item was voted in the supplementary estimates of 1932-33, being vote No. 403 of those estimates, to provide for the payment of claims for compensation for losses sustained by civil population and prisoners of war of Canada during the late war, interest thereon, and cost of administration. That vote was brought forward and administered by the Secretary of State, and it is not required this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the minister say whether any Armenian claims were paid out of that vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should think so, but as I say, this department had nothing whatever to do with the item. We did not bring it forward and did not administer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Since the item appears in the estimates of my hon. friend, could he give us some information with regard to the Armenian claims? If not, could he indicate when and where we could get that information?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: From the Secretary of State.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On his estimates?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: I should like to ask the minister if the preparation of the official history of the war is in the hands of one officer, or if other persons are consulted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, a number of other people are consulted. As a section is finished it is circulated and comments are requested from various people, including officers who were in certain sectors, with regard to the disposition of their troops, their orders and various matters of that kind.

Mr. ROSS: Then may I ask if any objection has been taken to any part of the book by any officer? If objections are taken will corrections be made, or in what way will differences of opinion be dealt with?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Every possible care will be taken to see that nothing is included in the history that is not authentic. We welcome all advice on any point that comes up.

Mr. ROSS: Has any protest been made by any officer in regard to any item prepared so far?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am told that exceptions have been taken to certain things, and that corrections have been made.

Mr. ROSS: Has any objection or criticism not been accepted?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Any criticism that is made is examined very carefully, and all available files are consulted in order to ascertain the facts.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the Book of Remembrance of members of the Canadian forces, and Canadians in the forces of the British Empire, who lost their lives in the great war, $7,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister state what progress has been made with this work?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As I think I stated when this item came up in the supplementary estimates last year, it was arranged that this book should cost $35,000. Of that total, $10,000 was voted in the supplementary estimates last year; $7,500 is in the estimates this year; it is intended to invite parliament to vote $7,500 next year and $5,000 the succeeding year, with a final $5,000 in the estimates for 1936-37. Mr. James Purves, an artist, illuminator and designer, has been engaged to do this work for a fee of $35,000. Mr. Purves was exceedingly well recommended; samples of his work were examined together with samples of other work, and the committee in charge of the matter recommended that he be given the work. This committee consists of the Dominion Archivist as chairman, the chief architect of the Department of Public Works, the secretary of the Imperial War Graves Commission of Canada, the director of the historical section of the Department of National Defence, and the Clerk of the Privy Council, with the director of records as secretary.

The book will be made up in this way: The names of all members of the Canadian forces, and of Canadians who served in the forces of the British Empire, who lost their lives from war causes between August 4, 1914, and April 30, 1922, will be inscribed in the book, each entry to consist of the surname, Christian names, rank, decorations and unit, the arrangement to be alphabetical by years of death. Then there will be a page without names dedicated to Canadians who have died or may die from war causes subsequent to the last mentioned date. There will be a page without names dedicated to those Canadians who died from war causes while serving in other allied or associated armies. The names are to be inscribed by hand on vellum pages. The title page, as well as certain other pages, will be illuminated. The binding is under the direction of the chief binder of the public archives. The materials used are subject to the approval of the committee and are to be purchased within the British Empire, and when completed the book is not to be accepted without the approval of the committee.

The situation at present is this: The work is being carried on in a studio which has been set aside by the National Research Bureau. All essential material for the book, including vellum leaves, colour and gold leaf, has been bought and paid for. A model of the work, in actual size, has been constructed according to agreement and is in process of examination and review by the committee.

Mr. McGIBBON: I understand that some difficulty either exists or is anticipated in preserving this vellum paper. Would the minister be good enough to tell me what steps are being taken and what methods are being used to preserve that paper?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The committee have consulted the Bureau of Research on that very question, and investigations are being carried on now as to the degree of humidity necessary in the atmosphere of the chamber in which the book will rest to best protect the vellum leaves. Everything is being done that can possibly be done along the research lines indicated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McGIBBON: Should not that be done first?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is being done on the vellum and materials that are going into the book.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask if the same provision will be made for that book as for the other the hon. gentleman made reference to this afternoon, regarding publication in both languages?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There will be nothing in this book except the names and dedications. It is to rest in the memorial chamber.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—Department of National Defence—radio services—for maintenance and operation of the Northwest Territories radio system, $199,425.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How was this saving made which is indicated in this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In these various depots in the north there is always a certain amount of building; some years less, some more. This year there is less building to be done.

Item agreed to.

Cadet services, $300,000.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the item of $300,000 under discussion refers to cadet training. At a time of depression, would it not have been more appropriate for the government to leave out this item instead of reducing it by $60, since the country has not the means, at present, to make such a large outlay for cadet services. The estimates of the National Defence were only reduced by $8,596.82, when those of Agriculture, Public Works and all other departments have been considerably cut down. The government should have spared the small wage earners and have further cut the estimates of National Defence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I regret that I cannot answer the hon. gentleman in French this year. I hope to do so some time. This item, as I explained last year, is for the current school year; it is already committed and there is nothing that can be done about it. The greater part of the money is already committed to be spent in the school year ending June next.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we forever to go on with this vote on the ground that it is always voted a year late?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That was the arrangement made a number of years ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What steps can be taken to alter that arrangement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman is an older parliamentarian than I am; possibly he can suggest some way.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Make a motion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The item is down $60,000. The principal reason for that is that during this year a number of cadet units have ceased to function, consequently we do not need that money.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish on this occasion to repeat what I have said on a number of previous occasions, because I do not think any good purpose is served by so doing. But I wish to protest on behalf of my own group and the people I represent against a continuance of this grant for cadets. It seems to me that for several reasons it is not necessary. At this particular time when there is very great need for food and clothing on the part of large numbers of people, when there are very great expenditures that should be made to meet the exigencies of the present depression, it is foolish to spend these large amounts on cadet practice. Further than that, we as a nation have declared our renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, yet we are deliberately maintaining policies of national defence. Our army and navy would not be so bad in themselves—we all recognize that they are not as expensive as are the armaments of some European countries—nevertheless they are a standing evidence of our suspicion of other nations, of the fact that we ourselves have not thoroughly agreed to give up war, that we expect that one of these days we may be forced to use these arms of the military and naval service. But more particularly I object to this grant to the cadets, because we proceed to teach the boys the use of force. Some people have been greatly exercised because there are certain people in our community who believe in the use of force in connection with class struggles. But I would point out to them that so long as the use of force is taught for the settlement of international questions there are many who will adopt the very logical conclusion that if it is necessary for the settlement of international disputes it may very well be adopted for the settlement of class disputes; and we are indoctrinating our boys in this way. I protest against it.

There is another point that I have urged before—I merely mention it again—I think this participation in the work of our schools is an invansion of our provincial rights. We have been told again and again that we ought not to contribute anything to the provinces for the promotion of peace, yet in this case we contribute to and almost force upon the provinces grants for what is, in my opinion, the promotion of war. I know some take objection to that and say it is not for that purpose, but if it is not for that it is a waste of money. It does in effect promote war ideals among our boys. I personally object to it, and I think there is a growing body of public opinion across the country that objects to it. It seems to me we should give notice to the minister that we do not expect that this vote will be continued.

Mr. MITCHELL: Recently the city of Toronto abolished cadet training. The observation was made, although not officially, that intimation had been given by the government that they were going to cut off the grant for cadet training. Is this to be the policy of the government in connection with future estimates?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the result of a cut in the estimates several years ago, no grant for clothing is made. No change is contemplated, although, as the hon. gentleman has said, the city of Toronto has discontinued its cadet corps and the vote next year will not need to be as large. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has spoken several times on this subject, but as yet he has not convinced me, and I do not think he has convinced the members of the committee, that the cadets are a military body. All that the cadet teachers seek to do is to instil discipline and cooperation, and it seems to me that at this time more than any other we should continue to do this work. Lack of discipline is largely accountable for some of our present difficulties.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The city of Winnipeg has a system of physical training for both boys and girls which is, I believe, far superior to that given in the cadet corps.

Mr. HEENAN: As the government is now considering ways and means of saving money; as it is cutting down the wages of men who have families to keep, does not this vote, apart from all other considerations, afford an opportunity to effect a saving?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The amount of this vote is committed before the beginning of the school year which closes this coming June, and there is nothing that can be done about it.

Mr. GERSHAW: Are rifles furnished to the cadets?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The cadets are furnished with a limited number of 22 rifles.

Mr. GERSHAW: Is the shooting supervised by the ordinary teachers in the schools or by special officers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If this work is carried on by a member of the school staff he is given a course to familiarize himself with the subject; if it is carried on by a member of the permanent force, of course that would be part of his training. No instruction is given by anyone not qualified to do so.

Miss MACPHAIL: How much will be saved next year because Toronto has decided not to continue cadet training in the public schools?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not give the exact amount, but undoubtedly there will be a considerable saving.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the minister mean to say that the total amount of this vote has been expended already?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Substantially it will have been expended by the end of the school year in June.

Miss MACPHAIL: If that is so, how can the thing be stopped? Must it be stopped on the initiative of the schools, as was done in Toronto? Apparently on cadets we are always voting money which has been spent already. What would the minister recommend in this connection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This has been the procedure for the past few years. As we know, the school year differs from the fiscal year, and this method was adopted some time ago as being the only one suitable to carry on this work.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the deletion of this vote would meet with the approval of the country. Although the total amount is not very large, it would be a worth-while saving. Those who advocate cadet training do not do so upon the ground of discipline, they advocate it as a sort of physical drill. There is another point which I think should be drawn to the attention of the minister and the committee. This year the matter of the continuance of cadet training in the public and high schools was discussed by the Vancouver school board. The management committee before which the matter was first discussed decided that cadet training should be discontinued, but when the question came before the school board one of the trustees claimed that as this training was not costing the citizens anything, there was no reason why it should not be continued. That feeling is prevalent among school trustees; this is not a direct taxation upon the ratepayers of the particular municipality, consequently they assume that it does not cost anything. They do not realize that even though it comes from the Dominion government, it is a tax which must be paid. I believe that cadet training could be very well discontinued and a physical drill of some sort substituted; it would be better for all purposes.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I hope the minister sees fit to continue a vote next year for cadet training, at least in the province of Quebec. We have more cadets in that province than in all the other provinces put together, and this year we carried off the trophy offered by the Governor General. I should like to know just why the members in the far corner object to the cadet movement. Is it because these boys wear a uniform and carry a rifle? Is it because they are taught to recognize their duty to their king and country? Is it because they are being taught discipline? One hon. member said a moment ago that the cadet movement has been dispensed with in Toronto, and I am sure the hon. members from Toronto have listened with sorrow to what has been said about their good city. Probably it is that same spirit of which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) spoke some time ago, that has caused the discontinuance of the cadet movement in the city of Toronto. We in Quebec have recognized our duty to Canada for more than three centuries and we claim that our youth must be educated not to live in a false paradise but to be prepared to serve some day in defence of their country. We are not afraid that the military spirit will be inculcated into the youth of our province; on the contrary we hope that the government will continue to vote this item and foster the cadet movement so that it may grow instead of diminish, to the betterment to the youth of Canada and probably for the safety of Canada. Speaking as a Canadian of nine generations, I am sorry to see those who have recently come to this country attempt to destroy, at least in the people of my race, a love of country which has lasted for over three hundred years. They have given their best in the past and are willing to do it again.

Miss MACPHAIL: I have spoken so often against cadet training I do not think there is any use in repeating my arguments over and over again. If any hon. member wishes to know them, he can read them in Hansard. I am opposed to cadet training for various reasons. I am not, however, opposed to discipline if it is self-discipline. Everyone needs discipline, but if it is going to be of any real use, it must be the discipline of the individual over himself, and that is very different from regimentation. We have in this country altogether too much discipline of the sort that is not self-discipline but is the falling into rank. We have an educational system that is altogether too rigid, it does not encourage thinking—indeed discourages it—and cadet training carries this automatic system just one step further. I do not think it is any good from the point of view of military training; I cannot imagine what use it is from a military standpoint to have small boys or, at any rate, public school children lined up with rifles and wearing uniforms, except that it gives them certain thought forms, militarizes the spirit, but as regards training them to be soldiers, it is nonsensical, has no point. We need the money for the feeding of children of about the size of those on whom we are putting uniforms and to whom we are giving rifles. It would be much more sensible if this year we spent the money for food, clothing and medical and dental care of children rather than for cadet training. The fact that we are passing through the economic difficulties of which we are now in the midst is a strong additional argument against cadet training in both public and high schools, but particularly in the former. When the city of Toronto has come to realize that cadet training is ridiculous, that is the last thing that need be said about it. I believe Quebec is now likely to follow the good example set by Toronto. It is only in the last half dozen years that Quebec has taken an interest in cadet training and the number of cadets there has increased. In my opinion the reason is that the money being spent is federal.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Oh, no.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is my opinion, and I have as much a right to it as the Deputy Speaker has to his. If that is the reason, namely, that it is money that, so they suppose, does not come out of the immediate community—although in the last analysis it does—but comes from the federal treasury and therefore they try to get more and more of it, that is not a very sound argument in favour of cadet training. All the old arguments have been reviewed. It is a very good thing from a financial point of view for the teacher of cadet training, but from that of the boys themselves, from that of the financial condition of the country and from that of education, I think the argument is all against cadet training. While I am not going to move that the item be reduced, since the minister tells us that most of it is already spent, I should like to say once more that I am entirely opposed to cadet training in either public or high schools. I believe the tendency of public opinion is in that direction and the vote will decrease from year to year.

Mr. LAVERGNE: May I remind the hon. member, who holds such an opinion about Quebec, that she should travel through that province and she would find the money question is not the great object there. My people have been trained to believe that man does not live by bread alone.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member for South-east Grey keeps repeating that some of this money is for buying uniforms, yet the minister has stated two or three times that in the item there is no amount for uniforms. Cadet training is only voluntary in the city of Toronto and no boy has to train if he does not wish to do so. As regards Toronto stopping cadet training, this is only temporary because there is a diversity of opinion there. In the first place, it was thought, owing to the depression, it would be wise to cut down expenses to help out the government. Cadet training is the finest thing in the world for a boy. It brightens his intellect; it gives him good discipline and manhood. A man in the army who starts in the ranks as a private and continues until he becomes a captain, is built up in manners and physique, and that is what cadet training does to the boy. I should have been glad if Toronto had not intervened; it was the biggest mistake they ever made, but the situation is only temporary and it will be changed later.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have listened to the observations of the Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether they were intended for me as a recent arrival in this country, but I should like to point out that I did my little bit so far as the past war is concerned and I think I can say without fear of contradiction I possibly served as long as did any other hon. member of this house.

Mr. JACOBS: That is why the hon. gentleman is a member of parliament now; it is his reward.

Mr. MITCHELL: Possibly. I think anybody who passed through that war and who would express the sentiments uttered by the Deputy Speaker, is a glutton for punishment. I had an experience of my own, although I do not like to speak about these things, where I saw men walk through eight inches of blood and salt water of the good young chaps to whom he referred. That should be a lasting lesson against anyone trying to inculcate in the minds of boys and girls who are growing up the idea that war is absolutely necessary. The depression through which we are passing was, it is admitted on every hand, largely brought about by the great war that took place between 1914 and 1918. I am in full accord with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the hon. member for Southeast Grey. I believe war is absolutely unnecessary; I appreciate the fact that unless one passes through it, it is hard to understand the enormity of it, and unless those who went through the last great war preach its utter uselessness to the young people who are growing up and who have not had that experience, there is no reason why there should not be another war.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to say just a word to the hon. member for Montmagny, who wonders why some of us are opposed to this vote for cadet training. He rather intimated that he is of the older Canadian stock and that some of us are very new arrivals. Some of our ancestors may have come here a little bit more recently than his, but I am of the old Canadian stock, of three, four or five generations, and a number of my people came over after the revolutionary war in the United States; therefore I think I have just as much right to speak in the house as have some of the hon. members from Quebec. Further than that, he suggested that we should have cadet training because of the virtue in being able to defend our country, to give our lives in the service of our country; and he went on to quote the Scripture, that man shall not live by bread alone. As the father of four boys I earnestly hope that not one of them will lift a sword or shoulder a gun. Some may laugh at that, but I have a right to my own opinion. I am just as earnest and just as zealous as anybody in wishing to see my own boys develop all the virtues and all the patriotism and all the devotion to their country that anybody should have, but I think we have reached the point in our civilization when we ought to teach our boys that they can show their devotion to their country in some better way than by fighting. I had hoped that that was the great lesson that was taught by the last war, and those of us who feel that way have a perfect right to advocate another type of virtue rather than the military virtue. It is for that reason above everything else that I oppose this vote for the cadets.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a little too sensitive. We are all with him in being opposed to war. Nobody wants war, but I think that those who have kept their heads upon their shoulders know that the best way to prepare for peace is to be ready for war. That is a very old saying, and it is very well known to be true.

Mr. DUFF: Keep your powder dry.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is often quoting the example of Russia. He should take another trip to Russia—not as a tourist this time—where he would see quite a number of cadet corps in training, as any well informed magazine, English, French or Italian, will tell you. Just read the last issue of La Revue des Deux Mondes, of Paris, which quotes an agent of Moscow whom my hon. friend knows well, Mr. George Williams of Saskatchewan, who I believe is very closely related to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me reply briefly. It seems very strange that one cannot make a remark along this line without some hon. member immediately suggesting Russia. I have no objection; I intend to say what I want to say. One of the things in respect to which I have been most critical of Russia is that that country has depended upon force, and I have stated so frankly and openly ever since the Russian revolution. I am opposed to military force in Russia just as I am opposed to it in Canada. I know that the Russians are training, and I am very sorry for it. Were I in Russia I would try to assert my position, though it is likely I would have my head taken off. We are better off in that regard in Canada, and I am thankful as a Canadian that I can assert my position without being rushed off to Siberia or anything of that kind.

I challenge the main point of the last speaker, that the way to prepare for peace is to be ready to fight. This idea may have come down to us from antiquity, but I do not believe it is true. The fact that we have had so many wars proves, I think, that it is untrue, because all nations that have prepared for war in the past have found that such preparation inevitably led to war. I recall a very fine speech which the Prime Minister made a few years ago, in which he took the position I am taking to-night—that as long as men have the instruments of war in their hands they are likely to use them. I believe that is undoubtedly true. If it were not so, why should we be having a disarmament conference to-day through which we are trying to establish peace on a different basis than that of armament? If indeed we are disappointed in the disarmament conference is it not because each man believes in his own heart that it will ultimately be necessary to fight?

Mr. POULIOT: I am pleased indeed to note that this vote has been decreased by three-fourths, but there is still one-fourth left, which might better be nothing. I remember distinctly urging upon the house last year the desirability of giving footballs and baseball bats and boxing gloves to our young boys instead of guns and drums and other militaristic paraphernalia. We on this side are not to be insulted because we do not share the views of the government members. We are free to have our own views and to express them just as are the government members. I am opposed to cadet training. I thing it is most foolish to see young boys who are just growing up being trained in the militarist system. Do you not think it is foolish, Mr. Chairman? We advocate peace. We now have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police looking after those who shoot migratory birds; we have them acting also as truancy officers to look after Indian children, and now our young men are to be trained so that when they grow up they will be able to replace those who are not British-born in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We have our boys in our colleges being trained as soldiers. It would be better for the government to subscribe $25 or so to the different schools for the purchase of footballs, baseball bats, and boxing gloves so that our young boys would get the benefit of the sport and physical exercise. Boxing would be a good thing for every member on the other side of the house, and it would be much better for us to box with them than to shoot at them because we might kill them. We do not want to kill them, because, in the words of the great St. Augustine, we seek, not the death, but the conversion of sinners.

My hon. friend from Montmagny said that he was in favour of cadet training. That is his own business, but he need not drag in anything about Russia just because some members of this house do not share his views. I have never been to Russia, and the hon. member knows as well as anyone in this house that I have nothing to do with communism or Russia or the Soviet or the U.S.S.R. I am not interested in them at all. I try to advocate common sense in this house, but unfortunately I am not very successful with hon. gentlemen opposite. The government subscribes hundreds of thousands of dollars to the League of Nations to prevent war, and at the same time trains our young boys in the warlike spirit, with instructors to shout at them, "Right, left, right, left!" They are being trained to be militarists. We hear a lot of drum-beating. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Long Lake is a bottle or a drum, but he makes a noise just the same. I am not surprised that he is in favour of the cadet system, but I am surprised that my hon. friend from Montmagny should share his views. They kiss each other. They should not. They should keep a certain distance.

Mr. LaVERGNE: Is my hon. friend jealous?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not. I am not in favour of it at all; in fact, I do not understand it. Is it not possible for the genial Minister of National Defence to appreciate that we wish to prevent war as much as anybody? I think he does too, and so much so that perhaps he would resign in favour of the hon. member for Southeast Grey, who everyone knows would abolish the Department of National Defence as soon as she became its minister. Would it not be possible for my good friend the Minister of National Defence to reconsider his decision concerning this vote? The children in Canada who are now in cadet corps would be just as healthy if the government would spend this amount in buying them footballs, bats, boxing gloves, hockey pucks, and the like.

An hon. MEMBER: And golf balls.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and golf balls, or tennis racquets. The government would make the children happy, and would not instil into their minds that warlike spirit which cadet training engenders. I am sure if the minister would postpone his decision until to-morrow he would agree with me, because as we say in French, la nuit porte conseil.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I am pleased beyond measure to state that this is one of the happiest nights I have ever spent in this chamber. I have discovered that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is ashamed of being called a Russian, that he does not want to be a Russian, and that he does not want to live in Russia for fear they may cut his head off or transport him to the Arctic regions. Secondly, I have discovered that my good friend from Témiscouata is afraid to fight. He is scared of getting into a scrap for fear he may get a licking. At last I am safe. For my part I believe thoroughly in cadet training for our boys at school. During my term of office on the Regina collegiate board I found that the boys wanted to have that training; they wanted to learn how to defend themselves. They did not want to lick anybody, but they would be hanged if they were going to let anybody lick them. That is still their spirit.

Mr. POULIOT: The chief difference between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Long Lake is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a beard and the hon. member for Long Lake has not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think it is fair to state that hon. members who do not favour this item are following the example set by people in Russia. In my view the contrary is the case. The fact is that in Russia to-day there is more military training than in any other country of the world. Under ordinary circumstances I should be happy to agree with the hon. member for Montmagny, but during these times when so many children have no food I believe it would be better to use this $300,000 to provide food and shelter for them than to put arms or weapons in their hands.

Miss MACPHAIL: Since the beginning of the debate on this item I have noticed a full page advertisement in the Ottawa Journal headed by the words: "Share or children suffer," and then, in smaller print, the following:

> When do we eat? That's the query expressed at regular intervals by the hungry youngster everywhere. Whether it is voiced in words or carried by a cry, it must be answered.

When it is found necessary in Ottawa, the city of Canada least touched by the depression, to insert a full page advertisement of the type I have described, surely it is nonsensical at the same time to be voting $300,000 for the military training of school children. I therefore move seconded by Mr. MacInnis:

> That vote No. 84 be reduced by the sum of $30,000.

which is the sum being asked for by the United Charities drive in Ottawa.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Southeast Grey apparently has a reason for her amendment concerning the reduction of this vote. It would seem that she has based it on an article appearing in an Ottawa newspaper. We know that there is a great deal of suffering throughout the country; no one denies that, and no one regrets it more than hon. members of this house. But the people of Ottawa will be able to handle any problem with which they may be confronted. The point made by the hon. members for Southeast Grey and Winnipeg North Centre is that the cadet movement is of a military nature. On that point I must differ from them, because in no sense is it military. The fact that young lads are given certain elementary drill which is given to soldiers does not indicate that they are receiving military training. There is no suggestion of military training unless in the minds of those taking part there is the object of defeating some enemy. In the cadet movement there is nothing of that kind.

Miss MACPHAIL: Why carry rifles if there is no idea of an enemy?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Rifle shooting is a sport, the same as any other game in which young people take part. It develops precision of aim and steadiness of nerve, and is one of the best exercises for mind and body. The small rifles used by the cadets have no connection whatever with military training. When soldiers manoeuvre on drill parade they have in mind an enemy, and at that time and under such conditions they are under military training. But cadets may march along in fours with no idea of an enemy at all. They merely have setting up exercises, and are taught respect for authority and discipline. This government has never urged cadet training on any community. The hon. member for Vancouver South has told us that in Vancouver they took the stand that as they were getting their cadet training for nothing they might as well have it. Such an understanding would not be correct, because if Vancouver cadets are wearing uniforms they will have to pay for such uniforms themselves. The cost of uniforms is one of the greatest costs in the cadet movement. Owing to the difficult times through which some cities are passing the cadet movement has been temporarily shelved, as has been described by the hon. member for Parkdale. Well and good; we do not urge that other action be taken. However there is a demand on the part of many people and many schools to have the young people taught the elementary principles of discipline. The hon. member for Southeast Grey realizes the fact that for some considerable time there has been provision in the estimates for this expenditure, and to cut it down as the hon. member has suggested—

Miss MACPHAIL: It cannot all have been expended if it carries on until June.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The cadet movement in Toronto will not be stopped until the end of the present term. In my view it would be a breach of faith on the part of hon. members to support the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Southeast Grey.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to make just one or two observations in connection with this item. I understand that the greater part of this vote is already spent or has been promised. Is that correct?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: That being the case I suppose the house is bound to pass the item, but before that is done I should like to say this: I am not opposed to cadet training under normal conditions. I know something about cadet training, and I never have been opposed to it. But I would go so far as to say that if there is any item that should be curtailed under existing conditions it is an item such as this, representing something without which we can get along very well. We can take it up again when conditions throughout the country are normal. I would not go as far as my hon. friend from Southeast Grey has gone in her argument, but up to a certain point I support what she said. Under present conditions throughout the country, with a vast army of unemployed, with our basic industry having such a hard time, with this government as well as provincial and municipal governments endeavouring to economize in every possible way, this is one place where some curtailment could be made. The government would have been well advised had they taken the initiative and cut out this item for this year; I think they would have been supported by the majority of the people throughout the country. The very fact that in Toronto they have come to the conclusion that they can get along without cadet training for this year supports my statement, and the trustees of schools in many other places throughout Ontario and other parts of the country have decided that for this year at least, and until the depression is over and conditions get back to normal, this is an expenditure that can be very well diverted into other channels.

I should like to support the motion of my hon. friend from Southeast Grey, but since the government have made commitments I do not know that I can do so. As a matter of principle, however, I do say that whatever government is in power next year should see to it that if conditions have not improved throughout the country, the expenditure on cadet training is entirely wiped out.

Mr. HEENAN: I am glad to find that other members of the house believe that under present conditions we could very well save this amount of money. I am reminded that under the peace, order and good government legislation passed by the government they have power to do almost everything except declare war, and I am not sure that they cannot take that step. I do say that with present conditions throughout the country the government should have seen to it that no money should be spent in this way. They are dismissing civil servants, even in the Department of National Defence; they are reducing the wages and salaries of civil servants; they are giving large sums of money in direct relief, and I am sure this $300,000 would have gone a long way in other directions.

The other day I asked a question as to the amount of direct relief that had been granted by the government to certain towns and cities throughout Canada since the relief measures were first brought in. In round figures the town of Kenora has received $3,000; Fort Frances has received $6,000, and Dryden has received only $187. We could have done a great deal with this $300,000 in relieving distress in northern Ontario, and would it not have been better for the children in that part of the country to have the money spent in that way rather than on cadet training? I was glad to hear the hon. member for Parkdale tell us that Toronto has led the way, even though it is only a temporary measure, and I am disposed to support the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey. I think this money should be spent on relief, not in Toronto or Ottawa but in northern Ontario, where relief is carried on in such a parsimonious manner.

Mr. MacINNIS: I find it very difficult to follow the logic of the hon. member for Montmagny. This afternoon he opposed a bill which gave the mounted police authority to act as truant officers in certain cases because it had to do with compulsory education, and the province of Quebec is opposed to compulsory education. I am in favour of compulsory education, but I am very strongly opposed to compulsory cadet training. The minister may say that this training is not compulsory, and in theory he is correct. Nevertheless it is compulsory because of the ostracism of those who do not take part in it. Now the minister tells us that this has nothing to do with military training, but the Deputy Speaker tells us that military training is its real purpose. I am at a loss to know which hon. gentleman to believe. I rather think I will accept the point of view of the Deputy Speaker rather than that of the minister, because it agrees with my own experience. The hon. member for Montmagny sought to prove that this training is military by saying that the only way to have peace is to prepare for war. If that is so we should save the expense of sending delegates to the disarmament conference, in order that peace might come all the sooner. I am absolutely opposed to this item, particularly at the present time when so many children throughout Canada are going to school without having received enough nourishment even to enable them to carry a gun.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask to whom the commitments have been made with respect to cadet training, and what is the form of the commitment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The arrangements were made last September with the various school boards throughout the country. The government agreed that certain grants would be made to their cadet corps for the school year beginning in September last and ending next June.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, as I understand it, the government makes its contract with the school boards. Two or three years ago the present administration put through an act respecting technical education, by which provision was made for the granting of certain sums of money each year from the federal treasury for technical education. But the government has not allowed the provisions of the law to be given effect to, so I believe, since it was enacted, on the score that the times were difficult and that it was not desirable to spend that money. The government I believe was wise in taking that step. I think the government would have been still wiser if they had followed the advice given by the opposition at the time and not reintroduced the technical education grants. They have not been able to carry them out; they might just as well have left the matter where it was. But if the government have found it necessary to refrain from spending further money for technical education, I do not see what justification they have for continuing to spend money through agreement with school boards for cadet training. One has only to mention the two side by side, in order to disclose how strong the argument is for withdrawing this grant at the present time. I would like to ask the hon. minister, is he prepared to say that, with respect to next year, he will communicate with the school boards informing them that the government is considering withdrawing grants for this service for the next year? It is altogether probable that we will not be out of the present depression inside of a year, and one-third of a million dollars is worth saving. It may well be that many a school board would welcome the opportunity of being freed from additional outlays on this score. I would ask the minister if he is prepared to give the house an undertaking that he will take up that matter with the school boards with a view to seeing if this amount might not be dispensed with next year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That of course is not a departmental matter; it is a matter of government policy. The government knows the discussion that goes on and undoubtedly will consider it, but I am not in a position to give a declaration on a matter of government policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, someone in the government must be able to give it. Perhaps the Prime Minister will give it. But I must say to the minister that I do not think he can hope to get his estimates through this house by seeking to evade all responsibility. Estimates are framed with a view of giving parliament control over public expenditure. Now he tells us we must vote this money because it is already expended according to the form in which he is presenting his estimates. The minister is asking for one-third of a million dollars to be spent in the next fiscal year, the year 1933-34, a year we have not yet entered upon. He cannot evade his responsibility by saying that the estimates are not in a form which permits him to give an undertaking to the house in regard to expenditures for the next fiscal year; nor can he evade it by saying he is not the minister of the department. He is responsible for the department, and he is asking parliament now as part of his militia services to vote $300,000 for cadet service. He inserts the item in his estimates as part of the militia service; he must be responsible. Surely the minister is in a position, as head of the department, to say that he is able to negotiate with the school boards. Surely he does not have to go to the Prime Minister to get that authority, nor to the government as a whole. If he has to do so, I wish he would let the item stand until he can inform us what the policy of the government is in regard to the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The right hon. gentleman has no reason to lose his temper on this. He knows very well indeed that he has taken up wrongly what I said, and he also knows that this item is not for the next year. It is the same practice that his own government followed during the years that they were in power. He knows very well that I cannot make a decision at this time as to the figures that would normally appear in next year's estimates. I think my explanation was very full and clear, and the interpretation the right hon. gentleman put upon it was entirely wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I still wish to maintain the position I have taken. I do not think the hon. minister gains anything by saying I have lost my temper. I have not lost any temper; he knows that very well. He may think it will read well in Hansard to have it so appear, but that is a very trifling way to go about a matter of this kind. What I wish to repeat to the minister is this: He is now asking parliament for an appropriation for the fiscal year 1933-34. That is true, isn't it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As I have explained several times—and the right hon. gentleman is too astute a parliamentarian not to follow me—I have followed the practice that has been followed for a number of years, in saying that this item applies to the current school year, not to the current fiscal year. The time for which the greater part of this estimate applies expires at the end of June this year, when the school year finishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then that is clear. What the hon. minister is now asking for is enough to enable him to pay what will be outstanding at June of the present year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will leave nine months of the next fiscal year for which no appropriations will have been voted by this parliament. I want next to ask the minister, so that we will know where we stand next year: is he prepared now to give the house the assurance, if we vote what is required to make good the commitments that expire in June of the present year, that between now and June he will take up with the school boards the advisability of the government discontinuing further grants from June, 1933, for at least another year, so as to save that amount out of expenditures in what will belong mostly to the fiscal year 1933-34?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman will realize that what is being done in this case is what has been done during the years he held office. The school year and the fiscal year do not end on the same date. Owing to the fact that the school year ends on the 30th of June, 1933, the part of the vote to make good that expenditure will naturally come in the fiscal year that ends 31st March, 1934, because March precedes June. March, 1933 will have ended before the obligation will have been completed to the end of the school year in June, 1933. That is only a matter of accounting. But there is another phase of the question, that to which the right hon. gentleman has just now directed attention; that is, whether or not it might be possible for this government to undertake that it would not incur further responsibility with respect to the cadet service. Unfortunately, or fortunately—that is a question of opinion—the matter does not rest in just that way. As the right hon. gentleman knows, the school districts have had held out to them—shall I say by the governments of Canada—the promise that if they maintain certain services assistance will be given from the federal exchequer to enable it to be done. I dare say the right hon. gentleman recalls what was done by the late Lord Strathcona in connection with cadet services. There meets once a year a certain body of men appointed by the Strathcona trust for the purpose of dealing with cadet grants. We have undertaken—when I say "we" I do not mean this government; I mean this country—that in the event of the school districts concluding that they are in a position financially and otherwise to carry on a certain cadet service, we will supply them with certain sums of money that have a direct relation to the money they expend. I do not carry the exact figures in my mind; I doubt not some member of the committee has in his mind the exact amount that we pay with respect to the amount expended by the school authorities. I should not be surprised if the hon. member for Perth would know whether or not it is dollar for dollar, or seventy-five cents to the dollar, whatever it may be. That is the position of this item at the moment; we have outstanding a promise on the part of the Dominion of Canada that under certain conditions it will pay certain sums of money. That is my understanding of the situation as I went into it some time ago. If for instance the authorities in Calgary conclude that they are unable financally to carry it on, and abandon the service, there is no longer any grant from this government for that service; it will end on the thirtieth of June this year; it is not being continued by Calgary, therefore there is no payment by this government to Calgary. There is one other city in which it was discontinued—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Toronto?

Mr. BENNETT: I was not sure; I thought it was one of the western cities. The same position obtains, that is, there is no longer an obligation to pay because the service has been discontinued. The grant now being sought is merely to implement obligations which have been incurred. I am satisfied that this is the same practice as prevailed during all the years the right hon. gentleman as minister was responsible for the passing through parliament of similar estimates. Undoubtedly in two cases no grant will have to be provided for another year, and although I am not sure I think there is another city in which the same position has been taken. In view of what has taken place in the past it would not be my judgment that the minister could ask the school districts to take a certain course. They are masters of the situation; they determine whether or not they will make any expenditure. When they determine that they will not, our obligation ceases. My understanding of the matter at the moment is that a very much lesser sum will be expended because of what has taken place this year. The vote which we are just passing deals with obligations which have been created; because of contractual relations between the dominion and the school districts, financial obligations have been created which must be discharged under the terms of our arrangements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the right hon. gentleman came into the chamber I had made reference to the action taken by his government with respect to technical education. In 1931 the present government enacted a measure with respect to continuing grants for vocational training and technical education. That was done against the advice of hon. gentlemen on this side. When the government found they were going to be hard pressed for funds, they took up the matter with the provinces, and, as I understand it, arrived at an agreement whereby no payments whatever were to be made. Whether or not agreements were made, I do not know, but I know that the act has been a dead letter, and that nothing has been paid out under its provisions. The government was justified in taking that step, as it saved a million or more dollars yearly, possibly considerably more than that when we consider payments which would also have had to be made from other treasuries. If the government thought it advisable to take that step with regard to technical education, surely the argument in favour of reduction is much stronger when applied to cadet services. I am not asking that the item before us should not be passed for this year, as anything for which commitment has been made up until June has to be paid, but I am suggesting to the government the advisability of discontinuing this grant for at least a year thereafter. I do not at the moment suggest its discontinuance for longer than a year. We are at the present time cutting down in as many directions as possible. As has been pointed out, ten per cent is being deducted from the salaries of civil servants and economies of every kind are being attempted if not in fact practised. Surely, when two school boards in large centres of population have found it desirable to discontinue cadet training, the minister could with advantage to all make arrangements which would save a third of a million dollars for an ensuing year. That is all I am asking, and I hope the government will consider this phase of the matter and advise that it is being done so that a year hence, we will not be told that commitments have been made for nine months and that therefore, we must carry them out.

Mr. BROWN: Would the Prime Minister explain a little more fully his reference to Lord Strathcona? Is it a fact that because of some action of Lord Strathcona the government has been committed to a certain policy from which it cannot recede? If that is so, it would seem that we have started a machine which we cannot stop even if we want to.

Mr. BENNETT: If I had thought this matter would engage the attention of the committee I would have brought the necessary documents with me, although I would have expected that the hon. gentleman would be familiar with the so-called Strathcona trust with respect to cadets. The officials have been able to furnish me with the constitution of the Strathcona trust for the encouragement of physical training and military drill in public schools. It reads:

The following shall be the officers of the trust:—

Patron—His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

Vice-Patron—The Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., Premier.

President—The Honourable Sir F. W. Borden, K.C.M.G., or the Minister of Militia for the time being.

Vice-Presidents—The minister in charge of education in each province in the dominion which shall have notified its adhesion to the arrangements regarding physical training and military drill in public schools, sanctioned by orders in council of August 13, 1908.

Executive Council—

(a) The Minister of Militia and Defence for the time being, chairman.

(b) The members of the militia council for the time being.

(c) Two representatives to be named by the minister in charge of education in Ontario. Two representatives to be named by the minister in charge of education in Quebec. One representative to be named by the ministers in charge of education in each of the remaining provinces.

Subject to the condition that the province represented must have notified its adhesion to the arrangements regarding physical training and military drill in public schools sanctioned by orders in council of August 13, 1908.

(d) The military officers commanding commands and independent districts in Canada. With a secretary to be detailed by the chairman from the staff of the Department of Militia and Defence.

The trust is to be administered in the manner set forth in paragraph 2. Paragraph 3 provides for rules and regulations and the constituting of a local committee for each province. Section 4 reads:

The local committees shall be charged with—

(a) Ensuring that the means of instruction in physical and military training are available for both teachers and pupils, where required.

(b) Division of the province into convenient districts for purposes of supervision and competition.

(c) Arranging details of the training to be given, so as to suit local conditions.

(d) The arrangement of competitions and inspections, and allotment of rewards, in accordance with the general instructions of the executive council.

Paragraph 5 reads:

The following are the general principles in accordance with which the trust shall be administered.

(a) His object being not only to improve the physical and intellectual capabilities of the children, by inculcating habits of alertness, orderliness and prompt obedience, but also to bring up the boys to patriotism, and to a realization that the first duty of a free citizen is to be prepared to defend his country, the intention of the founder is that, while physical training and elementary drill should be encouraged for all children of both sexes attending public schools, especial importance is to be attached to the teaching of military drill generally to all boys, including rifle shooting for boys capable of using rifles. All boys should so far as possible be made to acquire a fair acquaintance while at school, with military drill and rifle shooting.

Then follows an extract from a letter from the Right Hon. Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal to the Hon. Sir F. W. Borden, K.C.M.G., Minister of Militia and Defence, dated April 17, 1909, reading:

It is not my desire to make any alteration in the trust deed, as formulated by you.

Order in council, P.C. 1766, dated August 13, 1908, reads in part as follows:

The Minister of Militia and Defence submits the following synopsis of proposals entered into between the educational authorities of the province of Nova Scotia and himself respecting physical training and military drill in all public schools of that province.

Then follows substantially a reproduction of what I have read already. That trust, I believe, is still being carried out under the arrangement provided for in the trust deed itself.

Mr. BROWN: What was the amount of money mentioned?

Mr. BENNETT: Half a million dollars. The note handed to me by the officials of the department reads as follows:

It will be seen that the original amounts placed wtih the Receiver General by Lord Strathcona were $300,000 and $200,000, respectively; and that these amounts may be withdrawn at the wish of the trustees only. These amounts have not been withdrawn to date.

The interest on this $500,000 fund is placed by the Receiver General to the credit of the trustees in an interest-bearing account at the Bank of Montreal, Wellington and O'Connor streets, in half-yearly instalments of $10,000 each, on or about May 15 and November 15 of each year.

The amount of the interest, $20,000, is distributed annually to the provinces on the basis of the number of school attendants as furnished by the department of education of each province.

The interest earned on the deposits of $10,000 half-yearly at the Bank of Montreal is used for expenses of the trustees, such as printing, postage, et cetera.

I merely mention the trust deed as I was dealing with the point raised by the right hon. gentleman. I am not able from memory to say whether the dominion would be in a position to approach the provinces, or whether, having regard to the terms of the existing arrangements, the approach would have to be made by the discontinuance of the grants for cadet services by the school district either in the municipalities or through the province itself; for the Strathcona trust, as will be observed, is dealt with by the education authorities in all the provinces. But my memory is that the local advisory committee deals with the matter from the standpoint of the school districts or the board of education in the municipalities affected. My memory, for what it may be worth—and I do not pledge it as being accurate in the matter—is that until such time as the school authorities withdraw from it, the dominion would be bound to give effect to the arrangement under which we pay a certain proportion of the money thus expended. That is my recollection of the situation, but I would have to satisfy myself as to its accuracy, and I regret I am not in a position to give any further information to the right hon. gentleman. I do not, however, think we are in a position to say we shall not do so and so with respect to expenditure, but the option rests with the school authorities and not with us, and if they persist—I shall use that word—in carrying on the services, we are bound by and could not in decency and honour withdraw from the obligation which we deliberately accepted. The option does not rest with us to say to them: We shall not pay. But if they make their arrangement and carry on for a time and then decide to discontinue it, we can also discontinue it. Toronto, the hon. gentleman stated, and certainly Calgary, said that they exercised their option and would no longer maintain the service, the automatic result being that the dominion was not called upon to make grants.

Mr. BROWN: It is quite evident from the statement read by the Prime Minister that notwithstanding what the Minister of National Defence said, it is military training for which provision is made.

Mr. BENNETT: No; for both sexes.

Mr. BROWN: But special reference was made to young men, and military training is distinctly mentioned in more than one place. So that the Minister of National Defence is entirely wrong in his statement that this does not provide for military training.

Mr. POULIOT: If the training is for both sexes, there will be no weaker sex.

Miss MACPHAIL: Would the Minister of National Defence mind reconciling before the committee the two positions taken tonight: that taken by the Strathcona trust, which definitely states that it is military training, and that taken by the Minister of National Defence, that cadet training is not military?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Undoubtedly in the cadet work there are drills used that are in the military book; you cannot get away from that, as I have already tried to make clear. Whatever the idea was that Lord Strathcona had in mind, I know how the movement has been administered during the last number of years, not only during my incumbency in office, but also during the last regime. There was no idea on the part of either government of inculcating militarism in the minds of those boys. I am just as firm in that now as I was before. I may say that the department realized last year the difficulty and since last March no new units have been authorized. This is carrying out the policy of retrenchment and of discouraging any new units at the present time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Have any new units asked for the grant?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And they have been refused.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, and have been refused.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then the minister has it in his power to refuse them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: To refuse new units. It has been asked that new units be formed, but no units have been formed since March of last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just a word as to the situation as it appears to me from the discussion that has taken place. For a number of years there have been debates in the house as to the advisability of making these so-called grants for cadet training. If there is a doubt about whether the government can refuse to make the grants, of course all the discussion of those years has been useless. The answer would have been very simple: We cannot prevent it. That is, if that is the situation. Apparently neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of National Defence is in a position to say definitely that the government is or is not bound to go on with these grants. It seems to me it is a very remarkable position into which the government has got itself, and I am not referring particularly to this administration.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just now informed that the option is exercisable by the education authorities and not by the government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That means that it is only by the education authorities that these grants, once they have been started, can be discontinued.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the government has to accept the unit in the first instance, and the minister has said that they are not accepting any more.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What strikes me as rather remarkable about the explanation is that the government has power to refuse to make a grant in the first place, but once the grant is made, the government is helpless in the hands of the school authorities. I cannot for a moment imagine that is the position of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so about many things.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It may be so about many things, but I doubt very much if it is so in regard to this, because, if it had been so, that would have been such a simple answer to give years ago when criticism was made of continuance of the grant. The simple answer would have been: We are powerless to refuse to continue it. As regards the obligations so far incurred by the government, I am not prepared to vote against them, but I believe in the present state of the country's finances it should be made quite clear that, when cities like Toronto and Calgary, which perhaps are as much interested in military training or cadet training, whichever you choose to call it, as any other municipality in the dominion, have seen fit to discontinue it on account of the financial position in which they find themselves, no very great hardship would inure to other municipalities from one end of Canada to the other were they to follow the same course. If Toronto is unable financially to continue at the present time with cadet training, that is pretty strong evidence that it should be discontinued throughout the country. If notice were given now that after June of next year this government does not propose to continue the grants for the following year, surely no school authorities would insist upon the grants being continued. We have reached the time in the finances of Canada when they must be cut to the bone, and I believe this is a very good time to make it apparent that for the coming year, at any rate, this grant will have to be discontinued.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have been following as carefully as possible the explanation that has been given. As I understand it, we are bound by contractual obligations. Some three or four years ago this vote was approximately $600,000; to-day it is $300,000; it has been cut in half. Was the whole of that reduction of $300,000 made upon the initiative of the school boards, or was part of it made upon the initiative of the government? It would look as though some at least of the school boards throughout the dominion must have come to the conclusion during the last four or five years to drop cadet training, otherwise the vote would not have been reduced as it has been.

While I am on my feet, I may say that I have never felt very strongly on the cadet movement. I have been in contact with a good many cadets, and I realize the benefit they receive in many ways from their training. I am not going to discuss the question from that point of view at all. But in these days when we are cutting the salaries of the civil servants and finding it difficult to meet our essential obligations, I am thoroughly satisfied that this is one of the places where we could make a saving with less suffering and less hardship than would be caused by cutting any other expenditure on the whole list, and so I would strongly support the suspension of these grants for the present time at least. To repeat my question, was the entire cut of $300,000 which has been made in this vote in the last four or five years made on the initiative of the school boards?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When this government came into power, the vote, if I remember correctly, was $500,000, and the cut was made by doing away with the grant towards uniforms.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Was not that a part of the contractual obligation to the same extent as the rest of the vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, that was something which the government itself gave. There is one other point which has not been mentioned. Many of the school boards have engaged an instructor who is qualified to give this training. Also it must be remembered that there is a strong feeling in many parts of Canada in favour of the cadet movement. Many members have mentioned the feeling in Toronto. If Toronto gives a lead like that, I expect to hear of other cities doing the same thing, and if they do, there will certainly be no pressure on them to continue. On the other hand, wherever a school board feels that it has a just claim to the grant, built up during the years, I do not see how it is possible for us to tell them that the grant will be abruptly discontinued. But my own personal opinion is that there will be a cut in the vote for the reasons which have been given.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: One further question. I am not basing any argument upon the popular feeling in the country; I am confining myself entirely to the question of our contractual obligations. As I understood from the minister, our contractual obligations do not cover that part of the grant which is expended on uniforms, and therefore the government had the right to take the initiative and withdraw that part of the grant. The minister did not quite answer my question as to whether the school boards had taken the initiative in the matter, although he did indicate that the government had the power to take the initiative in respect of that part of the grant which is expended on uniforms. Would the minister indicate that part of the grant which is under the control of the federal authorities, and also that part in respect of which initiative in the matter of reduction must be taken by the school authorities? Because it is obvious that the contractual obligations are not as great as they were originally, according to the minister himself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The assistance which they are now getting is what I would call the contractual obligation of the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some attention has been given to our contractual obligations in this matter. I do not know for how many years the grant for cadet training has been made, but I notice that in 1928, owing to the cancellation of certain regulations for the cadet services, the grant was reduced considerably. For instance, there was a reduction in the grant caused by the cancellation of paragraph 63 of the regulations for the cadet services of Canada, which reads as follows:

A grant of one dollar towards the provision and upkeep of uniform and twenty-five cents towards the provision and upkeep of a suitable military head-dress will be paid annually for:

(a) Each cadet inspected in a complete serviceable military uniform:

It is well to note the "suitable military headdress" and the "military uniform." The regulation continues:

(b) Each cadet whose absence from the inspection parade the inspecting officer is satisfied is due to illness, or other unavoidable cause and whose uniform and head-dress have been produced for inspection by the inspecting officer.

If the department could cut down the grant by cancelling regulations in 1928, I would think that by cancelling all the regulations the entire grant might be done away with.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before you put the question, Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my duty to join with those on this side of the house and to my left who are opposed to this vote. When this vote used to come up annually a few years ago I think that all the members on this side of the house who voted for it did so reluctantly, and, particularly in view of the reasons which have been expressed here to-night, I think we should consider well before we pass this item. Under the conditions that obtain throughout this country to-day, when people in all parts of Canada are undergoing hardships and many of them are in dire necessity, I do not think the cause of military training in Canada will suffer if this grant is dropped for one year or reduced along the lines suggested by the amendment.

I do not agree with the views that have been expressed to-night by my hon. friend from Montmagny, who stated that this vote was very popular in the province of Quebec. So far as the district and county which I have the honour to represent in this house is concerned, it does not benefit one single cent by this vote. I do not believe that cadet training does so very much for the physique and disciplining of our young men, as has been suggested by my hon. friend from Montmagny. The young people in our colleges throughout the province get enough training and exercise in their ordinary school activities, and they do not need this military training of which we hear so much. Therefore I think we might well consider adopting the amendment and reducing this vote, if indeed we do not dispense with it entirely. I for one am not ready to vote the amount of money that is being asked for this year for this purpose, particularly when, as has been stated by the hon. member for Quebec East, a great many of our people are starving and a great many young children are in want of the necessaries of life. I think the vote should not pass; I think it should be dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I am not so much concerned with what we do at the moment, in the matter of meeting obligations to which we are committed up to the present time; I think they should be paid. I am, however, very much concerned about entering into further obligations involving future commitments under conditions obtaining in Canada to-day. I anticipate that before long we may have a statement from the Prime Minister, and possibly one from the Minister of Finance, concerning financial conditions in Canada. That statement will no doubt contain reference to conditions as they are in the provinces and municipalities. Why, in the face of an approaching statement of the kind we have reason to expect, we should be absolutely oblivious to the possibility of cutting down further obligations which involve the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities alike, I fail to see. Personally, I wish to state clearly that I believe this parliament has all the power it requires, if it wishes to exercise that power, to end any further commitments respecting cadet services. I am not asking that those services be discontinued for all time, but that they be discontinued during these hard times, and until conditions very materially improve.

I say to the hon. gentleman that, unless as minister of the department, he will give us an undertaking, or, unless the Prime Minister will give us an undertaking on behalf of the government, that the government is prepared to communicate with the provinces, municipalities or with whatever bodies they may have made commitments, expressing the hope that those bodies may see their way clear to forego further grants for the period of a year, I shall when it next comes up oppose the vote for this service. I am prepared to support the government with respect to its present obligations, but I want to make it perfectly clear at this time that, if it is possible to prevent it, I am not going to have the government enter into obligations for another year which we shall subsequently be called upon to meet. We do not want to be told a year hence that obligations have been entered into and that the government cannot, without default, forego payments. There is nothing in the Strathcona trust deed which obligates this parliament and the government. The minister knows that. Any obligation this parliament has, arises as the result of an act of this parliament; any act of this parliament can be repealed or amended. If in the light of present day conditions the minister does not wish to take the step of repealing or of amending the act, at least he can take a step similar to that the government has taken in respect to many other matters, and communicate to the interested parties the wishes of the administration. As for any obligation to wait for a lead from the municipalities or the provinces, my reply would be that the government did not wait for a lead from members of parliament before it deducted ten per cent from their salaries; it did not wait for a lead from civil servants before deducting ten per cent from their salaries; it did not wait for a lead from railway employees before it dismissed large numbers of them. The minister has made a long defence of this particular type of training, and has stated that it must be maintained so that some training master or teachers may be looked after and cared for. He did not show the same concern about the thousands of railway employees who, owing to pressure of the times, were dismissed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I am asking only that, with respect to this particular service, the government exercise the same endeavour to effect economies as it has exercised in very large measure with respect to many other services. Any one who examines the estimates will appreciate the fact that in many cases the government has gone as far as it could be expected to go in the reduction of expenditures. Certainly the item now before us might well be reduced, and for a year hence could be omitted altogether. I ask the minister, before the item is allowed to pass, whether or not he is prepared to give an assurance that the government will consider the policy of discontinuing these grants for a year or, if not discontinuing them outright, at least expressing to the municipalities concerned the view that it is the wish of the administration that the grants should be discontinued for that period of time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The department certainly signified its desire to economize in every possible way when it stopped the formation of any new cadet corps this year. I am firmly of the opinion that the government will look into the matter very carefully, and if anything can be done—and I am sure something can be done—towards a very material cut in the vote, without involving any direct breach of confidence with school boards, such action will be taken. I am seized of the views the right hon. gentleman has expressed concerning the necessity for economy. I can tell him the government will consider the matter carefully, and if without breaking any agreement something may be done, it will be done.

Mr. DUPUIS: Out of the $300,000 included in the estimate, how much will be required to finish the school term up to June, 1933?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: All of it will be required to meet allowances due to cadet corps and for the pay of personnel employed as physical training instructors, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN: All those in favour of the amendment say "aye."

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me I should like to say a few words in French, because as a representative of a constituency in which there is more misery than need of cadet services, I feel bound to make a statement.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, as you are aware I am the successor, in the house, of a man who represented the constituency of Laprairie-Napierville for a quarter of a century, and who, during the whole of his parliamentary life was strenuously opposed to military service. It does not follow, however, that I should share, in all circumstances, the views he held on this subject, because I think that the training of cadets is useful both physically and from the viewpoint of discipline, and, is an excellent training for later on in life. However, I share the views of my leader, and state that in a period of hardships and want, when we are surrounded by friends, relatives and many others who are destitute, deprived of the necessities of life, even children actually in want, we should practice economy in our budget so as to permit the government to relieve those in such miserable circumstances. That is why I am strongly opposed to all new grants as long as this economic depression is with us.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 15, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Morand be substituted for that of Mr. Peck on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Coote be substituted for that of Mr. Campbell on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Wilson be substituted for that of Mr. Campbell on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill proposes a rather technical amendment to the Exchequer Court Act in respect of claims made against the crown. It proposes the adoption of a uniform law throughout Canada in regard to money paid to the crown under a mistake of law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS FOR ONE YEAR—POSTPONEMENT OF REVISION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) I move for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Bank Act, the effect of which is merely to extend the existing charters for a year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: I would ask the consent of the house to move, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. This is exactly similar to the bill amending the Bank Act, and will extend the operation of the existing provisions of the law for another year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

C.G.S. ARRAS

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. Was an inquiry held at Halifax, in connection with the firing of a live shell by the C.G.S. Arras, at the fishermen at Cape Wolfe, Prince Edward Island, and damaging the property of Mrs. E. F. Hopgood, of Cape Wolfe?
2. If such an inquiry was held, will the minister give a full copy of the evidence taken at the investigation, giving the names of those who gave evidence and those who represented the department?
3. Is Captain Barkhouse, who was in charge of the C.G.S. Arras, still being retained in the employ of the department?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.
2. Yes, if asked for.
3. Yes.

INDIAN TRUST FUNDS*

Mr. LAURIN:

1. What was the amount of the Indians' trust fund standing to the credit of each province in 1920 and 1932?
2. What was the total sum derived from the alienation of Indian lands in each province, from 1867 to 1920, and from 1920 to 1932?

Mr. MURPHY: The first part of this question is answered, and with the consent of the hon. member who placed the question on the order paper the second part is dropped.

ALIENATION OF INDIAN LANDS

Mr. LAURIN:

What provinces submitted claims to the federal government since 1920, respecting the alienation of Indian lands, by virtue of the judgment of the privy council dated November 23, 1920?

Mr. MURPHY: The province of Quebec.

SMITHERS, B.C.—POST OFFICE

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the total revenue of the post office at Smithers, British Columbia, for the years 1929-30-31-32?

2. What salary and other remuneration was paid to the postmaster at that place during the same years?

3. What was the total rent paid for the post office quarters during the same years?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR—DISMISSALS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many employees have been dismissed from the Department of Interior since 1930?

2. How many have been dismissed in each branch for the same time?

3. What was the average remuneration to employees for the year 1930?

4. What was the average remuneration to employees for each branch for the year 1932?

5. What was the floor space occupied by each branch in 1930?

6. Have any of the buildings occupied by the department in 1930 been vacated since?

7. What was the total number of employees in 1930 (all branches)?

8. What was the total number of employees in 1932 (all branches)?

LAPOINTE PIER—DREDGING

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the amount of estimate, with quantities and prices, submitted to the Department of Marine for approval by Vancouver harbour commissioners, for the dredging work for the extension to the Lapointe pier at Vancouver?

2. Were public tenders invited, if not, why?

3. What is the name of the firm employed, the names of directors, if any, and amount of deposit and date of commencement and completion, respectively?

4. What is the name of any other firm from which figures were obtained with prices?

5. What was the total amount paid in connection with this dredging, with amount of extras allowed, if any, and quantity of material removed, with unit prices?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT—QUEBEC

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, including telegrams, letters and other documents, exchanged between the Minister of Fisheries, or any of his officials, and the authorities of the provincial government of Quebec, from April 1, 1932, to date, regarding the improvement of the fisheries in the province of Quebec.

GRANDES BERGERONNES, QUE.—WHARF

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams, and other documents with respect to improvements of landing facilities at the wharf of Grandes Bergeronnes, in the county of Saguenay, effected since January 1, 1932, to date.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, and other documents, exchanged between the Department of Public Works and the municipal authorities of Havre St. Pierre, in the county of Saguenay, with respect to improvements and reconstruction work carried out at the wharf in said locality, since January 1, 1932, to date.

ST. LOUIS DE GONZAGUE, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a copy of all telegrams, complaints, correspondence, petitions, reports, communications and other documents, respecting the postmastership of St-Louis de Gonzague, county of Beauharnois, since May 1, 1932.

BEAUHARNOIS, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a copy of all telegrams, complaints, correspondence, petitions, reports, communications and other documents, respecting the postmastership of the town of Beauharnois, and changes effected since November 8, 1932.

POINTE FLEURANT, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of pay lists and account for materials supplied the Department of Public Works for the construction of the Pointe Fleurant wharf and the approach thereto, in the county of Bonaventure in the year 1932.

ST. PAMPHILE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. FAFARD:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence, and petitions exchanged, since January 1, 1932, to date, between any individual and the Post Office Department, respecting the post office of St-Pamphile, county of L'Islet.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Mr. SPENCER:

For a copy of all correspondence between any member of the government and Mr. G. G. Serkau or any of his associates in connection with the proposal to exchange Canadian cattle and hides for Russian commodities.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SELECT COMMITTEE OF ADVISABILITY OF CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in order to decrease the cost of government, shorten the length of sessions, and deal with the business of the country in a more practical and intelligent way, a select standing committee of the house be appointed to consider the advisability of referring certain agreed estimates to a special committee where all information relating thereto may be provided by the ministers after which the committee shall report to the house, such report to be debatable in detail under the rules of procedure.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in bringing this resolution before the house my object is not so much to obtain the endorsement of the house, as that has been done already on at least two or three occasions, but in order that parliament might take such action as would facilitate business, lessen the length of the sessions, reduce the cost of government to the people of this country and permit us to conduct our business in a more scientific and businesslike manner.

In moving this resolution I realize that I am asking the house to deal with one of the great prerogatives of the House of Commons, a prerogative which is the result of hundreds of years of struggle dating back to the thirteenth or fourteenth century, when parliament obtained the right to redress for its petitions before supply was granted. When we look back over the development of parliamentary institutions we find that a very interesting story is told on the pages of history. It was a surprise to me to find that in the great charter wrested from the then reigning monarch in 1215, nothing was said about taxation. At that time taxation did not exist; it was simply a matter of the liberties of the subject and of rents. In fact, there was no parliament in existence at that time. When we realize that all parliamentary activity emanated from the crown, we get more or less of a key to the structure. For example, in those days parliament was summoned by royal writ; it met in a royal palace by royal command. Royalty's business was the first on the agenda, and royalty reserved the right of either rejecting or accepting the petitions of parliament. It was not until the year 1327 that we find parliament presenting to the then reigning monarch its petitions in one common bill. That action was the origin of the name of the chamber in which we are now doing business, the first designation of a branch of parliament as the House of Commons. The struggle continued, it ebbed and flowed through the pages of history, parliament sometimes gaining and sometimes losing in the struggle. A considerable gain was made during the reign of the Tudors, but that was lost in the reign of the Stuarts, until finally one was beheaded, bringing about the great revolution.

I should like to remind the house of the great principles of that revolution, upon which we do not put enough stress to-day. That was the real genesis of parliamentary control. The first concession obtained from the then reigning sovereign was that there should be parliamentary government in contradistinction to government by the monarchy. The second concession was that the House of Commons should be supreme. It needs no elaboration on my part to show this house how important it was that the House of Commons should be supreme over the House of Lords or the reigning monarch. A third and very important concession was that the House of Commons should represent the people. Hon. members who have studied the pages of history know that up until that time the House of Commons did not represent the people of the old land. That concession did not go into effect at that time, because of the limited franchise held by the people of Great Britain; it was not until the Reform Bill of 1832 was passed that the ordinary voter secured control of parliament and parliamentary activity. In outlining these steps in the development of the power of the House of Commons, it is worth while to note that the House of Lords in Great Britain did not come into existence until some centuries after the House of Commons.

Having attained that authority, and having put it upon a safe foundation, the people of the old land became, probably not indifferent but not quite so active in enforcing their rights. From that time on we have had some deviations from parliamentary procedure, and it is to correct some of these that I have put on the order paper the resolution which is now before the house. If I might read some extracts from certain authorities on parliamentary government, I would say that, having attained the supreme right to control the executive, the finances of the country, we have probably been a little negligent, indifferent, in exercising that right. One of the greatest authorities on parliamentary government which I have been able to find, makes this very significant statement:

> The House of Commons—now that it is the true sovereign and appoints the real executive—has long since ceased to be the checking, sparing, economical body that it once was.

And that it was created to be.

Another, Mr. Pollard, who, I am told, is one of the greatest authorities of the day on parliamentary government, says:

> Legislation has grown too complicated for profitable discussion of its details by a body of 700 general practitioners of politics between the bureaucrats who inform the minister and the spokesman who will have to suffer or profit from their administration.

That to-day is the statement of fact by which we are confronted in the house and, I think, in nearly every other legislative chamber on this continent and many in Europe. It is to remedy that defect that I ask the house now to pass this resolution.

This is not new to the house. It was introduced first in 1921 by the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, now Senator Lemieux. In 1925 the committee of the house which revised the rules, made a similar recommendation, and in 1930, the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) introduced a resolution along the same lines, which passed this chamber with the endorsement of the then prime minister, now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and with the blessing of the present prime minister (Mr. Bennett). But, sir, we have not been able to get any action and it is in order to get some I have again had the temerity to bring this resolution before the house and to ask hon. members to spend a little of their time to see whether we cannot devise some method which will be more in conformity with modern business methods than the one which we are now following.

Many of us who sit and who have sat in this house for several years are amazed at the unbusinesslike procedure we follow in passing the estimates. In days gone by I have seen millions of dollars, yes, on one occasion I saw every item of every department of government passed in one night. Is it any wonder that the Canadian people are to-day critical of our methods when they see millions and tens and sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars voted without any legitimate, honest or competent scrutiny as to where the money was going or whether it was being properly spent in conformity with the policies of this country.

What methods are followed in other countries? I went to some trouble to find out what they do in the United States. I find there the president has a personal representative who does not belong to any of the committees, and before whom the head of every department must bring his estimates. He scrutinizes them and, if necessary, cuts them down, forwarding them to the president with his recommendation. If the president approves them—and this is long before they go to congress—he sends them to the House of Representatives, not for consideration as a whole, but to be considered by a committee on estimates before they go to the house. This committee is divided into subcommittees. For example, if the post office estimates are up, they go to a subcommittee on post office estimates. They tear them to pieces if they like; they summon heads of departments, members of congress, ministers and others and put them under oath, examine them and thus get a thorough knowledge of the expenditures of the country. After they have passed the committee, they are referred to the House of Representatives, and the house debates them in committee of the whole for two or three days. Then they go to a committee where members are permitted to move amendments in speeches of five minutes duration. During that time they can either cut out the estimates, increase them or pass them as they stand. In other words, they have power to pass upon the budget which goes to congress. After they are passed by the house, they are sent to the Senate which has the same power either to reinstate something that has been cut out or to eliminate something that has been in the budget or to add to it. The crux of the whole argument I wish to present to the house is this, that at the present time the control of the expenditure of this country is all in the executive. The House of Commons, the backbenchers, have not a thing to say about the matter. The government makes up the estimates, brings them before parliament, which has to pass them, or else there is an election and a new government. That, to my mind, has eliminated from parliament the control of the finances of the country and centered it in the executive. This is contrary to the spirit of democratic government and particularly to the spirit of the British people. I have described the way in which public finances are handled in the United States.

Then I went to Germany and found there a similar process, only a little more drastic. If you will believe it, there they have a committee on estimates, composed partly of the representatives of the people and partly of business men, outside the representatives of the people, who are selected on account of their ability and capacity for business. All bills pertaining to trade and commerce are referred automatically to that committee. That brings into play in the government of the country the greatest brains in the business world. After these measures have been disposed of, they must come back for ratification by the elected representatives of the people. That, again, brings the control of the finances of the country back where it should be, namely, to the elected representatives of the people.

Then I went to Great Britain where I found that the very first steps towards controlling expenditures in that country were taken away back in 1902 when they passed a statute giving parliament power to form a committee on estimates. That was not acted upon until 1912, but in 1912, 1913 and 1914 that committee was active. When the war broke out, the committee ceased to function for a few years but it was revived in a committee on national expenditure under the chairmanship of Sir Herbert Samuel, and in 1916, 1917 and 1918 it functioned along a similar line in Great Britain going, not only into estimates but into other expenditures such as those involved in war, passing on them and sending recommendations to the house. When they ceased to function in 1920, I think it was, they presented to the House of Commons their recommendations and thirteenth report. I should like to quote briefly from them, although I do not like reading extracts to the house, but I think the house will be interested in hearing the recommendations the committee made regarding national expenditure and particularly the estimates of the parliament of Great Britain. Before the committee made their recommendations they sent out questionnaires to the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker, the heads of all departments and influential people in the government, asking for their opinions on how to handle the estimates of the house, and after replies had been received and the committee had sat for some three or four years and heard all the evidence they made the following recommendations to the British House of Commons:

> We are of opinion that the existing procedure of the House of Commons is inadequate to secure proper parliamentary control over the national expenditure.

Is there anyone here who would dispute the application of that statement to the procedure of this house regarding our national expenditure? The next recommendation was:

> We recommend that there should be appointed each session two standing committees on estimates, each consisting of fifteen members, and a third should be added if experience showed that this was desirable.

I want the house to note that recommendation because I shall refer to it later. The third recommendation was this:

> It should be the duty of the committees to consider the annual estimates and such supplementary estimates as the conditions allow, and report to the house any economies which they regarded as desirable and which did not raise questions of policy.

Both in the United States and Great Britain questions of policy were eliminated from the consideration of the committee. Policy, of course, always has been and must always be a matter for the government of the day. The next recommendation was this:

> For the assistance of the committees there should be appointed an officer of the house with the title of Examiner of Estimates.

Similar to what they have in the American republic. The next recommendation was this:

Opportunity should be provided for the consideration by the house of the recommendations of the committees in the manner proposed.

There were many other recommendations which I shall not read because I dislike reading matter to the house. It looks to me like a lack of respect for the house and rather like a lack of intelligence on the part of the speaker, as if he could not make his own speech.

The recommendations which I have quoted were not carried out. In 1926 the British house appointed a committee on estimates. It did not function very successfully, and for that reason criticism was offered in this chamber some years ago against adopting any similar plan here, but if you will read the history of that committee, and the reasons are set out in the report from which I have quoted, you will find that the reasons for its failure were threefold. First, the task put upon it was too great. Only one committee was appointed instead of two or three, and it would have taken that committee several years to make the rounds of the different departments. The second reason was that no expert counsel was appointed to assist the committee. I mean counsel for the committee, not for the government, just as when a royal commission is appointed counsel is also appointed to help bring out the evidence. That was a recommendation made by the Samuel committee of 1921, but it was never carried out.

I am not attempting to lay down any policy for this government to pursue. I am simply asking the house to appoint a committee to investigate this question. I submit that it is time that we in this house took upon ourselves the doing of the business of this country in a businesslike way. I do not think I am far astray when I say that a good board of directors would do in three weeks all that this parliament takes four or five months to do, and if ever there was a time in the history of this country when we should do things economically and relieve, if possible, the burden of taxation upon the people, that time is now. If we had such a committee we could utilize the best brains of this parliament, some of which are not now being used. We could bring into activity many minds whose labours would help to shorten the sessions of this house and enable us to do our business much better than it is done now.

I wonder if the members of this house and the people of this country realize that this session will cost this country approximately $3,000,000, or on an average $25,000 a day for every day we sit. I know that some one will tell me that there are a lot of fixed expenses. That is true. Indemnities of members of the Senate and Commons are a fixed charge, but I looked up the figures and I found that that does not account for half the total expenditure. Without going into details, I think it is fair to say that the controllable expenditure, which is the other half, could be reduced in proportion to the shortening of the session. If you could shorten the session by one-third, it would mean a saving to the people of this country of approximately half a million dollars. Now if that amount can be saved, it should be saved. Furthermore, surely the time of the members of this house is worth something to themselves back home attending to their own business.

I discussed this proposal with a member of the house the other day, and he said, "No, I am against you." I asked him why. "Well," he said, "I object to any man coming between me and my ministers for what I want." Imagine such an objection! If what he wants is legitimate he can go before any committee, substantiate his claim and get what he wants.

Another member said to me, "No, you would spoil my fun with the ministers." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a playhouse, and with all due deference to the hon. member I submit that $20,000 a day is a little too much to pay even if the fun is enjoyed by the member to whom I allude.

What are the objections to the present method? Has anyone ever seen a more ridiculous spectacle than is now presented to the house when estimates are up? Some member asks the minister a question. The minister leans over and whispers to his deputy. The deputy cannot address the house; we cannot ask him any questions direct, but we have to ask him indirectly because the minister does not know the answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not referring to any particular minister. I have been here since 1917, and I find that they are all the same—every one.

Mr. HANBURY: I thought the hon. member was referring to the Minister of Railways.

Mr. McGIBBON: No, he is generally pretty well posted. What did we see in this house last night? The only man in this house who knew the answer to a question about the Strathcona trust fund was the Prime Minister. Not another member knew a thing about it. The deputy knew, and if we had been able to cross-question him, do you not think that we should have been able to get more information? But we have seen it year in and year out; we know the way the ministers have to account for their actions. In my view the way ministers are worked during the session is a shame.

Mr. HANBURY: Why not turn over the government to the deputies?

Mr. McGIBBON: If my hon. friend will vote for this resolution, we will. We have listened to questions asked across the floor of the house which had no more to do with the matter under discussion than with Mars. I am not blaming anybody; probably I have been as great an offender as any other hon. member. I want to say however that in my experience estimates have been used as the chief instrument of blockade and obstruction; that has been their main purpose. Since I entered this house in 1917 I am convinced they have been used most effectively in that way. That line of procedure might have been all right ten or fifteen years ago, but surely parliament must make progress. Surely we have to have better business methods in this House of Commons. Surely the time of this country and government is worth money. Surely the time of hon. members is worth something. As I have said, the text of this resolution has been endorsed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King); it has received the blessing of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett); the principle contained in it has twice passed this house, and was once recommended by the committee in charge of the revision of the rules of the house. If at this time we can put into action the resolution now before us we can save the country annually from $300,000 to $500,000.

Mr. NEILL: On previous occasions the resolution did not appear in the same terms.

Mr. McGIBBON: No, but the principle was the same. I do not know whether the government would agree to it or not, but I am of the opinion the suggested change would restore to the House of Commons some power over the treasury which at the present time it does not have. Had the estimates of a department passed a non-partisan committee the work of the minister upon entering the house would be minimized. I ask hon. members this question: How much time was spent by this house on estimates from the railway committee, after those estimates had been considered by the committee? We have never spent more than ten or fifteen minutes. Further than that, hon. members would have a chance in the smaller committee to hear the officials of the departments, to scrutinize them. Hon. members would be in a position to gain accurate knowledge of the business before the house, and for that reason criticism in the house would be more effective.

I do not like the practice of reading during debate, but at this time I should like to read a few comments which I believe would be of interest to hon. members. Within the last two years a committee on national expenditure has been formed in Great Britain, before which have appeared some of the greatest minds in the country. The evidence was published in 1931. The Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin had this to say:

> I think the estimates committee serve a useful purpose, by all means.

He was referring to the committee which functioned in the years 1917, 1918 and 1919. I give that to the house as a testimonial from a man who was once prime minister of Great Britain. Hon. members will note in his view the estimates committee was serving a useful function. Then we turn to the words of the Right Hon. David Lloyd George:

> There has been no examination by the House of Commons itself of the estimates; no careful scrutiny whatever with a view to finding out whether it is possible to reduce the expenditure without detriment to the efficiency of the public service.

He states that there has been no careful scrutiny of estimates in Great Britain. Is it not time that they had it? I think that query might apply equally to the House of Commons in Canada. We have had no efficient examination into our expenditures to see whether they were in conformity with the policies of government, and were not extravagant. We ought to have it. Then Mr. Lloyd George states further:

> The minister must have the ultimate say,—

Of course he must have; otherwise we would be forfeiting the basic principle of responsible government.

> —subject to what parliament says, but it would enable the House of Commons effectively to supervise, and not only that, but to keep itself informed.

I wonder if that would not be applicable to this House of Commons? I should like now to read the statement of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, the man who advocated the formation of a sub-parliament in Great Britain which would be responsible to parliament. On that sub-parliament he suggested there should be not only members of the House of Commons and House of Lords but that in addition he would commandeer for that body the best business brains of Great Britain. To the sub-parliament would go all bills relating to trade and commerce. In my view that suggestion is worthy of consideration, because in the consideration of bills touching trade and commerce we should have, to help members of the House of Commons and the Senate, the best help from outside sources. In that way we would obtain more valuable information. Here is what Mr. Churchill said concerning procedure in supply:

He suggested our present method of discussing on supply was quite useless.

Is there any hon. member who will dispute that statement? Undoubtedly our present discussions in supply are quite useless. All hon. members are aware of the truth of that statement. We talk, and talk, and talk, all day. In the old days before the introduction of the eleven o'clock rule—which I thought was a mistake—talk would continue until the early hours of the morning. It was only at that time that business could be transacted. In my view the procedure in supply is an anachronism.

Mr. Churchill states further:

I agree that after they have been presented to parliament their consideration should take place by committees, dealing with each branch, military, civil and so forth, and those committees should apply the scrutiny which the public imagine is applied on the supply days.

Yes, the public imagines scrutiny is applied in this house; but is it? Does any hon. member apply any real scrutiny to supply voted in this house? I do not know of any such instance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to know if the hon. member has in mind the appointment of only one or of several committees?

Mr. McGIBBON: All I am asking is that this house appoint a committee to discuss the matter now before us. It will be the duty of that committee to formulate plans and rules, and to decide whether or not we shall have one or a dozen committees. I am making no definite suggestion in that connection; all I want is action. When that committee reports to the house, the matter will be open for discussion. But for heaven's sake in dealing with the business of our country let us bring our methods up-to-date. To-day we are using methods which were in vogue fifty or sixty years ago. May I read further from the words of Mr. Churchill:

I think one witness, at any rate—Mr. Lloyd George—went further than that and suggested it was not merely a matter of controlling expenditure, but it was a matter of using the control of expenditure as a means of controlling the executive.

I do not know whether that suggestion would be agreeable to the government; I suggest it is worthy of consideration. When advocating the appointment of a committee on estimates in Great Britain, that was the main point stressed by Mr. Lloyd George. Then Mr. Churchill continues.

. . . or giving the House of Commons more authority over the executive than it possessed at the moment. He suggested our present method of discussing on supply was quite useless.

They all agreed. I think we can all say amen to their prayer; it is absolutely useless. May I quote another one. This is from Sir Herbert Samuel, who I think needs no introduction. He says:

The House of Commons as an institution would gain more power, and the cabinet would have less power. I think on the whole that would be an advantage.

I am not making any comment on that. Then one of the members puts this question:

You really want to do three things; you want to make an estimates committee more effective in its check of the estimates, you want to make an effective opportunity on the floor of the house to debate its reports?

Sir Herbert Samuel: Where necessary.

Q. Some of its reports, shall I say?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you want to make it possible on minor issues for the house to amend the estimates without causing a parliamentary crisis?

In the United States the committee has power to knock out the estimates or to increase them, either in the House of Representatives or the Senate. One of the main things in Sir Herbert Samuel's report was that that should not be considered a vote of want of confidence in the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: These are some things to consider. Sir Herbert Samuel says further:

I want to take it a little further than that. Is the object that of more employment of members, or is it the control of the executive, because any of these objects or all of them could come under the scheme?

He wants to make this an instrument for employing the unused brains in the house. I think we have a lot of them here that are not being used. I myself feel that I have not enough work in the House of Commons, and I try to look up some. I have not half as much work as I do at home, and I would rather have more. One must be active and alert and keep his brain working, otherwise one deteriorates. I think a very important point in these recommendations is the suggestion that we employ all the brains we have here.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have not given very much consideration to the subject matter of this resolution, but I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. McGibbon) for the industry he has displayed and the information he has given the house. I have been a member of this house since the spring of 1921; I have sat through every session, and each year I have been impressed with the amount of the time of the house that is wasted in the consideration of the estimates. I know there are certain reasons which would move one portion of the house at all events to exercise such control as they may over the estimates. For ten years I sat in opposition, and I know that criticism of the estimates is the only weapon an opposition has against the furtherance by a government of undesirable legislation. A government can put through by sheer weight of numbers, whether it is right or wrong, legislation which is objectionable to an opposition. But on the estimates an alert opposition, if properly generaled and handled, can in the long run seriously embarrass a government in respect of legislation it desires to put through to which the opposition takes objection. From the standpoint of political tactics, therefore, I can understand why an opposition would oppose such a move as is suggested by this resolution. But apart from that I cannot see that any great advantage accrues to any political party by following the present practice. It has been stated here to-day that this practice has been in vogue since confederation, and I presume in deliberative assemblies in Canada long before that. While the fact that it is antiquated is no argument against it, yet in my humble judgment it is not evidence in its favour.

If we can dissociate our minds for the moment from the question of party tactics and consider this resolution on its merits, I suggest that the resolution has much to commend it. After all what does it seek? It does not seek by one fell swoop to impose on this house a new policy or new methods of procedure in connection with the estimates; it merely aims at the appointment of a special committee to study the question. If hon. gentlemen who have been in the house a considerable time will reflect I think they will agree with the mover of this resolution that there is room for improvement in the method of considering the estimates. What has been the experience in recent years? What is the experience in the provincial houses? I have never been a member of a provincial legislature, but for a good many years I have watched the legislature in my own province function, and I know that government legislation and private legislation have the right of way for very much the major portion of the time that the legislature sits, and that as a rule under every government the estimates have been crowded through in the last forty-eight hours. I do not know what the history is in the province of Quebec, or in the legislature of Ontario, but speaking generally that is the history in New Brunswick. And it never was truer than in the days of William Pugsley. The estimates were on the table, members had some opportunity to study them, but consideration was deferred to the last minute. I say that is not a businesslike way of transacting public affairs.

The parliament of the United Kingdom is the parliament of an empire, dealing with great empire problems. The mover of the resolution has done well to put on the record excerpts from reports and evidence from Great Britain in connection with this matter, because they have had to study it there. In my humble judgment there is no doubt that the sessions of parliament in Canada last too long, having regard to the business that we actually transact. Ninety per cent of the members of this house must earn their living outside the limits of Ottawa. We cannot do that, do justice to our families and to ourselves, and provide for our old age if we spend five or six months a year in this city. If we would we could transact all the business of parliament in three months in any given year.

An hon. MEMBER: Less than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I agree; less than that. At one time, when I was in opposition, the question of the indemnity paid to members of parliament was being discussed in this house, and at that time I made a sporting offer to the Prime Minister. I said that I would give back to the treasury of this country $1,000 for every month he would shorten the session, and I guaranteed that we would do just as much business.

An hon. MEMBER: You can afford to do it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not say I could afford to do so, but it would pay me to do so, through increasing my earning power in other ways, and I think it would pay most hon. members as well. That is my personal view, but of course there is a far wider aspect that should appeal to most of us. Can we transact business of the detailed character which is involved in the estimates by the method we have followed during all these years? Those of us who have had anything to do with corporation management in an executive or administrative capacity know that such management could not be carried on in this way. As a matter of practice such routine matters as these never would come before a board of directors.

So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we are agreed on the premise that this is an expensive and cumbersome method of transacting business at least we ought to explore the possibilities of newer and better methods. To that extent I am in accord with the resolution. I do not say that I would be prepared to go quite so far as my hon. friend would take us, but I am prepared to agree that we should study the question and see what is being done in other jurisdictions. An hon. member may say, "What right has a member from Saskatchewan to say what public works shall be voted or withheld in my county? I know the county; he does not know it. I know the needs of my county; he does not know them." The argument is that the member himself is best qualified to say what his constituency needs, and I agree with that argument if he is the right kind of member, but that is not the point.

Mr. McPHEE: Why single out Saskatchewan?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was just an illustration; I might just as well say Quebec. I have nothing against Saskatchewan; there was no personal allusion at all. I suppose if you go through the estimates for the last ten years you will find that less money has been spent on public works in Saskatchewan than in any other province of Canada, while the maritime provinces have received their fair share. They take care that they do receive their share, and there is a reason for that. Just glance at a map of the maritime provinces; look at the hundreds of miles of coast line, and then call to mind storms such as the one we had on the first day of this month, when practically every exposed breakwater and wharf in the maritime provinces was damaged. These will have to be repaired, and who is going to do that work?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The same applies to Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, to a more limited extent. I notice, however, that Quebec receives other favours. I might mention the citadel and a few other places where we have been spending money year in and year out since confederation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is money well spent.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What harm will be done if we set up a committee of this house, composed of earnest men, to study the question of changing our method of transacting business? There is no reason why we should not take that step. Personally I have reached a point in my life when I do not see how I can spend six months in Ottawa every year, especially since the stock market debacle of 1929. I have to earn my living, and that applies to other members as well. Let us do something that will shorten the sessions of parliament, and when parliament is not actually in session we may be able to do a great deal more for our constituencies. On the whole, therefore, I think I must vote for this resolution. No harm will be done; a great deal of information may be obtained, and the cost to the country will not be very great, while on the other hand we may be able to save the country a great deal of money.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to offer any objection to the suggestion contained in the resolution proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. McGibbon), but I must say that while there is a chance of reducing the time spent in the house on the general discussion of estimates, I fail to understand how some of the reforms suggested by the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken can be brought into effect. After all this is a responsible government; they must take the responsibility of presenting the estimates, and I fail to see how a committee could reduce or increase those estimates. It might shorten the time spent in discussion, and of course that would be worth while.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would my hon. friend pardon me? I did not have time to finish my remarks. All these estimates would have to come back to the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was just going to say that if this were the case I fear that instead of being shortened the period of discussion would be lengthened.

Mr. McGIBBON: No one could speak for more than forty minutes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We discussed this question when I was a member of the preceding government, and while we favoured some such action we felt that it would be unfair to delegate to a committee the entire right of discussion. Another method suggested was that any member interested in any item coming under any department could have the privilege of appearing before the committee and making representations, but after all under our system of government the government of the day must take responsibility for preparing the estimates. That is the first point. When they have prepared the estimates and submitted them to the house, they have the privilege of reducing or increasing those estimates or of introducing new estimates and so on, and to the government belongs the responsibility. My hon. friend holds out the hope that some control might be exercised over the government or over the individual ministers. I fail to see how that could happen, because after all every individual on the other side of the house is pledged to support the program of the government, and each member does support it. Seldom if ever does a member differ from a minister or the government itself on any question, whether it be estimates or legislation.

Mr. McGIBBON: If my hon. friend will notice, the resolution refers to certain agreed estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know my hon. friend has qualified his request, but I am merely pointing out the only merit I see in the resolution, which is that it might possibly shorten the time spent in discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that not be worth while?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, it might be, but after all if the estimates eventually are returned to the house for discussion I doubt if any time will be saved. If the report of the committee was to be considered as final, then some time might be saved.

A great deal has been said about the advantages of sending the estimates of the Canadian National Railways to a special committee of this house before which all the officials of the company are called to furnish all the information required. In spite of the work of this committee, I find abroad a great deal of criticism with respect to the expenditures of this railway. My hon. friend shakes his head, but evidently he has not been travelling in the same portion of Canada as I have.

Mr. McGIBBON: My hon. friend misunderstood me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am merely citing one instance to my hon. friend. The government in power delegated to that committee all the criticism which was properly the function of government. That committee has carried on for the last ten years and yet we find the results of its investigations being criticized to a greater degree than the operations of any minister who has come before the house and submitted to its criticism.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. gentleman say that the work of that special select committee on government railways has been criticized?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not wish to convey that impression. I made the statement that the conclusions of no committee of this house have been more criticized than have those of the committee dealing with the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways. Upon that committee were representatives from every section of the house and if that is a criterion of what is going to happen if we delegate the investigation of all estimates to a committee, then I doubt that the work of that committee will be a success.

I do not wish to enter into a discussion upon this matter, I merely wanted to point out some difficulties which I think would be in the way. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to accept the motion of the hon. gentleman that a committee should investigate these matters and report to the house.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, some years ago I voted against a resolution of a less stringent character than this one, and I propose to vote against this one. There seems to be a tendency to reduce the powers of the ordinary private member of the House of Commons. There has been an ever-increasing desire by all governments to do this. During the ten or twelve years I have been here, I have seen this under both the late and present governments. The effort has been made to take more and more power away from the private members and concentrate it in the hands of the government. In the course of another hundred years we will probably have all power concentrated in the hands of one man. I agree with the first part of the very able speech of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) when he said that it took one hundred years or more of hard struggle for the British Commons to obtain control over the voting of supply, but to my mind this resolution proposes to vitiate a right which is about the only one we have left.

The hon. member quoted the opinions of British statesmen and various committees that dealt with this matter in Great Britain, but he neglected to mention that no action had been taken, things remaining as they were before. According to the quotations by my hon. friend, these statesmen seemed to be in favour of another system but apparently they were not able to inaugurate a system better than that already in force.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) referred to the railway committee and I had made a note to speak about that. This committee consists of perhaps twenty or thirty members and, as the member for Muskoka said, it goes thoroughly into the railway estimates. The officials of the railway are before the committee, a report is made and the result is that only a few minutes are spent in putting it through the house. The result of this procedure is that 90 per cent of the members know nothing about the details. When they go home and are asked whether they voted this or that way, they have to reply that as these matters were dealt with by a committee of twenty or thirty members and then passed by the house, they do not know anything of the details. As the hon. member stated, perhaps if these estimates had been investigated more thoroughly by what I might term the common, ordinary members of the house, more objection might have been taken and the gigantic expenditures, of which everyone is now complaining, cut down. When these matters were going through the committee, the complaint was that we were not spending enough, and possibly if they had been threshed out in the house, better results would have been obtained.

Some years ago, much against my desire, the membership of the various committees was cut down considerably, until to-day the average membership is about twenty or twenty-five. Twenty-five men are to decide the appropriations to be made throughout the different provinces. As the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) says, how can a man from one province or from one district exercise a wise discretion over an expenditure to be made in another province or another district in which he may never have been? It is not always a case of defending an expenditure, sometimes we have to inquire about an item which has been omitted and the only one who is qualified to deal with such a matter is the member from the particular district. The hon. member for Muskoka gave an apparent answer to my objection when he hinted that this would be a means of our obtaining power over the Minister of Finance. If this is going to be done, I should like the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to give his opinion upon a system by which we are to override the government.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the hon. member misunderstood me; I was explaining the system in the United States where they do that.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: And a more pernicious system does not exist than that of the American system of log-rolling. I say to the member for Muskoka "I will vote for your rotten post office if you will vote for my virtuous wharf." We had that demonstrated last June, when the United States senate put through a tax on lumber which put the lumber interests of British Columbia out of business. This tax was rejected at one stage but it was later openly stated that it was put through at the last minute—an election being in sight—the lumber interests agreed to vote for something other interests wanted, and they had to vote in return for the duty on lumber. It would be highly undesirable to have a similar practice in this parliament.

The resolution reads:

—the committee shall report to the house, such report to be debatable in detail under the rules of procedure.

In replying to a question asked by an hon. member to my right, the hon. member for Muskoka said that members would be allowed to speak only for forty minutes during the debate upon the report.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member is misquoting me again, that remark applied to the system which they have in the United States. I could not tell what would be done in this house, that would have to be decided.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Edmonton was not discussing the system they have in the United States. He was questioning the fact that we would save time because there would be a rehashing in the house, and the hon. member replied that speeches would be limited to forty minutes.

If the report of this committee is simply to say: We recommend that $340,000,000, or whatever it is, be voted, and we are only to be allowed forty minutes to debate that report, then I cannot stress too strongly how undesirable that would be. If, on the other hand, there are attached to the report all these detailed estimates and we are allowed to discuss them in detail, that takes away the grievance I have just mentioned, but it brings us to the situation that we shall not be one bit better off than before as regards saving time, because, if I want to talk about a grievance, for instance, in regard to fish hatcheries in my constituency, I am not going to be stopped from doing so by twenty men, who do not know what a fish hatchery is, saying that they have passed the item in a committee. In my opinion this will not save time. We shall have to sweat in committee all morning and then come to the house and go through the whole thing again in the afternoon. Hon. members will not be satisfied to accept the dictum or statement that the committee has passed an item. It may be said that this course was pursued with the committee that dealt with the railway estimates. That is true, but the matter was of more general application to Canada as a whole. When, however, the matter under discussion relates to an hon. member's own riding, he is not going to let it pass without making either a protest or a defence of the item. As I say, if we discuss the matter in detail, then we shall not shorten the debate in the house, and if we do not discuss it in detail, then the situation will be exceedingly undersirable from the point of view of private members.

This question was very fully discussed three or four years ago and while, because perhaps of an indifferent house and a more or less snap vote, the resolution was passed, the obvious disadvantage of the suggestion was such that the government never pushed it and the opposition saw fit not to ask for it to be done. That is some evidence that back in the minds of hon. members on both sides was the thought that the present system, with all its evils—and I know how time-absorbing it is and so forth—was the best, but there are many things which we have to endure in order to get something of greater advantage. The right of free speech has been very costly to acquire, and we want to be exceedingly careful before we allow any portion of that to be taken away from us. I am willing to sit here and listen to an hon. member talk about some subject in which I am not interested, provided that later on I am permitted to bring up a matter in which I am. That is what we are here for, and the debate that takes place in the house gives the government, which is the ruling power, a cross-current to public sentiment that they will never get out of a committee. The committee is composed of ten, twenty or thirty men. In the house the government, while they may vote down opposition and jam through their bills and estimates, will find out what it is to their interest to do in the future. Let us take, for instance, the debate last night on cadet training. Was it not clearly expressed on both sides of the house that the government would be well advised to cut the vote down next year? Had that estimate been put through in committee, would the government have been seized of that sentiment? That is the advantage in discussing these matters in open debate, and that is the purpose for which we are sent to parliament.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in 1925 I introduced in the house a resolution that the estimates should be referred to various select standing committees. Ever since I came here I have been impressed by the unbusinesslike way in which the house in committee of the whole deals with the estimates that are presented to us each session. I agree with practically everything that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) has said in regard to the unbusinesslike way in which we deal with estimates. The motion I introduced at that time was referred to a committee which was revising the rules of the house, and in the report made by that committee they suggested that this question of dealing with the estimates was important enough to be referred to a special committee of the house to be taken up at the next session. I do not think that recommendation was carried out. In 1930 the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) introduced practically a similar resolution. It stated:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the estimates should be referred to select standing committees before being submitted to the committee of the whole.

That is the method which I have always felt might very well be adopted, not only to save time, but to enable hon. members to have an intelligent idea whether we were getting value for the money spent. This is not possible when we deal with estimates in committee of the whole. That committee is too big. The deputy minister and heads of branches who may be assisting the minister are not allowed to be questioned. We should be able to put them on the witness stand. The estimates, for instance, of the Department of Agriculture, should be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture which could bring the heads of the various branches of the department before it. In this way it would be able to find out what we were doing with the money, whether we were getting value for money spent and whether all the items should be voted the following year. Perhaps it might suggest that the government reduce the estimate or take money from one branch and spend it in another, thus securing better results in promoting the interests of agriculture. I mention that department only as one instance of what might be done with the estimates of the different departments.

Mr. NEILL: Is it not a fact that the committee on agriculture is now supposed to meet and has every facility for calling the heads of the department before it?

Mr. COOTE: Unfortunately the committee on agriculture meets only when it is given some special reference by the house. Those estimates might very well be referred to that committee every year.

The resolution submitted by the hon. member for Muskoka is somewhat differently worded from resolutions introduced in the house before, dealing with the same matter. The hon. member asks that:

> A select committee of the house be appointed to consider the advisability of referring certain agreed estimates to a special committee where all information relating thereto may be provided—

And so on. That, as it is worded, apparently contemplates the appointment of one committee to deal with estimates. The estimates are too voluminous to be dealt with by one committee.

Mr. McGIBBON: That committee could submit a report recommending the appointment of a dozen committees.

Mr. COOTE: I was just going to ask the hon. member for Muskoka whether we might take it for granted this was a wide enough reference to a special committee to give it power to recommend a reference of the estimates to more than one committee. I take it for granted such a course would satisfy the hon. member for Muskoka. With that understanding I am very much in favour of the resolution and I should like to see that special committee appointed.

I should like to deal with one or two points raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I shall not attempt to discuss all the objections he has raised. He said that the government was influenced by the discussions which take place in the house. Perhaps it is or, at least, should be, but discussions on particular estimates such as that which took place last night with regard to cadet training can be staged in the house just as well after this procedure is adopted as now.

The other point which came to me while the hon. member was speaking as to the possibility of influencing the course of the government, was that as a rule not very many members of the cabinet are in the house when the estimates are being discussed. The minister who is putting through his estimates must of course be present, but the other members of the government are likely to be in their offices dealing with other business matters. If the minister in charge of the estimates of his own department were at a meeting of a special committee dealing with those estimates, where questions could be put in a much more businesslike way and his estimates discussed very carefully, he would soon acquire more information about his department than he is able to do now with the limited time at his disposal.

Mr. NEILL: He would die of overwork.

Mr. COOTE: In putting his estimates through a special committee he would get a better idea of the work of his department than he could by putting them through the committee of the whole house. Sometimes the most important items in his estimates may go through without any discussion, because, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) says, certain members have a grievance to air. But most of the time of the committee is not taken up with the airing of grievances. It is taken up in an endeavour to get information as to what is being done with the money voted, and we do not get much real information after all, because there are too many members trying to question the minister at once. So far as I personally am concerned I think it would be an improvement if this proposal were adopted, or at least tried out. I think it would result in the business of this house being conducted in a more businesslike maner, and I am sure we must all admit that it is time we adopted any method which will enable us to do the work of this house in a more businesslike manner than at present.

Before I sit down I should like to disagree emphatically with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, in regard to the eleven o'clock rule. I know of no business institution in Canada and no gathering of business men or board who would sit till one or two or three, and even seven o'clock in the morning to get their business done. That is a most unbusinesslike way of doing business.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is the only method of breaking blockades.

Mr. COOTE: We can break blockades by other methods. I would suggest that it would be much better if, instead of the present hours, from three to eleven p.m., we sat from two till ten o'clock. That would be a long enough day. A great many of the members of this house are here at nine in the morning and stay till eleven or eleven-thirty at night, and it is altogether too long a day. Every year we hear the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition paying tributes to members who have passed away, and some of them I believe are passing away because of the unbusinesslike way in which we do our business and the late hours we keep. I think that the new method suggested of examining estimates would be much more businesslike, and therefore I am very much in favour of it.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said this afternoon on this resolution. I am bound to say that I do not believe that any of the time of the house from the beginning to the end of the session is better spent than the time taken by members of the house in discussing in committee of the whole the manner in which the money of the people of this country is to be expended. After all, it is one of the great safeguards of the rights of the people to have this discussion of the expenditure of public money in a committee of which every member of the house is a member, rather than have it discussed in a committee confined to certain members. I do not care how good such a committee may be. No doubt they would consider the estimates day after day just as conscientiously as they could be considered, but it would be a committee composed probably of members who were appointed to it because of their views in regard to certain things. Some of them would be appointed because they were in favour of expenditures, and others because they were opposed to expenditures. But judging by what has taken place in this house as a result of the recommendations of committees, the result has not been to decrease the expenditure.

I listened with much interest this afternoon to the remarks of my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who I am sorry is not in the house at the moment. It struck me that he was hardly as logical this afternoon as he usually is. In the first place he said that as a general rule estimates were rushed through the various legislative assemblies in this country in about forty-eight hours, but before he got through he went on to explain how much of the time of the house was lost in putting through the estimates. I thought he was hardly consistent.

After all, the greatest safeguard which the people of this country have is the discussion in committee of the whole house of the estimates. I go further and say that I believe the greatest assistance which the minister in charge of a department can have in the performance of his duties—and the duties of a minister in charge of a department are by no means light, particularly in some departments—is to receive suggestions from every quarter of the house when he is passing his estimates. Take, for example, what occurred last night, to which reference has already been made. I do believe that last night's discussion was of great benefit. I must say as one who for a time did have the responsibility of submitting to the house and putting through the estimates of an important department that in no part of my duties did I receive as much assistance and information as I received from all sides of the house in the suggestions that were made by the various members while my estimates were being considered.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman say that in his time a single estimate was reduced by one dollar?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is not the point.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and if the Prime Minister will look over the records, he will see that estimates have been reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: In this house?

Mr. McGIBBON: It could not be done except on motion of the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have myself moved in this house to have estimates reduced.

Mr. COOTE: The exception proves the rule.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid the Prime Minister is thinking only of the time since his government came into power; for I know of no estimate of this government which has ever been reduced, no matter what discussion took place in committee of the whole.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree, and it is not likely to be.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That may be, and if that is the finest compliment the Prime Minister can pay to the discussion that takes place in regard to the estimates, I do not attach much value to it. But after all, is there not something more important than the day or two extra that may be taken on the estimates? How are you going to preserve the right of members to move an amendment on going into supply from time to time if you have all the estimates passed beforehand by special committees of this house? That would take away the right which members now have of moving want of confidence motions on going into supply.

I have heard this question discussed at great length during the time of the former government, and I must say that I never was converted to the theory that any good purpose would be served by taking up the time of this house with a lot of the subjects that are discussed here from time to time rather than in discussing the expenditure of public money when the estimates are going through. Personally I do not believe the change would serve any useful purpose. At no time in the history of this country was it more important than it is now that the people's representatives should discuss in committee of the whole every item of expenditure that comes before us, and I believe we should make no change that would have the effect of curtailing the discussion on the expenditure of public money. Those are my views, and I think the house would be well advised to consider very carefully the suggestion before making any change.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer a word of congratulation to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) upon the very evident trouble to which he has gone in the collection of the information he presented to the house upon the introduction of his motion. However, very much to my surprise, I find myself inclined to agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why to your surprise?

Mr. GEARY: I am inclined to the view that by adopting the suggested change we would be giving up the advantage to be found in the discussions centring around the estimates, if before coming into this house and being dealt with in committee of the whole these estimates passed through a special committee appointed for a particular purpose. But the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has given so much attention to the matter, has produced so much information and material which seem to indicate that the trend of government in these days is towards some such procedure as he suggests in his motion, that I propose, so far as my vote will allow, to let him have his committee and, at least to that extent, to support him.

Reference has been made to the Canadian National Railways committee, but I am inclined to believe that we gain no advantage from such reference. To begin with, it did not deal with governmental estimates, but with estimates presented by the managers of a railroad. That committee went into business details, costs of right of way, maintenance accounts, hotels and that sort of thing. After examining officials of the railways, ascertaining how the money was spent and how expenditures compared with those of previous years, and the reason for the increase in maintenance of way, and like matters, those estimates were passed by the special committee. When they came from the committee to the House of Commons, then for the first time the government of the country entered into consideration of the matters with which the special committee had dealt and for the first time the government took control of the matter and became responsible for the passing of those estimates.

As the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) stated a few moments ago, there have been some criticisms of the results obtained by that particular committee. I was a member of the committee, took as active a part in its deliberations as I found possible, and was deeply interested in the information given to us. What was done in that committee however formed no shelter for the government which subsequently, for the first time, took into its consideration the results of the committee's work and authorized the expenditure of the moneys included in the estimates.

In the committee of supply we have placed before us a governmental estimate—if you like, a departmental estimate. It is brought down in committee and subjected to search by questions asked in committee; officials of the department are here to assist, and the estimate is treated, from first to last, as money being spent under the authorization of the government in power, a government which is responsible to the house for the expenditures of public moneys. Nor do we derive much help, as I see it, from studying the practice adopted in the British House of Commons, because in this House of Commons we have not the extreme detailed work they have in the British house. Not only does that house consider the problems of overseas colonies, but they must consider the smallest matters relating to local government boards, matters which in this country would be treated as municipal affairs. However, in Great Britain all those small details come within the purview of the British House of Commons and could not possibly be properly considered unless some short cut were adopted to bring them to the point where they might be passed by the government and brought into the spending category.

In my view the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made a very good point in his discussion of the matter when he said that the government and hon. members generally could derive a fairly accurate cross-section of the opinion of the house during discussions on the estimates in committee of the whole. With the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) I can very well see that there is every opportunity before a select committee, such as the agriculture committee, for inquiry into a particular subject. In such a committee however we get only the views of those on the committee interested instead of the views of all hon. members who happen to have a like interest. Toronto has received very little from this House of Commons by way of expenditures; we have every reason in the world to complain. But I cannot see that we would get any more if the suggested change were adopted. Nor do I think that the argument that estimates are put through too quickly has any more strength than the argument that they are put through too slowly, or that too much time is wasted in their consideration. I have seen estimates involving expenditures of hundreds of thousands of dollars pass committee of supply in less than a second; on the other hand I have seen very small matters take up the attention of the committee for hours. Sometimes it is done deliberately, and used as a weapon. But I do not believe we will be relieved from that opportunity for deliberate obstruction by the method suggested by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I fail to see how his suggestion will save the time of the house. The members working on the committees will have their mornings taken up in consideration of the estimates; those estimates will be brought back to the house, and, except for the interrogation of members who have already considered the estimates in the smaller committee, I cannot see where there will be any stopping of interrogation by other members equally interested. I believe there would be as lengthy discussion when the report came back to committee of the whole as obtains under the present system. If members of the special committees wish to discuss matters with the officials before them, well and good, but I remain to be convinced that the changed system would have the effect of saving the time of the house.

I do believe, however, that there must be more in the notice of motion before us than I had thought, and while I cannot say the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario will attain his objective I am ready to vote for the appointment of a committee, in order that the whole matter may be threshed out and if thought advisable some solution or recommendation be brought to the house. As a matter of fact I do not believe that on discussion of the estimates there is as much time wasted as there is in committee discussions on other matters. I am not saying it offensively, but the fact is that a great deal of conversation takes place emanating from different quarters of the house on subjects which, before the speechmaking is completed, are worn quite threadbare and do not give any particular advantage to the country. Time is taken up in discussions of matters dear to the hearts of some hon. members but which may be a bit faddy. Hon. members are entitled, however, to speak on such subjects as much as they like. I am not objecting to hon. members pursuing their hobbies or fads, or speaking as long as they please, but I do venture to say there is as much time taken up in that way without advantage to the country as there is in the discussion on the estimates when they are before the committee of the whole.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few moments in support of the motion before the house. In my view the procedure suggested, namely that of passing upon the estimates in committee prior to introduction in committee of the whole, is not calculated to shorten the work of the house and will not shorten the session, nor in my opinion is it particularly desirable that it should.

To my mind the important argument in its favour is that the discussions, when they do take place, could be based on much more accurate information, and so be much more intelligent than they are at the present time. I suppose I have followed the work of the committee of the whole as closely as the average member during the last twelve years, and I have found, as I think all hon. members will agree, that at least half the time in committee of supply is spent not in eliciting information of importance with respect to expenditures of money, but in debating comparatively trivial matters from a more or less political viewpoint. Time after time when an estimate is before the committee an hour, yes or a day or two, may be spent over some comparatively small thing, and then the vote itself, a large vote, goes through with practically no consideration at all. My reason for supporting this proposal is that before such a committee those who are definitely interested and who might desire to obtain accurate information as to the way in which money is spent, and the actual need of a particular expenditure, would undoubtedly elicit that information from the officials who would be brought before the committee. They would realize, as all of us who work on a committee do, that in the main the work of the committee is not supposed to take the place of the work in the house but is preparatory to it, and that it would enable hon. members in the committee of supply and in the house to ask for and receive information that would be of value to the entire committee. It might, I believe would, centre the attention of the house upon important matters of expenditure, instead of, as is too frequently the case at the present time, upon more or less trivial questions of political import. I do not believe it is of central importance that it should or that it would materially shorten the session. But I do believe it would give to the house year by year a far deeper and more accurate conception of the expenditures of the country. As we see the effects of the expenditure throughout the country, as we travel around and see the white elephants erected in every part of Canada as monuments—I will not say to the lack of intelligence, but perhaps to the indifference of parliament in respect of expenditures—and as we see the weight of debt and the attitude of the people towards it, I think we will agree that anything which would give us more intelligent control over parliamentary expenditures would be all to the good. I believe that through the adoption of this proposal we can have a more intelligent conception and therefore more intelligent control of parliamentary expenditures than we can have under the present system.

I for one would be delighted to give a special committee as requested the opportunity for considering this whole question and if possible suggesting a better method of dealing with estimates. That is as far as the motion goes. After all the main argument in favour of the motion lies not so much in the very fine presentation made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) as in our knowledge of what has gone on during past years and in the condition of public indebtedness and the public treasury at the present time. I think we all recognize that it will stand a great deal of improvement. The responsibility of checking expenditures is upon us, and this will enable us to discharge that responsibility with some degree of intelligence and knowledge.

As for the necessary and desirable opportunities of discussing grievances in the house on motions for going into supply, after all not only the report of the committee but every item of the estimates would have to go through the committee of the house just as they do to-day, except that they would go through after at least those interested had obtained in committee information which they cannot obtain here, and which would, as I said, enable them to give some guidance to the committee in questioning and examination of the ministers.

[Mr. Speakman.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that no harm would come, and possibly good results would ensue from the adoption of this procedure, and I should be glad to see the motion pass this house.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I know that all the members who have spoken on this resolution have been members of the house for some years, therefore as one who came here in 1930 I wish to speak on behalf of the younger members. It is the duty of every member of this house to become conversant with the business of the country, and I do not know of any better way of achieving that object than by having the details of the estimates placed before them as they come from the ministers. If there is no other reason I submit that the government have a duty to the younger members of this house to see that they are placed in a position—not where they have to go before some committee because after all, we are only human; we cannot go to several committees in one morning,—where they have the details of the estimates placed before them in such a way that when they return to their constituents to answer for what they have done in this house they can give an intelligent answer as to what they have voted for or not voted for. That is one reason why, although the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) is entitled to great credit for the manner in which his motion has been presented, I cannot support it.

One other objection to the resolution is this; it is quite conceivable that a minister could take his deputy to the special committee and have all the questions answered there, and the minister not be conversant with his department at all. That may be far-fetched, but it is conceivable, and I do not think it is the intention of this house or of the people of Canada. For these reasons I am opposed to the resolution, principally because I think the younger members are entitled to get all the information they can from the questions asked by the older members and by themselves as to what the proposed expenditures are for.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): I wish to compliment the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) not only for the excellence of the wording of this resolution but also for the very fine historical sketch which he gave on the development of the functions of parliament and the evolution of our rules of practice and procedure. I entirely concur in what has been said with respect to the resolution by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and I rise only to speak in support of the resolution because there is one aspect of the economic situation of this country upon which I think it may have considerable effect.

We constantly read in the public press of a growing demand for reduction in taxation consequent upon government expenditure. I wonder if all hon. members of this house realize that in the organized parts of the province of Ontario we have five taxing bodies, each of which in turn has a staff which has to be maintained by public expenditure. In a village, town or township in the organized part of Ontario, as well as in the city, you have first a school board, which, although it does not itself impose taxation, nevertheless determines what taxation shall be imposed and the municipal council automatically has to impose that taxation. Then you have the village, town, or township council, as the case may be, functioning to impose taxation. Then you have the county council, which is made up of representatives of the councils of the local municipalities that I have mentioned imposing taxes. Then you have the provincial government, like the others maintaining a staff and imposing taxation. Then you have the Dominion government, which is also a taxing body. Some time ago I read some statistics, which I believe to be accurate, which showed that of every seventeen or eighteen persons you meet on the street one is maintained by some government, some municipal institution or some taxing body.

An hon. MEMBER: One out of seven.

Mr. LAWSON: I hardly think the average would be as high as one out of seven. Even assuming that my recollection is correct, I think hon. members will agree that if we are to have economical administration we should favour the study of any proposal which is designed to bring about that condition. As I understand it, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) merely proposes that a select standing committee of this house be set up to consider the question of referring certain agreed estimates to a committee of the house, and it seems to me that this committee can function without additional expense to the country. It will be able to consider the question much more thoroughly than can be done on the floor of this house, so I unreservedly support the resolution.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me expressed some fear that the information which he may obtain as a member of the house under the present system would be curtailed. I think his fear is groundless. In the first place, if he should be a member of the committee studying the estimates he will obtain the information at first hand. If he should not be a member of the committee, then he can obtain all the information he desires from the published reports of that committee. Then he has ample opportunity for full discussion of the estimates when they are sent from the committee to the house. To my mind, sir—and I hope no hon. member will take offence at my statement—this is what we will accomplish; I have observed, as I am sure many other hon. members have observed, many occasions in this house during the consideration of estimates when questions were asked apparently soliciting information which really added nothing to the consideration of the item then under review. In my opinion, sir, if such a committee were set up the time of that committee would be taken up in ascertaining all necessary information, and the time of the committee of the whole house would not be taken up so much in seeking that information but would be devoted to the discussion of the estimates in connection with which the information was already available.

One hon. member fears that this step may be an encroachment upon the doctrine of responsible government, but I am unable to follow that line of reasoning. The government of the day still would have to take the responsibility for its estimates, and I feel convinced that if as a result of the development of information in that committee, or if as a result of the discussion in the house based upon that information the government sensed the cross-section of opinion which has been referred to, it would have the same effect on the government that is now shown in the discussion which takes place in the house.

My hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) pointed to the work of the special committee on national railways and shipping; apparently he thought a committee of the house studying the estimates would be in an analogous position. I have not been a member of the railway committee since I have been a member of this house, but if my information is correct, one of the difficulties which confronted several members of the railway committee has been that when questions were asked concerning some proposed expenditure, the attitude was taken that it was not in the public interest to answer those specific questions. I can readily appreciate that this ground might be well taken when we are operating a public utility in competition with a private enterprise, but surely no such situation could arise when the government was endeavouring to pass its estimates through this house. Therefore I am very strongly in favour of the resolution, and I believe the matter should be sent to a select committee for consideration.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the ground has been so fully covered and, I think, the objections so well answered that I do not wish to take the time of the house to say anything with regard to the resolution except that I heartily endorse the principle. I might express the hope that if such a committee should be set up it might consider the possibility of the establishment of not one committee but of a number of committees roughly corresponding to the different departments, in order that a number of members may be at work at the same time, and of course any controversial item could be discussed on the floor of the house. I think the mover of the resolution is to be congratulated for having brought this matter before the house.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I am sorry I was not able to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario Mr. McGibbon) who introduced this resolution; I only came into the chamber when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was speaking, but I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks made in support of this resolution.

The hon. member for Macleod discussed the very much overworked member of parliament; he said he thought the work of the committee of the whole in dealing with estimates added much to our labours, and expressed the view that as a result of the strenuous work we carried on here a good many members had died. I want to say to the hon. member for Macleod that I do not think the setting up of such a committee will do anything but add very materially to the work of the hon. members of this house. We are supposed to be in the house in the afternoon and evening. The morning is the only time we have to look after our personal mail and office work, and at present there are regularly constituted committees which take up enough of the morning without adding more committees. I strenuously object to his argument in favour of the resolution on the ground that it will lessen the work of the members.

I understand that the desire of the hon. member who introduced the resolution is to bring about economy, yet in speaking on this subject the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) admitted that it will not result in any economy in public expenditure. Indeed, he said that members of the house would have the benefit of all the evidence submitted to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There will be a saving of time.

Mr. MALCOLM: There will be no saving of money, I am sure, because if the reports of the committee are to be of any use to the members of the house, those reports will have to be printed and members will have to take time to study them. It has been said also that items are rushed through. That is quite true. Many of the large items contained in these estimates do not need to be considered for a moment, because the government is obligated to make the expenditures in pursuance of previous commitments, and these items are not controversial at all. The only items contained in the estimates which are controversial are perhaps expenditures which are not always of a major nature. I submit that there is really very little use in discussing nine-tenths of the estimates submitted by the Prime Minister and his government, because the government are not responsible for the items, which are voted in the ordinary course of federal business. I rather resent the criticisms which have been made as to the size of these estimates. In defence of past parliaments and the present parliament, may I say that in none of the spending bodies of the dominion has there been so little increase in expenditure as in the case of the federal body. My hon. friend referred to the tremendous burden of debt but he knows quite well that two billions out of the two and a half billions of debt was not voted by this house, but came about as a direct result of the war. If he knows anything about Canadian finance he knows that the Dominion of Canada is spending only about one million dollars a day in the administration of its business, and that fully half a million dollars a day is taken up in the interest on the national debt and the payment of pensions to our soldiers. He knows perfectly well that before the war the expenditures of this parliament were a larger percentage of the present-day expenditures than is the case with the provincial and municipal bodies. I contend that with the exception of the tremendous burden of debt incurred during the war, the federal government has not increased the burden of taxation upon Canadian taxpayers to the same extent as the various municipal and provincial governments.

The present and past methods of dealing with the estimates presented by the ministers, have been very satisfactory, and I do not think anything would be gained by having these taken up in a small committee room where a few hon. members would deal with all the estimates. Every hon. member is interested in certain items and he makes it a point to be present in the house when those items are to be considered. The ministers know from the attitude of the representatives of the people whether or not certain expenditures are justified. As one who has put estimates through the house, I know that valuable information is gained from the speeches delivered on the opposition side as to the justifiability of certain items. I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he says that the items are not likely to be changed, but I do not agree with him when he says that the influence is not there. It happens quite often that the following year's estimates will show a reduction in a vote because of the temper of the house when the previous estimates were being considered.

Mr. COOTE: It depends upon the government.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend has never put estimates through the house. If he had he would probably have a different viewpoint. He has never been a member of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: He has hopes, though.

Mr. MALCOLM: I appreciate the idea in the mind of the hon. member for Muskoka when he made the suggestion that the railway estimates could not be dealt with in the house as well as before a committee where the officials could be called to explain their expenditure. However, as the hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Geary) pointed out, it is an entirely different situation when a minister is presenting his estimates. He has before him his deputy, who can advise in connection with the various questions asked. He knows what his own policy is and can answer accordingly. The questions asked in connection with the estimates are not so numerous in comparison with the number of items which go through. There are pages and pages of items dealing with civil government salaries upon which no discussion is had. There are pages of items which are continued year after year without change; they have been discussed in previous years and no further discussion is necessary. I have in mind one item dealing with steamship subsidies in the maritime provinces. Year after year I was questioned by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) only in connection with the changes made in this vote. The changes were discussed and explained and the whole item finally went through. There is no use discussing items which are established from year to year as the government is not in a position to make radical economies in that regard. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, many of the items represent commitments which the government has to put through in the ordinary course of its business.

I do not think anything will be gained by taking away the privileges of parliament. It would be a mistake to restrict still further the time available to members in the mornings; nothing would be gained because when the report of the committee was presented to the house a member would be able to discuss those items in which he was interested. For these reasons, I am not in favour of the resolution.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting to hear what a former minister (Mr. Malcolm) has to say with regard to the information he received from the discussions of the house in committee of the whole. I am quite satisfied that the average minister receives considerable information in that way. The resolution moved by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) is not intended so much to control the expenditures of government as to expedite business. The members of parliament who are elected to attend to the affairs of the country are supposed to consider all matters from the viewpoint of the country as a whole, but it has been the practice of many hon. members to consider many matters only from the viewpoint of their own particular constituency. When the estimates are presented to the house, each hon. member has his eyes glued upon them to see whether or not there is anything for his own constituency. If the estimates were put through in one report, as is intended by this resolution, each hon. member would have the opportunity of discussing those items in which he was interested. It would make no difference to hon. members but would mean an economy in time in passing the estimates through the house.

We find very frequently that the passing of estimates is used for obstructive purposes rather than the obtaining of information. I remember that when the estimates were before the house last session the opposition held up the business of the house by asking a lot of questions which did not bring out any useful information. The consequence was that the time of the session was extended and an increased expenditure had to be made by the government. The government knows what is needed for the country, they know the amount of expenditure which is necessary. They know what their program is to be for the coming year, they know that a certain amount will be required to carry that out. In order to pay their indebtedness they budget for a certain amount, and the House of Commons cannot control that in any way. I am not in favour of doing anything by which the members of the cabinet would not be in control of their particular departments. The minister of each department knows how much money will be needed and what expenditures are necessary during the coming year.

Not only would the business of the house be expedited by the adoption of this resolution, but the report of this committee would make the information available to every member of the house more accurate in character. I am quite sure it would be necessary to have those reports printed, and to that extent expenditure would be increased, but each member would have them available to read what he wanted to find, and the minister, if he so desired, could read the reports and give the information in the house while the estimates were being considered in committee of the whole.

There would also be time economized for the individual member. Last year we stayed here a very long time, longer than was necessary. Not only did this cause an increase in expenditure, so far as the country is concerned, but it also created an increased expenditure for the individual member, because we might have been home long before. I notice many times members of the Progressive party feel we stay here too long and they are unable to return home in the spring in time for seeding. It would be advantageous for members from the west as well as from other parts of the dominion to be able to return home earlier in the year and not to stay here until the hot weather drives us out. Consequently I am in favour of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Muskoka, and I should be glad to see some method adopted whereby the session might be shortened.

I was very much interested in the remarks of an hon. member on the back benches who gave his viewpoint. He will get over it in a few years. When I first came here I was of a similar opinion, that it was of advantage to have an opportunity in the house to ask questions in regard to public expenditures. One gets the information in that way, but as I said before, he can get it from the report of the committee. If the house would take into consideration the benefit that might accrue and not look at the matter from the viewpoint of obstruction, this resolution, if put into effect, would bring about considerable economy for the government and in addition the situation would be of advantage to the individual members.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the discussion on this resolution. It is proposed that:

> A select committee of the house be appointed to consider the advisability of referring certain agreed estimates to a special committee where all information relating thereto may be provided by the ministers after which the committee shall report to the house, such report to be debatable in detail under the rules of procedure.

I would be inclined to support this resolution if I thought it would be conducive to some good and if it would, as has been said by some hon. members, reduce the time and expense of the session as well as the cost of government. If a committee is to be formed, this means that a new special committee will be added to the list of the various numerous committees we have at present functioning under the rules. As a whip who has been in charge for many years not only on the government but also on the opposition side, I know how difficult it is, with the committees we now have functioning, to get members to attend them. We have at present enough committees to deal with all matters that are referred to them and for the proper conduct of public affairs. The addition of a new committee to that list will have the effect, not of expediting the work, but of increasing the difficulty that we now find with committees, of obtaining attendance and proper consideration.

Further, if a special committee is appointed to look after these estimates before they are presented to the house, many members, as has been said before, will not be members of the committee. It is true they will have the right afterwards to discuss the matters when they are brought before them in the house. But as everyone knows, when you are a member of a committee you have by that fact a better opportunity to make known your views before it. It is the duty of parliament to preserve for all hon. members the right they have of controlling the expenditure of public money and of having a say as to how this money should be appropriated. That is one reason why I think that we should not adopt a resolution setting up a special committee to discuss the advisability of forming another committee to deal with these special cases and to provide for the selection of the estimates to be presented to the house.

I believe also the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) is a good one, that new members are not so conversant as are older ones with the way in which business is conducted and the procedure relating to debates on the estimates, and the new members who come here from year to year are entitled to discuss fully in open house the various matters that are submitted to us in the estimates. I notice very often, when estimates come before the house, not so much time is lost in discussing the different items. As the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) has stated, regular items, voted from year to year, go through quickly; other items that are new are debated more thoroughly. The same thing happens when, for certain reasons, as, for instance, last night when we discussed cadet training, the item is one of special importance and should be thoroughly discussed. The discussion on cadet training was one of those instances where an open debate might well have been prevented, if that special committee had made a set-up of those estimates and submitted it afterwards to the house.

Another reason is this: A few years ago we had a full revision of the rules of the house made by a special committee selected from the oldest and most competent members on both sides. The members of that committee, in their wisdom, did not think proper, with the information they received from people who came before them, to recommend such a special committee to deal with the estimates.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I correct the hon. member. They did make such a recommendation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, if they did, I am sorry they did not bring up the matter in the house for discussion. If that is the case, I do not recall its being discussed openly. If the idea had such merit it should long ago have been adopted. But if it was not adopted or not pressed very strongly at that time, the probable reason was that the people who held the reins of power in those days might have been afraid of the child brought out in the special committee.

If I thought the passing of this resolution would conduce to the better conduct of the affairs of the house, without depriving members of their rights and privileges and would curtail the session and lessen expense, I would be in favour of it. But I fail to see any of these advantages, and for that reason I do not feel I can support the resolution. Before I sit down, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Muskoka on his praiseworthy effort in delving into the past and all the various debates held on this subject and in presenting to the house such a fine statement. I am sorry that I cannot agree with him on the subject matter of his resolution.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this motion is one that asks the house to refer to a special committee a question of procedure in the conduct of the business of this chamber. That is all. The case which was made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) in my opinion warrants such a committee being set up. In 1932 the British parliament set up a committee which considered this and other matters at very considerable length and made a report, in the course of which, dealing with the question of the estimates, they said:

> Your committee, therefore, make it their first recommendation that the estimates committee should be enlarged, and that a close working arrangement should be established between that committee and the public accounts committee. They are of opinion that, while estimates and accounts are separate matters, it would be advisable that closer touch should be established between the working of the two committees. They think that it should be within the competence of the estimates committee to take into consideration matters of policy as well as of detail, and that it should be one of their duties regularly to survey the relation of the total public expenditure to the national income. It is obvious that the staff at the disposal of the present estimates committee is inadequate to the performance of their responsible duties, and your committee have considered how this difficulty could best be overcome. They are not of opinion that this duty should be allotted to members of the treasury staff. Every estimate, before it has been presented to parliament, has already been submitted to the treasury and passed. Once its sanction has been given, the function of the treasury must rather be to meet and answer criticism than to stimulate and direct it. Your committee are quite clear that the effective work done by the public accounts committee is largely due to the fact that they have at their disposal the reports and investigations of the staff of the Comptroller and Auditor General. They consider that the estimates committee ought to be provided with an official adviser of the same kind, with similar powers of investigation. They are aware that this is a major departure, but they do not think that any members of governments or of the house, can look back over the last ten years without desiring to overcome the difficulties which have hitherto stood in the way of an effective control by the House of Commons of public expenditure. They need only recall that during this period outside committees have been set up on two occasions in grave national emergencies to do work which ought to have been done, and could have been done, had the machinery been available, by members of the House of Commons. On consideration of the evidence placed before them, they are inclined to recommend that the adequate technical advisers for the service of the estimates committee should be taken from the staff of the Comptroller and Auditor General. They understand, however, from the Comptroller and Auditor General that there would be difficulties in carrying out this recommendation, partly on statutory grounds, and more particularly, on the ground that it might complicate the relations between the Comptroller's staff and the departments. Your committee, accordingly, urge that, if these difficulties prove insurmountable, the estimates committee should be provided with an independent technical staff adequate for their functions.

Your committee have also considered the question of the lack of opportunity under present Standing Orders for an adequate discussion of the reports of the public accounts and estimates committees; and they recommend that at least three of the supply days should be set aside for a definite consideration by the house of the reports from the committees, whether they cover the whole, or any part, of the annual estimates and accounts.

The fact that a committee of the parliament of Great Britain arrived at that conclusion does not, of course, except by reason of the large experience they have had in that house, give any weight to the conclusions which may be reached here except, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), that they have to deal with many problems there that we have not yet encompassed.

This is a matter dealing with procedure. It is a question of how we can best conserve the time of parliament in order that matters of the greatest importance may receive the most consideration. The matter of estimates which involve the expenditure of public moneys being freely and fully considered not only in their details but, as has been pointed out, in relation to questions of policy, is a matter of such importance I think as to warrant investigation by a select committee of this house, more especially in view of the fact that when the rules were under consideration on the last occasion a report was made which contemplated the possibility of just such action being taken.

But there were difficulties. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leading the government, discussed this matter at some length one afternoon, and I remember that I pointed out the difficulties that I foresaw in dealing with estimates purely as a matter of committee management. The former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) has pointed out some of those difficulties. But there is no member of this house who does not desire that every step should be taken and every means within our power employed that will conduce to the effective and efficient conduct of public business. I do not say that that will be accomplished by reason of this particular step being taken, but I do say that it is worthy of consideration.

Unfortunately I was called out of the chamber during part of the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, but listening to the very strong case that he made and the illustrations he gave I think most of us will be inclined to agree that on more than one occasion during our time in this house small matters have been magnified and much time has been taken up with questions that affected large matters of policy in only the very slightest degree. It is the inevitable result, of course, of our present system of government. Whether or not the effect of appointing an estimates committee will be to remedy the defects which are apparent to all of us, I cannot say.

I can best illustrate my position in this way. We, in this country, at the moment, are confronted with great difficulties, and there is a tendency on the part of many to say: Well, we can never get along, and we must therefore start anew and repudiate the past. That is probably the severest criticism that could be made against democracy. As to how democracy is to be trained to a sense of its responsibilities, whether results are to be arrived at by counting heads regardless of the qualifications of the heads to deal with the problems engaging their attention, is still, so far as government is concerned, the greatest question confronting mankind. If the committee to be set up in pursuance of this resolution looks into this matter and arrives at only a partial solution of the problem, we shall have done something perhaps to bring home to the mind of each one of us and of those whom we represent that, after all, in the ultimate analysis, whatever happens and has happened in the past, whether it be the building of railways or obligations of another character matters not, they have been undertaken by the will of the people; and the uncontrolled and unfettered exercise of power by a majority has brought about the position in which we now find ourselves. If the committee carrying out this investigation along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is able to make a report which will simplify the procedure of this house in dealing with financial problems, I believe it will have done this country a service. As a considerable number of hon. members with large knowledge and wide experience are anxious to make some contribution to their country, I support the resolution, and propose, if it is acceptable to the house, to appoint a committee of hon. gentlemen who have not enough to do, remembering that Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do, and who might possibly be better employed in dealing with a problem of this kind than in the idleness which sometimes invites a game of bridge or other less attractive pastime. I trust that the house with that object in view will adopt the resolution and appoint a committee representative of all parties of the house composed of members with wide experience to make suggestions and recommendations as to how, dealing with financial problems arising out of the estimates, we may best—shall I say?—prevent abuses and improve the present procedure of this house.

Mr. NEILL: If the Prime Minister will allow me a question, would not the object sought be better achieved by an extension of the functions of the public accounts committee? I have here the debates of 1930 in which the right hon. gentleman himself took that view at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the question which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has asked is one which has given me cause for consideration on more occasions than I care to think. How much work has the public accounts committee of this house done during the last five years?

An hon. MEMBER: Very little.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): Has it met?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it met once or twice. I dare say that the present leader of the opposition, looking into the matter, found that the estimates committee were correlating their activities to those of the public accounts committee in England. I was amazed, in the investigations I made in England, to find the care with which study was given to the expenditures of last year by the committee of the house this year, in order that they might satisfy themselves that the moneys voted by parliament had been properly expended. So much so that on one occasion I was struck with the fact that they reported upon the wages paid to labourers at Portsmouth in connection with public undertakings. When the matter was under discussion in this house at the instance of the then leader of the government, I directed attention to the fact that I did not think the public accounts committee in the last parliament had done any work comparable to that which it was originally intended they should do. I am satisfied that on investigation a committee of the house may be able perhaps to stimulate the activities of that committee or make some other finding with respect to procedure which will render more efficient the effective control of the finances of the country.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give credit to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) for the way he has presented his case to the house. I believe he did it in all seriousness and with the very best intentions. If I were convinced—which, for the moment, I am not—that his resolution if carried out would achieve that which he hopes, I should be quite willing to support it. In his proposed resolution I find the expression:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in order to decrease the cost of government, shorten the length of sessions, and deal with the business of the country in a more practical and intelligent way, a select committee of the house be appointed.

And so on. From what has been said in the course of the discussion this afternoon I am at a loss to know how the appointment of a select committee would, first of all, decrease the cost of government. To effect a decrease in cost there would have to be a shortening of the session.

Mr. McGIBBON: Read the whole resolution.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have read it all; if the hon. member will just allow me to proceed for a moment or two I shall be most obliged to him. I did not interrupt him when he was speaking.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am sorry.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not see how it would shorten the length of the session, because, whether we like it or not, we all know that in discussions, whether on the floor of the house or in select committees, politics arise. A select committee appointed by any government would be a committee in which there would be a majority of government supporters. From my experience in this house I have come to the conclusion that in most select committees—not in every committee I have been on—but in most committees, politics come in to the fullest extent.

Mr. McGIBBON: We have always had unanimous reports.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes, they may be unanimous when they are made, but they are not unanimous when they reach the floor of the house. Time after time select committees have brought in reports which, though supposed to be unanimous, were not accepted by a majority of the members of the house. I have no doubt that the select committee advocated by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario might bring in unanimous reports, but they would not be unanimous when they reached the house. In my humble judgment, instead of shortening the sessions the proposed change would add to their length. There would be debate and controversy in committee, and a duplication of that debate in the house.

Another point occurs to me, namely, that whether private members happen to be on the government or the opposition side, they have very few privileges. One privilege they enjoy, however, is that of taking part in discussions on the estimates; they may approve or criticize. To my mind that discussion should take place on the floor of the house, because it is the government of the day which is responsible for the expenditure of public moneys, and the fullest possible publicity should be given to such discussions. If the resolution before us were adopted and a select committee considered the estimates, there might be a tendency to say: "This is what the committee decided to do; we want the members to back up the report." In such circumstances I for one would not approve; I should still want to have the privilege I hold as a private member to enter into a discussion on the floor of the house concerning any estimate which might come up. I am convinced the resolution would fail in its purpose of shortening the session or decreasing costs of government. As I said a moment ago if I thought for one moment it would achieve the purpose which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario believes it will, I should be inclined to support it. I have come to the conclusion, however, after listening to the discussion, that I for one would prefer to follow the old practice of having the estimates presented on the floor of the house so that every hon. member may give full attention to them. For these reasons I cannot vote for the resolution.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit the resolution is out of order. A decision has been made on a resolution couched in exactly the same language as that now before us, and in view of that fact I say the present resolution is contrary to the rules of the house. For instance, there is a rule which states the house shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon. If I chose to introduce a resolution stating that we should meet at three o'clock in the afternoon, would I not be ruled out of order?

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Let me compare the two resolutions. The only possible difference is that in the present one the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has made use of a preamble. Notoriously, however, a preamble is not connected with the substance. If we left out the preamble, the resolution would read in this way:

That, in the opinion of this house, a select committee of the house be appointed to consider the advisability of referring certain agreed estimates to a special committee.

The rest of the resolution is in the nature of a preamble, and is not essential. I shall read the resolution which was introduced on March 12, 1930, by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) who moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the estimates should be referred to select standing committees before being submitted to the committee of the whole.

That, of course, is somewhat different to the one now before the house. But the same day it was amended by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who moved the following resolution:

That the resolution be amended by inserting the word "certain" in place of the word "the" in the second line thereof, and by inserting the words "or a special committee" after the word "committees" in the second line thereof.

So it would read like this:

That, in the opinion of this house, certain estimates should be referred to select standing committees or a special committee before being submitted to the committee of the whole.

That is precisely the resolution that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is now seeking to introduce. I may say that the motion of the hon. member for Camrose, as amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod, was agreed to on division. The division is not stated. It will be found on page 550 of Hansard of the 13th of March, 1930.

I submit that we cannot do what we have already done, as it were. The thing is superfluous. We have already agreed that certain estimates shall be referred to either select standing committees or a special committee. Therefore the motion to-day is wholly superfluous, and I submit, sir, that it is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution to which the hon. member refers was introduced at a previous session, not at this session; therefore it does not affect the motion before the house to-day.

Mr. NEILL: Then would it be in order for me to move that the house meet at three o'clock to-morrow and spend the whole afternoon debating it?

Mr. BENNETT: These are standing committees.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the meantime I find that the resolution is in order.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I desire to join in the compliments that have been tendered to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) for the splendid presentation he has made of this resolution. We appreciate that he is an experienced member of the house and is qualified to suggest ways and means of expediting the business of parliament. I believe there is a strong feeling throughout this country that we spend here days, yes weeks and months more than are necessary. I appreciate also the objection voiced by some of those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, and indeed by some who sit to your right, that the adoption of such a proposal would to some extent limit the rights of individual members. Personally, however, I cannot agree with that, because when the report of the committee comes back to parliament it is only reasonable to assume that the right of examination and debate would still exist. On the other hand I am inclined to believe that in this parliament, as well as in other legislative bodies, the privilege of discussion of the estimates has been much abused. I recall sitting in the legislature of Ontario until four o'clock in the morning over some trifling matter, while in the later days of the session the house would rush through millions of dollars of estimates without so much as the batting of an eye, even on the part of His Majesty's loyal opposition. Therefore I feel that the estimates provide an excuse for those who wish to gain political advantage.

I believe it would expedite the business of parliament if the estimates were first submitted to a committee. There is a feeling throughout this country on the part of business men that we, representing the people of this dominion, transacting the biggest business in Canada, do not do so in a businesslike way. It would be ridiculous if a board of directors carried on some of the petty discussions that have occurred in this house on matters that come up in the estimates. We come to parliament, the speech from the throne is brought down, defining to some extent the general principles and policies of the government of the day. Then we have the budget, setting forth, as I have always understood, the general financial program of the government. The estimates are the more detailed and routine administration of those general principles and policies, and it seem to me that the discussions thereon have been in many cases far afield. I have frequently been present when one member would select a certain estimate and take occasion to depart widely from the matters dealt with in that estimate. In fact we have even heard the weaknesses of government policy, or the fiscal policies of the government, discussed and condemned by those who sit to your left, sir, on items merely affecting some particular ward in a riding. Therefore it seems to me this proposal would be a step in the right direction and would do no violence to the desire of hon. members to safeguard their rights as members of this house.

I think the country is anxious that we as its representatives should be practical in the administration of its affairs. So I am therefore prepared to support the resolution, feeling that it would not in any way deprive individual members of their rights, even the younger members, but would tend to do away with the abuse that occurs when an hon. member talks forty minutes and again five minutes and later another forty minutes. It would tend towards shortening the sessions of parliament and giving the members opportunity to attend to their own business, and yet would not restrict proper debate. It would indicate to business interests that we appreciate the fact that we are here for a higher purpose than that of marking time and playing politics on matters that are important to them as taxpayers. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 16, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria) presented the first report of the select standing committee on private bills.

Mr. Stinson moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 29, to amend and consolidate the several acts relating to the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto.—Mr. Geary.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is very simple in character as it involves only four technical or administrative amendments. There is no question of principle involved upon which I should imagine there would be any diversion of opinion. I could explain the bill further if necessary, but I would suggest that such explanation be left for the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WATERLOO, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. Was a post office erected at Waterloo, Quebec, in 1929?
2. If so, from whom was lot purchased?
3. What price did the government pay for the lot?
4. Who recommended the purchase of the lot to the government?
5. What was the total cost of building the said post office, including the purchase price of the land and the cost of grading?
6. Did the government appoint an official to superintend the building operations?
7. If so, who was this official?
8. What was his occupation prior to his appointment as superintendent?
9. Was he qualified to superintend and direct said building operations?
10. By whom was he recommended?
11. How long was he employed by the government in this capacity?
12. What salary did he receive?
13. Was a heating system installed in the said post office?
14. If so, what was the total cost of installation?
15. Who sold the heating system to the government?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Part lots 469 and 470 from H. Forand for $3,650. Part lot 470 and lot 471 from G. H. Whitehead and W. E. Hills for $7,500.

4. Clerk of Works, Department of Public Works, Montreal, and Mr. P. E. Boivin, Granby, P.Q.

5. $43,303.99.

6 and 7. Joseph Oscar Seguin was appointed by the Civil Service Commission as a result of a competition advertised locally.

[Mr. Stinson.]

8. He had experience in building construction.

9. Yes.

10. Favourably reported on by the officer of the Department of Public Works as having ability in judging labour, material, reading of plans and understanding specifications, as well as ability to make rough sketches of progress of work.

11. He reported for duty on December 4, 1928 and his certificate expired on December 4, 1929.

12. $1,500.86.

13. Yes, included in general contract for building. In 1929 an oil burner was installed.

14. No information as to separate cost of heating in general contract. Cost of oil burner $800.

15. Sub-contractor for heating in general contract was S. LeBrun, Waterloo, P.Q. Oil burner installed by A. J. Lemieux, Granby, P.Q.

RADIO COMMISSION STATEMENTS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

Are the statements issued by the radio commission at Ottawa published in French?

He said: Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated that this question could not be answered because it was so indefinite. I had in mind the orders and directions issued by the radio commission in Ottawa to the various parts of the country, and I desire to know whether or not these were printed in the French language.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the hon. gentleman reframe his question?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, I will do that.

Question stands.

EXPORTS OF FOREST PRODUCTS

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What amount of forest products were exported from Canada to the United States between the years 1922-1932, inclusive, viz.: (a) lumber and planks; (b) logs and pulp wood; (c) telegraph poles and pilings; (d) box shooks and shingles; (e) other forest products?
2. What is the amount, in dollars and cents, for the same years?

Mr. STEVENS:

1 and 2. Canada's domestic exports of forest products to the United States for the years ended March 31, 1922 to 1932, inclusive, were as under:

(a) Lumber and planks:

1. Planks and boards—

PURCHASES OF GOLD

Mr. BLAIR:

1. How much gold did the Dominion of Canada buy last year?
2. What did they pay per ounce?
3. How much of this gold was mined in Ontario?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. 1,983,031 $^{386}/_{1000}$ ounces fine.
2. Average net price per ounce fine, including premium, $22.61.
3. 1,642,725 $^{305}/_{1000}$ ounces fine.

CANADIAN CAR AND FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri):

1. Did the Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, of Montreal, apply to the government or the Minister of Railways and Canals for the purpose of securing a contract for the construction of two thousand freight cars to be used by the Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, what was the answer of the government or of the Minister of Railways and Canals?

Mr. MANION:

1. Yes, application was made to the Minister of Railways and Canals.
2. The matter was promised consideration.

EXPORT RATE ON GRAIN

Mr. COOTE:

1. What is the existing freight rate on grain for export from Georgian bay ports to Saint John or Halifax?
2. What is the approximate mileage from Georgian bay ports to: (a) Saint John; (b) Halifax?
3. What is the existing export rate on grain from Calgary to Vancouver?
4. What is the mileage from Calgary to Vancouver?

Mr. MANION:

1. 15·17 cents per 100 pounds.
2. (a) 836 miles; (b) 1,208 miles.
3. 20 cents per 100 pounds.
4. 642 miles.

[Mr. Stevens.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SALE OF RIFLES

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Have any rifles been sold or otherwise disposed of as to individuals or parties outside the service of the government of Canada since January 1, 1931?
2. If so, to whom, in what quantities, on what terms and when?

Mr. CAHAN: This return is tabled forthwith.

INTEREST PAYMENTS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the amount of interest paid by each of the governments in 1932: (a) amount paid by the federal government; (b) amount paid by all provincial governments; (c) amount paid by all municipal governments both urban and rural?
2. To what extent did any of the above default in their interest payments during 1932?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman must realize that this government is not in position to give accurate information in connection with all these questions. The information will have to be obtained from many sources and its accuracy cannot be guaranteed. I am referring to that information which must be obtained outside of the governmental departments. It will take considerable time to obtain the information asked for in the second question as we shall first have to obtain from the different provinces just what the situation is. This question should stand as an order for return.

RELIEF FOR DISTRICT 18, ALBERTA

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What steps have been taken by the government to relieve distress in the coal mining area known as district 18, principally in the province of Alberta?
2. In this regard, has any order in council similar to P.C. 2534, November 25, 1932, authorizing the issuance of a cheque in favour of the province of Alberta to facilitate the movement of coal from Alberta to Ontario points, been passed?
3. If so, when was such order in council passed?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mr. J. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I am informed that in certain municipalities in my county instructions have been given to reduce the rates of direct relief, and it is reported also that these instructions were issued by the federal government. Will the minister inform the house upon whose authority the rates for direct relief are fixed and if the federal government has issued instructions that these rates shall be reduced in the province of Quebec?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to direct my attention to the questions he proposed to ask. In reply to the first two questions I would say that in the case of his district or any other district in the province of Quebec or elsewhere in Canada no instructions have been issued by the federal government to reduce the amount of direct relief to be granted to those in need. The only conditions which this government has at any time laid down with respect to direct relief have been to define direct relief as consisting of food, fuel, clothing and shelter or the equivalent thereof, and that there shall be no discrimination in the granting of relief to any applicant by reason of political, racial, religious or other considerations. No limit has ever been set by this government to the amount of relief which shall be granted to any applicant, this being constitutionally a matter wholly within the determination and judgment of the local authorities. It will also be obvious to members of the house that, even aside from the constitutional aspect, such matters are properly for the local authorities to determine.

Answering my hon. friend's third question, "On whose authority rates for direct relief are fixed?" I would say that municipalities must determine, first, whether relief shall be granted and, second, to whom and in what amount it shall be granted. I also presume that such decisions on the part of municipalities receive provincial approval. As a matter of fact I am informed and understand that in Quebec the provincial government determines the amount which may be expended in each municipality on direct relief.

Answering the hon. member's last question, "Has the federal government issued instructions in the province of Quebec to reduce the amount of relief?" The answer is no. This government has been most careful never to invade in any manner the jurisdiction of either the provincial or municipal authorities either in our relief legislation or in the administration thereof.

APPLE SHIPMENTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of newspaper statements in Nova Scotia to the effect that the British Ministry of Agriculture has no alarm about the pest known as the apple maggot, and in view of the fact that these statements may have created a wrong impression calculated to lead to efforts being relaxed in the extermination of this pest, will the minister state whether all danger of an embargo on the entry of Canadian apples into Great Britain is past?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Hants-Kings gave notice that he was going to ask this question. It is very important that attention should be called to this matter. The apple maggot is quite common in a number of provinces in Canada. When the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries of the United Kingdom instructed Mr. Fryer to investigate the possibility of the Colorado beetle being imported into the old country if importation of potatoes were allowed, he also instructed him to go very carefully into the danger of the importation of the apple maggot in infested apples.

So far as the shipping of the 1932 crop of apples is concerned, due to the very close supervision of the fruit inspectors with the cooperation of the shippers in the apple-growing provinces, only one shipment consisting of about twelve barrels of infested apples has gone into the United Kingdom. It was learned that a number of barrels of infested apples were on the boat and every effort was made to catch those and have them removed before the boat left, but in the cargo there were some twelve barrels that were shipped to the old country.

The fact that in a letter that I put on Hansard on February 10 last, the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries referred even to this small shipment, shows the great danger of an embargo being placed upon our apples if infested apples are shipped in any quantity to the United Kingdom. I do not think I can do better in this connection than read again the last paragraph of the letter of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries of the old land:

> Mr. Fryer has also reported to me the measures which you contemplate in order to prevent the export to this country of apples infested with the apple fruit fly. Much to our pleasure, it has not so far been necessary for us to place any restrictions on apples imported from the dominion. The discovery of an infested consignment last October—

That is the one to which reference has been made.

> —was, we hope, only an isolated case; and after considering Mr. Fryer's account of the steps you are taking, I have decided that it will not be necessary to impose any restrictions during the 1933 season unless the sampling of consignments on arrival in this country reveals the presence of the pest.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance that every precaution should be taken in dealing with the situation so that there will be no danger of an embargo.

HOG CHOLERA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? Is there an outbreak of hog cholera in western Ontario, and if so, in what sections is it occurring and what steps is the government taking to combat it?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I am not informed that there is such an outbreak. I shall be glad to make inquiries and give the hon. member a reply later.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): The other day an order of the house was passed for the tabling of all correspondence between one Serkau, and any members or officials of the government. Might I ask the government if they have any idea when we may expect that this return will be tabled?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): As regards any direct correspondence that has taken place between Mr. Serkau and myself, it is ready to be placed on the table at any time, but I believe a great number of resolutions, telegrams and letters have been received by various ministers and it will take some time before they can be collected.

Mr. VALLANCE: On that point may I assure the minister that so far as the telegrams are concerned, we are not very anxious about them.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (South Vancouver): May I ask the Minister of Marine if he intends to proceed this session with a bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The answer is, yes, and the bill will go to the printer within a few days.

Mr. NEILL: Will the bill be referred to a committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

WENTWORTH MILK PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): In view of the importance of the petition presented to the house by the milk producers of the county of Wentworth, is the government in a position to state what action will be taken regarding the same?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): My attention was directed to the petition to which the hon. gentleman refers. My view is that the matters therein mentioned should be taken up by the committee on agriculture and that they should call witnesses, hear evidence and arrive at conclusions based on that evidence, for I know of no method by which the ends sought can be as readily attained as by evidence being adduced before that committee and the matter being dealt with by them. I understand under the rules it is not necessary to make a reference, but any member of the committee may bring a matter before it and have it dealt with expeditiously and thoroughly. Every facility will be offered, so far as the government is concerned, to enable that end to be attained.

ANYOX DISTURBANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. What information has he in regard to the strike at Anyox, British Columbia. Have the men gone back to work and, if so, how many?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Skeena was good enough to intimate to me his intention of asking this question. On February 1, 1933, employees in the mine, smelter, coke ovens and shops ceased work, demanding increases in wages and reductions in rates for board and rent. From 800 to 1,000 workers are reported to be involved, from 400 to 500 having joined the Mine Workers' Union of Canada, affiliated with the Workers' Unity League.

It is not clear whether the other employees are on strike or merely deterred by pickets from working. A report from the union states that wages were as low as $2.75 a day, and an increase of fifty cents per day was desired; that board was $1.10 per day and rent for a shack six by ten feet $6 per month. A decrease of twenty per cent in board and rent was demanded. Recognition of the union was also demanded.

It is reported in the press that a clash between the provincial police and the strikers occurred on February 4, and that several were injured and in hospital, while eight had been arrested.

The plant was closed down on February 4, and the company is reported to have stated that it had been operated at a loss for some time and would be closed permanently if the strike continued for any length of time. Hon. members will understand that this is a base metal mine, and of course the product from the mine is selling at a very low price at the present time, so much so that I have no doubt that not only this base metal mine but probably all others with very few exceptions on this continent are having a most difficult struggle to keep their plants operating.

On February 9 a dispatch from Victoria stated that 310 of the strikers had voted to return to work and that the company expected the dispute would terminate within a few days.

The men have not made any application to the department to intercede, so far as I am aware, unless it has come in to-day. If such an application is made the department will, of course, exercise what authority it has and do anything possible in order to bring about a satisfactory solution of the alleged trouble.

SECOND NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): On behalf of the people of North Vancouver and Greater Vancouver who are very anxious to have repairs made to the second narrows bridge and cannot understand why there has been so much delay, I would ask the Prime Minister if he can give us any idea when the repairs will be started.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it must be within the knowledge of the hon. gentleman that when this parliament was asked to reenact certain legislation and amend the then existing legislation with respect to the second narrows bridge, which, if I remember aright, had been destroyed in part and with respect to which destruction it was held that there was liability against the company, we were told by those who had the matter in hand, the undertaking being owned by corporations and municipalities, that nothing further was required. This government was told that distinctly and positively. Later it was sought to obtain assistance from the government for the construction of the bridge because the methods to which resort was had, had failed. Then the government discovered that a receiver had been appointed and that a contract was outstanding, and it was asked that the government should take over the contract; that is, afford the means for providing for the payment of the obligations under the contract.

The bridge involves the construction of a substructure and a superstructure. The construction of the substructure being under water, with a swift current flowing, is a matter of very great importance, and in order that the foundation might be properly determined it was necessary that divers should inspect the bottom of the stream and that borings should be made. As a result of all the representations that were made, the government took steps to enable the Vancouver harbour commissioners to take over the undertaking, but when the undertaking was taken over it was found that there were outstanding contracts which had not been let by tender, and that the bridge was to be constructed by arrangement between one producer of material and bridge-builder and the corporation. The contract, it is true, is approved by the court, but in consequence of representations that were made to the government from Vancouver itself that it was undesirable in the public interest that an undertaking of this character should be built without tenders being called, the government then instructed the harbour commissioners to ascertain what could be done in the way of having tenders called. It was then represented that it would take a very long time to prepare the plans for the superstructure as well as to determine with exactitude what would have to be done with respect to the substructure.

Be that as it may, the government determined that no opportunity should be given to those who were seeking so strongly to obtain their assistance, later to charge that the government had been a party to the letting of contracts without tenders, and accordingly instructions were given that steps be taken to prepare proper plans and specifications for the purpose of enabling tenders to be called for the construction of both the superstructure and the substructure. That we are told involves delay, but the delay is not the delay of this government. It is the delay of those who had control of the enterprise from the start, but who did not desire any assistance from us until later, and then when assistance was sought we were confronted with contracts which involved the expenditure of moneys to be found by this government for the purpose of constructing without tenders a work that would cost a large sum of money.

At the moment negotiations are pending, I am informed, between the constituted authority of the harbour and the bridge company for the acquisition of the plans prepared by the bridge company, and not by the public authority, to enable tenders to be called. Yesterday a telegram came indicating that possibly with the aid of another consulting engineer the plans might be much more rapidly prepared than was at first thought.

I may add that Mr. Monsarrat, one of the most eminent engineers in Canada, has been out upon the ground and has gone over the undertaking with great care and made a report, and intimated that if the present plans prepared by a private company are to be used for the purpose of constructing the bridge, much money will have to be paid for them and there might be difficulties in connection with other companies tendering on plans prepared by a rival or competing company.

I know of few matters which I have had occasion to investigate in which you find so many cross-currents of interest and of influence, and in the end we determined that there should be no opportunity given to say that the public moneys under the control of the harbour authority had been expended otherwise than through tenders being awarded to those who were able to build the work for the least money having regard to their fitness to undertake it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The right hon. leader of the opposition a few days ago asked me when the annual report of the Canadian National Railways would be tabled, and I promised to make inquiry and give him an answer.

The management inform me that on no occasion except once within the last six or seven years has the report been tabled before the first of April, and that due to the immensity of the system and the necessity for the auditors completing their audit of the vast number of expenditures and accounts, they are afraid that the report cannot be tabled at the earliest until perhaps the middle of March.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I see by the press of last night that discussions are now taking place between this government and the government of New Zealand with regard to shipments of butter to this country. Could the minister of Trade and Commerce give us some information? It is stated that representations have been made by this government to the government of New Zealand looking towards the restriction of further shipments to Canada. I thought this matter of the shipment of butter to Canada was successfully settled when our friends opposite got into power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is out of order. Probably his real purpose in rising was to make the last statement.

Mr. JACOBS: No, it was not. The fact is so well known that it is not necessary for me to rise to state it. It is a hard, hard fact. I should like to ask the minister, however, if he is in a position to give the house some information with regard to the representations made by this government to the government of New Zealand requesting the restriction of further shipments to this country.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that at the moment the government cares to say on the subject.

EXPORT ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED REPEAL OF PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR EXPORT, ENACTED IN 1930

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Export Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of the amendment to the Export Act passed in 1930 it is not my intention to go over the ground I covered on March 24, 1930, and on May 18, 1931. At the time the amendment was passed in 1930 I think hon. members on this and on the other side of the house were of the opinion that we were going to get something in return from the United States for our friendly gesture. As everyone knows we have received nothing. First there was the Hawley-Smoot tariff which was so disastrous to the farmers of this country. Secondly there were amendments to the Immigration Act which affected the commuters, and especially those living at border points. In 1927 over 15,000 people, working in Detriot and suburbs, were living in the border cities. A great many of them were Americans. Since that time the number has been reduced to between 1,000 and 1,500. Not only that, but Canadians working in Detroit or Americans residing in Windsor were forced to move to Detroit to carry on their work in that city.

Restrictions are not the same on this side of the line. Americans are free to come and go as they please, and they hold high positions in the larger industries of the border cities. A great many Americans with whom I have talked have stated that in cutting off the export of good liquor and forcing the American people to buy moonshine and other concoctions Canada has been guilty of an unfriendly act towards her neighbour. There was never a better opportunity than that presented in 1930, at the time the restrictions were enforced, to make an arrangement with the United States whereby commuters on both sides of the line would be free to come and go as they pleased, as they had done until recent years.

The situation concerning exports of liquor differs greatly from that which obtained two years ago. The first cause of the change may be traced to the depressed conditions, and the second to the result of the United States election which took place on November 8, 1932. While some years ago the state of Michigan passed a prohibition act by an overwhelming majority, in the election held last fall prohibition legislation was defeated by a three to one vote. There can be no argument that Canada needs revenue. Probably I would do well at this time to place on Hansard figures showing our exports of whisky, spirits and beer for the year ending March 31, 1930, the last figures obtainable from the bureau of statistics, and the loss in revenue suffered by Canada as a result of the amendment to the Export Act:

[Mr. Robinson.]

Estimated Annual Loss to National Revenue and to Distilling, Brewing, and Other Industries as a Result of Amendment to Export Act, Prohibiting Exports of Intoxicating Liquors to United States

(Based on exports of liquor and beer (Duty Paid) from Canada to United States for year ended March 31, 1930. Figures as to quantities exported during that period obtained from statistics published by Dominion Bureau of Statistics)

Exports of Liquors and Beers (Duty Paid) from Canada to United States for Year Ended March 31, 1930

| | | Equivalent (at average) strength, 17 under proof, to | | | Amount Collected in Excise, Customs and Sales Taxes |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Whisky, Gin and Other Spirits | (Canadian Produce).....1,076,189 imp. gals. | 893,236 pf. gals. | Excise Duty—$7.00 per pf. gal.. | $ 6,252,652 | |
| | Sales Tax on average selling price, say $20.00 per case, 538,094 cases..... | | | 645,712 | |
| | | | | | $ 6,898,364 |
| | | Equivalent at average strength, 23 under proof, to | | | |
| Ale, Beer and Porter | (Foreign Produce).....163,414 imp. gals. | 125,828 pf. gals. | Average Customs Duty—$8.50 per pf. gal..... | $ 1,069,538 | |
| | Sales tax on average selling price, say $20.00 per case, 81,707 cases..... | | | 98,048 | |
| | | | | | 1,167,586 |
| | (Canadian Produce).....1,449,122 imp. gals. | | Excise Duty—12½c. per gal..... | $ 181,140 | |
| | Sales tax on average selling price, say $2.00 per case, 724,561 cases..... | | | 86,947 | |
| | | | | | 268,087 |
| | (Foreign Produce).....2,117 imp. gals. | | Customs Duty—42c. per gal..... | $ 889 | |
| | Sales tax on average selling price, say $3.00 per case, 1,000 cases..... | | | 180 | |
| | | | | | 1,069 |
| | | | | | $ 8,335.106 |

The cessation of the exports outlined in the above table represents the following losses to the Canadian distilling, brewing and other industries:

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Distilling Industry | 1,076,189 gals. | = | 538,094 cases at $20.00..... | $ 10,761,880 | |
| | | | Less Excise Duty..... | 6,252,652 | |
| | | | | | $ 4,509,228 |
| Brewing Industry | 1,449,122 gals. | = | 724,561 cases at $2.00..... | $ 1,449,122 | |
| | | | Less Excise Duty..... | 86,947 | |
| | | | | | 1,362,175 |
| Glass Industry | 1,262,655 doz. bottles at 50c..... | | | | 631,327 |
| Boxes and Containers..... | | | | | 200,000 |
| Labels, Wrappers, etc..... | | | | | 175,000 |
| Grain..... | | | | | 400,000 |
| Railway Freight..... | | | | | 225,000 |
| | | | Total..... | | $ 7,502,730 |

I should like the farmer members to note the amount lost in connection with grain. Then, I am informed regarding railway freights that the amount collected at Windsor and other border cities in 1928 from both railroads amounted to about $300,000. Of course at the present time that revenue is all lost. In addition to the loss of revenue there would be the loss of income tax, from those in the business, which was very large. I have already mentioned the loss of freight.

It may seem strange to some hon. members that the United States can export liquors to Canada although we cannot export to the United States. I have the figures here from the bureau of statistics for the year 1930-31. I think you will find them interesting. They are as follows:

Exports of Distilled Liquors from the United States to British Countries
(Calendar Years 1930 and 1931)

| Exports to— | 1930 | | 1931 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Proof Gallons | $ | Proof Gallons | $ |
| United Kingdom | .... | .... | 300 | 1,100 |
| Canada | 2,028 | 1,230 | 3,008 | 1,175 |
| Newfoundland | 2,800 | 1,232 | 1,500 | 596 |
| British Malaya | 1,280 | 562 | 4,001 | 1,440 |
| | 6,108 | 3,024 | 8,809 | 4,311 |

I draw the attention of the house to these figures to show how unreasonable it is for the United States to expect us to prohibit exports to their country when they are free to export to Canada.

The worst feature since this act went into force is that of the smuggling of alcohol into Canada which has increased by leaps and bounds. No service knows better what that amounts to than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have here an extract from a report of Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the liquor control board of the province of Ontario, for the year ending October 31, 1931. It says:

The smuggling of spurious liquor into Ontario, from the prohibited areas of the United States. at the first impression appears well nigh incredible. The reports, however, of commissions and inquiries, governmentally constituted in the United States, establish, without doubt, that spurious liquor and alcohol are largely trafficked in that country. Further, spurious liquors can be manufactured very cheaply. The usual base is alcohol; sometimes pure, sometimes absolutely poisonous. The added water, colouring matter and flavouring cost but little. Sixty-five per cent over-proof alcohol can be readily produced for forty-five cents a gallon, but the dominion excise tax alone amounts to $14.85 a gallon. American alcohol pays no taxes and has been sold in Ontario as low as $3 a gallon.

As I said before, I am not going over any of the material I used in 1930 and 1931 but I am going to read some editorials or parts of editorials from the leading journals of this country that will indicate the state of public opinion.

The Toronto Telegram of November 19, 1932, said:

Most Canadians felt that Premier King had gone beyond the requirements of international courtesy in complying with the request to place a ban on the export of intoxicants. Canada had no wish to interfere in the policy of the United States on the wet-dry question but it was felt that the Prime Minister of that day was asking too much when he called upon the taxpayers of Canada to spend $15,000,000 in helping to enforce the laws of another country. Liquor export, after all, was a legitimate enterprise so far as this country was concerned.

Here is one from the Monetary Times, Toronto, of February 12, 1932:

In the year ending March 31, 1931, we sent some 2,000,000 gallons of whiskey to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, practically all of which was reshipped to the United States. We lost the excise tax of $9 per gallon and then had the trouble of seeing that the goods actually went to their destination. It was a beautiful gesture on the part of our previous government, but it was of little value; for the thirsty American is still slaking his parched tongue and doing it more cheaply than before. From a sentimental standpoint it was supposed to earn us the undying gratitude of all our cousins to the south, but we find that many of our neighbours in the northern states are wet anyway while those in the dry regions are too far away to be affected.

May we repeat that the morals of the liquor business have nothing to do with the case. Any visitor to an American city can see, if he wishes, that the Volstead Act is as often honoured in the breach as otherwise. Spirituous liquors are being drunk and we are losing the revenue with no compensating benefit. The national strong-box in its present condition would be greatly helped by it.

Here is another, from the Financial Times of Montreal, dated November 18, 1932:

Though passed by an overwhelming house majority in 1930, the liquor export ban was never demanded by any substantial nation-wide body of opinion. In Ontario there was an outcry against the short-circuiting of supposed liquor exports but the provincial government effectively squashed that end of the bootlegging trade. In the face of these considerations, it may be asked: why was the law passed? The answer is that the law was one of those moves which few politicians actively support but which few dare openly oppose.

This is from the Montreal Gazette of December 10, 1932:

In pursuance of its policy of good will to the United States, at whatever cost to the Canadian people, the King government, in 1930, induced parliament to amend the Export Act to prohibit the granting of clearances to vessels carrying Canadian liquor to countries wherein the sale of such liquor was illegal. The amendment, though general in its terms, was designed admittedly to help the United States whose efforts at enforcing the prohibition law had failed. Parliament passed the amendment against its better judgment, the then opposition being unwilling to give the government the political advantage which, it was thought, might result from a division. It was an interesting exhibition of legislation based upon expediency rather than upon conviction.

The Border Cities Star of December 9, 1932, has this to say:

Public opinion on this subject has undergone a radical change. Public opinion favoured stopping export. But the public understood that Canada was going to get some worthwhile concession from the United States in return for this important favour. Canada got nothing. Consequently there is no longer much disposition here to assist the United States in the enforcement of its dry laws—particularly in view of the fact that the American voters have vigorously repudiated these laws themselves.

Here is one from the Ottawa Journal of February 2, 1933, headed:

May as Well Use the Front Door

Because, actually, all that the 1930 legislation did was to send our liquor to the United States by a more circuitous route. By the back door instead of the front door.

Last year our liquor exports to St. Pierre and Miquelon, which have a few hundred inhabitants, were 1,616,177 gallons. The liquor went to the United States.

We shipped 134,000 gallons to Bermuda; 106,000 gallons to British Honduras; 117,000 gallons to the West Indies. Most of this was for the United States.

We shipped 252,000 gallons to French Oceania, in the Pacific; and most of this went to the United States. French Oceania never bought a gallon of liquor from us until after the 1930 legislation.

In the circumstances, the 1930 law, under which we are supposed to protect good (but sometimes thirsty) Americans from our own sumptuary habits, seems to be little more than a nice bit of make-believe, or hypocrisy. And the worst of it is, it is costing us a lot of money.

Now I quote from the Border Cities Star of November 10, 1932:

Everyone seemed to take it for granted, at the time, that Mr. King had a formal agreement or at least a gentleman's understanding with the government at Washington by which this country would receive a substantial concession from the United States in return for the favour we were doing Uncle Sam by cutting off the business of Canadian liquor exporters. No announcement along these lines was made, but most persons concluded that the lack of announcement was merely a matter of diplomatic policy, Washington, for domestic political purposes, not caring to reveal that concessions had been made to Canada. However, as we mentioned before, time passed and the cold truth finally came home to us all—the government had given everything and received nothing. We had something substantial to "trade" and we muffed the opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask from what my hon. friend is reading?

Mr. ROBINSON: I am reading from an editorial appearing in the Border Cities Star of November 10, 1932.

Then and there, of course, enthusiasm for the ban on export started to wither and decay. And the withering and decaying process was intensified as politicians and officials in Washington continued to jack up the American tariff against our country and to devise further ways and means for keeping Canadians from crossing the boundary line in quest of employment or even, in some cases, for purely social purposes. Our people came to the bitter conclusion that they had been "let down" by their own leaders, that Mr. King and his associates had simply "missed the boat" in dealing with the boys at Washington.

A plebiscite on the question to-day would give Colonel Robinson a resounding majority for his proposal to end the export ban. No one familiar with public sentiment can doubt this. In addition, as we have said, the United States has "gone off the dry standard," thus destroying even anything in the shape of a moral argument, real or fancied, against the export of alcoholic beverages from Canada to that country.

Now I quote from the St. Thomas Times-Journal of November 16, 1932:

What has been the result? There has been no let-up in liquor violations in the United States. Liquor, good and bad, but mostly bad, flows more freely than ever in the "land of the free." And the reciprocal concessions, where are they? Nowhere. In place of them the United States has built higher tariff walls against our goods; tightened up its immigration laws to keep out Canadian labour and to prevent Canadians taking up residence there. Canada's gesture—well-meaning though it may have been—cost the dominion $15,000,000 a year in revenue, without our getting a single thing in return.

I quote now from the Montreal Gazette of February 1, 1933:

Since the November election in the United States, with its overwhelming repudiation of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law, the Canadian liquor embargo cannot be defended upon the pretence of cooperating to uphold the policy of a friendly country. Since the United States is no longer in favour of prohibition— if, indeed, it ever was—there can be no reason in the world for withholding one of the few export commodities which finds a ready market in that country. Moreover, the Ottawa treasury stands in the utmost need of any and every increase in revenue that can be legitimately provided. As the Prime Minister has stated, and as every thoughtful citizen knows, Canada is dangerously near the limit of its capacity to pay taxes. By legalizing the export of liquor, however, a former source of income can be reopened without hardship to the public and to the advantage of an important industry. In these circumstances the embargo should be removed, and the sooner the better.

I hold in my hand a map of the city of Washington, which appeared in the Border Cities Star of February 18, 1932. Shown on this map are dots representing speakeasies which have been raided by the police, totalling 1,155 and of these three were located on government property close to the capitol.

I believe this is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Speaker. In my mind, and in the minds of those who have the interests of the country at heart, the repeal of this act will benefit this country in many ways. It will help labour; it will result in the purchase of supplies and material, and will aid the distilling and brewing industries. I hope this measure will receive the favourable consideration of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): So far as I have heard, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Robinson), and who is the mover of this resolution, has not given a single reason why the legislation passed in 1930 should be repealed at the present time, if I confine that remark to arguments that really bear upon the essential features of the measure and the reason for its adoption in 1930.

My hon. friend spoke at some length about some quid pro quo which we should have received from the United States because of the passage of this measure. I never heard or thought of any such quid pro quo at the time or at any time. I do not think the bill was passed with any expectation that it would lead to other measures on the part of the United States. The bill was passed in the interests of Canada itself, in order to maintain respect for our own laws and to fulfil our treaty obligations. While no doubt the legislation was of assistance to the United States, it was not a measure that had relation primarily to the United States; its primary relation was to Canada, to fulfilling our own obligations, maintaining the integrity of our own public services, and seeing to it that our own citizens, and particularly our own officials, did not become allied with smugglers and criminal gangsters in their efforts to violate the laws of another country.

This is 1933; it is three years since the bill which it is now sought to repeal passed the house, and I might remind hon. members that when the measure was adopted it passed both the house and the Senate without division, as I recall it. I do not know what circumstances have arisen in the interval which should cause the parliament of Canada to change its mind with regard to the purpose it was hoped would be fulfilled by the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is wrong; there was a division on the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to be corrected if that is so. The vote against the measure was so small that I had forgotten it. Perhaps, I cannot do better than state to the house, in the terms of the explanatory note which accompanies the bill, the objects which according to that statement are sought to be effected. The explanation reads:

The object of this bill is, by repealing the above section, to restore to the revenues of Canada the large amount of revenue lost by its enactment, and to open the way by international treaty or convention for reciprocal duties and obligations on the part of the two governments concerned. It is also an effort to help the serious unemployment situation in Canada, and to assist in the prevention of smuggling.

There are four alleged reasons given, and I shall deal with each in turn, taking the last first. It is stated that the enactment of this bill is to assist in the prevention of smuggling. My hon. friend seeks to repeal a section of an act which was passed for the purpose of assisting in the suppression of smuggling by a bill which he says is to assist in the suppression of smuggling. I fail to see how he can claim that the suppression of smuggling will be one of the effects of his measure. I regard his bill rather as a measure to assist smuggling.

I should like to point out how the law as it formerly stood aided smuggling and how smuggling will be again aided if the amendment passed in 1930 is repealed. Not only was smuggling aided, but it was aided at the instance of the government of Canada and with the direct assistance of government officials. I should like my hon. friend to realize that from my point of view that is the most serious objection to be made to his measure, apart from its violation of the principle on which the original measure is based. If the amendment of 1930 is repealed we will again have the government of Canada, through its officials, knowingly and openly aiding and abetting smuggling in the violation of the laws of a neighbouring and friendly country. What was the procedure before and what will it be again if the amendment proposed by my hon. friend is adopted?

In the first place, in order to take out liquor from a warehouse or distillery for export it had to be entered for purposes of duty. If the liquor was going to a foreign country which did not prohibit the importation of liquor, no duty was paid but a bond amounting to twice the amount of the excise was exacted. When the Department of National Revenue received a certificate to the effect that the liquor had been successfully landed in that country, the bond was cancelled. In the case of the United States, which prohibited the importation of liquor, that process, namely the taking of a bond prior to export could not be followed by the department, so the department adopted the plan of requiring those who desired to ship liquor to the United States to pay on liquor so exported an amount equivalent to the excise duty.

My hon. friend says that his measure is intended for purposes of revenue, and I should like to show how this revenue would be collected. The duty would be paid at the time the liquor was taken out of the warehouse or distillery and whoever was shipping the liquor would have to state that it was going to the United States. The liquor would be entered in the books of the government of Canada as going to the United States, a country known to prohibit the importation of liquor and the customs officials would be obliged to make that entry knowing that they were assisting those who were desirous of smuggling and violating the laws of another country. That is the first step.

After the liquor had been entered in that manner, government assistance would be still necessary to get the liquor from the warehouse, brewery or distillery to the dock from which it was to clear for the United States. This step would be impossible without some cooperation upon the part of the officials of the Department of National Revenue. This cooperation would consist of giving a permit for the transportation of the liquor from the warehouse to the port from which it was to be cleared for the United States, and the permit would bear upon its face the statement that the liquor was going to the United States. Everyone having to do with the handling of that liquor, whether customs officials, train employees or others would know that that liquor was to be smuggled into the United States, they would all become parties to the smuggling. After the liquor, by virtue of this permit which had been granted by government officials or by the government of Canada—for after all it is the government; the government is responsible for the acts of its officials—had been transported from the distillery to the end of steel, it would have to be put on board a vessel for the United States. Before this vessel could be cleared for the United States another customs official would have to go on board to make sure, by examining the permit, that the liquor on board that vessel was the liquor that came from the distillery, that it had paid the excise duty and was going to the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON: That is not required for vessels of five tons and under.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that the vessels which would be engaged in rum running would require clearances.

A clearance would have to be obtained and I would point out that that clearance would have to be given by a government official. The clearance would state that the vessel had on board liquor destined for the United States notwithstanding it was known that liquor could not be lawfully imported into the United States. When a vessel known to everyone to be in the hands of rum runners was thus cleared, it would be cleared by virtue of the authority of the government of Canada.

This is something which any country which has regard for its own laws and the integrity and probity of its own officials cannot afford to countenance for one moment. The feeling I had when I presented the amendment to the act was that this procedure not only was demoralizing as regards encouraging the practice of rum running, but that it was particularly demoralizing to the whole customs service of Canada. Our customs service is intended to safeguard the revenues of the country and to prevent anything in the nature of smuggling. We cannot expect it to be an honest service if its officials are expected knowingly to assist smuggling operations.

Another extraordinary thing in connection with this whole business was the fact that at the time the excise duty was paid on liqour to be smuggled into the United States, not only were the officials of the federal government at Ottawa made aware of that fact but also the officials of the provincial government at Toronto. The control of the sale of liquor is a state monopoly in the province of Ontario, and it was alleged that the giving of such information to the provincial authorities would effectively safeguard against the liquor being taken off the trains and short circuited back into Ontario before being sent across the border. In other words, the officials of the Ontario liquor control department were expected to assume the attitude that by making sure that the laws of the United States were violated they would thereby be ensuring that the laws of the province of Ontario were not violated. I submit that as members of parliament we are here as law makers, and not as law breakers, or to assist in the breaking of the laws of our own or any other country. So far as the government officials are concerned, they are in a very difficult position; no matter what the conscience of an official may be, he is supposedly bound to carry out the instructions given to him by his superior officer. The only defence which it is possible for officials to make in performing duties of this kind in the light of the knowledge they have of existing conditions is that their business is simply to collect or to protect the revenue and nothing more. But, as I say, when they know that the effect of their action goes very much further than the collection of revenue; that it is a matter not merely of collecting revenue but of getting such revenue as can be secured, by becoming accomplices of rum runners and gangsters, a government that is responsible for placing on its officials an obligation of that kind, is assuming a very grave responsibility. That is the first objection I take to the bill of my hon. friend from West Essex. It is in the nature, not of a measure to help in the suppression of rum running, but rather of a measure to assist, and encourage rum running and the violation of the laws of another country. It makes of government officials a link between those who wish to make money by violating the laws of another country, and the bootleggers, rum runners and criminal gangsters who operate from a like aim.

The hon. member supported his bill by saying that this legislation will help to give revenue, and also that it will help to give employment. If we are reduced in this country to the position where the state can get its revenues and provide employment only by becoming partners in the rum running business, matters have come to a very strange pass. The less my hon. friend says about our attempting to get revenue in that way, and the less he tries to defend such action in the parliament of this country, the wiser he will be. I submit that anything of the kind is encouraging lawlessness generally; it is putting a premium on the direct violation of a country's laws. The hon. member must surely have forgotten the condition we had along the southwest-Ontario frontier three years ago as a result of the bootlegging and rum running business, and the extent to which it was being carried on there. That part of our country was becoming a base for criminal operations, and criminal operations not confined to the business merely of rum running. We were getting into Canada professional gangsters in very considerable numbers, whose activities were finding expression in a number of directions. Having gotten successfully away from that state of affairs, we had better not seek to return to it by any measure that will have any such effect. If my hon. friend's bill were to be adopted and this parliament were to repeal the enactment of 1930, the effect would be that on the day after the repeal we should witness in and about the vicinity of the community in which my hon. friend lives, the reassembling of those classes of persons in large numbers, and heaven alone knows, with conditions what they are at present in different parts of this continent, what might result from such an association.

Let me mention the other factor that is set forth as a reason for passing this amendment:

> To open a way by international treaty or convention for reciprocal duties and obligations on the part of the two governments concerned

I am afraid my hon. friend is not aware of the treaties that already bind us in the matter of assistance in the suppression of smuggling. This is not opening a way; it is destroying a way already provided. It is violating absolutely more than one treaty obligation. If this amendment should become law, we would be violating treaty obligations of the most important character.

Mr. ERNST: What obligations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first was a convention drawn up in 1924 between the United States and Great Britain, or rather, between the United States and Great Britain, and some other parts of the British Empire, because different parts of the empire approved it, whereby each of the parties to the convention undertook to assist the other party in matters pertaining to smuggling. More particularly, the different parts of the British Empire that became parties to the convention undertook to assist in connection with the laws of the United States regarding alcoholic beverages.

Mr. ERNST: In what particular, might I ask the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement itself as worded was that it was a convention the parties had entered into being—I quote—

"desirous to avoid any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws of the United States re alcoholic beverages." I know the point my hon. friend has in mind. That its provisions related to importations from the sea, and the nature of the agreement was amongst other things to extend the right of search to vessels that were believed to have liquor on board, from the three mile limit to a distance that would be equivalent to one hour's steaming from shore.

Mr. ERNST: I am not criticizing the right hon. gentleman's argument, and I do not say I am not in sympathy with it, but if it is sound, why do the British crown colonies, such as the West Indies—I am not talking of the dominions—still allow clearances to the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The crown colonies will have to answer for themselves. It is our duty as members of the Canadian parliament to answer for ourselves, and we in this parliament, both the House of Commons and the Senate, have approved that treaty. Both houses of parliament have approved a treaty which was expressly entered into in 1924 in the first instance by the British government, for the reason that the parties thereto were desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws of the United States regarding alcoholic beverages. If differences were likely to arise on the high seas, I submit they are as nothing compared with those that are likely to arise where there are frontiers as immediate as the one between Canada and the United States, and where smuggling takes place not merely across the high seas but across river channels that are far from being wide. The reasons for that treaty are just as strong to-day as they were when it was entered into. I remember, when the matter came up before, mentioning how the late Lord Curzon, who at the time was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Great Britain, had pointed out, as the ground on which the convention should be entered into, that no country could afford to be indifferent to the domestic legislation of another country, that it was bound to have respect for its policies and the sentiment of its people, that it could not do otherwise and hope to maintain friendly relations with that other country. That is the principle I wish now to reaffirm and assert.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What date was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That convention was ratified in Washington on January 23, 1924. Ratifications were exchanged on May 22, 1924. The convention was approved by the House of Commons of Canada on March 21, 1924, and by the Senate of Canada on April 4, 1924.

As I was saying, the point that was stressed at the time and that in the main accounted for the action of the British government, was the recognition of the fact that where a country, for reasons of its own, enacts legislation which governs its entire people, it is not the business of another country to inquire whether the legislation is wise, whether it is being enforced or not; it is its business to inquire to what extent its own citizens are respecting their obligations not to attempt to violate the laws of another country. Lord Curzon took very strongly the position that unless that position were maintained, if shipping or commercial interests in one state sought to further their business by running counter to the legislation and practice of another state, as, for example, by violating the laws of another country, "a very delicate and disagreeable situation would be produced" —that, I think, was the phrase he used—with which it would be extremely difficult for the country whose shipping was responsible for the violation of the laws of the other country to deal. I remember at the time of introducing the legislation of 1930, having then the responsibility of Minister of External Affairs, I felt, and had reason to feel, there was possibility of serious difficulty arising any day between this country and the United States by what might take place in connection with smuggling going on between the two countries. I felt that the really grave factor that would grow out of the situation was not one so much pertaining to the individuals participating in the traffic, as the responsibility of the government of Canada itself for their illegal action, seeing that their illegal action could not possibly have been taken except for the government itself through its officials being a party to it.

So much for the convention between Britain and the United States which we approved and to which we are parties. In 1924 the government of Canada entered into a treaty of its own with the United States for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of smuggling between the two countries. My hon. friend and colleague, the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was Minister of Justice at the time, and he is one of the signatories to that treaty. The treaty was approved by this parliament. Its object, as I have said, was to aid in the suppression of smuggling. Now if we amend the statute which has been enacted with the express purpose of suppressing smuggling by removing its effective clause we are thereby not only destroying the statute, but are absolutely violating the provisions of our own treaty with the United States.

Hon. members will recall an investigation that was made in 1926 into the administration of the customs service and the report which was presented to this house. That report was before the house prior to the dissolution of parliament in 1926. Hon. gentlemen opposite had a brief term of office, very brief, just prior and immediately subsequent to that dissolution, but during the time they were in office and before dissolution they introduced into this house a resolution that clearances should not be granted to vessels carrying liquor from Canada to the United States, and the resolution carried in this House of Commons. It was the resolution of hon. gentlemen opposite. They themselves supported it and were responsible for its passing through this house. That was in 1926.

Mr. ROBINSON: Is it not a fact that at that time the government was not getting excise duty on liquor exports to the United States, but that they were being shipped in bond?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Excise duty or no excise duty, what I am concerned about is the smuggling, and our being accomplices in the smuggling traffic. The select committee of the House of Commons in June, 1926, recommended that, by the extent to which the legislation prohibiting illegal export to the United States might be insufficient, it be amended, and also that regulations be made "to prohibit clearances being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo sailing from a Canadian to a United States port." That was adopted when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office in 1926. The bill of the hon. member for West Essex is contrary to that resolution of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman will remember that that was a part of the report of the select committee; the report was made at a time when his government was in power, and its final adoption took place during those hectic days when he ceased to be in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I fully expected that my right hon. friend would allude to that circumstance.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not forgotten it at all. That is quite true as to this particular recommendation, and it only makes the stronger the point I am bringing out at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is that all parties were of the opinion at that time that clearances should not be granted to vessels carrying liquor from Canada to the United States so long as the United States was under prohibition.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I desired to make.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1927 a royal commission investigated certain matters pertaining to the customs service, and again a recommendation was made that in all particulars the law should be made such that it would prevent the smuggling of liquor from Canada into the United States.

What was the position of the present prime minister and his supporters when this measure was introduced? I am perfectly frank to admit that the government of the day did not rush into action on the prohibition of liquor exports from Canada to the United States. We realized that to be at all effective any legislation would have to have back of it considerable public opinion not only as represented by hon. members in this house but throughout the country. There was doubt for a time as to whether the United States was seeking to enforce prohibition. It was not until we were perfectly sure that the government of the United States itself was doing everything in its power to enforce its own laws that we took the step which we did. But I remember very well, because I got most of the benefit of it, how my right hon. friend then leader of the opposition waxed full of wrath against me and the government of the day for not having taken that step long before we did. That was the whole gravamen of his indictment. My right hon. friend took the view at that time, and I believe it is the view he will take to-day, having regard to his responsibility as prime minister of this country, that that step should have been taken sooner than it was. I shall be very much surprised if the prime minister to-day at the instance of any one or more of his followers reverses his own position now that he is responsible for any change in this legislation which may find its place on our statutes.

In conclusion, I should like to add that these are days when conditions are troublesome enough on this continent, and in all parts of the world, to warrant us in being a little careful about taking any step which is going to make more difficult the relations that exist between countries, particularly between countries that are immediate neighbours. We have boasted a good deal on this continent that so far as our relations with the great country to the south are concerned we of the United States and Canada have a happier way of dealing with difficulties that may arise than have any other countries in their relations with their immediate neighbours. We speak much of the settlement of our differences by means of an international joint commission to which we can point with great pride. As a consequence we are in a position on this continent to set an example to the rest of the world as to how goodwill may be maintained on both sides of an international frontier. I hope that my hon. friend will not by pressing his measure seek to have what there is of virtue in that example destroyed not only as regards this country but as regards its effect upon the nations of the world generally.

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): I have listened, Mr. Speaker, with great interest, as I always am compelled to do, to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I can at least pay him the compliment of entire consistency.

Mr. HANBURY: As always.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I should not like to go that far, but he is consistent at all events on the present occasion because, as I think we all remember, the remarks to which he has just given utterance are those which he uttered in defence and in support of the act of which he was the sponsor some three years ago. I can well remember, too, that the right hon. gentleman was consistent in that respect both outside and inside the house because I remember his propounding outside of the house to a few friends, myself among them, the very suggestion that he has now made to the effect that the government of this country became more or less a participant in the activities of those who sought to smuggle liquor into the United States so long as Canada granted clearances, and I must confess that for my part I was very much impressed by that as an argument until my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) came along and punctured it neatly and completely by pointing out to this house that the government of the United States itself had seen fit to collect from those engaged in the illicit liquor traffic a very substantial portion of its gains from time to time, and was then still doing so. Because of the importance of that circumstance I made it my business to investigate the truth of the statement made by the hon. member for Labelle and I found it was abundantly borne out by the facts. If this house were to content itself at this present day and hour with the arguments that were made under the conditions obtaining in 1930, it might perhaps be said that those who did agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Labelle were in the wrong, and that my right hon. friend's earnest contention against smuggling, on principle, was something which might well be accepted. But, sir, the right hon. gentleman has unfortunately betrayed that same tendency that at times seems to oppress him in other respects: He is slow to appreciate the change in conditions which has taken place in this country and in other parts of the world. This house had an example of that when the empire pacts were laid before it, and we were compelled to realize that the right hon. gentleman opposite was dealing with the past. Again, in the remarks he addressed to the house to-day he is dealing in the past. Because when the bill of 1930 was passed, as the house knows there had been a very substantial majority in the congress of the United States which had declared itself in favour of the maintenance and support of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. But what has happened since that? If I am not entirely mistaken a gentleman who had the honour yesterday of being shot at in Miami was last fall a candidate for the presidency of the United States. If I am not mistaken in the speeches I heard directed by him to the electorate of the United States—not directly but over many a radio—there was one thing for which he stood, and demanded most emphatically, namely the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. He insisted upon it; there was nothing equivocal in what he said. He declared it was his positive intention at the earliest possible opportunity which should present itself to him to bring about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. My right hon. friend has very properly quoted the remarks by Lord Curzon to the effect that no country should be indifferent to public opinion in another friendly country. To that, Mr. Speaker, I most heartily subscribe. To that I subscribe, particularly at this very day when in the congress of the United States the very last ramparts of the eighteenth amendment are being torn down. I will not go back and live in the past as my right hon. friend did, when he endeavoured to have the house appreciate the situation, but I shall turn to a report appearing in the Toronto Mail and Empire of Thursday, February 16, 1933. From page 2 of that issue I read the following:

Washington, February 15.—A victorious "wet" onslaught to-night bowled over Senate "drys" to force a vote at three p.m. to-morrow on the revised Blaine eighteenth amendment repeal resolution, which more nearly conforms with the Democratic platform.

Victory for the Democrats and the "wets" came suddenly. The prohibition defense crumbled completely, their leader agreeing to a final vote to-morrow, after finding their fight against it in vain.

Democrats, under the guidance of their leader, Senator Joseph T. Robinson struck from the Blaine resolution the provision giving congress power to ban the saloon and voted to make ratification by state conventions instead of legislatures.

The powerful Robinson assumed leadership to-night, drove his Democrats into line and their "wet" adherents followed. "Drys" meekly acquiesced.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the present state of affairs in the friendly nation to the south of us with which I am sure every hon. member desires to be in complete accord. Let us put that into action; let us show that when we talk about our friendly disposition towards our neighbours we are prepared to back up what they are doing when, in no uncertain terms, they have shown officially their present position, whatever it may have been some three years ago.

The hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson) has given to the house some very conclusive facts and figures in regard to the amount of revenue of which this country is to-day being deprived by the maintenance of the existing legislation upon our statute books. I believe my right hon. friend from Prince Albert must have been smiling in his sleeve when he stated that the hon. member for West Essex had not given to the house any important reasons for changing the legislation, because those reasons seem to have appealed to many of the leading newspapers throughout this land. Newspaper extracts read by the hon. member for West Essex undoubtedly showed the consensus of opinion held by the leading journals of Canada, and my right hon. friend or any other hon. member cannot get up and ask this House of Commons to disregard the expression of opinion expressed so forcibly by those newspapers.

It is not my intention further to delay the house, but merely to place myself on record in support of the bill. For the reasons given by the hon. member for West Essex I hope the house will see fit to accept the bill. I hope we will endeavour to put into action that amity for the United States which we have been so willing to express in words; I hope that this bill will be the means of striking from the statute books improper legislation, and that we will not find ourselves in the absurd position of maintaining such legislation ostensibly in order to conform to the wishes of the United States and having that country this afternoon or to-morrow destroy their own prohibitory legislation.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, listening to the arguments put forward by the last speaker (Mr. Bell, Hamilton) and the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson), one would almost conclude that the estimable gentleman who was shot at recently was already seated in his place of power in the United States, and that under his supervision congress had taken action, legislation had been passed and the Volstead Act relegated to the scrap heap. As a matter of fact none of these things has yet happened. Mr. Roosevelt is still President-elect of the United States, and the Volstead Act is still in operation.

On second reading it is customary to discuss the principle of a bill, and at this time I wish to voice my very decided opposition to Bill No. 14, now appearing before us. I was in the house three years ago when the legislation with which this bill deals was passed, and I recall very clearly that such legislation was brought forward very, very slowly. I recall that it took several years of agitation, urging and petitioning from different public bodies, and more particularly from church bodies throughout Canada and especially throughout the province of Ontario, before this legislation was brought down. When in 1930 legislation was brought down under chapter 19 of the statutes of that year; provision was made for three points: First, that it would be unlawful to export intoxicating liquor for delivery in any country into which the importation of such liquor was prohibited by law. That condition obtained in regard to the United States at that time, and the same condition obtains to-day. The second point in the legislation was that it should be declared unlawful to grant a clearance to any vessel carrying such liquor, and the third point, that it should be declared unlawful to make any entry for exportation of such liquor. In the year 1930 that legislation was passed almost unanimously by the House of Commons. Although I have not been able to obtain the information from Hansard, owing to the inability of the Library to supply me with a copy, I believe the recorded division showed that there were only twelve or fourteen votes recorded in opposition to the legislation of that day.

Here are a few facts I would like to place before the house. Smuggling of liquor into the United States prior to 1930 was on an enormous scale. For the year ending March 31, 1926, that is four years before the legislation was passed, liquor smuggled into the United States totalled $12,572,011. For the year ending March 31, 1928, it had reached $18,380,070 an increase of almost fifty per cent. I have not got the increase for the years following that.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) says that this legislation as proposed in Bill No. 14, if enacted, would simply open the doors and start again those smuggling operations which had reached such proportions in the years prior to 1930.

On January the 8th, 9th and 10th, 1929, there was a conference held in the city of Ottawa between delegates to the number of twelve from the United States, and to the number of ten representing the Dominion of Canada. Those twenty-two persons met in this city and tried to come to an understanding as to what should be done to overcome the smuggling that then prevailed. Here is some information that was brought forth at that conference. I have a record of seizures made by United States customs officials for the two fiscal years ending June 30, 1928. In those two years there were 634 boats, 964 autos carrying liquor from boats on the United States side, 46,594 cases of beer, 6,644 barrels of beer and 16,360 cases of whisky confiscated. That is what the United States customs officials have a record of for those two years. But they also stated that this only represents from five to ten per cent of the total smuggling that was done during that two year period. If that is correct you will have to multiply those figures by about fifteen to twenty to get the total.

They also had on record at the conference the seizures made for the six month's period from July 1, to December 31, 1928, and they are very imposing indeed. There were 117 boats, 46,076 cases of beer, 4,576 cases of whisky, 375 autos in a total of 2,283 seizures. That is something of the history that we should go back to if we were to adopt this Bill No. 14.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What government was in power in Canada at that time?

[Mr. Carmichael.]

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It so happens that smuggling and hijacking and rum-running and bootlegging prosper under any government if given the opportunity to do so.

A chief argument used in favour of this bill is that it would increase the national revenue. Well, I think any of us here will agree that we need national revenue, but we are not all going to agree that we need it at any price. If we can get national revenue legitimately, without prejudicing the morals or the lives of our citizens, well and good. But if we cannot, if we are going to weigh upon the one side a few millions of national revenue and on the other side the morals and the lives of part of our citizenry then I think it will not take any of us very long to decide what the verdict should be. The condition that prevailed, especially along the Detroit river, and to a degree also along the Niagara river in the years preceding the passing of this legislation of 1930 is common knowledge. Gangsters, rum-runners, hijackers and bootleggers flourished like the proverbial green bay tree. They were waxing fat and growing rich. Not only were they taking chances with their own lives, but they were endangering the lives of many private citizens. We were informed at that time that the clearance to those vessels would be given in the daytime, and then they would run the river at night, at a time in the summer season when such river was just throbbing with all kinds of pleasure craft. There would be hundreds of small motor boats, row boats and pleasure seekers lining the Detroit, St. Clair and Niagara rivers at the time when the rum-runners would be shooting across with their cargoes. The result was that if the customs officials sought to intercept them and used firearms for that purpose they were endangering the lives of many innocent citizens. Indeed, we do not need to go far back to find that some innocent citizens were injured in that way.

Another important feature that developed in connection with the smuggling to the United States was the fact that there was a return smuggling of materials from the United States to Canada. It was proven that silks, cigarettes and other commodities were brought back into Canada by the smugglers who took the liquor from Canada to the United States, and our customs officials found it almost impossible to stop such traffic.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that if this legislation were before the public long enough for them to get seized of its importance and to realize its effect, we would have a flow of resolutions in here similar to what we had in the years prior to 1930. Just this morning I received in the mail a resolution from the secretary of a presbytery of the United Church in my own constituency. I read this because it is typical of what many communities would express if they had time and opportunity to do so. It is from Elrose, Saskatchewan, dated February 13, 1933:

At the regular spring meeting of the Elrose presbytery of the United Church of Canada, held at Elrose on Thursday, February 9th, the following resolution was passed:

Whereas the parliament of the Dominion of Canada by a large majority in 1930 amended the export liquor law so as to forbid the release of liquor for export into a country where such liquor is by law prohibited;

And whereas the enactment of this legislation has tended to promote respect for law and to free our borders from growing disorders;

And whereas if and when change is made in the prohibitory laws of other countries such action automatically changes the application of this Canadian statute;

This Elrose presbytery of the United Church of Canada desires to express to the Premier, the Hon. R. B. Bennett, to the Hon. Mackenzie King, the Leader of the Opposition, to A. M. Carmichael, the member for the constituency of Kindersley, and to J. S. Woodsworth, its conviction that no change should be made in the statute touching liquor in this regard.

Signed on behalf of Elrose presbytery.

A. L. Sibbald,
Secretary of presbytery,
Dinsmore, Sask.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that represents the sentiments of a very large proportion of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and I am quite confident that if we had an expression of opinion from the various church and social work organizations, even in the section of the province represented by the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson), it would be of similar character.

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, in supporting this bill the fact that I come from the same county as the mover has, I can assure you, no other significance than that we are in a better position than those in some other places to see the effect of the noble experiment of Mr. Hoover. Sometimes one has to go away from home to get a picture of home conditions, but while I certainly have a great deal of respect and admiration for the hon. member who spoke last, I cannot but feel that the picture he drew of conditions in our particular section of the country is not one that he has gained himself from his own observation but one gathered from magazines, some of which have a habit of picturing things to suit their own purposes.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: No, not a magazine.

Mr. MORAND: It must have been a magazine, a newspaper or some other publication. The leader of the opposition gave two or three different reasons for his opposition to this measure, and I am not without some sympathy with the first of these reasons. The leader of the opposition stated that the original intention behind this legislation was to protect and maintain the integrity of officialdom within Canada, but that argument rather loses its force when we consider that the same thing goes on to-day. But it is covered up; instead of issuing permits for export to Detroit these permits are issued for export to St. Pierre, Miquelon, Jamaica, Cuba or some other place, though the officials know at the time the permits are issued that the liquor is on its way to the United States. So I do not see that this reason has any very great force. Undoubtedly when it is shipped to St. Pierre or some other destination the liquor is handled in the same way it was handled when it was exported to Detroit, and I think every official knows that when he signs these permits he is helping to get that liquor to the United States. There is another fact which is of some importance. When the liquor is shipped in this roundabout way it does not help swell the revenues of Canada. The liquor goes to the United States by a circuitous route, while Canada makes a noble gesture, pays dearly for the privilege and does not accomplish anything in the end.

The right hon. gentleman said very definitely that there never was any question of a quid pro quo, and that it was not intended that we should receive anything in return for our help in Mr. Hoover's noble experiment. Shortly after that, however, he took the attitude that this measure was passed in order to carry out the provisions of existing treaties with the United States. As I see it, there was only one reason for the adoption of this measure, and that was in order to assist the United States in maintaining the prohibition law. Those of us who have lived across from the United States for many years have seen the absolute farce, futility and failure of that method of trying to make people temperate, and surely to-day we should be prepared to listen to the voice of the greatest democracy in the world, which has definitely stated that the repeal of the prohibition act should be brought about. We did our part in the experiment; now the people of the United States have said they are through with prohibition and that they are going to enact such legislation as will permit the development of temperance by means of education. We cannot help them any longer.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) referred to some of the abuses which undoubtedly existed previously. Does it necessarily follow that with proper regulation and supervision these abuses will develop again? The United States have said they desire the repeal of prohibition, so why should we go through the hypocrisy of sending liquor by the circuitous route which is followed at present? I am prepared to do my bit to see that they get the liquor they want; to see that they get good liquor and that they get it direct. Let our manufacturers and workmen benefit from the increased employment which will result, because we are in a position to secure a market which to-day is extremely difficult of access. I believe the country needs the revenue which will result from the export of liquor to the United States, and for all these reasons I am prepared to support the motion.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I cannot allow this motion to be voted upon without expressing my opinion in regard to it. The existing legislation was passed three years ago, in response to a very widespread demand on the part of the Canadian people, and by passing that legislation the government of the day recognized that the Canadian people were strongly in favour of that step being taken, not only in the interests of the United States but also because it was a duty we owed our own self respect.

One cannot help asking the hon. gentlemen who have supported this resolution the reason for all the hurry. If conditions in the United States are as they declare them to be what is the reason for all the haste? The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) and the hon. member who seconded the resolution stated that the sentiment in the United States now is different from the sentiment which appeared to exist three years ago, and they said that Mr. Roosevelt's election, together with his promise to bring about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, warrants us in repealing our own legislation. Well, it is not so perfectly certain that Mr. Roosevelt is going to be able to fulfil his promise. We have had abundant experience with men who have been elected because of great promises but who have not been able to fulfil those promises. It might very well be that Mr. Roosevelt will not be able to fulfil those promises. It must be remembered that the system of government in the United States is not the same as we have here. Mr. Roosevelt has only an indirect voice in legislation and before the eighteenth amendment can be officially repealed it will be necessary for three-quarters of the states to express themselves through their legislatures in favour of the repeal. I ask hon. gentlemen who are supporting this bill: What assurance can you give us that thirty-six out of the forty-eight states will vote for the repeal of the amendment? That in itself should be sufficient answer for the hon. member for Hamilton who is supporting this bill, but there seems to be another and if necessary a more conclusive argument to be offered.

The hon. member for Hamilton is a lawyer and lawyers are supposed to be well versed in the law and to be able to give an opinion as to its effect. As I recall the terms of the legislation it refers to any country into which the importation of liquor is forbidden, the United States not being specifically referred to. If this is true, the minute their proposed legislation becomes effective our legislation ceases to have any force. That seems to be a sound argument, so why the haste? Why cannot hon. gentlemen wait a little while?

An hon. MEMBER: We need the money.

Mr. BROWN: If there was anything that ever brought a legislature into contempt it was the action of the United States congress just before Christmas in putting aside all questions of public importance and scrambling around to see how fast they could pass legislation with regard to liquor. I have often had to confront the inconsistent arguments of the wets but I do not think I have ever heard more inconsistent and foolish arguments advanced than those advanced this afternoon. I do not think there is any need to say anything more, but before we take a vote upon this bill I think we should have a statement from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as to his attitude.

Mr. SPENCE: Make your own statement.

Mr. BROWN: I am making my own statement.

Mr. SPENCE: Go ahead.

Mr. BROWN: The legislation which it is now sought to repeal was introduced and passed as a government measure. With the exception of one hon. member, there was almost unanimous support from the government side and the total vote against the legislation was only eleven. While the present bill is being introduced by a private member, I do not think the government can remain silent upon the matter, especially in view of the statement made by the prime minister three years ago when the previous legislation was before the house. He is quoted on page 613 of Hansard of 1930 as follows:

> And, sir, it is a matter of some satisfaction to some of us who sit to the left, who are on the special committee, which made that recommendation, to know that at least we can support that measure which we could not introduce under the rules of this parliament, but which we have waited four years to hear introduced.

I am quite satisfied that there are many hon. members opposite who are opposed to this bill and I am quite satisfied that the prime minister personally is opposed to it. We do not know whether or not it is a fact, but it has been intimated to us that the government supporters have been given a free hand on this ocassion.

An hon. MEMBER: That is nothing new.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the Three State agreement.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think the prime minister can escape his obligations in the matter. I hope that when the vote is taken hon. members on this side will oppose this bill just as consistently and as unanimously as they supported the legislation of three years ago. I believe there are many hon. members opposite—I see one—who would be disappointed if this bill was to pass the house.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house at great length but I wish to put myself on record in connection with this bill which is now before us. May I say that I am almost in complete agreement with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Brown). I have listened very carefully to the arguments advanced from this side of the house and whether or not hon. members like it I am bound to say that I have not heard a single argument which had any cogency or logic. The only complaint I have to make against the hon. member for Lisgar is that he has to a large extent covered the ground which I intended myself to cover.

The act which it is proposed to repeal is not expressly directed against or in favour of the United States, although it is perfectly true that the general principle it embodies was enacted into law because of circumstances existing and reasons connected with conditions in the United States. All that the act does, however, is to lay down a broad principle, that it shall be illegal in Canada to export to a country any goods the importation of which is by its law prohibited. That is a clear principle and it does not matter whether it refers to the United States or to any other country. It is a sound principle which has been recognized over and over again as being legitimate in the enactment of laws by countries, that is to say, that the legislation of a country shall make it unlawful for its subjects to make use of the country itself for the purpose of plotting and carrying out illegal operations in another country. We should not allow the citizens of this country to take active measures and perform overt acts directed intentionally and with our knowledge to the breach of the laws of a friendly state. If that principle is correct, and surely it is, what force can lie in any of the arguments for repeal which have been adduced from this side of the house?

Let me review them for just a few minutes. It is said that we should repeal the act and draw our pen through the broad principle which the act enunciates, because we are receiving or have received no corresponding benefits from the United States. Have we passed legislation of this nature because of considerations coming to us from any other state? Surely the principle on which we have acted is one that is either right or wrong. The matter is not one of money, nor of weighing the pros and cons of consideration; it is the broad general principle I have laid down, namely, that no state can knowingly allow its citizens within its territory to plot a breach of the laws of a friendly state and to use its territory for the purpose of launching an attack against the laws of such state.

Mr. ROBINSON: Why should the United States allow the export of alcohol to this side without any convention preventing it?

Mr. BURY: I am not concerned with whether other states observe to the letter the principle that I have laid down. I do not think any hon. member can seriously question the accuracy of the statement that I have made. How then can the argument that in return for recognizing and observing this principle, we are not receiving any benefit from the United States, have any bearing on the question?

Then the argument has been advanced that there is a loss of revenue to Canada. If the principle be sound, surely that is not an argument against our observing it.

A third argument was used that our present act has in fact resulted in no benefit to the United States because that country has not effectually enforced its prohibition laws. What have we to do with that? That is the concern of the United States. That does not exonerate or relieve us from our responsibility; it does not make it right for us to countenance our own citizens in Canada plotting, planning, conniving and acting towards a breach of the laws of a friendly country.

Then there was a fourth argument, that payments have been taken by the United States authorities from violators of United States acts. The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) stated that until he heard that argument, he was convinced of the cogency of the arguments advanced in favour of the act which it is now sought to repeal, but that a statement of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that the United States federal authorities had been collecting money from violators of their country's law, effectually and neatly punctured all the force of the arguments which had been advanced and made him feel it was quite right then for us to connive at a breach of United States laws. I must say I am amazed at the hon. member for Labelle attaching any weight to that argument as an answer to the duty resting upon the Canadian government to see that its citizens did not consciously and intentionally violate the laws of another friendly country.

Let me take another argument. It has been stated that there has come in United States sentiment a change which justifies the repeal of our present act. That also is quite immaterial. Whatever change there may be in United States sentiment, there is as yet no change in their law. We are dealing not with the nature of United States sentiment, but with breaches of United States law, and as long as their law remains what it is, that it shall be illegal to import liquor into their country, so long, whatever the sentiment of that country is or may become, we must observe that as being their law and honour it in our legislation. If we do anything else—there is no use blinking the fact or trying to hide the truth from ourselves—we are only dishonestly, hypocritically, for our own profit making use of a plea that has no legitimate force; we are dealing with a matter of change in United States sentiment of which we constitute ourselves the judges and are electing to act on a matter which is entirely outside our province. We are concerned with the law of the United States, and when the sentiment of the United States is sufficiently altered to take that law off the statute book or to change the constitution accordingly, it will be time enough for us to consider a repeal of our own law.

[Mr. Bury.]

Indeed, may I point out that when the law of the United States is changed in this respect there will be no need to repeal this act. Our act states that what is illegal is the exportation from Canada of liquor into a country which prohibits its importation. The moment it has ceased to be the law of the United States that the importation of liquor is illegal and the moment such importation becomes legal, there will be no need to remove our present law from our statute book. As a matter of fact it should not be removed. As it stands it is the enunciation of a broad general principle which must remain true after the United States amend, if they ever do amend, their constitution so as to render legal the importation of liquor into their country.

It was stated—I do not know whether or not it was given as an argument for repeal—that vessels under a certain tonnage do not require clearance. What that has to do with the question, I cannot imagine. If you repeal this law it does not matter whether a vessel is over or under a certain tonnage, the illegality of importation is wiped out and vessels of all tonnages can take part in what is at present an illegal traffic.

The hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) referred to the noble experiment of President Hoover. We are not concerned with that, nor with any controversy between Mr. Hoover and Mr. Roosevelt. We are concerned only with the law of the United States as it is to-day. Whoever is responsible for it; and whether it is going to be changed or not, or whether prohibition is a noble or ignoble experiment, or whether it is going to be a successful experiment or not, has nothing to do with the matter.

Other arguments were adduced that the officials of this country at the time they give a ship a clearance of liquor from Canada to a foreign port or perhaps to one of the British possessions, know in reality it is ultimately coming back to America. What has that to do with the case? The officials of Canada are there to enforce the law of this country and our law says that there shall be no export of liquor from Canada to the United States so long as by the laws of that country its importation is prohibited. My hon. friend is surely not serious in suggesting that if a cargo of liquor is consigned from some part of Canada to Bermuda, the Canadian official would have a right to say: This is not going to Bermuda at all; it is going to New York or some other United States port and that he would have a right to set himself up as a judge to say whether a cargo consigned to a specific port was or was not going to that port. He is not concerned with that, he is concerned with seeing that no liquor goes from Canadian ports consigned to United States ports, and he is doing his duty when he does that. If, because of some gerrymandering at such foreign port to which the liquor goes, or on the high seas, the law is broken, that is not his concern.

I do not think there is anything else I can add, except this, in reference to some statements made by the right hon. leader of the opposition. Had I been in the house in 1930 I should have taken precisely the same attitude as the right hon. the present prime minister then took. I should have expressed wonder why so many years had elapsed before this legislation was put on the statute books. I have listened to the right hon. leader of the opposition excusing the dilatoriness of his government on two grounds: First, that it was necessary to wait until a body of public opinion had formed in Canada of sufficient volume to justify the government in putting this legislation on the statute books. Mr. Speaker, the volume of public opinion in Canada has got nothing to do with this particular principle. This is a principle that is recognized and has been recognized for years. The present act should have been put on the statute books years before 1930, and for a government simply to sit still and wait till the pressure of public opinion forces it to put a law on the statute books is merely to play the part of a leader who leads in the same manner as a man leads a wheelbarrow downhill, who is dragged or impelled forward by the force of public opinion so that he cannot do anything else.

Nor am I concerned with such expressions of opinion as have been referred to by my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). I am not concerned with waiting to hear what my constituents say on this matter. The principle is clear; the principle is broad; the principle is sound; the principle is true, and nobody can question it. Still less germane and relevant were the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition when he sought to excuse the dilatoriness of his government in 1930, and the years prior thereto, in putting the present law on the statute books on the ground that there was not till then a sufficient body of public opinion in the United States in favour of prohibition. What have we got to do with the body of opinion in the United States? We are concerned with the proper attitude of Canada in respect of the recognition of the laws of friendly countries beside us or at a distance, and with seeing that our citizens do nothing, while we can prevent it, to break those laws.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against the bill if it comes to a vote.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I agree entirely, Mr. Speaker, with the argument that has been so very well put by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury). I think that before 1930 Canada's action in allowing the shipment of liquor into the United States constituted an unfriendly act when the laws of the United States prohibited entry, and in 1930 when we had the opportunity I then supported the bill prohibiting the export of liquor to any country in which prohibition was the law. I still think that that was sound; and it was sound before 1930, and the same argument is sound to-day. Prohibition is still the law of the United States. It may or may not be their law for a very long time, but that is not our concern. The mover of the bill says that one reason why he wants it to pass is that it would relieve the unemployment situation, and then either he or some other supporter of the bill said that there was as much liquor exported out of Canada illegally as there was legally. So I do not see how it would relieve the unemployment situation. Surely as members of this House of Commons we do not support a principle only when it pays us to do so in dollars and cents. Rather we support a principle because it is a principle, and whether it pays us or not should not influence our action at all. I do think that in this case the honour of Canada is at stake. That was equally true before 1930, and it is true now when we are considering this bill. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): I had not intended to take any part in this debate. It has been my practice as a new member to sit and listen in this chamber with an open mind, and I think I have profited by so doing. The remarks of the leader of the opposition to-day as well as those of other hon. members who have spoken have convinced me, if I was ever in any doubt, as to what action I should take on this bill. I would refer particularly to the address made by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury). I think we are all here to do the right thing, and I believe that there is nothing for us to do but to maintain legislation that was enacted a few years ago. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) who is out of the chamber at the moment, referred to resolutions which he has received from his constituency. I have received none from mine, but I know my constituency pretty well, and I think I know what their sentiments would be on this particular question. I believe they would be behind me in my opposition to the bill which is now before the house. I shall not take up any further time, Mr. Speaker, than to say I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): The house has become so sentimental over this matter that it is time someone injected a little business into our discussion. I am not an advocate for the liquor trade at all, and never have been, nor on the other hand am I a believer in the Volstead Act or prohibition. I endorse everything that the sponsor of this bill has said, although I do not go so far as to endorse the quotations from newspapers that he gave to the house. After hearing my hon. friend from the border city, the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson), I made up my mind that I would say something on this bill.

I consider that prohibition is a perfect farce, and too much of the time of this house has been lost in discussing it. It does not matter what governments did in the past. We are here to legislate for the future, and we want to help the business world rather than kill it. That is what I am interested in most—the business of the country. There has been altogether too much interference with the old channels in which business has been done for centuries. The less interference there is by governments the better, but all governments have interfered with people who are doing business in their own way legitimately, because this stuff was being sold legitimately, although I do not argue that it was landed legitimately. I would be the last to allow liquor to go from Canada into the United States if the people of the United States did not want it, but I have never been convinced that they did not want it, and I am not now. When this matter was before us in 1930 I noted from an American newspaper which I got from a friend of mine giving prices on every brand of Scotch, Irish and Canadian whiskey sold in the United States. It proved that they were buying and selling liquor openly in the United States, and I knew that myself. I have been in Pittsburgh, and I have seen them making and selling whiskey every quarter of a mile. They were selling it for $1.25 a quart. I never drank any of it because I would be afraid to touch it. A great many members on this side of the house share my view on this question. They do not believe too much in temperance, but they are afraid to vote any other way lest they might lose a vote. I come from a temperance riding, but that does not hinder me expressing my views.

As I said before, I am not advocating the entrance of goods into the United States against the wish of that country; I would not do so if I thought they were really sincere and did not want liquor to come in. The right hon. gentleman opposite, the ex-prime minister, said the hon. member for West Essex, who sponsors the bill, had given no good reasons why the past legislation should be repealed. On the contrary I believe he gave many good reasons. The bill which passed the house in 1930 accomplished nothing. It simply drove liquor through a circuitous route into the United States. We lost money; many a man who had invested in stocks in the liquor business lost large sums of money. The past government was always killing the business men. They must realize that there was no sense killing him because to-day they are reaping the benefits of their folly of years past. Many men who bought liquor stocks legally on the stock market lost large sums of money. Those men as well as other people should receive fair consideration.

What is the use of a law which cannot be enforced? The legislation of 1930 has never been enforced. There are too many laws already on the statute books of the provinces and those of this federal government which cannot be enforced. Those laws are proving a farce, and by putting more and more on our statute books we would only be turning the public against us everywhere. When laws are impossible of enforcement it is only mockery to have them on our statute books, especially when we know they cannot be enforced.

I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman opposite was sincere when in 1930 he brought in this bill. I think he was looking for a nice moral question upon which he could go to the country—but he did not succeed in what he was attempting. He could have brought down that legislation years before, but he chose to wait for the psychological moment to pull a nice stunt. But the people were wise, and he did not accomplish his purpose. The great trouble in this house is that people do not speak their own minds, but speak the minds of some other people. They are not sincere. As far as I am concerned, when I rise to my feet I am expressing my own views. I believe when I tell the people in Parkdale, the riding I have the honour to represent, that these are my views, they will at least thank me for being sincere. On one occasion when I was running for office in the city council a certain temperance bunch—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: —I will not give their names, but people who belonged to all the churches imaginable, waited upon me as a deputation to ask me to vote against a measure which the party to which I belong was introducing in the House of Commons. I said I owed no allegiance to those people, but that I owed allegiance to my party, that I would vote with them always, but that I wanted them always to be right. As a matter of fact I think at least ninety-nine per cent of the time we are right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: On one occasion in the year 1910, I was running for alderman, and had the good fortune to beat a strong temperance opponent. After his defeat he circulated the rumour around the church that I was a drinking man, and for that reason that I should not be supported. The meetings which he addressed were held in a Methodist church in Parkdale. I am telling you the truth, gentlemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: They said, "We cannot support this man Spence, because he takes a drink." Fortunately I had a good friend at the meeting who said, "Well, the only difference between Mr. Spence and some of you gentlemen sitting in this room to-night is that if Dave wants it he goes in by the front door and gets it, and not by the side door." I will tell you frankly that I have no doubt there are a hundred hon. members in this house who take more than Dave Spence, but in order to hide it they go in by the side door.

Hon. members should attempt to be sincere. If we enact laws which cannot be enforced we are just asking people to become sinners. You cannot legislate a man to be good; you cannot legislate him to be sober. Even in the old country conditions are different to-day. Not long ago I was in Ireland, and I learned they are not drinking nearly as much as they used to drink. The same condition obtains in Scotland. I suggest that education has had a great deal to do with the change. I can remember that not far from my own home in an Irish town there were four public houses at one street intersection. The market where the people sold their cattle and pigs was close to that corner. When I was a boy the men used to hang around the doors of those hotels, and passed out bottles of ale and Scotch whiskey. But when last I visited Ireland the people were out on the streets doing business, buying and selling. Education is responsible for the change. Law could not make such a change, no matter what my lawyer friends may say. Of course I cannot follow their arguments at all, because they are much too learned for me. I know only the business world.

I do trust this government will settle down and see to it that too many restrictions are not enforced, so that people will have difficulty in doing business. The people who are dealing in or buying stock in a liquor business are entitled to consideration. The production of liquor helps the farmers, because grain is required, and I am convinced it is a very bad thing to restrict business in any way, as long as that business is legally conducted.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised that there should be any doubt concerning my position with respect to this legislation. I cannot but think that the experience of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and others, as to the uncertainty of their own minds just before the past adjournment makes them suspicious of the opinions of others. We do not change our minds each minute; we are not prepared to support an agreement one minute and oppose it the next, just because somebody else does. I merely mention that, in passing, to the hon. member for Lisgar.

In 1930 I followed the then leader of the government, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and, as strongly as it was possible for me to do, supported the legislation. I gave my reasons—not all of them. I still think there was a reason I might have given, a reason perhaps as powerful as any which could be advanced, namely, that I conceive it to be a principle of international law—true, it has been acted upon only in a limited number of cases—that where a friendly nation has knowledge of the fact that another nation has prohibited the importation into their country of commodities, it is a breach of good faith, of good neighbourliness and of international law, as I appreciate it, to aid, abet and succour the breach of that law.

There is one serious doubt, however, with respect to the application of it, which arises by reason of the fact that the late government made a treaty with the United States of America. That treaty was made for Canada through its then minister of justice, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and on behalf of the United States through its secretary of state, Mr. Hughes. I have never been able to understand or appreciate —which does not in any sense indicate that the provision was not based upon sound ground—the reasons for the concluding portion of article II of that treaty. Article II says:

> The high contracting parties agree that clearance from Canada or from the United States shall be denied to any vessel carrying cargo consisting of articles the importation of which into the territory of Canada or of the United States, as the case may be, is prohibited—

That is my appreciation of what should have been said, and in my view the article should have stopped there. But this is what follows:

> —when it is evident from the tonnage, size and general character of the vessel, or the length of the voyage and the perils or conditions of navigation attendant upon it, that the vessel will be unable to carry its cargo to the destination proposed in the application for clearance.

It will be recalled that during the customs investigation of 1926-27, it was made apparent that ships cleared for ports which there was no possibility of their reaching. This article, for a reason to which I shall presently refer, provides that the prohibition of clearance shall be made effective only when it is apparent that the vessel is carrying such cargo, or when other circumstances indicate that the vessel will be unable to carry that cargo to the destination named in the application for clearance. There, you will observe, is a tacit recognition of the legality of clearances. It has always been difficult for me to understand why that tacit recognition of the legality of clearances was inserted in the treaty. The treaty was signed on the 6th of June, 1924, and I have never been able to understand, nor do I yet understand, why the article should not have ended at the word "prohibited," thus making it read:

> The high contracting parties agree that clearance from Canada or from the United States shall be denied to any vessel carrying cargo consisting of articles the importation of which into the territory of Canada or of the United States, as the case may be, is prohibited.

But it will also be recalled that during the debate that took place in 1930 I presented to the house the correspondence and read extracts from the documents showing that an effort had been made by the United States to negotiate a treaty along those lines. That effort failed. It failed because no action was taken by the Dominion of Canada. Now we have this incontestable fact, that on the 6th of June, 1924, the Dominion of Canada signed a treaty with the United States that by implication, applying any rule that may be applied as to the construction of documents, gave to such a clearance, by its recognition, the colour of validity and legality, except it be a clearance for a vessel that came within the latter part of article II. As I say, that is the only difficulty I have with respect to this whole matter and the application of the principles of international law to which I shall presently refer.

I have always thought that the analogous case was the so-called Alabama case. It will be recalled that during the American civil war, complaint was made by the northern states that Great Britain had violated neutrality by permitting a ship built at the Cammell-Laird yards at Birkenhead to escape, after warning had been given by the representative of the northern states. She escaped in 1862 to Teneriffe, where she was fitted out with guns to prey upon the commerce of the northern states, as a result of which extensive losses were sustained and many vessels destroyed. The United States continued to complain; negotiations proceeded for several years. Finally, on the 8th of May, 1871, the parties entered into the treaty of Washington, which dealt with many questions in dispute between Great Britain and the United States. The then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald, was one of the commissioners and plenipotentiaries for Great Britain who signed that treaty.

In that treaty three rules were agreed upon which should govern in determining the validity of the claims of the United States for damages for loss of its commerce. These three rules I submit have application to a case such as this. They are as follows:

> First.—To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace, and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.
> Secondly.—Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly.—To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violations of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Although these principles were not adopted as rules of universal application in international law, these words appear in the treaty:

Her Britannic Majesty has commanded her High Commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that Her Majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in article I arose, but that Her Majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that, in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrators should assume that Her Majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these rules.

Then follow these words:

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers and to invite them to accede to them.

It is perfectly true that these rules, which are now a part of international law as far as Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada and the rest of the British empire are concerned, applied only to the principles of neutrality when there was war between contending states. The state of civil war that existed between the southern and the northern states made it incumbent upon Great Britain to preserve neutrality. As a result of the escape of the Alabama and other ships Great Britain was called upon by the award of the arbitrators to pay fifteen and a half million dollars, which was distributed in part amongst those who had suffered losses.

My view has been that we have a similar case with respect to the countries that have passed prohibitory legislation with respect to any commodities if we give the sanction of this country by granting clearances into that country of such contraband commodities. The rules of blockade with respect to international law, the rules with respect to contraband of war, can obviously have no application in time of peace, but by analogy I submit it is fairly clear that liquor is a contraband of peace. I think I said that in this house in 1930, intoxicating liquor is contraband of peace. Why? Because the supreme legislature of the United States has declared that it shall not be imported into that country, and a prohibition exists against its importation. We too have passed prohibitory laws with respect to many commodities; you will find the names and descriptions in our customs legislation. My view is that wherever you have a prohibition of the importation into a country of that which thereby becomes contraband of peace, it is a violation at least of those principles of friendly relationships that exist between peaceful countries to force or to aid or abet in the forcing of said prohibited goods or commodities into that country.

It is by that principle I stand. I oppose this bill because it is to my understanding a violation of the true principle that should govern the relations between friendly states. If in time of war two belligerents are entitled to demand from a neutral country the application of the rules that I have mentioned, it is equally true that in time of peace, where there is a prohibition that makes a commodity contraband of peace, the same rules should be applied. We should be astute enough to see that not only are we not partners, but that we do not aid or abet or assist or permit anything being done by our country that militates against the maintenance of friendly relations, by becoming parties, or partners if you will, or aiders or abettors, if you will, in or to a violation of the law of a friendly state. That in my judgment is the principle that governs. By the application of that principle this bill should not pass. The legislation that was passed in 1930 gave effect to that principle. It tardily gave effect to it, in my judgment, and the only difficulty I have ever had is with respect to article II of the treaty, which in itself is a tacit recognition of the validity and legality of a clearance except under conditions that do not apply in this case at all.

The desire on the part of many that legislation of this character no longer should be applicable if one of our friendly neighbours sees fit to pass legislation removing the prohibition is not pertinent to this discussion, for the simple reason that no such legislation has been passed. What is more, under the terms of the existing legislation—and the house will remember the discussion which took place in 1930—it will be recalled that if the prohibition of the friendly state against the importation of the commodity is removed, the right to grant clearances at once revives, because there is no legal prohibition and it is no longer a contraband of peace. In that case the clearances could be granted validly and legally, and no longer could the charge be made that the Dominion of Canada had aided, abetted, assisted or even connived, if you like, in the violation of the laws of a friendly state.

Without going into the matter at greater length it is on this ground that I am unable to support the motion. May I add that the only reason I did not think it desirable to participate in the debate at an earlier stage was that this is a private bill. Personally I have grave doubts as to the competency of a private member to introduce a bill of this character; I think I could show good reason for that statement, because in my judgment it conflicts with one of the rules of this house, but in any case the bill is here before us. I thought the right of every member freely to express his opinion with respect to a private bill thus introduced should be in no sense lessened by any observations which might be made by the leader of the government, because it might be supposed that he was speaking as such. Therefore I have listened to the observations of hon. members of the house both in opposition to and in support of the proposed bill which has for its object the repeal of the legislation of 1930. I oppose this bill even as I supported the bill of 1930. I supported that bill for the reasons I then gave and for the reason I ventured to express to-day, namely that this country cannot become a party to the passing of legislation which gives countenance to the export to a friendly country of that which is prohibited by that country as a contraband of peace.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I much regret to have to admit that the position taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to my mind is technically correct. There is no doubt that the passing of this legislation in 1930 was intended to be a gesture of goodwill towards a friendly nation, and if that nation were still of the same mind there might be some force in that argument to-day. I opposed the bill in 1930 because I always have been opposed to anything in the nature of prohibitory legislation in this country or anywhere else. If the same condition existed to-day that existed then the argument of the right hon. Prime Minister might be sound, but as has been well said by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell), the people of the United States of America have voted by a majority of more than 11,000,000 to repeal that prohibition law. We know that steps are being taken by the legislative bodies of the United States to bring about that repeal, but we also know that because of the defects of the American constitution in all probability it will be two or three years before that end is achieved. Then will it not be a gesture of friendship and goodwill on our part towards the United States to say; "We will help you when you cannot help yourself"? I contend that by voting for this resolution we will be doing far more to create goodwill between ourselves and our neighbour to the south than we will do by saying: "We will wait until, with the intricacies and complexities of your constitution, which we do not think is a free constitution, you get rid of this prohibition and at last show yourselves before the nations of the world as a free people."

Before taking my seat I cannot help but direct the attention of the house to something that amused me a great deal. I refer to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) appealing to the Prime Minister to help him out of his difficulty. That shows the condition of mind and the state of panic in which our prohibitionist friends find themselves—and I suppose under the circumstances I might have the right to say "I told you so." I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation of 1930 will be repealed by a majority equal to that with which it was passed. I see my friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) smiling. He was one of that brave band of eleven who voted against this legislation, and I know he will be consistent and vote for the bill now before the house. I was reading over the remarks made in 1930 by the present Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, in which he twitted the former Minister of National Revenue on his vote at that time. I sincerely hope that on this occasion the Minister of Railways will not leave himself open to the reproach from this side of the house that the former Minister of National Revenue received on that occasion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, as one of the noble eleven who stood out in opposition to the act passed in 1930 prohibiting the export of liquor from this country to the United States, I deem it my duty at the present time to give my reasons for voting as I did upon that occasion.

I recall very well the speech delivered at that time by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), then minister of national revenue. He described a visit which he had made to the city of Detroit. After very careful observation he came to the conclusion that the government and the people of the United States were not sincere in their efforts to prohibit the importation of liquor from this or any other country. He told us of having seen a boat loaded and unloaded with liquor under the eyes of the officers of the law of that great country. I felt at the time that we were being made nothing more or less than policemen to enforce the laws of a foreign country. I could not conceive it to be my duty to support such a bill, as I felt it was not our duty to enforce the laws of the United States of America. These are some of the reasons why I voted against the bill in 1930.

At that time the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leader of the government, made the statement that perhaps not more than two per cent of the spirits entering the United States illegally came from our country. It was a fact that a considerable quantity of alcohol and its allied products were being consumed by the people of the United States, but where did the other ninety-eight per cent come from? Part of it was home manufactured, but a large part came from foreign countries. I could not see where cutting off two per cent would have any considerable effect upon the people of that country, and I asked myself the question: Why should the people of Italy, of France and of Great Britain be permitted to have their liquor released for export to the United States or any other country and a penalty be placed upon our doing the same thing?

I pictured to myself the loss of revenue which would occur. We had a vague idea of the quantity of liquor which was being exported from this country, but we knew for a fact that at least $20,000,000 per year of good American cash was coming into this country as payment for the liquor that went out. It may have seemed sordid to look at the matter in that way, but the fact was that they were going to spend the money, so why should we not get our share when the money was good?

I do not believe that any hon. member who spoke this afternoon objected on moral grounds to the terms of the bill now before the house, nor was such the case in 1930. At that time the legislation was not framed for the purpose of uplifting the morals of the people of this country; it was put before this house as a political issue. I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) made that very clear this afternoon, and I need not elaborate. It was not a moral issue, it was an election issue. Even though it had been a moral issue, I was prepared to take the same action. As hon. gentlemen have mentioned this afternoon, many of us do not believe in prohibition of any kind. Prohibition means taking the people by the throat and crushing them down; we believe in moderation, not in prohibition.

After hearing the arguments placed before the house this afternoon against this bill, I cannot feel that I was wrong in 1930. The arguments are based upon a treaty entered into some years ago between Great Britain and her dominions and the United States, a treaty which had to do with shipping and liquor. There was also a treaty entered into in 1924 between Canada and the United States dealing with the smuggling of all commodities. This treaty was considered lightly until suddenly in 1930, when an election was looming, the government felt it necessary to prohibit absolutely the shipment from Canada of anything contraband to the United States.

We have kept rigidly indeed our part of the treaty, but what have our neighbours to the south done? The government of that day passed an act binding us to prohibit the export of liquor from this country to the United States, but what did they get in return? Did they insist that the United States should control the export of contraband articles from that country to Canada? Not at all. The result is that while we are not allowed to export liquor to the United States, the United States is shipping into this country millions and millions of dollars' worth of contraband goods, consisting of silks, tobacco, cigarettes, and various other commodities. We have kept our faith; they have not kept theirs. We have been told to-day that a change of sentiment has taken place in the United States, and no man can deny that. The United States for several years have been labouring under a law which was not popular. In November last they voiced their opinion of that law, and three weeks or more from to-day the first move will be made to throw it into the discard and there will be substituted for it a law which will be entirely different from the Volstead Act which is at present in force in that country.

Much has been said of good will among nations; much has been said and well said by many on both sides who support this bill, about our duty to our neighbours. If we wish to show goodwill to our neighbours, now is the time. Let us pass this bill; let us allow the free exportation of liquor from this country and let the people of the United States keep it out if they so desire. Let us bring back to Canada the revenue which we have been denied for the last three years; a very conservative estimate of the amount we have lost by the passage of the act at present in force, is $60,000,000. The law has contributed nothing to Canada, nothing to the welfare of the United States, nothing to the moral uplift of its people.

When I heard this afternoon the talk of gangsters and of the terrible conditions existing around Windsor and Detroit, from those who live perhaps thousands of miles away, and when I heard also hon. members who live in that particular locality tell us that those reports are entirely exaggerated, I prefer to take the word of hon. members from the counties of Essex who live on the ground. I prefer to take the word of the hon. member who was Minister of National Revenue in 1929 and who told the house that the people of the United States were not in favour of prohibiting the export of liquor from this country and that he saw nothing wrong on the part of Canada. I would rather take the word of those gentlemen, and for that reason, when the vote is taken on the second reading of this bill, I intend to vote for it.

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier-Maskinonge) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall add a few remarks to this interesting debate, because the constituency which I represent possesses an industry which has been very successfully operated for quite a number of years: the Melchers Gin Company. I am aware that this industry is highly appreciated by our friends opposite because, each time we have an opportunity of sampling its products, it is always a source of pleasure.

I wish to congratulate the sponsors of this measure which, in my opinion, should be unanimously adopted by the house. After the statement made by the President of Melchers Gin Company—which in the past gave work to three hundred heads of families—that it had to close its doors owing to the act prohibiting the export of alcoholic liquors which was passed by the previous regime, I cannot see why this government would not sanction this measure. I have never been able to understand why the right hon. leader of this government (Mr. Bennett) approved and still upholds this act to which I was opposed at the time, and to which I am still opposed.

I deem it my duty to appeal to hon. members to lend their support to the sponsors of this bill amending the Export Act so as to allow alcoholic industries to carry on their business as in the past.

Mr. Victor Marchand, the President of the Melchers Gin Company, recently informed me that, if this act was repealed, the company would immediately employ three hundred heads of families. The question is therefore worthy of consideration and the house should approve of the motion introduced by the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson) and so well seconded by the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand). I regret that I only took cognizance of this bill late this evening, otherwise, I would have submitted to the house convincing statistics that this measure should be adopted. I shall therefore vote in favour of the bill of the hon. member for West Essex.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, although the bill sponsored by the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson) deals with a question which concerns more particularly that part of Canada which lies quite near the United States, as a representative of the people of my province I should be remiss in my duty if I did not very shortly express to the house my opinion with regard to the bill. The house is aware of the fact that the province from which I come, rightly or wrongly—and that is its own business—has at the present time a prohibitory law on its statute book. Therefore I consider it my duty, no matter what my personal opinion in the matter may be, to express the views of the people I represent.

The United States for a number of years past—no matter what may happen a month or three months or a year from now—have had a prohibitory liquor law. It is true that one of the planks in the platform of the Democratic party which swept that country in November last, was that they would do away with the eighteenth amendment. But that promise has not so far been implemented, and until such a time comes, until they place on their statute book a law which will do away with the eighteenth amendment and with prohibition in their country, the matter is entirely in their hands, and in the meantime I consider that Canada would do very well to leave our law as it stands at present. When the United States do away with prohibition, if they do—and I have no doubt they will—then the law as we have it now on our statute book will become null and void and there will be no need of any discussion such as is now taking place here. For that reason, while I do not like to differ with some of my good friends on this side, I hold myself free to vote against the bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Who seconds the motion?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is conceded by most hon. members that there were two major issues which led to the defeat of the government which preceded this one, one the export of liquor and the other the import of butter. Both were trade matters, and this side of the house felt it was particularly strong on trade policies generally, but evidently on these two trade issues the majority of the electors thought otherwise. I think it is quite consistent for the notable eleven who voted against the legislation of three years ago to vote for this bill which seeks to repeal it, but what are we to say of those other members who by voting for this bill are simply advertising to the country that they secured their seats largely by means of their disapproval of the old bill? That, of course, cannot be proved, but there is no other interpretation to put upon their action than to conclude that it indicates the support they received from the liquor interests. They know that this bill is not going to pass in face of the opposition of the leaders of the two major parties and of the leader of the other wing of the opposition, who, I feel sure, would also be opposed to it if he were present. I am surprised that any hon. gentleman would so advertise himself to the country, but possibly, it may be claimed that the distillery has as much right to be represented in this chamber as any other vocation. Besides, these hon. members are bravely attempting to kill something that will be automatically dead in a very short time anyway, just as soon as the eighteenth amendment is repealed by the United States congress. The whole thing is dead now so far as we are concerned, and it does not take very much courage on the part of hon. members supporting this bill to get up and attempt to kill a prohibition that is practically dead already. I really cannot understand them at all.

There is one other thing that causes me anxiety. This is the second or third occasion on which I find myself supporting the great majority of the government. But it is not my fault if they happen to be right two or three times. I am not going to go wrong just to take opposite sides from them. The other day when we were discussing the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation I found myself with every member on the other side of the house who spoke against the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Hon. gentlemen know that it is not a very comfortable position sometimes to be voting with the opposite party, nevertheless I faced the music on that occasion.

Mr. MANION: Worse for us.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Worse for me. Then to-day again I am with hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke against this bill because I believe they are right, particularly the prime minister (Mr. Bennett); and I am prouder still to follow my own leader and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) in voting against this bill, which has been brought up simply for the purpose of showing certain vocational interests in this country which side certain hon. gentlemen are on. I am going to show which side I am on, and if it comes to a vote I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I again move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken in moving the adjournment of the debate, when he had no seconder, and he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. ROBINSON: Am I not to be allowed to close the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Robinson), which was negatived on the following division:

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Penitentiary Act (eight hour day).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the main object of this bill is to reduce the working hours of the guards and officials of the penitentiaries, who are now working from eleven hours in the day to thirteen hours at night. It is proposed in the bill that their hours of duty be reduced so that they will be the same as those of all other civil servants, namely for the period of eight hours each day. Penitentiary guards and officials are the only class of public servants who are compelled to work more than eight hours a day. It is not necessary for me to point out that there is no more exacting work than that of guard or instructor in a penitentiary. They have always to be on their guard and to exercise the utmost vigilance in handling men confined to the penitentiary, some at least of whom are scheming to escape.

It has always seemed strange to me that the guards and other officials employed in penitentiaries should be compelled to work such long hours, especially when all other classes of employees are employed only eight hours a day. I ask hon. members to compare them with the police forces and members of fire departments throughout the country. It is my understanding also that in provincial prisons the guards are asked to work only an eight hour day, and I am informed further that in mental hospitals that is the duration of their daily duty. Throughout Canada however we have here institutions in which men are compelled to work an eleven hour period in the day and a thirteen hour period at night. It may be argued that throughout the month their daily average is not more than eight hours, but I suggest that is not a fair way of looking at it. The fact is that in a twenty-four hour period two men are asked to do the work of three. Where there is so much responsibility, where constant vigilance is required, where instructors and guards must be on the alert every moment they are on duty, it is not in the best interests of the country to compel them to work eleven or thirteen hour periods. They are dealing with men whose liberty has been taken away from them, and some of whom are continually plotting escape as is well known. Some men in penitentiaries fear neither law nor mankind.

At this time it is not my intention to discuss generally the conduct of affairs in penitentiaries; that phase of the matter may be discussed later. The purpose of the bill, with the exception of section 2, is confined wholly and solely to the hours of duty during which officers shall work. The purpose of section 2 is to reduce from ten to eight the working hours of prisoners. On one occasion at least when I raised the question of hours of duty to which officials were subjected the Minister of Justice replied that the hours of labour of prisoners had some material bearing on the matter. It is with that in mind that the second clause in which the hours of labour of prisoners are reduced from ten to eight, has been added to the bill. I may add that the provision for a ten hour labour period now contained in that section is a relic of by-gone days and when people worked much longer hours than they do to-day. As a matter of fact at the present time no prisoners work a ten hour day; they work eight hours and very often less than that.

There is a provision in the bill whereby the warden or deputy warden, if necessity should arise, may direct that the prisoners work longer hours. I believe the bill as it now stands should commend itself to all hon. members, and I ask favourable consideration by the minister and the government.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, where practicable I am in favour of an eight hour day for all government employees. In our legislation concerning the eight hour day it will be found that the eight hour period now applies to almost all branches of the dominion public service, but there is in our law a saving clause under which any particular branch of the federal service may be excluded from the operation of the eight hour day provision. One of the branches of the public service which up to the present time has been excluded is the penitentiary service. Under the Penitentiary Act all convicts who are sent to penitentiaries are sent there to do hard labour; that is a provision of the act. Hard labour embraces within its definition a ten hour day.

In the bill before us I notice a proposal to reduce the working hours of convicts to eight hours. The law has always contemplated ten hours as a proper day's work for convict labour. When one considers the proposal to reduce hours of labour the question of the number of guards required for penitentiaries at once arises. I am informed by the departmental officials that with the exception of a single letter received from one guard, there have been no requests from the guards for a reduction in their hours of duty. There have been many requests, however, by labour organizations asking that a reduction be made in respect of all members of staffs in our penitentiaries and particularly in respect of guards. I find also in the matter of guards that the Canadian penitentiaries are perhaps not as well staffed as prisons in other countries, notably in Great Britain and the United States. It may be that our staffs are a little limited in respect of the number of guards. In Great Britain I find that in the great prison of Dartmoor, where they had the serious revolt last spring, for 440 prisoners there was a staff of 96 guards, about one guard for every five prisoners. In the various prisons of the United States, while there is no uniform rule on the subject, the average is about one guard for every seven prisoners, while in the Canadian penitentiaries the average is approximately one guard for every ten prisoners. At the present time the number of guards employed in all penitentiaries of Canada is 598, but this has been increased within the last three months owing to disturbances which took place in three of the penitentiaries. At the time of the disturbance in the Kingston penitentiary there were 96 guards and 957 prisoners; at St. Vincent de Paul 115 guards and 1,115 prisoners; at Dorchester 47 guards and about 470 prisoners. The total number of prisoners in Canadian penitentiaries is in the neighbourhood of 5,000, including those at Piers Island, B.C., and the total number of guards at the present time is 598, so the proportion of one to ten is pretty fairly maintained. And that proportion has been maintained on the basis of a twelve or thirteen hour day on the part of these guards. It is quite true, as my hon. friend who moved the second reading of this bill has stated, that the average hours of work of a penitentiary guard throughout the whole year do not amount to eight hours per day, but that average is arrived at after computing certain leave and absences which the guard is permitted.

An hon. MEMBER: Seven days a week.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have had a report compiled upon the subject, and I find the matter has been under examination in the Department of Justice on several occasions during recent years. The average has been taken in respect to certain guards from actual time sheets. Their average for seven months is 203 hours and 50 minutes of service each per month. During the seven months the guards in question had 39 days' annual leave, two statutory holidays and 32 days' sick leave. The officers are paid for sick leave when they have sick leave to their credit. This works out at 6 hours and 26 minutes per officer per day in a thirty day month, or 7 hours and 50 minutes per day if a six day week is used as the basis of calculation. So taking the average throughout the year the actual time of service on duty of a guard is less than eight hours per day under the present system, although I grant that the ordinary day for the guard is some twelve hours and on night duty thirteen hours.

When prisoners are called upon to work they start early in the morning. The guards are turned out with them. They go in gangs to the various shops or quarries or fields to perform the ordinary penitentiary labour, and of course, guards are appointed for each gang of prisoners. A count is made when they go out, record is kept of all material they take with them; when their working period is over the same guard brings them back, when another count is made to see that they are all there, and the materials are again all checked. So the time of the guard and the time of the prison labour coincides. If the proposed change is made and the guards are allowed an eight hour day there will have to be breaks in the working periods, unless the period of labour of convicts in the penitentiaries is also reduced to eight hours as asked for in this bill.

It has been estimated that at least 175 to 200 additional guards would have to be taken on if the eight hour day system is put in force. The average cost per guard in the Dominion of Canada, according to the figures of last year, is $1,300. That includes uniform, cost of meals and estimated value of medical attention at $3 per man. The cost per man is $1,177.20, in round figures $1,200, and allowances as stated. An additional 175 or 200 guards would, it is said, also involve an increase in the number of higher officers on the staff. The amount of additional expenditure involved in the proposal is very serious; it would run, it is said, from $240,000 to $250,000 a year in the cost of management of the penitentiaries of Canada.

The wardens of the various penitentiaries do not favour the change, except one. One warden has drawn up a schedule of hours for the guards as well as for the prisoners, and he thinks the system could be made to work satisfactorily provided the increase in the number of guards which I have indicated, and also certain additional members of the higher staff, were permitted. That is the opinion of the warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, who is one of the very best officers on the whole penitentiary staff.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: He says:

> The night staff would remain as at present, except for the alternation in the deputy warden and chief keeper visiting rounds. To assure full control it would be necessary to have an additional deputy warden or chief keeper. I think that it would be preferable to have an additional chief keeper; one assistant steward, one assistant engineer, one guard fireman, and three more keepers would also be necessary.

These are the higher paid officers of the staff. He goes on to say:

> Only the guards taking over the duty from the night staff till the opening of the prison would report at 6 a.m., and would work from 6 a.m. to 8 a.m.; then at noon from 11.30 a.m. to 2 p.m., and from 5.30 p.m. until 10 p.m., thus making eight hours duty. The assistant chief keeper would relieve the deputy warden and the chief keeper two hours each during the day, and visiting rounds would require to be additional duty for this officer during the night.

He places the additional cost as far as the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is concerned at the sum of $45,000 a year, including salaries and uniforms. The other wardens do not favour the change according to the records in the department. And they point out that the guards themselves have not asked for the change except in very few instances.

Now, guards who serve on night duty do, I believe, serve as long as thirteen hours. They tell me that it is not good policy to attempt to change guards during the night hours. As I pointed out a few minutes ago, if guards are to be changed more frequently, there will always be a certain amount of delay when the change takes place; there will be the checking over of the men, or, as they call it in the penitentiary, "the count;" the checking of the tools and other material which has been used by the preceding watch or preceding guard. All these things involve extra trouble, a certain amount of delay and a very substantial amount of expenditure in increased staff. I do not think that under present conditions one would be warranted in proposing the additional expenditure in regard to penitentiaries of say a quarter of a million dollars for the purpose of introducing at this time the eight hour day system. I should like to see such a system introduced; I should like to see eight hours made a day's labour throughout Canada in all federal departments if it were possible to do so, but I do not think it would prove to be a very workable system in the penitentiaries at the present time. Certainly the guards in penitentiaries have very responsible positions. This week I read in the report of Senate debates that it was suggested by a certain senator that guards should be in the nature of evangelists, missionaries or teachers, who could improve the prisoners while they were serving their time. I can only say that if we introduced guards of this sort into our penitentiaries, the guards themselves very soon would become convinced that they were misplaced.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, our penitentiaries contain the most serious type of criminals to be found in the country. Of course there is a distinction between a prison and a penitentiary. For the most part the prisons of Canada are under provincial jurisdiction, while the penitentiaries are under the Dominion government. Unless a man is sentenced to a term of two years or more, and unless he is a criminal of the more serious type he is not sent to a penitentiary. During the past few years, however—perhaps since the war—we in Canada and perhaps the people of other countries as well have been invaded by a class of criminal, not all Canadians but from other countries as well, of a more desperate type than we ever experienced before. Some attribute this condition to the motor car. We know that the motor car bandit and the hold-up man are much in evidence in Canada to-day. Bank hold-ups are of almost daily occurrence; there have been no less than four in Toronto within the last ten days. These bandits are armed and do not hesitate to use their arms should occasion arise. As a result we have in the penitentiaries of Canada a very large proportion of desperate criminals serving very long terms. Of necessity the guards in these penitentiaries must be strong and courageous; they must be men of intelligence and judgment, and they must be men who can be depended upon in any emergency. They have a very hard, reckless crowd with which to deal. Many of the prisoners seem to be entirely regardless of what may become of them individually; of course many are life prisoners, and they seem to be entirely careless of what may be done to them. They are desperate, and like necessity desperation knows no law.

We must have carefully selected guards, therefore, and in the future we will endeavour to pay more attention than has been paid in the past to the selection of guards. The position of guard is an important one, and to a large extent it is a dangerous one. If the guards themselves objected to the hours of labour I think perhaps the matter might receive more consideration but, as I have stated, I have found in the records only one case where a guard suggested the eight hour day, although during the past six or eight years many labour organizations have pressed for it.

What I take to be the most formidable objection to changing the system at present, however, is the actual money required to make the change. With existing conditions in Canada I would not feel warranted in asking for the expenditure of an additional quarter of a million dollars, which would be necessary to put this change into effect, and I do not know that the change would produce any better results than we have experienced to-day. I should like to increase the number of guards in some of the penitentiaries, and as a matter of fact since the recent outbreaks this has been done. We have increased the number of guards at Kingston from 96 to 154, at St. Vincent de Paul from 115 to 140, and at Dorchester from 47 to 54. The staffs in the other penitentiaries remain unchanged. This was thought to be a wise precaution having regard to the conditions which undoubtedly existed in those institutions.

It must be remembered that at the moment we are faced with another rather heavy expenditure. We must take care of from five hundred to six hundred Doukhobor prisoners who are held at Piers island on the Pacific coast. That prison has been especially constructed for the purpose of looking after these prisoners, who have been sentenced to terms of three years imprisonment. A staff of guards had to be procured, I think in the ratio of about one to twelve, and the increase in expenditure occasioned thereby has been very considerable.

Under these circumstances I would not feel warranted in recommending the change proposed by this bill at the present time. I do not commit myself or anyone else in regard to future policy in this respect, though personally I strongly favour the eight hour day upon government work.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister stated that the increased cost would be about $250,000. I wonder if he could tell me just what percentage that is of the total cost of penitentiary services.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I could not answer that question unless I had the estimates before me. If my hon. friend will look at the penitentiary estimates he will find the total cost shown, and he can make the calculation himself.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): I am in favour of the principle of this bill, especially since this country is committed to the eight hour day, but it seems to me that as this bill is drawn it is quite useless. The establishment of the eight hour day would depend upon the request of the warden or deputy warden, and we have just heard that only one warden is in favour of the principle, so this would not appear to be of very much use.

My second point in regard to this bill is that the penitentiary system is undergoing reorganization, and it would be hardly fair for parliament to pass a bill such as this without giving the new organization sufficient time to consider the matter. So far as I am concerned I think eight hours is quite long enough for a guard to be on duty, but I believe we should allow this reorganization to take place before we consider any measure such as the one now proposed.

The second section of the bill is rather humorous; at present I think public opinion is rather changing with regard to the position of the convict. I have nothing to say with regard to the first offender; I always have been in favour of showing him every possible consideration. On the other hand, however, the second offender, the repeater, should receive no favour so far as this country is concerned unless we want to find ourselves, with regard to our penitentiaries and the whole question of crime, in a position similar to that in which our neighbour to the south finds itself to-day. It would not mean anything if we were to say the convicts should work only eight hours a day. Every prisoner has to be in his cell before dark, and that means that at no time do they work eight hours at a time. Then the suggestion is made that they should not be asked to work on fast days or thanksgiving days. I wonder what sort of thanksgiving day would appeal to a man in penitentiary. I do not think he would consider that thanksgiving day as anything worth having. Clause 2 is absolutely humorous; indeed it is ridiculous, especially to those who understand the present day conditions in the penitentiaries.

While I shall vote for the principle of the bill, I think it would be much better if this house reserved its opinion until we see how the new organization was working out. If the guards at Kingston penitentiary have been increased from 88 or 90 to 140, it may be that the superintendent and the new warden will be in favour of this bill. I think it would be unfair for the house to express or press its opinion before the new organization can get under way and express its views.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this bill. During my experience with labour movements throughout the past year I have always found that when a shorter working day is asked for it is argued that such is not possible because of working conditions and costs. However, it has always been found to work very well when put into effect, and I am sure the same thing would apply in this instance.

The minister says that these guards are charged with very responsible duties. I have no doubt that he is correct, but he should realize that a man charged with very responsible duties should not be asked to carry on with those duties for thirteen hours at a time. When a man has carried on very responsible duties for eight hours, I think it is time he should be relieved. Those of us who perform duties which take our attention for some considerable time know that as the hours wear on we get irritable and those with whom we are associated feel the effects of the long hours we have been at work.

Previously whenever the eight hour day question has been brought before the house we have been met with the argument that this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction and that this government could not do anything. In the present instance the Dominion government has full jurisdiction and the only obstacle in the way is that of organization and cost. Even with the additional cost, there would be some saving because of the fact that a certain number of men would be taken off the unemployed list. The minister stated also that the guards themselves did not want this. The guards at Westminster penitentiary or others speaking for them have approached me on this matter to ask my support. The guards did not want their names made known because they were afraid it might jeopardize their positions. I am glad to know that the minister is favourable to an eight hour day and that this would be put into effect if times were different, but I do not think conditions could be more favourable than at the present time. Two or three years ago times were fairly good in this country and yet no effort was made to reduce the hours. I would suggest that this is as good a time as any to make this very desirable change.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is not the time to go into the penal system of Canada in any detail, and I do not propose to do so at the moment. I have no objection at all to an eight hour day for the guards, but I do not think the working day of the inmates should be reduced to eight hours. Every-one knows that what the convict fears most is loneliness, he dreads being shut in a cell from the time he comes off work until the next morning. To add to that period of loneliness would be unnecessary and needless cruelty. I am hoping that some beneficial results will come out of the recent disturbances which have occurred and that lights will be put in the cells by which the prisoners can read. At the present time the lights provided make it almost impossible for the convict to read for any length of time. The statement is made that school teachers are provided and the prisoners have an opportunity of educating themselves. Those are just words without meaning. They have forty minutes immediately after they eat to attend the classes, the worst time possible to attempt to study. The blood supply cannot be in the stomach and the head at the same time.

May I be permitted to make the statement that in my opinion the recent disturbances were not due to certain prisoners who had been recently sent to the penitentiary. The government is to be congratulated in having communists in the penitentiaries on whom the blame for the disturbances can be placed. If the penal system of Canada had been reorganized according to the report of the royal commission which sat when Mr. Doherty was Minister of Justice there would not have been any disturbances. I should like to quote very briefly from the report of this commission which sat in 1914, as follows:

> Speaking for themselves, the members of the committee would not before undertaking this investigation have believed that the penitentiary system could have been as needlessly cruel as it in fact is, and the absence of those features of the system which involve unnecessary mental or physical suffering would not to any of them make prison any the less abhorrent.

That is the commissioners speaking, not the convicts. This very excellent report was reinforced by another one in 1921 by a committee appointed to advise upon the supervision of petitentiary regulations. There was also a resolution moved by myself and adopted by the government but never acted upon. Since 1914 nothing has been done to bring the penitentiary system of Canada up to date.

Our present system is based upon revenge and not upon reform. I disagree altogether with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) who stated that we owed nothing to the repeater. The repeater is the result of poor environment, unsound heredity and an inefficient penal system. If there are a great many repeaters, then without going any further I think we can say that something radical is wrong with the penal system. Punishment should never be in the nature of revenge, it should always be with the idea of reforming the individual. At all times the state should be above the thought of wreaking vengeance on the individual.

Let me repeat what I said in the beginning. It would be the most cruel thing possible to limit the penitentiary working day to eight hours, because in that case the prisoners would be locked in their cells much longer than they are now. If the intention is that the number of guards be doubled or increased, I have no particular objection. So far as lack of money is concerned, we can take what we are spending on cadet training or the non-permanent force or some other source of useless expenditure, and put it to this use if it is needed. The very fact that the prison population has doubled in the last three or four years goes to show that the causes of crime lie outside the penitentiaries; they are at the moment largely, although not wholly, economic, and just to increase the supervision in penitentiaries will never lead to a change in the penal system or to a reformation of the prisoner. If this bill means an eight hour day for all, I am very much opposed to it. If it means increasing the number of the right type of guards, then I would be in favour of it.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, if there are no other speakers, I might be allowed to say a few words. In view of the minister's statements it is not my intention now to press this bill; my desire was to have the matter brought to the serious attention of the minister and the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is speaking in reply on the motion, I would call the attention of the house to the fact that if he speaks now he will close the debate. If anyone else wishes to speak he should do so now.

Mr. REID: I should like to say a few words, however, in reply to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who said that no guards had petitioned for this. The information given to me is that the guards are not allowed to organize and therefore they have no voice to present their petitions to the warden or the minister of justice. I do not know why they are not allowed to organize —that may be good business or otherwise— but I believe I am fully voicing the expressed opinions on behalf of the men who work in the penitentiaries when I propose reducing the hours, eleven to thirteen, to eight. I presume it is a serious matter at this time to ask for such a large increase in expenditure. As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) he may refer to section 2 as foolish, but the present regulations call for ten hours of hard labour. The prisoners are not doing hard labour or working ten hours. Why he should call it humorous or ridiculous to reduce the prisoner's hours to eight, I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. ROSS: I will agree with the hon. member that they have been shut in for about four months.

Mr. REID: Why did the hon. member not oppose the present act instead of this bill?

Mr. ROSS: The present act does not allow shutting in of that kind.

Mr. REID: I would ask the minister to take this matter into serious consideration, because I am convinced that an eight hour day can be put into effect. I spent the greater part of a day in seeing how the guards operated and how the whole system worked. My real purpose in introducing the bill was to bring the matter to the serious attention of the minister and the house. That having been done, and on the assurance of the minister I am quite willing, after hearing his remarks, to withdraw the bill, and that this whole matter be again considered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his bill? In any event I have grave doubt whether it is in order. I am inclined to the opinion that it is contrary to standing order 60, but as the hon. member is withdrawing the bill, the point need not be decided.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was going to raise a point of order, but inasmuch as the hon. gentleman could discuss the matter on a resolution, I thought it better before doing so, for him to conclude his observations. This constitutes a charge on the public revenue and will increase taxes, so that according to the rules of the house it is a money measure and it is not competent for a private member to introduce a measure that involves an additional charge upon the taxpayers. The hon. member of course could discuss it on a resolution, and in view of that fact I thought it well to let the discussion conclude before raising the point of order. If an hon. member, by introducing a bill to reduce hours of labour, can circumvent the general rule precluding private members from introducing money bills, obviously the procedure is open to question. It is an indirect way of trying to do something that could not be done directly, and I submit that for further guidance it would be well to have the matter disposed of.

Bill withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed, from February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code (unlawful associations), and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

[Mr. Ross.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I have very few words to add to what I said the other day in connection with this bill and the amendment of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). When the hour for public bills expired, I was referring to section 133 of the criminal code, which section had been repealed in 1919 at the same time that section 98 was enacted. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) called my attention to the fact that in 1930 the section was reinserted, and he was right. On every occasion when a measure had passed this house to repeal section 98 and to reenact section 133, the repeal of section 98 as well as the reenactment of section 133 was rejected in the other chamber, but in 1930, though they voted against the repeal of section 98, they agreed to the reinsertion of section 133, which is an essential safeguard for free speech. But this only shows that parliament in 1919 went very far in enacting an exceptional piece of legislation.

I stated that the Minister of Justice was wrong in suggesting that all those who were asking for repeal of section 98 were extremists, belonged to special associations which were radical in their views. I said that every year I was a member of the government I attended interviews with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and other labour associations, at which the repeal of this section was urged. Those associations are far from being radical in their views. I have taken the trouble to look into the report of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada for every year during at least the last six or seven years. In every one of their reports and at every one of their annual meetings they protested against this section and passed resolutions asking parliament to repeal it. Let me call attention more particularly to the report of the meeting of last year, 1932, held in Hamilton. What they did with regard to this section will be found on pages 222 and 223. In 1931 the Trades and Labour Congress, under the presidency of Mr. Tom Moore, met at Vancouver and there reiterated their objections to this section, as will be found on pages 19 and 185. In 1930 they held a meeting in Regina, where again the same resolutions were passed, and it is to be noted that at every one of those meetings the congress rejected motions advocating extreme measures; motions, for instance, asking for the liberation of prisoners who had been convicted for having taken part in riots. They showed themselves as being conservative in the good sense of the word, but at the same time they insisted upon asking parliament to repeal this legislation which is obnoxious to the sane element of labour in all parts of Canada. It is a mistake, I respectfully submit, on the part of the Minister of Justice or of any hon. gentleman to represent as extremists or communists those who are asking for the repeal of this legislation of 1919. On the contrary, I believe that every sane labour leader in Canada will tell my hon. friend that section 98 is rather a weapon in the hands of agitators and gives them a chance to attack parliament and the law of Canada. It is not legislation that conforms to the ordinary rules of British justice.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing in the section to forbid the criticizing of the parliament of Canada; it is the destroying of it by force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I say that the men who are asking for the repeal of this legislation are not the extremists such as have been described in this house. It is sufficient to call attention to one or two features of section 98. Subsection 2, for instance, says:

(2) Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association, or held or suspected to be held by any person for or on behalf thereof may, without warrant, be seized or taken possession of by any person thereunto authorized by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and may thereupon be forfeited to His Majesty.

Under that section any senseless person, anyone who was over-zealous, if he could persuade the commissioner of the mounted police, could be authorized to enter my own home if he said that I was suspected of having in my possession some documents or something else which was obnoxious. Now that is not ordinary British justice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has never been done except once.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been the law for thirteen years, and there has been no complaint.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to that retort, that it has been there for thirteen years and has not been used.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Except once.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then why should it be there at all? I say it is contrary to all the ordinary rules of British justice. It is an axiom of British law and British justice that a man's home is his castle into which even the king of England cannot enter. This legislation is absolutely opposed to anything that can be found in the statutes of any other British country. It is a product of the war. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) alluded to the fact that this legislation was enacted to embody the report of a committee which had been sitting in 1919, and of which he said I was a member. I was not a member of that committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know the hon. gentleman sat in the old museum, and was there the day that Senator Copp voted for the proposal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: His was the one vote that carried it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure my hon. friend is wrong. I took the trouble to go to the library and consult the records because I knew I was not a member of that committee. The Hon. Charles Murphy was, and perhaps it was of him my hon. friend was thinking.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And Senator Copp.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, he was there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And his vote carried it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The vote carried, yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: His vote carried it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was far from being a unanimous vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It carried by Senator Copp's vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have here the Hansard of 1919, and at page 3291 the Hon. Charles Murphy is reported as follows:

There was in the committee a very sharp division of opinion as to the necessity of amending the criminal code, and there was a further division of opinion whether, in the event of the committee being of opinion that the criminal code with reference to sedition and seditious propaganda should be amended—in view of the numerous strikes and the general unrest throughout the country—this was the proper time to make such a report to the house and induce a discussion of matters that would inevitably be discussed by reason of that report and of ony action that might follow the introduction of that report. It was on the latter ground principally—coupled with the fact that an opinion prevailed that the present criminal code was ample to cover the class of cases to which the attention of the committee was directed—that a portion of the committee, including myself, shared the view that this was not the proper time to introduce such a report as that, the adoption of which has now been moved by the Solicitor General.

I see that my hon. friend, who was I believe the chairman of that special committee, in the course of his speech in the house at that time intimated that this legislation was to put on the statute book what had been the law during the war by orders in council. During the war, of course, the government of the day had almost a blank cheque to do practically everything, and they passed orders in council dealing with sedition, unlawful meetings and unlawful associations. These orders in council lapsed after the war, and this particular legislation was enacted for the purpose of replacing them. Those of us who remember what happened at the time know how dangerous it was even during the war to have such wide powers given to the government. I remember a case where a man was prosecuted for having in his possession Plato's Republic! I think that the Labour people of Canada are right in asking that such a condition should not be made permanent in the statutes of this country. I have said that the other clauses of the criminal code are quite sufficient to deal with sedition. We are being told that these are restless days, dangerous times, that there is unemployment and that we must have all the power necessary to deal with these troubles when they occur. My answer is that under the other clauses of the criminal code we have that power.

I should like to refer hon. members to recent cases in three provinces of the dominion which have been taken to the appeal courts in those provinces. I refer first to the case of Rex vs. Jones, reported in Canadian Criminal Cases, 1932, page 81, where the appeal court upheld a conviction under section 87 made in pursuance of riots which had taken place on account of unemployment and trouble in Alberta. The same thing happened in Manitoba, as is shown in the case of Rex vs. Beattie, 55 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 380, where, again in the appeal court of Manitoba, Chief Justice Prendergast affirmed a conviction made under section 87. Again in Ontario, in the case of the King vs. Patterson, reported in Dominion Law Reports, volume 3, 1931, at page 267, the appeal court of that province affirmed and upheld a conviction made under section 89 of a man who had been found guilty of taking part in riots and unlawful meetings which arose through unemployment.

I am sorry to disagree with the Minister of Justice. I respect the opinions of those who do not share my views, but I would ask them to bear in mind that so far as communism is concerned I am quite ready to speak against it as violently as could any other hon. member. I repeat: I am opposed to communism and its methods, but I do not think that by enacting special or arbitrary legislation which is contrary to the ordinary rules of British justice and British procedure we are adopting the best method of fighting it. Especially do I hold that view when I know that this legislation is resented by people who cannot be classified as agitators or extremists. I am deeply convinced that the enacting of section 98 was a mistake. I am sorry to disagree with hon. members opposite, and that my views do not meet with the approval of that great organ in Montreal, the Montreal Gazette. But on many occasions I have had the misfortune of not having the approval of the Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is there any legislation except the first part of section 98 which meets adequately the case against communism. That has been my difficulty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, sedition, under the common law, and even other sections of the code.

Mr. BENNETT: They do not touch communism.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely. I mentioned them the other day, but I am quite willing to repeat them. I hope hon. members will refer to the annotations in the criminal code showing that in England proposals to enact legislation of this kind have always been rejected, because in that country they preferred to remain under the common law. They always find a way of convicting under the ordinary rules of common law those who are guilty of fomenting trouble. Apart from that I am free to admit that temperamentally I do not like this kind of legislation. I do not believe that this is a good way to repress error. After all, to allow freedom is the best way of dealing with people in a democracy, and I am free to confess my belief that always when truth and error are given a fair field, truth ultimately prevails. That is one of the chief reasons for my opposition to this legislation.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is so emphatic in his arguments in favour of the repeal of section 98, and has quoted so widely from the reports of labour organizations, that I purpose taking a directly opposite view and quoting the opinions of many other organizations which doubtless also advocate the repeal of this section. At the outset of his remarks the ex-minister of justice stated that during his term of office on five different occasions he sponsored a bill in this House of Commons the substance of which was almost identical with that of the bill now before the house.

As I was not in the house on those occasions I do not know whether the government of that day had an absolute majority or whether it was necessary to obtain the support of the southeast corner of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nor do I know whether on any occasion such a bill went from this house to the Senate, and that body had a majority in support of the party then in office, the party of the ex-minister of justice. But if the Senate did have a Liberal majority at that time, or on any occasion to which the hon. member has referred, I should like to know how strong an effort he made to persuade his friends in the Senate to pass the bill instead of throwing it out. I can say this, that the party now in office will not ask the Senate to throw it out; we will throw it out ourselves and hope that it will not be resurrected. In spite of the credit the ex-Minister of Justice takes upon himself for supporting agitations in and out of this house for the repeal of this legislation, I am satisfied that within the house the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) must receive the major portion of credit, or censure, or whatever it may be, for the movement to repeal section 98. The militant part of the agitation is carried on by militant socialists and communists outside the house. I am going to connect it up, if I can, directly with Moscow and the communist international. I quite admit that the ex-Minister of Justice is sincere in all he said and likewise perhaps every one else in this house, and I will go further and say that many outside the house are sincere in their objections to the section and in their desire to have it repealed. But in my humble opinion a great many others appear to take their marching orders from the seat of the communist international whose headquarters are in Moscow. I will read from the Theses and Statutes what I believe are the marching orders:

> For all countries, even for most free, "legal" and "peaceful" ones, in the sense of a lesser acuteness in the class struggle, the period has arrived when it has become absolutely necessary for every communist party to join systematically, lawful and unlawful work, lawful and unlawful organizations . . . It is especially necessary to carry on unlawful work in the army, and navy, police—

> This country is aware of the agitation that has been carried on in the last two or three months on many platforms to wreck institutions we stand for.

> —and persistent and systematic propaganda and agitation is necessary in the army where communist groups should be formed in every military organization. . . .

> The working class cannot achieve the victory over the bourgeoisie by means of the general strike alone and by the policy of folded arms. The proleteriat must resort to an armed uprising.

Now we have heard of on scores of platforms during the recess of this parliament of arguments advanced why an upheaval, a violent upheaval such as they had in Russia, might take place. I think it is about time those opposed to this propaganda—and I am one—should stand up and place themselves four-square against it instead of offering arguments in support of it.

The clause it is sought to have repealed is directed against unlawful organizations whose professed purpose is violence and so forth. I have read section 98 very carefully and I can see nothing in it that prevents anyone from going on any public platform and advocating almost anything he fancies provided he does not advocate violence and military uprising. When I was a young man I remember taking part in a debate on a resolution that Canada should be part of the United States. The negative side won—not that I was on it, but perhaps the judges were as much opposed to any such proposition as those on the negative side were. Had violence and militant action to achieve that end been advocated then it would have violated this section. But one can go on any platform and advocate anything within the law. Personally I am in favour of free speech, but I am opposed at all times to the advocacy of change by violence and the upsetting of our institutions by armed uprising.

I said at the beginning that I believe that this whole agitation has its origin in Moscow. I do not charge that anyone advocating these things in this house is associated in any way with Moscow, but the militant communists outside are, and they are the people responsible for the major part of the agitation. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has spoken in many meetings and has been cheered to the echo for many statements he has made, but I know further that it is easy in any great city to pack a hall with sympathizers for what he advocates. It is not difficult to get an audience of 1,000 or 10,000 for meetings in Toronto.

I want to read out of these same statutes of the communist international what I believe shows the hook-up of this whole propaganda with the whole communistic agitation. I do not say, as I explained a moment ago, that those advocating the repeal of this section are hooked up with it, but the agitation is in my opinion:

The class struggle in almost every country of Europe and America is entering the phase of civil war.

Has it not been stated on our platforms in Canada during the last few months that we may have an upheaval, armed or otherwise? Did I not note a short time ago that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had said such and such must come, that is we must either take it or have it jammed down our throats?

Under such conditions the communists can have no confidence in bourgeois laws. They should create everywhere a parallel illegal apparatus which at the decisive moment should be of assistance to the party to do its duty toward the revolution.

We have heard a great deal about revolution lately; has repeal anything to do with revolution that has been advocated?

In every country where, in consequence of martial law or of other exceptional laws, the communists are unable to carry on their work legally, a combination of legal and illegal work is absolutely necessary.

This section is directly opposed to those who advocate violence or illegal work. No one else is interfered with; anyone who desires to effect change in a legal way need not fear section 98. I can go on any platform and advocate what I believe to be for the best interests of Canada, but I may not advocate with it violence and armed upheaval.

Persistent and systematic propaganda and agitation must be carried on in the army where communist groups should be formed in every military organization. Wherever, owing to the repressive legislation, agitation becomes impossible, it is necessary to carry on such agitation illegally.

That is what we are opposed to. We are opposed to illegal organization and armed upheaval, or the repeal of this section or the smashing of our institutions.

In countries where the power is in the hands of the bourgeoisie, or the counter-revolutionary social democrats, the communist party must learn to unite systematically legal with illegal work.

All we are opposed to now is illegal organizations, and before I sit down I am going to give quite a list of them said to be, and tell something about what they advocate. An illegal organization advocates violence and armed upheaval. The object of section 98 is to prevent violence and armed upheaval. What hon. member will stand up in this house and advocate violence and armed upheaval? I do not think there is one. Then why should any hon. member here or anyone outside the house who does not advocate violence and armed upheaval fear this act? I am not in accord with repressive measures; I do not think repressive measures achieve their ends at all, and if any part of this act can be characterized as extremely repressive I would think that might be given consideration. On the other hand it should be sufficiently severe to prevent the advocacy of armed upheaval or violence. A great many organizations have been established in Canada and, in the opinion of those who have been carrying out law enforcement in this country, many of these organizations are unlawful. I am going to refer to two organizations. I do not say that they are unlawful; I do not know, and as a matter of fact I would rather admit that they are quite regular. On December 13 last, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke in a hall in East Toronto, and he is quoted as follows in the Mail and Empire of December 14, 1932:

J. S. Woodsworth, M.P., leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, declared last night at a meeting in Danforth Park school, before an audience of more than one thousand persons—

Before reading this quotation I should like to protest publicly against our public schools and certain of our churches in Ontario lending their platforms for the advocacy of all sorts of proposals calling for the destruction of our institutions as we know them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I must object to any member of this house implying in any way that I used any public school for the purpose of advocating the destruction of any of our institutions. I ask that no such statement be made.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had heard me correctly he would have known that I did not say he had advocated anything of the kind. What I did say—and what I will say again—was that I publicly protest against school auditoriums in the province of Ontario—for the upkeep of which I pay large taxes—being used for the advocacy of political propaganda these times designed to destroy our institutions as we know them. Now if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to come within that class that is up to him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a point of order—

Mr. MacNICOL: Continuing to quote—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the rules of this house are designed to protect the members of this house. I object to any implication—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member state his point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am doing so. I object to the implication that in any way whatever I attempted to advocate the destruction of any of our institutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in taking any such objection. I was listening attentively to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), and no such implication was made. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will have a right to reply, but that time has not come yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not a case of having a right to reply.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will continue, because my time is limited.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not a question of the right to reply; it is a question of maintaining my honour at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's honour is not at stake and has not been questioned in this debate.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member is quoted as having made this statement during the course of the same address:

"It is absurd for the Senate, a body without responsibility, to veto measures passed by the elected representatives of the people," he declared. Assailing the capitalist system, he urged his hearers to be ready with practical solutions for some system to replace it as it crumbled.

Well, the capitalist system is not going to crumble; it is going to remain right in existence. Now I hope the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), whom I intend to quote next, will not challenge the statement I am about to make. The hon. member also went to East Toronto and spoke to the East York workers in the R. H. McGregor school on Saturday afternoon, February 11 of this year. According to the Mail and Empire of February 13, among other things the hon. member said:

The C.C.F. was trying to establish a new social order, she said.

The old one surely would have to be destroyed before a new one could take its place. I continue quoting:

The House of Commons is the place where we must enter—I almost said capture. If every member of the house were a free citizen—

I suppose we must all be slaves.

—voting on what seemed to him best, we would not be in the mess we are in.

Now listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

Canada has the least liberty of speech and action of any country.

As a Canadian I am proud of Canada. People are as free in Canada as in any other country in the world, bar none.

Miss MACPHAIL: May I just say that up to this point the report—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am going to assist the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) raising a point of order? If not she has no right to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Miss MACPHAIL: There is one error—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member for Southeast Grey to maintain order. She has no right to interrupt, unless it is to ask a question with the consent of the member who has the floor, or to raise a point of order.

Miss MACPHAIL: I was just going to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: Let me repeat what I said before I was interrupted. As a Canadian I am convinced that Canada's institutions and our right of free speech are second to none, despite anything the hon. member for Southeast Grey has to say to the contrary. I am a Canadian of the fourth generation, and I am proud of it. I think it is a very strong statement to make to say that Canada has less freedom of speech than any other place in the world. I will quote the exact words again, so that I may not be called to order:

Canada has the least liberty of speech and action of any country.

That means that in Afghanistan, Baluchistan and all the other "stans" of Asia, as well as in Russia, there is greater freedom of speech and action than we have in Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Speaker, may I say—

Mr. MacNICOL: I said a moment ago that I was going to endeavour to link up this propaganda with Moscow.

Miss MACPHAIL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the last quotation given by the hon. member is inaccurate. I said the members of the House of Commons in Canada had less freedom than existed in any British parliament in the world.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Southeast Grey is not in order in making that remark.

Mr. MacNICOL: The newspaper report does not agree with what the hon. member for Southeast Grey just stated. Let me repeat the last sentence quoted in the newspaper:

Canada has the least liberty of speech and action of any country.

Now I must hurry on, because I want to connect up these various organizations and I will leave it to the house to decide whether they are lawful or unlawful. I will leave it to the house to decide whether the speeches delivered before these organizations, some of which I am going to read, are lawful or unlawful. I will leave it to the house to decide also whether this propaganda is connected with the communist international in Moscow. The first is the Workers' Unity League, and in the worker's pamphlet No. 4 at page 15, I find this:

In conclusion, the party of the workers must be built up. The communist party stands today as the only party true to the principles of socialism and the class struggle. The duty of every worker and poor farmer who reads this pamphlet and who agrees with its political messages is to take his place in the ranks of the party and provide a leadership for the struggle for socialism.

Organization is the key to struggle. The building of unemployment councils, militant labour unions, opposition groups in the reformist unions—these are tasks that can only be carried out by an organization of the type of the Workers' Unity League.

This organization is associated with the communist international with headquarters at Moscow.

The Farmers' Unity League is hooked up in the last sentence of the same article, which reads:

The Farmers' Unity League stands as the militant leader of the poor farmers.

This organization is associated with the Workers' Unity League. The National Unemployed Workers' Association is referred to on page 6 of The Party Organizer, as follows:

One of the principal tasks facing the party at this time is to sink the roots of the party among the masses. In order to do this, we are confronted with building shop committees of the Workers' Unity League, the cores of the revolutionary industrial unions in the factories, and the organization of local councils of the National Unemployed Workers' Association.

This is a communist organization which according to this pamphlet, receives inspiration from the communist international at Moscow. The next is the Canadian Labour Defence League, which is referred to in The Frame-Up on Allan Campbell as follows:

The Canadian Labour Defence League issues this pamphlet, not only as an exposure of the sharpening terror in Vancouver, but also to inspire the workers generally with the courage exhibited by comrade Allan Campbell and to serve as a lesson to revoluntionary workers how they can defend themselves in capitalist courts.

—the "sedition" and "deportation" laws must be opposed by every worker and poor farmer.

That is what we are having, an agitation to change the law so that there will be an opportunity afforded to preach sedition and violence without obstruction. The next is the F.S.U., and I am sorry I cannot give the house the full name of this organization. It is referred on page 13 of The Party Organizer as follows:

The worker may be ready to join one of the mass organizations like the Canadian Labour Defence League or F.S.U.

I am informed that this means Friends of the Soviet Union. The next is the Mine Workers' Union, which is referred to as follows:

The results of the referendum, through which the miners of Alberta expressed their determination to join the fighting front of the Workers' Unity League is of tremendous importance. This decision makes possible to extend the revolutionary leadership among the Alberta miners, and through burning out in the fire of daily struggles the remnant of Wheatleyism make the Mine Workers' Union of Canada the base for the struggle for one all-inclusive oil, mine and smelter workers union of Canada.

That is another communistic organization. Another is the Needle and Lumber Workers Union. I shall not quote the reference which is made here. The Christian Social Order, I believe I read, held a demonstration in Toronto quite some time ago. One of their beliefs is:

That the achieving of a Christian Social Order would entail the socializing of the organized agencies of production.

Then we have the W.E.C., F.B.L., R.I.U., and N.U.A.

An hon. MEMBER: Any other combinations?

Mr. MacNICOL: I think the minister should investigate the objective of these various organizations. The National Unemployed Workers' Association held a meeting in the Queen Street United Church. I might mention that the church was not associated with the meeting other than permitting the use of its hall. The report of the meeting does not associate the church with these activities. This meeting was reported in The Worker of May 16, 1931, as follows:

Starting by singing the "International," the meeting was thrown open to free discussion, and one speaker after another condemned the church as an opium vendor, demanded non-contributory unemployment insurance and urged the workers present to join the National Unemployed Workers' Association. The first speaker declared, "what we want is an international soviet union."

It might be well to quote from some of the songs which were sung or distributed at that meeting. The first is the International, which goes as follows:

Arise, ye prisoners of starvation,

Imagine, this is in Canada.

Arise, ye wretched of the earth.

One would almost think they were speaking of some downtrodden European country forty or fifty years ago.

For justice thunders condemnation,
A better world's in birth.

We have heard a good deal about that in the last two months.

No more tradition's chains shall bind us,
Arise, ye slaves, no more in thrall,
The earth shall rise on new foundations,
We have been not, we shall be all.

When it is all over, it will be found that the institutions of Canada will continue to go along just as usual. The chorus runs like this:

'Tis the final conflict,
Let each stand in his place,
The international soviet Shall be the human race.

The international soviet will never wave its flag over this grand old Canada. The next song was The Red Flag, which runs as follows:

The workers' flag is deepest red,
And shrouded oft our martyred dead,
And ere their limbs grew stiff and cold,
Their hearts blood dyed its every fold.

To hear this song, you would think that there was nothing but violence being carried on in this country. The chorus reads:

Then raise the scarlet banner high,
Within its shade we'll live and die,
The cowards flinch and traitors sneer,
We'll keep the red flag flying here.

As yet it has not been up and I do not think it ever will be. The next song is the Red Army March. It runs as follows:

Comrades, the bugles are sounding,
Shoulder your arms for the fray,
Boldly we'll fight for our freedom,
Bravely we'll hew out a way.

Born in the ranks of the workers,
Whose toil scanty wage must suffice,
Brotherhood, unity, freedom,
This is our fighting device.

This is the type of song sung at these meetings.

An hon. MEMBER: And in a church.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, but, as I pointed out earlier, the church had nothing to do with it.

During the recent municipal contest in Toronto, several candidates were contesting the ward in which I live and part of which I have the honour to represent here. An article in the Toronto Telegram of December 29, 1932, refers to three of these candidates as follows:

Three of the candidates, members of the United Front Party and endorsed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and self-avowed socialists, were the speakers most popular of the evening.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member wishes to do me justice he will remain in his seat and allow me to finish my remarks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MacNICOL: One of the candidates was asked the following question:

Why is all the world in such a bad state of affairs?

And his reply was:

Because capitalism is in the saddle. We will have a revolution here as in Russia (I did not want to name Russia but I must), but I think it will come in a different way.

At many of those meetings in Toronto where these candidates were speaking, they were supported by groups of avowed socialists who, after these candidates had made their speeches, prevented other candidates for the city council or the Board of Control of Toronto, who wished to discuss the issues of the day, from speaking. In other words, the very advocates of free speech prevented free speech on many platforms during the municipal election in Toronto.

I should like to read what His Grace Archbishop McNeil says with reference to clean speech. His Grace, as reported in the Toronto Globe of June 22, 1931, spoke as follows:

The message given the Holy Name Society on Sunday by His Grace Archbishop McNeil is one which should cause people of all denominations to think. "If ever there was need for promoting reverence," he said, "it is in our day. To-day wide-spreading organizations exist in Canada, the United States and England to encourage atheism. There are even schools of atheism in this country. And the largest country in Europe has adopted atheism as its public policy."

It seems to be a fact that the forces operating against the spirit of reverence are more active and determined than those promoting it.

There are such organizations as the archbishop referred to, including the communistic schools, directly interested in wrecking the bulwarks of spiritual thought by spoken and written speech and evil example. In addition there is the insidious campaign of those who would give rein to atheistic doctrine in the name of "free speech." The former are conducting the "drive"; the latter is breaking down resistance. Where is the defence organization that has at its back the might of right, "the faith of the fathers," and the knowledge of a righteous cause?

I want to close just with this: I am in accord with maintaining on the statute book section 98 of the criminal code, and I shall support the amendment moved by the minister of justice. While I have been in the house I have heard those who assume that they represent labour, speak on many occasions. I have been associated with labour for twenty-five years and I yield to no one as regards the rights of the working man. I am convinced that organized labour in this country and in the United States deserves a great deal of credit for what it has done and what it proposes to do in the way of alleviating the condition of the working man, and on every occasion that organized labour advocates something for the betterment of the working man, I shall support it if I believe it is wise and just. Organized labour has been quoted as being in favour of the repeal of section 98. Let me say that organized labour is opposed with all its might to the preaching of violence and armed upheaval, because labour men would be the first to suffer and would suffer longest and hardest as a result of any armed upheaval. I would not be so much opposed to agitations of this kind if, when parades were organized and marshalled to bring about violence and armed uprisings, the paraders would seize the leaders who led them astray and would march them at the head of the procession, so that those leaders would be the first to suffer from the advocacy of violence and armed upheaval.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege a week ago to-morrow night to address a large congregation in Donlands church which is near the McGregor school in East York. I was invited by the Reverend Mr. Irwin, the pastor of the church, to give an address, I was introduced by Doctor Salem Bland.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Miss MACPHAIL: I said there that I respected my colleagues in the house, but I am afraid, after the laughter at the mention of Doctor Bland's name, I shall have difficulty in doing so in future. As I said, I was introduced by Doctor Salem Bland. I made practically the same speech as I made the following afternoon at McGregor school. The school, I may say, was crowded. I congratulated the school board in allowing, though I could never understand why it should be a case of allowing, the taxpayers in that school section to use the auditorium for public meetings and discussions. The minister of Donlands church, and the East York Workers' Association, almost all of whom were unemployed, could have selected their own member to address them. I did not ask them to invite me. Possibly their own member had better do some heart-searching to find out why he was not asked. I do not know why he was not.

As regards the subject to which the Mail and Empire was referring when I was reported to have said that there was less freedom of speech in Canada than anywhere else, the question I was discussing was freedom of action of elected members in the House of Commons, and I said that in the British House of Commons there was much greater freedom and that when a cabinet minister was not pleased with the action of his government, and when the action taken by his government was contrary to his personal convictions, he asserted his position as an indivdual, was true to his convictions and showed this by resigning from the cabinet, something that practically never happened in this country. I went on to say that what I believe constitutes one of the real difficulties of government in Canada is the slavish adherence in this house to parties. I said—and am afraid I cannot say it again—that I respected my colleagues in the House of Commons and that I believed if they were free individuals, free first to think, then to discuss and finally to vote on the merits of questions as they arose in this chamber, we would have very much better legislation than we now have and we would have avoided some of the great difficulties into which we have fallen. I still say that, and if the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), who has just spoken, means that in our speeches we must defend everything as it is, may I say that I do not intend to do so. It is a long time since I decided that the upper house was of very little use to Canada. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat may disagree with me. That is his business, but I do not propose he shall tell me what I shall think, and for the hon. member to try to link up, as he did quite definitely in his speech, those of us who go out to speak in school houses, churches and public halls, on the economic condition and the need of constitutional reform—radical and fundamental, but constitutional—with communists, that just brands him for the excellent Tory he is. We are not communists, and I may say that the heckling that we receive comes from the communists who hate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), myself and others associated with us more than they do anybody else, because we, by striving to bring about reforms constitutionally, stand between the communists and the violence they desire. The people who are aiding the communists most are the very ones who are afraid of them, and who will not consider any changes at all, but insist upon retaining such repressive measures as section 98 of the criminal code. They are the very ones who are helping, as I said in this house the other day, to bring about the thing they fear.

I am Canadian born, and I love Canada as much as any member who sits on the government side. My record of service in this country is as clean as that of any member in any part of this house, and I do not propose any longer to sit here and allow people to put into our mouths things that we have never said and attribute to us motives that we have never had. This business of continually trying to tie us up with Moscow is ridiculous; it is nonsense. It is a regular trick of the Conservative party. I remember when the Liberals were in power how the Conservatives were always saying that the fiscal policy of the Liberal government was dictated from Washington. Now if the financial policy of this government is not dictated by Wall street, New York, I should like to know who is dictating it. The Conservatives are always trying to tie up those opposed to them with dictation from some place outside of this country. I myself and the members of the United Farmers of Alberta and the Labour group in this house are Canadians. We are not tied up with Moscow, and never have been. We are taking no orders and no money from Moscow. May I say to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest that we are striving by constitutional methods, by the exercise of our intelligence, which thank God we possess—

Mr. MacNICOL: You will never get any money from me if you advocate that kind of stuff.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would not want your money.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then why mention it?

Miss MACPHAIL: I did not; I did not know the hon. member had any money. We are striving by the exercise of our intelligence to bring about by constitutional methods the very reforms that must come. You cannot stop reform. You can try. You can stupidly stand in the path of progress and do all you can to stop it, but all you can succeed in doing is to dam the thing back until it gets beyond control and then causes the very upheavals and difficulties which we all deplore and which none of us want. I hope we shall not again hear such statements as those made by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest. I have no objection to the government members and the Liberal members fighting us on the merits of any question, but to intimate, as the last speaker did all through his speech, that we are closely associated with communists in this country is simply laughable, and may I add that I think the hon. member is not doing himself or his party any good. The people of Canada know that the Conservative party has no corner on Canadianism, that it has no corner on loyalty to this country, that it has no corner on a desire to serve even though it means sacrifice, and it is about time the Conservative party realized that. They have waved the flag and prostituted patriotism as no other group in Canada ever has done—we have heard it until we are sick of it—and when the flag won't do they take the Bible and wrap their policies in both, hoping the people will then stomach them, and it is sometimes all they can do. We have listened to altogether too much of that sort of thing.

I am going next week-end to Toronto to address an audience in a school auditorium, having been invited by a man who has about ten letters after his name, whatever they stand for, and who is as good a citizen I presume as the member who has just sat down, and if you care to hear what I have to say, come if you want to. But do not quote a paper like the Mail and Empire, one of the most partisan papers in Toronto, and one that is now spending a great deal of money to try to increase its subscription list. I suppose as the number of Conservatives in the country declines, so do the subscriptions of the Mail and Empire.

I do not very often protest so heatedly, but this thing has gone so far that even respectable members of the house like the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) are getting up and seriously saying these things which men of their intelligence must know are not true. They are intelligent men; I will say that for them. Instead of abuse, why not meet the issue on its merits? I think that this game of misrepresentation has been played too long in Canada, and I do not think that it will deceive the people again. That is all I care to say at the moment.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but some of us back benchers have been so frequently charged with being afraid to get up and express our views that I feel I must say a few words in regard to section 98 of the criminal code.

I want to inform the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that it was my privilege last summer on the twelfth of July to introduce a resolution approving of section 98. I suppose I shall be condemned as a loyalist for having introduced it on the twelfth of July, but I do not apologize for that. The resolution was presented at a picnic attended by at least three thousand people in the constituency of Rosetown, and most of them were farmers. The resolution endorsed the action of the government in retaining section 98 of the criminal code, and recommended that under present circumstances the section should be retained. That resolution was passed unanimously, with not a dissentient voice, and as I said, a large proportion of the people present were farmers. We are passing through a severe depression, and it is necessary that we meet in an orderly and constitutional way, difficulties as they arise. I think that that is the attitude of the farmers not only of Rosetown constituency but of western Canada. I believe that if hon. members of the party in the far corner of the house would do a little more to help solve the problems of the farmers of western Canada and come to their relief instead of talking so much about the elimination of section 98 from the criminal code, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation might receive better support than it is getting. I am convinced that our friends in the far corner are doing themselves no good in western Canada.

I was in the court house at Kingston yesterday when four of the convicts from Portsmouth penitentiary were brought in for examination, and I notice that the Ottawa Journal of this evening has this to say:

> Three more convicts of Portsmouth penitentiary, making 18 in all who have been sent up for trial, were committed by Magistrate J. M. Farrell in county police court to-day. All are charged in connection with the penitentiary riots of last October.
> Further hearings were adjourned to-day until Monday. Prominent in the trio facing trial to-day was Albert Dorland, whose claim of being "framed" by Toronto police brought police commissioners from that city two weeks ago to interview him. Dorland is serving a five-year term for possession of firearms.

[Miss Macphail.]

> Murray Kirkland, who figured in a sensational bank robbery in North Toronto three years ago, when $10,000 was dropped by the bandits and recovered by a child, was the second committed.
> The third was Robert Spinks, sentenced in Sarnia in 1927 to a 20-year term for a serious offence.

The caretaker of the court house informed me that three of the men were born in Russia, and I presume from the names that it was these three Russians who were committed for trial.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) the other night, in addressing the house, said that if ever there was a time when we should retain section 98 in the criminal code, that time is now. As a member from western Canada I feel I am voicing accurately the sentiments of people in that part of Canada. It is alarming to me to hear some hon. members, and especially the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who unfortunately has left the chamber, state that some of the back benchers dare not say a word for themselves. Last fall we were subjected to the same criticism. We came to parliament last fall to ratify treaties, and some hon. members made an effort to economize and not to take up too much time in debate. That has been my attitude since my appearance in this House of Commons. I believe the pros and cons on each subject are placed fully before this chamber, and for that reason as a new member I hesitate to make lengthy statements. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must be familiar with the resolution passed last July 12, because I met him on the same ground a few years ago. When I tell him it was passed at Crystal Beach, Saskatchewan, he will be familiar with part of the country to which I refer.

I do not wish to take up much of the time of the house, but I should like to add that the people in my part of the country are behind the government one hundred per cent, and we contend that section 98 should remain in the criminal code. Of course we have our troubles in that section of the country. I could mention other things I should like to have done, but at a later point in the session I shall outline them. I could not help but resent the challenges of the hon. member for Southeast Grey when she referred to the loyalty of our people. I have always boasted that I was of Empire Loyalist stock. I am proud to think that there were people who had the courage to come into this country, cut away the bush, build shanties, and, as their next move, put up little churches. That fairly well describes the type of people who came out here, and it is characteristic still of the people of the west. I can only say that heredity must have something to do with the spirit of our people, and I could not sit in my seat in this House of Commons and hear criticism levelled at them of the kind that has been made to-day.

On December 28, a gentleman from Regina, a Mr. Coldwell, came to our constituency, and on that occasion he spoke in terms similar to those employed to-night by the hon. member for Southeast Grey. He intimated that last August he had occasion to travel through British Columbia, and that while his train was stopped at Banff he got out and ascended a certain hill. At that particular moment a short freight train was passing through a tunnel and as it emerged from the tunnel Mr. Coldwell counted 206 transients riding on it. When he had completed his remarks I got on the platform and asked this question: "Would you believe, sir, that those 206 men, or most of them, had probably got on that train before the harvest started; in other words, that they wanted to get out of our country before the work started?" I told him to go on to Rosetown and he would learn from the people of that place that when the harvest started men had jumped on a freight train and migrated to British Columbia. I am not suggesting that all labouring men are of that type, but I do want to say in all fairness that I cannot believe that labour and farmers can harmonize; they cannot do it.

Some years ago I employed some men on my farm who sat in their tents at nights and sang hymns out of red-backed hymn books. I would pass by their tents after the day's work was over, and after I as their employer had done as big a day's work as any of them. I would hear them saying in effect: "Isn't that farmer an awful fool?"—calling me by name —"Isn't he eager to get rich? Look at the way he works his wife to feed us." Then they would say: "Some day everything will be equal; we will all get the same. Some day we will visit his farm and take away his pigs and his steers." At that time I was paying some of those men as high as $7 a day. What happened? I was forced to buy combines because their wages were so high. I can remember one occasion when some of the men I had hired put a coil of soft wire in a stook, undoubtedly for the purpose of ruining some of my machinery.

Some such men are still travelling up and down this country on trains. Even to-day they try to hold us up for $5 a day when we are receiving only 25 cents a bushel for our wheat. I want hon. members to realize I am in sympathy with the labouring man. I know labourers are not all of the type I have described, but there is a certain element which would like very much to rule the country, and their attitude has been apparent for some years.

May I say again that while I have not spoken on many occasions in the house, certainly nobody has been restricting me. In this particular I believe I am speaking the minds of all back benchers. I am not anxious to have my name in Hansard; I am not looking for publicity. The people of my constituency were good enough to elect me to this House of Commons, and I am not worried about the future. I will stick to the people of Rosetown constituency who still have faith in me, whether or not I have my name in Hansard every day, or frequently take up several hours of the time of the house.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am not greatly interested in comic opera revolutionaries or would-be comic opera dictators. I intend to present what I consider to be a purely trade unionist viewpoint concerning the bill before this house. By heritage and conviction I am a trade unionist. Since my return from the war I have attended most of the conventions of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Without equivocation I wish to state clearly that I am absolutely opposed to the philosophy and tactics of communism. I believe I can agree with some hon. members when they state that communism is absolutely foreign to the mental make-up of Canadians and the Anglo-Saxon people. I have always taken the stand that no person has a right to enter this or any other country where democratic institutions exist and preach the forceful overthrow of those institutions. It is pure logic that those democratic institutions should protect themselves, and I believe my views in this connection cannot well be controverted.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). It is my view that the present government is responsible more than any other force for the existence of the communist party in Canada. I make this statement because of my practical experience, and because of my knowledge of the methods used by the communist party in Canada in their effort to destroy the trade union movement. Men active in the labour movement have possibly received more criticism, I suppose, than the members of the government from that direction. They call us labour fakers and apply to us all the adjectives they so commonly use in respect to the responsible labour leaders not only in this country but in every country where the communist organization functions. I want to point out, in a very practical way, that the position taken by the government in declaring the communist party an unlawful organization has driven it underground; they have a different name almost every week for their different local organizations, and in my judgment this supports the contention of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that in the final analysis the best attitude to adopt is absolute freedom of speech. I say that from my own practical observation. Last May day in Hamilton these chaps wanted to hold a meeting in one of the large parks. They were refused permission. Everyone was on hand to see the fun; there were about fifteen thousand people. The firemen turned out and laid the hose in case of emergency. Someone threw a brick at one of the firemen; the water started, and the fire and police departments made enemies of those innocent bystanders.

Not so long ago when I was in Detroit I saw an anarchist holding forth in what I think they call the grand circus there. He was raising cain about everything in general—the mayor of the city, the responsible government officials in the state and federal assemblies. About a thousand people were listening. So I say, as a result of my practical experience in contact with different individuals representing various viewpoints both on the left and the right in the labour movement of this country, that it is far better to have complete freedom of speech. Apart from the principle I think it is the most practical thing to do.

We of the trade union movement have taken the attitude that we are not interested in the expression of opinion or even the guarantees of members of parliament in this regard. They are not the ones who sit and interpret the law. We cannot rest content even with a guarantee from the Minister of Justice. Arising out of our struggle for existence, almost within the lifetime of some in this chamber men were deported simply for belonging to a trade union. The trade union movement has gone through a continuous struggle to maintain its existence as an instrument in the upbuilding of the social status of the great bulk of the working people that make up the industrial life of this country and of Great Britain where the movement had its inception.

The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) quoted from the record of the Trades and Labour Congress at its last convention in the city of Hamilton. A resolution passed by that body called for the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code. I was a member of a delegation which on January 27, in this city presented a brief through Mr. Moore, the president of the congress, stating that in their opinion section 98 of the criminal code is too wide in its application and unduly restricts freedom of speech. In 1920 the congress was so alarmed at the implications of this section that they went to the trouble of getting legal opinion. That position was unanimously adopted by the congress in session in Windsor, Ontario, on September 30, 1920. I would like to read this into the record, because it gives clearly the attitude of the responsible trade union movement of this country towards this particular section. It says:

As to conspiracy itself, Wright in his book on Criminal Conspiracies, says: "No intelligible definition of conspiracy has yet been established." The Hon. Edward Blake, in 1890, while discussing, in the House of Commons, the subject of the protection of trade unions from prosecution as conspiracies in restraint of trade, called it the "obnoxious law of conspiracy."

A conspiracy is an agreement to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act in an unlawful way.

Before closing the subject, I should direct your attention to the amendments of 1919. I have already referred to the repeal of the provision declaring what was not to be deemed seditious. There has been added a section (97b) as follows:

"Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, sells, or offers for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind, in which is taught, advocated, advised or defended, or who shall in any manner teach, advocate, or advise or defend the use, without authority of law, or force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threat of such injury, as a means of accomplishing any governmental, industrial or economic change, or otherwise, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years."

Further subsections deal with the circulation of such enumerated documents by mail and with the importation of them. While the word "seditious" does not appear in the section, the side note reads: "publishing, etc., seditious books, etc."

The penalty for speaking seditious words was, under section 134, limited to two years. The two years limitation has been done away with and the imprisonment may now be as high as twenty years.

I add, also, the new section with respect to "unlawful association."

"Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association."

Provision is then made for seizing the property of unlawful associations and for prosecuting its officers and members, and punishment is provided for wearing its badges etc.

The attention of the congress should be directed to the words "force" and "terrorism," in the above sections, coupled as they are with the words "industrial or economic change."

The use of these words leaves the door wide open for the prosecution of every trade union in Canada. If "force" is intended to mean "physical force" it should be so stated.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: The business of the house to-morrow will be the items on the order paper, and supply, national defence, agriculture, railways, justice and trade and commerce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the votes and proceedings of February 15 there is an item at the bottom of page 227 under the heading "Erratum", with regard to adjustment of war claims. This item carried in committee on the fourteenth. My recollection is that in the course of discussion on the item I asked the Minister of National Defence where we could get the information we desired with respect to an appropriation of $500,000 in the previous year which was not to be renewed. The minister replied that we could obtain it from the Secretary of State when we came to his estimates, but there is no place in the estimates of the Secretary of State, so far as I can see, where we could bring up that item. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it can be understood that we may return to that item for the purpose of getting any information we wish if we allow this matter to go as having been passed. Otherwise we shall have to get the information in some other way.

Mr. BENNETT: I was in the chamber when the incident to which the right hon. gentleman refers took place. and I recall the reply of the Minister of National Defence to the question asked by the right hon. gentleman. It is true that the Minister of National Defence would not be in a position to deal with the particulars of that item, which would fall within the duties of the Secretary of State. If it will suit the convenience of the right hon. gentleman I will arrange that when the estimates of the Secretary of State are under consideration this item will be discussed. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wished to make sure that we would have that opportunity, because I could not find any place where this matter could be taken up under the estimates of the Secretary of State.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 17, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

BRIGHT FAN INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I understand that the investigation into the sinking or scuttling of the British freighter Bright Fan in northern waters has been completed by the British Board of Trade. Has the report of this inquiry been received, and if so, when will it be tabled?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): So far as I know, the report has not been received and so far as I am aware there is no obligation to table the report of another government; that can be done only with their permission.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The other day I asked the Prime Minister whether the agenda of the World Economic conference was available. He said that copies had been published by the League of Nations. Is it possible for members of the house to secure copies of the agenda and further, will the house be given an opportunity of discussing it during the present session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I explained to the hon. gentleman the other day that a draft copy, published by the League of Nations, of the proposed World Economic and Monetary conference, had been received, but that there were not sufficient copies for distribution purposes. As far as discussing the contents of the agenda is concerned, the agenda was decided upon by the representatives set up by the League of Nations and at the moment I do not know of any reason that it should be discussed. I shall give further consideration to the matter, but I had not thought there would be any discussion of that agenda.

WESTERN FREIGHT RATES

REDUCTION OF DOMESTIC RATES ON GRAIN AND GRAIN PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways. The other day, in speaking on the question of freight rates, he intimated to the house that a suggestion had been made by the railways to the western provinces whereby the domestic rate would be reduced 50 per cent of the differential between domestic and export rates. My question is this: Is the rate in effect now, or are the railways awaiting a reply from the Minister of Railways as to whether this suggestion meets with the approval of the provinces?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The rate is not in effect now. The submission has been put by me to the four western provinces and I have received from two of them acceptances of the proposition. This morning I sent telegrams to the other two telling them I had already received acceptances from the others concerned and asking them to hurry their replies. As soon as I receive the replies of the other two western provinces, I shall immediately take proper steps to have those rates put into effect, but I cannot move until an acceptance has come from at least one and preferably both of the other two western provinces. I think it would be better to wait for all the replies.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Before the Christmas recess the Prime Minister was good enough to make a statement about the policy of unemployment insurance. Can he give any information on it now?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman, with his wide experience, knows, I think, how idle it would be to ask, without notice, for a statement on a matter of that kind.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

PROPOSED EXCHANGE OF CANADIAN CATTLE AND OTHER COMMODITIES FOR RUSSIAN PETROLEUM AND OIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I was not in the house when the order for motions was called. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he tabled the correspondence he said he would table?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The correspondence asked for in the motion is one dealing with different departments and such correspondence is tabled by the Secretary of State.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask the Secretary of State when we may expect it? I notice the Prime Minister stated last night that we might take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: So we shall.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would like to have the correspondence before that is done.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution was adopted the other day after it had been pointed out that what was involved would necessitate the transcription of, I fancy, at least 100 messages that have gone to various departments. In accordance with the system that has been observed in this country the practice is for the Secretary of State's office to send a copy of the resolution to each department. The departments then send to the Secretary of State copies of the documents and then the Secretary of State presents the return. The other day I pointed out that had the resolution been limited to the correspondence that took place with the Department of Agriculture, the return was ready to be made. Notwithstanding the fact that this would be only a partial return, perhaps the best course to pursue would be to table copies of that correspondence so far as it goes. The rest of it is purely informal, I would think, consisting of telegrams sent by people who did not know anything about the matter but who had read something about it in the papers and had been asked to send telegrams. The tabling of these messages will not help beyond showing that there were ten, twelve or fifteen telegrams received. I shall endeavour to see that the correspondence with the Department of Agriculture is tabled without delay. If it is ready now, I shall try to see that it is tabled before this evening.

GRADING OF HAY AND STRAW

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, respecting the inspection and grading of hay and straw.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Before the second reading passes, I should like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker. It will be noticed that this bill makes a distinct change in policy. In the previous bill the regulations regarding hay and straw were in the bill itself. It is now proposed to put into the hands of the minister power to make regulations. I see no occasion for that. It is just another case of which we have seen so many examples in the last ten years, of taking power away from parliament and putting it into the hands of a department, no matter how able its officials may be. I have very great respect indeed for the officials of the Department of Agriculture, but I have noticed over a period of years one peculiarity in their point of view, and that is that they adopt the policy of making the penalties very extreme for any infraction of the rules and regulations which they make. They appear to go on the principle of the Turkish sultan who made it his boast that, when he found a baker selling bread of short weight, he ordered him put into his oven and baked, and he claimed that that stopped that particular crime. But that is not the method we adopt in more civilized countries. But there is this tendency by the officials of the Department of Agriculture to make the penalties for any infraction of their rules and regulations very severe, and for that reason I should like to see the regulations framed by the house and not by officials only.

I also notice that the explanatory note, in setting out why this legislation should be passed, says that the grade standards for hay that were serviceable twenty-five years ago when the principal demand for baled hay was for the feeding of horses in cities need to be revised. I would point out that it is not twenty-five years ago; it dates back only to 1918, when the present grade standards for hay were established. The act was amended and thoroughly revised, and the present grades were established in 1918. Now 1918 is a good deal nearer than twenty-five years ago, and I think we might expect a little more accuracy in the explanatory note.

The explanatory note also says that baled hay was principally used up to that time for the feeding of horses. Well, they are not going to feed motor cars with baled hay even now, and I suppose that if it was good to arrange a grade of hay for feeding horses in 1918, the relationship between hay and horses is very much the same even now.

Take one of the present grades:

Prime timothy shall be pure timothy, perfect in colour, sound and well cured.

That was the grade established in 1918, and is there anything wrong with that now? Has anything happened in the last fifteen years, not twenty-five, to require a change in that grade?

The minister also takes power under paragraph (c) of section 3 to prescribe the places where, and the conditions under which, hay and straw shall be inspected. Suppose I am baling my hay and straw and that I am getting a horribly low price, and I discover that it has to be inspected at a point fifteen miles away from my home or where I am baling it. That would be a very serious handicap to my doing business.

The explanatory note also says that there have been urgent requests for the repeal of the existing grades. I should like to hear where those urgent requests came from. In these days when it is so difficult to do business at all, and more difficult still to do it at even a minimum of profit, we should mark time for a while rather than introduce new regulations which, however desirable in themselves from the point of view of an official, are calculated to hinder business. Let the wretched farmer, if he can, get a sale for his baled hay and straw, and sell it under the conditions which have been in effect for the last fifteen years. I would ask the minister—I suppose he cannot speak now—to take notice of my suggestion that these regulations should be passed by the house and not be left to the officials.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): The information given the house thus far by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has been very meagre, and I trust that before the bill passes he will amplify it somewhat.

This bill, or a somewhat modified one, should have been passed many years ago in Canada. One was introduced in 1928 or 1929, but a very much different bill, and it was opposed so strenuously by both wings of the then opposition that it was let die on the order paper. Just previous to that, a good many bills of a similar nature providing for the standardization and grading of farm products had been introduced by the then government, but the house seemed to think that we were going too rapidly in that direction. I am afraid that some of my colleagues thought the same, because they were quite satisfied to let the bill go by default, and I think maybe they were right because we were going perhaps a little rapidly. But I am glad to see that the minister is following in our footsteps, in that respect somewhat hesitantly, but nevertheless following.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has pointed out, this is rather an arbitrary bill, and it may seem strange that I am rather disposed to approve of it, but the bill must first be modified by explanations or otherwise in order to remove its arbitrary nature. I hope the minister in his explanation will be able to satisfy the house on that point.

We have some five or six provinces which are concerned in the selling of hay, the maritimes, Quebec, parts at least of Ontario, part of Alberta, and there is a little selling in British Columbia, and then there are two other provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan which are concerned in the buying of hay. All these provinces either as sellers or buyers are interested in the grades of hay, and I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he follow the example of the government of 1906, not a bad one to follow in many respects, and consult with the provincial Ministers of Agriculture in the various provinces, whether they sell hay or not, and get their views on any new classification of hay, before being adopted by the minister. I remember that in 1906 the new grades were submitted to the Department of Agriculture in Saskatchewan, and because we were consulted we got more loyally behind the bill.

It is a very naked bill that is before us, consisting of only three sections, and a fourth section repealing the old law. It is both naked and arbitrary, and I trust that the minister will give some explanation that will satisfy us before this bill is given its second reading. Then when it goes to the committee on agriculture we shall be able to make any modifications that are thought desirable. I am not going to oppose the second reading now because of the arbitrary nature of this bill because I think that the advice which the Ministers of Agriculture of the various provinces are in a position to give will give the minister all the direction necessary and enable us to get through a simple bill which can be modified from time to time as circumstances require, and which will also avoid the necessity of bringing these grading bills too frequently before this house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. A. R. LAVERGNE (Montmagny): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the principle of the bill, but I am afraid when it reaches the committee stage it will have to be amended. A part of clause (2) in the bill reads:

> . . . the Exchequer court shall not have jurisdiction to entertain any action heretofore or hereafter commenced for the recovery of any sum of money paid to His Majesty voluntarily in mistake of law, if the recovery of such money might not in England be the subject of a suit or action against the crown.

This would seem to put the province of Quebec under the English common law, and when the bill comes to the committee stage I think there should be an amendment so far as the civil code of the province of Quebec is concerned.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be better to go into committee and have the explanations at that time, because I must say I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). I should like to hear some explanation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Payments made voluntarily to His Majesty in mistake of law.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, as is well known the Exchequer Court of Canada was founded by a statute which is now chapter 34 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. The jurisdiction of that court is expressed in section 18 of the act as follows:

> 18. The Exchequer court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases in which demand is made or relief sought in respect of any matter which might, in England, be subject of a suit or action against the crown, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases in which the land, goods or money of the subject are in the possession of the crown, or in which the claim arises out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the crown.

Then section 19 sets out a specific number of cases in which the court shall have jurisdiction. As shown in section 18, the Exchequer court is founded on the law of England and, as is well known, it is a court established by federal authority and has jurisdiction throughout all parts of Canada; irrespective of provinces. The only limitation in regard to the act, so far as I am aware, is the limitation contained in section 32 which prescribes that the statutes of limitations in effect in the various provinces shall have application to all suits pending before the Exchequer court. That is the only limitation.

It so happens that from time to time claims arise against the crown for the return of moneys which have been paid under mistake of law. Sometimes when claims are made in respect of taxes, customs dues or the like, and where litigation ensues or is threatened, the parties compromise their claims and payment is made on the basis of compromise with the government of Canada. It has happened that in respect of some claims which have been so paid, subsequently by a decision of a superior court in Canada or by a decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council, the law under which the money has been paid has been declared to be ultra vires of this parliament. Claims then immediately arise from the parties who have paid the money claiming recovery back of the amounts they have so paid. It is a well known principle of British law that when money is paid in settlement of a claim or of a litigated matter, when there has been no fraud or no threat of any kind made, the money cannot be recovered back. It is a further principle of British law that money paid under a mistake of law cannot be recovered. The theory is that the parties were at arms length, and were advised by their friends or solicitors, that they compromised and that settlement was made. If money has been so paid under a law which subsequently has been declared to be ultra vires, or an improper law, that money cannot be recovered back.

The object of this amendment is to declare that in Canada, in actions or proceedings before the exchequer court, that common principle of British law shall apply throughout all parts of Canada, and that the law in that respect shall be general throughout the length and breadth of Canada. The effect would be that in all matters which come within the jurisdiction of the exchequer court no party will be able to set up a claim in that court that he should get his money back because he paid it under a mistake of law. That is the proposal contained in the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have not had time to consider this bill, which was introduced only two days ago, because in my view it is very important. If I followed the explanations of the minister it would appear that this bill would not be necessary were it not for the law of the province of Quebec. After all, the Exchequer court is given jurisdiction in matters between the crown and the subjects, but it has to apply the laws of the various provinces. In the province of Quebec we have what is called repétition de l'indû, or recovery of money paid under mistake. The proposed legislation would take away jurisdiction from the Exchequer court, and in a roundabout way apply to the province of Quebec the principle of the common law which, under the laws of the province is not applied. I would ask my hon. friend to let the matter stand in order to give me and other members opportunity to consider the question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will be very glad indeed to let the matter stand. But before the committee rises I think I might point out that this proposal does not come in any way in conflict with the law of the province of Quebec within that province. There are provisions in the Quebec code under which money can be recovered when paid under mistake of law, and no one for a moment proposes to disturb that provision within the province of Quebec. But the Exchequer court is a federal court applicable to all parts of the Dominion of Canada. It is not intended in any way to disturb the operation of the law of the province of Quebec as applicable to residents of that province or to any matter which arises in that province.

However, I see that the point taken is of sufficient importance and intricacy to require some study. I would move therefore that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30 to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister explain?

Mr. RYCKMAN: This bill deals only with procedure or administration. The explanation of the first section is fully stated in the explanatory note. It has been found that by reason of this phrase "value for duty" not being explained and applied there is a failure under section 217 of the Customs Act. That section provides:

> Where the goods so harboured, kept, concealed, purchased, sold or exchanged are of the value of two hundred dollars, or over, such person shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a term of imprisonment—

The point taken, and I think, well taken, is this, that while this subsection 3 deals with value for duty, the magistrate before whom a smuggler comes, in cases of liquor, if it is specific duty say of $7 a gallon, says that there is no value for duty. That is a specific duty. Therefore the smuggler goes free; his defence is good. We desire therefore to define "value for duty" as it occurs in this act. I may say that the same definition of "value for duty" appears in section 85 of the Special War Revenue Act, which says:

(b) "duty paid value" shall mean the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of such article into Canada under the laws relating to the customs and the customs tariff whether such article be in fact subject to ad valorem or other duty or not, and in addition the amount of the custom duties, if any, payable thereon;

So, as hon. gentlemen will see, this is just a simple amendment to clarify the law and make those answerable to it who should properly be answerable.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did the minister state that under the existing provisions of the act it was impossible to collect duty on an article, assuming it to be liquor, if the value is not over $200?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Evidently I have not made myself understood. Where one harbours or conceals or keeps goods contrary to the provisions of the Customs Act there is a penalty involved. No one cavils at the penalty, the point is that it refers to value for duty, and when the question of value for duty comes before the magistrate he says there is no value for duty when there is a specific duty.

Mr. POWER: Would the $200 enter in at all?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Not at all. No matter what the penalty is, it is a case of the smuggler going free because it has been held that unless "value for duty" is defined as we have it here or in some similar way, there is no value for duty; therefore, there can be no offence.

Mr. POWER: Are not the penalties higher if the goods are of a value of $200 or over?

Mr. RYCKMAN: This section deals with goods of the value of $200 or over. The penalty is less when the value is less than $200. But it is not a question of the value of the goods that comes into consideration now.

Mr. POWER: But would not the paragraph have the effect of bringing goods of a value of less than $200 under certain specific penalties?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, I do not think so. I think this clause, which as I say is the same as we already have in our Special War Revenue Act, would define "value for duty" the ad valorem value of the article would be taken into consideration. Some of us have an idea of what the ad valorem value of spirits may be, and I must freely admit that in determining the value under section 217 of chapter 42 that would be taken into consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister read subsection 3 of section 217?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will be glad to, but for the sake of a clearer explanation perhaps I had better read subsections 1 and 2 as well. Subsection 1 is as follows:

If any person, whether the owner or not, without lawful excuse, the proof of which shall be on the person accused, harbours, keeps, conceals, purchases, sells or exchanges any goods unlawfully imported into Canada, whether such goods are dutiable or not, or whereon the duties lawfully payable have not been paid, such goods, if found, shall be seized and forfeited without power of remission, and, if such goods are not found, the person so offending shall forfeit the value thereof without power of remission.

Subsection 2 reads:

Every such person shall, in addition to any other penalty forfeit a sum equal to the value of such goods, which may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction, and shall further be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Subsection 3 reads:

Where the goods so harboured, kept, concealed, purchased, sold or exchanged are of the value of two hundred dollars, or over, such person shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a term of imprisonment. . . .

As both lawyers and laymen, I think, will appreciate, the point is that it has been held that under subsection 3 of section 217 there is no value for duty when it is a specific duty. We want to correct that omission in the interests of the administration of the law. I hope this is an understandable presentation of the case.

Mr. POWER: As yet I have been unable to get the point of view of the minister. I did understand that paragraph 3 indicated that there were higher penalties for the harbouring of goods valued at over $200 than there were for harbouring goods valued at less than $200, but I do not know that the crown will improve its position by adding this definition of value for duty. The proposed section reads:

"Value for duty" means the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of such article into Canada under the laws relating to the customs and the customs tariff, whether such article be in fact subject to ad valorem or other duty or not.

Does that mean the customs collector for that port would be called in by the prosecution in order to establish what would be the duty?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would understand it to mean that the customs appraiser would value the article in question just as it would be valued if there were an ad valorem duty payable.

Mr. POWER: The minister would not consider repealing that section altogether, would he?

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister really think it is desirable, in fixing the penalty for a criminal offence, to make it depend upon the uncertainties of assessment by the customs appraiser? No one wants to protect an offender, but it seems to me that the offender at least ought to have some sort of notice of what offence he is committing and the penalty to which he may be liable. If you use as the test of whether a man is liable to the lesser or the greater penalty the value for duty as it may be fixed by the customs appraiser under the various sections of the customs act, then it seems to me you have not been quite fair to the criminal, because he does not know and cannot tell what the penalty is. He never will know, and the court will not know until somebody comes to the witness stand, takes the book and says that for the purposes of duty the goods would be appraised at a certain figure, perhaps two or three times their real value. Would it not be satisfactory so far as the minister is concerned, and so far as the enforcement of the act is concerned, to adopt the same test that is adopted in subsections 1 and 2, namely the value of the goods? Then there is no trouble; anyone ought to know the value of the goods being harboured or kept, but if you adopt the uncertain test of the value for duty I do not think you are carrying out the principles which generally surround both the specification and the administration of criminal law, namely that there should be some certainty about it.

I wonder what is the objection of the minister, or if there really is any objection, to using the word "value" instead. I quite appreciate that "value for duty" has been in the act before, but while the minister is amending the act, and in view of the increased powers which have been given to fix arbitrary values, I would suggest that now is the time to let the value of the goods determine what penalty shall be imposed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I may say to my hon. friend that the question he has raised really does not seem to be a proper one in view of what is proposed. This amendment is not suggested for the purpose of influencing or affecting in any way any penalty whatever. It is brought forward without regard to what the penalty may be. My hon. friend will find that the word "value" is defined in the interpretation section of the Customs Act.

Mr. RALSTON: Just the word "value" alone.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, and these words "value" and "value for duty" as hon. members know have a difference in signification. I merely ask that a man bringing in silks, for instance, on which there is an ad valorem duty, shall not be subject to these penalties while a man who brings in liquor, to refer to the commodity I mentioned before, gets off because there is a specific duty on that article. We want to put everyone on the same footing, and there is nothing in the suggested amendment except equal treatment for all. It will be seen from the interpretation we place on "value for duty" that it is the actual value of the article, which should be known by the importer.

Mr. RALSTON: Not the actual value.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I quote from the amendment:

> "Value for duty" means the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty.

It seems to me there can be no objection to that when our customs tariff has both ad valorem and specific duties. If a man is found harbouring and concealing goods to cheat the customs, in the one case he would be subject to a penalty and not in the other because of the technical interpretation made by magistrates as to the value for duty. That is what we wish to correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the minister understands what I am suggesting. I am saying that there should be absolute equality with regard to goods upon which an ad valorem duty is imposed and those upon which a specific duty is imposed. That equality can be effected by making the value of the goods the value for duty proposes in order to decide as to whether the greater or lesser penalty should be imposed. The minister might have a prosecution against a certain man for harbouring goods. How is he going to know whether or not that is an indictable offence until the customs appraiser steps into the stand and states that if the goods had been subject to an ad valorem duty he would have valued them at so much.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is unfair for my hon. friend to state the case in that way.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not intend to be unfair.

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend says that the value would not be known until the appraiser stepped into the box, but that is not the case. In order for a man to get his goods he would have to come before a customs officer, the man would be treated the same way in the one case as in the other. The man would not be brought into court without knowing what he is charged with.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister misses the point. If a man was charged with harbouring goods that had been imported unlawfully, those goods would not have passed through the customs. There would be no appraisement made by a customs officer and the magistrate or the prosecuting officer would not know whether to lay the charge as an indictable or summary offence. The customs officer would have to be called to fix the value. The governor in council has power to impose all sorts of arbitrary values and a man may be charged with a more serious offence if the customs appraiser decides that the goods in question shall be valued at so much for duty purposes. When a man harbours silks or other similar goods he knows what the value is; if they are worth more than $200 he knows that he will be liable to the greater penalty. However, in the case of many other commodities he might be liable only to the lesser penalty. I am suggesting that it should be made equitable all round, it should be the same in this subsection as it is in subsections 1 and 2.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If what my hon. friend states is an injustice, it has existed in every case where an ad valorem duty is applied. I have never heard of it having worked unfairly and no complaints have been made against it. We are simply putting the two men upon the same footing and not making it subject to a magistrate's interpretation of the value for duty. Everyone who is familiar with the workings of the Customs Act knows that there is a right of appeal. If one is bent upon asserting his rights he has abundant opportunity to do so. We are simply trying to place those guilty of infractions of the law upon the same footing as far as ad valorem and specific duties are concerned.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) is not in the chamber as he might recall with me that at the time this act was passed there was a somewhat bitter controversy in the house. It was contended that this was too arbitrary a power to place in the hands of the customs department, and that we had not really met the distinction between commercial smuggling and the ordinary petty smuggling which goes on over the border every day where people who have entered the United States come back with a pair of silk stockings or two or three packages of cigarettes. As I recall it, the debate at that time lasted through two or three sittings of the house. As the hon. member for Waterloo is not present, perhaps I should not refer to the fact that the bill was finally passed on a Friday night when most of the members who had opposed it were away. At that time an arbitrary power was given to the customs department; that was bad, but this is far worse. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has pointed out, it would be impossible to know the value of the goods being harboured or smuggled until such time as a customs officer came into the box and stated that the particular merchandise was worth so much. In many cases he might not know himself until he had consulted with the higher officials of the department. If the articles harboured, hidden or smuggled were not articles usually imported in the ordinary course of business, I have not the slightest doubt but that the customs officer would have to apply to the commissioner of customs to find out what value had been placed upon them for duty purposes. I submit to the minister that it would be in the interests of the crown itself in avoiding expense in the prosecutions, and it would certainly be fairer to everyone if he would say that the value to be taken into consideration in the prosecution shall be the real value of the article. He does not require the other sections of the Customs Act for the purposes of prosecution.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Let me interrupt for a moment. That is exactly what this amendment proposes. The subsection reads:

> "Value for duty" means the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of such article into Canada under the laws relating to the customs and customs tariff, whether such article be in fact subject to ad valorem or other duty or not.

Mr. POWER: "Under the laws relating to the customs and customs tariff." The laws relating to the customs and customs tariff provide that there may be an arbitrary valuation for duty purposes, a valuation which cannot possibly be known to the person accused of this offence.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I submit that the section absolutely excludes an arbitrary value.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend suggested that I was unfair; I do not think that that statement is quite fair. The section reads:

"Value for duty" means the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of such article into Canada—

Mr. RYCKMAN: We want to put them both upon the same footing.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend suggests that that means the actual value. I think I could ask any importer to step into the witness box to deny that the value for duty purposes is the actual value of the goods, and particularly the value for duty as it would be determined. There have to be two presumptions; there has to be the presumption that the goods are subject to an ad valorem duty, which they are not, and there has to be the presumption that they are worth a certain amount which the appraiser is going to fix, which they are not. That is the sort of thing upon which the prosecution, the conviction and the punishment is going to be based. My hon. friend says that this has been done in the past; it is quite true that it was done in the past but at that time the value for duty meant the fair market value and only in the case of manufactured goods, under a special provision, was there any permission to make an arbitrary value. That has all gone by the board in the legislation of the last three years, and now my hon. friend and his officials have a right to fix any value under the sun—

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: —and to call that the value for duty purposes. My hon. friend proposes to rest a criminal prosecution and punishment on that. I cannot see, and with all due deference to him I do not think he can see any reason that the real value of the goods should not be the test whether the increased penalty should be imposed. That would be putting the section squarely in line with the two previous ones, and he would not then be permitting an arbitrary prosecution based on an arbitrary price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a question of value in each case?

Mr. RALSTON: No, a question of guess.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The only objection I take is that if the act is not to be amended for the honest importer, then we shall be giving a preference to the man who is trying to evade the law.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Let us take this case. How much is a gallon of alcohol worth? For ready reckoning, let us call it fifty cents. The value of that alcohol, after it is free of customs, is much more than that. The tax which we impose is $7 a gallon. Supposing there were twenty gallons; that would mean $140 in value of duty. But if the actual value is to be taken, then you would find our friends asking that fifty cents should be used and the total would be $10. Everyone knows twenty gallons of spirits, if it is potable, is worth more than $10, and thus one can see the justice in appraising the value of the article.

There has been no trouble in the administration of this section. What the hon. member for Quebec South says is true, not however, with regard to section 217. As far as I understand the matter, there was no complaint made against this section. I think I may fairly put it in this way: as one offender comes under the law and another, on account of a technicality, does not, would it not be proper to make the law cover all actual offences, putting one man on the same footing as another? That is what we are trying to do. We have a value for duty in terms of the Special War Revenue Act. This is just to make the law fairly applicable.

Mr. YOUNG: We know in the last few years powers have been given to the minister to fix on goods coming into Canada any value he likes, regardless entirely of what the goods are actually worth. We know, if a man is found with goods in his possession of the actual value of $100, that have been imported without paying duty, that man is liable to a certain penalty. We know if he is found with goods of the value of $200 on which duty has not been paid, he is liable to a much heavier penalty. The provision of this clause, as I understand it, will put in the hands of the minister's officials power to value these goods so that the duty to be paid will be higher and the man will suffer a greater penalty. He may be in possession of goods of the actual value of $100, but the customs official can go into court and say: I value those goods at $200, and in that way the penalty will be much heavier.

Mr. RYCKMAN: He cannot do that.

Mr. YOUNG: That is the law as I understand it. There are lawyers in the house who will put the same interpretation on it. If it is not so, will the minister so state definitely?

Mr. RYCKMAN: What my hon. friend has said about the law and the facility with which customs appraisers can act, is altogether incorrect.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will my hon. friend state, as a fact with respect to goods imported honestly and fairly, on which duty has been paid, that a customs appraiser cannot, on instructions and under powers vested in the minister, put any value he likes on those goods?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will state positively that he cannot do so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are unfortunately many people who have paid duties who say otherwise.

Mr. RYCKMAN: They have not paid duty on any value, no matter what it might be, that the minister cared to fix.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the sort of stuff hon. members opposite have broadcast through the country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all. I am not prepared to stand for that. I am ready to bring the evidence before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Bring it in.

Mr. VALLANCE: Let me put a concrete case. The Prime Minister announced, during the time we were putting through the Economic conference agreements—

Mr. BENNETT: The opposition were not putting them through; they opposed them.

Mr. VALLANCE: The right hon. gentleman mentioned wire; he said that wire was coming from Holland at a certain price and that it was not allowed to come into Canada at the price suggested. The Minister of National Revenue being vested with the right, for duty purposes placed an arbitrary value on barbed wire. Is that so?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: What did the hon. gentleman do?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Exercised his intelligence. That is all.

Mr. VALLANCE: How did he keep out the wire?

Mr. RYCKMAN: What was found was this, that a German concern which was manufacturing barbed wire, was shipping it to be barbed in Holland because barbed wire was not in common use there, in order that it might in a country where there was no real market, establish a price which was a dumping and unfair price. It was shown that in Germany where this company had their home, they were charging more for barbed wire. It was shown that in Belgium, lying just alongside, they charged less for it, but they went to Holland where barbed wire was not in extensive use and when called upon to say how much was used there, they said 6,500 tons. It turned out that part of that was re-exported from the country. They were trying to establish a price to ruin anyone engaged in the business in Canada, and under section 36, not by action immediately of the minister, a value was fixed for barbed wire. What would have been the result if this barbed wire which it was proposed to distribute here, had been allowed to enter Canada? There would have been no chance of doing business in this country by the companies already here and the result would have been that later people would have paid through the nose, prices they never paid before, for barbed wire.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the same principle apply, as regards the valuation for duty purposes, to all articles? Under the old dumping act, if anyone attempted to sell goods cheaper in Canada than in the country of origin, the dumping duty applied. Will the minister say whether the same principle applies in regard to the valuation of goods coming into Canada to-day?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I shall say that dumping does not in any sense apply in the consideration of the amendment now before us. If my hon. friend desires me to answer any question arising out of his own knowledge of any particular subject, I should be glad to sit down with him and discuss it, and I am sure that he will find that there is no enlarged power taken of fixation. It is already provided under section 36 of the Customs Act what action shall be taken by the department itself, irrespective of the minister or the government, and such action is taken in the ordinary routine of the department. Yet members rise in the house and tell us that there has been some fixation by the minister of outlandish prices. I can only stress as emphatically as I can that such is not the case.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I say one word in answer to my hon. friend from South Battleford? The question of valuation was always predicated upon what was described as fair market value in the country of origin; that is, the price that would be paid in normal trading transactions for the commodity in question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Except there is a distress market.

Mr. BENNETT: I said fair market value. Distress market has nothing to do with it; I am leaving that out altogether. The difficulty arose because the surplus product of foreign manufactures was thrown upon the Canadian and other markets at prices which were less than the fair market value. If any of the members of the committee are disposed to read the speech that Mr. Fielding made upon the matter when section 43 was introduced into our statutes by the late Senator Bureau, they will realize just what the difficulties in this country were. The fair market value became almost impossible to determine for many, many reasons, and we had what was called a dumping duty, but that was found to be wholly inadequate to meet the situation, and the extraordinary provision of the act of 1930-31—

Mr. YOUNG: Extraordinary is a good word.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, to save the industrial structure of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: And ruin its farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not. It saved the entire fruit industry, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to point to a single injury to any farmer by reason of it.

Mr. YOUNG: How about barbed wire?

Mr. BENNETT: Barbed wire did not do any injury, but the price of barbed wire was not enhanced by reason of any action that was taken.

Mr. VALLANCE: The price was maintained.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly it was, and I explained to the house when I was asked questions about barbed wire just what the situation was, that I do not think any member of this house believes in his own mind that it is sound business for Canadians to permit any commodity to displace Canadian commodities at distress prices, with the effect of destroying the Canadian industry, and then leaving the Canadian consumers subject to the price of a monopoly. That is what it gets down to. You must at least take a view of these matters beyond the immediate day. I could name half a dozen instances, if it were relevant to this particular matter, in which what I have indicated actually happened. It is a question that is not in the realm of doubt or conjecture; it is a real happening. Now Canada, we hope, will endure beyond to-day and to-morrow, but if your policies are based solely upon to-day, then the result is that to-morrow you suffer, and I wonder if there is anything clearer than the example of the railways in Canada on that point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope my hon. friend is not blaming the dumping duties for ruining the railways.

Mr. BENNETT: The same principle. Everybody was clamouring for railways. Democracy got railways, and the day after woke up and discovered that it had destroyed itself. That is what happens in regard to these commodities.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Other things happened to the railways too.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I will admit that. The hon. gentleman managed them for seven or eight years politically.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We will discuss that when the railways are up.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The railways were carrying goods then.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they were carrying loans.

Mr. YOUNG: What are they carrying now?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Deficits.

Mr. BENNETT: When the hon. gentlemen have exhausted themselves, I shall proceed. Fair market value was the test that was imposed, and when the fair market value could not be ascertained, other means were resorted to, to ascertain what that fair market value was, and the duties payable have been the duties payable on fair market value with fair competition. Hon. gentlemen no doubt saw in this morning's paper that yesterday the president of the Board of Trade in England said that England would have to take steps to save her shipping from unfair competition.

Mr. YOUNG: More navigation laws.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has suggested one method by which it could be done.

Mr. YOUNG: Going back a hundred years.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has discovered that one hundred years of experience has taught lessons.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think three years have taught some.

Mr. BENNETT: The people of this country have discovered that unless the steps taken had been taken there would have been no industrial fabric left in Canada.

The point at issue in this bill is one which the minister explained very clearly, and I cannot understand why there is all the fuss about it. You could not convict for violation of the statute because the duty payable on importation was in specific terms rather than in ad valorem terms, and that made possible punishment for a violation of the law. What the value is, is a matter of evidence. It always is. That is a matter of procedure and evidence; that is all. The evidence will establish the value, and when the value is established, that is all there is to it; the duty then attaches at the rate indicated. Is there anything very strange about that? I cannot see it. Of course, I am open to conviction always.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Prime Minister is improving.

Mr. BENNETT: It is amazing what adversity does. If the hon. gentleman had to carry the burden of responsibility that I have done for the last three years, he probably would have improved too. I realize more and more every day what are the conditions in this country and the burdens we have to carry, and I endeavour to adapt myself as best I may to the continuance of the burden. I am grateful to the hon. gentleman if he thinks I show signs of improvement, for I should hesitate to remain, in the words of Pitt, one of those who continue ignorant despite the warnings of age and experience. That is all there is in this legislation, and I suggest it might be a reasonable thing to adopt it so that those who have violated the law in the past shall not be able to escape on a technicality.

Mr. YOUNG: I have not the statute before me, but speaking from memory, the 1930 amendments to the Customs Act give the minister power to fix valuation for duty, and he would fix those values for duty according to the price the Canadian producer thought he should get. I think the statute provides for a minimum price, that the price so fixed shall not be less than the cost of production plus profit to the manufacturer in the country of origin. That was the minimum, and the sky was the maximum. There is nothing in the statute as it now stands to prevent them making any valuation they like. Mention has been made of barbed wire. Will the minister tell us whether or not any confidential letters have been sent out from the department to the customs collectors in regard to valuation for barbed wire?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that question is relevant to the matter before the chair.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I shall be very glad to answer if the chairman will allow me. I know of no such letters. Any letters that would be sent out would be in the ordinary routine of the office, and barbed wire would not be dealt with any differently from any other commodities coming under the direction of the department. I know of no such letters.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister knows of no such letter in regard to barbed wire, will he tell us if any confidential letters have been sent out by the department touching valuation for duty? Have those letters been sent out for the purpose of fixing the values for duty without allowing the importer to know the value until he has to pay the duty?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I know of no such instance.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I should like to ask the minister if in the application of these changes he intends to use the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not know that that point comes under consideration in the discussion of these amendments, but as the hon. member knows, what is called the preventive service is now under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Part of it still remains with the Department of National Revenue, that part which might be termed the investigation branch. Investigations come peculiarly within the Department of National Revenue. But it was thought that where there was protective work to be done and enforcement of the law to be carried out, that in view of the fact that we had a police force which does its work efficiently that force should do the work formerly done by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I am assuming a great part of the work of the Department of Customs will be undertaken by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to state to the minister the fact that in this case, as in many others, there will be overlapping of jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the hon. member is out of order. Unless there is general consent the preventive service cannot be discussed at this time.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am quite willing to answer any question the hon. member may ask. However, as you have said, Mr. Chairman, this does not seem to be the proper time to discuss the preventive service. When my estimates are before the committee I shall be happy to answer any question which may arise. If the hon. member finds it impossible to be in the house at that time, and will be good enough to let me have a memorandum of the information he desires, I shall be very happy to reply.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I am prepared to wait and ask my question at another time. There is a specific occurrence in mind, however, which I should like to bring to the attention of the house, one which took place in my constituency only last week. I am satisfied, however, to wait until later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many cases were dismissed under the old section? There is reference made to these prosecutions under the explanatory note.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot tell my hon. friend. I must say, however, there was more than one shot, and we thought we had to mend our fences.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In all the provinces?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot tell my hon. friend, but I shall inquire and let him know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may be dense, but I do not yet understand the situation. We will suppose someone attempts to import two gallons of liquor into the country, knowing perfectly well that he is evading the customs law to the extent of $14, or at the rate of $7 per gallon. When he is caught and apprehended it is very easy to ascertain the amount he owes customs authorities. In addition, however, there is a desire to punish him. Are there no penalties in the act for infractions, without fixing values, or is this change merely for the purpose of fixing the amount of penalty? We will say, for example, that the reason for the insertion of the $200 means that if it is under $200 a magistrate cannot impose a penalty as severe as it would be if it were over $200. Is that where the difference arises?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member's question. If he had section 217 of the Customs Act before him he would find that where the value is small the party is liable on summary conviction before a justice to a penalty not exceeding $200 and not less than $50, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment. But where the amount involved is larger, as stated in subsection 3 of section 217, there is an indication that the offenders have been indulging in what we call commercial smuggling, or that they are making a business of it. There is an indication that they are harbouring and concealing, in an extensive way, in contravention of the customs law. In the office we call that commercial smuggling, and the commercial smuggler receives more severe treatment than the one who may smuggle a small amount of alcohol for his own benefit or for the purpose of having a celebration with his friends. Only a day or two ago there was an instance where twenty-four men held a celebration; true, under the law they were committing a breach of the Excise Act, under which the penalties are more extreme. It is our hope that at this session those penalties may be modified. The twenty-four of them signed a round-robin stating they were all guilty, not knowing that they were making themselves liable to a fine of $200 and one month in gaol. That was not a case of commercial smuggling. The magnitude of the offence is something which must be considered, because in one case it is setting the law at naught, but in the other it is not only setting the law at naught but trying to make money out of doing so.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, the minister has stated there have been no cases of extreme valuation placed on goods. I should like to give him the circumstances of a case which came under my notice not long ago. A man without money settled on a homestead in southern Saskatchewan close to the Montana border. He managed to get a little lumber with which to build a shack; he had no furniture. A neighbour living across the line, on the American side, gave him an old democrat, from the body of which he made a cupboard. Another neighbour sold him the remains of an old mower for the sum of $5. With that purchase, added to other parts he was able to pick up, he made himself a mower sufficient for his purposes. His total investment was $5. These articles which were gathered from his neighbours' junk heaps were reported to customs officials, one of whom came along and put a valuation of about $40 on the goods. The farmer was told that the value for duty would be that amount. If that is not extreme valuation, I do not know what could be; it is both arbitrary and extreme. It might easily have happened that the customs collector would not have come along until the farmer had gathered a little more junk from his neighbours, at which time the valuation might have been placed higher than $200. Under those circumstances the farmer would have found himself liable under the criminal code. I say the valuations put on are absurd.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I had not heard of the circumstances to which the hon. member has referred, but I believe they have no relation whatever to the clause we are now discussing.

Mr. RALSTON: It shows exactly to what extent criminal law is being carried, when it is suggested that the penalty shall be based on a valuation of that kind. That is exactly what my hon. friend was endeavouring to point out. I understand the suggestion has been made that we have no arbitrary duties.

All of us have been giving examples in this house right along of the most arbitrary duties being imposed. We started out by saying we were going to have dumping duties, imposed in this way, that the customs appraiser was going to value the goods at the amount at which they would sell in the country of origin, that was to be the test. We soon got beyond that, we said: No we will not pay much attention to the selling price in the country of origin if it is below the cost of production in Canada; we will increase those values to meet at least the cost of production in Canada. That did not go far enough; then we abandoned any rule whatever, and gave the customs officer the right to put on any value he likes. Those arbitrary duties are being imposed from day to day. I think if my hon. friend reads the mail of his department he will find that complaints are coming every day from importers who if they place an order for delivery three months later have no idea whatever how much duty they are going to have to pay, owing to such arbitrary valuations. And that is to be the basis of criminal prosecutions launched against citizens of this country for harbouring. My hon. friend is always talking of spirituous liquors, as if they were the only thing on which specific duty is imposed. Let us take socks, upon which there is a specific duty. A man can have a bale of them in his cellar; he knows what the penalty is. But a customs officer is found who says: If I had to determine the value of these goods for duty purposes, instead of $10 I would have valued them at $50, or instead of $100 I would have valued them at $300. A man incurs a penalty simply on the decision of the customs officer. Our objection is based on the fact that these arbitrary duties are being constantly imposed. Value for duty means something entirely different from what it meant when this provision of the law came into force; then it was fair market value, now it is any value the appraiser sees fit to put on.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the remark of my hon. friend go without an answer. I tell him specifically across the floor of this house that when he says the minister has the power to fix any duty he likes—those are his words as I caught them—

Mr. RALSTON: Valuation.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —I say that is untrue. I will also add that the legislation that is upon the statute books, with the exception of the amendment made to section 43, was put on the statute books by the party opposite.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no. If my hon. friend will read the sections of the act from No. 35 on, he will find the minister has that power. He will find further that the governor in council can give the minister special power. He will find that the only arbitrary power given under the former act was the power with respect to natural products and nothing else. That has now been extended to cover all the commodities we import into Canada.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 2—Special permission for lightening vessel and unlading goods.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Just a word in explanation. Section 8 of the Customs Act says that we shall not work on Sundays and statutory holidays nor between sunset and sunrise. That has been the law for a long time. As my hon. friends must of course know, it is sometimes necessary—not desirable but necessary—to work on a holiday. It is sometimes desirable to work between sunset and sunrise. We want that privilege in exceptional cases and when the minister authorizes that the work shall be done. As mentioned in the explanatory note, there was one case where not being allowed to lighter a boat resulted in an expense of about $2,500. Some of these boats cannot approach the wharf without being lightened, and it is necessary sometimes to do that when otherwise we would like to be at our devotions or taking our ease. I think the amendment is reasonable and should commend itself to the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think the explanation justifies the change as far as working on Sundays is concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Doubtless it is possible that some company or corporation or individual may lose as much as $2,500 by not working on Sundays, but that happens everywhere and in every sphere. All the big corporations are losing more than that by being obliged not to work on Sundays. How will my hon. friend reconcile this legislation with the Lord's Day Act? He will have to amend the Lord's Day Act too, because here is the only exception covered in the Lord's Day Act as to loading and unloading of vessels. It is in chapter 123, section 11 (1):

Loading, unloading and operating any ocean-going vessel which otherwise would be unduly delayed after her scheduled time of sailing, or any vessel which otherwise would be in imminent danger of being stopped by the closing of navigation—

I do not see why there should be special privilege for unloading vessels on Sundays because of loss of money incurred by somebody by reason of having to wait until Monday. I think it is setting a bad example. And, Mr. Chairman, may I call your attention to the fact that already the law for the observance of Sunday is sometimes broken, I know that there have been many complaints in my own province about it. This is no time for the government to introduce legislation of this kind.

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend is quite satisfied to have our railway trains travel on Sunday, he is quite satisfied to sail down the St. Lawrence on Sunday. Where, because of her heavy draught, it is necessary to unload a boat to a degree before permitting her to approach a wharf, surely it is in the spirit of keeping the Lord's Day that that necessary work should be done. Provision is sought for nothing but what is necessary, and I leave it to the common sense of members of the house. Would it not be altogether reasonable that in the cases mentioned there should be opportunity, not to turn the day into a working day, but where there are special reasons for the work being done, to save it from being a breach of Sabbath observance?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the point taken by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is well taken. I do not want to add to what he has said, but I think it is inadvisable to set such an example, more especially in our province where I know some friends of the party opposite are taking the provincial government to task because in some cases they have had to carry on certain impending and necessary works on Sunday. After all this is only a question of dealing with customs and excise enforcement, levying fines and so on, and I do not think these matters are of such tremendous importance that we should do away with the Lord's Day Act just to give certain officials power that may force them to break a statutory law. I do not think it ought to be done, and if this question comes to a vote I for one will vote against it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, some members of the committee may wish to consider this matter further, so I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Ryckman, that we revert to the order of motions.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: On behalf of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) I desire to lay on the table a partial return of correspondence with Mr. G. G. Serkau in connection with the proposed exchange of Canadian cattle for Russian goods, in response to the motion made by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance).

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Militia services: cadet services, $300,000.

Hon. DONALD M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): When the committee rose the other night we were considering this item, but since the hon. member who moved an amendment and the other hon. gentleman who said he wished to speak on the matter are not here, perhaps we might let this item stand for the time being and proceed to something else.

Mr. RALSTON: I would like a little information on this item, and perhaps the minister would go on with it as far as possible. If the others are not here a little later perhaps it might stand. Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if the minister would give us the number of cadet corps now operating, and also tell us if there have been any increases or decreases in the last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There were 1,174 corps in existence on December 31, 1932. Up to March 7 last ten new detachments had been authorized, and since that time no further authorizations have been made. Last year forty-four detachments were disbanded.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many detachments are there in the province of Quebec?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are 324 corps in Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In view of the debate which took place when this item was under consideration previously, during which members on this side of the house belonging to both the official opposition and the group in the corner gave many reasons why this amount should be reduced, I should like to know from the minister if he has considered the advisability of reducing this vote or, if that cannot be done this year, of undertaking that next year we will not be asked to pass a similar vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think I am quite safe in giving that undertaking, which I gave the right hon. leader of the opposition previously. Undoubtedly the estimate next year will be very considerably reduced.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I presume the minister has no idea of the extent of that reduction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot give a definite figure, but certainly it will be very much reduced.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that when this item was under consideration the minister felt that he was hampered to some extent by existing arrangements or agreements. Let me point out to the minister that as I understand it—and he will correct me if I am wrong—the arrangements really are only with respect to the Strathcona trust fund, which really was the commencement of the cadet movement. That has to do only with the expenditure of the interest on a certain amount of money which was provided by Lord Strathcona. So far as I know there are no arrangements in the sense of contractual obligations of any kind with the provinces with regard to the expenditure of any sum such as this. I wonder if the minister had in mind that commitments had been made or that there were any moral obligations which he felt he should observe in asking parliament to vote this sum for the fiscal year ending 1933-34. Is it not the case that everything which might be considered either a moral or a legal obligation will expire by midsummer of this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So far as any legal obligation goes I think the hon. gentleman is correct; I do not think we would be breaking any legal obligation if we announced a change of this kind in sufficient time to give school boards a chance to make their plans. However, I think there is a certain moral obligation on our part with respect to boards who have inaugurated the system and who desire to maintain it.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not sure about that. As I understand it there is a contribution of $1.25 towards each uniform.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, the uniform allowance has been cut off.

Mr. RALSTON: Then the contribution now really consists largely of payments to instructors, and I wonder if I am right in saying that an instructor is paid $2 each for the first fifty cadets, and either $1 or 50 cents for each cadet in excess of that number.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The allowance to cadet instructors is $2 each for the first fifty cadets and $1 each for all additional, with a maximum of $3,000 to any one instructor.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the total provision made for instructors?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In round figures, $157,000.

Mr. RALSTON: What are the other large items?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are twelve cadet officers, one in each district except military districts 2 and 4, in which there are two. The vote for these officers is $43,000. There are twelve civilian stenographers employed solely on cadet work, the allowance being $13,000. An allowance of $46,000 is made for pay and allowances of permanent personnel employed as physical training instructors at normal schools or with cadet corps. Transport and travelling expenses, $24,000.

Mr. RALSTON: This vote has always been the subject of attack in the committee but I have always defended the cadet system and I am prepared to do it again. However, I submit that in view of our economic and financial position this item should be very substantially reduced. I think the minister agrees with me in his heart of hearts, even though he may not be willing to admit it openly. The $157,000 paid to cadet instructors is on the same rate as was paid in 1926, 1927 and 1929. A ten per cent cut has been made in the case of other civil servants and I think it would be only fair that a substantial reduction be made in these grants. I know I will not be popular in making this suggestion but I cannot see any reason why the cadet instructors should not also take a cut. The basis of remuneration is the number of cadets being trained, and that basis should be substantially reduced. The allowance for twelve cadet officers is $42,000, and this is in addition to the allowance for twelve stenographers. I do not think the minister would be breaking any contract if he reduced the number of cadet officers or assigned them other duties in order to effect a substantial reduction. I am still supporting the cadets but at this time I think this vote should have the benefit of the pruning knife and that to a very substantial extent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we are now discussing item 84, whereby the administration seeks $300,000 for cadet services, a reduction of $60,000 over the vote of last year. I understand also that there is an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) to the effect that this vote shall be reduced by $30,000, the sum being asked for by the United Charities drive in Ottawa. This amendment appears on page 2111 of Hansard. I would not at all quarrel with the hon. member if it were possible that this vote could be reduced by $30,000 and that amount could be paid over by the government to the United Charities, but I know that though the item was reduced by so much, the $30,000 could not be distributed to that most worthy object. I might mention that this most worthy drive is again receiving very generous support from the citizens of Ottawa.

The other evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) explained just why this vote of $300,000 for cadet services was being asked for. At the outset of my remarks may I say that for the years which it has been my privilege and great honour to be a member of this house, I have consistently supported this vote. I am quite prepared to accept the explanation given the other evening by the Prime Minister, to be found on pages 2114 and 2115 of Hansard. I think this explanation can be summed up in the following words of the Prime Minister:

> In view of what has taken place in the past it would not be my judgment that the minister could ask the school districts to take a certain course. They are masters of the situation; they determine whether or not they will make any expenditure. When they determine that they will not, our obligation ceases.

I think this statement should be coupled with the statement made by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) which appears on page 2115 of Hansard, as follows:

> As has been pointed out, ten per cent is being deducted from the salaries of civil servants and economies of every kind are being attempted if not in fact practised.

And again on page 2120:

> I say to the hon. gentleman that, unless as minister of the department he will give us an undertaking, or, unless the Prime Minister will give us an undertaking on behalf of the government, that the government is prepared to communicate with the provinces, municipalities or with whatever bodies they may have made commitments, expressing the hope that those bodies may see their way clear to forego further grants for the period of a year, I shall when it next comes up oppose the vote for this service.

These statements show just exactly how this vote was placed before the committee. With what my right hon. leader said I am in absolute accord, but at the same time may I say that in my opinion in years gone by there has been very much in fact, too much, lopping off or cutting or doing away in connection with our national services. Canada has reached a stage where every bit of her national services should be preserved. I have seen with great regret the decrease of estimates in the very essential services. It is true that this is due to circumstances, but we should not, in time of crisis, do anything that may endanger the machinery whereby the national development of Canada is brought forward, so that when times return to normal we shall not be so far away from the well-beaten path, that we shall be unable to recognize the old blazes on the old trees, and find the trail we then travelled in ease, luxury and happiness.

I am altogether in favour of this vote for the cadet service. It does not make very much difference to me whether there is anything military in the training which these young boys receive. I am quite sure there is no military training in what is given to the Boy Scouts and Girl Guides. I am confident that if at the outset of the great war, Sir Sam Hughes was able in so short a time to gather together 35,000 men, send them overseas and have them on the field of battle, it was because of the training and discipline they had received in the summer training camps. It did not make militarists out of them. I honestly believe that the many feats of valour and glory on the fields of Flanders, Vimy, Courcellette and elsewhere had their origin in the discipline and training our youths had received in the training camps of Canada. When they found themselves in difficulty, they knew exactly what to do in cases of emergency. I am not one who believes in armaments or whose maxim is, si vis pacem, para bellum, but I believe the youth of to-day, the boys and girls, would spend their time very much better in the open, in the fields, in discipline and practice, whether they use a rifle or one of those sticks with a signal flag on the end of it, than by going to moving picture houses where they receive nothing that will improve either their morals or their physique.

I wonder if the work, for instance, of the Royal Military College may be said to inculcate militarism in the minds and souls of the young men who have been fortunate enough to follow the courses given there. Those who are opposed to this training ought to look into the matter and see how many of the young men who have received their training at the Royal Military College, or, for that matter, at any other military college that exists in Canada, go about preaching warfare. A large proportion of them are following ordinary vocations in life as engineers and in other capacities. I do not for one moment think this training is conducive to the creation in the youth of to-day of a spirit which may be anti-pacifist or bellicose. Canada in her youth should be prepared for to-morrow; the youth of to-day should receive training along the lines of the old Roman and Greek physical culture. We all know in the old days the Romans and Greeks believed in "mens sana in corpore sano," a sound mind in a sound body. The mere fact that boys drill under a military system, bow to discipline, even carry muskets, will not create in their souls a desire to kill somebody else. Our policy should be based on modern methods, on the necessity of keeping in touch with present conditions, and in some way we should put a stop to this lopping off of services that are conducive to the national standard of living. By the statute of Westminster Canada is now a nation. She should be garbed in the dress or uniform that befits her to-day—long enough to cover the subject and short enough to be interesting—but please do not make it any shorter. Methinks we can not afford to lop off any more.

I am in favour of this appropriation; I shall vote against the amendment. I would be much more at ease if the minister would say that he will procure, as my right hon. leader has suggested, an undertaking that some of these schools or bodies or corporations with whom we are concerned will advise the government that they will not ask for any further grants pending the betterment of financial conditions. But if that cannot be done, then, with less gladness of heart I shall nevertheless vote for this item.

Mr. ROSS: May I ask the minister whether this is under a separate administration? This might be one way in which a saving could be made. I am strongly in favour of this training and will support it in every way, but I think at the present time we are a little top-heavy, and if this administration is not separate and apart, I see no reason why the duties should not be combined with those of some part of the administrative body.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The cadet movement has developed very rapidly in the years since the war. During the last few years particularly it has gone forward by leaps and bounds, and undoubtedly if the grants were not cut down there would be a continual increase in the movement. In view of that fact and the general opinion in favour of the movement, it was considered too big to be tied to any of the other departments. Under present circumstances there is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says, and no doubt considerable changes along the line of overhead can be made.

Mr. ROSS: I see no reason why the officer in charge of cadet services should not perhaps take on some other duty, thereby reducing the headquarters expenditure. On the other hand, it would be rather difficult to reduce the amount allowed for stenographers, because the officer has found it impossible to take a lady stenographer around with him to the different training classes. He insists on a male stenographer, which, of course, increases the stenographic expense. I think his reason is sound, but it makes the expenses for that section slightly higher than in the past. I repeat, however, that I can see no reason why in these days the cadet officer could not take on some other duties in order to reduce the overhead expense, especially when the whole service is being reduced.

Mr. HOWARD: I appreciate very much the cadet service and personally I favour the training that is given and the way it is being handled throughout Canada. But the minister stated the other night that it was impossible to reduce this vote because of commitments already made, and he went on to say that he could not promise to reduce it another year because it was outside of his jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I did not say that.

Mr. HOWARD: If that were so there would not be much use in our discussing the item. I am exceedingly pleased that since then the minister has changed his position and now undertakes to do his best to make a reduction next year. I personally favour this vote, but in view of the conditions of the country to-day and the reductions in expenditures that are being made in all directions, I think this is one item in which we could make a substantial saving. I would make this suggestion to the minister. The fiscal year ends on March 31, and out of this vote there will be required an amount sufficient to cover only the remainder of the school year, that is, the months of April and May and up until about the middle of June. It would seem to me, therefore, that it would be an easy matter to cut this vote, as only two and a half months of the school year have to be provided for. Nearly all our schools in Canada close by the eighteenth or the twentieth of June at the latest.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am fully in agreement with what the hon. gentleman says as to cutting down the vote next year, and that will be done; but nothing can be done this year because we are committed for the current school term. This vote of $300,000 covers the expenditures from the first of last September to the thirtieth of June, 1933, the end of the school term. So in fairness and justice there is nothing we can do this year. But a cut will be made for the school term beginning on the first of September next.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the minister quite correct about that? We are voting money now for the fiscal year from March 31, 1933, to March 31, 1934. We are not voting to pay accounts for last September. They should have been paid out of last year's vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman is not correct. What we are voting now will be spent for this current school year, which ends on June 30. These arrangements were made several years ago, and it has been well understood that that was the custom regarding this vote.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is satisfied about that, that the expenses, let us say, for cadet instructors in September and October, 1932, are paid for out of the vote for 1933-34?.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Then that answers the point raised by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke as to the school year. Does the minister consider that the vote will be exhausted by the end of June next?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The money that is being voted here?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: There is one thing I should like to mention in this connection. I understand that the instructors are put into the normal school. That is the way in which instruction gets out to the general schools. The teachers in the normal schools are instructed, and the teachers in turn take the cadet corps in the schools. In addition, cadet instructors visit the schools from time to time and give certain training, and cadet officers also do inspection work. These are two services in regard to which it seems to me a cadet holiday might be declared, at least until financial conditions improve. Once more I want to repeat that I am not expressing the slightest change in my belief in the desirability and efficacy of the cadet movement, but I am talking about a temporary holiday in cadet activities until financial conditions improve. It seems to me where there are so many necessary items of public expenditure, and where there is so much need and want and misery and suffering, this is one of the places where we could save money.

Amendment (Miss Macphail) negatived: yeas, 11; nays, 43.

Mr. RALSTON: Through an error, I have voted. As a matter of fact I am paired with the Minister of Finance in all matters, even in committee. Were I in the house my vote would have to be counted, but in committee that is not necessary.

Mr. POWER: I am in the same position, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Engineer services and works, $297,500.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister tell the committee whether he has set aside any special sum for engineer services in military district No. 5, Quebec?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, $20,000.

Mr. POWER: For what purpose?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This vote is for general engineering services, such as repairs to rifle ranges, maintenance of barracks, repairs to ordnance buildings, drill halls, armouries, and so on.

Mr. POWER: I should like to invite the attention of the minister to the condition of Kent gate, Quebec. I understand the engineers have been dealing with this problem. This is a covered gate and comprises part of the walls of the city of Quebec. During the month of August or September it was found that these walls were decaying, involving serious danger to passersby. The military authorities under whose control this gate and other sections of the Quebec fortifications come, decided to condemn it. After considerable time I gathered from the newspapers that the department at Ottawa had set aside a certain sum of money for repairs to the gate, to be expended under control or supervision of the Royal Canadian Engineers in Quebec. Work was begun, but, for some reason I have never been able to ascertain, was never carried to completion. For some months the scaffolding impeded passage through the gate, and in spite of protests from newspapers and public bodies in Quebec no further action was taken. Then, the scaffolding, which obstructed one of the most important streets of the city, that leading to the legislative buildings, was taken down. Repairs, however, were not effected. Only last week I passed this point and noticed that no further work has been done. I remember reading in the newspapers that the Solicitor General had given an interview in which he stated that the work could not be done until such time as parliament voted the money. I judged from this interview that moneys had been set aside for the completion of the work. I regret to learn that apparently no such specific sum has been put aside. The citizens of Quebec, who are keenly interested in the condition in which this gate has been left, would like to have an explanation from the minister, and would like to know whether or not his department intends to proceed with the work.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I wish I could give every hon. member an answer as satisfactory as I am able to give the hon. member for Quebec South. Arrangements have now been made, and the work to which he has referred will be proceeded with very soon. Although in the past we have expended considerable sums on fortifications, this added amount was entirely unexpected. There was nothing in the vote which passed the house last year to take care of it, as there was no intimation that an emergent condition would arise. At the present time, however, not only has a decision been made, but the matter will be attended to very shortly.

Mr. POWER: What amount is it the intention of the department to expend?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot give that figure, because part of the work will have to be done as unemployment relief. The hon. member knows that there are a number of men at the citadel who will be engaged on the work, and there is other highly skilled labour which would not come under the unemployment relief expenditure. It is impossible therefore to state definitely the amount required.

Mr. POWER: The remarks of the minister bring another question to my mind. I suppose the minister has reference to the men being housed at the Quebec citadel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: I had never fully understood the arrangement with regard to those men. I should like to learn from the minister what work they are doing, what pay they are receiving, and in what way or under what authority the money is found to pay for the work.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Some time ago it was felt that the Department of National Defence could be of assistance in carrying out some of the work in aid of the unemployed, and that particularly it could help single homeless men. In furtherance of that policy, on October 8 last an order in council was passed setting forth certain facts about the unemployment situation, and stating that with advantage to Canada certain works could be undertaken by the Department of National Defence during the months of November, December, January, February and March which would provide occupation for single homeless men. This work included development of the Trans-Canada Airways, and the repairs, renovations and renewals of certain portions of the old fortifications in the city of Quebec. The amount allocated to that work in Quebec was $45,000. There has been a subsequent order in council increasing the amount available for that work.

Mr. POWER: What is the amount covered by the subsequent order in council?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: $6,330.

Mr. POWER: That was to be attributed, I assume, to the particular work to which I have referred?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It would be included in that.

Mr. POWER: These men, I understand, are being housed, fed, and paid twenty cents a day?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is right.

Mr. POWER: Are their services being leased to any contractor or other person?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, no.

Mr. POWER: Is there any arrangement with them whereby if they remain during a certain specified period they will receive more than twenty cents a day?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. POWER: And they are being utilized to carry on work such as that to which I referred, of an emergency character, in rebuilding the walls and in restoring the structure, such as the Kent gate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is not entirely on the Kent gate; it is more particularly on the general walls. Some of the work that can be done that way will be done under the arrangement referred to.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether there is much in the way of criticism with regard to the general scheme, but there may be some criticism if the services of these men working for twenty cents a day are to be utilized on works which could be carried out by other workmen in Quebec. If, for instance, one of these unmarried transients is doing work which could just as easily be carried on by a married labourer of the city of Quebec, I should think we might have serious ground for complaint. The repairs to the Kent gate could, I am sure, be carried out by ordinary labour available in the city. I should be glad to know if there is any justification for discrimination in favour of outside people as against those living in the city who require to earn their living.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are no outside people—only those from Quebec and the immediate vicinity, would be so employed.

Mr. POWER: That goes pretty far.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who selects those men? Is there any regulation under which they are admitted? A couple of young unemployed men came to my office and told me that they had tried to get work on the citadel and could not do so; they were told they had to have a recommendation from a friend of my hon. friend the Solicitor General. I should like to know whether in order to get work there one has to have the support of somebody in Quebec city, or whether he has to have special recommendations or qualifications.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Did they say who told them that fairy story?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should say there is nothing in that at all. Men are taken on from the provincial employment bureau at Quebec.

Mr. POWER: At any rate it is widely and generally recognized throughout the city of Quebec that no man is unemployed in the sense that he can get a twenty cents a day job unless he has a certificate of such unemployment from one Nolan, who is the ward heeler of the hon. Solicitor General. Whether through the activities of my hon. friends opposite during the last election they became expert in the ability to ascertain who was unemployed and who was not, I do not know.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What is a ward heeler? I never heard of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before my hon. friend graduated into government employment he knew what that was.

Mr. POWER: I should be very grateful to the minister if he would instruct the officers in Quebec who have to do with this matter that a man may be legitimately unemployed and entitled to obtain this twenty cents a day from the government even though he be not recommended by the political adherents of the Solicitor General. I know that the military officers there would act in the best interests of the public generally, but perhaps it would be well if they received instructions from headquarters. I would have more confidence if they did.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there anything in this vote for improvements or repairs or work at the citadel in Halifax?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. The hon. gentleman knows that as far as this department goes we have moved entirely out of the citadel. Work is being done there, but it is not under this vote, neither is what we have been discussing with regard to Quebec.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister tell me if any expenditure is contemplated with regard to the militia quarters in Yarmouth? For some time the question has been under advisement of a rearrangement of quarters there, and in fact something substantial has been done. I wonder if the minister has under consideration any further plans in that regard?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I remember that matter coming up. If I recall aright—I speak subject to correction—they were going to take over an old church or other building and remodel it. But on account of the difficulty of finances, as in a great many other cases, any change or move that necessitated an increase of rent or anything of the kind had to be laid over.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): A few years ago the department secured a site in Prince Rupert, British Columbia, for a drill hall, and started to excavate. For the last few years nothing has been done. I would like to know if they still have that site and if they intend to do anything, or if there is anything in this vote for the work. At the present time, with the unemployment that prevails it would help the city of Prince Rupert greatly. As you know, I am not a military man and do not favour cadet training, but money is devoted to that purpose, I think our young people in that part of the country are as much entitled to a share as any others.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When I was at Prince Rupert I saw the site. I think it is right next to the one they are using at the present time, an additional lot. I believe we have that yet. I told the officers there at the time that under present conditions we could not go ahead and get a new building, that it was impossible. They have pretty fair quarters there; probably they could be better or larger, but I told them, and I have to repeat to the hon. gentleman, that I do not see any immediate chance for a new building at Prince Rupert.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Is it the intention of the government to do anything at all to improve that property? At the present time rented quarters are being used.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is nothing in these estimates to provide for a new building. If there is anything in the way of repairs to be done, that might be arranged, but at present we can do nothing more.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $667,800.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I note that there is an increase of $8,926 in this vote. Will the hon. Minister of National Defence inform us whether this signifies an increase in the military forces of this country? All are aware that the cost of living has considerably decreased, yet I note an increase of $8,926. I would like to know what are the main items which are comprised in that amount.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This vote provides for the purchase, inspection, repair and maintenance of clothing, equipment and ordnance stores, medical, dental and veterinary stores, telephone signals and wireless equipment, the cost of material and labour for the manufacture of munitions at the Quebec arsenal, the inspection of output, and maintenance charges and repairs to the arsenal buildings.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The vote amounts to $667,800. I would like to know what are the items which make up this vote. Will the hon. minister explain why there is an increase?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The increase is largely due to additional material we expect to use at the arsenal in Quebec. Last year, of course, the vote was cut down a great deal, and during the summer it was necessary to close the arsenal for nine weeks. This year we hope to reduce that period to six weeks.

Mr. POWER: Does this vote cover the arsenals?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if there is any truth in the rumour we have heard in Quebec recently, that it is the intention of the government to begin immediately the construction of a new arsenal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, that is not correct.

Mr. POWER: Are there any buildings to be substituted for the existing arsenal buildings? Is that contemplated at present?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We are going to change some of what we call the danger buildings, where the actual loading is carried on. There is a danger building pretty close to the city of Quebec, and these buildings probably will be located at Valcartier.

Mr. POWER: That is part of the cartridge factory, what they call the Cove Field buildings?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is where they load the shells, back of the citadel.

Mr. POWER: Is it the intention of the department to move the Cove Field buildings to Valcartier?—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, eventually they will be all taken there.

Mr. POWER: I think perhaps the minister deserves our congratulations, because the buildings were not very well located, and they seriously interfered with any development of the national battlefields. I suppose the minister is well aware of an order in council that was passed some years ago providing for an annual vote of some thousands of dollars to provide for the change in location of those buildings. Will the minister tell me how much it is proposed to expend in that direction this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We are spending $10,000 for preliminary work.

Mr. POWER: For laying the foundations, in other words?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, and for spur tracks.

Mr. POWER: What will be the eventual cost of the buildings?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Of course if a full arsenal were built there the cost would be tremendous.

Mr. POWER: I suppose about $3,000,000 or $4,000,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, but we cannot do that at present.

Mr. POWER: If all the buildings that are called danger buildings are removed to Valcartier I imagine the cost will be in the neighbourhood of $500,000 or more, will it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It depends on how much is moved. At the start, of course, the manufacture of the shells will go on at the arsenal, but eventually the arsenal probably will be moved to Valcartier, although there is nothing definite about that.

Mr. POWER: The arsenal is in operation at present, is it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: What holiday is proposed for this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This year we will have to close for six weeks.

Mr. ROSS: How much of this amount is to be devoted to medical supplies or stores, and what are those stores used for? Are they used for anything but regimental purposes? Are they used for military hospitals?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is $9,000 for medical stores. That is to provide for the purchase and upkeep of medical and surgical supplies for the permanent and non-permanent active militia.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Is any provision made to replace the hospital at Work Point barracks, Esquimalt, which were destroyed by fire some time ago?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. We have been doing the best we could; the sick are being well looked after, but under the circumstances now existing we cannot replace the building.

Mr. ROSS: I have a point to bring up which may sound peculiar, but I believe if a member sees a chance to effect a saving and at the same time do good service he should bring it to the attention of the government. Could the minister say how many patients are in the military hospital at Kingston and how many patients are in the general hospital?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not the record here.

Mr. ROSS: I wonder if the minister could get that information when we consider item 89? I will have a suggestion to make then which I believe will give better service and at the same time prove economical.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,994,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I notice there is an increase in this item and I should like to know if anything is being allowed for the regiments of northern British Columbia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not the detailed information as to what each regiment will get. I could obtain the expenditures last year and let my hon. friend have them.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like to have that information, and also the details of the increases this year.

Mr. HOWARD: How is the increase brought about?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In my judgment, this is the most important vote in our whole estimates. For the last two years practically nothing has been done for the artillery and provision is being made to allow them to get together a little this year.

Mr. COOTE: Are training camps to be conducted this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not in the sense they were some years ago. There will be none of the large infantry camps which we used to have.

Mr. POWER: Will there be any cavalry camps this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Last year a number of the units took their allotment and supplemented it themselves in order to hold local camps. We want to further that practice as much as possible and some of the increase will be for that purpose.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an explanation as regards this item. We have had military camps at St. John's, but I cannot see their usefulness. The camp lasts two weeks and during three quarters of that time the officers indulge in drinking scotch and smoking cigarettes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): What are the privates doing during that time?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): They are idle, as usual.

I have here a bill for $70.74 worth of cigarettes bought from one of our local dealers' by a captain and receipted by a certain lieutenant; this bill has not yet been settled. On another occasion—I can divulge names—payment was refused on a bill for beer amounting to $144. Fortunately, the honorary colonel of the regiment was generous enough to send his own cheque to the St. John's merchant who had sold this beer.

I think that these camps have no usefulness. All classes of men are brought to camp, men of all ages, from 16 to 50 years old. They are kept there for two weeks at the country's expense. Thefts and all kinds of disorders take place, notwithstanding this, grants are increased by $111,190.

I think that it is more than time to reduce the estimates of National Defence by discontinuing the training in camps, at general headquarters, etc., especially when the salaries of civil servants are reduced.

I fail to see the usefulness of these camps. If the hon. minister visited the military camp of St. John's he would soon realize the uselessness of them. I cannot understand why soldiers from St. John's are transferred to Ontario camps, when there exists in St. John's a military school, and when, moreover, the Department of National Defence has at its disposal the best sites in that town. I fail to see why such a camp should be maintained at a cost of some hundred thousand dollars.

I am amazed at the amounts voted for militia purposes. This year, there is a cut in the estimates of National Defence of $8,596, while the cut in those of agriculture amounts to $381,948. The estimates of agriculture are greatly reduced while there is hardly any cut in those of National Defence, yet hon. gentlemen opposite make no protest. I think that instead of making an outlay of $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 for militia purposes, agriculture should be better encouraged.

I request the hon. Minister of National Defence to kindly see that bills for beer and cigarettes are settled previous to the breaking up of camps, when regiments from Joliette or elsewhere are sent there. The solicitor of the merchant who sold the cigarettes referred to, wrote to the minister in this respect, on August 25, 1931. The minister's secretary replied and the hon. minister must have been apprised of the facts.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 16, respecting the Synod of the Diocese of Saskatchewan and to change its name to "Synod of the Diocese of Saskatoon." —Mr. Mackenzie King.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed, from February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code (unlawful associations), and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, a number of observations made in the house during the course of this debate prompts me to rise to lay my views before parliament. It has been claimed by some hon. members that in the opinions we express in this corner we do not at times represent the organized labour movement in Canada. On this occasion, however, in the few observations I intend making on this particular bill, I think I fairly adequately express the viewpoint of the organized labour movement. Another reason that prompts me to rise at this time is that I represent in this parliament a constituency which is probably one of the strongest from the standpoint of the communist party. In that constituency, North Winnipeg, there is what I would call the real centre of the organized communist movement; from there they spread their tentacles in all directions. Therefore, if I speak on this question, I do so from a certain knowledge of the work and activities of the communist organization which has been discussed at such length in different sections of the house.

Before doing so, however, it may be as well that I refer to the fact that the legislation now before us arises from the circumstance that in 1918 a number of orders in council were passed and certain repressive measures were taken by the then government. Amongst the orders in council that were passed were those that made illegal in Canada certain organizations such as the Chinese Nationalist League, the old Social Democratic party and a number of similar organizations. Those who look back over the years and think of the action of the government of that day in repressing by law the activities of those associations will surely come to the conclusion that that action was most unwise.

But during the course of the present debate I could not help coming to the conclusion that many hon. members who have spoken have over-emphasized the importance of the communist party in this country; it has been receiving gratuitous advertising and has had thrust upon it glory and honour which it does not deserve. Canada is certainly in no danger from anything the communist party might do or even attempt to do. In fact, I believe we have a much greater danger to fear from the stand-patters than from the communist party. I happen to know something about its strength, because for a number of years

I have been most bitterly assailed and opposed by it; I have been opposed by it in quite a number of elections going back as far as 1924. Numerically it is rather small. In Winnipeg, where I said at the outset it is probably as strong as anywhere else in Canada, if I put its number down at about 3,500 to 4,000, I am giving it a fairly generous measure for the amount of support it has in that city. That figure has been tested out in a number of elections, and even as late as November last in the mayoralty contest in Winnipeg, when they named a candidate for mayor, their votes on that occasion amounted to approximately 3,500.

In addition to the numerical strength of the communist party, they have a certain amount of financial strength. As to that I must confess that I have not the faintest idea where they get all the funds of which they are possessed. Only recently in Winnipeg, when about twenty of their associates were committed for trial on a charge of rioting, they were able to place in the courts of that city the sum of $20,000 in cash as bail for those individuals. Where they got that money I really cannot say.

In addition to their financial strength they are possessed of many buildings in various parts of the dominion, and again I do not know where they obtained the funds to purchase those buildings. In my constituency they must own about six different buildings where they hold their meetings, where they gather together, where they have social events, and those buildings are usually paid for and maintained out of funds owned and controlled by the organization.

As regards section 98 of the criminal code, the real opposition of the communist party to this section in my opinion is the fact that it contains one clause which was elaborated upon yesterday by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and which gives to the government the right to confiscate property in case of its being owned or controlled by illegal organizations. The real attack of the communist party against the whole of section 98 is not against that clause which infringes upon the right of free speech or of assembly, but against that clause which they feel might be invoked against them and whereby they might lose the property which to-day is nominally or actually in their possession.

Efforts have been made in the house by certain hon. members who, I think, ought to know better, and who, if they do not, ought to try to understand a little more about the matter, to link us in the labour party up with the work and activities of the communist party in Canada. It seems to me that those members have a very hazy understanding of some of our problems and of the meaning of the word "communist," and a similar hazy understanding of even the term "socialism" or the things for which we in the labour party stand. Fortunately or otherwise the term "communism" in the year 1933 has taken upon itself something of the character of those activities engaged in by the communist party in those countries where communism happens to be in operation. Now the only part of the world where the communist party is in the saddle to-day happens to be Russia, and so any action taken there by the powers that be becomes, so to speak, part and parcel of what some people like to call the activities of the communist party. On the other hand when we speak of anarchism we immediately confuse that term with the activities of the man who attempts to assassinate a ruler in some part of the world, and forget about the philosophy that underlies the theory of anarchism. Those who have read some of the books of Kropotkin and other philosophical writers on the theory of anarchism can see how far removed from anarchism are the practices of those who think they are following the ideas of the writers to whom I have just referred. Unfortunately or fortunately, communism to-day implies the things that are taking place in Russia, and naturally I do not blame anyone for condemning some of the things that are taking place to-day in soviet Russia. We of the labour party are totally opposed to a great many of the things which the communist party have done and are doing at the present time in soviet Russia. We believe fundamentally in an ordered democracy. We are opposed to all forms of dictatorship. We are opposed to a dictatorship in Moscow just as much as we are opposed to a dictatorship in Wall street. One is just as obnoxious to us as the other, and consequently when the communists in this country attempt to attack those who oppose them, their first line of attack is against those who happen to be part and parcel of the labour movement. And so in this country, as in many other parts of the world, we find those who are closely associated with the communist party attacking those of us in this house and outside who are associated with the labour movement more vigorously than those who belong to the Liberal or the Conservative party.

In this country the communist party has had control directly or indirectly of a number of organizations. Affiliated with them, as has been previously pointed out, is the Canadian Labour Defence League, the Workers Unity League, the Farmers Unity League, the Workers and Farmers Educational Association, and a number of others, as to which I have ample proof in the files in my office. So far as the communist party in this country is concerned, we, here, of the labour party, have no associations whatsoever with them. In fact in my last election the only party that had any associations with the communist party happened to be the Conservative party. At one of my election meetings at which the communists were present in large force I was not allowed to speak, and after the meeting one of the leading Conservatives in that part of the city where the meeting was held spoke to the crowd and said: "If you cannot support the Conservative party, then by all means vote for the communist candidate."

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that we, here, of the labour party are totally opposed both to the tactics and to the ideas of the communist party as expressed in this dominion. There have been, as I said before, certain hon. members who have tried to associate us with the communist movement in Canada. I would point out to the hon. members of this house that in my last election when I was running in North Winnipeg about two and a half years ago the only districts in which I attempted to hold meetings were those in which the communists claimed to be strongest, and it was my privilege, if I call it such, at every one of those meetings to be howled down and prevented from speaking by those very people who to-day are howling for the rights of free speech in Canada.

I have no fear in the least so far as the communist party in Canada is concerned. Those who have studied British history and imbibed its traditions must realize that institutions such as parliament which have existed for about seven hundred years are not so easily going to be turned upside down by the talk and cry of a few individuals who have no knowledge of British history and of the traditions of British parliamentary institutions. In this country the strength of the communist party lies almost entirely among those of the foreign-speaking population in this dominion. It is an unfortunate fact, and one that I regret extremely. I have been in public life in this parliament or in public office for a period of over sixteen years, and during the whole of that time I have attempted to the best of my ability to do all I possibly could do to prevent racial hatreds. I have tried to bring together the component parts of our Canadian citizenship in order that we might build up a Canada that is worth while both for ourselves and for the generations that are to come, and when I see the activities of these people who are of more recent origin in this Dominion of Canada I feel that they are not only doing a disservice to themselves but a tremendous disservice to all those people who have come to our shores during their own lifetime. I know how easy it is to stir up racial hatred in almost any part of the world. In my own constituency, comprising about 63,000 people, about forty per cent of them, or fully 25,000, are of what might be called foreign nationality, and among this 25,000 are to be found, almost exclusively, those who have come to this country from Russia. We find a section of them imbued with the idea that the only way in which improved conditions can be brought about in this dominion is by doing what has been done in Russia. The actions of this comparatively few people in Canada are having a bad effect, to my way of thinking, in a most unexpected and undesirable way. They have created amongst sections of our Canadian people a distrust and a misunderstanding of large sections of the foreign-born population of the dominion, and if some of those communists who think they are performing a useful service by their actions could only see some of the results of their activities, I am inclined to think that a great many of them would change their ways.

I have attempted to indicate the feelings of the communist party in Canada towards those of us who in some way or other have been connected with the labour movement in Canada. Those hon. members who have been attempting to link my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with the activities of the communist party really must not have read anything that that party has had to say about the hon. member. He has been described in this house as one who is always attempting on the floor of the house to support the activities of communist organizations. I suggest that is hardly in keeping with the facts. We find that away back in 1925, when I first became a member of this chamber, we asked the then government—which was not exactly in power, but was in office—to enact certain legislation. At that time they consented, but there was nothing extraordinary in their action because prior to 1925 they took exactly the same stand as they did subsequently. Communications passed between the then Prime Minister and my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre concerning this very question. They undertook to bring in remedial measures looking towards either the amending of section 98 or its deletion from the criminal code.

During all these years that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been attempting to have this clause deleted from the criminal code, unkind and untruthful statements have been made about him. I shall attempt to outline some of the statements which have been made—and may I add that what has been said about him has been said about other hon. members, including myself. In a short article I have before me, published a little over two years ago, there is reference to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River as "Peter Heenan, the typical renegade." Then, in one of the communist papers there is reference to "Woodsworth and Heaps at the old faker's game." There is hardly an issue of the communist paper in which there is not a reference to some hon. member in this corner of the house, and on all occasions we are referred to as fakers or traitors of some kind or another.

I shall give one further illustration by referring to an article written about a year and a half ago by a gentleman who is now spending his time in Kingston penitentiary. This article, which concerns Mr. Woodsworth, and is taken from the Labour Monthly, is as follows:

Mr. James Woodsworth, the recent labour faker, does his share in betraying the workers' interests by adding his voice to the renewed anti-soviet war agitation. This slave of the capitalists utilizes his recent visit to the U.S.S.R. for a series of articles in the capitalist press directed, together with all other garbage press reports, to undermine the growing confidence of the workers in the success of the socialist republics.

I commend that article to the attention of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol). These are statements made openly in an effort to create a feeling of hostility towards some hon. members who happen to sit in this House of Commons. I shall attempt to tell hon. members what is done behind closed doors, because I have in my possession a document which I shall quote because in my view it will prove interesting reading. This letter comes from the city of Toronto under date of April 21, 1931, and is as follows:

To All Party Functionaries

Dear Comrades:

This mimeographed pamphlet contains a special letter of the organization department of the communist international. It deals very concretely with the very important problem of shop work. It does not only tell what is necessary to do but it gives a wealth of materials as to how it is to be done.

This letter, signed by the central organization department, then proceeds to give the following instructions from abroad to its membership in the Dominion of Canada:

All the social democratic and reformist officials in the factory should be severely criticized in the propaganda and agitation in the factory nucleus with the help of communists factions and especially the factory paper each number of which should cite facts exposing the treacherous anti-working class part played by these agents of the bourgeoisie in the factory.

That, of course, had reference to the fact that men like my colleagues from Winnipeg North Centre and Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) had to be exposed, and our treachery laid bare to the great mass of workers in Canada or in other parts of the world. Immediately this circular was received by the organization in Winnipeg its membership was told to vilify, abuse or slander those who are part and parcel of the labour movement in Canada, and who do not owe any allegiance whatsoever to those associated with the communist party.

I believe I have given sufficient evidence to indicate the hostility of the communist party towards some hon. members in this corner of the house, and I should like to indicate that our feelings towards them are of a similar nature. There is absolutely no analogy in the things for which we stand, and we have little in common. When I turn to some of the statements which have been made in this house I cannot help but feel how essential and necessary it is to have section 98 removed from the criminal code. I am sorry, sir, that you are acting in the place of Mr. Speaker, because I wish to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest. Of course I have the advantage that when he is in the chair he cannot reply to my statements.

Speaking in this chamber last night the hon. member to whom I have referred seemed to take offence at some of the statements made by the hon. members for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and Winnipeg North Centre. He seemed to be particularly grieved to think that anything could be said about another chamber not far removed from this one, and in that connection quoted the following words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

"It is absurd for the Senate, a body without responsibility, to veto measures passed by the elected representatives of the people," he declared. Assailing the capitalist system, he urged his hearers to be ready with practical solutions for some system to replace it as it crumbled.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest seemed to feel that my colleague ought not to be allowed to make such statements, and for that reason he urged that section 98 ought to remain. Imagine a person saying that the Senate was not a responsible body! It would appear that in the view of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest the gentleman responsible for the statement quoted had been guilty of something approaching sedition. I should think that in these days when the Senate has been reformed, and is of a certain complexion, it might be classed as a responsible body. I suppose when they change their complexion, either one way or another, they become irresponsible. To-day they are not responsible, in the eyes of those who sit to the left of Mr. Speaker, but are responsible in the eyes of those who sit to his right. There was a time not long ago when even the Conservative party had in its platform a suggestion that the Senate was not a responsible body.

I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was far from the actual fact when he suggested the crumbling of the capitalist system. To-day we see it under our very eyes, and are helpless in the situation. When the hon. member referred to the system I presume he referred not only to Canada but to other parts of the world as well. When we see in the state of Michigan people unable to withdraw their savings from the banks, we cannot help but feel there certainly must be something wrong with the whole capitalistic structure.

Then the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) proceeded:

> The House of Commons is the place where we must enter—I almost said capture.

When the Conservative party in the last election used those terms it was perfectly legitimate, but the moment they are used by the hon. member for Southeast Grey it verges on sedition.

> If every member of the house were a free citizen voting on what seemed to him best, we would not be in the mess we are in.

Those were terms used by the hon. member for Southeast Grey. Some members of this house object to that kind of language being used by a member of parliament, and therefore ask that section 98 of the criminal code be allowed to remain on the statute book. The expression of views of that kind by certain hon. members clearly indicates the need for the deletion of section 98.

It has been claimed further that we should retain the section on account of the conditions that prevail at the present time. I am free to admit that there is a great amount of unrest in Canada, more than there has been for a number of years. But that has not been caused by any action of the communist party, for the communist party is not responsible, nor is even the labour party, for the economic conditions that now prevail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have just taken advantage of them.

Mr. HEAPS: Just the same as hon. members opposite took advantage of economic conditions in 1930. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways. Section 98 of the criminal code will not prevent any political organization from taking advantage of the conditions that prevail. I think if we want to do away with the communist party in Canada we are not going to achieve that result by repressive measures. I would far rather we attempted to do it by changing the conditions that at present exist so that every one who is now out of a job may have employment under decent and healthy conditions. By retaining section 98 in the criminal code we are trying to repress ideas held by individuals. I am one who objects to the use of force, I care not by whom, because force is no remedy for the existing conditions. Force, wherever used, cannot maintain itself permanently, because force begets force; if any party has to be maintained in power by force its power cannot be lasting.

It was pointed out yesterday by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that a person who had in his possession Plato's Republic was charged with sedition. I know people who have been charged with sedition because they quoted certain passages from the Bible. A person so minded could go into a home where there was a Bible and charge the person having such Bible with being in possession of seditious literature. I know people who were charged with sedition, against whom the use of certain passages from the Bible was given as evidence.

Ideas can be classified into two categories, the good and the bad. Those of us who are believers in democratic government have faith in the people, believing that ideas that are bad will be discarded and ideas that are good will ultimately prevail. If ideas are good, I do not care whence they come, let them come out into the open, we have no reason to be afraid of them; if ideas are bad, let them still come out into the open, for I think that is the best way to kill them. By attempting to suppress them we only force them underground, and they thereby become possessed of a strength far greater than they would otherwise have. Consequently I would much rather see us err on the side of leniency, as far as legislation is concerned. Let us have faith in the people of this country, because I am satisfied they will pick out the ideas that they think are best suited to our needs, and in the final analysis we can trust the people to give Canada the government that they themselves desire.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss briefly section 98 of the criminal code, I wish first to say to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps) that his speech, from the standpoint of fairness, was admirable. The striking thing about it to me was that in his thirty minutes' denunciation of the communist party comprising the first part of his speech he was in my view building up a case for those who stand for retaining section 98 in the code. When an effort is made to indicate that those who believe section 98 should remain as it is are actuated by a desire to include within the ambit of section 98 statements such as my hon. friend has attributed to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), speaking in Toronto, such as that about capturing the House of Commons, it goes so far outside of anything contained in section 98 as it now stands as to indicate at once that a red herring is being drawn across the trail and an attempt made to divert the public mind from what is actually contained in that section.

Speaking in the house the last evening this measure was under consideration, the hon. ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made two statements to which I would like to refer. First he said that both in Great Britain and in Canada efforts had been made by judicial and parliamentary bodies to define sedition. If his argument meant anything it meant this, that notwithstanding all these efforts, these bodies had found it practically impossible fully to define sedition. And he stated that the common law made provision by which juries and courts could in their own way, as each particular situation arose, define what sedition actually was. Speaking as a layman, not a lawyer, it appears to me that there is certainly nothing in section 98 that in the least degree circumscribes anything that is in the common law or any statute with relation to sedition. The particular class of people or the particular offences that come under this section of the code are clearly set out. There cannot be any misunderstanding, it is expressed as clearly as the English language can make it. In a moment or two I will read the vital clause in the section that defines exactly what the section aims at.

The ex-Minister of Justice also made reference to the origin of section 98, and if I understood him correctly—I have not checked it up in Hansard—he stated that section 98 was a war measure. As a matter of fact section 98 was not a product of the war and did not come into existence because of war conditions. Section 98 was written into the criminal code because of disturbances that took place in the city of Winnipeg, when the persons against whom the section is directed and their agents, directed as to the actions they should take from a foreign country, undertook to turn into a virtual insurrection a simple dispute between a group of working men and their employers, such as we have had in Canada for as long as my memory takes me back and such as we will have again under ordinary conditions. The people, directed as they were to carry out that act, seized the government of the city of Winnipeg and undertook to seize the postal service and to destroy the transportation system of this country. I have here part of the instructions which were forwarded to the committee operating in the city of Winnipeg before this move was taken. These were contained in a letter written by the gentleman who is now the head of the communist organization in the United States, and who then styled himself the head of the One Big Union, with headquarters in Chicago. I intend to read part of his letter to the Winnipeg committee which, as I said a moment ago, undertook to turn into a virtual insurrection a simple dispute between a group of working men and their employers. That is exactly what the communist party of Canada is endeavouring to do to-day. And, if I may say so, notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said and not endeavouring in the least to link him up with it, I want to say now that the political labour party, as represented in this House of Commons, does not in any sense represent organized labour in Canada as we know it.

Mr. HEAPS: I would deny that statement absolutely.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have no doubt my hon. friend will deny it, but I happen to know the viewpoint of a very large body of men throughout this country who form the backbone and the head and front of the organized labour movement. Let me read what Mr. Fred G. Biedenknapp, general organizer of the One Big Union, wrote from Chicago just before the Winnipeg insurrection:

> The true communist and labour leader rejoices more over one unsuccessful strike than over ten strikes that succeed.

And I presume the hon. member who has just spoken will agree with that statement.

What the O.B.U. and similar organizations aim to create is not better working conditions for the average man but worse conditions. The workingman, or organization of workingmen, who strikes for higher wages and gets them, or for better working conditions and fewer hours of labour, and gets them, is not the material from which revolutionists are made. He is likely to be contented and take a conservative so-called sane view of a world in which the conditions have been easier and better for him. On the other hand, the striker, or group of strikers, who fails, are likely to be more embittered against the employers, the whole employing class and society generally and after repeated failures of this kind they will come to the conclusion that striking and voting are alike useless to improve the workingmen's lot, and they will listen to the red who talks intelligently of direct action and the overthrow of society and forms of government as at present constituted.

We have heard a lot of this in recent times from public platforms across Canada.

We have already two million workers—

My hon. friend said Winnipeg had two thousand of those.

—members of the O.B.U., and our numbers continue to grow as one successful strike follows another. Therefore, we, of the new vision, encourage strikes not because we desire to better the workingmen's conditions but in order that they may fail.

Our first aim must be to destroy organized labour as it has previously existed. It is one of the chief obstacles to a successful revolution in any country where it exists.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. NICHOLSON: June, 1919.

Mr. HEAPS: That was months after the strike started.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is no use trying to sidestep it; my hon. friend knows that what I say is correct. The strike in Winnipeg did not amount to anything; it was nothing more than the strike of the employees of a small basket factory, or something of that kind. The fact is that the strike was used in order to bring about a revolution in the city of Winnipeg. The government of Winnipeg was actually seized, and as an evidence of the character of the government that was sought to be set up by these people, their first act was to deprive the children of Winnipeg of their supply of milk.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not correct.

Mr. MacMILLAN: Yes, it is.

Mr. HEAPS: I was a member of the city council at the time, and I should know something about it.

Mr. MacMILLAN: You were also a member of the strike committee, so you should know something about it.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now let me come to the part of section 98 that is the cause of the whole discussion. The section it is desired to repeal reads as follows:

Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force—

My hon. friend spent half an hour, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has spent hours in endeavouring to convince members of this house that this is the very thing they desire to condemn. They profess to be against those who would bring about changes in the social and economic order of this country by——force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force—

Every other part of this section is linked up with these specific acts set out in paragraph one of this section. Let me read them again:

—to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury—

What are the arguments that have been brought forward for the annulment of this section, and to take away that protection from the Canadian people? My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, in introducing his bill a few days ago, said that because of section 98 of the criminal code eight men are now lying in the penitentiary at Kingston, convicted under that paragraph. I am not going to take time to look up Hansard for his exact words, but I think the hon. member will agree that he made this statement. What is the only meaning that can be taken from the hon. gentleman's plea? It is that these men are there unlawfully; that the state brought these men to trial and convicted them of doing things that section 98 says decent, ordinary citizens shall not do in this country. Of what were they convicted? They simply formed an unlawful assembly or association. These people are like ordinary cowards, if I may say so; they run in packs and in groups, and their work is carried on by groups.

I was extremely interested, Mr. Speaker, in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who admits that in his constituency he is surrounded by these people, and who tells us that he has been opposed by them over a long term of years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, that was not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will try once or twice to possess his soul in patience and keep his seat while other hon. members are speaking.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. NICHOLSON: I referred to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is all very well.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is what the hon. gentleman referred to, something that has been referred to in this house many times over. He asked: Where do these people get their money? My hon. friend says that they have a tremendous amount of property in Winnipeg. It is well known that none of them work, they are not engaged in any useful industry or business, the only thing they do is to go across Canada in an endeavour to create dissension among our people and, as my hon. friend admits, take advantage of the times through which we, in common with the whole world, are passing, in order to attempt to break down our social system. My hon. friend said, just as I have said many times over: Where do these people get their money? I could give the house one or two illustrations of where they get their money, illustrations which would indicate that they are getting it from somewhere outside of Canada. The money which these people are spending in the city of Toronto, in northern Ontario, in Kirkland Lake, in Sudbury, in Copper Cliff, and at Hearst, the money they have spent to bring about riots and all that—where is it coming from?

An hon. MEMBER: Russia.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is it exactly, it is coming from Russia. It is sent into Canada and the agents are in this very city.

Mr. IRVINE: Some of it comes from the Conservative party; I can give my hon. friend an instance of that.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. IRVINE: No, it is not nonsense.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend might tell the house from what joke book he got that.

Mr. IRVINE: From the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies).

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member must have been listening to Amos 'n' Andy before coming here to-night.

Mr. IRVINE: I am listening to Amos now.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member is listening to one of those who stand for law and order in this country.

Mr. IRVINE: Disorder.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And he will continue to stand for law and order, and will endeavour as far as possible to oppose those who want to bring about a condition which would make it impossible to carry out the very things outlined in this statute.

I do not intend to refer in detail to the remarks of the hon. member who introduced this bill (Mr. Woodsworth), but I should like to quote briefly from Hansard of February 14, at page 2098. The hon. member for South-east Grey almost went into a fit of apoplexy last night because another hon. member suggested that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had used the word "force" or had suggested that force might be used. In introducing the bill to amend section 98, after referring to something which had taken place in Manitoba and in England, the hon. member went on to say:

> My point is that if the use of force under certain circumstances is so well recognized by our own leading men, and has been so generally recognized all down through the years, it seems very like persecution to set up a law that permits a certain group of men whose opinions are repugnant to the majority of people in Canada to be persecuted simply for holding that in certain contingencies resort must be had to force.

Those gentlemen who are residing to-night —I sincerely trust they will remain there for some time—within the portals of Kingston penitentiary advocated the use of force in this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I think in fairness it should be said that these men were prosecuted because they belonged to an organization.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt without the permission of the speaker.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will accept the hon. gentleman's correction. He states that they were not convicted individually for advocating force but were convicted as an association for advocating force—combined force instead of individual force. His words are specific; he states that these people should not be punished simply for holding that in certain contingencies resort must be had to force. There is nothing in this act which prevents a man from defending himself, from using force to defend his family or his home, but there is something in the act which prevents him from entering into a conspiracy with other people to destroy my home or to destroy society as a whole. Hon. members have referred to the position of organized labour and the churches, they have mentioned the petitions sent in here against section 98 of the criminal code, but they know perfectly well that there is nothing within the four corners of that section which would affect in the least degree any man who is willing to abide by the law and live as a decent Canadian should live. There is nothing against a man who is willing to endeavour to create harmony instead of distrust and disrespect.

For these reasons I shall vote to have section 98 of the criminal code left just as it is.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I believe that those who advocate force when in power would have no hesitation in using it when out of power in order to gain their end if they had the opportunity, and so I am beginning to feel rather afraid of removing section 98 from the statute book. In anticipation of the success of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at the next election, I would not be a bit surprised if we might not want to use section 98 against the unlawful assemblies of hon. gentlemen opposite who are now advocating the use of force against helpless people who have speeches to make. It is quite possible that this section will be of some use sooner or later.

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Nicholson) has indicated that a man is at liberty to use force in defence of his family and home. If the western farmer hears that it may create a great deal of trouble.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It certainly will when the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation tries to operate.

Mr. IRVINE: The western farmers may want to defend their homes against foreclosures, and they may quote the words of my hon. friend which gives them the liberty to use force in defence of their homes against foreclosures by sheriffs, and such like. He had better be careful or he may be getting into trouble.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hour for private bills has elapsed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Contributions to Empire Bureaux, $21,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister was to give some information as to where these different bureaux were located and what they were doing.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Information was asked regarding the location of these bureaux. They are all in the United Kingdom, two in London and eight others at different places in England, Scotland and Wales.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the nature of the work they are carrying on?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Their work is to accumulate from all parts of the empire results of research work and to disseminate that information through the different parts of the empire. Last year I believe they sent out reports numbering in the neighbourhood of 10,000. This is just a machine for accumulating the results of research and disseminating them. The contract is for five years, from 1929 to 1934.

Item agreed to.

International Institute of Agriculture, $8,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister please explain the work of this institute?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This institute is also a machine for the gathering of agricultural statistics and reports, and disseminating them through the various countries that contribute to its upkeep. It is not an empire but a world arrangement.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where is it located?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In Rome.

Mr. YOUNG: How often does it send out reports?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Regularly, annually.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood this institute was organized for the purpose of keeping the world informed as to the situation in regard to grain, that is the supply and demand, so that people could form an estimate of what the price should be. If the report is an annual one, it would be rather out of date.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In addition to the annual report, they make intermittent reports or they will send reports to any countries that ask for them, but these are summarized in the annual report.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why is there this decrease?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a set sum for membership, but the decrease is due to exchange values, I believe, and also to the fact that we do not make the same contribution towards its publications. Part of the vote is set aside for publications.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): To whom would they make reports? If requests were made for reports, would the reports be made to the government or to the private corporation? I presume the reports come annually to the government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Then the department would furnish that report to the interested party?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is this only in connection with grain or does it deal with other matters?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All farm products, chiefly grain.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give us some idea of the length of the report and where the volume is available? Is it available in the library or in the department, and how voluminous is it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A large number of volumes of the report are available in the library of the Agriculture department and elsewhere in the department.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many countries subscribe to this?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the neighbourhood of forty. I believe the number changes from year to year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When did this grant first begin to be made?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In 1907.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell us whether the reports sent out by this institute are anything like those we get regularly from Broomhall?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Broomhall's reports are practically entirely grain reports. No doubt they will use the reports of the international institute to check up their information.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there any relation between the two items, the International Institute of Agriculture and the empire bureaux, of which we have been speaking?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): None.

Mr. YOUNG: If I remember rightly, a long time ago I read something of this institute and I understood it was organized for the purpose of collecting accurate statistics as to the supply of grain throughout the world with a view to enabling people to estimate fairly correctly what the market price should be and to know whether violent fluctuations were justified. The information given by the minister would indicate that such was not the case; that it was issuing reports at long intervals, so that they would be practically valueless from the point of view of the object for which the bureau was organized.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I gave that impression, I did not intend to do so. The following information is given so far as Canada is concerned.

By cable dispatches as soon as received:

1. Statistics from every adhering country on area sown, prospective crops, quality of crop, total crop.
2. Information concerning nature and extent of animal and plant diseases and insect attacks as they occur.
3. Statistics of exports and imports of foodstuffs and feeds.

By correspondence or through publications:

1. Information statistical, technical or economic concerning farming, both vegetable and animal products.
2. Information concerning the commerce in agricultural products and the prices prevailing in the various markets.

The institute publishes four monthly bulletins and two year books namely:

(a) Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Sociology.

(b) Monthly Crop Report and Agricultural Statistics.

(c) Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Science and Statistics.

(d) International Bulletin of Plant Protection.

(e) International Year Book of Agricultural statistics.

(f) International Year Book of Agricultural Legislation.

Besides these periodicals the institute publishes from time to time comprehensive monographs on various subjects of universal interest which have been more particularly investigated.

The outstanding value of the statistical data published by the institute is that they are reduced, from whatever country they have been obtained, to a common comparative basis so that on simple inspection one grasps easily their relative importance.

Mr. YOUNG: How often are these reports sent out—some of them monthly, some annually?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Did I understand the minister to say that Broomhall bases his estimates on these reports?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that he may use these reports to check up his own estimates.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has explained the difference between the amount of the item for 1933-34 and that for 1932-33. I see the amount this year is $8,500. What is the basis for Canada's quota of $8,500?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The countries are arranged in various groups, and Canada is in a group with that quota.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that the average amount paid by the different countries, or what is the basis?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the time the institute was established, this was the amount that was considered fair for a country of Canada's population in comparison with other countries.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): After this information is received, how is the information put out in Canada? Are publications issued based on the information received?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information received is given on request. It is also disseminated through the bureau of statistics and other channels of government service.

Mr. SPENCER: If I remember correctly, Canada has sent representatives to conventions of this institute from time to time. On what basis are the different countries represented at such conventions? Is the representation based on the amount paid by each country, or according to population, or the amount of grain grown?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each country has so many units which determine its representation.

Mr. VALLANCE: The different countries which are members of the institute pay a certain percentage.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes; there are some forty countries.

Mr. SPENCER: Does each country pay the expenses of its own delegates?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each country looks after its own representation, and so far as Canada is concerned it has been the practice on some occasions to be represented by the British delegate.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Can the minister tell us if the United States is still represented in the institute? About three years ago the United States was on the point of withdrawing, for a number of reasons which seemed substantial to them, but I have not heard if they have actually withdrawn. Has the United States or any other country withdrawn?

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My impression, which I shall be glad to verify, is that the United States have withdrawn officially, but they still maintain a contact with it. I have not precise information here.

Item agreed to.

Publications, $28,231.

Mr. VALLANCE: The vote for the previous year was $7,500. Why the increase this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Let me explain that by first explaining the decreased vote last year. Last year, when we were endeavouring to cut estimates as low as possible, it was felt that by making use of all the supplies of material left over from the previous year, we could carry on with a smaller vote. That has all been expended, and this year we have to have an increase.

Mr. McINTOSH: What are the names of these publications, or are they too numerous to give to the committee?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are not really publications. This is to pay for the service of sending out publications.

Mr. GERSHAW: How does the department compile lists of farmers to whom these publications are to be sent? I realize that the publications contain much valuable information, and I know farmers who have been anxious to get it but have never succeeded unless they wrote specially for the information they wanted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Different methods have been tried from time to time. It has been felt that to send out the publications indiscriminately would mean a good deal of wastage, because many of them might not be read at all. A list of the publications available is published from time to time, or any farmer who writes to the department for a particular publication receives it, and when the publication is sent to him there goes with it a list of new publications; he is requested to mark any that he wants, and they are then sent to him.

Mr. YOUNG: This vote is to pay for sending out the publications, for the services of the clerks addressing envelopes, and so on?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, addressing envelopes and duplicating.

Mr. YOUNG: Under what item is the cost of the publications themselves?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That comes under each branch.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the total cost of all the publications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would come under the votes for the various branches. The cost of the experimental farm publications, for instance, would come under the experimental farms branch. I have no record showing the total cost of the publications under each branch.

Mr. YOUNG: It would be interesting to have that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to see if I can get it.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do the weekly farm reports come under this vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are prepared in the branch concerned and distributed by the publications branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are the clerks who perform this service appointed by the Civil Service Commission or by the minister without regard to the commission?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand that they are civil service appointments.

Item agreed to.

Dairying, $246,300.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of what the Prime Minister said the other day when speaking of the Russian barter proposal, would it best suit the convenience of the minister to discuss that proposal under this vote or under the live stock vote? The Prime Minister promised that when the agriculture estimates came up we would be given the opportunity to discuss the whole Russian barter proposal. As a certain percentage of the cattle concerned in that proposal were dairy cattle, it occurred to me that the minister might wish to have the question discussed under this vote. I am quite prepared, however, to suit his convenience in the matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the spirit of the hon. gentleman's remarks. I understand that the Minister of Justice, when a question was asked him the other day, said that the Russian barter proposal could be discussed under the live stock item. As the papers were not submitted until this afternoon perhaps it would be satisfactory to members of the opposition, as it would be to me, to defer the discussion until the live stock vote comes up.

Mr. VALLANCE: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Cold storage warehouses, $140,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is a reduction of $60,000 in this item. Just how does the minister propose to make that cut?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On the basis of the requests last year it was felt that we could carry on this year with $140,000. It is expected that that will meet all present commitments and, allowing for certain contracts not being completed, there will be sufficient to take care of any new or contemplated obligations for this year. It is also felt that at the present time there is no shortage of cold storage space.

Mr. REID: In what cold storage plants are these commitments to be expended this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The commitments are as follows:

| Name | Location | Amount |
|---|---|---|
| Nova Scotia Public Fish and Cold Storage Terminals, Limited. . | Halifax, N.S. | $41,352 36 |
| Pacific Coast Terminals, Limited | New Westminster, B.C. | 23,784 34 |
| Norfolk Fruit Growers Association (1) | Simcoe, Ontario | 2,500 00 |
| Norfolk Fruit Growers Association (2) | Simcoe, Ontario | 4,000 00 |
| Penticton Co-operative Growers Association | Penticton, B.C. | 1,770 15 |
| Prince Edward County Fruit Growers | Picton, Ontario | 4,403 23 |
| Georgian Bay Fruit Growers, Limited | Clarksburg, Ontario | 2,560 00 |
| Trenton Cold Storage Company, Limited | Trenton, Ontario | 6,200 00 |
| La Sarre Creamery | La Sarre, Quebec | 320 00 |
| Middlesex Growers Co-operative | Strathroy, Ontario | 1,526 25 |
| W. L. Hamilton | Collingwood, Ontario | 805 00 |
| Thedford Cold Storage Company | Thedford, Ontario | 4,340 00 |
| Kelowna Growers Exchange (1) | Kelowna, B.C. | 4,060 00 |
| Kaleden Co-operative Growers Association | Kaleden, B.C. | 4,235 00 |
| Berwick Fruit Company | Berwick, N.S. | 4,703 37 |

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is the vote for the purpose of repairs or for building new plants?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is for new cold storage equipment.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What revenue is derived from those cold storage warehouses?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no revenue to the government.

Mr. TOTZKE: What percentage does the government pay towards the building of these plants?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Thirty per cent spread over four years.

Mr. REID: Could the minister tell us the total amount paid to the Pacific Cold Terminals Limited in New Westminster?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member referring to the total payment?

Mr. REID: Yes, the total payments which have been made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We will have to work out that information, and will be in a position to give it in about five minutes.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there any application from any part of Saskatchewan which could not be accepted because of the cut in the estimates?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that there has not been.

Mr. LUCAS: Can the minister tell us the total number of cold storage warehouses in Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member refer to the plants to which contributions have been made?

Mr. LUCAS: I refer to the plants which come under this vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Fifty-seven warehouses have been subsidized under authority of the act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has the minister any information with respect to the interesting experiment being carried on in the Pacific cold storage terminals in connection with the freezing of fresh fruits, such as strawberries and loganberries? Large quantities of these fruits were shipped and frozen, and turned out afterwards in fresh condition. Is that experiment being continued?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, it is being continued, and the experiment is working out satisfactorily.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How are the revenues of cold storage plants standing up in these hard times?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand they are all in operation, and in view of the times through which we are passing they are doing very well.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are all in operation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, all in operation.

Item agreed to.

Fruit, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $456,200.

Mr. TOTZKE: Why is there an increase in this item?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe some of the $30,000 increase is for travelling expenses, and some of it is necessary on account of the shortage in equipment which was brought about by a smaller vote last year. Then, there is an additional staff for apple maggot work in Ontario and the maritimes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the minister still think the Canadian Horticultural Council should receive this $5,000?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I do.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are perhaps the most representative body that we could have in an agricultural industry, and it is of great value to the government to have such a body whose advice may be accepted. They are competent to tell us of the needs of the farmers engaged in the fruit industry, and in that way we gain the information through which we may render assistance.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is any of the $5,000 allocated to the Canadian Horticultural Council used in disseminating information acquired by the horticultural council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This grant is given with very few strings attached. The money is used to defray expenses of the executive. No doubt some of the work of the executive is as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. VALLANCE: The publication of the findings of the Canadian Horticultural Council is being paid for out of this $5,000, so that the council itself does not receive the $5,000 as indemnity for sitting as a council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not believe I understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the $5,000 merely to indemnify the council for their time in sitting, or is a certain percentage of the $5,000 paid out for the dissemination of information acquired by the council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The members who sit on the council receive no indemnity. They receive only expenses.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is indemnity. Is it correct to say that the whole $5,000 goes to pay the expenses of the horticultural council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, this money is put into a fund created by the horticultural council to carry on its work. This is our contribution to that fund.

Mr. YOUNG: What is their work?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In a general way they are a clearing house for the whole horticultural industry. Perhaps I could not do better than to read the description I have before me:

During the past year the Canadian Horticultural Council had in membership elected representatives of the various branches of horticulture in Canada, including fruit growers, vegetable growers, amateur horticulturists, nurserymen, florists and gardeners and wholesale fruit and vegetable dealers. The council was, therefore, as usual fully in a position to represent the consolidated views of the horticultural interests of the dominion.

As an indication of its representative nature the following list of representatives upon the council during the past year is cited:

President—Walter J. Cook (vegetable grower), Kingston, Ont.

Chairman—W. B. Somerset (fruit grower), Burlington, Ont.

Fruit Growers

R. H. Macdonald, Vernon, B.C.
Paul A. Fisher, Burlington, Ont.
W. J. Tawse, Montreal, Que.
W. W. Hubbard, R.R. No. 1, Oromocto, N.B.
John A. McDonald, Upper Dyke Village, N.S.

Vegetable Growers

Fred Lewis, Vernon, B.C.
Walter J. Cook, Kingston, Ont.
Charles Haeck, St. Martin, Que.
F. W. Bishop, Paradise, N.S.
W. J. Boulter, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Nurserymen

E. B. Luke, Montreal, Que.

Florists and Gardeners

Chas. Craig, Ottawa, Ont.

Amateur Horticulturists

Dr. C. F. Patterson, Saskatoon, Sask.

Canadian Fruit Jobbers

Karl B. Conger, Ottawa, Ont.
A. McCallum, Winnipeg, Man.

Chairmen of Committees

W. B. Somerset—Markets committee.
Dr. W. T. Macoun—Ornamental horticultural committee.
E. B. Luke—Publicity committee.
Fred Lewis—Transportation committee.
Prof. W. A. Middleton—Economics committee.

53719—141½

Due to the unsatisfactory financial state of the industry, with prevailing prices much below cost of production, the problems handled by the counciil during the past year were more numerous, more intricate and probably broader in scope than those with which the council had been called upon to deal during any of the past ten years. In spite of the abnormal business conditions and due to some extent at least to the activities of the council, the horticultural industries face the coming year with possibly a slightly better feeling than most of the agricultural interests.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the minister reading from?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A synopsis I had prepared for my own information, to satisfy myself of the work they were doing.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask how often this horticultural council meets, or do they just meet when called?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have one annual meeting, usually, if not always, held in Ottawa; and they have an executive that meets from time to time.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell me if there was a grant of $5,000 to the horticultural council last year, and if so, the number of the grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under the same item, but in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have the supplementary estimates here. but I cannot find it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that it was deleted from the regular estimates, but voted in the supplementaries under this heading.

Mr. DONNELLY: I cannot find it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I ask the hon. member if the supplementary estimates he has are those of this year or of the end of the fiscal year ended March 31, 1932?

Mr. DONNELLY: March 31, 1933.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would not be the supplementary estimates in which it would be included.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that in addition to this $5,000 the horticultural council have a free office in Ottawa, at government expense, that their telephone is attached to the central of this building, and that they have other perquisites. May I ask what is the total cost to the government of this association?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe they occupy a room in a government building, but my information is that the telephone is not a government telephone.

Mr. YOUNG: I think it is on the exchange of this building.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The number is Queen 1165. It is not charged to the government.

Mr. DONNELLY: I cannot find the vote. I have the supplementary estimates of last year and this year, and it is not in them.

Mr. VALLANCE: While the minister is looking that up, I hold in my hand the supplementary estimates of 1932-33 and the estimates of 1933-34. I find in the supplementary estimates, No. 332, "fruit, further amount required, $31,000." Would it come under that item?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might be included in that estimate.

Mr. DONNELLY: It cannot be, because in the estimates for 1932-33 the amount is $426,200. If I add up the estimates we had last year I get only $421,000, so there is $5,000 missing somewhere.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to check that up and give the information the next time the estimates come down.

Mr. YOUNG: A year or two ago I placed on Hansard part of the report of the annual meeting of this association. If I recall aright, the growers at that time were withdrawing from the association because they said the whole association had degenerated into a political organization. I notice from what the minister said to-night that the growers appear to be in again. Will the minister tell us if they have composed their difficulties and have ceased their political activities?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As far as my information goes they have never been a political body. My recollection is that in Ontario there was some misunderstanding between the amateur horticulturists and those in what we might call a commercial way. I cannot say whether those differences have been settled or not. My understanding is that it was more a personal difference.

Mr. YOUNG: Does not the minister know that the bulk of the growers had withdrawn from their organization, that they complained that they were some 85,000 as against some 5,000 dealers or processors, but that the 5,000 had full control of the organization?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The growers' organization is still in existence. They have elected their officers, and they were present at the annual meeting that concluded, I believe, in Ottawa yesterday.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask whether this horticultural council is representative of all Canada? Is every province interested in this council? And as to this grant of $5,000 per year, is there an equitable distribution, province by province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grant is given to the dominion association to carry on for the year. There would be no distribution of it to any provincial organization. My understanding is that it is a very representative body.

Mr. VALLANCE: Last year the supplementaries and the regular estimates combined, $426,000 and $31,000, make a total of $457,000 voted under this item. Does the minister contemplate any supplementaries on this item?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has Saskatchewan any representation on this horticultural council?

Mr. MacNICOL: They only grow wheat.

Mr. McINTOSH: They grow something better than you.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are eligible for representation. They have none at present.

Mr. YOUNG: This is $5,000 out of $456,000. Will the minister tell us what is done with the rest of the money?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The greater part of it is spent in salaries of fruit and vegetable inspectors. On this there is returnable in fees for what is known as commercial inspection in the neighbourhood of $90,000. So against this amount approximately $90,000 will be collected and returned to the receiver general.

Mr. YOUNG: What did these gentlemen do for their salaries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Their principal duty was inspecting fruit and vegetables and attaching their certificates setting out the grades for interprovincial and export trade. Last year they were engaged longer than usual in making a survey of orchards in connection with the presence of apple maggot.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that there is considerable dissatisfaction among many growers with the way these inspections are carried on. They feel that the whole power has been centralized too much and that this work could be done more efficiently and more economically by local authorities. Has the minister had any complaints along that line?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Complaints have been made by individuals and those complaints have been investigated. So far as I am aware, complete satisfaction was expressed by those individuals after the matter was gone into thoroughly.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not my information. I am told this expenditure is wholly unjustified and that the work could be done for a fraction of this sum if it were performed by local authorities. Further I should like to ask why this service is not made self-supporting, like the administration of the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It could be made self-supporting if the hon. member felt that under present conditions, with prices so low, it would be advisable to make a further levy or charge which would have to be deducted from the receipts of the producers. With regard to this work being done locally, I think almost everyone would agree that this would be a very dangerous practice. Let us consider what might happen in connection with the shipping of apples to the old country. If there was a local inspector in Ontario, for example, terrific pressure might be brought to bear on him by a friend whose apples were infected. A shipment might be made, and as a result an embargo against all Canadian apples might be put in force. We feel that the work is done in a very satisfactory manner at present, and in any case, the apples would have to be accompanied by a certificate in order to be exported.

Mr. YOUNG: The dominion certificate would have to go with the shipment, but is it necessary to have the orchards inspected, and so on, before that certificate can be given? Could not that be done better by men right on the ground, familiar with local conditions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We feel that it is all gain to have the men who are to inspect these apples for export survey the orchards and advise the growers as to the importance of spraying and other control measures. We believe the inspectors will be able to have a better picture of general conditions and to carry on a better inspection of the districts where there are infected orchards. In Nova Scotia this year they appointed a non-partisan committee which has just completed a survey of the Annapolis valley for the purpose of ascertaining public opinion in connection with the enforcement of regulations. They believe that they can get men there who can carry out the surveys of the orchards at a lower cost than would be the case if we sent men who might be better qualified to do the export inspection. They are now preparing for submission to me a statement as to the difference in cost, and if it is as appreciable as the hon. member suggests this work will be done in that way.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not know what credence can be placed in newspaper reports, but it is intimated in the press that when the budget comes down we will be confronted with a deficit running into eight figures. In view of this fact, if it is a fact, I do not think this enormous expenditure can be justified, and I would suggest that this amount be cut in half.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope the hon. member who made that suggestion is not serious, because the agriculture estimates already have been cut quite enough. I do not understand why my hon. friend the minister has restored the grant to the horticultural council while the dairy council remains out in the cold. Surely he does not take the ground that horticulture is of greater importance than dairying, or that in times such as these the dairy industry does not require the aid of a council. Dairying has gone to the bow-wows, though we were led to expect something very different if only hon. gentlemen could get rigging up the tariff with regard to butter. The dairy industry needs support now more than it ever did. It is not on an export basis, yet prices never have been so low in the history of the proverbial oldest inhabitant. If we were on an export basis the prices probably would be even lower by possibly five cents.

This is an opportunity for my hon. friend to come to the aid of a very important branch of agriculture, just "when a feller needs a friend." I do not expect the minister to deal with dairying now as that vote is passed; but I want to commend him for restoring the horticultural grant. Look how nice and quiet it is here this Friday evening. To-night my hon. friend could get through almost anything that had any reason to it. If he can get as suitable a night another year I would suggest that the grant to the national dairy council be restored also.

My hon. friend from Weyburn raised an important question when he spoke about local fruit inspectors. To an outsider the appointment of local inspectors would seem to be the best and cheapest way to carry on this work. They have not far to travel and they are acquainted with local conditions, but according to my experience this is really the worst way to carry on the work. That statement applies not only to fruit but to almost everything else as well. We should have inspectors with as little social or other connection as possible in the vicinity of their work; then we will get the best results, and I think that applies to almost all forms of inspection. As a matter of fact we want to have that policy followed in the maritimes a little more than is the case at present. They have perhaps the most beautiful apples in the world down there, but it is the most difficult place to introduce a proper inspectional service because of the tendency of hanging on to old methods of inspection. One reason, however, is the continuation of local inspectors. Many do not even yet look upon such appointments as coming from the Civil Service Commission particularly; they prefer to obtain them otherwise, and some do not take the work very seriously. I am glad to know that some improvement is being shown in that respect since shipping point inspection was adopted two or three years ago, but still I believe the further they can get away from local inspectors the better it will be for them. We have had the great danger of too much local influence being exercised on the inspectors, who in the past have looked upon their positions as political perquisites. This is now the exception, I understand, rather than as formerly, the general rule.

Let me tell the committee that inspectional service has practically no value at all unless the certificates are lived up to. The hon. member for Parkdale is a dealer in fruit and vegetables, and he knows that to be so. A certificate is just a piece of paper; its value depends upon the character of the inspection and the manner in which the inspector has lived up to the regulations. When a certificate has that one hundred per cent value it becomes almost as negotiable as a barrel of apples itself. In connection with wheat a buyer depends upon the certificate; that is what it is for. No one doubts a wheat certificate, especially since mixing was stopped, and no one doubts a cheese certificate. The buyer accepts that certificate without ever looking at the product, and that should be the case with each of our exportable farm products. Perhaps when we get things standardized and adopt the practices that have been in vogue in connection with cheese and grain, these fruit certificates will become so well established and so well known that they will become accepted without question. That has not been the case in the past with regard to fruit, especially in the maritimes and to a lesser degree in other parts, but I am glad to know that these conditions are improving greatly there. This service will not be fully improved until the local inspection service is discontinued as much as possible, allowing the locally qualified men to inspect in other places. Is the chief fruit inspector still in the department?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He has retired.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was about time.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) mean that local inspectors should be used irrespective of their knowing anything about the work? If that is so, I do not agree with him. It takes years of study to qualify as an inspector for the foreign market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Certainly not.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain how this is done? Take John Brown; he has a fine orchard of apples and would like to export. Just how will he proceed to have his orchard inspected and obtain a licence to export?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The actual inspection occurs when they are being packed or being delivered to the pre-cooling plant.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to know every step he would have to take.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the inspection for export?

Mr. YOUNG: I want the whole thing. John Brown wants to export his apples and before he can do that he must have an exporter's licence. I want to know how he will proceed to get that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no export licence; the apples are inspected and if they pass inspection they are eligible for export.

Mr. YOUNG: Where are they inspected?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the large orchards, as they are being packed, and in other instances, when they are being shipped into cold storage.

Mr. YOUNG: Do I understand that before John Brown can pick and pack his apples he has to wait until a dominion inspector is on the ground?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister says they must be inspected while they are being packed; I do not see how that can be done unless an inspector is there.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the large orchards, they are inspected while they are being packed, otherwise they are inspected when being loaded into cars or sent into the cold storage.

Mr. YOUNG: When apples are being loaded into cars they are either in boxes or in barrels, and I should like to know how an inspector from Ottawa or anywhere else can inspect apples in sealed boxes and barrels.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The great majority of the apples are inspected while they are being packed in the large orchards. The staff is sufficiently large to carry on this work, and we extend this service as far as possible to the smaller orchards. The survey made of where the apple maggot is occurring guides the inspectors in the closeness of the inspection which they feel is necessary.

Mr. YOUNG: There must be a considerable staff of inspectors employed for a short season while the apples are being packed; what do these men do the rest of the year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They may do anything they wish, as they are just temporary employees for short periods.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice there is a reduction of $381,948 in the total estimates for agriculture this year, and I should like to know if this reduction is the result of the interprovincial conference held in Ottawa some time ago when the overlapping of the dominion and provincial departments of agriculture was discussed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): An inspection of the estimates as a whole will show how the decrease is accounted for. Part of it is as a result of arrangements made at that conference, and we hope that next year a further reduction will be possible.

Mr. DONNELLY: There is no objection from the prairie provinces to this vote, but the wheat growers feel that they are being discriminated against to a certain extent. Perhaps my remarks should be directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). We are asked to pay for the grading and weighing of our wheat and surpluses have occurred from this charge which were turned into the public revenue. I do not know whether a surplus exists at the present time, but there was one a few years ago. The grain growers are in just as serious a financial position as the fruit growers, and assistance in the inspection and grading of wheat would be welcomed.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand that representations were made by the railways to the railway commission to increase the classification on bulk apples in order to put the rate up on a level with the rate on packed apples.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say whether or not an application was made to increase the freight rate on bulk apples, but the committee might be interested to know that last night the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself met a delegation asking for the lowering of the rate on packed fruit from British Columbia to the prairies. This matter is under consideration, and it is hoped that a reduction may be made. This would be a comparable reduction to that made in the case of feed grains going from the prairies to the west.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Was that unpacked or bulk shipments?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Bulk shipments, but not necessarily carload bulk.

Mr. McINTOSH: If the application I referred to was made, I would like to know the position of the horticultural council upon this very important matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The council went on record as opposing an increase in the rate.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): That is an increase on shipments of bulk apples, the classification having been raised last fall?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, on the bulk rate.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister said there was no such thing as an exporter's licence; is there an exporter's certificate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): An export inspection certificate. Any fruit to be eligible for export must have an export certificate.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it necessary to have the orchard inspected in order to get that certificate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): A short time ago the minister read a synopsis of a recent meeting of the horticultural council here in Ottawa. He mentioned several names, and I should like to know if those individuals are producers of fruit or jobbers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think in reading the names I stated what they were. For instance, the president is a vegetable grower; the chairman is a fruit grower. They are the elected representatives of growers' organizations, dealers' organizations and others connected with the industry of horticulture.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I notice the item states that they are facing considerable difficulties at the present time and looking to the future with no great hope. Knowing this organization a few years ago put out certain political propaganda with regard to increased protection against fruit coming from the United States, I was wondering whether they had not at that time received something that would solve their difficulties. I wonder now what their difficulties are. They have surely, under this government, all the protection they need. What is their trouble to-day? What are they clamouring for?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The chief difficulty at present is the low price of their fruit due to low purchasing power, also difficulties in British Columbia with the fire blight; in Ontario the apple maggot and coddling moth, and in the maritimes the apple maggot. The work of the department is to serve in the best possible way all branches or phases of agriculture, and I know of no better way in which we could get such representative opinion than through a body like this, elected by the people concerned.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Do they admit the protection they have received from the government has been of no value to them?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have never discussed with them anything that might be considered as being of a political nature.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): They believe it is not.

Mr. YOUNG: What are the regulations in regard to the spraying of orchards? The minister spoke of pests existing in all the provinces.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulations for spraying are provincial and therefore are not under control of the federal department. As the hon. member knows, perhaps better than I do, the spraying depends upon the nature of the pest it is desired to combat. The spraying, however, is largely under provincial direction.

[Mr. R. McKenzie.]

Mr. YOUNG: This, then, is the situation: spraying the orchards and fighting the pest that is infesting the apple are under provincial control, but the inspection of the fruit is under federal control. Is that a sane system?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that it is sound that the provincial authorities have control of the product that is grown, because they are the people on the ground; but as regards export certificates that will really carry any weight in foreign countries, the matter should be under federal supervision.

Mr. YOUNG: When the federal officials are going to issue an export certificate, do they consult the provincial officials to find out whether an orchard has been properly sprayed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not necessarily. As regards the case in Nova Scotia I cited, our man assisted the provincial men to start the campaign. We felt that our man, on account of perhaps longer and wider experience, would be able to advise them.

Mr. MALCOLM: With regard to export certificates on fruit, are there many complaints as to the fruit not being up to standard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Practically none. There has been some local complaint this year on account of scab and other diseases, but this does not concern export.

Mr. MALCOLM: I understand we do not give an export certificate except where the fruit is exported to a foreign country, a certificate comparable with a grain certificate.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister says there has been no complaint regarding our export certificates on fruit this year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not sure whether I understand my hon. friend's question. There have been complaints from fruit growers that they could not get export certificates.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is not my question. I am sorry if I did not make it clear. My hon. friend knows the inspection of grain is so close to perfection that very few cases of complaints have been established that the grain was not as represented in the certificates, and, as the former Minister of Agriculture stated, the grain certificate is so good that it passes almost as legal tender. I wanted to ask the minister if we had progressed so far towards a state of perfection in the inspection of apples that there were no complaints from importers in foreign countries.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been practically no complaint this year—none that I know of.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the minister received any complaints from the horticultural council since the tariff on sulphate of copper was increased by ten per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs? They are very keen on these tariff matters. Has there been any complaint as to the increase in the tariff on nitrate of soda?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not that I remember. I could not say without looking up the matter.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I am surprised that the horticultural council, which has been so keen on this question of protection in relation to fruit, has not seen fit to make a complaint when the tariff is working against the interests of the fruit growers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A complaint may have been lodged, but my answer is that I do not remember any.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, etc., also grant of $18,900 to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $443,200.

Mr. YOUNG: This is another item of nearly half a million dollars. Would the minister tell us what we get for our money in this case?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This, again, is chiefly the administration of acts. The great part of it is for the salaries of the men who are carrying out the provisions of these acts, including the inspection and distribution of seeds and the inspection of fertilizers and feeds. Part of the grant, as set out in the item, is to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the minister anything to do with customs duties on fertilizers, or does that come under the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that a shipment of fertilizer being imported cannot be released until it receives a certificate of inspection from our officials.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice a grant of $18,900 to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. In the western provinces we have provincial seed growers' associations. Is this an amalgamation or federation of all the provincial associations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A dominion association, common to all the provinces. The provincial organizations have more to do with merchandising. Each province is represented on the central organization. It is not an amalgamation in the true sense of the word, because it is not comprised of provincial associations.

Mr. VALLANCE: This is not an amalgamation of the commercial and distribution end?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. TOTZKE: I notice that included in this item are grants to seed fairs. How large are these grants, and on what basis are they made?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grant is $50 for each seed fair on condition that the province puts up a like amount.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the total amount of the grants to all seed fairs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not that information at hand.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice that this item is for seed, feed and fertilizer control. How does the department control the fertilizer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): By administering the act respecting fertilizers.

Mr. DONNELLY: Under what vote does the grant for the world's grain congress come?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): An amount was put in the estimates last year which the executive felt would be sufficient, but there is also provision under a number of branches for exhibits at the fair.

Mr. GERSHAW: How extensively is the fertilizer product which is manufactured at Trail being used, and with what results at the experimental farms?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would ask that that question be deferred until the experimental farm item comes up, when I shall be glad to give all the information. The results have been very satisfactory.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood the minister to say that a large part of this vote is for the salaries of seed inspectors who inspect pure bred seed. Some of the farmers used to make a business of growing pure bred seed and selling it to their neighbours. But there are not many farmers to-day who have money to spend on pure bred seed; they have to get along with the seed they have, and it would naturally follow that we do not need so many inspectors. Would it not be possible to reduce this item accordingly?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the province from which the hon. member comes, much heavier work was done by our inspectors last year to ensure that the seed which the farmers received: especially the oats imported from other provinces, were of a good quality, and that they got value for what they were paying.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the minister mean that the seed put out by the Saskatchewan seed commission was inspected by these inspectors?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Except the wheat that was stored in the elevators in the south. It was not felt necessary to inspect it. We had a conference in Regina, where the plan to be followed was recommended. Any wheat that was imported from other provinces was inspected by our inspectors, also the thousands of bushels of oats that were shipped in.

Mr. DONNELLY: Were the oats that were shipped in to the southern part of the province last year inspected by these inspectors?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All of it.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then they made a very poor job of it, because most of it was wild oats.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member mean seed oats or feed oats?

Mr. DONNELLY: Seed oats.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid the hon. member is misinformed there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that under this vote there is a distribution of grass seed and clover among the western farmers. I hope that a great chunk of this extra $30,000 will be used for filling a lot of orders out there this spring which the government were unable to fill last spring owing to the cut in the vote. What percentage of the fields sown with grass seed and clover last spring secured a good catch?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Eighty-two per cent.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the department buying grass seed for distribution among the farmers of Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, also in Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would appreciate that, but it has been my experience for some years that it is a good thing for Saskatchewan to have a federal minister representing the province, and I would suggest that when the government change they change the location of the Minister of Agriculture so that the rest of us might get an even break once in a while. I notice that Saskatchewan gets an increase of $30,000 this year. We are all very much interested in agriculture, and the agriculture vote is a very respectable one, but I hope that it will not all go to Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What is the total amount of the grants to seed fairs, and how many seed fairs are held?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the total of the grants to seed fairs available in that form.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Has the minister instituted a policy of providing grass seed in various areas in the west?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the prairie provinces, including Manitoba.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): How much was spent on that last year, and what is the policy in that regard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The policy in general is this, that a supply of the best available seed is purchased and is distributed through a provincial committee, in conjunction with federal officers. Last year we were able to supply a minimum of three farmers per municipality, they undertaking to return to the department an equal amount of seed or half the price of the seed two years later. The money so received goes to the credit of the receiver general.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the department inspect the Caragana seed sent out by the Department of Public Works in Regina for the growing of Caragana hedges?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Have the obstacles in the way of the importation of fertilizers, more particularly nitrate of soda, been removed as was promised by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sorry I have not that information.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think the matter has been settled quite satisfactorily.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Satisfactorily to the manufacturer or to the farmer?

Mr. RYCKMAN: To the farmer.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where are these seed grain fairs held in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are two provincial fairs in Saskatchewan, one at Maple Creek and the other at Saskatoon.

Mr. VALLANCE: Surely the minister does not mean that. Seed grain fairs are legion in Saskatchewan. Within a short radius of my own farm there are at least half a dozen. Whether they are under provincial or federal jurisdiction I do not know, but I feel sure the minister does not mean to say there are only two or three seed grain fairs in Saskatchewan.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my information regarding fairs to which we contribute.

Item agreed to.

Entomology, $30,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice there is an increase of $25,000 in this vote, and I am wondering what new bug has caused this increase. I am sincere, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD: You look it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You mean, what new humbug.

Mr. VALLANCE: The ex-Minister of Agriculture has suggested that I am referring to a new humbug, but I should like to know why the increase has been made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The increase is due to increased travelling expenses transferred from civil government, and equipment.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the purpose of the vote? How is the money to be expended?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For headquarters staff organization.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the minister refer to the staff in Ottawa? I take it he does not include the laboratories at different points, such as the one at Annapolis Royal.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under what vote does it come?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The next vote.

Item agreed to.

Administration of Destructive Insect and Pest Act, $673,300.

Mr. YOUNG: Explain.

Mr. VALLANCE: Could the minister tell us what insects we have in larger proportions than we have had at other times, and why it is necessary to spend $30,000 more this year than last year? Surely the pests of the Tories are not increasing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are increased expenditures in connection with inspection work concerning apple maggot control, and in connection with a threatened invasion of the dreaded Japanese beetle, particularly to the Niagara peninsula.

Mr. BROWN: Has the Dominion government anything to do with the control of the grasshopper pest in western Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Federal men make surveys, in other words they do the scouting work. They give information to the provinces concerning the likelihood and the extent of the grasshopper outbreaks. The federal government, however, does not supply any of the materials for poisoning, for instance, in the coming spring it is feared there will be another very serious outbreak of grasshoppers. The federal men will assist provincial officers in supervising the work which is done, the provinces supplying the material and the actual labour costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: What part of the work in connection with apple maggot control is done by the federal government?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The federal government does much of the orchard survey work and the inspection work, certifying shipments for export. We report on the extent to which the infested area may be affected.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are additional men required, or what men are used? For instance, do you use the staffs at Kentville and Annapolis Royal?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The work is done mostly by fruit branch inspectors, although last year other inspectors of the entomological branch were used.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I think it is about time the government of Canada made a concerted effort to exterminate the insect pests which have been blighting our country for some time. Had hon. members been in points adjoining the constituency of Long Lake during the last summer they would realize the magnitude of the damage done. In a stretch a hundred miles long and fifty miles wide, as a result of the ravages of grasshoppers, army worms and cutworms, all plant growth was stopped. We have to fight these pests, and we might as well make up our minds to do it. There is an increase in the vote, and I hope that as a result there may be more complete cooperation between federal and provincial departments in the extermination of these pests.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Strange as it may seem, I am going to lend my support to the hon. member for Long Lake. I appreciate fully what he has said with respect to grasshopper damage in western Canada last year. It was particularly bad in the area from which I come, where early in the spring I saw hundreds of fields eaten off as bare as a floor. In some sections of the country grasshoppers have totally destroyed gardens and green vegetables. Those of us who are familiar with the damage they do readily appreciate how necessary it is to take all possible steps to control them. I am happy to see that the vote has been increased by $30,000. I am just wondering if the minister has a report on what conditions may be next spring, in the event of another grasshopper outbreak. I am not asking him to read it, but I am wondering if the report is available for some of us to see. Last year about this time a map was published indicating in a general way the areas which might be infested by grasshoppers. May a similar report be expected this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Maps are under preparation now. In certain areas, and especially in the southern part of Manitoba, there is evidence of outbreaks worse than those of last year. It has been estimated that in some districts there are 100,000 grasshopper eggs per square foot.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us anything with regard to the progress they are making in connection with information concerning cutworms? Last year information was given out in western Canada as to how the farmers should handle their summer fallow to meet the cutworm pest. Many of those farmers are claiming the information was absolutely wrong. I have spoken to some who said that the sections of land in connection with which they followed governmental instructions were infested with cutworms and other sections were not. Some tracts of land were split in two, half being cultivated and the remainder left with a hard top, through which, it was stated, the cutworm could not go. The result was that where the ground was left with a hard top there were cutworms, and where it was cultivated there were none. Can the minister give us any further information concerning this pest?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sure the hon. member realizes how difficult it is for any branch to give information that will be foolproof having reference to climatic conditions, soil, and so forth. Especially around Indian Head last year there was a good deal of criticism that those who did not follow the instructions sent out by this branch did not have the same damage from cutworms as some of their neighbours who did. We made a careful examination as soon as the complaints came in, and we received every cooperation from those who at first were critical. The control recommendations are built upon the preference of the moth in egg-laying and are designed (1) to keep land free from cutworm eggs by maintaining it in a crusted condition during the period of egg-laying, namely, August and the first half of September, (2) to save the crop being eaten out where cutworms are present in a field by the use of an indicator strip, and (3) to prevent reseeding of fields destroyed by cutworms until after the cutworms have ceased feeding. The recommendations as published, interpreted and applied by farmers, have proven to be of the very greatest value throughout the entire infested area of Alberta and Saskatchewan wherever they were seriously attempted. Here is a report regarding the outbreak:

The campaign which has been in progress for three years was carried out by officers stationed at Assiniboia, Indian Head, Saskatoon, Drumheller and Lethbridge. It has involved the forecasting of the outbreaks, the distribution of 2,500 posters, 100,000 pamphlets and maps, reinforced by a press campaign and a personal canvass of thousands of farmers. The control practices were of very great value and the savings of crops throughout the areas infested unquestionably amounted to tens of millions of bushels of grain. Even under the most difficult conditions such as those where there had been soil drifting in the autumn of 1931 and the spring of 1932, Indian Head region, the recommended control practices reduced the losses almost a half. Elsewhere, and in the great proportion of the area wherever the control practices were seriously attempted, the saving of crop was phenomenally successful and was in practice upon hundreds of thousands of acres.

Mr. DONNELLY: In every village in the south country where you met a group of farmers they were all talking about it, and the general opinion seemed to be that where they followed the advice of the Department of Agriculture and left their summer fallow after the fifteenth of August, the soil was infested with cutworms, but wherever they went on and worked in the fall there were none. This applies not only to the Indian Head region, but to the whole south country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I just used that as an illustration.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I think the minister said that no part of this appropriation was used in actual control of the grasshoppers, that it was devoted simply to surveys indicating the possible extent of the outbreak the following year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): None was used in the purchase of material.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I may say to the minister that if his report is right he may be called upon to help, because this thing is coming to be what may well be called a calamity.

Mr. BROWN: I support that statement. In the southern part of my own constituency they are likely to suffer seriously during the coming year. The district represented by my hon. friend from Macdonald had the pest a year earlier than we had, but last year they came to us for the first time, and there is every evidence that the condition will be much worse this year. I know they are very serious. The municipalities will not be able to provide funds to fight the pest. The provincial government, it is true, did so last year, but to what extent they will be able to do so this year I cannot say. It is certain the Dominion government will again be called upon to help in the compaign.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): We cannot afford as a nation to put on a great staff of highly paid experts, college bred men, to do this work, but it seems to me that the minister at the appropriate season could get two or three dozen hard-headed experienced farmers—all Tories, of course—to do the work and help the farmers in the campaign against these pests. I do not know anything that could be better. These farmers are quite capable; their services could be secured for a short period and would be mighty useful. We have simply got to fight these pests. In the early days the ex-Minister of Agriculture will tell you the prairies were swept by prairie fires which roasted these insects and their eggs. I have no objection to roasted grasshoppers, but when they get as they are now they are a menace which we must deal with. Our old friend the prairie fire is gone, and the modern methods of agriculture are not suited to cope with these pests.

Mr. HOWARD: May I ask if any proportion of that money is spent in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A very considerable proportion.

Mr. HOWARD: At what main points?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have laboratories in the Montreal district, Hemmingford district, and field stations in other sections, particularly for the study of forest insects. There are summer camps studying the forest infestation, which is a very serious thing in Quebec.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I do not want to delay the passing of this item, but I should like to impress upon the house the seriousness of the grasshopper menace in southern Manitoba. My hon. friend from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) suggests that we might engage a dozen good Tories to help fight this menace. If he had been in the area which had the grasshopper invasion this year he would appreciate the efforts that were made. In practically every municipality in my constituency there was a mixing station established in which half a dozen men were working day and night, and trucks were running back and forth to Winnipeg practically every day bringing poison ingredients. These were delivered to the farmers round about, who last spring spent the better part of every forenoon for a solid month spreading the poison in an effort to control the grasshoppers, and even then they were not able to control them. At this distance away we may not realize that the grasshopper menace is so very serious, but in southern Manitoba during the latter part of July of last year, when the crops began to ripen and the fields dried up, the grasshoppers, seeking more succulent forage, moved on to the yards and gardens and completely destroyed them, so that not only garden stuff but potatoes and corn and everything was eaten right to the face of the earth. It was not for lack of effort or using plenty of men—and they were not white collar men, as my hon. friend from Long Lake would lead us to believe, but good hardheaded farmers. I hope the minister will give this thing the consideration it deserves, otherwise it is going to spread to a still greater extent.

Mr. COOTE: A good deal of apprehension is felt in some parts of southern Alberta regarding the grasshopper menace. I wonder if the minister has any report from his officials as to whether there is serious risk of an outbreak of grasshoppers in southern Alberta this summer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reports are that there is evidence now that there will be some slight outbreak, but nothing at all in proportion to what is expected in Manitoba. The provincial government has been advised and is making preparations to meet it.

Mr. COOTE: The actual preparations for fighting it are left in the hands of the provincial government?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, with the guidance of the reports they have and the information they receive from our men. Our men are also engaged in an advisory capacity.

Item agreed to.

Assistance to fairs and exhibitions, including the Royal Agricultural Winter fair, $395,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask the minister if he has decided in his own mind, in view of the decrease in this item, where it is proposed to economize. Is he going to pursue the same policy that was followed last year with regard to class B fairs throughout the various provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The decrease is not entirely in the grants to fairs. Previous to this year there were included in this vote grants to junior farmers and farm clubs, but at the suggestion of the auditor general those have been shifted to the live stock vote. This year the policy with reference to fairs, especially class B fairs, is that the grant of last year will be continued, if they meet the standard required, and all such fairs will have the opportunity of earning an additional $500 by way of a regional grant.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Would the minister give us a statement as to the success of the regional fairs last year, and could he tell us where they were held?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not a list of where they were held last year, but they were quite evenly distributed among the different provinces. I think there was one in Ontario at Port Arthur last year and there were two the year before at Peterborough and Lindsay. There was one in Quebec at Ayer's Cliff and in the maritimes at Chatham, one in Manitoba, at Portage la Prairie, one at Melfort in Saskatchewan, one at Red Deer in Alberta and one at Armstrong in British Columbia. On the whole the reports that we have received as to these regional fairs is to this effect: They did give a stimulus, in proportion to the money given, much greater than was the case with the ordinary grant, which has become more or less a matter of routine. This year we are making available to all class B fairs that comply with the conditions already outlined the possibility of earning $500 as a regional grant.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): What was the grant given last year and the year before?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Last year and the year before we did this as an experiment in order to see what would be the result, and as a rule it was given to one place in each province, with the exception of the older and larger provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Previously the sum given was $1,000. The result led us to reduce the offer to $500 and to make it available to all fairs that complied with the regulations.

Mr. SPENCER: What are those conditions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The general condition is this: If in addition to their general fair they put on a competition between the districts surrounding the centre where the fair is held and in that way develop a healthy rivalry as between one district and another, in contrast to the severe competition within the districts which the other method promotes, then they are in line for the grant.

Mr. SPENCER: What areas are included in these districts?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends on local conditions. The agricultural society at Lacombe, for instance, will decide what localities might compete. It might be an area surrounding small C or D fairs, as they are called in the west; it might be a village or a municipality or a number of municipalities. Suggestions are made by the agricultural society.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Who decides what fairs are entitled to this grant of $500?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is entirely in the hands of the fair board. Previous to this year, when we were trying it as an experiment, we asked the advice of the provincial minister of agriculture as to what B fair he thought should get the grant. This year it will be in the hands of the agricultural society or fair board itself. If the B fairs conform to the conditions we set out, and any B fair board may do so, they will be in line for the additional grant of $500.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this competition confined to any particular organizations such as those adjacent to any large centre of population, say a town of 1,800 or 2,000, that has a class B fair now? Has the fair board the right to say what organizations may compete within the district designated by the board? As the minister well knows, we have many organizations throughout the west, in every district.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We will take the hon. member's constituency as an example. If the agricultural society of Kerrobert had paid out sufficient money over a period of years, and this year they could pay out in prizes on live stock and other farm exhibits the sum of money required in the standard, they would be entitled to a regional fair. Then they would meet and decide what places might wish to compete. It might be decided in this way: Coleville might be given an opportunity to compete; Denzil might compete; Salvador, or some of the other districts surrounding Kerrobert might compete, and the number of points made by everyone competing for the one particular district would be totalled. If Unity competed, in the same way their points would be totalled and the community with the most points would get first prize.

Mr. VALLANCE: So it would not be confined to any particular organization? There are various organizations throughout these districts mentioned by the minister. They would be allowed to gather their exhibits and send them in to the local fair?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might not be a village at all; it might be a municipality such as Ruby Lake.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I am quite in sympathy with the regional fair idea which the minister is promoting, and I may say that the Dufferin agricultural society has carried on something along these lines for some time, although they have not gone into it as extensively as the minister now suggests. I recall that in the past organizations such as the local branches of the United Farmers of Manitoba have been given the opportunity of soliciting exhibits, that is, encouraging people to show. As these people do so, the credit goes to the particular organization which went after the exhibit. I remember that on one occasion the Rebecca lodge was successful in winning the highest number of points for promoting these exhibits, and I was wondering if they would be eligible under this arrangement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would rest almost entirely with the agricultural society; there is a good deal of freedom left in that connection. They would decide as to the basis upon which the competition should be held.

Mr. HOWARD: Has there been any change in the policy with regard to class A fairs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The province of Quebec has given a good deal of attention to the reorganization of its system of exhibitions, taking as a basis the regional fair idea. Although their policy is decidedly different from those of the other provinces we have felt that it would be in the best interests of the whole work if we cooperated in every way with the provincial government, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. HOWARD: What will be the grant for class A fairs in the province of Quebec during the coming year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It will be $2,500 to class A fairs only.

Mr. HOWARD: How will that work out in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grant to the newly classified fairs is $1,500.

Mr. HOWARD: What will the A fair in Quebec city get?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): $2,500 to the Quebec provincial exhibition, and in addition there will be a grant of $1,500 to the Quebec regional, provided it qualifies.

Mr. HOWARD: Is the regional fair held in the city of Quebec just prior to the A fair?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the policy of the Quebec government, and they wished us to cooperate with them in that respect. We thought it was only the proper thing to do.

Mr. HOWARD: What will you do in connection with Sherbrooke?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Sherbrooke gets two grants, $2,500 and $3,000.

Mr. HOWARD: $2,500 to each one?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the A fair, and $3,000 to the winter fair.

Mr. HOWARD: That is $500 in excess of last year, when it was reduced from $5,000. Can the minister give the details of the total reduction of $45,000?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I gave that when the item first came up. There was an item of $81,000 for grants to junior clubs, but at the suggestion of the auditor general, these grants have been put into the live stock vote.

Mr. HOWARD: I would not like to dispute the minister's word, but that cannot be correct. Five thousand dollars is being saved in Sherbrooke alone.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This vote is made up as follows:

Grants to A fairs, $51,500.
Grants to B fairs, $74,000.

Last year this item was $49,000.

Grants to winter fairs, $107,000.
Grant to City of Toronto, Royal Winter Fair, $103,713.
Exhibits, $25,000.
Special grants to organization, $23,786.
Allowance for freights to Royal Winter Fair, $10,000.

Mr. MYERS: In case Sherbrooke and Saskatchewan get all this vote, I should like to know if there is any possibility of the grant to the Prince Edward Island fox fair being restored this year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We understand that that society is in strong shape financially, but this matter is under consideration.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where is the regional fair in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It could be any B fair that qualified.

Mr. McINTOSH: What about the policy of making grants to A and B fairs in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): $2,500 for A fairs, $3,000 for winter fairs, $1,500 for B fairs, with a possibility of an additional $500 if they comply with the conditions.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there a closed list in connection with B fairs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is the first time there has not been a closed list. We endeavoured to work out a policy which would enable any place to qualify as a B fair.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. TOTZKE: Any fair which could meet the standard set for B fairs would receive a grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, subject to the department's approval.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Upon what basis and when are these grants to B fairs paid? If a district held a fair in 1933 it would expect to have the grant paid immediately afterwards.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A portion of the money would be paid immediately, but the regional grant would not be paid until a reasonable time later.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand the minister to mean that any B fair could qualify as a regional fair?

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister given notice to the B fairs of the standard they would have to meet to qualify as a regional fair?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, that is right.

Mr. VALLANCE: Let me get this thing right. Do I understand that any fair in any province of the dominion coming up to a certain standard can apply to the department for a $1,500 grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member is a little confused. This is only a policy carried out from year to year. This year any exhibition in the dominion that has been previously recognized as a B fair and that conforms to the conditions which we have set out in connection with the grants they will make for live stock and farm products, not what appears in its prize list, but that has been actually paid, can qualify as a regional fair and be entitled to this grant.

Mr. TOTZKE: There are still a number of class B fairs that are classified as in previous years?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Could the minister give the committee an idea how many regional fairs he will expect in Saskatchewan under these regulations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We cannot tell yet, but there cannot possibly be over seven, according to the conditions set out.

Mr. VALLANCE: Coming as I do from a western province, and having every sympathy with the minister in dealing with the fair situation throughout the dominion, I am opposed to any minister of agriculture, I do not care of what political shade, setting up a standard for fairs. There has always been trouble throughout western Canada because of this very thing. Standards have been set up and rural districts are asked to attempt to attain a position which was not in the best interests of the district.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table a copy in English and French of the notes exchanged relating to the effect of the St. Lawrence Deep Waterway treaty, signed at Washington July 18, 1932, upon the diversion for power purposes through the Massena canal and Grass river.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): With the permission of the house I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), that the return now tabled by the Secretary of State referring to the Russian cattle deal be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and that such committee be empowered to call witnesses and hear evidence with respect to the matter referred to therein and to report their findings and recommendations to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: That requires notice, I think, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then may it serve as a notice of motion?

Mr. BENNETT: It can be put on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: It cannot be moved without notice.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 17, to incorporate Canadian Railway Employees Mutual Benefit Association—Mr. Casselman.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DAVIES

Mr. P. G. DAVIES (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Last Friday evening, the seventeenth, while the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) was discussing the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code, he referred to the question of where the communist party was raising its funds, and during the course of his remarks the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) interjected a remark to the effect that some of its funds came from the Conservative party. Upon being pressed for the source of his information the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is reported by Hansard to have replied, at page 2229, "From the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies)." Mr. Speaker, I deny ever having had any conversation with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin or anybody else on such a subject. I deny ever having made such a statement to him or to anybody else. I further deny that there is any truth whatever in his statement as reported. As a matter of fact, I was in the house at the time and I happened to notice that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin used the word "Ask" the hon. member for Athabaska, not "From," and I would ask that a correction accordingly be made in Hansard.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

NEWFOUNDLAND—BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

*Mr. DUFF:

1. What amount, if any, was advanced by the government of Canada to the government of Newfoundland about January 2, 1933, to pay the interest on part of Newfoundland's bonded indebtedness?
2. What was the total amount of interest owing by Newfoundland on or about that date, and the rate of said interest?
3. What security has the Dominion of Canada for said loan?
4. What are the terms regarding payment of said amount loaned by Canada, and the interest rate?
5. What is the total amount of Newfoundland's bonded and other financial indebtedness?

Mr. BENNETT: A statement on the subject is being made in the British House of Commons either to-morrow or next day, and a statement will be made here at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL PORTS

*Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur):

1. What are the national ports which are managed by harbour commissions?
2. What amount has been advanced to each commission by way of gift or loan?
3. What security does the Dominion hold for such advances?

4. What amount has been guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada?
5. Has any harbour commission issued or sold bonds without a guarantee of the Dominion of Canada; if so, in what amounts?
6. What loss or deficit has there been in the operation of each port since the formation of the harbour commissions and how has such loss or deficit been taken care of?
7. What harbour commissions have operated at a profit, and what are the amounts thereof?
8. What amount for each harbour commission for each year has the Dominion of Canada had to pay?

Mr. BENNETT: I think this question will have to stand as an order for a return because the answer would be very long, there being no limitation as to time in regard to question No. 2, for instance. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would let it stand for modification as to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands.

FISHING BOUNTY

Mr. DUFF:

1. How many fishing vessels were paid the fishing bounty for the seasons of 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, respectively?
2. What was the total amount paid such vessels in each of the above years?
3. How many fishermen received the bounty during each of the years 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932?
4. What amount did each fisherman receive during each of those four years?
5. What was the total amount paid out by the government, in each of those four years, out of the so-called fishing bounty fund?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Order for return, now tabled.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CANADIAN EXPENDITURE

Mr. LAVERGNE:

What has been the annual cost to Canada of its delegates to the League of Nations, in salaries, other remuneration and travelling expenses, from the date of its admission to membership?

No salary was paid for services of Canadian delegates to the League of Nations Assembly or Council.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Concerning the completion and construc- of the Beauharnois power project—have any agreements or arrangements been entered into by the government in relation thereto?
2. If so, when will such agreements be laid before the house?
3. What is the total amount of money advanced by the government to date in connection with the construction and completion of this enterprise?
4. What is the extent of the guarantees in the same connection?
5. What security has the Government been given or obtained for the money so advanced?
6. What is the estimated value of such security?
7. Has the government taken any steps to secure a reliable legal opinion in regard to the legality and validity of the statutory authority under which the Beauharnois project and the disposition of its power are being carried on?
8. Has the government secured any legal opinion other than that of the members of the government regarding the constitutional and legal right of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company to transmit electrical energy beyond the limits or boundaries of the province of Quebec?
9. If so, when will these opinions (Nos. 7 and 8) be laid before the house?
10. Did the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister approve of loans estimated at $6,500,000 made by the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Bank of Commerce to this enterprise?
11. Has the government been informed as to what security the banks received for such loans?
12. Are such loans permissible under the Canadian Bank Act?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Yes: General agreement dated the 1st of March, 1932, relating to the project was entered into between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company and His Majesty, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, under authority of order-in-council P. C. 504, of same date.

General plans of the project were approved by the governor general in council on September 7, 1932, P. C. 1975.

The company also executed under date of September 17, 1932, conveyance to His Majesty, of lands for locks and canals purposes, the crown granting, in return, to the company the necessary rights to the use of the water flowing over certain of such lands for power purposes.

Under authority of order-in-council P. C. 504, and the agreement of March 1, 1932, the Minister of Railways and Canals has approved certain detailed plans of construction.

2. Copies will shortly be tabled.

TRADE WITH UNITED STATES

PROPOSED RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENT FOR EXCHANGE OF NATURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in drafting the resolution which I have just moved I endeavoured to be as careful as possible in the wording so that the matter could be discussed entirely from a business point of view, and so that our discussion might centre around the question as to whether in the opinion of this house it is wise that this country should do all the business possible with our great neighbour to the south. In order that I may deal with this matter properly I should like, first, to give a history of the different negotiations between Canada and the United States with regard to what is commonly known as reciprocity. Or, in other words, I shall outline what might better be termed the different business relations which have existed at various time between those two great countries.

In 1854 a treaty known as the Elgin-Marcy reciprocity treaty had been negotiated, and it proved beneficial to Canada, for the ten years the treaty was in operation.

The United States statesmen claimed, however, that it had not been so beneficial to that country, and therefore the radical Republicans in the United States Senate voted for its abrogation. One reason why the vote was so strong against it then, in the United States Senate, it is said, was that it was done in retaliation against the British attitude toward the south, during the Civil war.

In 1866, A. T. Galt, Minister of Finance, and W. P. Howland, Postmaster General in Canada, went to Washington, in an effort to secure to Canada a continuance of the benefits of free trade, and to propose that such trade be established by reciprocal legislation.

After confederation, when Sir John Macdonald was Prime Minister of this country, in an effort to hold both the Conservative and Liberal factions under his control, he favoured reciprocity with the United States, providing the provisions of the old treaty could be renewed.

In 1869, Sir John Rose, then Minister of Finance, went to Washington to confer with Secretary Fish of the United States government. There was much speculation as to what Rose had offered Fish as a basis for a renewal of the reciprocity treaty.

Sir John Rose assumed another important position, in the story of Canadian-American relations, when he went to Washington in 1871 to pave the way for a settlement of the troublesome Alabama claims dispute. Other methods had failed to settle the matter, and now the British government suggested that Rose offer the fisheries and the use of the St. Lawrence waterway, as a basis for proceeding to the more serious points of disagreement.

A fisheries agreement, which favoured the United States, was to run for fifteen years, and the right to the use of the St. Lawrence was granted to the United States forever.

When the Mackenzie government was formed—about 1872-3—with Sir Richard Cartwright as Finance Minister, one of the first things the Liberal government did was to make a serious attempt to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States.

A treaty was drafted which provided that the duties on the articles in three separate schedules should from July 1875 to July 1876 be two-thirds of the present duties, that they should be reduced to one-third the following year, and that after 1877 and for a period of twenty-one years, the articles on these three schedules were to enter each country free of duty. The first schedule contained a long list of natural products. The second contained forty articles some of which were manufactured articles; and the third a long list of manufactures.

Although the treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States the proposal was rejected by that body.

In 1879, with the Macdonald government in power in Canada, the rates of duties on manufactured articles, were increased, although a reciprocity clause was attached to this tariff which fulfilled the election campaign promises. It provided that whenever the United States allowed Canadian natural products to enter the country free of duty, then Canada would allow the same articles to enter this country free of customs duties.

The Conservatives, from that time on, made reciprocity proposals upon the basis of this offer of 1879.

It was some years afterwards before another effort was made to secure a reciprocal arrangement. The fisheries dispute paved the way, in the next attempt, just as it had in certain previous ones. The Canadians had recognized the importance of the north Atlantic fisheries, as a lever to force concessions from the American authorities in the direction of freer trade.

The treaty of Washington of 1871 put an end to the fisheries dispute after fifteen years. The time approached for the agreement to come to an end and Canadians prepared to make the best of the opportunity.

Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington in 1888 and had a conference with Secretary of State Bayard. The Canadian offer was to give free fish for free trade in natural products. A treaty was arranged and sent to the United States Senate, but was not ratified. The "Commercial Union" movement is the most interesting phase of the long period of agitation for reciprocity between the two countries. It had its origin in Canada. Among the most active and enthusiastic leaders, however, were some Americans. Among the leaders were the following: Erastus Wiman, President of the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, a Canadian by birth but residing in New Jersey; Goldwin Smith, eminent historian and scholar; Benjamin Butterworth, representative in congress from Cincinnati, Ohio; and Samuel J. Ritchie, an Akron, Ohio, manufacturer, owning nickel mines in Ontario. The latter and his legal adviser, Mr. Butterworth, spent much time and money in the spread of the doctrine.

The movement was first taken up by the Toronto Mail and later by the Toronto Globe. Commercial leagues were formed throughout the country. The doctrine actually involved an unrestricted trade with the pooling of customs duties, to be divided upon some agreed proportion.

In the spring of 1888 the leaders of the Liberal party in caucus decided, after some discussion, to support Sir Richard Cartwright in a motion for what he termed "Unrestricted Reciprocity" with the United States. Conservatives and Liberals alike had supported reciprocity and many Conservatives had supported the doctrine of "Commercial Union." It had not yet become a party issue. When Cartwright introduced his resolution it served as a challenge. When George E. Foster arose early in the debate and offered an amendment to the main motion which stated that the government would adhere to the standing offer of 1879 the issue was clear. It had become a party question. The debate originally intended for but two or three days, dragged on for a month. Cartwright and his followers had to distinguish between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. The Conservatives attacked the Liberal motion chiefly because it included discrimination against the mother country and would lead, they insisted, to political union. The motion was defeated by a party vote of 124 to 67. There were four New Brunswick Conservatives who voted for the motion.

In 1890 the Colonial Secretary of Newfoundland, the Hon. Robert Bond, went to Washington and succeeded in drawing up a convention with Mr. Blaine which provided for freer trade between the two countries. When Sir John A. Macdonald heard of this he sent Sir Charles Tupper to Washington, who suggested that they proceed to base a treaty on the Elgin treaty of 1854, as a basis for a new agreement. But Mr. Blaine insisted that that treaty was not wide enough. Sir Charles Tupper returned to Canada and intimated that an arrangement could be made. Macdonald and Tupper were urged to go to the people, in a general election, if they could assure the electorate they were negotiating a reciprocal arrangement with the United States.

In 1892 Canadian commissioners led by Mr. Foster again presented their case to the American government. Nothing further was done in the matter until 1911, when the Hon. W. S. Fielding and the Hon. William Paterson proceeded to Washington and negotiated a reciprocity treaty which was known as the Taft-Fielding proposal. This treaty was defeated in the general election of 1911.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter which is closely allied with the reciprocity negotiations. In fact the reciprocity conversations and negotiations were really a result of the treaty of 1818 between the British government and the United States government, and in view of the present agitation regarding the renewal of the so-called modus vivendi, it would be as well to give also the history surrounding it. Article 1 of the treaty stipulated—

> (a) That the inhabitants of the United States shall have forever in common with British subjects the "liberty" to take fish of every kind on a portion of the coast of Newfoundland, about the Magdalen islands, and on the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence eastward from Point Joli, and to dry and cure fish on the said portion of the north shore so long as it remained unsettled, and afterwards by agreement with the settlers.
> (b) That the United States renounce forever the liberty claimed on the other parts of the coast for their fishermen, but that they would be permitted to enter bays and harbours on all portions of the Canadian coast for wood, water, shelter and repairs "but for no other purpose whatever."

The two countries placed different interpretations on certain parts of the above article of the treaty and difficulties arose. Consequently the Reciprocity treaty of 1854, mentioned previously, resulted, and fish and fish products of each country were admitted free of duty into the other and reciprocal fishing privileges were authorized in certain territorial waters of each country.

It was out of this treaty of 1888 that the system of issuing what are called modus vivendi licences to the United States fishing vessels was started. May I say here modus vivendi means a working arrangement, a practical compromise. The British plenti-potentiaries feeling that it would take some time to have the treaty made effective recommended a modus vivendi not to last more than two years, under which United States fishing vessels, by the payment of a fee of one dollar and fifty cents per registered ton, could obtain the port privileges contemplated by the treaty and thus avoid the difficulties that would ensue while limiting such vessels to their liberties under the treaty of 1818. The privileges were (a) the purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits and the transhipment of catch and the shipping of crews.

These licences were yearly continued thereafter and in 1892 an act was passed giving the governor in council power to authorize the issue of the licences. This act formed section three of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.

In 1918 on the recommendation of an International Fisheries Commission, the privileges covered by the modus vivendi were granted reciprocally in either country to the fishing vessels of the other.

In 1921 the United States gave notice that the privileges granted in 1918 were to be terminated in that country. They were continued, however, in Canada without licence until the season of 1922 when the modus vivendi licences were again introduced, but later in that year the fee for the licence was reduced from one dollar and fifty cents per ton to a nominal sum of one dollar per vessel. The authority of council was given for the granting of such licences at the nominal fee for that year and the following year.

As a result of some agitation on the Atlantic coast for the discontinuance of the modus vivendi privileges to United States fishing vessels unless the United States recognized the advantages of such privileges, it was decided by order in council of November, 1923, that modus vivendi licences should not be continued after the end of that year. The United States government was so notified, and from that date until the present time no modus vivendi licences have been issued and United States vessels are now restricted to the simple privileges of entering our bays and harbours for the purpose of obtaining wood, water, shelter and repairs but for no other purpose whatsoever.

As I said a moment ago, in dealing with this question, which to my mind is a very serious one, especially as far as the maritime provinces are concerned, I intend only to deal with the question of the fisheries. Before dealing with what I consider would be the benefits of reciprocity may I speak for a moment in regard to what is known as the modus vivendi? From this history which I have given it appears clearly that during the years the modus vivendi was in operation United States fishing vessels could come into our ports and buy bait and supplies and tranship fish. There was a good deal of business done in the maritime provinces. I have always been a great advocate of freedom of trade. I am trying to keep as far away as I can from the political side of this matter, but I never could see why under the treaty of 1818 or subsequent treaties the late Liberal government or previous governments in this country would not allow United States fishing vessels to come into Canadian ports and do business with us. I notice, in reading the newspapers the last few months, that my good friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) was in Ottawa and strongly recommended to the government that the modus vivendi arrangement should be reopened so that fishing vessels could come into Canadian ports. I want to thank him for the great interest he has taken in the matter. I am only sorry that the newspaper reported that his idea was that every year these privileges should be granted only for the space of three months. I intend to prove that if it is a good thing that American fishing vessels be allowed to come into our ports for bait, ice, provisions and supplies for three months it would be a much better thing if they were allowed to come in for the whole year. I notice that in the Halifax Herald of Saturday a dispatch from Ottawa headed:

Privileges are Being Restored to United States Schooners

And the dispatch goes on to say:

The privileges, it is stated, are to be restored for a limited period, believed to be six weeks, particularly to provide for the sale of bait of which there is a large supply in Nova Scotia cold storage plants.

I hope that dispatch is only partly true. Again I say I am strongly in favour of opening our ports to United States fishing vessels; not for six weeks or three months, but for as many years as those vessels want to do business with us.

Mr. ERNST: I should like to ask one question, and I am asking it in good faith. Does the hon. member favour the transshipment of fish in bond through Canadian ports by United States fishing vessels?

Mr. DUFF: I intend to deal with that question in a moment. It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that this dispatch says that the reason for granting these United States vessels the privilege of coming into our ports for six weeks is that certain cold storage plants have a large supply of bait. If these vessels had been allowed to come into our ports for twelve months of the year these cold storage plants would not have had this large quantity of bait on hand. I am very much afraid that if this arrangement is made for six weeks it will only give the cold storage plants a chance to get rid of their bait, with the result that the same thing will happen again that has happened in previous years.

If the United States fishing vessels can enter our ports twelve months of the year they can buy bait direct from the fishermen; if they are allowed to enter only for six weeks they will have to buy bait at the cold storage plants. This means that the plants—the big interests, if you like to call them that—who buy bait from the fishermen at ridiculously low prices and put it in their cold storage plants, will sell that same bait to the United States fishermen at higher prices. Last year I knew of traps full of herring and squid that had to be opened so that the herring and squid could escape because there was no one to buy them. If United States fishing vessels had been allowed to buy bait then probably these fishermen could have sold their catches. I know of another case not a thousand miles from my own home. There was no demand for bait; the squid, the best bait that can be bought, were sold by the fishermen to the cold storage plants for 30 cents a bushel, and herring was sold to the same plants for 25 cents a bushel. If United States fishermen had been allowed to come to Nova Scotia ports and buy that bait direct from the fishermen, instead of the poor devil of a fisherman getting 30 cents a bushel for bait which was later sold by the cold storage plants for 4 cents a pound, he would have received $1 or $1.50 a bushel. I commend the government for considering the opening of Nova Scotia ports, but if they are going to open them at all they should be kept open so that the fishermen along the shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will be able to sell their bait direct to United States and Canadian fishing vessels, which will give them a better return.

I said I was in favour of these vessels coming to our ports, not only to buy bait but to buy ice as well. This would mean that the ice houses in Canso, Lunenburg, Yarmouth and other places would be filled with ice which would be sold to the fishermen. Then my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) asked me a question. Certainly I am in favour of allowing United States vessels to trans-ship their catches in bond from Nova Scotia ports to Boston. Of course we are all interested in the fishermen and in our fisheries, but I think it will be admitted—and I say this with all modesty—that I am just as much interested in the fishermen of Nova Scotia as anyone else, and I say that if we allow United States vessels to come to Canadian ports and trans-ship their fish it will mean more labour for Canadian workmen. Ice will have to be bought. Boxes will have to be made from Canadian lumber by Canadian workmen. Men will have to pack the fish in the boxes; teamsters will have to haul the fish to the railway station; the Canadian National railways will get the haul to Yarmouth, and the steamer will carry the fish to Boston, New York or wherever they go. Surely there can be no harm in that. It will not hurt Canadian fishermen if we allow this practice to be carried on. These fish do not come in competition with fish caught by Canadian fishermen; they go direct to United States ports. So I will say that I am strongly in favour of allowing these vessels to enter our ports throughout the year so that they can do business with us and spend their good American money here.

I said that I intended to deal with only one phase of this subject, Mr. Speaker, but it might be interesting if I were to place on Hansard a statement showing the exports of certain qualities of fish shipped from Canada during the years 1919, 1926 and 1931. This statement shows our total exports of certain kinds of fish to British Empire countries and to the United States, including Puerto Rico. I have not time to read the whole statement, but I am going to ask that it be placed on Hansard so that hon. members may have the benefit of these figures.

First I should like to deal with one or two matters which are covered by this statement. In 1919 our total exports of fresh codfish amounted to 31,154 hundredweight, or 3,115,400 pounds. Of that quantity only 2,226 hundredweight went to British Empire countries, not including Great Britain, while we sent to the United States 28,928 hundredweight or 2,892,800 pounds. Now let us take dried codfish, of which our total exports amounted to 697,794 hundredweight. In addition to British Empire countries and the United States those dried codfish went to Italy, Greece, the Argentine, Brazil and many other countries. Of that total 75,789 hundredweight went to British Empire countries, and I think I am safe in saying that practically none went to Great Britain. To the United States we shipped 267,474 hundredweight or 26,747,400 pounds. Practically our entire exports to British Empire countries went to Trinidad, Jamaica and Demerara.

I might read this whole statement, but I do not think it is necessary. For a moment, however, I should like to deal with some of the duties imposed on these fish. On the 26,747,400 pounds of dried codfish shipped to the United States in 1919 the duty amounted to $334,342.50.

Mr. ERNST: Have you the rate? I mean at that time, in 1919.

Mr. DUFF: It is 1¼ cents per pound or $5.60 per tierce of 448 pounds on dry fish alone.

Mr. ERNST: I am merely asking for information.

Mr. DUFF: It might be argued that the consumer pays that $334,000. I am convinced, and I believe that business men are also convinced, that this duty is not paid by the consumer but by the fishermen of Canada, and the reason for that is that the price of fish is not fixed in Halifax or Saint John or Vancouver but in the foreign port. It is quite true of course that in some cases there is made out what is known as an f.o.b. invoice, but that is based on the price in the foreign market less duty, less insurance and less freight.

An hon. MEMBER: Who imposed the duty?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend asks who imposed the duty; the United States, of course. Now, in my opinion, with the Canadian fisheries in their present condition, there is only one salvation for them and that is for this government to make a trade arrangement with the United States so that our fish might go into that country.

We hear a good deal about trawlers nowadays. I have no time to go into that question to-day, but if we had the United States for a market there would not be very much talk about trawlers because the trouble to-day is that Canada is a very small market. Great Britain is too far away from us, being some twenty-five hundred miles across the water, and they have their own source of supply so far as fish is concerned, so that practically the only market open to us now, to which we can extend our business, is the United States. I need not say that the fisheries of this country are in a deplorable condition, and I appeal to the government to do everything they can to help the industry. There is no question about it that there is a great opportunity for the government as well as for the fishermen of Canada. We read over the lintel at the main entrance to this building these words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

What is the use of having the wholesome sea at both our gates if we do not take advantage of it? The sea is full of fish and our fishermen are only too ready to catch them if they could get a half decent market, but when they have to face a duty of hundreds of thousands of dollars there is no hope for them. I do not blame this country, but the fact is that there is a duty which the United States government has imposed which makes it impossible for the fishermen of this country to carry on their operations in a proper manner. I think the time is ripe for something to be done if we are to be clear of our surplus product. This is the time for the government to enter into negotiations with the government of the United States.

In January I noticed in the Cosmopolitan magazine an interview given by President-elect Roosevelt, in which he made this statement:

> This plan must go into effect at the same time that international trade is being restored through tariff adjustments. Every major problem before us to-day is involved with the tariff. The building of a higher tariff fence about ourselves has caused foreign retaliatory tariffs and prevented even the simple exchange and barter of goods internationally. By reciprocal agreements with other nations we shall have opportunity given to lower our tariff fence to permit the resumption of international trade. The United States can lead in outlining the mutual restoration of trade, and thus facilitate exchange.

Those are the words of President-elect Roosevelt and, I repeat, the time is ripe for this government to do something in the matter. Let me give some quotations from prominent authorities. Sir Robert Borden, Canadian head of Barclay's bank, declares that:

> The removal of restrictions that impede the interchange of products is the crying need of nations suffering from the depression.

Certainly the fishermen of this country are suffering not only from the present depression but from restricted markets, and neither this nor any other government could do anything better than to endeavour to obtain a market for the Canadian fishermen.

Sir Herbert Holt, in his annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada, deplored:

> . . . the futility of the trade warfare of which tariffs are the most important weapon.

Sir John Aird, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce wants:

> . . . a general and uniform reduction of tariffs the world over.

Mr. S. J. Moore of the Bank of Nova Scotia:

> . . . sees the nations in a state of economic siege, trying to starve one another out of an impossible position.

And Mr. J. A. McLeod, of the Bank of Nova Scotia, calls for:

> . . . sweeping reciprocal reductions in tariffs among all countries.

Surely Mr. McLeod's words, if they mean anything, are to be taken as including the United States in the desire for sweeping reciprocal reductions. We have heard a good deal about Mr. Roger Babson. As quoted in the Halifax Herald, New Year's issue, this gentleman makes the following statement:

> Existing tariff discriminations whereby Nova Scotia is unable to sell her fish, coal and lumber and other products to the Atlantic seaboard territories which constitute your natural markets; and yet is compelled to pay from 25 per cent to 50 per cent additional on automobiles, clothing, shoes and practically all manufactured goods. The maritime provinces should have a separate tariff with the United States.

I do not agree with that last statement, because I think we should have only one tariff in the country; but there is no reason why a proper arrangement could not be made with our great neighbour to the south, so far as Nova Scotia and the maritimes are concerned.

Captain O'Donnell of the Eastern Steamships Company, in the same paper makes this statement:

> In order that you may trade with the United States and she in turn shall offer you what she produces we must in some way bring about tariff adjustments that will be to the advantage of all of us who live on each side of the line dividing our countries—the line on which there is not a single fortress or a suggestion that we are not neighbours and friends who trust each other.

I have here another statement giving the views of the premier of Nova Scotia, as published in the same issue of the Halifax Herald to which I have referred:

> Our lumbering and fishing industries in so far as they rely upon export markets have experienced the difficulties consequent upon the lack of purchasing power in their former markets and this situation has been aggravated by adverse tariffs and unfavourable exchange.

In view of all these expressions of opinion, I think I am justified in asking the government, at the earliest opportunity, to approach the great country to the south of us, a country which has a potential market for Canada of 120,000,000 people, with a view to securing an outlet for our fish products. I am sure that with the experience which they have gone through in the last five or six years, the United States must realize that the duties they have placed on fish, both in the Fordney-McCumber and in the Hawley-Smoot tariffs, have not helped the fishermen of the United States, while they have been detrimental to those of Canada.

I hope that the suggestion will not be made either in this debate or in the country, but it might be said that if we entered into a reciprocal trade arrangement or a commercial arrangement with the United States there would be danger of this country being too closely connected with our southern neighbour. I do not think for a moment that the people of Canada will sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. We are loyal citizens of the British Empire. If we sell our fish, lumber or anything else to the greatest, the nearest and the most natural market, as far as the maritime provinces are concerned, then I say we should fear no danger. We are daughters in our mother's house and mistress in our own. We are going to remain daughters in our mother's house and all we ask of the British Empire, all we ask of this country is to stand by the maritime provinces and give us a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States so that we can do business with and make money in dealing in a businesslike and reciprocal manner with them.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the temper of the observations of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) one can find little or no complaint. I am not wholly in accord with some of his statements of fact for reasons which I shall presently indicate, but in the main there is no difference. One might summarize his statement in this way: He has made a strong plea that the legislature of another country should act differently from what it has. That is all that it means when stripped of everything, an appeal is being made to the congress of the United States to take action different from that which they have heretofore taken.

Mr. DUFF: Except holding out the olive branch.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall deal with that presently.

In view of the present condition of economic matters in the world, I think it well to make a more extended statement than I otherwise would with respect to this particular matter. It is well to remember the historic background in connection with reciprocity and it is also well to remember that the remedy which the hon. gentleman seeks is one that is not in our hands to grant. If we keep these two facts in mind I think perhaps we will be able to approach this problem without prejudice and without any feeling of resentment against another country that has pursued a fiscal policy which to its representatives in congress seems best. This is just as we have done. If we concede the right to others to do that which we ourselves have done, we will then probably be able to appreciate the problem more clearly than if we claimed the right, on the one hand, to do as we pleased and, on the other, denied that right to others.

In 1879 when the national policy was introduced in this country, section 6 of the legislation provided as follows:

6. Any or all of the following articles,—that is to say: animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees, and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

In introducing his budget upon that occasion the late Sir Leonard Tilley made an observation which I think it might be well for me to read. He said:

I have this to say to our American friends: In 1865 they abrogated the reciprocity treaty, and from that day to the present a large portion of the imports from that country into the dominion have been admitted free. We have hoped, but hoped in vain, that by the adoption of that policy we would lead our American friends to treat us in a more liberal spirit with regard to the same articles. Well, after having waited twelve years for the consideration of this subject, the government requiring more revenue, have determined to ask this house to impose upon the products of the United States that have been free, such a duty as may seem consistent with our position. But the government couple with the proposal, in order to show that we approach this question with no unfriendly spirit, a resolution that will be laid on the table containing a proposition to this effect: That, as to articles named, which are the natural products of the country, including lumber, if the United States take off the duties in part or in whole, we are prepared to meet them with equal concessions. The government believe in a reciprocity tariff, yet may discuss free trade or protection, but the question of to-day is—Shall we have a reciprocity tariff, or a one-sided tariff?

That was in 1879. That legislation remained upon the statute books of this country in that or some modified form for very many years. In fact, that section, the terms of which I have just read, section 6 in the legislation of 1879, will be found in the revised statutes of 1886. In 1888 there was a revision of the proposals, but in the main they remained as I have read them. The legislation of 1888 was somewhat different from that of 1879, and in order that there may be no misapprehension on the part of the house as to what the proposals of this parliament have been—when I say this parliament, I mean that although the proposals were introduced by the government of the day in the end they were crystallized into legislation which constituted the offer which the parliament of Canada made to our great neighbour with respect to the matters to which I refer—I shall read section 9 of the legislation of 1888, which is slightly different from the section I read first. The words are as follows:

9. Any or all of the following things, that is to say: Animals of all kinds, hay, straw, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), salt, peas, beans, barley, malt, rye, oats, buckwheat, flour or rye, oatmeal, buckwheat flour, butter, cheese, fish of all kinds, fish oil, products of fish and of all other creatures living in the water, fresh meats, poultry, stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state, lime, gypsum or plaster of paris (ground, unground, or calcined), hewn or wrought or unwrought burr and grindstones, and timber and lumber of all kinds unmanufactured in whole or in part, including shingles, clapboards, and wood pulp, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at less rate of duty than is provided for by an act at the time in force, upon proclamation of the Governor General, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

It will be observed that this list contains items which were not in the first list, and that the first list contains items deleted from this one. In 1890 there was a reenactment of the terms of section 9 of 1888. In 1894, fifteen years after the original offer had been made in 1879, there was a substantial modification in the terms of the proposals. Section 7, 8, 10, 11, 12 and 24 of chapter 33 of the statutes of that year contain the offer or proposals of the dominion parliament in that regard. Sections 7, 8 and 10 read:

7. The whole or part of the duties hereby imposed upon fish and other products of the fisheries may be remitted as respects either the United States or Newfoundland, or both, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the governments of the United States and Newfoundland, or of either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in the said countries respectively.

8. Eggs may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less duty than is provided for by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that eggs from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on eggs under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

10. Shingles and pulp wood, or either of them, may be imported into Canada free of duty, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that shingles and pulp wood, or either of them, from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty.

Then section 11 reads:

Any or all of the following things, that is to say: green or ripe apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye-flour, hay, and vegetables specified in item 41 in schedule A to this act, shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that such country imposes no duty on the like product or products imported into it from Canada.

It will be observed that instead of limiting the proposed offer to the United States of America, it is extended to any country which grants reciprocal benefits to this country.

Then barley and Indian corn were dealt with by section 12:

Barley and Indian corn shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that such country whence either or both these products are imported admits both these products free of duty imported into it from Canada.

By this statute the acts that I have just previously quoted were repealed. That contains the offers that were made up to that day, and it might be well in this regard to refer to the speech that was made by the late Right Hon. George E. Foster on March 27, 1890, when this and the similar section that I have just read were under consideration:

I now come to another item about which there has been considerable discussion in the house, and out of it. It is that which relates to plants, fruits, shrubs and the like, and with which this house dealt in 1888. By an order in council of April 14, 1888, certain fruits and plants and shrubs were placed upon the free list. This arose from the fact that in the Tariff Act of 1879, there was a clause which left it permissive with the government, on a certain list of articles, to either reduce the duty upon them or to remove the duty altogether when such articles were either free, or of less duty in the United States than was charged here. The matter was brought to the attention of the government in 1888 under the peculiar circumstances which at that time prevailed. It was contended by gentlemen of the opposition that it was not treating the United States fairly, when they had any one of these articles at a lower duty, if we did not place that article on the same tariff footing as it was in the United States. It was contended on this side of the house that this clause of the act was simply permissive and not mandatory on the government and that it rested with the government of Canada to say whether this should be done in individual instances or not, and that what was contemplated in that article in the tariff law was that when those products as a whole, or as many of them as Canada should consider it to be in her interest to reciprocate in, were placed on the free list or had a lower rate of duty imposed upon them, the government would reduce its duties upon them, to the same level. However, under the circumstances that prevailed at that time, it was decided to put these articles on the free list, and a very considerable amount of duty was lost in consequence, and a very considerable damage was done to a large and important interest in this country.

I read that merely to indicate that at that time there was a contention made that the offer must be taken as a whole, rather than that the individual items that constituted the offer should be considered if the circumstances warranted. In the event, it transpired that the government of the day treated the offer as referring to individual items. In 1891, the year following the speech to which I have just referred, the finance minister, still the Right Hon. George E. Foster, said:

But I may say this, that the government holds itself ready, as the Liberal-Conservative governments have always done, to meet the United States on a fair and equitable basis and with the sincere and earnest desire to remove all differences that exist and to give the greatest freedom of trade compatible with the best interests of this country in its relations with the United States of America. Certainly no government of a self-governing and self-respecting country should be asked to do more. Further than this, we can state that while we are willing to make all the concessions that on these lines can fairly be made, we are not willing to go so far as to injuriously shut ourselves out from the trade which we have with Great Britain and the other countries in the world, that we are not willing to forego, for a doubtful gain, the substantial advantages which we have enjoyed and expect to enjoy from our relations with the mother country, from which connection we have reaped so much in the past and from which we hope so much in the future.

Then in the speech of 1894, in which a revision of the offer was made, as I have just read, these words were used by the Right Hon. George E. Foster:

When we come to the grains—oats have been kept at 10 cents per bushel, and cornmeal at 40 cents per barrel, but two schedules have been formed with other grains, and two or three other agricultural products. The first schedule contains corn and barley. The duties on these are kept as they were before, but there is added this clause, "Provided that barley and Indian corn shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, if such country, whence either or both are imported, admits both these products free of duty, when imported thence from Canada. That is an offer of reciprocity to any country that chooses to take it up.

The object of leaving oats out of that proposal was to retain protection to that product of the farmer in Canada, a very large product and one which, in some portions of Canada, might be adversely affected at certain times and under certain conditions, if the duty were removed. Then again buckwheat, buckwhat meal, rye, rye flour, beans, peas, hay, potatoes, green and ripe apples, and vegetables, are left with the same duties, or nearly the same, as they had under the old tariff, and it is enacted that each of the above products shall be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no duty on the like product when imported from Canada.

I repeat that by 1894 the parliament of Canada had extended the offer made in 1879 with respect to the countries that might accept it, because in 1894 the offer became open to all the countries of the world, whereas in 1879 it had reference only to the United States, and later to Newfoundland. So that the effect between 1879 and 1894 was to induce the Canadian people, speaking through their representatives in this parliament, to place upon the statute books an offer that was open to all the world with respect to the items to which I have referred. After the change of administration in 1896 it will be recalled that certain reciprocal offers were made, and I think perhaps it might be advantageous to refer to them.

Section 7 of chapter 16 of the revised statutes of 1897 reads as follows:

The whole or part of the duties hereby imposed upon fish and other products of the fisheries may be remitted as respects either the United States or Newfoundland, or both, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued, whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the governments of the United States and Newfoundland, or either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in the said countries respectively.

Then there was a protective clause with respect to the French treaty of 1894. Section 16 reads:

Nothing contained in the foregoing provisions shall affect the French Treaty Act, 1894, or chapter three of the statutes of 1895, intituled An Act respecting Commercial Treaties affecting Canada.

Then follows section 17:

17. When the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty, provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule D to this act.

2. Any question arising as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the controller of customs, subject to the authority of the governor in council.

3. The governor in council may extend the benefits of the reciprocal tariff to any country entitled thereto by virtue of a treaty with Her Majesty.

4. The controller of customs may make such regulations as are necessary for carrying out the intention of this section.

The house will observe that instead of declaring that the benefits might be clearly reciprocal, the words used were "on the whole." That is, if on consideration of the whole tariff proposals it was clear that the benefits this country would derive would equal the benefits this country was offering or giving or granting, then the reciprocal arrangement would apply by virtue of the proclamation. That, too, was an extension of the general principle that began in 1879. That is, we find in 1897 not any astute desire to find equality through the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i", but rather, if on the whole the benefits were at least equal, the reciprocal provisions should obtain.

Then we have further a consideration of this matter by reason of the fact that there was a continuous increase in the American tariff. The McKinley tariff had been increasing the then tariff of the United States, the Dingley tariff and the tariffs that followed, until the advent into power of the Democratic administration under President Wilson, when there was a complete revision of the tariffs and a reduction resulting in free entry into the United States markets of many of our commodities. This was coupled with a reciprocal provision in the American Tariff Act whereby on proclamation they could admit into their markets free certain commodities produced in Canada, if Canada took similar action. It will be remembered that pursuant to that provision the Dominion of Canada did issue a proclamation whereby wheat, flour and semolina were given free entry into the Canadian market, and as a result we had free entry into the American market.

The matter of course engaged the attention of the new administration of 1896. Perhaps it will be within the memory of most hon. members in this house that the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier set up a commission which went to Washington for the purpose of ascertaining just what could be done to extend our trade in that direction. It will also be recalled that in the end that mission failed. We find that in 1910 the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, in his budget speech used these words:

> We had had negotiations from time to time with our American friends in relation to better trade conditions, and they had not turned out very successfully. We had, after repeated efforts, taken the ground that we should not again approach the United States with proposals for betterment of our trade relations, and that, if the matter was to be reopened again, it should be reopened, not upon the initiative of Canada, but upon the initiative of the United States. Accordingly, we declined to make any approach to the United States while the question of the French treaty was pending.
> We claimed that our treaty with France was a treaty of reciprocity; that is to say, that we granted to France certain concessions in return for which France granted us similar or equivalent concessions. We said to the United States; If you want these concessions that France received from us, you should be prepared to purchase them as France did by giving what we would regard as equivalent concessions. To that our friends in the United States naturally demurred. They claimed that if they gave us what is called the favoured nation treatment—the best that was going—that we should do the same with them. That, however, was a view we ought not to take. We refused to take it in the beginning, and we refuse to take it now.

Those were the words of Mr. Fielding in 1910 after, as you will remember, an earnest effort had been made by the Canadian government of that day to induce our American friends to enter into a trade agreement.

In 1911, the next year, an agreement was entered into which was not quite what the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat described. It was not a treaty; the hon. member referred to it as such. On more than one occasion I have in this house indicated clearly the reasons I for one was opposed to that measure. First, it was an agreement incorporated into the statutes of both countries for that year, and it mentioned a limited number of items. But it was so framed that the change by this dominion of its tariff with respect to any one of those items terminated the agreement; secondly, the agreement was for no period of time, or for no definite length of years. It merely meant that if the interests of the United States could best be served by terminating it, all they had to do was to change the tariff rate on any single item, and the agreement then fell by the way. Equally, if the Dominion of Canada came to a similar conclusion and changed a single item, then, the agreement fell. I have made this statement so frequently that I hesitate to trouble the house to listen again, but I shall repeat that in my judgment any trade agreement which creates a channel of trade that may be terminated at the caprice or without notice to the other party, or be terminated by one party without considering the interests of the other, is fatal to the interests of both, because there is always a conflict of interest. All the terms of the agreement no longer have any appplication if, by reason of changed conditions one of the parties concludes the best thing it can do is to terminate the agreement by merely changing the tariff in regard to one item.

The people of Canada rejected the proposal, and I believe if they were asked again they would conclude that any arrangement which left us in a position whereby our trade relations could be changed over night for any reason, good or bad, which might occur to the minds of the American congress, would not be a sound or sane venture for a country such as ours. That is, we cannot hope to develop the resources of our country or give it favourable position in the trade of the world if we render it possible for a channel of trade to be dammed up, shut off, diverted or ruined by any action which may be taken by another party without notice to or regard for ourselves. Whatever else may be said, the fact is that with the coming of the great war the agreement could not have remained in the terms in which it stood because it would have been essential for either one or both of the parties to have modified it.

In the meantime, as will be remembered the Democratic party having come into power, and President Wilson's policy being that of lower tariffs, we had access to the American market for our wheat, cattle and many other commodities under terms which were highly satisfactory to Canadian producers.

There then came a change of administration in the United States and also a change of administration in Canada. The Liberal party was in power in this country and the Republican party in power in the United States. The old veteran Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, was again in his former position. I think it is fair to say that everything reasonable men could do compatible with self respect and regard for the honour of their country was done by the Minister of Finance of that day to secure lower tariffs from the United States. But the efforts failed.

I find that in 1923, after the new Republican administration was in power, Mr. Fielding in his budget speech used these words:

In the name of the Liberal party of Canada, I declare to-day that we stand for reciprocity with the United States. I say that when the opportunity comes to make a fair treaty or agreement—and I say the agreement of 1911 was a fair and reasonable agreement and I am glad that our Progressive friends call for a repetition of that agreement in their motion to-day; to that extent I agree with it—but I say that when the opportunity comes we are proud to declare in the face of the parliament of Canada, whatever the fate of it may be, that this Liberal party stands for reciprocity with the United States when we can get a fair and reasonable agreement. That is our position. We are content to let the people judge between the hon. gentleman and ourselves on that point.

And towards the close of the debate, on May 23, 1923, the right hon. gentleman opposite who is now leader of the opposition used these words:

What is the position with regard to the United States? Since the Liberal convention was held, there has been enacted by the United States a much higher tariff than ever before existed between Canada and the United States. The Fordney-McCumber tariff, so-called, to-day is operating to the disadvantage of Canada. Is there any member of this house who will stand up in his place and say: Nothwithstanding that obvious fact we think we should throw down our bars against the United States and give them an opportunity to come in here and affect our industries in a manner even more seriously than they have already been affected.

Now, sir, I conceive those words to be words to which I can give my hearty support. I have said on more than one occasion, when the right hon. gentleman was leader of the government, that those words express, I believe, the general view of the Canadian people.

Is there any member of this house who will stand up in his place and say: Notwithstanding that obvious fact we think we should throw down our bars against the United States and give them an opportunity to come in here and affect our industries in a manner even more seriously than they have already been affected.

That was in 1923, it indicated the view which I believe was a reflection of the sound opinion of the Canadian people. And the right hon. gentleman proceeded in these words:

But, sir, we had another aim, and I think it is becoming apparent to anyone who reads the American press of to-day. The Americans, as I have said, have put up a high tariff wall against us affecting no part of this country more than the part from which my hon. friends of the Progressive group come. They have that wall, but we want to show them that if they wish to sell they must also be ready to buy. There can be no jug-handled proposition in matters of trade. If you wish to sell you have got to be willing to buy. If you wish to buy you have to be willing to sell. I think our American friends will come to see that if, as a result of their—and it is their own business, of course—if as a result of their action Canada is going to seek and obtain new markets in which to buy and sell in Britain, new markets in France and new markets in Italy, is going to develop a reciprocal trade and effect agreements with Australia and possibly other countries as well, if they begin to see that in all these directions we are striking out into and creating new lines of commerce, and that we can manage very well as we are, I am inclined to think that that line of thought, quicker than anything else, will bring about the change which my hon. friends of the Progressive group opposite hope may come.

I should think that is not an unsound argument. In this house on a previous occasion I made that statement, I now repeat it. May I in that regard point out that at that same session, dealing with the tariff, Mr. Fielding in his budget proposed what was enacted in the Revised Statutes of Canada, vol. 2, chapter 44, which was originally found in the statutes of 1923, chapter 42:

11. If the President of the United States, under authority of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:—

Cattle; wheat; wheat flour; oats; barley; potatoes; onions; turnips; hay; fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719, and 720 of the said Tariff Act of 1922,

The governor in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on such articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States.

That was in 1923. That was the offer of the Liberal government of that day—not of the Liberal government, the offer of the parliament of Canada of that day, under which, as I have indicated, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance made the observations to which I have alluded. In face of that, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), instead of taking advantage of the offer as made and of the suggestion contained in the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, the tariff of the United States was raised against Canada higher still.

Now we are confronted with new conditions. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he is asking this government to take a step which he should not ask it to take at this moment. If he earnestly desires to accomplish the purpose he has in mind—and he does—then obviously nothing should be done that would in any sense have the effect of lessening the possibility of success in the adoption of the arguments to which I have just referred, which are not my own but which I adopt, in dealing with the United States. If the hon. gentleman is prepared, as he apparently is, to accept the statements made in the interview by the president-elect, that is that by reciprocal agreements he proposes, nay he expects, to advance the trading interests of the United States, obviously any action taken by this parliament at this moment along the line suggested by the hon. gentleman would be premature. If we have the opportunity indicated in the statement made in the Cosmopolitan magazine and the interview to which the hon. gentleman referred of reliance by the new administration upon reciprocal agreements, then with our standing proposals, which have been the policy of all governments in this country since 1879 until to-day, it occurs to me that the hon. gentleman will best serve the interests that he desires to promote, having made the speech he has, and after such debate as may be thought desirable, by withdrawing the motion, in order that it may be made apparent to all who run and read that this parliament is still of the same opinion that it was in 1879, and that successive administrations have but given effect to one general view; that is that there is an earnest desire on the part of the Canadian people, with their great natural resources, their fisheries and forests and wide plains, to take advantage of the markets afforded by the most populous community in the world living together under one form of government.

But there is another reason, and I put it to the house as being, I submit, a conclusive reason why at this time, after this discussion, which cannot but be helpful, we should not adopt any resolution that would involve the possibility of being taken as an indication of a division of opinion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day directed attention to the fact that a draft annotated agenda for the monetary and economic conference had been issued. I indicated that while that is a draft agenda only, it is now published, and any person who so desired might avail himself of the opportunity to read it. Among the items on that agenda for consideration you will perhaps recall that after some difficulty this was added:

5. Tariff and treaty policy.
   A. Tariff policy:
      (1) Cessation of tariff increases.
      (2) Reduction of tariffs.
      (3) Special aspects of the tariff problem.
      (4) Method of procedure.

I will not weary the house by reading from the annotations with respect to the item on the agenda, I will content myself by directing attention to the fact that the United States, with some reluctance, shall I say, has agreed to have placed on the agenda an item dealing with the question of tariffs.

Now every thoughtful Canadian realizes that our geographical position has imposed on us difficulties of the first order. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough in very mild and moderate terms referred to the pre-confederation trading arrangements with the United States of America. Any man born as I was in the maritime provinces knows just what those trading agreements meant to the maritimes. There was then no Dominion of Canada, there was then no confederation. Reciprocal trading relations between the maritime provinces—not as a unit, of course, but each dealing with its own peculiar problems—and the United States of America gave a very substantial measure of prosperity to that part of this country. The termination of the treaty undoubtedly wrought great injury to the maritime provinces. But under the terms of the treaty it could be terminated, and the notice given was in accordance with the provisions of the treaty. It is undoubtedly true that where there was no treaty, as during the Wilson administration, the termination of that tariff arrangement by the legislative action of congress under the Republican administration did very great injury to the Dominion of Canada. There is no doubt that when channels of trade have been established, the destruction of such channels of trade, whether after six months' notice or without notice at all, works a very great injury on those who have created those channels. Our geographical position imposes upon this country extraordinary difficulties. No hon. member of this house who has had cause to think upon the problems of trade, as all have, fails to realize the truth of the statement by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) as to our natural market, if you can use that term when dealing with a foreign country, being the United States of America. I wonder how many members of this house have taken the trouble to study the situation according to the map: Look at the New England states and the city of New York, and remember the fast services by water, with splendid ships, that now exist between Yarmouth, we will say, and the city of New York. Think of the opportunities of modern cold storage facilities to supply the markets of that great city, whose population is at least half that of this dominion, with fish products just as fresh as could possibly be secured in any part of the world.

On the other hand we have this argument, which has prevailed in the United States congress to this day: The Gloucester fishermen, and those of the New England towns, say that these hardy Newfoundlanders and maritimers create unfair competition because of the quality of their products, which need not be here described, and they say they find it necessary to impose a duty of 2 cents a pound upon the fish brought to United States ports, as against free entry for fish caught by citizens of the United States. In dealing with a commodity such as fish, where the price per pound is not large, of course the result is that a 2 cent rate becomes such an addition to the cost as to represent practically a prohibition against the importation of Canadian fish. That is one item; I might mention others, but I will not take time to do so. These possibilities exist by reason of our geographical position and the easy transportation by water between the maritimes and the great cities and teeming communities of the eastern United States.

We must concede the absolute right of the United States congress to determine what it conceives to be best in the interests of that country. That is clear. In my judgment all we can do is follow the course that has been followed by successive governments and indicate clearly our willingness to negotiate on terms that are fair and reasonable, to quote the words that have been used by both Liberal and Conservative prime ministers and ministers of finance. We can only be ready and willing to avail ourselves of any proposals that are fair and reasonable and are not of such a character as will involve injury to this country if they are speedily terminated. I regard that as a factor of the utmost importance, and I believe I always shall, because I never have seen any answer to that argument, whether it be the notice that terminated that reciprocity agreement in 1864 or 1865, or the more recent termination of the Wilson tariff statute.

I can only repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I congratulate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough for affording the house an opportunity to discuss this matter. I have expressed my feeling in that regard, and have given two reasons for that feeling, the one being the historic reason, indicating the willingness of all parties and of this parliament, speaking as parliament, to make agreements that are fair and reasonable and for the good of the people as a whole, and the other argument being that we have been given to understand that within a few months an opportunity will be afforded not to one or two nations but to all the great nations of the world to realize the difficulties that have arisen because of too great reliance having been placed upon nationality as the determining factor in making trade agreements—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite applaud that statement, but let them remember that no ten millions of people can afford to be the victims of the application of the converse of that argument. That is the other side of the question. Willing as we may be and always have been to consider any fair and reasonable proposals, as the former Prime Minister, now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, no man will stand in this house to-day and express the view that we should place ourselves in such a position that as a result of the action we take, that which we have built up by such intense effort may be destroyed. Let me repeat that I cannot express the situation more clearly than it was expressed by the right hon. gentleman when he was leading the government, nor do I desire to do so. For that second reason, however, I do suggest that since the house, speaking for the whole of Canada, has expressed a unanimity of opinion as to the desirability of such an agreement being made if possible, the mover of the resolution, having served the excellent purpose that he had in mind, might further advance the object that is so dear to his heart by withdrawing the resolution after the discussion has served the purpose which he has in view.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the resolution which has been so ably moved by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman on his splendid review of the different negotiations that have taken place in connection with reciprocity, starting in the early days of confederation and continuing to the present time. I think he presented his views in a very impartial and unbiased manner and endeavoured to show as clearly as possible the benefits that would accrue to Canada if something of a reciprocal nature could be arranged between the two countries.

I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who has just spoken, did not see fit to tell the house that the government was ready to adopt the resolution, thus making it known to the United States that Canada was willing to trade on reasonable terms, under some carefully worded and carefully thought out trade agreement which would be beneficial to both countries. The right hon. gentleman advanced two reasons as to why this step should not be taken at the present time. The first reason was that in view of the fact that a new government has come into power in the United States it would be premature for Canada to make any advances along this line at the present time. With that argument I cannot agree; I think this is the opportune time for Canada to make a definite pronouncement in this connection. I believe we should let the United States understand that we are perfectly willing to enter into a reciprocal agreement with them if they are willing to meet us on fair and reasonable terms.

The other argument advanced by the Prime Minister was that in view of the fact that the World economic conference was to be held in the very near future, the matter of tariffs as between Canada and the United States and, for that matter, the world over, might better be left for discussion until that time. He intimated that pending that conference we should not make any pronouncement on the subject. I ask, however, why should not Canada take the lead in this regard? If we believe, as a great proportion of the Canadian people do believe, that there should be lower tariffs, why should not Canada endeavour to take the lead and if possible to make her position clearly felt at that world conference with respect to this important question of reducing tariffs? However, I think we were all glad to see that the Prime Minister was if anything much more reasonable, if I may be permitted to use that term, in his attitude towards tariffs to-day than he has been in the past. There was a time when he told us that he would make the whole world pay tribute to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Just when did he say that?

Mr. MacLEAN: I believe that has been quoted in the press very often.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MacLEAN: Perhaps my right hon. friend will say he has been misquoted.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. BENNETT: No, the statement is there. Don't misquote it, however, that is all.

Mr. MacLEAN: At any rate, the right hon. gentleman was of the opinion that foreign nations should pay tribute to the empire as a whole if they wanted to sell within its borders. Shut out the foreigner was the idea conveyed. Today however, possibly in view of the trade returns of our own country, the Prime Minister has learned the lesson that the policy of higher tariffs is not for the good of Canada nor for the good of any other country that adopts it.

I do not think anyone can take exception to the views I express when I state that the United States is the natural market for the maritime provinces, and notwithstanding the fact that high tariffs have been placed against a great many of our commodities, our farm products and the products of our fisheries are still entering that market over those barriers. I want to tell the Prime Minister and this house here and now that if it were not for the quantity of our products which we are still able to sell in the United States, I am at a loss to know what the farmers and the fishermen of the maritimes would do. We know that they are in a bad enough position at the present time, but if that market which they have in the United States were altogether closed to them they would be in a very much worse position than that in which they now find themselves.

Our friends have always told us, and no one was stronger in this than the Prime Minister at the last election, that they would build up the home market for all Canadian products. Well, this government has endeavoured to preserve the home market for the producers of Canada and to-day I ask the farmers of the country how they like that market. They have it now with a vengeance, but that market is not affording them very much relief. This idea of our friends, of building up the home market for Canadian products, so that the people of the maritime provinces can dispose of their products in central Canada, is an old delusion. It has been trotted out and has done duty at every election, just as it did in 1930, when we were told that the market for the producers of the maritimes would be found in central Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where did you sell your potatoes this winter?—Right in Toronto.

Mr. MacLEAN: All that we sold in Toronto was harmless. The hon. gentleman can ask his own friends from the maritimes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will ask someone who knows more about it than the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. MacLEAN: My hon. friend can make his speech when his time comes and I shall be glad to listen to him. Let me tell him however that if he will look up the statistics as given by the Bureau of Statistics he will find where our potatoes from the maritimes are sold year in and year out. What do we find when we come to central Canada with our products? We find that the farmers there are producing the very same commodities that we are offering for sale. They are producing butter and cheese, potatoes and vegetables, and they are supplying the cities of Toronto and Montreal, which are the large centres of consumption in this part of the country. The result is that when we look for a market for our products in these centres we are practically shut out.

The difficulty with our farmers at the present time is to find a market. They cannot find a market in those centres which are easily accessible. The United States is the place they can reach with the least difficulty, where there are water transportation and cheap freight rates to enable them to get the full benefit of the market and to obtain the maximum for their produce. What is the situation with respect to our shipments to Great Britain? As regards the province of Prince Edward Island, our cheese and butter and a great many of our other products have to be loaded on the trains, hauled a distance of seven or eight hundred miles to Montreal, and then loaded on the boat for Great Britain, being taken back past our own door, all of which costs the farmers and the producers of that province a tremendous amount of money. We are three or four thousand miles from the British market and only a few hundred miles from the American, and there are many products we have to sell that are really not required at all in the British market.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has dealt fully with the fisheries question, which I myself have brought up in this house on different occasions. Let me refer to it for a moment. Take the question of the shipment of live lobsters. Last season, had it not been for our live lobster trade there would have been really nothing in the fishing season for our fishermen. Our canned goods go largely to the markets of Great Britain, and the price was so low that the fishermen were receiving only 2, 3 and 4 cents per pound for the lobsters that were being packed and shipped to that market, whereas for their live lobsters going to the United States they were receiving, 15, 20 and often as high as 25 and 30 cents per pound. You can see therefore that if it were not for these shipments of live lobsters to the United States the fishermen of the maritime provinces could scarcely carry on.

As regards the question of lowering tariffs, as I said a moment ago, I am glad to see that the Prime Minister is apparently more favourable to this line of action than he has been in the past. It was my privilege to hear the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin at the Imperial conference, and he made these remarks:

> No nation or group of nations, however wealthy and populous, can maintain prosperity in a world where depression and impoverishment reign. Let us therefore aim at the lowering rather than the raising of barriers, even if we cannot fully achieve our purpose now, and let us remember that any action we take here is bound to have its reactions elsewhere.

Mr. Baldwin was plainly of the opinion, even at that conference, where I am sorry to say tariffs were really raised rather than lowered, that the only solution for the problem confronting not only Canada but the world at large was the lowering of tariff barriers if at all possible. With 120,000,000 people right at our doors, is it not natural that we in the maritimes should want to trade with them? Why not try to do business along business lines? Why should this or any other government seek to act differently in the negotiating of trade treaties for the extending of trade than would a business man? Business men are after business, they try to find markets near at hand and all that this resolution asks for is that similar action be taken by this government.

There is no need to go over all the history from confederation to the present time as it deals with the reciprocity agreements which have been advanced. There is no reason why we should not attempt at the present time to negotiate an agreement better than any agreements negotiated in the past. It is within the possibilities of belief that the present government now coming into power in the United States will be more favourable to trade relations with Canada than have the governments in the past. I think it was during the election campaign that President-elect Roosevelt said: Why not let us sit around a table and work out these difficulties; let us start trading with our neighbours in Canada; let us endeavour to get trade moving and then if we can do that we can set our people to work. The members of the government do not seem to realize that the great need of this country at the present time is trade. Before I conclude my remarks I intend to quote a few figures to show how the trade of this country, our export trade especially, has fallen off since this government came into power.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member should also give the figures for the rest of the world to show how much better off we are.

Mr. MacLEAN: The right hon. gentleman should not seek shelter and attempt to defend the policy of his own government by referring to world conditions. Canada's trade returns cut a sorry figure to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: They are better than those of other countries.

Mr. MacLEAN: I am sorry to say that the tide is still running out, we have not yet reached low ebb. The statement of the Department of National Revenue issued a few days ago shows that our trade returns are still falling off.

Those of us who remember back to 1910 and 1911 and the agreement brought down at that time wonder why our hon. friends who came into power through the defeat of the reciprocity agreement did not endeavour to meet the United States in connection with that matter, or through some modified agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLEAN: The Prime Minister laughs.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because you had been at it for two years or more before we came into power.

Mr. MacLEAN: When that treaty was introduced into this house I understand that even our right hon. friend and many other hon. members of the house were so impressed with it that they were not sure whether or not it should be opposed.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member refer to me? I opposed it from the minute it was published, and I was not a member of the house at that time.

Mr. YOUNG: More shame.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the most vigorous language you could use.

Mr. BENNETT: You will find a letter in the Toronto News.

Mr. MacLEAN: I do not know whether or not my right hon. friend should be congratulated for that. We maritime people do not think so. When Sir Robert Borden made his first speech on the reciprocity agreement, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the remark that he could not tell whether his right hon. friend was for or against the agreement. It was a very mild criticism, his chief argument being that it would injure our transportation systems. Later on the opposition to the agreement developed and our hon. friends became very seriously alarmed at the possibility of this commercial union becoming a political union, that we would become an annex to the United States. I do not see why our hon. friends at that time should have been so much alarmed. They seemed to have the same idea as they have at the present time. They do not grasp the fact that trade and trade alone is the life blood of any country. At that time they endeavoured to convince the people that if this reciprocity treaty went through the industrial life of this country would be ruined. Had they been wise they would have showed the people that the increase of trade which would have developed through the reciprocity agreement would have helped the prosperity of this country. The Prime Minister himself to-day stated that when we had the reciprocity agreement with the United States the maritime provinces were more prosperous than they have ever been since. I do not think for one moment that that agreement would have injured the industrial life of this country. However, resolutions were adopted in the provincial legislatures, in boards of trade and every place else opposing this reciprocity agreement. Speaking at a board of trade luncheon at Toronto on November 3, 1910, Sir George W. Ross told the audience that it was a step towards annexation and he asked the people of Canada to form themselves into organizations in an attempt to prevent any possible annexation to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: And that gentleman was afterwards the leader of the Liberal party in the Senate.

Mr. MacLEAN: That does not make any difference.

Mr. BENNETT: I just mention it.

Mr. MacLEAN: An attempt was made at that time to hoodwink the people of Canada with regard to these negotiations. I think to-day the people of Canada are too intelligent to be fooled by anything of that kind. Sir George W. Ross told his audience that Canadian wheat would lose its identity in passing through the United States and Canada would lose her world markets for that commodity. He told them that the same thing would happen in connection with Canadian cheese. Those were the arguments put forward at that time. Sir James Whitney, the Premier of Ontario moved a similar resolution against reciprocity in the Ontario legislature.

This agreement was defeated at the polls in 1911 and I think this constitutes the greatest crime ever committed against the agriculturists of the maritime provinces. Although that offer remained open on the statute books of the United States for ten or twelve years our good Conservative friends here never made any move to accept it even in a modified form that would have met their wishes, and I say emphatically that that is one thing which the people of the maritime provinces hold against the Conservative party. They are responsible for the defeat of the reciprocity agreement. It is due to the neglect of the Conservative party, after the offer had been held open for that period of time by the United States, that no attempt was made to put through even a modified agreement if the agreement as written by Mr. Fielding was not acceptable to the Conservative party. So it is no wonder that the United States then increased her tariffs. The Prime Minister would lead us to believe that the United States was as much to blame as Canada in the matter of increasing tariffs. The United States waited ten or twelve years, and then realizing that Canada apparently had no intention of accepting the treaty in any shape or form, they naturally said to themselves: All we can do is to put up a prohibitory tariff against Canada and shut her goods out of our market. This they proceeded to do, and I say without fear of contradiction that if there is a high tariff imposed by the United States against Canada to-day, a great deal of the blame for that lies at the doors of our friends opposite.

I should like to give a few figures of our exports from the maritimes to the United States and our imports from that country, which strikingly illustrate the nature of the trade we enjoy with the United States. I have picked out just two or three of the most outstanding items. In 1931 we imported from the United States 195,917 hundredweight of potatoes, and in the same year we shipped to the United States 4,594,121 bushels. Of poultry, we imported none from the United States, and we exported to that country 278,480 pounds. Of turnips we imported none from the United States, and we shipped to that country 1,838,829 bushels. Those figures are small compared with our exports in other years. On a great many occasions we have shipped many more millions of bushels to the United States than the figure I have just given. There is one thing I should like the house to realize, and that is that this 5,000,000 bushels of potatoes which we shipped to the United States from the maritimes had to climb over a tariff wall of 75 cents per 100 pounds, and still our friends on the other side of the house ask, what is the use of the American market for the people of the maritimes or for Canada? They ask us, why don't you sell in Toronto and Montreal? Let me tell them that it would take only the shipments from a very few farms in the maritime provinces, given a good year, to completely fill the markets of Toronto and Montreal, and consequently we have to find a larger market than Canada affords.

Notwithstanding that this government promised to do so much for the farmer—they were going to find markets for farm products and blast a way into the markets of the world that were reluctant to receive our products —the best this government can offer us now is to tell the farmers of this country that there is only one thing for them to do, and that is to cut down their production. I say that if ever condemnation could be laid at the door of any government, it should be laid at the door of this government for its suggestion now to the farmers of this country to cut down their production of agricultural and other products.

Our fish products have been referred to by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). We have a very large market for our fresh fish in the United States, in spite of the fact, as the Prime Minister has stated, that there is a duty of two cents a pound against our fish. The Prime Minister said that we could not get our fish into the United States market because it was a low-priced product, but nevertheless, in spite of the duty, we are making very large shipments of fresh fish of various kinds to the United States from the maritimes.

In connection with the potato situation, I may say that I have moved in this house for a return to be brought down giving full information regarding the potato embargo and the report which the British officials who were sent over here to investigate made some time ago. Up to the present time the papers have not been brought down. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) did read a letter the other day informing this house that the British government has refused to lift its embargo. So, as far as blasting a way into that market is concerned, we have lost all hope, and so far as regards forcing our way into other reluctant markets, nothing has been accomplished.

I would also point out that the Cuban market has largely been lost to the people in the maritime provinces. The Cuban people told us positively that unless we made some kind of a reciprocal arrangement whereby they could ship their sugar into Canada, they were not prepared to buy the products of this country. So what with the dumping duties which have been imposed by this government and the different arrangements which they have put into effect, Cuban sugar has been practically shut out of our market, and in consequence we have to a great extent lost the Cuban market for our potatoes.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit a question, may I ask what action of his government has shut out Cuban sugar from this market?

Mr. MacLEAN: Since my hon. friend has raised that question, and it is a fair one—my hon. friend always wishes to be fair—this matter came up in the house last year, and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) at page 908 of Hansard of November 7, 1932, asked regarding the importation of sugar from Cuba, and the Prime Minister in reply said:

> Mr. Bennett: Not the duty on sugar. It was to take care of the sugar that came from Cuba under circumstances which, as the hon. gentleman knows, were destroying not only the beet sugar industry here but the West Indian sugar industry as well. It was to preserve the market we had promised them under the treaty as well as the beet sugar industry here that the order in council was passed dealing with Cuban sugar.

Mr. STEVENS: The West Indian treaty passed by my friends opposite is the controlling factor in regard to Cuban sugar.

Mr. MacLEAN: I cannot agree with my hon. friend at all. Our friends opposite have been trying to put that over the Canadian people too long, but we are going to nip it in the bud right now.

Mr. STEVENS: We de not have to put it over because it happens to be statute law.

Mr. MacLEAN: The hon. member for Weyburn, following up his question, then went on to say:

> Mr. Young: The value for duty was fixed, and so the duty was raised. The minister told us that that was done to encourage the farmers to sow beets, but what did he do? He raised the duty on refined sugar and left the duty on raw sugar where it was.
>
> Mr. Bennett: That was covered by the treaty, and he could not change it. Surely the hon. gentleman knows that.
>
> Mr. Young: Then what benefit was the beet grower going to get out of it? He was going to sell raw sugar.
>
> Mr. Bennett: It kept Cuban sugar out.

Mr. MacLEAN: So we have the Prime Minister's own word for it that they shut out Cuban sugar.

Mr. STEVENS: Refined sugar.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. MacLEAN: It makes no difference; the minister cannot hide behind the discrimination between refined and raw sugar. The Cuban people would be as happy to sell raw sugar as to sell refined. The minute Cuban sugar is shut out of our market, we are doing an injury to that country. To get back at us they have imposed a duty against our potatoes. The hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald) was sent to Cuba and upon his return was asked question after question in this house. Finally we received a little information to the effect that they were perfectly willing to trade with Canada, provided Canada were content to trade with them and to take some of their sugar.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member must know that Cuba is now growing her own potatoes.

Mr. YOUNG: Where do they get their seed?

Mr. BENNETT: From us.

Mr. MacLEAN: I think the Prime Minister should revise his statistics. They are still importing large quantities of potatoes, but chiefly from the United States. However, even in the face of the increased duty against our potatoes, we still ship some to Cuba. I am trying to drive home the point that Cuba is still buying potatoes, but that the farmers of the maritimes are forced to take a loss because of the duty which has been imposed against them by Cuba as a result of the policy of this government. I hope nothing more will be said about the Cuban sugar situation because we have heard the Prime Minister's statement to the effect that by order in council he shut Cuban sugar out of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: By fixing prices for duty purposes.

Mr. MacLEAN: Yes. I am pleased to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his seat, because there are some figures concerning the trade of Canada which I should like to place on Hansard. In 1922 the export trade of Canada was valued at $753,927,009. As everyone knows that trade went up by leaps and bounds until we find that in the year 1929 it reached its highest point, namely, $1,388,896,073, or an increase of $634,969,064 in the period of a few years under Liberal rule.

What do we find to-day? Under the policy of the present government the export trade has continued to decrease until we find that for the last ten months it is valued at only $350,000,000. That is the lowest trade figure in the last twenty years of Canadian history

If we take the top figure of $3,000,000 per month for the next two months the total export trade of Canada for the year would stand at only $356,000,000. One would think with figures like these staring hon. members opposite in the face, they would see the error of their way and be willing to reverse their policy in an endeavour to restore to Canada its export trade. They should accept all suggestions from any corner of the house towards reciprocal or other trade arrangements which would benefit not only the trade of Canada and our financial standing but would benefit Canadian farmers. After the mad race for high tariffs which we have witnessed I believe the time has come when this house should consider very carefully every proposal put forward in an endeavour to reach a trade condition which at least to some extent would relieve the Canadian farmers and fishermen.

From an order for return passed by this house a few days ago we learn that 527,000 pounds of New Zealand butter have been admitted into Canada within the last twelve or thirteen months. I see the hon. member opposite in his seat who only a few days ago introduced a resolution asking that something be done by this government for the dairy farmers. I was not surprised when he introduced that resolution, because if ever there was a time when the dairy farmers of Canada required assistance, it is to-day. Notwithstanding the fact that hon. members opposite won the election because of their cry against the Liberal party's policy in connection with New Zealand butter, yet we find in the return to which I have referred that in the short period of only twelve or thirteen months, this large quantity of New Zealand butter has been admitted into Canada. I could give instance after instance of a similar nature, where our friends opposite have neglected to fulfil their promises.

Again I appeal to hon. members opposite not to try to side-track the resolution now before us, not to ask that it be withdrawn, but to give it careful consideration. I suggest that arising from it there should be a treaty which would not have for its purpose the wiping out or injuring of any industry, but rather the improvement of our agriculture and fishing industries. Undoubtedly there are certain commodities people in Canada require which the United States can supply. On the other hand we produce commodities that the United States could use and would be willing to buy from us. As a common sense business proposition, why in the world cannot the people of the United States and the people of Canada get together on some form of reciprocal agreement which would be beneficial to each country, and benefit particularly the farmers and fishermen of this country?

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that after the very dispassionate manner in which the mover of the resolution (Mr. Duff) discussed the subject, and after the very thorough and, I should add, illuminating manner in which the Prime Minister has dealt with the topic, the house will not expect me in any controversial spirit to engage with the hon. member (Mr. MacLean) who has just taken his seat. To him I would say only this, that for good and sufficient reasons the Canadian people in 1911 defeated the reciprocity pact; it was not a treaty at all.

Mr. MUNN: And they have been sorry ever since.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have never said so, and I shall have to have better evidence than that supplied by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) before I change my opinion in the matter. Therefore I have no desire whatever to engage in any controversy as to the whys or wherefores surrounding the defeat of reciprocity in 1911. Rather should we, I believe, devote our attention to the consideration we should give to the resolution before us, directing our minds chiefly to the question as to whether or not at this time the subject matter should be before us at all.

I have no doubt in the world as to the sincerity of the hon. member who proposed the resolution. No doubt he has listened to the legend telling of the advantages of the reciprocity treaty of 1854. I was not born in those days, and I doubt if many hon. members in the house remember even the latter part of the period involved. I do however recall hearing my grandfather, who was in trade in a small way, telling me about the days of the reciprocity treaty of 1854. I believe it is the consensus of opinion that so far as the maritime provinces were concerned that convention or treaty, or whatever you may wish to call it, was of advantage to that section of Canada. But we have to remember what day and generation that was. I also recall having heard him tell of the distress that prevailed in the maritime provinces because of the abrogation of that treaty. To me as a young boy he gave a lesson as to what might happen if we entered into an arrangement whereby our trade should be turned into certain channels and then be arbitrarily cut off, as happened in 1867. That is one of the reasons why I think the Canadian people in 1911 voted as they did. It may not have been a good reason, but I have no doubt it was a reason.

I desire to congratulate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, on the manner in which he treated the subject. There is no question where he stands. He believes it to be in the interests of the people of Nova Scotia, particularly the fishing interests, to have access to the New England market. I was born in sight of American territory, and I have lived all my life there. I represent a constituency which adjoins the American republic on an extensive border line, and I know that propinquity, contiguity, is a strong factor in creating a disposition to trade with our American neighbours, especially between the maritime provinces and New England. Personally I am perfectly willing to enter into an arrangement at any time with respect to that if it can be done on fair and reasonable terms, and terms that will be stable as to time. But I am not willing that we should enter into an arrangement which can be terminated at the whim of any American politician. I spent a week in the gallery of the United States Senate in April, 1929, when the Hawley-Smoot bill was being dealt with in its last stages, and I witnessed what they did and how they handled it. I have no desire to repeat the story here. But there is a large measure of sentiment in both countries ready to consider this question on its merits, and when the proper time arrives, I think we should consider it in that way.

The historical data that has been placed upon Hansard this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) should be of great value. I commend it particularly to the notice of the hon. member for Prince. If he will go back to his constituents and tell them that as long ago as 1879 the government of Sir John A. Macdonald, when Sir Leonard Tilly was finance minister, put an offer of reciprocity on the statute books of this country, he will be doing the fair thing, but knowing him as I do I doubt if he will do it. Let him tell them also of the statement made by Mr. Fielding in 1923. I was a member of the house at the time and recall the circumstances very well. As far as I am aware that proposal which is quite in line with the policy of the Conservative party previous to 1896, has never been repealed.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has touched, very properly from his standpoint, on the question of the modus vivendi. I lived for twenty-one years in the constituency of Charlotte, New Brunswick, where they have the largest body of fishermen of any county in New Brunswick, though not as large as some in Nova Scotia. That county particularly, lying as it does along the shores of the bay of Fundy, and adjacent to the American border, is particularly interested in this question. Personally I never could understand why the modus vivendi with respect to the use of our ports was cut off, and I commend the action of the administration in renewing it in the last few days. But I do suggest, in the absence of further information, that the period suggested seems to be too short. I never could understand why it should be limited as to time or as to its operation. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that in the absence of good arguments to the contrary our ports should be open to the Gloucester fishermen not only for shelter and wood and water and repairs but for the privilege of buying bait and supplies and transshipping fish in bond to the American republic. I understand that privilege has been enjoyed at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, for years and years, and why the same principle is not applicable on the Atlantic coast I do not understand. I think some explanation is due. I believe the government will be conferring a benefit upon the fishermen of the Atlantic provinces if they can see their way clear to renewing this modus vivendi for twelve months in the year and allowing the Gloucester fishermen to make those purchases in our ports. I would add, though, that the greatest enemy of the project is not the Canadian government but the supply men of Gloucester, who are absolutely opposed to the distribution of that money in Canada. It is just another illustration of their attitude towards this country. I am told that many of the men who are interested in the vessels as owners are also interested in the business of supplying these vessels with bait and provisions. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will probably know about that better than I.

Perhaps it would have been just as well if the motion had been withdrawn after the Prime Minister made his statement this afternoon, but as that has not been done I think we ought to go ahead and examine it at some little length, if only for educational purposes, for the benefit of those who, living in the interior of the country, are perhaps not as much interested in the matter as we who are contiguous to New England. It must, I think, be apparent to all that whenever a Republican administration has been in power in the United States, save and except the one of 1911, adverse tariffs have been imposed against us by our neighbours to the south, and whenever a Democratic administration has been in power, there has been, at all events to a degree, a reversal of that situation. Therefore I confess that I have some little hope, though no certainty, that the Democratic party, which is about to assume office in a very few days, will give some consideration to this problem of better trade relations with other countries, especially Canada. I suggest to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough that perhaps his resolution is a little premature. Having regard to the fact that the Democratic administration is not yet in office, and that the administration now going out is moribund and without power in the United States congress, it would have been better had he delayed bringing up the question.

The second reason why the motion is premature is the one alluded to by the Prime Minister; I refer to the World economic conference which we hope will be held very shortly, and at which this very question of tariffs is to be discussed. I think I have made it plain on more than one occasion during the years I have been honoured with a seat in this house that I am not a high tariff man.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear. Come over here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to be provocative, but when I look over there I see every stripe of political colour with regard to the tariff. I see the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), who has high protection on his furniture, and I see free traders scattered all over. I see the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), with his protected industries; probably he wants even more protection. I understand that he is a director of a great new industry that was recently established in his province with a 35 per cent protection.

Mr. VALLANCE: And you see Tories from Saskatchewan sitting beside you.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but there are Tories and Tories. There is the old crusted variety, like Sir Wilfrid Laurier, than whom there was no greater Tory in Canada in his day.

Hon. gentlemen have succeeded in diverting me for a moment from the line of thought I was pursuing. I think in due time we will all come to recognize—and I say this without political bias—that tariffs are best used as weapons in securing trade. That is the argument upon which, in my own constituency, I have based my defence of a tariff system in Canada. I do know, however, that the United States never had more respect for Canada than she had when we put up our tariffs against that country as a result of the election of 1930. Further, she never had more contempt for Canada than she had during the period from 1922 to 1930, when this country turned the other cheek after being slapped repeatedly. Then we had the spectacle of the Dunning budget, by which the Liberal party endeavoured to withdraw from an impossible position which they had assumed for eight years.

Mr. MALCOLM: Very good years for trade.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, good all over the world, and Canada got her share. But let me tell the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce that during those eight years we were selling the raw material of this country, part of our heritage.

Mr. MALCOLM: I beg to differ with my hon. friend. The percentage of manufactured goods exported was higher during that period than it is to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: That included newsprint; that is why.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. gentleman includes flour and that sort of thing among manufactured products probably he is correct. It all depends on how you classify those things. I do say, however, that in my own province, and I believe in Nova Scotia as well, the great bulk of the exports during those years was raw materials.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you call lumber raw material?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I would say that lumber in a semi-manufactured state is raw material. Come down with me to the county of Charlotte and I will show you where white pine sawn only one way, that is with the wane on, is being carried over to Mattawamkeag, Maine, and sold to the Diamond Match Company. There it is manufactured into match blocks and shipped to various parts of the United States for manufacture into matches. Also I will tell the hon. gentleman that these match blocks, made out of Canadian white pine cut down in the county of Charlotte, New Brunswick, are being manufactured into match blocks in Maine and shipped to England in the manufactured state. If that is not exporting our raw material I do not know what it is. The only reason they do not ship the tree to the plant in Maine is that they want the lumber to dry and be air seasoned before it is manufactured. That is what we did from 1922 to 1930; we exported raw material out of this country, and many a man went after it. We lost a million good Canadians during that period.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can my hon. friend tell me how many more Canadian citizens would be employed cutting this white pine into match blocks? It is a trivial operation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can tell the hon. gentleman that if that plant were in Canada just that many more Canadians would be employed.

Mr. MALCOLM: Just how many? It is a trivial operation, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am free to confess that I do not know anything about it. I do not know how big the operation may be, but I see the plant as I go by Mattawamkeag, Maine, every month or every two weeks, and I know that the plant is in the United States and that it is manufacturing Canadian raw material.

Mr. MALCOLM: What about Canadian cotton mills manufacturing United States cotton?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everyone knows that raw cotton is not indigenous to this country. Rightly or wrongly, fifty years or more ago we built up a cotton industry in this country. I do not know, but it is just possible that if we had it to do all over again we would proceed differently. Rightly or wrongly we built up an automobile manufacturing business in this country, in which millions of dollars have been invested. Since that industry was established all governments have given it protection. Rightly or wrongly we built up other industries in this country, including the furniture industry, and we have given them protection. My hon. friend makes very good furniture; I bought some of it and was glad to have it. I paid for it, and I suppose according to the arguments of my hon. friend I paid him 35 per cent excess profits on it. I only hope the government of this country has received some of that back in income tax.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

To be serious, and to return once more to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Antigonish-Gusborough—

Mr. MALCOLM: Would my hon. friend permit a question before he gets serious, apropos of what he says about the United States having built up an industry for making match blocks? Why should they not continue to get the pine to supply that industry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far as I am concerned I would much rather see that industry in Canada. The hon. member for North Bruce may desire to see it in the United States; I guess that is the truth, and that is typical of the policies of the Liberal party for years past. They have sought to change Canada into a country of hewers of wood and drawers of water, and if hon. gentlemen opposite had their way there would not be a single industry left in this country. That is my answer to the hon. member for North Bruce; the record of his own party.

Having regard to history and to the present position of political parties in the United States; having regard to all the facts, I must say that any discussion of this question at the present time can be nothing else than academic. I would refer the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough to the remarks made by Mr. Fielding when he delivered that speech in 1923. I have not Hansard by me, but he said that having regard to the conditions that then obtained, having regard to the fact that they were putting through a tariff bill in the United States congress at that very time, it would not be opportune, it would not be right, it would not be in keeping with the dignity of Canada as an independent nation for us to go down there with our hat in our hand, and I hope that this country will never witness such a spectacle, much as I should like to see us extend our trade with our neighbours to the south.

For these reasons I do not think it is opportune for the hon. gentleman to press his motion at this time. At the same time no harm will have come from the discussion of the problem in a very moderate way, as I have attempted to discuss it. I repeat, I am not a high tariff man but I am willing to use tariffs for purposes of negotiation, as weapons to get fair trade, and I believe that I shall live to see the day, as many hon. gentlemen opposite will live to see it, when the United States of America will recognize the fact that Canada's protective tariff is as much a weapon of barter with us as it is an instrument to carry out the principle of protection itself.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I listened with a good deal of interest to what I might call the Prime Minister's historical recitation this afternoon and I learned a good deal from him, but I am sorry to say that I can hardly agree with him in his conclusion when he suggests to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) that he withdraw this resolution after some debate on it.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. VALLANCE: For the very reasons he gave why it should be withdrawn, I think it should be fully discussed and that this house should register the fact that it is unanimously in support of such a resolution. Why should we not support it? What does the resolution propose? Let me quote:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough dealt very ably with the question of reciprocity with the United States from the standpoint of the fishermen, and I wish to refer for a moment or two to the effect which such a resolution as this might have on agriculture, especially the cattle industry.

We have been and to-day are very much concerned about markets for all our surplus products, and we have been discussing the possibility of an arrangement with Russia whereby we might be able to dispose of 100,000 head of cattle. In discussing a resolution of this kind, it seems to me that if we went back over a period of years and realized the possibilities of that great market to the south of us, most of us would be able to convince ourselves of the advisability of adopting what is here proposed. The Russian deal was a barter of coal for cattle and the suggestion I am going to make to the government in support of this resolution is also coal for cattle; and I propose to give some figures showing to what extent the cattle industry had been developed, so far as our exports to the United States are concerned. In 1919 we exported to the United States over half a million head of cattle, and our subsequent exports, together with corresponding values, will appear from the following table:

| Twelve months ended September 30 | Number | Value |
|---|---|---|
| 1920 | 420,891 | $35,082,023 |
| 1921 | 247,106 | 15,277,621 |
| 1922 | 224,032 | 4,699,358 |
| 1923 | 161,891 | 4,475,504 |
| 1924 | 149,715 | 4,903,490 |
| 1925 | 123,438 | 3,324,087 |
| 1926 | 159,512 | 4,620,863 |
| 1927 | 194,039 | 6,699,406 |
| 1928 | 316,608 | 17,260,840 |
| 1929 | 240,050 | 13,234,671 |
| Twelve months ended June 30 | | |
| 1930 | 190,515 | 9,934,282 |
| 1931 | 22,481 | 763,858 |
| 1932 | 18,651 | 649,890 |

I will not blame the government entirely for this condition—

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): I hope not.

Mr. VALLANCE: My hon. friend from Lethbridge says, "I hope not." Well, if we continue to ignore resolutions such as the one now under discussion, we shall find before long that our exports of cattle will not only have dwindled to 18,000 but have entirely disappeared. What we are trying to do is to bring about an export condition comparable to that of 1919, and coming from Lethbridge as the hon. member does, he will not, I am sure, vote against this resolution.

From October 3, 1913, to May 27, 1921, under the Underwood tariff, there were in force in the United States rates which permitted our cattle to get into that market free. The emergency tariff, from May 27, 1921, to September 21, 1922, imposed a duty of 30 per cent, and then the Fordney-McCumber tariff, from September 21, 1922, to June 18, 1930, fixed these rates: On less than 1,050 pounds 1½ cents per pound; 1,050 pounds and over, 2 cents per pound. Then came the Hawley-Smoot tariff, from June 18, 1930, to date, carrying these rates: Less than 700 pounds, 2½ cents per pound; 700 pounds and over, 3 cents per pound.

It seems to me that the time is ripe for this government and this house to give expression to the attitude of the Canadian people towards a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That is on the statute books now.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister says it is on the statute books now, so that there can be no harm in allowing this resolution to be voted on. By so doing this house would be intimating to the people of the United States that Canada is still willing to enter into a reciprocal agreement with them.

It is only to put the position of the cattle industry before the house that I have spoken. I do not think there is any branch of agriculture to-day, badly off as wheat is in regard to markets, that needs a market more urgently than does the cattle industry. We are not exporting cattle. The cattle that should have found a fall market were turned back on the ranges and are to-day running the ranges in Saskatchewan and Alberta. If we adopt this resolution we shall show the United States our willingness to enter into a reciprocal arrangement with them. In a few days' time there will come into office there a government which I believe will be more sympathetic to a proposal of this sort than the government which is going out. I fully intend to support the resolution.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): I shall support this resolution because it discloses evidence of a willingness on our part to remove the restrictions upon trade between the United States and ourselves without adding to the duties on goods imported from other countries. I am heartily in agreement with the speaker who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Vallance). I am convinced that such an arrangement would be of immense benefit to the wheat growers and cattle raisers of western Canada. Great benefits would accrue if this resolution should receive the support of this house and ultimately become law here and in the United States.

I am exceedingly gratified to see the reception given to the resolution by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I am sure that the sympathy he has shown towards it will meet with the approval of the whole country. I remember the experience of 1911 when the reciprocity pact then proposed was turned down by the people of Canada. I have always felt that that was a great mistake and that had the people approved it it would have been for the good of Canada and we would have received benefits for all time. I have always felt that that pact was not turned down because of its merits or demerits. Many arguments were advanced by its opponents, but those arguments were more of the nature of a red herring drawn across the trail, an attempt to obscure the fact that the arrangement would be beneficial to Canada as a whole. It was alleged that the existing trade connections would be disrupted, that the trade routes would be changed, that it would have the effect of disturbing the existing transportation systems which had been designed for east and west traffic, that great loss would result to the shareholders in our transportation systems, that our natural resources would be depleted to our harm and to the good of the United States. It was also urged that Canada was rich and did not need reciprocity, that the ties with the mother country would be weakened and ultimately there would be the annexation of Canada by the United States. I do not think there are many hon. members of this house who would fear any one of these supposed dangers to-day.

We have reached the time when we realize that we need more trade with every country willing to trade with us. The Prime Minister gave expression this afternoon to that view when he said: There is an earnest desire upon the part of the Canadian people to trade with the United States. As Canada turned down the proposed arrangement in 1911 it is perhaps our duty at this time to take the first step in reopening negotiations. I think it would be for the good of Canada that we should make known our wishes with regard to the matter, although it might be better for the government to wait until the new administration is in power in the United States before making formal approaches.

I hope that this resolution may be implemented because I believe it would greatly increase the volume of trade between Canada and the United States to the mutual advantage of both countries. I believe it would lead to a better understanding and a greater appreciation, each of the other, and would tend to eradicate the animosity which has been engendered by the high tariff walls of our respective countries. I believe this is a good time to consider the matter, because on both sides of that imaginary line which is called the boundary between the United States and Canada there is a growing opinion in favour of freer trade between the two countries as well as among other countries of the world. Many men and organizations have been urging that tariff walls should be lowered to permit our trading more freely with each other. I am most heartily in agreement with any suggestion of the kind.

The resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

Surely no hon. member can object to that resolution. It speaks only of arrangements being made which shall be in the interests of both countries. Every hon. member who has the interests of Canada at heart desires that our trade shall increase and unemployment be lessened, and even more so if this can be done without any harm whatsoever to any industry in this country. For these reasons I heartily support the resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak for more than a few minutes on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). As one of the older members of this house, needless to say I was greatly interested in the discussion which took place this afternoon. The discussion pursued lines which in the past have been rather controversial, and the unanimity with which the motion was received this afternoon was consequently somewhat of a surprise to me. I have lived a considerable time in Canada; I have a vivid recollection of the attitude of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house with respect to public questions and reciprocity is one in which I have always been much interested. I know something of its history, and I followed this afternoon the rehearsal of its history by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Duff) and in the remarks made by the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) with respect to the attitude which the respective political parties had taken on this very important question.

No one will deny for a moment that trade with the United States is the most important in which the Canadian people are engaged. One need only refer to the annual trade returns issued by government departments to realize that our trade with the United States has always been the most important. Indeed, our trade with the United States and with Great Britain represents about seventy-five per cent of our total trade, and it has been so for many years.

I shall not recapitulate what has been so well stated this afternoon, by both the mover of the resolution and the leader of the government. I wish rather to base my remarks on events from 1911 onwards. I happened to be in western Canada in 1911, and as one who believed in the utmost freedom of trade and in trade expansion, a cause which I have always espoused and supported, believing that the widest possible measure of trade would be the most beneficial to Canada. I naturally was strongly in favour of the reciprocity treaty. I have never subscribed to the narrower views of trade held by the Conservative party, who believed, and they are entitled to that belief, that the secondary industries were entitled to a certain amount of protection. I believed that it was impossible in any way to lend protection to the great natural industries of this country, our basic industries, lumbering, mining and fishing, upon which the whole success of the commercial fabric of Canada depends, and for that reason I have constantly been opposed to the granting of special privileges which the party opposite have always been willing to extend to secondary industries for their encouragement, and in order, to use their own language, to create a home market for the primary industries of this country. It will be many years before that happy condition of affairs comes about in Canada. I am not forgetting the terrible arraignment which hon. gentlemen now sitting on the treasury benches meted out to us who were then sitting on that side, in speeches much more vitriolic than that made by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon. Many a time it was hurled across the floor of this house that we were only too willing to turn the other cheek when our neighbours to the south saw fit to increase their tariffs against us. But the striking fact remains that throughout all these years in which the tariff controversy has raged, the United States, ever since we have kept trade statistics in this country, has been the best customer for Canadian products. That is the amazing thing, that the United States has remained our best customer, even in face of the exorbitant tariffs enforced by the Americans from time to time against us, tariff increases which made it easy to inflame public opinion in Canada against the United States. It was thought wise in this country to have a great national policy, and hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party talked about "red-blooded Canadianism" if you did not support their policy. My hon. friends opposite got very considerable support in Canada in 1930 on the basis of those very same statements. It is easy to inflame public opinion, but the fact remains, which no one can deny, that through it all the Americans were the best customers that Canada possessed for her products.

My right hon. friend has said—I shall not have time to go fully into this—that it was because we were shipping them our raw products. Let me simply say in passing that the volume of our raw products going to the United States was never comparable to the volume of raw products coming from the United States to Canada. These are facts that we should remember. But the amazing thing to me is that after all the statements made by the great Conservative party now represented by gentlemen on the government benches, and after all the criticism that was offered of the attitude of the Liberal party with regard to our trade with the United States, after all the statements made by Mr. Fielding and the men in the government of that day who supported him, and after the statements made by my right hon. leader when he was at the head of the government—the amazing thing, I say, is that these statements are now accepted in toto by the leader of the Conservative party in this house, and, of course, he speaks for the whole party Why, if I were to refer to some of the statements made in earlier days by the right hon. leader of the government, who amazed me by his statement to the house to-day that the only objection he took in 1911 to reciprocity was that there was no time limit placed upon the agreement—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that, pardon me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry if I did not catch his remark correctly.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave two reasons why I opposed it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The right hon. gentleman gave many more in 1911.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave six, as a matter of fact.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, and twice six.

Mr. BENNETT: No, six; I remember them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My right hon. friend must remember that I was one of those who sat and listened to him. He made a speech in London on that occasion. He was brought to eastern Canada and all over Canada as the champion boy orator. He was opposing reciprocity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct; I did not speak in London in 1911. The hon. gentleman is confusing 1905 with 1911.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did not my hon. friend tour Canada in 1911 in the interests of the Conservative party? He may not have spoken in London, but he spoke in various other places, often in the province of Alberta, I am bound to say, and he was successful. I am always willing to admit that my right hon. friend had some measure of success. He is a forceful speaker, and I hope that he will be just as forceful in his championship of the policy that he enunciated to-day. If he is I shall be with him, as I was on a former occasion. It was extremely pleasing to me this afternoon to be in the position where I could support the right hon. gentleman and his party in something which I think and have always thought is of vital importance to Canada.

May I say that I was one of those who supported, with all the power I possessed, the reciprocity offer of Mr. Fielding to the United States, believing that despite all the obstacles that had been put in the way of it, the United States was, and still continues to be, the best market for Canadian products. What would it mean if we could remove some of those obstacles? One hon. gentleman has spoken of fish, and another hon. gentleman has spoken of cattle. The removal of those obstacles would mean more than we can estimate. I have not time to go into details, but I know what it would mean to the cattle industry of western Canada. We are trying to sell our cattle to Russia because we have to sell them somewhere, and we cannot sell them in Canada. That is perhaps also one of the vital reasons for our interest in a departure from what is known as sound money, so that we may sell some of our cattle to Great Britain, as well as other agricultural products. But I emphasize once more that the country to the south, our closest market, is the market we ought to cultivate.

I am surprised for another reason. In the fall session of last year, and only in the fall session, an agreement with Great Britain was placed before parliament which members on this side of the house opposed to some extent. We did not oppose the principle contained in the agreement, because it was directly in line with our policy, but we did oppose the five year guarantee to continue the duties imposed upon certain commodities to be exchanged between Great Britain and Canada. I wonder if hon. members have looked at the list of commodities mentioned in that agreement? When the Prime Minister was speaking this afternoon I went through it, and I could not help but wonder what would happen if to-morrow President-elect Roosevelt should take office and send an invitation to the Canadian government to consider a reciprocal trade agreement. What position would the Prime Minister take? What would he do, in the light of the agreement with Great Britain to which the government has committed Canada for a period of five years? What would he offer not only to the United States but to any other foreign country wishing to enter into an agreement with us? I have all kinds of sympathy for the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) who has spent a considerable time in Paris. I did not know how he could come back with any kind of agreement with France. Why? He would experience difficulty because of the cast iron provisions this government saw fit to enter into in the trade agreement with Great Britain. They did not need to do it, but they did it with their eyes open, and to-day we have the spectacle of the leader of the government pledging the Conservative party to a reciprocal agreement with the United States which, he says, has been their policy since 1854. But he forgets—we do not forget—that hon. members who preceded him and sat on that side of the house went about the length and breadth of the country, and with every ounce of energy they possessed condemned the 1911 agreement. This afternoon, however, the leader of the government said the agreement was not so bad after all.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not; he said exactly the opposite.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They did not have a time limit, he says. The Prime Minister lays a great deal of emphasis on agreements which must have a certain length of time attached to them. If my right hon. friend will turn to his remarks of this afternoon, if he does not change them before revised Hansard is printed—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman should withdraw that statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will withdraw it; I will withdraw anything that does not seem to do credit to my right hon. friend. But I want to say this to him—and I am perfectly right in saying it—that that was my understanding. I sat here and listened very carefully to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman this afternoon. If my right hon. friend says he did not make that statement, I withdraw my remark.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not seen the report of my speech, so whatever Hansard says is correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my right hon. friend says he did not say it, I withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: What statement?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That the only objection you took was the time limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly I did not say that at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, my hearing certainly must be bad.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not your hearing at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But as far as the right hon. gentleman is concerned I find I am on the same platform—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not on these—

Mr. BENNETT: Not on reciprocity, either.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, that is what I fear; that is what I am coming to.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, all the questions you like.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did we not put into effect from 1917 to 1921 every article of the 1911 reciprocity agreement, and were they not annulled by the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well that is a fact.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to know of one particular instance where the Conservative party made any offer to implement the agreement of 1911. If the hon. member is sincere in that suggestion, I should like to ask this question: Why did he oppose it in 1911, and why did his friends oppose it?

Mr. McGIBBON: Every one of them was put into effect from 1917 to 1921.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Some comments are founded on facts, and others on jokes. All I have to say is that if the right hon. gentleman who leads the government is sincere in the protestations he made to-day, if he really means now to subscribe to the resolution moved by Mr. Fielding in 1923, I am here to tell him there are many of his followers sitting in this chamber to-night who did not subscribe to it, and who have not changed their position from that time to this. If hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their views, then it is a complete right about face so far as the Conservative party is concerned.

All I have to say is that the more publicity that is given to the resolution before us, the better for Canada. If it will increase trade—because heaven knows there is nothing we need worse—certainly it would be of great benefit to the country. If ever I had any doubts about the position I have taken concerning trade matters, certainly they have been dispelled within the last year and a half or two years. Hon. gentlemen opposite have demonstrated beyond peradventure that by their trade policies they can ruin the country quicker than by any other course they could pursue. If hon. members do not believe what I say, I ask them to look at the trade returns. Where are we going? Where are we to get the revenue with which to pay our indebtedness? Where are we to get the money to meet the ordinary running expenses of the country? I have much sympathy for my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). No man in the government is entitled to more sympathy than he, because one of these days he will have to make a rather sorry statement to the House of Commons concerning the revenue of the country.

The quicker we revive trade and the quicker this suicidal policy of the Conservative party is changed to one of reciprocity with people who are willing to trade with us, the better it will be for Canada. I could not sit still in my seat and observe without comment the sudden change of front shown by the government. We were to have an announcement which, we understood, would startle us, but nothing could startle me more than the statement I heard to-day; nothing could appeal to me more. I expected an entirely different statement.

If we approach the United States showing that we are unwilling, as the party opposite has demonstrated in the past, to give any concessions that will injure Canadian industry—and I mean secondary industries, because the Lord knows we cannot injure the primary industries—if we go with the avowed intention of having extreme protection, I have very little faith in the result of any trade arrangements we may try to make with the United States. In my view any trade agreement on that basis with Great Britain can be of very little benefit, and to prove my contention I would ask any hon. member to look at the current trade statistics. The figures will indicate that the improvement in trade with Great Britain is so small it is hardly noticeable. If the government approached the United States with a fixed policy of that kind in mind, the possibilities of reciprocity would be very small indeed. But, I believe in spite of everything that can be done, in spite of the high tariff forces in the United States, in spite of the high tariff forces in Canada, our trade with the United States will increase. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite, after three years of trial of a high tariff policy, will be willing to listen to reason. Perhaps they will be willing to offer something worth while towards the improvement of trade conditions.

An hon. MEMBER: What a hope!

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps it is a faint hope; but after the speech of this afternoon I am prepared to hope for anything. I believe a better day has dawned. When we have a frank admission, as we had this afternoon, a right about face, a change of heart, when the worst that could be said was that we exported some few logs for the making of matches—I never heard of manufactured matches getting into Canada, but perhaps they will under a reciprocal agreement—then I am convinced that the dawn of a better day is here.

I support this resolution most heartily. I hope it will carry by a large majority, so that to-morrow it will be known in Washington that the Canadian parliament is favourable to a reciprocal agreement with the United States. My hon. friend stated this afternoon that until the Dunning budget came down in 1930 there was no change. My view is that we should trade with any who will trade with us on a fair and equitable basis, and I believe that is the policy that will prevail. On the other hand we will never build up trade with other nations if we put up impossible barriers, which is exactly what hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have been doing. But to-day they say they are going to right about face; in that respect I for one will lend them all the support I can. But knowing them as I have in the past, having listened to their declarations on the public platform, I am going to take their present statements with some grains of salt. I want them to show me that they mean what they say. For heaven's sake do not try any more agreements such as have just been enacted with the mother country, because it is no good. And do not tie yourselves up for five years so that you cannot trade with anyone else without referring the matter to the country with which you have the cast iron agreement.

An hon. MEMBER: What about your twelve years?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What about a lot of things? All I can say is that I hope and trust that you really mean what you said this afternoon, because if so there is some hope for Canadian trade.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it would appear to me as an ordinary onlooker that there must be considerable disappointment in the ranks of the hon. gentleman's friends. It is quite evident that all the speeches that we have been listening to this afternoon from that side were prepared with the expectation that the government was going to oppose the resolution of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). They show a persistent attempt to create the impression in the country that this government is opposed to reciprocal relations with the United States. Now I come from the province of Nova Scotia, the proudest province of the dominion, where there is a tradition in favour of reciprocity with the United States. It was said by Joseph Howe many years ago that if you were to throw a board on the waters of Nova Scotia it would float to Boston. In those early days before confederation there was a great trade between the maritime provinces, particularly Nova Scotia and Boston. Fishing vessels from Boston, Provincetown and the other New England ports always came to Nova Scotia—including the little village in which I was born—and fitted out, shipped men and materials, and came back in the fall and discharged their crews. Many of the crews went to Boston during the winter months, and shortly afterwards their families followed them, with the result that to-day in the New England states there are more people of Nova Scotia parentage than there are in the province of Nova Scotia itself.

From the discussion this afternoon it is quite clear that both parties are in favour of this resolution. Let me say right here that I am not in favour of it in the terms in which it is expressed. There is no doubt that many years ago Nova Scotia enjoyed great prosperity owing to the freedom of trade that existed between it and the New England states. But things are different to-day. We sometimes make the mistake of thinking that if we could return to the days of our fathers and grandfathers we would enjoy the same prosperity that they did. Such is not the case. I doubt whether the fishermen of Gloucester and Provincetown and Boston are much more prosperous to-day than our own fishermen are. It must be remembered that the fish business has gone down all over the world. It has certainly gone down in the maritime provinces. During the past few years we have tried to build up a fresh fish business with upper Canada. For this purpose trawlers have been licensed; out on the banks they keep in daily touch by wireless with the merchants, thus ensuring a continuous supply of fresh fish from Nova Scotia to the Toronto and Montreal markets. It is urged that they have been the death of the shore fisherman—with that I will deal later—but just let me ask you what would happen to that fresh fish business if the bars were let down and fresh fish landed from vessels sailing out of Gloucester and Boston appeared in the Montreal and Toronto markets. It is true that the shore fishermen throughout the lower provinces have suffered; I do not think that anywhere in the country there is greater destitution and suffering than among the fishermen of the maritime provinces. I am in agreement with my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) on one point, and that is the great desirability of the modus vivendi. I believe that American fishing vessels should be permitted to enter maritime province ports to tranship their fish, purchase their supplies, make all necessary repairs and ship men if necessary. That would give our shore fishermen an opportunity to make a living which they do not now enjoy. I could tell you stories of shore fishermen who pursue that hardy calling, going out to sea in the early morning, returning with their boatload of fish, and being obliged either to sell them for one cent apiece or to throw them away. With proper cold storage facilities the fishermen could put those fish away for bait and so get a reasonable living. In this connection I might mention that we have storage facilities at North Sydney and Sydney Harbour, but these have been practically destroyed so that they are of absolutely no use to the fishermen. With such facilities as these afforded, however, the town of North Sydney would prosper.

There is one point to which I should direct the attention of my hon. friend. Among other things his resolution includes the natural products of Canada, the products of the sea, the farm, the forests and the mines. I wonder how long the coal mines of Nova Scotia would last if we had reciprocity with regard to coal. Their destruction would be very sudden and very complete. I venture to believe that this great industry in Nova Scotia, upon which one-fifth of our population depends for a livelihood, would disappear in a few years. Therefore I am obliged to take issue with my hon. friend on that point, though as far as fish go I am at one with him.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to express the views of those who I have the honour of representing in the house—the farmers of Laprairie-Napierville—on this all important question introduced by the resolution of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). The resolution reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

To summarize, this motion requests the renewal of the treaty negotiated by the Liberal party, in 1911, in order to promote wider trade relations with our neighbours to the south. I need not mention that the Quebec farmers, especially those located on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, close to the United States frontier are, and have always been, in favour of a reciprocal trade treaty. Indeed the people of Laprairie-Napierville and those of the counties bordering on the United States, would greatly benefit from such a treaty. Producers of milk, butter and cream, who are numerous in these counties, under a fair tariff, compared with the one our friends opposite recently enacted, sold at a profit their milk products to the United States. If such an agreement could be concluded between the two countries, there is no doubt that our farmers would find, in the United States, a market which would improve their condition, especially in these times of depression. The same may be said about the farmers who specialize in wheat and hay. A number of western members and all those interested in the live stock trade have sufficiently threshed out this question, I need not, therefore further insist.

[Mr. F. MacDonald.]

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated, this afternoon, that one of the main reasons why he opposed reciprocity, in 1911, was that the treaty could be terminated without notification. I do not see how the right hon. Prime Minister could oppose this resolution for such a trivial reason, because now that he is in power he can amend, as he pleases, this resolution and add a clause stipulating that in case one of the contracting parties wished to end this treaty, a notice should be given.

The right hon. Prime Minister further stated that our two great political parties have had this question before them ever since 1879, and have always favoured a reciprocal treaty with our neighbours to the south; he also added that, as the two parties agreed on this resolution, the mover should, in the interest of the country withdraw his motion, and not insist that a vote be taken. I find it hard to understand why the members opposite would oppose this resolution simply because it might bring on a vote which would divide the house into two adverse camps. I have some notions of logic, yet I cannot quite grasp how the people's representatives, in the house, can possibly be in favour of a measure and when a vote is taken refuse to support it.

May I request the right hon. Prime Minister to explain how it is possible for him to be both for and against this resolution.

He will permit me, however, to remind him of the speeches he made, when he first came out as a candidate in the Dominion election of 1911. We have but to refer to the press despatches of that date to ascertain how strenuously the Calgary candidate opposed the reciprocity treaty with the United States. One of the main arguments invoked to justify his opposition was, that if this measure carried, the empire would be destroyed, the spirit of loyalty existing in Canada would be crushed; he did not wish to trade with the United States, because this would be an act of disloyalty. And how many other arguments did he invoke! After being elected, he had the honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and the following are his words on the reciprocal trade treaty:

Mr. Speaker, in that portion of this great Dominion in which I am privileged to reside, a very substantial portion of our population has come from the great republic to the south, and one of the strongest reasons I had for opposing the reciprocity agreement was that it threw into the melting pot for solution a question that involved a problem in patriotism. When we remember that so large a portion of our population came from that great republic, where they inherited traditions that were at least not favourable to monarchial institutions; when they learned through the medium of the American press, that, however much their former political parties differed with each other, they showed unanimity in favour of these proposals, and when they found American public men preaching a doctrine that indicated that the consequences of this agreement would be the absorption of western Canada at least by the great republic, and at all events rendering impossible for all time the commercial and organic union of those overseas dominions and the motherland which comprise the British Empire, it was little wonder that these people allied themselves with those who were in favour of the reciprocity pact.

Having read the speeches delivered by the then representative for Calgary—now the Prime Minister of Canada—on the hustings and in the house, we are rather agreeably surprised to note what are his views on this question to-day. The right hon. Prime Minister has greatly changed his views since those days when Laurier compared his speeches to the turbulent waters of the Bow river. Evidently he shows that he is intelligent, which no one has ever doubted. I am a Liberal, however, I am not so narrowminded as to think that nothing good can come from outside the Liberal ranks. No one in this house will recognize more readily than I do that the Prime Minister is steering in the direction of liberalism. Although I do not expect that he will join our ranks, I can assert that he is not one of those mentioned by Lady Asquith who stated that only the gods and fools do not alter their views. I can assert here, and pay him the compliment, that he is neither in one nor the other of these classes, notwithstanding the fact that a large number of his one-sided followers have so exalted him that they sometimes have looked upon him as a god. The right hon. Prime Minister has this afternoon brought them to earth by informing them that he has altered his views since 1911, that he is neither a god nor a fool.

As to us, sir, we have no need of changing our views on the subject, and no one will ever blame us for it, especially when we witness members opposite view this question of trade reciprocity in the same light as we do. I am doubly in favour of this resolution because I note by the change taking place opposite towards our own views, that we are still more assured of being in the right path.

I therefore trust that this resolution will receive the unanimous support of the house. Let hon. gentlemen opposite not fall into the error of resorting to such tactics as contending that they approve of the resolution, but not in its present form. Let them not blunder by opposing this resolution; let them prove their patriotism by voting unanimously in favour of this resolution, so that the government in power across the border be made aware, once for all, that the reciprocal trade treaty is not a dead letter in our statutes, but is always and more than ever a living issue, and, that the moment the United States will show their willingness to act, they will find on this side of the frontier people who will welcome their proposals and say: We are ready to negotiate a reciprocal treaty with you on products of the land and sea, and also those that can be exchanged to the mutual benefit of the two parties interested.

I shall close my remarks, sir, by stating that everything prompts me to hope that the right hon. Prime Minister, as well as his followers, will continue to show that they are intelligent, farsighted and wise by unanimously voting for this resolution.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé) (Translation): May I, sir, add a few words in support of the resolution of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I must congratulate him on the splendid speech he made on the subject of the maritime fisheries.

I closely followed the reply of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). Briefly, it means that we cannot have a reciprocal treaty with the United States because, first, our neighbours to the south would have to lower their tariff, and our government is unable to force them to take such a step. My reply to the right hon. Prime Minister is that it was himself who, last summer, was responsible for the agreements concluded with the British commonwealth. Since he displayed his great ability in bringing about a trade treaty with the British commonwealth, he might do the same to obtain from the United States government what the Liberal party has often attempted: to negotiate a reciprocal treaty.

In 1911, the Liberal party did negotiate such a treaty with the United States, but unfortunately, this famous treaty was rejected by the people. Had the Liberal party been maintained in power, in 1911, I am convinced that Canada would have been better served. Moreover, the great majority of the people admit, today, that had the treaty been ratified Canada would have made great strides along the path of prosperity.

Our country had a few years of such prosperity from 1921 to 1929, however, after the Tories returned to power business declined and prosperity gave way to depression.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough did not wish to introduce politics into this question, this afternoon. He simply requested the government to use its good offices in order to negotiate a reciprocal treaty, especially in connection with the fisheries of Canada. I shall support this motion and I trust the right hon. Prime Minister will enter into negotiations with the United States in order to obtain reciprocal arrangements in tariff matters. The United States will certainly not lower their duty on fish unless we are ready to grant them reciprocal advantages. May I point out to the house that our fish industry has been in a deplorable state for a number of years. Not only are we unable to export our fish, but when we wish to import the necessary fishing equipment, such as nets, marine motors, etc., we have to contend with too high a tariff. If we are willing to lower our tariff on marine motors and all fishing equipment entering Canada from the United States, I think the latter will grant us, in return, concessions on our fish.

The only way to bring back prosperity is to conclude a trade treaty with the United States. As long as the Conservative government maintains its 1930 tariff, prosperity will not return to us. I therefore beseech the right hon. Prime Minister not to reject the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), but to give it his serious consideration, and therefore, I trust the house will unanimously vote in favour of this resolution.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Megantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to state that I entirely approve of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), requesting the government to negotiate a new trade treaty with the United States so as to permit on the one hand, our products of the farm, mines, forests and sea to enter their country free of duty, and, on the other hand, admit into this country, also free of duty, the products we require. The government must act to relieve the present situation of the farming classes and thus avoid a general bankruptcy.

Because of the present crisis, we should set aside party differences and endeavour to save the situation. I therefore think that the best way to do so, would be to negotiate a reciprocal trade treaty with the United States. The people of Canada would be very grateful to the government if it brought back to the farming classes the prosperity they enjoyed under the liberal regime. The slightest improvement in our trade relations with our neighbours would mean more to us than all the agreements signed at the Imperial Economic Conference of 1932.

I believe that some of the members of this administration will be forced, by circumstances, to cast their vote in favour of this motion.

I shall quote what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) stated in the house, at page 552 of Hansard, on October 25, 1932:

> I would also draw the attention of the leader of the opposition to this fact, that the strongest argument brought against the reciprocity pact of 1911 was that it was to continue for only one year. That is what defeated that pact, and we know what happened to the Liberal party on that occasion.

The hon. gentleman stated that if, in 1911, reciprocity was defeated, it was because we requested a treaty for one year only. Now that the Conservatives are in power, they can negotiate such a treaty for a much longer period, and, with the President elect of the United States, they will have a better chance of negotiating a treaty than with the present incumbent who is highly protectionist, and, owing to this fact the United States is passing through a crisis of greater severity than that of any crisis experienced for many years past, and which was the starting point of the present world wide crisis.

When the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi introduced his resolution, on February 8, 1933, requesting that the committee on agriculture be divided into two sections—a motion which I endorsed at Plessisville—he stated, page 1919 of Hansard:

> I would like to remind the house that all kinds of farm produce, with the exception of beef, are selling for higher prices in Canada to-day than anywhere else in the world.

The hon. member forgot to mention maple sugar, which is also a product of the farm, and, as I have the privilege of having in my county the largest maple sugar factory in Canada, I am glad to be able to give the house some statistics as to the profits our farmers would have made, and would still be making, if our maple sugar entered into the United States free of duty. The factory is known under the name of "Producteurs de Sucre d'érable de Quebec." This cooperative company sent me the following figures of their maple sugar exports to the United States:

| | Pounds | Value |
|---|---|---|
| 1929.. .. .. .. .. | 13,036,058 | $2,473,620 |
| 1930.. .. .. .. .. | 5,959,638 | 1,229,747 |
| 1931.. .. .. .. .. | 2,572,578 | 483,658 |
| 1932.. .. .. .. .. | 3,363,180 | 600,067 |

In 1929, the duty on maple sugar entering the United States was 2 cents per pound, in 1930, 4 cents per pound, in 1931 and 1932, 8 cents per pound. The only market we have for our maple sugar is the United States. You will readily see, sir, what a great advantage it would be for the farming classes, who are to-day in very poor circumstances, if they could obtain some concession on the duty on maple sugar.

The United States, sir, is the only natural market for the products of Quebec, and prosperity will not return unless we can conclude a reciprocal treaty with our neighbours to the south.

As stated, there lies the only market for our maple sugar products and we are obliged to pay a duty of 8 cents per pound while the price obtained here by the farmer varies between 3½ to 4 cents per lb. The same may be said of numerous other farm products, such as butter, milk and especially young live stock. Not being able to ship the latter to Great Britain, our farmers practically give them away. The price of calves, sheep, etc., has fallen by more than 50 per cent.

By negotiating a trade treaty with the United States, the farming classes would immediately realize profits on their products. Such a treaty is the only way opened to the government in order to end the depression existing on the farm.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this resolution. As I understand it, the resolution suggests the reopening of negotiations with the United States to arrange if possible a reciprocal pact for the exchange of the natural products of this country for certain products of the United States. It is an effort to procure wider markets, and our trade returns clearly show that wider markets are badly needed. Canadian imports in 1929 were valued at $1,265,000,000; in 1932 they had dwindled to $578,000,000. Taking the value in 1926 as the basis, the volume would be represented by $1,403,000,000 and $808,000,000 respectively. In 1929 the exports of Canada were valued at $1,363,000,000 and in 1932 they had dwindled to $576,000,000. We find that the volume of exports of agricultural products has diminished from 129 to 72.4. Surely it is evident that wider markets are needed for our Canadian products.

A few weeks ago the news went abroad that there was a possibility of selling some of our Canadian cattle in Russia. That news reached the ears of men in this country who are vitally interested in the cattle business, and many of us who represent western constituencies have received numerous letters from men who are anxious to sell their cattle. Of course, it was realized that this government could not guarantee profits or accept Russian bonds, but it was felt that there was a market for cattle in Russia and they hoped that some way would be found by which some of our surplus stock could reach that market. Nothing more clearly indicates the desire of the primary producers of Canada to find a market; nothing more clearly indicates the need of such a market, and these people are looking to the members of this parliament for some solution of their problem.

Someone has said that we should not go to Mr. Roosevelt with our hat in our hand to beg for an agreement. I think the Canadian people will agree with that, but they realize also that a salesman does not wait in his office for orders to come in. Surely Canadians are not bankrupt as far as salesmanship is concerned. Surely, when they have a great surplus to dispose of, they will not hesitate to try to find a market for it. This resolution deals particularly with primary products, and we all know that the prosperity of Canada as a whole depends upon the prosperity of those in the primary industries. We know that the curve marking the general business follows the curve which indicates the activity in the agricultural industry. That being so, it is of the greatest importance to the people of Canada as a whole that they should have a prosperous agricultural industry. It is true that in making agreements we cannot expect to get all the advantages. Some of our secondary industries may have to be sacrificed. But if that is true, is it not also true that those industries are failing in any case? Is it not so that as the days go by and we make little progress in solving our problems, industry after industry in Canada is failing to balance its budget, as it were—failing even to earn the interest on its bonds? So that the larger considerations must first receive the attention of this house.

The district whence I come was once one of the great ranching districts of Canada. Later the ranches were broken up as settlers came in, and to-day those great areas are vacant. If there was a market for our cattle those areas would be used for ranching purposes, but the few ranchers who have thus far survived are finding it extremely difficult to carry on, and if present conditions continue they, too, will have to give up. As an illustration I might point out that one junction which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) knows well, the junction of Dunmore, once shipped thousands and thousands of cattle, and to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is asking permission to have that station closed. Nothing more clearly indicates the fate which has befallen the ranching industry in that country. Their great market was in the United States, but changes in the American tariffs have shut off that great market.

I wish to put on record a few figures which will indicate what the various American tariffs have done to this great Canadian industry. From October 3, 1913, to May 27, 1921, the United States under the Underwood tariff allowed our cattle to enter that country free, and what do we find? We find that in the year 1920, 420,891 cattle entered the United States. Then on May 27, 1921, the United States imposed an emergency tariff of thirty per cent against our cattle, which tariff remained in force until September 21, 1922. At once we see that, instead of shipping some 400,000 cattle, to the United States our exports dropped to 224,000. Then on September 21, 1922, the Fordney-McCumber tariff came into force and at once there was a further drop in our exports, so that in 1925 we shipped only 123,438 head to the United States. The last blow came on June 18, 1930, when the Hawley-Smoot tariff came into operation. That tariff levies a duty on cattle, of less than 700 pounds, of 2½ cents a pound, and of 3 cents a pound on cattle over 700 pounds. In the year ending June 30, 1932, our exports of cattle to the United States dropped to 18,651. Nothing more clearly illustrates the advantage of that great market than the fact that we have suffered so much when it has been closed to us.

Of course I realize that it is not within the power of the members of this house to open that American market. On the other hand the responsibility of governments for the welfare of its citizens has been fully established, and an effort might and should be made to get us into that market at least under more favourable terms than we can enter it at present. Years have passed since any active effort has been made in that direction, but I believe that, especially at this time, if a real effort was made in a businesslike way it would bring some measure of hope and courage to men who are at the present time most discouraged.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I closely followed the remarks made this afternoon by the right hon. Prime Minister, on the resolution before the house.

To my mind this resolution purports to lay down the principle that a reciprocal trade treaty between the United States and Canada is desirable. We have witnessed a most amazing change in the views of the leader of the government. However, in order to explain his present attitude, he referred to Canadian history as far back as 1865, the year our reciprocal treaty with the United States was abrogated. After this event the Conservative party which held power in 1879, adopted, it seems, a measure endorsing the policy of reciprocity with the United States. This measure purported to allow free entry into Canada of a large number of products from the United States the moment the latter country reciprocated those advantages. Again this policy was endorsed by the Conservative party in 1888. In 1890 and 1894, however, it was slightly modified, that is, the reciprocity policy was extended to all other countries which offered us the same privileges.

This is somewhat the stand taken by the Conservative party, judging from the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister, as regards our trade relations with the United States. He also referred to the attitude of the Liberal party from 1897 to 1911, on trade matters. There were but slight changes, it seems, in the acts of 1897, 1904, 1910 and even 1911, and, according to the Prime Minister we are led to believe the two parties, in connection with external trade, advocated the same policy.

May I, sir, endeavour to prove that with the same policies we do not beget the same results. In 1911, the Liberal party, after recognizing the principle of reciprocity, adopted a measure allowing the free entry into Canada of numerous products, while the United States adopted a similar measure. Then the election of 1911 took place. Although advocating the same policy, as it seems, the Conservative party endeavoured to defeat this reciprocal trade treaty, or rather defeat the two measures, and their battle horse was: "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." In 1911, the Conservative party, therefore, denied—and we blamed them for it, at the time—the policy advocated by Cartier and Macdonald, in 1879, 1888, and the other years when measures tending to the same results were enacted. The Conservative party succeeded in convincing the majority of the people that they were right, and the people voted down the reciprocity treaty with the United States after winning the election, notwithstanding the fact that the Democrats were still in power in the United States, no steps were ever taken by the Conservative party to put into force these acts.

In 1923, under the Liberal regime, efforts were made to bring about such reciprocal arrangements but no results followed—I think that the Republican party was then in power. In a few days the United States will have at the helm of affairs the Democratic party which on many scores resembles the Liberal party, especially as regards their tariff policy. Is it the advent to power of this party which has brought about such a change in the Prime Minister's views on trade intercourse with the United States? He has, however, for ever so long, known what was the trend of trade with our neighbours to the south as shown in the statistics, and also that with other nations. He is fully aware that, even with our high tariff protection, our trade with the United States represents half of our total trade with the entire world and the two-thirds of our trade with foreign countries. Our trade with the United States is twice as large as that with the British Empire. He is fully aware that notwithstanding all tariff restrictions and obstacles, it was impossible for us not to trade with United States.

The right hon. Prime Minister referred to our geographical situation. If it is true that this geographical situation lends itself to trade intercourse with the United States is it not much more natural to trade with them than with distant countries.

I doubt very much whether this so long delayed repentance on the part of the Prime Minister can have practical results in connection with our trade with the United States. What has been the Conservative party's tariff policy with our neighbours, since it assumed power, in 1930? They increased the customs duties on two-thirds of our tariff items, contending that the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot tariffs, necessarily obliged us to adopt such a policy. It was laying down the principle that the tariff was to be used as a threat rather than as a means of trading.

We must, however, note with joy this acknowledgment by the Prime Minister, because we, the Liberal party, are convinced that we shall only return to prosperity by increasing our trade with the United States, as well as with the other countries.

When you raise a tariff barrier between Canada and the United States, you hinder trade, whether it be imports or exports. When I examine our trade statistics for 1931, I find that we are making a great blunder in refusing to trade with the United States, notwithstanding their prohibitive tariff, because in 1931, our exports to the nations comprising the British Commonwealth amounted to $292,884,145, and our imports were $204,935,168; while our exports to foreign lands, in those countries which also have a high tariff wall against us, amounted to $506,768,522 and our imports to $701,677,513. This proves that our trade outside the empire is far larger than within the empire.

It took our government two years to negotiate a pact with the British Commonwealth. Why should it not now endeavour to negotiate trade conventions with the other countries? Our agreements with the various nations of the British Commonwealth will always appear as an impediment, however, even then, I think that an honest and sincere effort on the part of our government would produce good results. I fear that, not having the same policy as the Domocrats in tariff matters, our government may encounter some opposition from our neighbours to the south, however the effort will not harm us.

I have but one further argument to set forth, before closing my remarks. The Prime Minister, in a meek and very conciliating mood, requested the sponsor to withdraw his resolution. His party was well disposed to negotiate with the United States. It was better not to bring on any clash between the two parties in the house. In due time, he would take the necessary course to open up trade negotiations with the United States. If the policy submitted to the house is to the advantage of Canada, if the principle of reciprocity is sound, there is no need for the sponsor of this resolution to withdraw it. If it is desired to show a united front before the country, the United States and the other countries, this resolution should be unanimously carried, thus the house would give a proof of its sincerity. I am aware that our friends opposite hailing from Quebec will find it hard to vote for this trade and policy, they who, in 1911, 1917, 1921, 1925, 1926 and 1930, boasted of the contrary throughout Quebec; however, it is never too late to repent. I think that they would rise in the people's esteem by adopting the principle of this resolution.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, We in the maritime provinces, all things being equal, would be quite in favour of the resolution now under consideration. For generations our natural market has been down the Atlantic seaboard in the New England states. We always found a profitable market there, and while that market remained open to us we in the maritime provinces were very prosperous indeed. My idea of the tariff situation to-day is that tariffs throughout the world,—in America, Europe or wherever you may go—are much too high. To my mind they constitute a great restraint upon the trade and commerce between countries.

Hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke this afternoon appear to have tried to convey the impression to the house and the country—and more particularly the country—that the tariffs imposed against us by the United States are of our own making. They would try to have us believe that the tariffs against our goods entering the United States were made in Ottawa. Such, however, is not the case. Those tariffs are made in Washington, and anything that this parliament has been able to do or say has not had the effect of lowering their tariffs. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) spoke about the decline of trade between Canada and the United States. True, trade has declined, but while trade will decrease or increase very quickly according to the prices of the different commodities concerned, a decline in value does not always indicate a decline in volume. That is one point which should not be forgotten. However there has been a very good reason for the decrease in trade in the last two years between Canada and the United States.

After six o'clock I managed to secure some figures concerning a few of the commodities with which I am most concerned, and I should like to place them on Hansard to show what has happened during the last few years. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) spoke about the cattle trade, and made reference to the great trade enjoyed until the year 1921 between the western prairie provinces and the United States. Why should there not have been that trade? Up to 1921 Canadian cattle entered the American market free of duty, and I am of the opinion they should still enter under the same condition; we all believe that. However, in 1930 conditions were different. As the hon. member stated, cattle of 700 pounds or under were subjected to duty of two and a half cents a pounds while on cattle over 700 pounds the duty was three cents per pound. Again, take poultry; in 1921 the United States duty was one cent a pound; in 1930 it was 8 cents a pound. It was intended that the duty should be prohibitive; that is why it was put on. On sheep, which entered the United States free in 1921, you now have to pay $3 per head, almost half the price of the sheep. Oats that in 1921 entered the United States at 6 cents for thirty-two pounds now pay 16 cents —prohibitive again. Wheat, which was free in 1921, now pays 42 cents per bushel. Wheat flour, which was free in 1921, now pays $1.04 a barrel. Pork, something in which we are all interested—in our section of the country vitally so, for it is one of the chief articles of export—in 1921 was free of duty; to-day it pays 3½ cents a pound to enter the American market. Butter in 1921 carried a duty of 2½ cents a pound. I would not complain about that, but imagine a duty on butter in 1930 of 14 cents a pound, almost the price of the article! Cheese in 1920 was 20 per cent ad valorem; now it is 35 per cent. Cream, which was free—and this should interest the farmers of central Canada—now pays 56.6 cents per gallon, a duty intended to be prohibitive and nothing else. Potatoes, in which we, in our province, are vitally interested, were free in 1921; now we have to pay a duty of 75 cents per hundred pounds to get them into the United States. Turnips, another article that we export largely, were 15 per cent then; they are now 25 cents per hundred pounds. So it is easy to see why the trade between Canada and the United States should decline, under the duties I have mentioned, duties which were clearly meant to be prohibitive.

But just as the exports from Canada to the United States have declined, we are pleased to be able to inform this house that owing to the beneficial arrangements made at the Imperial economic conference held here last August, our exports to British countries are on the increase. During the last six months of 1932 our exports to the United Kingdom totalled $116,487,568 as against $102,433,809 for the first half of the year, an increase of $13,953,759. That is where our exports are going now. We have found the United States market very fickle, and I believe that is what the Canadian exporter is afraid of. We want markets upon which we can rely over a long period of time. It is no light matter for an exporter to establish connections in a certain country and build up the shipping facilities necessary to move his product, and then have his exports to that country ruthlessly shut off overnight, as was done by the United States in 1930.

The same is true of Canada's exports to other British dominions. During the last six months of 1932 our exports to empire countries totalled $137,209,418 compared with $126,483,-054 for the same period of 1931, a gain in the year of $10,726,364.

Now my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. MacLean) made some statements this afternoon with reference to the export of potatoes. He told us, I think, that somewhere around 4,000,000 bushels of potatoes had been exported, largely from the maritime provinces, even in spite of the 75 cents per hundred pounds duty. My hon. friend was a little in error there, because in the year he refers to the duty on potatoes was only 50 cents a bushel. I remember quite well the fight that took place with reference to this duty on potatoes in 1929. I happened at that time to be a director of the Prince Edward Island Potato Growers' Association. Foolishly, I now think, we spent a considerable sum of money in conjunction with men and firms in the southern states who were buying our potatoes; we had men at Washington looking after our interests; we did all that men could do to prevent the United States from raising that duty on our potatoes from 50 cents to 75 cents. Our effort was absolutely in vain. The state of Maine and other potato growing localities of New England simply brushed us aside; they had their way, and the duty was put at 75 cents per one hundred pounds.

Now we are just as anxious to trade with the United States as they are to trade with us. Figures have been given here to-day about the great volume of export business that we had with the United States up to a year or two ago. That business now is to a certain extent shut off. I imagine that the American people will miss that business, and they will now be more ready to listen to us regarding a reduction in tariffs than they would have been had we allowed that business to flow freely over our borders. I think we have given them a little check-up and taught them a lesson, and I believe that with the new government to be inaugurated in Washington, representing the Democratic party, who have always appeared to be a lower tariff party, we shall soon be able to arrange some nice little bargains with them in reference to the interchange of goods, especially products of the farm, the sea, and the forest.

A good deal has been said here to-day about that famous 1911 reciprocity election. I remember it very well. I took a considerable part in it in support of the candidates who were contesting the constituency I now have the honour to represent. The result of that election was no snap verdict. I do not remember any question that was more clearly and fully put to the Canadian electors, and more fully explained to them than was that reciprocity pact during the campaign of 1911. I imagine it was some time in late March or early April that Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance at the time, came back from Washington with that agreement. It was announced here in the House of Commons, it was published in the Canadian press; from one end of this country to the other, speakers on both sides of politics went out and fully explained the matter to the electors. And you must take this further fact into consideration, that for fifteen long years the Conservative party had been in hopeless opposition. I say "hopeless" because some of the Conservatives we tried to persuade to cling to the old Tory banner were becoming discouraged, and we were almost discouraged ourselves. I do not see how the defeat of the reciprocity pact of 1911 ever can be blamed on the Conservative party. It is quite true that Conservative politicians and candidates did their best to explain to the Canadian people that it would not be good for them to enter into that agreement, but it is equally true that my hon. friend the late Minister of Justice and his colleagues went the length and breadth of this country in support of that proposal, using great eloquence and taking full advantage of the fact that at their head they had a loved leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who until that day never had tasted defeat. That is quite an asset to any party. Those were the conditions, and if there is any fault to be found with the verdict that was rendered on that occasion I do not see that the blame should rest with the Conservative party. The old Tories voted as they always had voted, so there must have been a lot of Liberals who turned over and voted against the reciprocity pact. Therefore the credit or discredit, depending on how you look at it, for the defeat of that pact belongs to the Liberal voters.

I do not intend to take up much more of the time of the house on this question. I was a little surprised this afternoon to hear my hon. friend from Prince mention butter; I thought that was the one question upon which he would not have touched. My hon. friend mentioned the live lobster industry of Prince Edward Island; he spoke of it in such a tone of voice that one would almost think there was some great obstacle in the way of shipping those lobsters to the United States. My hon. friend knows very well that live lobsters enter the United States free of duty, so there is no reason why we should not do a good, profitable business in that line. My hon. friend, however, bemoaned the fact that during the present year we have imported some 350,000 pounds of New Zealand butter. Why, Mr. Speaker, that would not butter very many slices of bread. Last year we manufactured within our own borders some 300,000,000 pounds of butter, almost all of which was consumed in Canada, so it will be seen that 350,000 pounds would not be a drop in the bucket. It is quite true that the price of butter was low last summer; I regret that fact as much as anyone could regret it because that is the way I make my living. But just think what would have happened if hon. gentlemen opposite had been in power and that famous New Zealand agreement had been in force, under which from 30,000,000 to 54,000,000 pounds of butter annually was allowed into Canada to flood our market.

I have no quarrel with the resolution now before the house. I confess quite freely and frankly that the people of the maritime provinces, and I believe the people of the dominion generally, are anxious indeed to trade with the United States. That is quite natural, because they are our nearest neighbours, but there is no use in my trying to sell a horse to my neighbour if he does not want to buy it. Before I can do business I must look for someone who needs a horse and is able to buy it. I would be the last man on earth to accuse my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) of doing anything in an underhand way; I know he would not do that, but I have an idea that hon. gentlemen opposite have taken into consideration the fact that the Prime Minister so ably piloted Canada through the Ottawa conference and arrived at trade agreements which within the next three or four years cannot help but make agriculture in this country prosperous; I am afraid they feared that the right hon. gentleman might do the same thing again and arrive at a beneficial agreement with the United States. To my mind this resolution is advanced at this time more or less to forestall any action of that kind on the part of the Prime Minister. If that be the object of the resolution I should feel like voting against it, but if it was advanced in an honest desire to secure a trade agreement between Canada and the United States I should be very happy to support it.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this resolution reads:

> ...it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America...

[Mr. Myers.]

I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that as far as products of the farm are concerned I am absolutely against any reciprocal arrangement with the United States. If we had reciprocity with the United States to-day we would get five cents a pound less for our butter and seven cents a dozen less for our eggs. Do hon. gentlemen opposite understand that? To-day Canadian farm produce commands the highest prices paid anywhere on earth. That does not include beef, but I would tell western members that beef is going to bring a better price; we have concluded a trade arrangement with Great Britain which eventually will provide a good market for our beef.

With regard to fish, lumber and cattle, if some arrangement could be made by which these commodities could be admitted to the United States I would be very much in favour of it, but certainly such an arrangement would hurt us if it included the products of the farm, and I shall have to vote against the resolution for that reason. Since last August, when for the first time in a good many years Canadian farm produce commanded better prices than were paid in the United States, I have expected advances to be made with regard to reciprocity, but I did not expect those advances to come from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I thought they would come from the United States. This takes me back a great many years. I am older than most members of this house, and I live within striking distance of the American line, so I know how our people have been treated. The treaty we had with the United States was abrogated in 1865 and for several years, until 1878 or 1879, the farmers of Canada took 10 cents a pound for their butter, 5 cents for eggs and 5 cents for cheese, while the Americans were laughing at us. Their attitude was, "If you want to participate in the advantages of our markets, join us". I know what I am talking about.

In 1879 we brought down a national policy. At that time we did no manufacturing in Canada but depended upon foreign markets, principally the United States and England, for manufactured goods. We brought down a tariff, and I want to say right here that there are only two industries that have been uninterruptedly well protected since 1879, namely, tobacco and rubber. Where are those industries to-day? They are both flourishing, and I contend that if all our industries had had good, sane, reasonable and continuous protection they would also be flourishing to-day.

I have been amused as well as perplexed by the logic of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) who is a free trader. I have heard him on two or three occasions in this house, the last time just before adjournment, extolling the healthy and enviable position of the rubber industry in Canada. I wonder what that hon. gentleman thinks the healthy and enviable position of the rubber industry is due to. Is it due to free trade? Well, they have had a steady 35 per cent protection since 1879. From 1879 until 1885 or 1886 I could save my return fare on the railway going twenty miles to Richford, Vermont, in buying two pairs of rubbers. We began to establish rubber factories, commencing with one in the county adjoining me, the county of Granby. We built the Miner factory, the Granby, the Dominion, the Hamilton, the Gutta Percha, the Goderich, the Goodyear, Jacques Cartier, and other rubber concerns, and to-day all these rubber companies are competing. There is clean, healthy internal competition and we are keeping the money in Canada. What is the result? To-day you can buy better rubbers made in Canada as cheaply as in the United States. Furthermore, we export more rubber goods per head of population than any country on earth, and that condition in the rubber industry is due to the fact that that industry has had sane, continuous protection.

I contend that if you are going to have protection you must have a tariff that protects; a wish-washy halfway measure, half protection and half free trade, does not amount to anything. To-day, if someone suggested raising the tariff on rubber to 50, 75 or 100 per cent, there would be a terrible howl in this house. But what difference would it make to the price of rubber? Not a cent. If you took the duty right off it would not make the difference of a cent, but that 35 per cent protection is a safeguard. It is no longer protection but a safeguard; that is all. Had all our other industries received that protection they would be in the same position, so that the protection they receive would be no longer protection but a safeguard.

I will not detain the house longer. I simply want to state and state most emphatically that the eastern dairy farmer in Canada cannot be in favour of this resolution. If butter, cheese, eggs and the products of the farm come under a reciprocal arrangement, so far as trade with the United States is concerned, it will be disastrous to us, and for that reason I shall have to vote against the resolution.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I listened with much interest this afternoon to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his remarks upon this resolution. He gave us an exhaustive review of the various negotiations between this country and the United States with respect to reciprocity, going back to a time prior to confederation and carrying his review up until the year 1930. Outstanding in that review were at least two significant features. One feature was that the Liberal attitude in this parliament had always been favourable to a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, if such could be obtained on terms mutually advantageous. I noticed that in speaking the Prime Minister enlarged the Liberal attitude somewhat and termed it the attitude of this parliament. Now, I regret to say that a review of the debates of this parliament would not disclose any such acquiescence by hon. gentlemen opposite in the Liberal point of view. It is something new to have it said by the leader of the Conservative party that the attitude of this parliament has been consistently one of desiring a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. That is one feature which would indicate that my right hon. friend, if he believes what he says at this moment, has experienced a change alike of heart and of mind as a consequence of the changed conditions that have come about of recent years. I notice that the right hon. gentleman has just come into the chamber. May I repeat to him what I have just said. I was saying that, in reviewing the situation this afternoon, he left the impression that the general view which this parliament had taken was one favourable to reciprocity—

Mr. BENNETT: In natural products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to have him give me exact terms, because I had not so understood the position of the Conservative party up to the present time. As I recollect the discussions in this house, the Conservative party has from time to time strongly opposed a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States—

Mr. BENNETT: Not in natural products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in natural products, and has given at different times various reasons for such opposition. However, if to-night we are agreed that hon. gentlemen opposite as well as those on this side of the house favour a reciprocal agreement in natural products, then I say that the sooner we seek to bring about such an agreement the better; for surely nothing is so greatly needed at the present time as a market for our natural products, and that market the best that can be obtained.

I followed with special interest the concluding portion of my right hon. friend's remarks. It was not, however, as we might have expected, that we should try to obtain a market in the United States for our natural products as quickly as possible, it was that we should not pass this resolution because in the near future there was going to be a world economic conference which, among other things, would deal with the question of tariffs. That was the concluding part of my right hon. friend's remarks, and on this ground he made a plea to the mover of the resolution (Mr. Duff) that he should permit a debate but withdraw his resolution at its conclusion. If my right hon. friend had been logical and consistent he would not have asked that the resolution be withdrawn, he would have asked that it carry unanimously so that when this world economic conference takes place all those who attend would at least know the position of the Canadian parliament upon this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt my right hon. friend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: If he will observe the terms of the resolution he will note that the words are that this country should reopen the matter. I quoted the right hon. gentleman himself in an effort to show why we should not reopen the matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: A very good reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the question of reciprocity, this parliament of Canada and different governments have been governed pretty much by conditions as they existed at the time; they have necessarily been restricted in their actions by the opportunities that presented themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the other feature to which I referred a moment ago, that was made apparent by the Prime Minister in his review. When no opportunity presented itself, naturally there was not the same reason for pressing the matter. On the other hand, where the United States took a particular course with respect to its tariff and the existing conditions demanded that Canada should as a consequence take a course which would serve to protect her own interests, the Canadian government has always felt free to take the course that seemed to be the right course under the then existing conditions. The course taken has been governed by circumstances. That is a thoroughly logical position, and it is the position which I think my right hon. friend ought to take to-night. Conditions to-day are different from what they have been at any other time; they are different in Canada as respects the need for markets, a need which has never been so great as it is at the moment. An opportunity is being presented to-day such as has not been presented since 1911. As my right hon. friend knows, the president-elect of the United States has indicated publicly that he is prepared to make reciprocal agreements with any countries that are prepared to make reciprocal agreements with the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: But not with respect to natural and farm products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: His terms were broad enough to include almost everything if a mutually satisfactory arrangement could be reached. If he is prepared to negotiate reciprocal treaties, then I think my right hon. friend ought to find out from him if he would consider a reciprocal treaty with Canada in natural products. When the incoming administration in the United States publicly states that it is prepared to negotiate reciprocal treaties, then I think the government of the day in Canada should at least not hesitate to open negotiations. These should be opened through the minister at Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the president is installed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Begin now to prepare for negotiations through the minister at Washington. He should be made au fait with all phases of the matter in order that no time may be lost.

May I say to my right hon. friend that in this connection I do not think he is as much concerned about the world economic conference to be held in the near future as he is about the recent Imperial economic conference which was held in Canada. I recall that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain, speaking, I believe, in the British parliament, or at a public meeting, made the statement, in order to obtain support for the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, that unless the United Kingdom-Canada trade agreement went through, in all probability Canada would seek to bring about a reciprocal agreement with the United States. I think that is a correct interpretation of his remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: Substantially correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain had that impression in his mind he got it while he was here at the imperial conference.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure he did not get it out of his own head or from any one in Britain, and I do not see why my hon. friend should ask, why. He was speaking about conditions in Canada as he had been told about them in this country during the conference, and I have not the slightest doubt in the world that he got the impression which he had from the right hon. gentleman who is now leading the government. That is precisely the point of view which has been put forward time and time again by the Conservative party with respect to the trade agreement with Great Britain, that the choice lay between Canada trading with Great Britain or trading with the United States. May I say that there is no such alternative; Canada is quite as able to trade with Great Britain and with the United States as Great Britain is to trade with Canada and with other countries of the world. That is the position which we should take at the present time.

What are the difficulties likely to confront the present government when this world economic conference to which the Prime Minister has alluded takes place? The conference is going to consider the question of tariffs and in this connection so far as Canada is concerned there will come up possible reciprocal agreements which can be arrived at between this and other countries. The first obstacle that is going to stand in the way of a reciprocal agreement between Canada and any other country will then be seen to be the trade agreements arrived at during the imperial conference this last summer. Immediately my right hon. friend is going to feel obliged to say: We would like very much to join in this movement for the reduction of tariffs but so far as Canada is concerned we can go only so far; it is quite true that we can reduce our tariff to a certain figure but we cannot go below that because we have entered into an agreement with Great Britain that for five years we will maintain a certain tariff as against all other countries so as to give a certain margin of preference to the United Kingdom. Upon what basis was that tariff arrived at? We used to have and have yet to a certain extent, although one is now pretty well shattered, three tariff levels; we have the general tariff, the intermediate tariff and the British preferential.

Mr. BENNETT: And the treaty tariff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Our tariff has been so altered that for the most part on commodities likely to be a factor in trade negotiations with other countries the intermediate tariff has been brought up to the level of the general. If we began to bargain with any other country we would find ourselves in a position where we could not as respects certain commodities make a reciprocal offer because we have to maintain for five years to come a tariff rate which would give Great Britain a preference of a fixed amount. If my right hon. friend really wishes to trade with the United States the first step he will have to take will be to have that treaty modified so as to leave him absolutely free to make a reciprocal agreement with the United States.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Are you objecting to the British preference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not objecting to the British preference. May I say that I would go much further with respect to British preference than have hon. gentlemen opposite. I would begin by giving a British preference which would be a preference and would mean something to Canadian as well as to British trade.

The point I wish to make at the moment is this: My right hon. friend would find himself fortified in an effort to modify the United Kingdom-Canada agreement if he had from this House of Commons a unanimous expression in favour of this resolution which states that this country is desirous of entering into a reciprocal agreement with the United States on natural products.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what it says.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It asks that we re-open negotiations, and that is a very mild way of stating the objective. It is only a beginning, but it is a beginning in the right direction.

We have heard a great deal this afternoon and evening with respect to the need of a market for cattle. I think it is pretty generally agreed that so far as Canadian cattle are concerned, the United States is a natural market. May I pause here to re-emphasize what the Prime Minister said this afternoon so that his words may reappear from time to time when we discuss the relations of trade between the United States and Canada. He said that we were all agreed that the United States was the natural market for Canadian products.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as it was possible to have a natural market for anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to add that, and I am very glad to add my right hon. friend's modifying words. That is what we have been contending, that the United States, situated as we are, was our natural market, and that so far as it is possible to secure that market we ought to secure it, and if the ministry is anxious to promote trade they will find under existing conditions a way to make it possible to get into that market.

Mr. BENNETT: You did not get into it in nine years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me go back to the question of markets. Our natural market we are agreed is the United States. May I point out that while we here have been discussing this matter as affected by the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, in Great Britain they have also been discussing the question of trade under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement. They have been discussing in that connection the possibility of at least one other country finding a market for its cattle, and finding that market in Great Britain. That brings this whole question, it seems to me, very much to a head. Is this treaty to operate one way with respect to Great Britain and another way with respect to Canada? We have the statement from British statesmen and men in public life in Great Britain that so far as the United Kingdom-Canada agreement is concerned, Great Britain under its provisions is free to make reciprocal arrangements and can do so, and further that the treaty can be modified if it stands in the way of any reciprocal agreement. I have said before, and I wish to repeat, that I think in that regard there is no doubt in the world that the British ministers at the recent conference did score a point over our Canadian ministers in that the British statesmen took good care to see that what they were giving to Canada could, for the most part, be given to any other country in the form of reciprocal agreements, if they wished to do so, while we on the other hand, by binding ourselves for a period of five years to maintain a certain margin of preference based on keeping our general tariff at a certain level tied our hands so that we could not make reciprocal agreements with other countries.

May I read an item which appeared in the press of the past week with relation to the pacts made at Ottawa, and which are stated to be capable of modification. It bears directly on what we are discussing at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the author?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a dispatch from the Canadian Press, London, February 10, and it refers to a reception that was given to the representative of the Argentine republic in Great Britain. Great Britain is anxious to promote trade with the Argentine republic, just as we are anxious to promote trade with the United States, and she also is confronted with the question of just in what position she stands vis-a-vis this United Kingdom-Canada agreement. Here is the public statement that goes out from Great Britain with respect to the United Kingdom-Canada agreement in its relation to the possibility of Great Britain negotiating a reciprocal trade agreement with respect to the Argentine. I shall read the entire article so as not to be accused of having omitted any part of it. It is a dispatch from the Canadian Press. I read what appears in the Ottawa Citizen of February 11, 1933.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could just as well read it from the Ottawa Journal, as all the papers carried the same dispatch, It reads:

(Canadian Press)

London, Feb. 10.—"Agreements made at the Ottawa conference do not preclude trade negotiations with other countries," the Prince of Wales told a large gathering at the Argentine Club to-night.

The occasion was a welcome to Vice-president Roca of Argentina, who heads a trade delegation to the United Kingdom.

Walter Runciman, president of the board of trade, another speaker at the banquet, declared modification of present restrictions on export of money from Argentina was desirable, and he coupled an assurance that the agreements made at the Ottawa economic conference affecting meat were capable of modification when to "mutual advantage."

The speaker said Great Britain regarded Argentina at least "first cousin" of the Empire, if not "son of the Empire."

The Prince of Wales prophesied that anyone returning to the earth a century from now would find Argentina a "great and leading nation with a highly developed and original culture." He added that this depended upon keeping the nation prosperous and that in turn depended upon prosperity of the beef industry which he said is closely bound up with the British market.

"But while Argentina requires this market, I do not forget that there are things we want from Argentina ourselves—security for our investments and an increasing market for our goods, with facilities for obtaining remittances in payment.

"Agreements made at Ottawa do not in any way preclude negotiations with other countries, and the Argentine is naturally one of the first countries we want to negotiate with."

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask, if these agreements arrived at in Ottawa do not stand in the way of negotiating an agreement respecting cattle, to speak of one commodity only, between the Argentine and Great Britain, why should these agreements be permitted to stand in the way of a reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United States? If the Argentine can be described, as it was described by one of the British ministers who was present at the Ottawa conference this past year, as a cousin or son of Great Britain, surely some description of Canada that would indicate an even more immediate relationship than that would be wholly appropriate as applied to this country; and if the Argentine in the future is to be looked upon as a great and prosperous country because it has had a market for its cattle in Great Britain, why should not this country equally be looked upon as a great and prosperous country in view of the markets which it also has been able to find with regard to cattle and other commodities?

Mr. BENNETT: The market the Argentine needs is not for cattle, but meats.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of Canadian cattle.

Mr. BENNETT: The Argentine is looking for a market for her meats.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The relationship is close enough between cattle and meats. The point I wish to make is this: When my right hon. friend asks us to withdraw this resolution because there is going to be a world conference which is going to discuss tariffs why does he not ask Great Britain similarly to defer her negotiations? I say to him that that proposal is a bluff pure and simple. It is not a reason; it is not an argument. The argument is entirely the other way; the logic of the position is entirely the other way. What my right hon. friend should do is to allow this house to pass this resolution, which he would lead us to infer is one which meets with his approval—

Mr. BENNETT: Not in those terms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend always seeks to save himself by some few little words which will serve his purpose. I do not find fault with him for that. But I am looking at the main objective. What we are seeking at the moment in Canada is trade with every country that will trade with us on a basis that is mutually advantageous. We should not permit any treaty or agreement that has been entered into between the United Kingdom and Canada to stand in the way of reciprocal arrangements of the kind if that same treaty is not to be permitted to stand in the way of reciprocal arrangements which can be made with other countries by Great Britain, the other party to the agreement. So I say to my right hon. friend and hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are sincere in their willingness to promote trade with the great country to the south, they will not ask that this resolution be withdrawn or seek to postpone a vote upon it, but they will let us have a division upon it immediately, if it is not to be carried unanimously—

Mr. BENNETT: Or amended, as it will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will see the nature of the amendment and then judge the mind of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BENNETT: We will not adopt that resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend wishes to amend the resolution, it is quite proper he should do so. We will then understand that he does not wish it to be carried in the form in which it is, and we shall judge by his amendment what if anything he is prepared to do. But the step to be taken now is to clear the decks as quickly as possible of any obstacle in the way of further reciprocal agreements, and the first step necessary in that regard is for my right hon. friend to have the United Kingdom-Canada trade agreement so modified as to leave his hands absolutely free to negotiate a trade agreement with the United States if the opportunity offers.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has just taken his seat. For about one-tenth of the time of his speech he indicated a belief that the sooner a reciprocal agreement was brought about, the better it would be for all concerned. For the remaining nine-tenths of his time he pointed out the obstacles in the way of bringing such an agreement into effect.

May I state frankly that I had not intended to say anything until I heard the remarks of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr Stewart). While listening to his speech I could not help but think that from 1921 to 1930 he had been a minister in a government led by the right hon. gentleman opposite. During his speech I found myself considering the record of that government so far as reciprocal agreements with the United States are concerned. This evening the right hon. leader of the opposition stated that we should have new markets, that from 1911 until the present day there never has been a time when new markets were more needed than they are today. I should like to remind him that when he assumed office in 1921 our export trade to the United States was valued at about $560,000,000. But, as a result of the Fordney-McCumber tariff which came into force in September of the following year, just after the right hon. gentleman took office, our export trade fell from $560,000,000 to $304,000,000. Was there ever a time in our history when we needed new markets, and needed markets in the United States, more than we did then? What did the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for West Edmonton do to recover the market lost at that time? What was the attitude of the leader of the opposition?—"Don't provoke."

The right hon. leader of the opposition has mentioned cattle, and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) gave some figures in that connection. Prior to the Fordney-McCumber tariff we had shipped to the United States over 400,000 head of cattle yearly; that has been reduced to 18,000 head. Why? There are two measures responsible, namely the Fordney-McCumber tariff and the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930. There has been a similar decline all down the line. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) gave figures showing the increases in tariffs which were placed against our natural products going into the United States during the nine years the right hon. gentleman opposite led the government. What did he do to restore a single dollar's worth of that trade to the primary producers of Canada? If he has such a burning desire to enter into a reciprocal agreement with the United States, and if there was such a desire during those nine years of office, certainly no one would be led to that conclusion from the record of his government or the results shown in the trade figures.

Let me enlarge a little upon that phase of the matter. I do not wish to repeat figures which have been placed on record, but it should be pointed out that the Fordney-McCumber tariff came into effect in the United States on September 21, 1922. It has been pointed out that in 1921 wheat entered free, but when the right hon. gentleman left office there was a duty of forty-two cents a bushel on it. What did he do with the United States to get back some of that trade?

Mr. MALCOLM: Was that his fault?

Mr. BOWMAN: No, perhaps not; I will give him credit for that. But where was his effort to improve trade conditions? Where was the burning desire for reciprocity? There may have been a desire, but what did it accomplish? What was done, in a practical way, to restore the trade we lost during those years? Let us see the figures in connection with wheat flour. We find that under the emergency tariff measure which came into effect on May 21, 1921, there was an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. But when the right hon. gentleman opposite and his partly left office there was a duty of $1.04 per hundred pounds. The right hon. gentleman has said there is a connection between cattle and beef. Quite true. What happened with respect to meats? In 1921 beef entered free; mutton, free; lamb, free; pork, free. But when the right hon. gentleman left office in 1930 the duty on beef had risen to six cents per pound, on mutton to five cents per pound, on lamb to seven cents per pound and on pork to two and a half cents per pound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was under a Tory government.

Mr. BOWMAN: No, it was prior to the time the Tory government came into office.

Mr. YOUNG: There was a Tory government in the United States.

Mr. BOWMAN: What did you do about it? We could go all down the list of natural products which we in Canada were anxious to sell to the United States. From September, 1920, to September, 1921, our trade in agricultural products with the United States was valued at $159,000,000. From September, 1921, to September, 1922, the year the Fordney-McCumber tariff went into effect, it had dropped to $55,000,000.

When the right hon. gentleman and his party went into power they were immediately met by the Fordney-McCumber measure. They knew then the attitude of the United States in connection with tariffs on natural products. They were in power for eight or nine years subsequent to the introduction of that tariff measure, and if there had been any fruitful soil in the United States which could have been cultivated in their efforts to spread the desire for reciprocal trade arrangements, surely something could have been done in that time. But what do we find? We find that just before they left office another tariff measure, known as the Hawley-Smoot tariff, became effective. Did they do anything to prevent it? Were their hands tied? Were they unable to do anything? What do we find after they had been in office for eight years? Let me give just a few instances. On poultry the tariff is increased by the Hawley-Smoot bill from 3 cents to 8 cents per pound; on sheep from $2 to $3 per head; on oats from 15 cents to 16 cents per bushel; on bacon from 2 cents per pound to 3¼ cents; on fresh meat from 3 cents to 6 cents; on mutton from 2½ cents to 5 cents; on lamb from 4 cents to 7 cents; on butter from 12 cents to 14 cents; on cheese from 5 cents to 7 cents; on cream from 30 cents a gallon to 56·6 cents a gallon. One could continue the list indefinitely.

Mr. MALCOLM: What did the American public do to the government that raised those tariffs?

Mr. BOWMAN: May I ask the hon. gentleman in return what the people of Canada did to his government? What was the result? The result was that our trade in agricultural products with the United States fell from $55,000,000 to $9,000,000. And all the time, I presume, judging from the statement made this evening by the right hon. leader of the opposition, there was that burning desire to enter into reciprocal agreements for trade with the United States. I point this out merely to bring home the fact that after all, if you are going to make a trade agreement, there have to be two parties to the agreement.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is what we were up against.

Mr. BOWMAN: That is what we are up against exactly, I will admit it. Every country desiring to trade with another country must submit some proposition which is mutually satisfactory—

Mr. HEPBURN: Can't you blast your way into markets any more?

Mr. BOWMAN: I do not know that the hon. gentleman who has interrupted will ever get a chance to blast a way into any market.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There will not be any markets left.

Mr. BOWMAN: No, not if the policy inaugurated by my hon. friends opposite were continued, because the trade we desire in agricultural products with the United States disappeared under their regime.

As far as the resolution is concerned, that there should be brought about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States, I do not think anyone in the house would differ from it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Vote for it, then.

Mr. BOWMAN: I think that is the desire of every hon. member of this house, and the whole question at the present time as far as I personally am concerned is how and when the United States government should be approached.

Miss MACPHAIL: A good time would have been 1911.

Mr. BOWMAN: There may be a difference of opinion as to that, but one thing certain is that the electorate settled that question at that time.

The leader of the government has said that at the World economic conference, to be held some time this summer, the question of tariffs and trade barriers is to come under consideration. I think it is the general consensus of opinion in this house that tariffs to-day are too high—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWMAN: —that there are too many barriers and restrictions to trade. But there again we have the question of entering into a mutually satisfactory agreement with the different countries with which we purpose to trade.

The resolution in question goes on, after referring to a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States:

> Whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines, and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States. . . .

Well, if any hon. member of this house can show us how we can get that free entry, that is what we are looking for.

Mr. HEPBURN: That is your job.

Mr. BOWMAN: No hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, no hon. gentleman in this house, has shown us the way to get that free entry. As a matter of fact the right hon. leader of the opposition and his government during nine years in office showed how not to get free entry, and how the United States shut their doors in our faces as far as trade was concerned. The right hon. leader of the opposition stated that we should make it possible to get into that market, but did he make any suggestion as to how it was to be made possible? If we followed his example it would show how to make it impossible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that concludes what I have to say in respect to the resolution, except that as far as I personally am concerned, and as far as western Canada is concerned, we would welcome any mutually satisfactory reciprocal agreement with the United States whereby our natural products would enter the United States free or on any reasonable and mutually satisfactory basis.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): As there is an indication from my friends to the right that they are anxious if possible to have this debate conclude before adjournment to-night, I will take only a very few minutes. But I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without indicating my stand, and I think, in regard to this matter, I represent the stand of most of the members who sit in this corner. On several occasions since we have been in the house we have indicated our desire to secure better trade relations with the United States. Our attitude is still the same, and I would say briefly that the need was never greater. Trade on this continent naturally runs north and south, but it does seem that neither Canada nor the United States is aware of that fact. We both seem to have put every obstacle in the way that we possibly could. The trade figures show how successful these methods have been. In 1929 Canada bought from the United States about $877,000,000 worth of goods, while in the year ending October, 1932, we bought from them a little over $278,000,000 worth. The loss of trade in the opposite direction was equally heavy, Canada selling to the United States in 1929 $536,000,000 but only $178,600,000 worth in the year ending October, 1932. Agriculture is the chief industry of Canada; in 1921 we sold to the United States $159,500,000 worth of farm products, that is both raw and processed, while for the year ending October, 1932, we exported from Canada to the United States farm products to the value of only $8,850,000—a terrific drop.

Mr. BENNETT: The Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, the Hawley-Smoot tariff was passed in the interval. Personally I am particularly interested in a market for our cattle. The policy of the present government in keeping our currency at such a high level in the United States, and consequently keeping the pound at such a relatively low value in Canada, makes it almost impossible to market our cattle in Britain. Therefore we should seek every possible opportunity of negotiating with the United States to see if it is possible to secure entry to that market on more favourable terms.

One other reason I should like to suggest. We are told that our contractual obligations in the United States are so great that we must keep our currency as near as possible to the level of the currency of the United States; in other words, to use the expression of the man on the street, our currency seems to be tied to that of the United States. We are told that people in the United States have an investment in Canada of over four billion dollars. Surely investors in the United States and the authorities there must realize that the only way we can pay these obligations is by the export and sale of goods, including the gold that is produced in Canada. Surely the authorities in the United States must see the need of allowing us to export our goods to that country if we are to continue to meet those contractual obligations. I think that very fact should be of considerable help to any government.

Mr. MacMILLAN: I object, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. gentleman reading his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is quite in order.

Mr. COOTE: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the house provide the hon. member with a better pair of spectacles. Since the low tariff party soon will come into office in the United States surely it would be good policy on our part to hold out to them the olive branch. By passing this resolution we would indicate to the United States that the parliament and people of Canada are in favour of entering into negotiations designed to bring about the best possible trade relations between these two great countries on the North American continent.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the house is indebted to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) for bringing forward this resolution, if only for the reason that it allows our old friends of the Liberal party to show that they are still running true to form. They are wonderful free traders when they are in opposition, but by the time they get in office they are wonderful protectionists. For ten years the burning desire of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough for free trade with the United States in fish has been slumbering under the ashes, but some breeze has blown away those ashes, and immediately we get a resolution in favour of reciprocity.

Mr. DUFF: Not at all; I always was in favour of it.

Mr. TURNBULL: There has been no change of heart or mind in the Conservative party; it has declared itself in favour of reciprocal trade on mutually satisfactory terms. Those words are contained, I believe, in the speech delivered by Sir John A. Macdonald when he introduced the national policy in 1887. While the Conservative party believes in tariffs in order to protect the workingmen of this country from the competition of cheaper labour in other countries, at the same time we believe that reciprocal trade between ourselves and other countries under carefully prepared treaties will benefit all concerned. It is true that our trade with other countries has been restricted and that we need markets for our natural products. It is true that we need markets for cattle, for wheat and for the other products of the farm, but we have needed them for the last ten years. Can hon. gentlemen opposite name one single treaty which they negotiated during the ten years they were in office which sold one dollar's worth of farm products? We had a treaty with Australia, which was later extended to New Zealand, which sold manufactured goods, but the farmers of Canada paid for that sale by the opening of the Canadian market to butter, while my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) declared that wheat products could find their own market, and that the Department of Trade and Commerce was not so much interested in the sale of these commodities as in the sale of manufactured goods. As soon as hon. gentlemen opposite got into opposition they became great friends of the people who want to sell natural products. When we came into office we proceeded to make the Canadian market available to Canadian farmers.

Miss MACPHAIL: And look at the prices.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend knew what the prices were she would realize that the prices of farm products in Canada are better than in any other part of the world, and that is due in great part to the action taken by this government. After having given the farmers of this country the Canadian market, which they never had under the government of hon. gentlemen opposite, we turned to the problem of finding a market abroad. Whatever else may be said of them, the treaties into which we have entered were framed with the intent of selling the products of the farm, of the forest, of the mine and of the sea. In return we have agreed to facilitate the importation of manufactured goods from the mother country. While we were trying to find this market within the empire for our farm products, hon. gentlemen opposite were fighting us tooth and nail. Why are they so anxious to trade with the United States, with Russia or with any other country while they fight so bitterly against trading with the mother country? As a result of the treaties we made we are selling farm products in that market.

Let me point out that the United Kingdom market is likely to be open to us so long as we are able to supply it. If we make a treaty with the United States have we any guarantee that the treaty will be continued? Hon. gentlemen opposite say we should not make a treaty that will be continuous at all; they want us to make one that can be abrogated the next day. They do not believe in five year terms. Are we to give up the British market once more in order to get the United States market, which we may have for fifteen minutes, for five years or for as long as they choose to allow us to enter? Over and over again we have extended our trade east and west; then we began to trade with the United States until our east and west channels were closed up; then the United States market was closed to us, as happened in 1866, and we had no markets at all. Nothing in the imperial conference treaties precludes us from negotiating treaties with other countries, so long as subsequent treaties are negotiated in accordance with the terms of the treaties already made.

Hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that we should approach the United States in the hope of getting reciprocity. Why? We are told that the opportunity exists now because President Roosevelt is said to be in favour of lower tariffs. Let me remind hon. gentlemen what happened to President Wilson when he attempted to reduce the United States tariff a few years ago. At the next election his party was swept out of office. My hon. friends say that the reason they did not do this in the ten years during which they were in office was that a favourable opportunity had not presented itself, and now they say that a favourable opportunity does exist. What is the favourable opportunity? Not a single thing has been said on the other side of the house to indicate that the American government is any more favourable to taking Canadian farm products into that country than they were before. More than that, President-elect Roosevelt in the course of his election campaign declared that he did not know of one single item in the farm schedules on which the duty was too high. He was prepared to lower duties where they were too high, but he did not know of one single item where they were too high. Does that offer us any opportunity to sell our natural products?

It is very necessary that the quality of Canadian goods going to Great Britain should not be impaired. I remember hearing years ago Mr. Andrew Broder, the old member for Dundas, long since dead, telling what had happened to Canadian products when we had reciprocity with the United States. Canadian butter of good quality was sent across the line into the United States. It was stamped as American butter and sold in the British market as such, while cheap American butter was stamped as Canadian butter and shipped from New York to the British market as a Canadian product. The result was that it took us a long time to regain the reputation for Canadian products in the British market which we had lost in those years.

If there is any possibility of opening up trade negotiations with the United States, if there is any disposition on the part of the United States to reduce their tariffs as they affect Canada and to do business with us, that feeling in the United States is not due to the attitude my hon. friends took in the spring of 1930 when they declared that they were afraid to increase their general tariff and were afraid to increase the British preference lest it might provoke the United States and be misunderstood on the other side of the line. If any favourable attitude has arisen in the United States in recent years it is due to the fact that this country has taken an independent, manly stand with respect to its own economic affairs. It is due to the fact that this government has put into force tariff schedules calculated to meet the interests of the people of this country, regardless of whether they provoke the United States or any other country. And if to-day the United States are prepared to deal with us, it is because they respect the attitude we have taken and realize that they are dealing with people whom they can neither browbeat nor frighten, people who are not afraid, people who will do what is best in their own interests, regardless of whether anybody in the United States disapproves or not.

To-day the Hearst press, which helped to elect President Roosevelt, is printing its diatribes against any reductions in their tariff. They are urging still higher tariffs so as to make up for the depreciation in currency in those countries which are trying to trade with them. It is true that this country needs trade. The people need internal trade even more than they do external. It is the fact that we had an external trade that makes us so susceptible during this time of depression.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what Mr. Dunning said the other day.

Mr. TURNBULL: Our external trade with America, amounting to $200,000,000 of farm products in 1922, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, has dwindled to less than $10,000,000 owing to the action of an outside government. It was the action of France, Germany and Italy that killed our external trade in wheat. I am in favour of external trade but not at the expense of internal trade. We must have an external trade on proper terms as between this and other countries. With respect to trade with the United States, there is not a person in Canada that I know of who is not desirous of increasing the trade of this country on terms advantageous to us. We are getting a market in Great Britain for our products. The figures produced daily by the bureau of statistics show an extending trade in practically every line of farm products in that country. True, we are not getting the benefit we should get, the benefits we shall get when exchange comes back to normal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When there is a change in government.

Mr. TURNBULL: My hon. friend must not be pessimistic, for if we have to wait for a change of government we shall wait a long time. Our trade relations must be built on lines that will last, and in directions that can be maintained; they must provide a market that will be continuous. It costs money to build markets in foreign countries, and there is no desire to build markets in foreign countries when the people who are trying to establish them know that the day they are established they are liable to be killed by tariff action in some other country. If we can get a trade relationship with the United States which will last long enough to make it worth while, which will provide for the sale of western cattle, our western wheat, our British Columbia lumber, along with that of Quebec and Ontario, and which will enable my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) to sell his fish, and the people of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to sell their potatoes—

Mr. YOUNG: And radishes.

Mr. TURNBULL: I think the hon. gentleman would be better able to sell cabbages and socks. If, as I was saying, we can establish trade relations along these lines, which will be sufficiently continuous to enable us to keep the market once we have it, and to keep it long enough to make it worth while to establish such trade relations, and if we can do so without destroying the trade we already have, then I do not think there is any person in any part of this country who would object. If it is necessary that an opportunity should be provided for trade relations with the United States, and if the opportunity is as apparent as my hon. friends opposite think it is, then surely in the course of this debate they should have been able to give evidence of some kind to show that such an opportunity was available.

We have heard something to-night with regard to trade with Great Britain. We have heard about the Imperial conference and its effects, and we have been told what is taking place. It is exactly what we contended all last fall. These were the very things this side of the house was saying last year. We were claiming on this side of the house that these treaties did not preclude us from trading with other countries. My hon. friends were saying that they did, and now they quote British authorities to show that we were right. They said that we were building up an economic imperialism within the empire, a zollverein. They say that we have a high tariff wall around the whole empire to shut out the rest of the world. That was the story they told the public last year; that was the story they gave us last fall; that was the argument we heard until they had so confounded themselves that they did not know which way to vote when the vote on treaties came up. Within two or three months from that time we find the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) coming back to this house and confessing that he was wrong all along and that we were right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not wonder that hon. members laugh at him. He now says that this treaty does not preclude Great Britain from trading with other countries, that it is quite open for her so to do. It is the same for us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not for us, that is the rub.

Mr. TURNBULL: There is nothing in our treaty to prevent our trading with other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course there is.

Mr. TURNBULL: The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has been in France negotiating a treaty with that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is the treaty?

Mr. TURNBULL: My hon. friends are in a hurry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Give us another Regina announcement.

Mr. HEPBURN: Read us his speech on Japan.

Mr. TURNBULL: My hon. friends are in a hurry. May I remind them of what happens to Liberals when they get too much in a hurry? We have an example over in the other corner of the chamber; look where they have got to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The tariff board.

Mr. TURNBULL: The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Mackenzie) wants to run after and catch up with them.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Oh no; he runs up a stick.

Mr. TURNBULL: He wants to catch up with the Liberals in that corner who were in a hurry. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) says: No, "let them alone and they'll come home, bringing their tails behind them." I urge the hon. member for Vancouver not to get into too much of a hurry about anything; it is a part of the folly of youth that wears away in old age. He will get the treaty in due course.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 21, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Spencer that the following motion having been called twice, and not being proceeded with, be restored to the order paper.

That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table a number of orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

RELIEF ACT, 1932, AMENDMENT

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the thirty-first of March, 1934.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SUPERINTENDENT OF BANKRUPTCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has received a complaint from the Montreal Bar Association against Mr. W. J. Reilly, superintendent of bankruptcy, and if so what answer he has given to that association? An article from a Montreal newspaper dated February 17, 1933, reads as follows:

Complaints against Mr. Reilly, Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed with his question?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): He has asked his question. At the moment I have no recollection of having received any representations concerning the superintendent of bankruptcy from the Montreal Bar Association. However if I did receive such representations I forwarded them to the Department of Finance, because the superintendent of bankruptcy is now under that department.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Minister of Finance if he has received the resolution of the Montreal Bar Association mentioned by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Jean) and what he has done with regard to it?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as far as my memory serves me I have received no resolution from the Montreal Bar Association. I did, however, receive a resolution from the council of the Montreal Bar Association and some inquiries were made by myself in respect to the matter in question, but no official acknowledgment has been made, solely for the reason that as my hon. friend knows I have been indisposed of late. But an answer will be forthcoming in a few days.

FISHING BOUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to refer to a question which appeared in the votes and proceedings of Friday last, February 17, 1933. The question I have in mind has reference to the bounties paid fishing vessels and to fishermen during the years 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932. Yesterday, only four days after my question appeared in the votes and proceedings, the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) was good enough to file sessional paper No. 115a. This paper gives particulars regarding the years 1929, 1930 and 1931, but the answers concerning the year 1932 which, for my purposes, are the most important, are in every case "not paid yet." I wish to state that this return is incomplete. I am not blaming the acting minister, because I appreciate fully his position, but I want to say that the official who prepared this return should be disciplined. I want the information, and I am willing to wait for it.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter, and if the return can be supplemented with further details, it will be.

CANADIAN GOLD MINES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if he has given any thought to taking over the gold mines in Canada, increasing their output and enlarging the survey for more gold, in order that we may be able to carry on.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) would not expect an answer right out of hand to a question so all-embracing as the one he has submitted.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): On the front page of Hansard of Monday, the 20th of February, I see that it is supposed to be an unrevised edition—official report. It is rather the first issue of expurgated Hansard.

BANKRUPTCIES—1932

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Might I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if he has received from the superintendent of bankruptcy any report along the lines discussed when the matter was before the committee last year as to the bankruptcies during the calendar year 1932 and the amount that has been received by creditors?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): No, no such report is to hand as yet.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Indian Act.—Mr. Murphy—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Inquiry as to fitness for enfranchisement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Might I ask the minister to explain.

Mr. MURPHY: Section 110 as it exists in the act at the present time, the hon. member will find printed on the right hand page of the proposed bill. The proposed amendment reads:

> The Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belong, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

You will observe that the act as at present in force reads that the Indian may be enfranchised upon the application of himself or of a band on a vote of a majority of the male members of such band of the full age of twenty-one years at a meeting or council thereof summoned for that purpose. Under the amended section the Superintendent General would be given the power to appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belong, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister inform me how many have been enfranchised under the old section 110?

Mr. MURPHY: During the ten year period from 31st December, 1922, to the 31st December, 1932, under section 122a of the old act and section 114 of the new, 793 Indians were enfranchised.

Under section 107 of the old act and 110 of the new—that is the act which is at present in force—61 Indians were enfranchised during the same period.

I may say that the majority of the Indians enfranchised during the past few years have been enfranchised under section 114 of the present act rather than section 110. Under section 114 Indians are enfranchised who live and make their living away from the reserve. Section 110 refers more to the enfranchisement of Indians living on the reserve.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister give the total number of Indians enfranchised in the dominion?

Mr. MURPHY: The figures I have given for the ten year period comprise all those enfranchised during those years. When an Indian is enfranchised his wife and minor children are enfranchised automatically. If he has children over the age of twenty-one it is necessary for them to be enfranchised of themselves.

Mr. BRADETTE: I understand under the electoral act, at least as far as northern Ontario is concerned, only Indians who are war veterans have the right to vote. I believe the law should be uniform throughout Canada for all Indians. I have in mind that during the last general election a party organizer for one of the great parties in Canada sent a letter to one of the candidates to the effect that a certain number of Indians should vote because they were good Conservatives. He was certain of that. We want to do away with that. I do not believe that any man in Canada should say who has a right to vote and who has not. That right is vested in this parliament, and we should have a uniform law that applies to the whole of Canada. I know this anomaly has existed in my section of the country and also in other sections. I protest as strenuously as I can against such a measure. I believe that under the electoral act only Indians who enlisted during the great war have a right to vote. Under this act it is going to be left to one or two men to decide what Indians shall have that right. I protest against that. Either it should be general, that an Indian has the right to vote no matter where he lives, or else no Indian should be allowed to vote. I speak feelingly in this matter, because I know the electoral act is not properly applied, in my section of the country at least, and this would only create another gap which will allow some men, perhaps competent men, in most cases honest men, but in some cases subject to political influence, to pick out certain people to whom the right to vote would be given, and keep it from others. I say this law should be uniform for all Indians. No body of men in Canada, no matter how able they may be, should be given the power to say whether or not an Indian is entitled to vote. We know what happened at the last general election, and so far as I am concerned I do not want the same thing to happen again.

Mr. MURPHY: As I understood my hon. friend, he was making some complaint with regard to the voting system. This section merely provides for the enfranchisement of the Indians, and not for the actual voting.

It would appear to me that the amendment suggested by my hon. friend, which I could not hear distinctly, has reference to the electoral act rather than to the Indian Act, which only provides for enfranchisement.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe the two questions of enfranchisement and voting cannot be separated. What I had in mind was this: Under the present electoral act and the Indian Act, even at the last general election certain men were allowed to say whether or not certain Indians should vote. That is why I am protesting now. Once the Indians become enfranchised under this act they have the right to vote; if they have not the franchise they have not the right to vote. I maintain that the law should be uniform with regard to the Indians, as it is for the white men. Under this statute there will be no uniformity for the simple reason that you leave it to two or three men to decide what Indians shall vote. They may be quite competent men, but certainly they should not have the right to give the franchise to certain people only. That right is vested in this parliament, and I am afraid that the same things that took place during previous elections will happen again under this amendment. I think there should be a uniform law applying to all the Indians throughout Canada, and I do not believe any body of men should be given power to pick out certain Indians who may become enfranchised and have the right to vote.

I make this protest very sincerely for the sake of the good name of our elections. People should know exactly where they stand. If the minister would like me to do so I could give him some correspondence that came into my hands accidentally. In the town of Mattice, near Hearst, which the Minister of Labour knows quite well, a certain number of Indians spend the summer months. During the last general election I came into possession of a certain letter giving information to my opponent. I do not know who wrote the letter, whether or not it was the agent of the department, but this letter singled out a certain number of Indians who should be allowed to vote because they were good Conservatives and a certain number of Indians who should not be allowed to vote because they were good Grits. I want to see these uncertainties done away with, but I believe we will only continue that system by this amendment. I believe each Indian should know exactly where he stands when an election comes along, and I repeat that you cannot separate the franchise and the right to vote. I appeal to the sense of justice of the minister and the government; I ask them to bring in a uniform law in this connection. This is the time and place to do it; it is only justice and British fair play to all concerned.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What qualifications are necessary before an Indian can become enfranchised?

Mr. MURPHY: The general qualification would be the judgment of those who examine the Indian as to his fitness to be enfranchised. Frequently an Indian who does not live on a reserve applies of his own volition to be enfranchised. Upon receipt of the application reports are asked from the agent and other responsible people in the district as to the fitness of this particular Indian to be enfranchised, and after the reports are received and passed upon by the department a recommendation is made to the governor general in council. A number of Indians have been enfranchised in recent years; I gave the figures a moment ago. Practically all these Indians came under section 114, which provides for the enfranchisement of those living off a reserve. Section 110, which we propose to amend, refers more particularly to those now residing or who may hereafter reside upon a reserve. I do not think I can make it any plainer than that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: For what purpose is the enfranchisement referred to in section 110? At what elections does it entitle the Indian to vote? Surely it does not refer to the right to vote at a dominion election, for instance?

Mr. MURPHY: It has nothing to do with the right to vote; it enfranchises the Indian and makes him a citizen of this country, with all the rights and privileges that go with citizenship.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Under the electoral act certain Indians only are entitled to vote at dominion elections. Do I understand the minister to mean that if the Indian is enfranchised, either under section 110 or section 114, he thereby becomes entitled to be added to the list that is already provided for under the Dominion Elections Act?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask the minister where the demand came from for this amendment? Did it come from the Indians on the reserves? Was it suggested by the department, or where did the suggestion come from?

Mr. MURPHY: Whatever merit there may be in the measure is not for me to say, but the amendment originated with myself. The amendment before us was drafted within the department, by and with the advice of the officials.

Mr. VALLANCE: Was there any demand from the Indians living on reserves to have this tribunal set up in this manner?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Were the Indians consulted at all?

Mr. MURPHY: A similar amendment was passed in 1920, when a committee of the house sat upon the matter and the Indians and all interested parties were represented.

Mr. VALLANCE: Here in Ottawa?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Were the Indians represented here at that time?

Mr. MURPHY: They appeared before the committee, yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: I compliment the minister on this provision because for many years there has been a considerable demand from the Indians for enfranchisement, As I said the other day, there is no reason at all for fixing the colour line with respect to the right to vote. Must the Indian apply separately and specifically, or will the minister hold an investigation into his capability of exercising the franchise?

Mr. MURPHY: The proposed amendment reads:

> The Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band, to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

I would take it that a separate board would not be appointed for every indivdual Indian, although if an Indian made application, or it was decided to investigate his fitness, a board might be appointed for that purpose. But that same board could pass upon the fitness of more than one Indian at the time the sittings were held.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think the minister caught my question. Would this board be competent to go into the band and examine all the Indians there, or will the individual have to make separate application to be enfranchised?

Mr. MURPHY: It would depend upon the instructions given the board. If the Superintendent General instructed the board to make a general investigation of the Indians of the band, it would be within the competence of the board to do so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How does this affect the liability of the Indian for debt under the Indian Act? Suppose execution is recovered against the Indian; it does not become effective, so long as he remains a member of the band, as against any property on the reserve. Does this affect him when he becomes enfranchised? Does he then take all the rights and privileges of the ordinary citizen and lose the privilege that he formerly had of exemption from having his goods seized under execution?

Mr. MURPHY: After he became enfranchised he would certainly be in the same position as any other citizen of Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Even if he lived on the reserve?

Mr. MURPHY: Whether on or off the reserve, he has become enfranchised and is then subject to the laws of the country the same as any white man.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that the franchise, the power to vote, is conferred in the first instance on Indians who served overseas in the Great war and, in the second place, there is enfranchisement through the procedure established in this act which is now being modified. As I understand the amendment at present before us, it is only to eliminate the initiative from the council of the band and to leave that initiative with the minister himself in relation to the board. Am I correct in my interpretation of the section?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes; it gives the Superintendent General the power to initiate the proceedings.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Without consulting the band or the council?

Mr. MURPHY: The council must be consulted because they have the power to appoint one member of the board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As regards an Indian who continues to live on the reserve after enfranchisement, the land which he occupies is taken out of the reserve and becomes his private property, subject to taxation. He has all the civil rights of any other British subject and is similarly liable to be sued. Enfranchisement as understood in this act has no reference to the right to vote; it means enfranchising the Indian in his right as a citizen. If any question as to the right to vote is raised, it will be more proper to raise it as an amendment to the election act than by way of amendment to the Indian Act.

Mr. McINTOSH: I notice in the bill we are considering that the board of investigation is largely a departmental board. There are two representatives from the department to inquire into the fitness of any Indian to vote, and these representatives in many cases are thousands of miles away from the Indian reserve. If we are going to make this a real board competent to investigate the fitness of the Indian to vote, I submit that the head of the band should be on the board together with one man from the department and one representative selected from the community in which the reserve is situated. If that were done you would have a representative body of opinion on a question of great importance to the Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: The amendment provides that the Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department. It does not necessarily follow that these two officers will be located in Ottawa. We have agents and inspectors throughout Canada and it would be quite competent for the Superintendent General to appoint an inspector and an agent, or two agents, as representatives of the department on the board.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a little better, but it is more than likely that one of the men whom the department might appoint would reside, in the case of Saskatchewan, in Regina, and that is about as bad as if he were living in Ottawa. My point is this. If you appointed an Indian agent as a member of the board you would still be under a disadvantage in getting the considered community opinion regarding the fitness of the Indian to vote.

Mr. MURPHY: The members to be appointed could be the agent and inspector in that province, and the inspector is continually making his tours of the reserves in the province and is therefore quite familiar with the conditions as they exist. Furthermore, the boundaries of many of the reserves especially in the west are fairly close together, and two agents living side by side might constitute the board. When I say side by side I mean in contiguous territory. It would therefore be perfectly competent for them to pass upon the fitness of the Indian for enfranchisement, considering the case in conjunction with the Indian who is nominated by the council of the particular band.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. VALLANCE: This provision which we are now considering proposes, as the minister has pointed out, that the Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian belongs, to make inquiry and report as to his fitness to be enfranchised. What section of the act permits the Indian to make application for this body to investigate, or is that right vested in these officials, together with the Indian chosen from the band? Have they the right to pick out the Indian who is to be investigated?

Mr. MURPHY: An Indian on the reserve might himself desire enfranchisement and there is nothing to preclude his making application if he sees fit—

Mr. VALLANCE: Suppose he did not want to?

Mr. MURPHY: —in which case the board would act exactly in the same manner as it would if the Superintendent General were to direct an investigation to be made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there any particular section of the act that instructs the Indian to take such action?

Mr. MURPHY: The present section 110 which we are amending makes provision in that regard. We are only substituting this amendment for one subsection of section 110, which comprises thirteen subsections.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would ask another question prompted by the reply given by the Minister of Justice a few moments ago. I think I understood the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to state that an Indian living on a reserve who applies for and obtains his enfranchisement would have his land taken out of the reserve and become a regular citizen of Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: Provided he has a location upon the reserve.

Mr. VALLANCE: And if he has not?

Mr. MURPHY: Subsection 8 of section 110 reads:

> Upon the issue of an order of enfranchisement the Superintendent General shall, if any Indian enfranchised holds any land on a reserve, cause letters patent to be issued to such Indian for such land; and such Indian shall pay to the funds of the band such amount per acre for the land he holds as the Superintendent General considers to be the value of the common interest of the band in such land, and such payments shall be a charge against the share of such Indian in the funds of the band.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does that apply to both treaty and non-treaty Indians, and would the Indian then be entitled to vote?

Mr. MURPHY: I would say that no distinction is made in the act between treaty and non-treaty Indians; it simply says "Indian."

Mr. VALLANCE: The act defines the responsibilities of treaty and non-treaty Indians. I do not want to appear to be telling the minister something which he perhaps ought to know regarding his own department. I think there is a vast difference in what is expected by the state from a treaty and a non-treaty Indian. They are not in the same category; the one is a ward of the state while the other is not.

Mr. IRVINE: I cannot see any difference between section 110 as amended by this bill and the latter part of the original section. I should like to know why the first part of the section which provides for an Indian making application has been dropped?

Mr. MURPHY: Under the present act there must be voluntary action by the Indian in making application while under the proposed amendment the initial proceedings might be started by the Superintendent General.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the minister in a position to answer the questions I asked? I do not ask these in order to embarrass him.

Mr. MURPHY: Both the treaty and non-treaty Indian is mentioned in the act, but my opinion is that the term is used in this section in the generic sense and means all Indians. I do not think it is circumscribed in any way by the definition of a non-treaty Indian.

Mr. VALLANCE: According to the interpretation given by the Minister of Justice, all we are dealing with is the treaty Indian living upon the reserve. When that Indian applies for enfranchisement and receives it he is no longer a treaty Indian entitled to the privileges of a ward. He cannot have both.

Mr. MURPHY: Quite so.

Mr. VALLANCE: Under this bill you are permitting the treaty Indian to come out from under the treaty and assume all the responsibilities of citizenship?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: The note in connection with section 7 reads:

> This subsection is designed to give the necessary impetus to carry out the ultimate aims and objects of the policy which has governed the administration of Indian affairs.

What impetus is being referred to?

Mr. MURPHY: Through the years the Canadian people have recognized their responsibilities for the welfare of the Indians of this country. In furtherance of that recognition they have spent vast sums of money in order to raise the status of the Indian. In cooperation with the churches they have established a very comprehensive educational system comprising both residential and day schools. They have also provided medical and hospitalization services for the Indian and have spent large sums of money, notably in the west, in order to make the Indian self supporting upon our agricultural lands. This constant endeavour throughout the years to raise the status of the Indian has been for what purpose? What has been the ultimate object in view in the expenditure of these moneys and the providing of these services for the Indian? It has been to raise the Indian to full status where he can take his place as a citizen of Canada. I believe this policy is the correct one but so far we have failed to take that final step which, in my opinion, should be taken, namely, to make the Indian a full citizen of this country when he has obtained that degree of advancement which entitles him to the full responsibilities and privileges of citizenship.

Mr. BROWN: Let us grant that what the minister has said is correct, but I want to point again to the proposed amendment as it compares with the original subsection. If I understand the minister aright he says that the real difference is that in the one case the action depended upon the volition of the Indian whereas under the proposed amendment this action may be taken by the department without consultation with the Indian. If I am correct in my interpretation, then I think it very essential that this distinction be drawn to the attention of the committee. Does the minister think that an Indian who has not had sufficient initiative to ask for enfranchisement is worthy of being enfranchised? Does he think that an Indian would be capable of exercising the rights of citizenship when he has not been willing to take the steps to attain that end? If this change is made the power will be given to departmental officials to enfranchise Indians at a wholesale rate irrespective of the qualifications of the Indians and perhaps irrespective of their desire. At any rate, it would be apart altogether from their own volition.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is urged that this amendment is being made because the time has come when the Indian should be made a citizen. Is it not rather fathered by the thought of the $400, $500 or $600 band money for each Indian and is he not anxious to become enfranchised because at the expiration of two years he receives his franchise and gets this money; he is anxious to get it into his hands. Am I not correct in saying this is the reason for his wanting to become enfranchised?

Mr. MURPHY: I would say that the opposite is the case, because the Indians who are living on the reserves at this time have not over the years made application to become enfranchised although they would be entitled to their share in the funds of the band to which they belong. Applications that have been made for enfranchisement have generally been from those who are not living on the reserves, but who have gone out into the cities, towns and other localities and are there making their living in competition with the white man.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am in absolute agreement with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), when he says that we should give the Indians universal suffrage. I believe the Minister of Justice was answering the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario when he said that we were dealing with the electoral act. This measure is in conflict with the electoral act. We are going to take a certain portion of the population and decide, apart from the provisions of that act, whether they shall have the vote. In extending this franchise, we can extend it only to federal elections; we cannot give it for provincial or municipal elections, so that there again there will be a conflict with the municipalities and provinces. In my opinion, we should therefore leave aside this part of the act, the present section 110, because the Minister of Justice has said that in dealing with the matter we are dealing with the electoral act and it is not fair for any parliament to pass legislation picking out a certain section of the population and deciding whether they shall have the right to vote.

I agreed with the Minister of Justice when he said in answer to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that so far as this parliament was concerned we could not give the Indian universal suffrage except through the electoral act. I believe this section should be withdrawn now. Although I have no treaty Indians in my section, there are conflicts so far as the Indian vote is concerned. Some of them do not know whether they have the right to vote or not. Whether the law is not well enough defined or not or universal enough is up to parliament to judge, but I believe if you create a body from the Indian department that will have power to extend the right to vote, you are going to cause still more conflict. We should let parliament decide the matter through the electoral act. From personal experience I belive it would be better either to enfranchise all Indians or to have all disenfranchised. The situation is confusing and even the chief electoral officer does not know in certain cases how to apply the act because it comes into conflict with the electoral act. I make this appeal very sincerely to the minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that what I have said has been misapprehended. This section we now propose to amend has been on the statute book for at least ten years and the amendment now proposed does not affect the right to use the electoral franchise one way or the other; we are not going to change the law in that respect. The only change that is proposed is as regards the manner in which an Indian shall apply for enfranchisement. Under the old section 110, subsection one, the Indian made the application. Now it is proposed by the amendment that the superintendent may make the application.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought that had been very well explained.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it has not been, it will be. The other point that seems to have caused some trouble is whether it applied to all Indians. The section does apply to all Indians, treaty and non-treaty. My hon. friend will see that the section refers to an Indian and in the interpretation clause an Indian is defined:

1. Any male person of Indian blood reputed to belong to a particular band.
2. Any child of such person.
3. Any woman who is or was lawfully married to such person.

A non-treaty Indian is also defined:

"Non-treaty Indian" means any person of Indian blood who is reputed to belong to an irregular band, or who follows the Indian mode of life, even if such person is only a temporary resident in Canada.

Then an irregular band is described and defined:

"Irregular band" means any tribe, band or body of persons of Indian blood who own no interest in any reserve or lands of which the legal title is vested in the crown, who possess no common fund managed by the government of Canada, and who have not had any treaty relations with the crown.

Section 110, as it has been upon the statute book for at least ten years, provides that any of these persons may under certain conditions become enfranchised. Enfranchisement confers upon them all the rights of a British subject; they may even buy and sell liquor. The right to the electoral franchise is only one of those rights. What I intended to convey in what I said before was that if this is meant to limit the right given, any amendment in that respect should be made to the Dominion Elections Act and not to the Indian Act. I do not know that any amendment to the Dominion Elections Act is necessary, but such an amendment should certainly not be made to the Indian Act. This enfranchisement covers all the rights of a British subject.

Mr. BROWN: Why is this change being made? It seems that its only effect is to take the responsibility away from the Indian and throw it into the hands of the officer.

Mr. MURPHY: A few moments ago I endeavoured to make plain the reason for the proposed amendment. There are in Canada to-day I would say a considerable number of Indians who have so far progressed that they should accept all the duties of citizenship.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then let them ask for it.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend says: "Then let them ask for it." Let me point out, as has been done already, that under the Indian Act these people who are classed as Indians have certain rights and privileges, for instance, in regard to their debts, as the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) indicated the other day. Recently in an indirect manner there came to my attention an instance where an Indian was carrying on a considerable manufacturing business in this country. He was assessed by the Department of Inland Revenue for the sum of $4,000 sales tax, which he paid. Later he secured the services of a legal firm who endeavoured to recover that amount of money from the department, on the ground that he was an Indian and carrying on his business on an Indian reserve. I leave it to the good sense of the committee to decide whether or not a man capable of carrying on business to the extent I have indicated, namely to the point where he becomes liable for a $4,000 sales tax, should accept his responsibility as a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Was a judgment rendered?

Mr. MURPHY: I cannot say that, because I did not follow the case that far; in fact I am not certain as to whether or not a decision has been given. Further, may I point out that many Indians, so-called, have a greater proportion of white blood than Indian blood in their veins; yet they are still classed as Indians. Further, in some cases white children have been adopted by Indians and have become members of the band, thereby enjoying all the rights and privileges, if we wish to term them so, enjoyed by Indians. There might not be—and I believe, sometimes is not—one drop of Indian blood in their veins. Still they have all the privileges accorded to them under the Indian Act.

Again, there are Indians of mixed blood who have left the reserves and gone to Montreal, Toronto or other Canadian cities and taken their places in the community in every respect, with the one exception that they do not exercise the right of voting. Possibly they cannot buy liquor legally. But for all other purposes they meet their white brothers on common ground, and compete with them. Then, there are many Indians to-day in Canada who belong to professions, and are as clever and brainy men as can be found anywhere. Is it reasonable that these people should not accept their full responsibility as citizens, rather than claim the privileges which are accorded to them because they have not seen fit to make application to become enfranchised.

Mr. MALCOLM: I believe the minister has succeeded in making clear the desire of the department. I take it from what he has said, and hope I am correct in my interpretation, that the department's desire to make the change by which it could enfranchise an Indian without receiving first a request to be enfranchised, as was provided under the old section, is because the department has found that certain Indians are evading their responsibilities as citizens, so far as their legal obligations are concerned. I should like to know whether it would be the intention of the department to go to a band which is not asking for enfranchisement, and enfranchise the Indians belonging to that band. Could the department take that action forcibly, and without first receiving a request from the Indians, in cases where there have been no violations of their rights as citizens?

Mr. MURPHY: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that any minister charged with the admintration of the department would have to make that decision, after considering all the circumstances.

Mr. MALCOLM: To my mind that seems to be the important point.

Mr. MURPHY: But I would say that before taking such action the minister responsible would have to consider all factors. For the information of the hon. member who has just spoken may I refer to subsection 3 of clause 110 which reads as follows:

> In the course of such inquiry it shall be the duty of the board to take into consideration and report upon the attitude of any such Indian towards his enfranchisement which attitude shall be a factor in determining the question of fitness.

I do not anticipate it would be the desire of the department, or any responsible minister, to enforce enfranchisement against any great objection by a band of Indians.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But you could do it under the section?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, it could be done.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to say—and I believe the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario will agree with me—that the Indians themselves have a very strong desire for the franchise. On many occasions they have expressed their desire to candidates of both political parties. They urge that they are the first native Canadian citizens, and that the rest of us have descended from people who came to this country as foreigners. The Indians are the native Canadians. Regardless of the fact that the federal government has made a treaty with them to give them certain treaty moneys, and in that treaty have agreed that the Indians may fish and hunt so long as grass grows and water flows, and has agreed to give them ownership of certain lands—regardless of all that they believe they have the right to vote, and still receive the privileges under the treaty.

I believe the minister's point is well taken when he refers to Indians who leave reserves, who engage in business and try to avoid payment of taxes which might arise in the course of that business. I think the point is reasonably well taken that the department might say to him, "We maintain the right to state that you are a Canadian citizen and subject to the laws of Canada with regard to taxation." That ground may be well taken; but under the old act, as the minister so ably said, the Indians have always had the privilege of applying for citizenship. If their applications are accepted they have to accept the obligations to which an ordinary citizen is subjected with regard to debts. The minister has pointed out that when they receive citizenship the land on the reserves which they have been holding is transferred to them in fee simple, they in turn incurring certain obligations to the band for the value of the land. The minute that becomes possible, the decision must be made whether the Indian can then sell the land to some white person who is not now on a reserve, or who may be objectionable to the other Indians at that point.

While the minister's point may be well taken, I do not think the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs or any other departmental official should have a right to go to a reserve and enforce enfranchisement of Indians who have not requested it, take away from them privileges they have enjoyed under the Indian Act, and place greater responsibilities upon them. I believe the position the Indians take—and I am referring to those bands in Ontario who are cultured, have good education and are farming intelligently, as obtains on some reserves with which I am familiar—that they have a right to vote at elections and still retain their Indian privileges, is a well founded claim. I submit suggestions made by the hon. member for North Timiskaming are well founded, and we would be wise to consider under the election act whether or not we might let the privilege of voting accrue to the Indians, without any reservation as to their civil rights.

I point out to the minister that, as every hon. member knows some of our Ontario bands sent practically every able bodied man to France. Of course those men were rewarded with the franchise, without incurring the responsibilities to which the minister has referred. How can we differentiate between the sons of those men who went overseas, and the fathers? They are the same type of Canadian citizens. Their fathers were enfranchised, and the boys who have now reached voting age cannot see why they should be deprived of that privilege. I place myself on record, with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, and the hon. member for North Timiskaming, in saying that we would be well advised to consider favourably giving to all the native Canadians who are called Indians the franchise for general elections.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid I will have to disagree with my good friend who has just spoken. Having had some experience in administering Indian affairs I see great difficulties that the minister would encounter if he tried to enfranchise the Indians holus-bolus and leave them with the rights they possess under the Indian Act, because under that act they are wards of the government of Canada and possess a great many rights. Enfranchisement would give the Indian every right of a Canadian citizen, but then he could be no longer a ward of the government.

Mr. MURPHY: And at the same time every responsibility.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, absolutely. He becomes a Canadian citizen in the fullest sense of the word. But as a ward of the government he can call upon the government for a great many privileges. For example the education of the Indians is pretty much the responsibility of the government. The Indian does not pay taxes, except such as he imposes on himself for the purposes of the reserve or the band. All these things have to be taken into consideration. Up to date enfranchisement has only taken place at the express desire of the Indian and with the consent of the band. All my hon. friend is attempting to do is to say he does not require that the Indian shall make application, but if he finds, after representation has been made, that any certain Indian would be better enfranchised for various reasons, which he has enumerated, then he does not have to go through the process provided under section 110. All he has to do is to appoint a board consisting of two officers of the department and a member of the band. I am not just clear if the minister stated that this member of the band would be the appointee of the council. If that is true then the council would have some say, but his amendment does not so state. That selection is made by himself, and those three decide whether or not a particular Indian is to be enfranchised. If they recommend his enfranchisement, undoubtedly it will take place. Where I see difficulty is in the adjustment that will have to take place between the individual Indian who is enfranchised and the band and band council, with respect to his property held in common with the rest of the band. Under section 110 as it existed that was all taken care of.

Mr. MURPHY: It is yet.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then I do not see it. I would be glad to have that explained.

Mr. MURPHY: We are not altering that in the slightest. The same conditions will apply if he becomes enfranchised under this amendment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Suppose the band refuse to act, what is going to happen? Suppose the band or the council of the band have not been consulted: a recommendation is made by the board that a particular Indian be enfranchised. If my hon. friend is correct and this third member of the board, the Indian member, is the nominee of the council, then it would be assumed that the council were consenting parties?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But I do not see that that is provided for in the section as drafted.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, under subsection 2 of section 110, which reads as follows:

> The Indian member of the board shall be nominated by the council of the band, within thirty days after the date of notice having been given to the council, and in default of such nomination, the appointment shall be made by the Superintendent General.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are we then to come to this conclusion, that if a band of Indians do not want to avail themselves of subsection 7 of section 110 they are now going to be or may be forced by the department, to nominate this representative on the board, and if they do not nominate, then the department itself nominates an Indian whether he wants to sit or not?

Mr. MURPHY: That is the act as at present in force, and as it has been for some ten years.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, but the minister forgets that he is now giving power to this board to nominate someone who must come before themselves. That is what we object to. Coming as I do from the ancient seat of Battleford where there are many Indians, naturally I am interested in them, and I cannot conceive of an Indian suggesting to the minister, and I cannot see where the minister in his travels ever got the suggestion, that the Indians wanted to be forced into the position that he is trying to put them in. I have learned to-day that the Indian, when he becomes enfranchised, as a treaty Indian loses his treaty rights. What is to hinder the department from enfranchising all Indians and taking away their treaty and all the privileges they have, whether they like it or not?

Mr. MURPHY: I think any responsible minister charged with the administration of the Indian Act, if he is a fit and proper person to administer the affairs of that department would never have such an idea in his mind as to force enfranchisement upon a body of Indians who were not fit for enfranchisement.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is the thing we are trying to prevent. Why should the minister be given that power?

Mr. MURPHY: For the reasons I endeavoured to give to the committee a few minutes ago, when I pointed out why this amendment is being asked for; simply because there are many Indians in Canada to-day who should accept full responsibility of citizenship, and are not doing so because of the privileges they enjoy by being classed as Indians.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then may I suggest, in order to take care of that individual, why can we not state in the act that when an Indian reaches a certain position he then must automatically become enfranchised?

Mr. MURPHY: That is exactly what this board is provided to determine.

Mr. VALLANCE: This board may go into the Poundmaker reserve and take twenty or thirty or fifty Indians or take none at all. They can pick whom they like. You have a board consisting of two men who are officials of the department with the possibility, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) says, of three appointed by the department, to force this on the Indian.

Mr. MURPHY: Not three members from the department.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, but you are going to have two, and another nominated by the department if the band does not choose one. I have had so much to do with the Indians and the problems facing the Indians in the disposition of the moneys that the Indian rightly thinks belong to him that I cannot conceive of the Indians as I know them even suggesting to the minister that this amendment be placed in the act.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think probably some of us have a different viewpoint.

Mr. VALLANCE: You have different Indians, that is the trouble.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is just what I was going to say. The Indians in my riding I think are probably ninety-nine per cent capable of conducting their business or exercising the franchise or anything else that the ordinary citizen of the community is capable of doing. I have some reason to believe, from conversation with others, that there are certain bands in the west and on the Pacific coast who have not that high intelligence and activity.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, it is not lack of intelligence, they are just as intelligent as your eastern Indians.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I say that that is what I have been informed. But some reference has been made by the ex-Minister of the Interior to the fact that they are wards of the government and have certain privileges. I think you have to go behind that a little. They exercise certain privileges because the government of the day is under certain obligations to them. We took the country from them, and the government pays them moneys in compensation, which moneys are doled out to the Indian at about $5 a month, and in times like these they think it is not sufficient, and it is not. A family of five gets $5 a month from the government, and we must remember that in times like these they are not given relief. They are wards of the Dominion government, and they are not given relief by the municipalities. As I endeavoured to point out the other day they are handicapped even when they go into the labour market. A year ago, when we were furnishing relief in the form of labour, the Indians could not get work because they are wards of the nation, and the other people in the community thought the Dominion government should look after them.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will this amendment to the act make it any easier for the Indians?

Mr. McGIBBON: I think so. I can only speak for my own district, but I think you will find that all the Indians in the constituency I represent will apply for enfranchisement right away.

Mr. NEILL: Why have they not done so before now?

Mr. McGIBBON: Perhaps it is a matter of education; perhaps they did not know they were entitled to do so. Really I cannot see any objection to the amendment. I think there should be an intelligence test, and I believe it should apply to others than Indians

Mr. POWER: To members of parliament.

Mr. McGIBBON: Perhaps. The colour line should not be the line of distinction; that is my point. There should be an intelligence test, and if an Indian is sufficiently capable and intelligent why should he not be given the right to vote and why should he not be liable for any debts he may contract? Why not give him the full power of citizenship, as the Minister of Justice said; why not allow him to sell and buy things, even liquor if he wants it? I think this legislation is along the right line, and I believe it should pass.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this another case of the iron heel?

Mr. NEILL: I think compulsory naturalization is a very dangerous thing, if that is what this amendment means. The minister admitted with some diffidence that this act will give him the power to enfranchise any Indian, and he explained the need for this power by pointing out cases of men who were in business. As the hon. member for North Bruce said, there would be no objection if the minister took that power only in regard to such people, but in answer to the hon. member the minister also said that he could apply it to entire bands if he so desired. When he was asked if he would apply it to Indians who did not want it he said their vigorous opposition would be taken into consideration. If the minister makes that statement in this house in view of the criticism which has been offered, it is quite evident that he realizes what is the fact, that he has absolute power to go out on a roving commission and enfranchise whom he likes. To quote scripture:

Whom he would he slew; and whom he would he kept alive.

Let us look at it from another point of view, a parallel case. There are a great many people in this country who are qualified for citizenship but who, for various reasons, do not avail themselves of that privilege. It would be a parallel case if we compelled these foreigners to become naturalized. If we can compel an Indian to become naturalized if that is the correct word, why should we not compel a Ukrainian or any other foreigner to accept the same responsibilities?

Mr. McGIBBON: They are responsible for their debts now.

Mr. NEIL: I am speaking of exercising the rights and privileges of citizens.

Mr. McGIBBON: They have most of the rights and privileges also.

Mr. NEIL: We talk largely of the advantages of being a Canadian citizen. Will we be proud to be associated with people who have been forced to become citizens? What will we think of the mental calibre and value of a citizen upon whom that privilege has been forced? This is a serious step to take, but if we do it in the one case we may be asked to do it in the other as well. Why not simply take this power in cases which can be enumerated in another subsection, covering those men who are in business and who are exercising all the privileges of a white man, and leaving out the members of the bands who are neither willing nor able to become naturalized?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was going to suggest that we might frame a section permitting the Indian himself to apply for the franchise and another section to carry out the intent of this proposed amendment, giving the Superintendent General power in certain cases. That would allow the Indian to make application, and in cases where such application is not made the Superintendent General could make application on behalf of the Indian. If a double barrelled section of that kind would meet the situation I think one might be drafted.

Mr. POWER: May I point out that a great deal of the objection from this side of the house has been to the compulsory enfranchisement of the Indians. An Indian has certain rights and privileges to which he is entitled. We took his country, and we owe him something. We came here and took away everything he had, and the least we can do is give him and his descendants some compensation in return. We have a treaty with him now, and I do not believe this parliament has the right, in justice and in common decency, to confer on the minister any power whatever to alter the terms of that treaty unless the Indian wants that step to be taken. The Indian has inherited certain privileges; he has become a ward of the government. He is not allowed to vote, presumably on the principle that there should be no taxation without representation. We say to him, however, "So long as you do not vote and do not become an ordinary citizen we will allow you to carry on as a ward of the government." Are we going to force him to vote? Are we going to take away from him the privileges which he has acquired traditionally and historically? I do not think we should do so, and I do not think the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice should be introduced.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before touching on the question involved in the amendment I should like to be clear on one point mentioned by the Minister of Justice, in regard to who actually is an Indian. I think the minister stated that an Indian was one who belonged to a band or an irregular band or who followed the Indian mode of life.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is a non-treaty Indian.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is what I want to have clear. My interpretation of the act—and I have been associated with Indians for the last fifty years and know a great deal about them—has been that an Indian who was a non-treaty Indian and did not follow the Indian mode of life was a citizen of Canada. I should like to be clear on that point.

In the country that has been referred to by my hon. friend from North Timiskaming there are two distinct tribes of Indians who have intermingled. As far as one can learn, originally the Ojibway band, a section of the Algonquin tribe, occupied the height of land and the country south of the height of land and north of the great lakes. The Cree Indians occupied the watershed of Hudson bay and James bay. The Cree Indians in the Hudson bay area were one of the last bands to become treaty Indians; I think some of them did so quite recently. Before they became treaty Indians, however, and before they were recognized by the department in any sense, hundreds of them migrated from the shores of Hudson bay to the line of the Transcontinental railway and further south to the lake shore, and from the day they came to that district, some fifty years ago, they no longer followed the mode of life of the Indian. They stepped right in beside the white man and became citizens of the country, building homes for themselves and taking positions in railroad service, as mechanics and so on. In the town in which I live there is an Indian community living in homes as good as my own. They run locomotives; they have become telegraph operators, machinists and so on. They never have been recognized as Indians in the ordinary sense, as migratory or bush Indians, as we term them, have been recognized. That brings me to the situation referred to by the hon. member for North Timiskaming, where there are two classes of Indians. One of these classes exercise the franchise, and they have always done so, because they have never been recognized as wards of the government. I go a step further. We have a large Indian school three miles from the town in which I live, where the children of treaty Indians are entitled to free education in keeping with an arrangement made throughout Canada with the different denominations of the churches to which the Indians happen to belong. Now, the children of these Cree Indians are not entitled to the privileges of that Indian school, but their parents pay taxes to the public or the separate school as the case may be and they attend the school wherever it is located.

What is the situation with regard to these people? The term "following the Indian mode of life" has been applied to them although they do not follow that mode of life. People commonly understand what that mode of life is; it means either that the Indians live on the reserve or that they are taking advantage of the privileges granted them to go hunting and fishing wherever they can. That is a point that should be definitely cleared up.

I come next to the question of the franchise. It is a fact that these Cree Indians have not for half a century followed the Indian mode of life but have lived after the manner of the white man, taking their position side by side with him and accepting all the responsibilities involved. One hon. gentleman referred to Indians who had gone overseas, and I believe I have stated in this house before that you could comb the country from the Mattawa river to the mountain line of Manitoba in 1917 and you could not find an adult Indian of military age and physically fit who had not volunteered to go overseas. But what is the situation when we come to enforce enfranchisement? The state is spending, to my personal knowledge, large sums of money on these Indian schools to train the boys and girls and fit them, not for the Indian mode of life but in order that they may, as their rights and privileges are taken away, and their opportunities disappear, step up alongside you or me or anyone else and take their position as Canadian citizens. But suppose they refuse to do this after all that has been done for them? I personally know of two girls who graduated from the Indian school in Chapleau. They were put through high school by the Indian department, through normal school by the Indian department, and they became qualified as school teachers, so that they are now teaching school in the southern part of Ontario in a settlement where all the children are white. Ultimately these young women will marry. There are men doing the same thing. In Chapleau, a young man, graduate of the Indian school and of the high school, takes a position in a bank or in a store or somewhere else. Should he not assume the responsibilities of citizenship when that has been done for him?

I know the Indians; at least I know two bands of Indians, having lived amongst them, and I know that they will be perfectly satisfied to allow their case to rest in the hands of the Indian department.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, they won't.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I speak only of those I know, and I have had a lot to do with them. All this talk about the Indian department setting up a tribunal that will go among the bands of Indians and take some family and say to them, "You must be enfranchised," is all rot in my opinion. I have had a good deal to do with the Indian department, for I was a member of the commission that approached that department many years ago and made the joint arrangement under which these schools from one end of Canada to the other are being carried on. The interest of the Indian department in the Indians, and the sympathetic manner in which they have dealt and are dealing with these people, are in my judgment a guarantee as to whether the rights of the Indians will be transgressed or not in any part of Canada. But after all these things have been done for them, if they insist on accepting one position that has been provided and refuse the other, then the Indian department should be clothed with responsibility and should say to them, "Now that we have brought you to this stage you must accept your responsibilities." I think the Minister of Justice should make that point clear with regard to these people. I know from personal knowledge that hundreds of them for the last forty or fifty years have been following the ordinary life of the white man and have not lived as Indians in any sense whatever. I am not a lawyer but I understand that the statute makes reference to treaty Indians, Indians living on a reserve, members of a band of Indians, or an irregular band, or men and women following the Indian's mode of life. But these people have not been following that mode of life in this generation, and many did not do so in the last.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wish to say a word or two in answer to some remarks made by my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson). There is a clear distinction between the rights in this country of what is known as the non-treaty Indian and those of the Indian as defined by the Indian Act. The treaty Indian obtained his rights as a result of treaties which were made, by which the government of this country agreed, as my hon. friend from Quebec South said, to give to the Indian certain protection in return for what was taken away from him. The non-treaty Indian stands in a different class; he belongs to what is known as an irregular band. That is a band that does not hold lands under location ticket, which is the way Indians belonging to bands hold their lands in this country. The non-treaty Indian belongs to an irregular band which has no land, and he is known as an Indian largely by the fact that he follows the Indian mode of life. He may be only a temporary resident in Canada.

Personally I would not object to the amendment which has been proposed being made applicable to non-treaty Indians because the country does not owe them the same obligations that were imposed upon the government by the treaties with the treaty Indians. There is a clear distinction. It is a breach of faith if the government of this country goes back on the rights which the Indians thought they obtained under their treaty, not merely with respect to the privileges that have been referred to but with respect to what I regard as the greatest privilege of all which the Indian enjoys, namely, his privilege of being protected against the guile and cunning of the white man who makes certain deals with him that are not in his interest. That is why the Indian Act was drawn as it is. That is the reason that in this country we have not the right to issue execution against the lands of an Indian who is not a non-treaty Indian. Living on the border of a couple of reserves as I have done for many years, and knowing very intimately the difficulties in which the Indian becomes involved at the hands of the not-too-scrupulous white man, I say it is a grave breach of the fundamental principles that underlie the treaty between the representatives of the people of this country and the Indians if you compulsorily take out of that class people who have for generations had that protection and say to them, "We will now compel you to become ordinary citizens and, whether you want it or not, to accept the obligations and responsibilities of white people to whom we owe no obligation such as we owe to you under our treaties." Every hon. member who lives near the borders of a reserve knows that some very attractive lands have been set aside for the Indians. These lands are particularly attractive because of the waters which run through them or the timber or the grasses which grow upon them. These lands are a credit to the people who selected them for the Indians. Certain portions of these lands may be wanted for timber or for pasture. The protection which the Indian has had in the past will be taken away by this amendment. Previously no man could obtain a lease of any land from an Indian without first having it approved by the Indian department. I do not think the minister realized what he was doing by removing this safeguard from the Indian. It is proposed to give him this land in fee simple and not to have it held in trust by the government.

Mr. MURPHY: Enfranchisement will be given only after a proper investigation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: After it has been obtained in a way never hitherto intended.

Mr. MURPHY: Pardon me, a similar amendment was passed in 1920.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MURPHY: I beg the hon. member's pardon, it was.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister does not get my point. This amendment contains for the first time the evil of which I complain. By it, an Indian can be compelled against his own will to be enfranchised and to be made liable to have his land and his chattels taken in execution. I ask the committee to listen to the provisions of the previous subsection, which reads:

> Upon the application of an Indian of any band, or upon the application of a band on a vote of a majority of the male members of such band of the full age of twenty-one years at a meeting or council thereof summoned for that purpose, according to the rules of the band and held in the presence of the Superintendent General or of an officer duly authorized to attend such council, by the governor in council or by the Superintendent General, a board may be appointed by the Superintendent General to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

It is proposed that the following be substituted for that subsection:

> The Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of two officers of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised.

The action would not be a voluntary one by the Indian, it would be compulsory and would be in violation of all treaties. The government would cease to be the protector of the Indian. He would be left at the mercy of crafty and designing people who wished to make contracts with him. It would be possible to obtain a judgment against an Indian which would have consequences which were not possible formerly. There has never been a time when the people need as much protection against sheriffs and executions. There has never been a time when the privileges enjoyed by our people, whether white people or Indians should be more carefully guarded than now. This action would be a terrible mistake and a breach of faith against this great body of people.

Many of the prizes given at the ploughing matches in western Ontario are won by Indian boys and by older Indians. These people are very capable in many ways but they are not so capable of taking care of themselves in the making of contracts. They should not be robbed of the protection that has been thrown round them for generations. In some cases they need to be protected from their own improvidence. I would follow the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to this extent, that this amendment should be limited to non-treaty Indians. We do not owe them the same obligation that we owe to the treaty Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think the Minister of Justice suggested that it should apply only to non-treaty Indians.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the minister had been listening to me he would know that I did not suggest that the Minister of Justice made that statement. I am making a suggestion that it should be limited to non-treaty Indians because otherwise we would be guilty of a breach of the treaty. The Minister of Justice thought that a compromise might be arrived at and he suggested that they should be left the right to make application for enfranchisement and that there would also be the power in certain cases to compel them to accept enfranchisement. My suggestion is that the right of compelling enfranchisement should be limited to the non-treaty Indians. We should not go back on the obligations we undertook years ago to the ancestors of the present Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is in error when he makes the statement that this is the first time that such an amendment has been proposed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the minister will pardon me, I said that this subsection—

Mr. MURPHY: I did not interrupt my hon. friend and he should allow me to complete my remarks. He is in error when he says that this is the first time the proposal has been made to give this power to the Superintendent General and the department. This same amendment was passed in 1920 and it remained upon the statute books of this country for two years.

Mr. DUPUIS: Why was it withdrawn?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know what motives actuated the minister at that time in taking that action. In order to make some progress and to meet the suggested amendment of the Minister of Justice, perhaps this section could stand for the time being.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): How many Indians were enfranchised during the past two years?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the figures for the last two years, I have them only for the last ten-year period. I do not think any Indians were enfranchised during the last two years under this section; they were enfranchised under section 114, not under 110.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Is there a waiting list for the coming year?

Mr. MURPHY: There is not, under this section; there have been some applications made under section 114.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have in my constituency the first colony composed entirely of graduates of the various Indian schools throughout the west. This colony has made great advancement in agricultural pursuits during the past thirty years. The main grievance I have from the members of this colony, especially on behalf of the sons of returned men, is that they have not been able to be enfranchised fast enough. An hon. member referred to that and a real question arises there. The sons of men who fought in the war and whose fathers are enfranchised by reason of their war service, are now in a number of cases of age and yet cannot vote. That is something I should like to see dealt with more satisfactorily than under this blanket clause whereby the minister and his officers can, in a wholesale way, take young Indians and old, and, just before an election, manufacture a lot of votes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Very dangerous.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am astonished at my hon. friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This would be the restoration of methods that prevailed many years ago, but in Saskatchewan we find the chief Conservative organizer, not on the relief commission, but administering the act as manager. If hon. members want to know his name, it is C. B. Daniels and a capable officer, but before he got the position he was chief Tory organizer in southern Saskatchewan. So we are just a little afraid that Saskatchewan methods may meander down here and be invoked by this government. I would ask the minister not to put himself into that position, because I do not believe he wants to be put in it. That is exactly what may happen, however.

Another point is that these Indians who have been dispossessed of their property, by force if you like, but more humanely in Canada than in any other country, are going to be weaned at a time the most difficult I can remember to be put on their own. I have been telling these young men who are anxious to be enfranchised, that they are better off to-day than the white man. They have their schools near by, hospitals, medical services and an advisory foreman over them. They have every possible aid of which one can conceive. Now at this time when nobody can make a living on the farm, or at least nobody can pay his debts or replace his machinery, the government, under the guise of enfranchising these Indians, is going to shove them on their own wholesale. There must be some compelling force behind this enfranchisement conception under those inhuman conditions to which I have referred. I cannot conceive of any of them wanting the franchise on such terms as having to pay taxes and so on like the white man and hustling around under conditions that are very difficult, even though they do not start with any debts. I would ask my hon. friend not to have such terms embodied in this section. Let us give the young men as well as the old the right of initiative in making their own reforms. No individual can become a member of a band without the consent of its council. If an Indian from some other reserve wants to become a member of a band, he has to obtain the consent of the majority in it. When my hon. friend is looking into this matter, let him consider also the situation of the wives of these returned men. Nobody knows whether they have votes or not. In some places they vote; in others they do not. What about the wives of any of the Indians who are going to be enfranchised? Why should the franchise be confined to the males only? The Indian women are frequently better workers than the males.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They support the men.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course. As the saying goes: The woman is the better man of the two. They certainly deserve as much recognition as do the males in regard to enfranchisement, and they are quite as capable of exercising it intelligently. I think the minister should leave the section as it is, that is, preserve the right of voluntary enfranchisement.

Mr. EULER: In the constituency which I represent there are no Indians, either treaty or otherwise, and I rise to say a few words only on behalf of what I regard as a very definite principle. The term "treaty Indians" has been used. That implies, to me at least, although I have no extensive knowledge of this particular subject, that some sort of contract has been made with those Indians. If such a contract has been made, surely it is not right for one party to it to break it without the consent of the other, or, in other words, to treat it as a scrap of paper of which we heard so much in days gone by.

Moreover, I am constitutionally opposed to anything in the nature of compulsion. I do not like the thought that men shall become naturalized against their will. Further, if they have not a sufficient appreciation of the rights of the franchise, of citizenship, to make the application themselves, I doubt very much whether it is worth while to make them citizens. I would add this as a qualification: If you are going to do that, I see no reason, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, why you should make a distinction, naturalizing Indians because they are worthy of being citizens, intelligent, industrious, and should assume all the responsibilities as well as possess all the advantages of citizenship, and not apply the same rule in the case of foreigners who have been in this country for five years or more, who have all the qualifications of citizenship and who yet do not avail themselves of their right to become naturalized. I might even go so far as this, that as regards men from other countries, I do not care where they come from, from the white countries if you like, from the countries of Europe, who have made Canada their permanent home and who for some reason do not become naturalized, it ought to be brought to their attention that it is their duty to assume all the responsibilities of citizenship. I should not make naturalization difficult in cases of that kind. Perhaps I am going a little too far afield in saying that. Instead of making it difficult for these men to become naturalized if they are willing to become citizens, I would make it easy.

I rose more particularly to dwell upon what my deskmate said a moment or two ago. I do not ordinarily attribute sinister motives to anyone. I remember very well some seven or eight years ago when the Hon. Mr. Copp, who is now in the Senate, was Secretary of State and as such introduced an amendment to the Naturalization Act under which the Secretary of State was empowered to naturalize those who applied instead of the procedure before the judges as is the case at present. I recall what severe resistance was offered by our Conservative friends who were then in opposition. They gave as their reason that it would be very easy, just prior to an election, for a secretary of state, at the behest of a government that naturally wanted to be reelected, to naturalize these foreigners in shoals and hordes, in hundreds and thousands, knowing all the time they would vote in a way that would be advantageous to the government. I do not say that would be done in this case, but as my hon. friend to my right says, it becomes possible for a government so to act. The amendment was withdrawn. The only reason that has been given by the minister for the introduction of this amendment is that there are a few Indians who have refused to pay their just obligations and who have taken refuge behind their privileges. I would say to him: While that argument may be sound, I do not think it is of sufficient importance; I do not think the instances would be so numerous—I believe they would be very few—as to justify him in breaking a sacred treaty with those Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: A moment ago I asked that this clause might stand in order that the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice might be considered and we might make some progress. I have no desire to shut off discussion; further discussion may be had at the next sitting. Perhaps we would make greater progress with another clause.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Section 7 stands.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask the minister when this clause will be reconsidered.

Mr. MURPHY: On the next government day, when it is called or appears on the order paper.

Section stands.

Mr. MURPHY: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Shall I report progress?

Mr. DUPUIS: Before this motion is decided I should like to say a few words concerning it. I am afraid that this—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I suggest that the motion to report progress is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—INSPECTION OF CANNED SALMON

STATEMENT OF MR. NEILL ON MOTION OF MR. GUTHRIE FOR COMMITTEE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about a subject of considerable importance to the fishing industry of British Columbia. My remarks arise from the passing on the third day of this month of order in council No. 206. I should like to discuss the matter from two angles, first the ostensible reason put forward for its passage and then I should like to state what I believe to be the real and ulterior motive behind it.

Before doing that however I should like to deal with the method of introducing the order in council. Although it was passed on February 3, it was not gazetted until fifteen days later, namely on February 18. However the public was, so to speak, privately advised of it, and hon. members from British Columbia who were here at the seat of government had to get their information that the order in council had become law from the newspapers published in the west, which were sent to us from British Columbia. While the order in council is vital to the fishing interests, it was actually passed under the authority of the Meat and Canned Foods Act. A section of that act is devoted to fishing matters, and is under the control of the Minister of Fisheries. I suggest therefore that the responsibility for the passing of this order in council is his.

I should like to give three reasons why it should not have been introduced in that way. In the first place the matter to which I have reference should never have been introduced as an order in council. It was of sufficient importance to be introduced as a bill. We are all familiar with the law—I believe it is a law—that regulations under an act must be confined entirely to amplifying or carrying out the purposes of that act, and that it is ultra vires by way of order in council to introduce that which is practically a new law. We are told that any change of that kind must be brought about by means of a new act. Comment is often made by hon. members on both sides of the house that the party sitting opposite is merely rubber stamping the opinions of the government or of the opposition as the case may be. That may be so, but at least on such occasions we are rubber stamping opinions and policies decided either in a meeting of the cabinet, at a party caucus or at a convention. But there is another aspect in connection with which we are all equally guilty, and which constitutes a worse form of rubber stamping. The government brings a bill before the house under which it takes power to pass regulations; thereafter all our responsibility and control seems to disappear. We simply come here and find that the government has rubber stamped the views and opinions of one or two officials, that action has been taken in secrecy and without any publicity. If that is not rubber stamping carried to excess, I do not know what it is.

In 1932, about a year ago, there was a complete revision of the Fisheries Act. That matter was referred to the marine and fisheries committee, and under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) good work was done. A considerable part of the work in that committee was merely that of revision. But in addition some new sections were introduced, passed and reported to the house. But not one of those new sections, or even the whole of them put together, had the importance of this order in council which has now been slipped through without publicity of any kind. All that work was done, and now we find an order in council is passed which might possibly vitiate some of the most important parts of the act itself.

I object, again, to the fact that the order in council was passed when the house was sitting. About the year 1923 a resolution was passed in the marine and fisheries committee of which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) was chairman. That resolution was to the effect—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that the committee requested or recommended—the language was not more imperative than that—that if the department proposed to put through any order in council relating to fishery matters while the house was sitting, the committee should first be advised. The idea was that parliament was paramount, and that while parliament was sitting and the committee was sitting it would be wise and well that any material changes proposed to be enacted by order in council should receive the investigation of the committee. I submit that the change to which I shall refer is very material, and should have been referred to that committee. There could have been no rush, because the action proposed to be taken could not possibly be taken for three months, and more likely about four and a half months. There was no excuse for the secret rush—because I believe that is the way to describe it.

My third objection is that it is a breach of good faith with the whole fishing industry of British Columbia. In the last eight or nine years a most admirable practice has grown up in the department, whereby the minister or his deputy has visited British Columbia once a year, mostly in the early days of December. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) came one year, and we were pleased to see him. On such occasions the deputy minister holds meetings at three or four of the principal points in British Columbia. An agenda is prepared beforehand, and any person, whether he be rich or poor, canner-man or fisherman, is entitled to place his views before the meeting. All people are welcome, canner-men, fishermen and dealers. The result is that the officials receive an idea of the feelings in the industry. The meetings have been found so satisfactory that a practice has grown up, established by long usage, that unless a matter has been discussed at one of the meetings it will not, except in very urgent cases, be made the subject of legislation during the coming year. That met the objection that was so common for many years that the government had a habit, influenced perhaps by political or other considerations, of passing orders in council and legislation of that kind at the very last minute. The canneries were embarrassed by these regulations coming in the last minute before the season began; the fishermen did not know what regulations they had to comply with; so it became a well established rule that unless it was something of extreme urgency, nothing that had not been discussed at these meetings would become the subject of orders in council for the ensuing season. That has been carried out for eight or nine years with very good results. It was departed from on one occasion last year, a matter of political influence, very much to be regretted, and here we have another departure and a very much worse one. Last year when the deputy was out in December he had four meetings at least, five possibly, and discussed matters fully. The agenda I am of course quite familiar with. There was nothing in the agenda about this subject, it was never brought up at any of the meetings, the deputy minister never heard of it as far as we know, and no hint was given of anything of the kind. Early in January I heard a whisper —these things do leak out—that an attempt was to be made to put over this legislation —and "put over" is precisely the language to use. I wrote to the department on the 13th of January and got an answer dated the 20th of January which indicates that my letter was the first intimation that had reached the department about this matter. Then it goes on to say that the requirement that none other than salmon in perfect condition should be placed in cans was being well taken care of through the inspection of canned fish. Well, that reassured me; I was satisfied then that there was nothing in the whispers that I had heard.

So that on January 20 the department had no intention of legislating along the lines of the order in council which it passed two weeks later. I do not suppose they get up before breakfast to pass an order in council; it must have been a matter of consideration, possibly of correspondence. At any rate within two weeks after the date on which the department assured me there was nothing in the wind the order in council was actually signed by His Excellency—without publicity, and it was not put into the Gazette until fifteen days later. Why was no notice given the industry? Why were the independent canners, who were going to be deeply affected, not advised? Why were the fishermen, whose livelihood was imperilled to a large extent, not advised? I might even say, why was I not advised, considering that I had been assured fourteen days before that there was nothing in it at all? I think it would have been only fair to advise me of this sudden change of principle and policy and as to what their intentions were. I keep asking myself again and again, why was this thing perpetrated? Why? Why? Well, sir, I can answer my own question. For the same reason that a burglar operates in the dark; it had to be put over in the dark because it could not be done in the daylight. The least breath of publicity, the merest ray of light thrown upon it, would have killed it. Now I want to be perfectly fair. Sometimes I am accused of not being fair, but I am. I see the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) quite agrees with my contention, though I do not know which one it is he agrees with. I am sure it is the first one. At any rate I want to be fair to-day, and I will say that the defence given by the department—I do not know if I am paying them a compliment when I say defence—is this, that the order in council dealt with the inspection of canned salmon, and as this inspection of canned salmon is a matter wholly concerning the canners it was not necessary to take it up at these meetings on the coast attended by fishermen and others, and therefore all I have said about not passing legislation that was not considered at these meetings was beside the mark. Yes, it is true that ostensibly it deals only with canned salmon inspection regulations, and if that was true in its entirety, then consulting the canners alone would have sufficed. But it is a terrible and obvious quibble. The nature of this regulation is such that it becomes of vital and desperate importance to the fishermen, and that places it in the category of the things that should have been discussed at the fishermen's meetings. So that dissipates that defence.

To sum up: First, this legislation should have been introduced by an act; second, it should have been referred to the marine and fisheries committee then sitting; and third, it was a breach of the established policy that had been carried out for years and years with the fishing industry in British Columbia.

Now having dealt with the circumstances surrounding the illegitimate birth of this—might I call it—piscatorial foundling, let us devote ourselves to some consideration of the reasons alleged in support of its original conception. Ostensibly it was introduced to strengthen the government regulations dealing with the inspection of canned salmon. Years ago the government found it necessary, and properly so, to install a system of government inspection and guarantee of canned salmon. The question immediately arose as to how to accomplish that inspection. Two ways were suggested. A number of people recommended, and I think I supported them, that it could best be done by having one inspector at every cannery. He would stand there, he would see the fish as it came in; it would matter not to him where it came from or how long it had been caught, or anything else; all he would be guided by would be his judgment of the actual state of the fish. If the fish were bad he would say: That fish must not be canned. If he gave his approval to it being canned—he was there in the plant and would have followed every detail of the procedure; it is a well known process—at the end of the process he would be able in all sincerity to give a certificate that it was of the first class. That would have been the best idea, but the government found it to be too costly. I agree with them; possibly it was. So they decided upon the other method—there were practically only two between which to choose—that is making the test on the canned product. I emphasize that because my whole objection turns upon it. The government decided that the inspection would be made on the canned product. So many tins would be opened and the inspector would pass judgment on it, just as you do in the case of fruit or other articles. Now last April the government in pursuance of this policy introduced by order in council under the Meat and Canned Foods Act a considerable number of regulations dealing with the inspection of canned salmon. It will be recalled that I objected very strenuously to some of them, not that I objected to the system, but I said they were unworkable, ill calculated to achieve the object they professed to serve. Of course no attention was paid to my protest; they were declared to be perfect. The impression was given that they were inspired. Well, Mr. Speaker, they may have been inspired, but I do not think they were divinely inspired. The inspiration came from a less exalted source. To use the vernacular, I have since got quite a kick out of the subsequent results of those supposedly inspired regulations that could not be improved upon and were the very last word. The thing became, as I had predicted, a joke—simply and plainly a joke. A gentleman came out from London, England, one of the biggest buyers of canned salmon in the world—and that is a big word. He had a very big order with him. He expressed in plain English, very emphatic language that I could hardly repeat here, his opinion of the intelligence and mental capacity of anyone who would consider those regulations suitable or useful. He said that for his part he was not going to buy a case of salmon unless it passed the inspector arranged by himself. Since then I have received information from a gentleman of some standing in Australia who complained that the regulations had lent themselves to direct abuse. That was in the early days, before the regulations were amended. He said they encouraged people to take salmon of an inferior grade to Australia, where it was sold as the very best, and a little later I will quote from his letter.

Perhaps the best proof of the futility of these regulations can be shown by the way the department treated its love child. The regulations were put in operation ten months ago, and since then they have been amended five times. The original regulations covered two and a half columns of the Gazette, but the five amendments or additions made since then extend to some five and a third columns. In other words it has been found necessary to patch or add to this good and godly garment until the patches cover the garment not once but two and a half times. That will give us some idea of the adequacy of the original regulations. These amendments were made to a very considerable extent along the lines I advocated. Of course they did not follow my recommendations too closely; that would not have done at all. There is such a thing as saving the face of the department, and it would not have done to give me an opportunity to say "I told you so" too plainly. At any rate the amendments were substantially along the lines I suggested. Finally the officials thought the regulations were now all right, at least they thought so until three weeks ago, when they threw this order in council into the works and upset everything again. Let me quote the letter of the department dealing with these regulations:

. . . it may be said, without the possibility of successful contradiction, . . .

That is a brave statement.

. . . that the fact that the original regulations and the amendments thereto have been accepted with remarkably near unanimity by the canners, is in itself an evidence of the efficiency of the regulations.

Is it really? It is to laugh. It might also be held to be evidence of the fact that the reglations were so ineffective that the people concerned did not bother to complain of them. It might be taken to mean that they were glad to get the appearance of government endorsation of their product even though the regulations were so feeble and ineffective that they did not impose any restriction on them. Suppose I were asked to formulate a set of regulations to deal with a case of smuggling, and later I had to make a report. I might say, "Well, I have a set of regulations that have worked like a charm. The smugglers are perfectly satisfied with them." Would that be considered an evidence of efficiency? I rather doubt it, yet that is all it amounts to. For evidence of that kind I would rather look to statements by buyers and wholesalers in other countries. I would look to see if these Englishmen were content to accept the government inspection and no longer insist on their own inspection.

At any rate, that is the official attitude. We have further endorsation from British Columbia. The chief supervisor of fisheries is quoted as follows:

It has proved a notable success and has been welcomed by overseas buyers, especially in Great Britain and Australia.

Then I see a long article in the Pacific Fisherman, a well known fisheries paper, in which the chief supervisor is quoted as follows:

The results, he said, have been in general highly satisfactory, and the buying trade has been well pleased;—

Then follow endorsations by two or three of the leading cannery operators in British Columbia. That must have been a red letter day for the chief supervisor of fisheries. In addition to having his views recorded on one page, I find on an adjoining page a really pretty photograph of him attired in the most up-to-date golfing togs and associating with some of the leading cannery operators on the coast, an attitude which I think is highly symbolic. It was rather curious to hear the chief supervisor talk about the results being so satisfactory in Australia, because I have in my hand a letter written last November by a man who says he is the representative of a large merchandising business in Australia, the name of which he mentions. He says:

For some time past, several merchants have been relabelling salmon, mostly pinks, and naming them reds and distributing them as reds. The practice, apart from its dishonesty and misrepresentation, was causing bona fide traders concern, especially those who would not practise the deception.

Then in a letter he sent to the government of Australia he says:

I understand the federal government of Canada was trying to make it an offence under the pure foods department or health act, but the results are very disappointing.

But the chief supervisor says he has had word that the results are very satisfactory.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. gentleman mind letting me see that letter?

Mr. NEILL: Certainly. Part of it is a personal letter to myself, but I know my hon. friend will treat it as such.

Among the regulations passed last April was one establishing a board of inspectors. I objected to that system very strongly, because it appeared that these inspectors who were liable to condemn the packs of the canners to the extent of thousands of dollars were to be nominated, appointed and paid by the canners themselves. Is it any wonder that I objected to a system of that kind? I have in my hand a clipping from the journal published by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which comment is made on the system of inspecting meat in Australia. I find these words:

All these inspectors are salaried officers of the commonwealth government entirely independent of the proprietors of the meat works.

Is that not the proper way? How would it look if this same journal, published by the government, in explaining the system of salmon inspection had to say that these inspectors were nominated, appointed and paid by the canners themselves? What weight has an inspection conceived and carried on in this way? I will say, however, as I said in April last, that by chance or otherwise the first men appointed to the board were good, capable, competent and reliable men, whose integrity and honesty is unquestioned. I am not saying a word against them. I said then, and I repeat, that I would be quite satisfied with their judgment as such, but I do condemn the system. We left it to the judgment of these good men; we said to them, "You will look at this salmon. If in your judgment it is good you will pass it." Here are the exact words of the order in council defining the duties of these men; it is subsection 27 (a):

Canned salmon that are found by the board of inspection to be fresh, firm, well-packed and in good, merchantable condition, shall be approved and a certificate in the form attached marked A shall be issued therefor.

If the inspector found that the fish was in that condition in the tin, fresh, firm, well-packed and in good, merchantable condition, he would issue the certificate, but if he did not issue the certificate, if it were anything inferior to that standard, it had to be marked second quality, and that absolutely damned the sale of it, because you cannot sell canned fish marked second quality.

That was the section under which these men acted; it was within their sound judgment as to whether the fish complied with that requirement. Now I come to the order in council which was passed on February 3 last. It simply added a proviso to the words I have just read, as follows:

Provided that no certificate shall be issued for canned salmon that had not been landed fresh at a cannery for canning within twenty-four hours after being caught, excepting fish that has been gutted and iced immediately after being caught.

They have their tenses mixed; it is not even grammatical. However we will let that go. You will observe that it stipulates that the fish must be landed at the cannery fresh for canning within twenty-four hours of being caught. It does not say that it must be canned within twenty-four hours, so that vitiates the usefulness of the whole provision right there, to say nothing of other reasons that might be advanced. It may be landed at the cannery within twenty-four hours, but the fish may lie there for another twelve hours to suit the convenience of the cannery man, because there is nothing to prevent that being done.

In the preamble of the order in council it is stated:

Whereas the acting Minister of Fisheries, on the advice of the deputy Minister of Fisheries and the responsible officers of the department, and with the approval—

With the approval of whom?

—of the salmon canners, recommends that, etc. . . .

It is with the approval of the salmon canners, the very people whose goods are to be inspected and perhaps severely dealt with. That order in council creates an absolute departure from the principles that the government had already laid down. Formerly the test was simply the appearance and condition of the fish. The question that had to be decided was, did it comply with that stipulation that it should be fresh, firm, well-packed and in good merchantable condition. It was left to the judgment of competent, experienced, reliable men. They did not have to consider the history of the salmon or its pedigree or ancestry, or where it came from or anything else. It might have come from California or Mexico or the Arctic pole; all they had to do was to use their judgment and determine whether it was of the required quality. If it did they would approve; if not, they would not. What is the situation now? They may be perfectly prepared to approve it; the fish may come up to every word of that requirement; but if in addition to that it is not proved that the fish has been delivered at the cannery within twenty-four hours of its being caught then it must be condemned.

Now how are these men to know whether the fish has been delivered within that time or not? It might have been delivered within ten hours of being caught and still it might be the duty of the inspector on inspection to condemn it; that would be quite understandable. But what is the test? Is it delivery within twenty-four hours of the fish being caught, or is the test to be the question whether or not the fish comes up to the stipulated requirement that it shall be fresh, firm, well-packed and in good merchantable condition? There is no question at all that in the final analysis this last is the principle on which the inspectors must act. If it is bad, it is the inspector's duty to condemn it even though the fish may have been put into the tin alive. But if on the other hand the inspector finds that it is perfectly good, quite fresh and of the highest quality, he cannot give a certificate unless it can be proved that the fish was landed at a cannery within twenty-four hours of being caught. Now I should like to know how any inspector can get that information? Why the need for this sudden and violent change of policy, changing the whole system right round, from the inspection of the canned product to a question as to the time within which the fish has been delivered at the cannery?

The system was lovely; the department at Ottawa said so. The chief supervisor in British Columbia says so, and he is the last word as an authority on fish, certainly in his own opinion. This was not asked for by the officials; at any rate it was not asked for by them as late as January 20, because I have the letter right here. It was not asked for by the board of inspectors. Now would you not have expected to find the inspectors taking part in this and approving of the order in council? Yet there is no record in the order in council, in the correspondence or anywhere else to show that they were either interested in, or invited to express any opinion on the subject. They did not ask for it, and it would have been remarkable had they done so, because it would have been admitting openly an obvious reflection on their ability and intelligence. Who then did ask for this change in the system? It was not the department; it was not the inspectors; it was not the fishermen. I will tell you who did ask for it. According to the letter from the department, strong representations were made to the department on behalf of those who put up over ninety per cent of the canned product—not ninety per cent of the canners, but those who put up ninety per cent of the canned product, which might have represented two or three companies——that the existing inspection requirements that canned salmon must be fresh, firm, well packed and in good merchantable condition to be entitled to a certificate were not sufficient.

And it had to be buttressed up in the way I have indicated. Why did they ask this? Were they dissatisfied with the judgment of their own inspectors whom they themselves had recommended so strongly only ten months before? Was there any reason for dissatisfaction with them? Had any word come back from the markets in Britain and elsewhere that the fish was not in proper condition and that the regulation as it stood was inadequate? No sign or evidence of that at all. I will give the real reasons in a moment.

Let us consider how this requirement will work, or rather not work. How will it be carried out? Is there to be an inspector on every little boat, a man who will stand there and put a tag on every salmon as it comes on board, or how will he know? Are you going to make the fisherman, when he comes to the cannery, take an oath as to how long this particular fish or that other fish has been out of the water? I have a vision of a man coming in with twenty or thirty fish and taking an oath that these eighteen fish over here had been caught sixteen hours, those six with the curly tails had been caught a couple of hours later, and as to this other lot over here, well perhaps they had been caught twenty-five hours but he was on daylight saving time while the officials were on standard time, so perhaps that would make it all right. Or are you going to require an oath of the cannery man? Of what use would that be? He could not know. He could only repeat what the fisherman had told him. I am not impugning the honour or integrity of the cannery man, but we all know that in any rank of life if you make it compulsory for people to swear to stereotyped statements it will simply mean that some bookkeeper will say, "Here Bill, sign this thing," and Bill will sign it, although he does not know what it refers to. I have known cases—and I am not referring now to the fish business—where one man has been required to sign something and in his absence someone else has signed his name.

I contend therefore that this provision will be entirely superficial. It will be entirely useless, and stereotyped statements forced in that way are of little value anyhow. I want you to note this also. The inspector may be perfectly willing to O.K. the fish but he has to have evidence that they were landed on the wharf twenty-four hours after they were caught. How is he to get it? He must get it or else the whole thing must be a joke and never intended to be enforced. I rather suspect that, in this aspect of it, and I intend to suggest a real reason. How is this thing going to be done? The order in council which I read contains no provision by which it can be carried out. The order in council was passed on February 3, four months before it was needed, and yet no method was suggested for carrying out its provisions. How is he to find out whether the fish was caught within the time? It is unworkable and it is superfluous. It would be superfluous if it were not unworkable and it would be unworkable if it were not superfluous—it is both.

The argument is used that after all twenty-four hours is a long time and a considerable distance can be covered in that period. Time is a comparative thing. If a man is to be hanged, twenty-four hours is a different measure of time than if he is going to be married. It is said that you can go two hundred miles in twenty-four hours, but that means eight and a quarter miles per hour which would require a faster boat than is generally used. Fish cannot be caught like you would go into a store to buy a pound of butter. Fishing is not one incidental, isolated action, it may take twelve or fifteen hours to get a load. If the first part of the load happens to be just within the twenty-four hours, the latter must be within the eight or ten hours. Such a provision would impose a hardship upon the fishermen. Then, as every fisherman knows, it depends entirely upon how the catch is handled. An inspector might properly reject fish which had been only ten hours out of the water. So many factors enter into this matter; there is the variety of fish and the conditions under which they are caught, the weather, icing and so on.

The fish must be landed upon the cannery wharf within twenty-four hours, but only landed. What use is that? The idea in mind is supposed to be quality, but how can the quality be improved by insisting that the fish be landed upon the wharf within twenty-four hours after being caught and then permitting them to remain upon the wharf twenty-four hours more. There is no provision to take care of that possibility. The only provision is that the fish must be landed upon the wharf within twenty-four hours.

It is a well known fact to those who know, and the men behind this movement do know, that some fish carry much better than others. I am told that sockeye carry much better in the round, that is, unopened and ungutted, than other fish do even when gutted and iced. There is something about sockeye which makes them carry better without opening. They do not feed immediately before being caught and are not full of what is called red feed which ferments and decays. Let me quote from a practical canneryman, as follows:

> It is a fact that sockeyes for instance carry better in the round than any other species of salmon, having no feed in them, and we are prepared to guarantee that we will land sockeyes properly iced in the round seventy-two hours after being caught in better condition than similar fish landed twenty-four hours after being caught which have not been properly cared for and iced.

To my own knowledge I know that that is true. As I said before, the conditions imposed by the order in council are superfluous, useless and unworkable. I doubt very much if there will be any genuine attempt made to enforce them. It will be a dead letter, there are no teeth in it as regards its ostensible purpose.

I shall now deal with the other purposes of the regulation and to do this I shall have to go back a little into the history of the canning industry of British Columbia. Many years ago there were no canneries, the waters were open to everyone and to everything. Certain men began to can and it was thought desirable to encourage them. The thing was an uncertain venture and the government quite properly gave them the exclusive rights to large bodies of water. I am not kicking against that action because I probably would have done the same thing as there did not seem to be any reason at that time for not doing it. Unfortunately, where you create a monopoly, in time you lead to favouritism and graft. The worst feature of the whole proceeding was that it gave not only exclusive rights to canning but also to fishing. It is hard to believe that only fourteen years ago it was a criminal offence for a Canadian to go out into territorial waters—I think it applied also to extraterritorial waters—and catch fish. He could not get a licence or if he did it would be of no use to him. The cannerymen received and farmed out the fishing licences to the fishermen who were in a state bordering upon economic serfdom. They were absolutely at the dictation and the influence of the men from whom, and from whom only they could get the licence which enabled them to fish. The canning trade proved to be profitable and many petitions were made to obtain the rights which at that time could be obtained only by political influence.

In 1917 or 1918, I just forget which, the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, Minister of Fisheries in the Union government, went out to the west coast. I am glad to note that in the parliamentary guide book he puts his politics down as Independent, and this perhaps accounts for the courage and foresight with which he acted. To paraphrase Genesis, he saw that the thing was not good and he put his foot down and said: I will do away with all this. He established an open door policy, so that everyone who bought a licence and complied with the conditions could go and fish and carry on as a canneryman or fisherman. The fishermen could then call their souls their own, they ceased to be criminals when they went fishing. They had a standing in the community, they saved money and bought their own boats. They became a sturdy and desirable class of citizens, they married and settled with their families to form little fishing communities. They represent a bulwark of empire upon our western front. Some day some nation—I am not indicating which—may want to form another Manchukuo on Vancouver island. It may be said that that is impossible, but we thought the other Manchukuo was impossible. From an imperial and national point of view it is very desirable to have these little settlements along the narrow waters and fjords. These sturdy, hardy fishermen are thoroughly familiar with the waters of the western coast.

Another result, perhaps not as desirable, which followed this open-door policy was the increase in the number of canneries. People rushed into the business and before long there were jealousies and rivalries between the different canneries. It led also to very intensive fishing. To equip properly a seine boat costs from $20,000 to $25,000. Previously, two canneries located in comparative proximity were in the habit of each putting in, say a couple of seines. However, in order to make more money and to get ahead of the other fellow—the undying horror of a canneryman is to let a neighbour get half a fin ahead of him—they went out and put four seines each into the water. Then the other fellow would try to go one better and I have heard of cases where fifteen seines have been placed in waters which would ordinarily take only four. The department, realizing the danger to the industry brought about by this action, formulated a rule that if more than a reasonable number of seines were being used, the department to be the judge, the number of days for fishing per week would be cut down. Of course by this method you get more fish. But it was far more expensive fish; it cost the canners more money to get a given quantity by these intensive methods. You can imagine that catching one-third more fish with five times the equipment would not be profitable. The rivalries and jealousies led also to fish of poorer or more doubtful quality being put up. The one idea in those years seemed to be to get a bigger and bigger pack regardless of the cost and heedless of the quality of the fish put up. This meant a huge outlay for the boats and a bankrupting outlay for the canners. By and by the inevitable result followed of heavy losses. Backers and bankers began to ask: Why all this sudden loss? Why this large expenditure? Like the Israelites of old, who when they were cornered in the wilderness as a result of their sins, instead of acknowledging them, cried: Would to God we had stayed with the fleshpots in Egypt, the cannerymen, because it is not human nature to admit one is wrong, instead of admitting the facts as they were, said: It is all due to Ballantyne's malicious policy; if we could only get back to the good old days when there was the closed door and exclusive rights all round, when I owned this fifty miles of seaboard and you owned the other, everything would be all right.

In fulfilment of those views, which the backers and bankers had to accept in lieu of a better and more definite statement, they tried to get back the good old days. They made a perfectly legitimate effort by endeavouring to have the Dominion government alter its policy. Succeeding governments were approached, and quite properly, but all efforts were unsuccessful. Then they attempted to work it through the provincial government, it having acquired rights over canneries and the fish after they were caught. The Hon. Mr. Howe, who was minister in charge, in a very roundabout way sought to give them the advantage for which they asked, but the method he proposed was so nonsensical that after it had been threshed out in committee of the local house, the cannery men's own lawyers advised him to withdraw it because if he attempted to put it through, it would only make his ignorance of the subject all the more apparent.

Following this, less creditable methods were adopted. They said: If we cannot get it by means of change of policy, of legislation, perhaps we can get it by means of regulations which say one thing and mean another. What they wanted to do of course was to get back as near as they could to the good old days, eliminate the small independent canners that had sprung up among the old established ones and also eliminate the independent fishermen who were growing in strength and importance, and make them serfs and tools of the cannerymen and dependent on them. This meant huge expenditures in boats and so forth. The really proper policy for the canners to adopt is to encourage the independent fishermen and let them fish and let the cannery men can. In all phases of industry it has been a good system not to try to do too many things at once. So the independent fishermen should be encouraged instead of being discriminated against. In this way the cannerymen would be saved great outlays and they could devote themselves to their business which is sufficiently large and profitable under normal conditions for them to pay their whole attention to it. It is needless to say that all these recommendations and proposals were made in the name of conservation and quality. Someone has said: O patriotism, what crimes are committed in thy name! I have had a long and wide acquaintance with fishermen and cannerymen and every other class of the industry, and not one of them, when asking for something to which he was not entitled, has not laid his argument on the altar of conservation and quality. That is a proverbial and well known fact.

Mr. Speaker, as I have finished this phase of my argument, I would ask you to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF TORONTO

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, to amend and consolidate the several acts relating to the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Explain.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. member has asked me to explain; I do not know that he would like to go through the bill with me, since in it there are some fourteen pages of printed matter. I may say, however, that the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto was incorporated by statute of the old province of Canada, passed in 1844. Naturally since that time there have been other statutes, one of which incorporated the Board of Trade with the Toronto Corn Exchange Association, and many others amending the original provisions applying to the corporation. I have read the bill and cannot see that it contains anything new. It is simply a consolidation of previous legislation, and is designed to put everything in more compact and understandable form. I suggest that any questions hon. members may wish to ask be asked in committee.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed, from February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the criminal code (unlawful associations), and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, when the hour for private bills expired on Friday evening I was just about to congratulate the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) on his success, at least to his own satisfaction, in answering charges made by hon. members opposite to the effect that there was some connection between the group to which he belongs, or groups in this corner of the house, and the communistic organizations of Canada. While I wish to congratulate him upon his success in satisfying his own mind, I am very much afraid that his was a labour of love which will remain unrequited for a long time, because hon. gentlemen opposite who insist upon making the charge would be very much disappointed if they had to accept the truth, which is that there never has been and never can be any connection between these groups and communistic organizations.

It appears to me that perhaps one reason why a certain section of the house opposes the repeal of section 98 is in order that it might be used for political purposes. By inspiring fear they hope to accomplish that which they cannot accomplish by applying reason. Such terms as bolshevism, communism and revolution used by people who have political objects in view present alarming pictures to the general public. Each one of those words in the minds of some people stands for something quite objectionable. Their connotations are such as to inspire fear and repulsion. So, in a movement in this country if one manages to connect with it the terms bolshevism, communism and revolution, he immediately raises an unreasoned objection on the part of the general public. It is very much like witchcraft. I suppose there never was actually such a thing as witchcraft, yet many poor old women paid with their lives for that superstitution. I do not suppose there is any real revolutionary movement in Canada; certainly those in this corner who are charged with being revolutionary are not. And yet this suggestion is being used, just as witchcraft was used, to scare people.

As I have said, perhaps that is one reason why some hon. gentlemen wish to retain section 98. They keep it alive for political purposes. I am not so sure that government agents are not employed in certain parts of Canada to stir up strife, in order that section 98 might be used. Certainly we have had examples of this in Leopold and Zanetti. These gentlemen were government-paid agents who took an inside leadership in certain communistic movements of Canada; they led on a few ignorant dupes until they got them where they wanted them. At that point section 98 came into play and arrests were made. Surely the powers that be ought to hesitate to stoop to that sort of thing. Yet it was done, and maybe it is going on now to a greater extent. Perhaps the most radical revolutionary papers in Canada are being edited by agents of that type, who desire to prove the value of section 98, and to make connections with the groups in this corner of the house in an effort to gain ground for the argument that there is an association between the two.

Mr. ERNST: Such as Change?

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member has mentioned a very notable and exceptionally well edited paper which is very far ahead of any paper which at the moment can be claimed in support of the Conservative party.

Then, another group who want to retain section 98 are those who are afraid. They may have personal cause for fear about which I do not know, or their fears may be purely pathological. But that some of them have such fears there can be little or no doubt; and fears have always in the past expressed themselves in obscurantism and persecution. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), who is not in his seat, is in my opinion one of those people dominated by fear. He is so afraid that a resolution passed by the synod of his own church seemed to disturb him greatly. I have before me an excerpt from a news item appearing in the Ottawa Journal of September 23, which reads as follows:

> Nicholson, M.P. urges resolution toned down lest they be misquoted on communist platforms.
> Toronto, Sept. 22.—Anglican Synod—A demand for condemnation of "capitalistic methods" and of financial scheming which takes millions from the many, to put into the hands of the few, was made by the Very Rev. Archdeacon F. G. Scott of Quebec, at the general synod of the church of England to-day.
>
> On motion of Canon A. P. Gower Rees of Montreal, the synod committed itself to the principle that "the nation is primarily responsible for the support of any citizen who, through no fault of his own, is deprived of his right to secure his own means of livelihood and the maintenance of his dependents."
> Moving that the resolutions be referred to the special committee G. B. Nicholson, M.P. of East Algoma urged that they be toned down "lest they be misquoted on communist platforms all across the country."

When the hon. member is actually afraid of the resolution passed by the Anglican synod, one cannot wonder that he would literally quake with fear at the resolutions which come from this corner of the house.

Mr. ERNST: Were both resolutions passed?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, so far as I can learn from the report, both passed. So I say it is not surprising that one who for pathological or personal reasons is afraid of a resolution of the Anglican synod should be perturbed by a resolution coming from this corner of the house.

Mr. MORAND: He was afraid of being misquoted.

Mr. IRVINE: Well the fear of misquotation is not expressed in the report which I read, and I have never heard any such fears expressed by the hon. gentleman here. It was always the reality of his imaginings he was afraid of, not of being misquoted. Now it appears to me that he and a few others in this house are suffering from Russiaphobia, and being in that condition they seem to be entirely unconscious that they are following Russian methods themselves. The attitude of the government in retaining section 98 and in arresting and imprisoning people under that section is undoubtedly that of the czar. That is the course the czar followed prior to the revolution. No matter how intelligent a man was, if he opposed the czar he was clubbed or murdered or sent to Siberia under laws similar to this that we are opposing. So that while hon. members opposite charge us with being bolshevists, I feel very much prouder of that than if I were on the other side following in the footsteps of the czar across the sands of political time. And that is what they are doing. I say I would far rather be charged in this house or anywhere else with being a follower of Lenin than of the czar, though I am a follower of neither. Supporters of section 98 are followers of the czar. He who practises what the czar practised is a follower of the czar. This section 98 if it had been drawn by the czar would not have been any more rigorous than it is. Its method, its spirit, the political philosophy behind it, are those that were characteristic of the czar and led to the revolution which hon. gentlemen so much deplore and fear will be repeated. Economic slavery and persecution were the seeds of communism. Whatever associations hon. gentlemen may try to establish between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, for instance, and groups associated with it, and the communistic groups, whatever success they can make of that they are welcome to, but I repeat, I would much rather be associated with communism than with the group to which they belong, namely the czaristic group. Section 98 is certainly not British, it is certainly not Canadian, it is a weapon of prerevolutionary Russia, and I do not marvel that those who advocate it are afraid. They are certainly taking a course which would give them cause for fear if they only realized it.

There is a third type that seem to desire to retain this legislation, namely those who honestly believe that ideas can be and should be put down by force. Those of us who want to see section 98 repealed believe that the widest possible latitude should be given to all thought, and that thoughts, whoever may express them, should be allowed to be uttered unhampered. I would not go so far with action; I quite realize that a government that cannot retain power ceases to be a government, and if force is exercised against the government then the government has to exercise force to maintain itself. In other words, if any group in Canada made forcible attacks upon government or upon the institutions necessary to law and order, then I do not doubt that the government should take action, but for the government to begin to take action by force before any action has been taken against it is undoubtedly persecution. Let the government wait until the action has been taken against it; then it is time enough for the government to act. I suppose most of us have noticed that those who, like this parliament for instance, do a lot of talking, never act very quickly if at all. Great Britain has recognized that for a long time. She permits liberty of speech; men and women can go into the halls and the public parks of Great Britain and say what they like, there is no restriction on words or ideas. And Great Britain has found that that is much safer than to try to repress utterance. Think of the absurdity, for instance, of a single communist or a handful of communists standing up and saying that they are going to upset the Canadian government by force! There they are, a few poorly fed, poorly clad and sometimes ignorant individuals, with no organization, no money, no guns, no arsenal, no munitions, no aeroplanes, they have nothing but their mouths and they stand up and threaten to attack by force the government of this country! A ridiculous thing, a joke. Those, as a rule, who thus threaten attack by force, do so because of the realization of their utter inability to carry out their threat. If they really were trying to upset the government by force they would not be talking so much about it. Let them talk. Let them say what they will, as long as they do not act. When they act, and if their action be subversive, I agree that the government must be firm, but the government has authority to take action under those circumstances without this action, which, on the other hand, provides opportunity for any government inspired by fear to persecute instead of punish. There is the point, I think the most powerful point in the whole argument against the repeal of this section. In that connection may I refer to a statement which I think was made by Macaulay? He says:

> The true distinction (between punishment and persecution) is obvious. To punish a man because he has committed a crime, or is believed, though unjustly, to have committed a crime, is not persecution. To punish a man because we infer from the nature of some doctrine which he holds, or from the conduct of other persons who hold the same doctrines with him, that he will commit a crime is persecution; and is in every case foolish and wicked.

It appears to me, sir, that that is the whole point at issue in regard to the repeal of section 98. The government has all the authority it requires for the protection of the government and the state. But this section gives them the opportunity to persecute if they desire to do so. I do not say that they wilfully desire to persecute, but when men are as afraid as the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and find themselves with a weapon of this sort at hand, they use it. It has been used rather liberally in the past few months, and if it is not taken away no doubt will be used in the future perhaps even more liberally. So I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all who believe in freedom of thought, who believe that every man should have the right to express his views when and where he desires, will support the repeal of section 98. Let those who are afraid, those who desire to use it for persecution, keep on their fateful course; history will deal with them just as it did with their predecessor the Czar of Russia. But for those who wish to retain British institutions and who wish to give freedom to thought—or shall we say those who wish to retain Canadian institutions, which are perhaps even higher—I say, let us wipe this legislation from the statute books and allow Canadians the right to express themselves on political and economic and social questions as they feel inclined.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of this measure which is before the house. I was surprised—and I suppose being surprised arises from the fact that I am a new member, because I notice that the older members are not surprised at anything that happens in the house—I was surprised, sir, when I heard the attacks of hon. gentlemen opposite on this bill, especially when they endeavoured in some way to connect Canadian labour with soviet Russia. I am sure no hon. member seriously believes that any member on this side of the house believes in or would advocate force or is connected in any way with soviet Russia. So I say I was rather surprised and also disappointed when I heard the attacks on hon. members supporting this bill. I can say this much, Mr. Speaker, that the communists of this country utter more denunciatory remarks against the labour members in this house than they do against even the vested interests; they are more severe in their criticisms of those who stand up for labour.

I hope the views expressed by hon. members opposite who have spoken are not held generally, because if those fears spread I am afraid we are then in danger of losing our individual liberty. For that reason, therefore, I would be loath to see the present act retained on our statute books. Not long ago a prominent judge on the Pacific coast said that if ever there were a time when individual rights should be respected and preserved it was during this trying period through which we are passing. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said only two prosecutions had been carried on under this section since it was passed in 1919. I feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that those who supported the measure in those days had some reason to believe that this provision was necessary then in order to prevent rebellion or revolution, but since that time only two prosecutions have been carried out. The fears held at that time have been proved groundless, and I am convinced that the fears some hold now are equally groundless. I do not think we are in danger of revolution if we remove this section from the criminal code. In time of peace there is no need for any such provision, because the whole nation is calm and can reason out all such matters that might affect the peace of the country, but conditions are entirely different at present. A wave of fear is likely to spread over the whole country, and no one can tell what may happen if a panic of fear should spread from one end of Canada to the other. It might not be very difficult to start a reign of suppression if the fears I have heard expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite should spread to any great degree.

Let me remind hon. members that Great Britain has not forgotten her magna charta of individual liberty; for many years she has carried on in the belief that there is more danger from bottled steam than from steam that is allowed to escape. So she has wisely adopted the policy of allowing any person to say almost anything so long as he does not go too far in regard to the king himself. He can say almost anything, however, with regard to the government. I have listened to speakers in Glasgow who had to be protected from those who wished to mob them for daring to say the government was evil. As I say, Great Britain has adopted the policy of permitting great freedom of speech in all public places; public speakers are protected by the law and are allowed to say what they wish. If you do not care to listen or do not agree with what they are saying it is your privilege to walk on and pay no attention to them. It might be well, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members who could afford it took the opportunity to visit that great country. We have heard a great deal about the Anglo-Saxon spirit, and we pretend to follow the lead of Great Britain in a great many things. Let us follow her lead in this case. For years the socialists and communists have been preaching their doctrines in that country but Britain is still as sane as ever. At the last election some people thought Great Britain would swing to socialism, but a national government was formed. Even Stalin, after the results of the last election were known, said that Great Britain was impossible. He believed that after socialistic doctrines had been preached there for so long, with unemployment prevalent and the depression and distress continuing, revolution was at hand and that after the election the socialist party would take charge of the country. That did not happen, however, due to the good sense and foresight of the British nation, which had allowed absolute freedom of speech.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that you can never keep down any movement by repression or force. I remember very well that even Kier Hardie, the great labour leader, preached the red flag and taught socialist hymns in the Sunday schools in my younger days. Those hymns have been repeated in this country, and many members opposite seem greatly exercised in connection with them. I do not advocate immunity for those who would take charge of the government of this country by violence and bloodshed, but I do not think the removal of this section of the criminal code will bring about any such revolution in this country. I heard the Minister of Justice mention the long list of foreigners who were connected with the communist movement. I hope he does not make the mistake I made two years ago. There was a communist riot in the city of Vancouver, and I happened to say to the mayor of that city, "I suppose most of the leaders of these men are foreigners?" He said, "You are darned right they are foreigners; the head man is a Scotchman." Scotchmen are noted however for their great love of liberty, but I would not like them to be classed as foreigners.

There is a striking difference between the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite and that taken by those on this side of the house; there is really a clear line of demarcation. The Liberal party and those in this corner of the house—and this is not another move to the left—have been in favour of individual liberty and took that attitude even when this measure was introduced in 1919. Those on the government benches fear that some great catastrophe will result if this amendment is carried. But the repeal of this provision is not asked for by labour only. I have had communications from many farm organizations asking me to do everything in my power to bring about the repeal of this section if the opportunity should arise. I greatly fear, Mr. Speaker, that if a wave of panic should sweep across the country the citizens of Canada may suffer greatly; they may be subjected to many injustices on suspicion only. We are told that the courts give a man a fair trial. That may be so, but in days of panic it is possible that the courts might become a little panicky also. History has proved that repression and force never stamped out a movement such as this. We know that to be the case in connection with religion. In the early days endeavours were made to repress individual liberty in connection with religion, but it was found that this end was not accomplished. I might say to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) that the greater the repression, the better for any new movement. History has demonstrated this to be the fact.

I would ask hon. members opposite to use their calm judgment; if this panic spreads among the members of the house no one knows what may happen and what numbers of people may suffer. Repression is repulsive to the Anglo-Saxon. The way to keep communism from our country is to endeavour to work out some measures which will benefit the masses of the people, and if we can do that we need have no fear of communism or of a revolution, in my opinion. The people cannot be blamed if they gather in groups and talk and scheme about a new social order. Surely it is their right to do so, especially when we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed, not only in this country but in every other country in the world. Surely, when they have lost their all and have become charges on the state, they have a right to endeavour to take steps to better their conditions and talk about a new social order. Sometimes I think the city of Ottawa is as far removed from the rest of Canada in her knowledge of actual conditions as Siberia is removed from the rest of Russia. I do not think you can properly get the viewpoint of the rest of Canada from this city.

For all these reasons, and many others, Mr. Speaker, I shall take great pleasure in voting for this measure to repeal section 98.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): I did not intend at first to take part in the debate, but as I listened to the arguments of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I thought I should say a few words. I heard the hon. gentleman speak in favour of the repeal of section 98, and one of the arguments he used was that the other clauses in the criminal code are quite sufficient to deal with the situation. This is the legal opinion of a high personage whom I respect, but it is not my opinion. I do not agree with the hon. member for Quebec East when he says that section 98 is legislation that should be repealed; on the contrary I think it is the only legislation which adequately meets the case against communism. In my opinion, and it is only a personal opinion, sections 87, 89, 130 to 136 of the code do not sufficiently cover communism, and if the hon. member for Quebec East is right, which I deny, then section 98 is only a mere repetition. If it is only a repetition why oppose it so strongly?

There is a very simple way of nullifying the purport of section 98 and that is for every man in this country to abide by the law and not to try to soviet or revolutionize or to overthrow the social order by force, violence or physical injury to persons or property. Section 98 does not affect the ordinary trade and labour organizations or unions; they have nothing to fear from that section. The law abiding citizen has no reason to be apprehensive of section 98, and the section is by no means an attack on the right of free speech. Any citizen may advocate the most radical changes and criticize in the most emphatic language our institutions and laws; it is only when force, violence or physical injury to person or property is used or threatened to be used that the section applies.

An additional argument advanced by the hon. member for Quebec East is this. He said that such legislation is arbitrary and contrary to the ordinary rules of British justice and British procedure. I presume my hon. friend meant en resume that it was opposed to liberalism. I wonder what liberalism he meant. Is it his own liberalism or the liberalism practised by his party in the province of Quebec? A study of the Quebec Alcoholic Liquor Act will show that by that act are abolished all the writs of prerogative. By section 139 no writ of quo warranto, of injunction or of certiorari may be granted; no writ of mandamus and no writ of prohibition may be issued. Even the sacred rights of habeas corpus are abrogated by section 130 of the Quebec Alcoholic Liquor Act. Another Quebec law, the Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act, also abolishes all these writs of prerogative, including even the habeas corpus; whereas section 98 of our criminal code does not abolish the habeas corpus although it is for a higher purpose than the Quebec liquor acts, its object being the maintenance of peace, order and good government.

It is very amusing to hear our friends advocating the principles of liberalism. On the one hand we see the ex-Minister of Justice advocating the repeal of section 98, and on the other hand we find his friends in Quebec abolishing the writs of prerogative and habeas corpus. It reminds me of what I heard one day in Quebec; it was on the 14th of January 1933. The Liberals gave a big demonstration to their chief, the leader of the opposition, at a huge banquet. We heard the Hon. Mr. Taschereau saying that maybe democracy had gone too far and that we should go back, and immediately afterwards we heard the hon. member for Quebec East declaring that on the contrary we should go forward. At that meeting we had the great privilege of listening by radio to the views of these gentlemen. It was a love feast of Liberal adherents and we had the privilege of listening to the most interesting contradictory meeting one could attend.

I admit that this is exceptional legislation. The Minister of Justice admitted the other day that there had been times in the past when he looked upon the repeal of this section as a matter of indifference; he even added that on one occasion he stated that this particular section had perhaps survived its usefulness and that there was no further necessity for it. But, added my hon. colleague, at that time there was no communist agitation in this country such as prevails to-day. May I add that this communist agitation is spreading and gaining ground all over Canada. We think therefore that the only legislation which adequately meets the situation is this section 98; we look upon it as a rampart against communism.

I will not quote at length some of the passages of such literature as is actually circulated throughout this country; I should be afraid of promoting its propaganda. I do say however that the Minister of Justice was quite correct when he stated that the literature circulated is most scandalous, most seditious and in many cases blasphemous and obscene.

Section 98 was inserted in 1919 and up to 1926 there was no move on the part of my hon. friends, who were then in power, towards the repeal of that provision. Then came the elections of 1925 and both parties were returned with almost equal strength. Then followed the famous letter written by my hon. friends of the Labour party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Vancouver asking the then Prime Minister the price to be paid if he wanted the support of the two members.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say that there is no member in this corner from Vancouver, and further that no letter such as described by the minister was signed by me. I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. DUPRE: Instead of withdrawing, I will read the letter. It is quoted in Hansard of January 29, 1926, and reads:

Dear Mr. King:

As representatives of labour in the House of Commons, may we ask whether it is your intention to introduce at this session legislation with regard to—

(a) Provision for the unemployed;
(b) Old age pensions.

We are venturing to send a similar inquiry to the leader of the opposition.

Yours sincerely,

J. S. Woodsworth.
A. A. Heaps.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre then went on to say—

Mr. CASGRAIN: What about the letter?

Mr. DUPRE: He said:

We sent a similar letter to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and to the leader of the Progressives. Mr. Mackenzie King was good enough to give us the opportunity to present our case in detail, and to-day I received from him the following letter, which I should like to place on Hansard.

Then follows the letter of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). As my time is short, I shall read only a portion of this letter.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it all.

Mr. DUPRE: It appears in Hansard and any hon. member can read it. The second and third paragraphs read as follows:

You will observe that the statement made by Mr. Lapointe was in accordance with the intimation which I gave to Mr. Heaps and yourself at the time of our interview, following the receipt of the communication herein referred to.

With respect to amendments to (a) the Immigration Act; (b) the Naturalization Act; and (c) the criminal code, which were referred to at the time of our interview, I would say that having since taken up the proposed amendments with the ministers concerned, I feel I am in a position to assure you that legislation on these matters will also be introduced in the course of the present session.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Nothing wrong with that.

Mr. DUPRE: A few weeks after that letter the then Minister of Justice introduced a bill to repeal section 98 because he and his leader wanted to pay the price for the support of the two labour members.

Mr. FAFARD: That is the minister's own conclusion.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): They would have gone out of power if they had not had it.

Mr. DUPRE: It was in the name of British justice and British procedure that they asked for the repeal of section 98. My question at the present time is this: Is the Liberal party having recourse to the same tactics in 1932 that it had recourse to in 1926?

An hon. MEMBER: This is 1933.

Mr. DUPRE: Are they paying a second price? That is my question.

Taking part in this debate a few days ago, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), after referring to British justice and procedure, said:

> Apart from that I am free to admit that temperamentally I do not like this kind of legislation. I do not believe that it is a good way to repress error.

I direct attention to the following words:

> After all, to allow freedom is the best way of dealing with people in a democracy, and I am free to confess my belief that always when truth and error are given a fair field, truth ultimately prevails. That is one of the chief reasons for my opposition to this legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Who signed that?

Mr. DUPRE: That is the Liberal doctrine, let truth and error, bad and good have a fair field. Truth and good will prevail ultimately; if they do not, so much the worse for truth and good. I commend these words of the former Minister of Justice to the people of this country and particularly to the people of my province. I think they are a vindication of what the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said, that the essence of Liberalism was to have no principle. No wonder some of us seem to think that the former Minister of Justice, consciously or unconsciously, is drifting towards the extreme left. It is because we do not want to give error a fair field, it is because we feel that error should not be given a fair chance, it is because we do not belong to the same school as the former Minister of Justice, that we ask for the maintenance of section 98. Shall we permit in this dominion the use of force, violence, intimidation and terrorism? Shall we permit communism to flourish? Shall we permit a civil war? My answer is no, and that is why I shall support the amendment of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) asking for the six months' hoist on this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the remarks of the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) as to why section 98 should remain upon the statute book, I have come to the conclusion that he has three reasons for the stand he takes. The first is that he does not like the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe); second, he has no love for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and, third, he feels that section 98 is necessary to combat Liberalism in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Or anywhere else.

Mr. FACTOR: Before I continue with the history of this question may I, shall I say apologize, or, say a few words in defence of my action in supporting this bill? It has become fashionable in this house when any member desires to support any legislation or any proposed changes in our present laws for him at once to assure the house that he is not a communist. I say that without any reservation, and I also assure hon. members that I do not favour force, violence, terrorism or any other similar methods of procedure referred to in this debate. I am wholly in accord with the policy of expressing ourselves by means of ballots rather than bullets. Now that I have made my personal explanation and feel satisfied that even hon. members opposite will realize I am not at all in league with Moscow and have not received marching orders from Russia, as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) put it, I purpose to discuss the enactment dispassionately and without in any way making a speech either in favour of or against toryism or in favour of or against liberalism.

First, I must make this general observation. It has become a popular pastime, particularly on the part of hon. members opposite, if any member, especially on this side of the house, advocates some measure of reform, some change, to discredit him on the ground that he is a communist, to criticize his action and to represent him as being in league with Russia and communism.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The hon. member looks like a communist. That is the trouble.

Mr. FACTOR: All I can say in reply to the hon. member is that if all the communists in Russia look as mild as I do, well—

If an hon. member advocates in this house some measure of reform, there are immediately hurled against him the epithets "bolshevist," "communist," "red." The people in this dominion are getting tired of this kind of talk; it lacks intelligence. It is silly to hurl such accusations against any hon. member who discusses something which he thinks is for the good of his country. If we ever hope to solve the difficult and complex problems with which we are faced to-day, we must have free, unfettered and enlightened public opinion and not the application of the iron heel.

Section 98 was introduced in 1919 to meet post-war conditions. We were still suffering from war hysteria and were willing somewhat to restrict and abridge our liberties. The result was the measure which appears on our statute books and which is now known as section 98. But let me remind you, sir, just as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) pointed out the other day, that this legislation was not passed unanimously. When the draft bill was referred to the committee, it was, as the Minister of Justice told us the other day, passed by a majority of one vote in favour of reporting it to the house, and it was subsequently enacted by parliament.

Let us for the moment examine section 98. The first paragraph refers to any association, and so forth, that advocates force, violence or physical injury. No hon. member will be a party to advocating violence or physical injury to any person or property. But what is the meaning of the word "force"? If the words "physical injury" are used, why put in "force"? Is this not a case of moral force?

A recent occurrence in Toronto shows how extremely ridiculous a situation may be rendered. A couple of young lads from the Jarvis collegiate were distributing cards to their co-students to attend a meeting of the high school boys to discuss social and economic problems. The principal of the school, after looking at the cards, was rather put out and called in a policeman. The policeman thoroughly examined the boys and ascertained that they were calling a meeting of the high school students in a certain hall for the purpose of discussing social and economic problems. But through some workings of the police, the owner of the hall was frightened out of allowing its use to those boys, with the consequence that the meeting was cancelled. Just imagine! High school boys gathered together for the purpose of discussing our social and economic problems, and the power of the police force used against them with the result that they are unable to meet and discuss those problems!

Mr. YOUNG: That must have been in Toronto.

Mr. FACTOR: Yes, it was. Section 98 is a vicious piece of legislation. It will not be found on the statute books of any other English speaking country in the world. I challenge any hon. member opposite to name any English speaking country on this continent or in the world which has a similar section in its statute books. It is entirely un-British both in substance and in the penalties imposed. In the section there is one clause which prescribes twenty years in prison for wearing a button. This provision is a very dangerous weapon in the hands of a weak government, as was ably illustrated by the speaker who preceded me. It is urged that this section is required to combat communism and those who advocate violence and terrorism. My answer to that is that there are in the criminal code at present sections sufficient for the purpose. There are all the sections concerning sedition and unlawful rioting. The danger in this legislation lies in the fact that it may be used against organized labour. Legitimately organized unions and organized labour have in years gone by protested against this legislation. I admit there is considerable unrest in Canada, and under the pressure of poverty and distress there are a few harebrained and irresponsible persons who advocate force and violence, but surely that is no reason for our losing our heads and becoming panicky and allowing legislation of this kind to remain on our statute books.

I did not have the pleasure of hearing, but I was rather amused to read, the speech of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest. From it one would imagine that Toronto is absolutely overridden with communists and that anyone speaking on a Toronto platform and advocating some measure of reform is taking marching orders from Russia, as the hon. member puts it. The hon. gentleman is seeing red; that is the difficulty. I notice he quoted from the statement of the communist party. I advise him to dispose of the document quickly, otherwise he is liable to be charged with possessing unlawful literature.

SUPPLY—INSPECTION OF CANNED SALMON

STATEMENT OF MR. NEILL ON MOTION OF MR. GUTHRIE FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking on this order in council this afternoon I tried to lay down the premises that it had, so to speak, two angles, two faces: one I deemed the obvious, so to speak the face value of it, the ostensible reason, and the other side or face or angle was what I termed the indirect or ulterior which I alleged was the real reason that this order in council was introduced. But in dealing with that phase of the matter in connection with the ostensible reason, I omitted to discuss one branch to which I should now like to revert before picking up the thread of what I was saying at six o'clock.

That order in council, before it was amended, read like this:

> Canned salmon that are found by the board of inspection to be fresh, firm, well packed and in good merchantable condition shall be approved and a certificate in the form attached, marked "A," shall be issued therefor.

That was the original order in council. Then by order in council No. 206 the following words were added:

> Provided that no certificate shall be issued for canned salmon that had not been landed fresh at a cannery for canning within twenty-four hours after being caught, excepting fish that has been gutted and iced immediately after being caught.

I direct the attention of hon. members to the last twelve words. While this afternoon I quoted them, I did not dwell upon them. I feel there is an argument in that connection which might be used against me, and for that reason, for a few moments, I revert to the matter. The argument might be that while I have made a great deal of fuss about the restriction imposed by this provision which provides for landing fish at the wharf within twenty-four hours after catching them, my objection would be dissipated if the fishermen complied with the last twelve words of the order in council and saw to it that their fish had been gutted and iced immediately after they were caught.

I realize that it is somewhat difficult, in connection with a measure like this, to explain the obvious difficulties. However, I shall make an attempt. There are three main branches of fishermen, namely, trollers, gill netters and seiners. The trollers might possibly, and very often do, gut and ice their fish as they are canght. It is possible to do that, and many of them do it because they catch them one by one, and it is not difficult to gut and ice as they are caught. However, in regard to gill netters and seiners the position is altogether different. In the case of gill netters the process would be difficult and expensive, and so far as seiners are concerned I should imagine it would be almost entirely impossible. Of course, in one sense, nothing is impossible. If one is willing to spend enough money, time and perhaps human life, he can do a great many things. But when we speak of a thing being impossible in a business and economic sense we mean that it cannot be done at a cost which would leave any profit or margin for operation. Hon. members will readily understand that for purposes of economy the boats used must not be too extensive in size. If they were they would require too large engines for operation, and would not be able to operate in shallow waters. Further, they cannot have too elaborate or extensive accommodation for the crew. Space must be cut down to a minimum.

The average purse seine boat is run by from five to seven men—not more than seven. They have very narrow and small quarters for the crew. The whole of the remaining space other than that taken up by the engine is used for the storing of fish. Then, considerable space is required for the net, which takes up a lot of room and then, of course, further space for the fish. Every inch of free space must be given to accommodate the fish, and the hold when filled is loaded until one could not put another fish into it. In catching the fish large seines are used. They are run out in a circle, and are brought in as quickly as possible, because there is a time limit. Those seines are brought back to the boats from which they started. Then, by means of a winch on the boat, the nets are brought in. These are called purse seines, because there is a cord attached which pulls it together like the old fashioned purses that the ladies used to use. When it is pulled together it is hauled to the side of the boat. The problem of getting the fish out of the net then presents itself. I do not want hon. members to think that that operation is always performed in smooth water. If the boat is tossing in a choppy sea the operation becomes more difficult. One of the seven men must stay by the engine, and the other six are very fully occupied, and taxed to the limit of their ability and power to unload the fish. The fish are generally unloaded by means of what is known as a brailer. This article is something like a big scoop made with a net with an iron around it attached to which is a long handle. This is operated with the winch and is let down into the seine alongside the boat, and with it they dish up three or four dozen fish. When they get the fish aboard, there is only one place they can be dumped, and that is into the hold. If the fish were placed on the deck, loose, quite possibly they would roll overboard the next time the boat rolled. For that reason the fish have to be brailed right into the hold.

For the reasons I have already indicated it would be impossible to have double space so that the fish brailed out of the net could be put into number one hold so that the crew, after they had finished unloading, could set to work to gut and ice. The men could not be spared for the process, and further than that it would take five or six hours to gut and ice the quantity they would take. Meantime the boat with its costly equipment would be lying idle. Such a boat could not carry enough crew to do all the operations simultaneously because the accommodation is limited, and the expense of carrying such a crew would be prohibitive. So far as I am concerned—and I am not trying to make a partisan statement—I am convinced it would not be economical to gut and ice the fish taken by a seiner. Further, I think it would be very difficult to gut and ice by gill netters. That, I believe, is an argument against the suggestion that the whole matter might be very easily overcome by simply gutting and icing. It is all very well to make that statement, but in my view it is a requirement impossible of fulfilment.

I shall now return to the point I had reached at six o'clock. I was dealing with what I called the real motive or object—perhaps object is the correct word—for the introduction of the order in council. I said this was an attempt made by the canners who had tried by thoroughly legitimate means to repeal the legislation passed in 1918 by the Union government, which proclaimed the open door in fishery matters. I said it was an effort on their part to get back to what they termed the good old days, when each man owned his own water, and so on. I said that, failing success by way of changing the legislation, they had sought to achieve the same results by having changes made in the regulations covering fishing. In their view it would have had the same effect, while ostensibly their efforts would have been devoted towards the conservation or improvement of quality and so on. The methods by which they sought to bring about these results were quite numerous, and for that reason I shall deal with only three of them.

Many methods were suggested, and at one time I was familiar with all of them, because these efforts have been continued for about ten years. I have files in my room and at home which would fill a wheelbarrow dealing with the different attempts made to get indirectly what they could not get directly. The three main methods which come to my mind at the moment—and I state them because I know they have been the subject of attempts quite recently—were first, that fish caught in an area would have to be processed, or manufactured in that area, and could not be taken into an adjoining area. I should add that when I use the term "area" at least some hon. members will understand that the whole of the waters is divided into areas. Had they been successful their object would have been attained, and they would have had the whole thing in a nutshell, because they would have cut off the cannery which did not have an area, and would have made the individual fisherman the servant of the cannery. The fishermen would have had to take the prices offered by those canners. If they did not choose to accept those prices their punishment would have been that the canners would not buy their fish.

The second attempt was along the lines of limiting the distance fish could be taken after being caught. That contention was in favour for quite a time, but there were so many obvious reasons against it that eventually it was abandoned.

Then, the third attempt was towards limiting the time within which fish caught would have to be canned. If the processing in area in which fish caught had been established it would have affected not only the outside cannery but also the fishermen. I want to explain what I mean by the outside cannery. When the open door was adopted it became possible for a cannery to be put up not immediately adjacent to the fishing grounds, and they depended upon getting their supply of fish, under the laws of Canada at the moment, anywhere they could. This processing in area regulation would eliminate them. As time went on it was found that a different system as regards the place of canning was more profitable. In the old days when a cannery was located say in the Skeena district it was at an isolated place, no town, no village, no residents, just used for six or eight weeks in the summer time. The cannery owner would have to send up the whole equipment from Vancouver, perhaps five hundred miles away, and not only the whole equipment, but the whole provision for a preconceived pack. He would have to get cans for perhaps a big pack, would have to guess as he best could what the pack would be, and would have to buy cans for that pack. He would have to make arrangements for sufficient labourers to handle that big pack; he would have to take food for them and start a village and make provision for all that goes with quite a large settlement for the time being. Then, as nature cannot be counted on, it might turn out that the pack would be disappointing; he would have large supplies of food and tins, and a large amount of labour employed which he could not use, and would be burdened with heavy charges for taking it up and down again. So it was discovered that he could do better by locating his cannery at a place like Vancouver or Alert bay or Port Alberni, where he had ready access to wholesalers, and did not need to buy even five sacks of flour more than he needed. In fact the question of feeding his staff was almost non-existent, because they would have their homes there. There was no question of getting an under- or over-supply of labour; ample was available. And while the transport of the fish cost a little more, by putting on fast boats with Diesel engines that can be run on fuel oil at a very cheap rate, it was found more profitable to have the cannery at a centre of population than to have it away off in a remote place. Consequently these canneries have grown up. If this order in council goes into effect and operates as I think it will, these canners will just be out of luck because they will not be within twenty-four hours run from where the fish are caught.

As I have said, these attempts to get this legislation put through were not confined to a day, but continued through a series of years. For a number of years the obvious injustice of some of these things I have mentioned prevented them being put into effect. It did until last year, in fact up to this year. Just recently—I mentioned it in the letter I wrote to the department on the 10th of January—I heard a whisper in Vancouver that an attempt was going to be made to put it over this department along the lines of processing in area and preventing the fish from being canned unless they had been delivered at the wharf within twenty-four hours of being caught. The processing in area has failed for the moment—I anticipate it is only for the moment—but they did put it over as regards time limit within which the fish had to be delivered to the wharf. They have slipped it in under cover of this order in council as an amendment to the inspection regulations. If they get by with it this year, it will be a very apparent handwriting on the wall indicating that we will find the idea of processing in area introduced next year, and then heaven help the independent canners and all the money they have spent, and still more the independent fishermen, who will be reduced to a condition of servitude. That, I claim, is the real objective of this order in council, and I defy anyone to convince me otherwise. That is why the demand for the order in council came not from the purchasers. It came not from the inspectors, to whom it must be a nuisance and an interference with their work and a reflection on their ability if not their integrity. It did not come from the departmental officials, at any rate up to two weeks before the order in council was passed they said they were satisfied. But it came from those who in the language of the department control ninety per cent of the fish canned, but not ninety per cent of the canneries. It came from the men whose goods were subject to inspection; apparently their views on the method of inspecting their product had weight with the department. One would think that those were the last people to whose opinion consideration should be given as to what was the best way of controlling the inspection of their stock. The undoubted result will be, as I have said, to eliminate the smaller and newer canneries in Vancouver and elsewhere, and worst of all to eliminate competition in the buying of fish, because the fishermen must sell to the local cannery. I have heard it said: "Oh, there will be competition, because there will be two canners in a given area." But how long will it take two canners to get together? I have been in business and I know how readily that would be arranged. So it would make it impossible for them to have competition in price. Hitherto, if the local canner does not or cannot or will not give a reasonable price, the fishermen could send their fish away to another canner, or they could invite a packer, that is a boat that carries fish on contract, to come into their neighbourhood. I am not suggesting, I do not want to be thought of as suggesting, that the canners are full of nothing but malice and ill will, and want to injure the fishermen. Not at all; there are many fine canners who realize that the best interests of both are served by getting the fishermen and the canners together. I have heard many canners say that they think the best ultimate condition will be when the fishermen do nothing but fish and the canners nothing but can. I say it is not always the fault of the local canners that they cannot give a sufficient price to the fishermen. It may be due to accident; it may be that the canner did not lay in enough cans, that he did not have a cannery of sufficient size, or maybe he had put up enough for all the orders he had and did not care to or could not go any further, or maybe he had exhausted his financial backing. All or any of these reasons might suffice. It does not mean at all that these men are necessarily trying to work an injustice or hardship on the fishermen because they offer him a price he could not accept. I want to quote a canneryman on this point:

> Taking these facts into consideration we can only assume, subject of course to correction, that this regulation was passed to assist certain powerful canning interests who have canneries situated on the fishing grounds and who wish to embarrass others not similarly situated who rely upon collecting boats for their fish. Our experience has been that canners sending out collecting boats, properly iced, pack a better grade of fish as a whole than those situated on the fishing grounds since in the majority of cases the latter have no ice available and not having far to run do not take the same care of the fish.

And he goes on to say:

We are well aware that our protest will be "as the voice of one crying in the wilderness" yet we feel it to be our duty to make it when, as we see it, sectional legislation that will not stand argument is placed on the statute books of Canada.

I want to quote one which surely is from an independent source, namely a cold storage plant. This I took out of a Conservative paper, and I had no knowledge of it before. The letter from the canneryman also came to me quite unsolicited. I might be making an ex parte statement on behalf of the fisherman, but I could not have invented this article in the Victoria paper. This is an article by the manager of a cold storage company on the coast. He says:

Mr. McBride interpreted the twenty-hour limit clause for delivery of purse seining catches to canneries as a blow at the independent fishermen.

Notice that, Mr. Speaker.

He pointed out that it would be extremely difficult for independent fishermen to complete their catch and deliver the salmon to the canneries, either along the west coast, or in Victoria, within twenty-four hours of making the catch.

That is an independent, unbiased opinion from men with whom I have not communicated and whose views I have not requested. Certainly it coincides with the opinion I expressed. I have a letter from the department from which I must quote just one sentence. It says:

From the aspect of preventing competition for the catches of the fishermen this regulation should have no detrimental effect. On the contrary it should result in the fishermen obtaining higher prices for their fish.

If that gets into the press, Mr. Speaker, it will be laughed at from Prince Rupert to Vancouver and from Ketchikan to Seattle. The idea is ridiculous that in a narrow, constricted area, by reducing the number of buyers to one man or one company you are going to increase prices. If that is not enough to make one laugh I do not know what is.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no suggestion in the order in council that the number of buyers should be reduced to one company.

Mr. NEILL: No, but I am talking about the effect.

Mr. STEVENS: Nor is that the effect of the order.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I have read what the manager of the cold storage thinks, so I am not the only one who makes this statement. As I have said, it will result in the independent fishermen being driven out, and that is a very shortsighted policy. It is to the real interest of the cannerymen to support the independent fishermen and not have to invest huge sums of money in equipment and have men on wages and so on. I might say also—and I do not know whether this will have any effect on the government—that is just so much more propaganda for the reds.

Now I should like to sum up the situation very briefly. The order in council is irregular, I contend, because this measure should have been brought in by an act of parliament, and the question should have been referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries. Also it is a breach of faith and a departure from the policy which has been followed for quite a number of years. The ostensible reasons given, with which I have dealt, are unworkable and superfluous and I doubt if they are intended to be enforced. I might pause here to say that after all it does not make any difference to my argument whether or not I am correct in saying that this order in council was introduced at the instigation of certain parties for a certain purpose and with a deliberate, preconceived and ulterior motive, or whether I simply make the allegation as I do now that the result will be as I have stated. Let us forget about motives for the moment, and forget about the origin of this measure; at least the result will be as I have stated, no matter why it was brought in. It will put out of business the independent canneries and very nearly ruin the independent fisherman. He is nearly ruined now, and you are going to destroy the market for his product. Already prices are insufficient to maintain a decent livelihood. The fisherman is handicapped by the high price of gasoline and by the phenomenally low price of fish, as well as by the further fact that in many districts the market is lacking altogether. There is no use catching certain grades of fish because there is no market for them, and now the fisherman is to be restricted as to where he can sell his catch. I wonder what hon. gentlemen opposite and those to my right who represent constituencies where wheat is grown would say if they were told that in view of some supposed benefit to be derived from the quality of the wheat they were to be compelled to sell their wheat only to their country elevator. There would be a bloody revolution. It may be said that there are two elevators in the village and that a farmer could sell to either one. How long would it take them to arrange matters between them? There are so many technicalities in connection with the fish trade, and they are so difficult to understand and explain, that it is not easy to see that it is just as impossible in the one case as in the other.

I started out with the intention of moving an amendment to the motion to go into supply. I am not going to move the amendment, but I should like to read it:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

This house recommends that the subject matter contained in order in council No. 206, be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries for discussion and report.

My excuse for moving this amendment would have been that it was the only way I could bring this matter to a vote. I cannot bring this question before the house by means of a resolution because, as we all know, private members' days soon will be taken away from us, and it would be impossible to reach that resolution. I think the urgency of the matter would justify my moving such an amendment, but I am not going to do so because that would mean a vote of want of confidence in the government, and of course that would be used against me; hon. gentlemen opposite would say I was playing politics. I would rather leave the matter to the goodwill and judgment of the government, and I ask them if they will not refer this matter to the committee on marine and fisheries. Surely that is not a drastic step to take. I am only asking that the matter be investigated. The government will have a majority on the committee, and they need not fear any ill considered action being taken. I am not afraid to leave the matter to the committee, because all I want is an investigation and to have some publicity thrown on the matter with all the facts brought to light. I will be satisfied with the judgment of the committee. I feel sure that if the government would take this step this legislation, which came in through the back door by means of an order in council, would be thrown out the front door in the interests of fairness, equality and justice and to the ultimate benefit of everyone concerned in the fishing industry.

Now it is very much up to the government. What are they going to do? There are thousands of fishermen in British Columbia whose livelihood will be seriously imperilled if conditions remain as they are. These fishermen will be waiting for the decision of the government with anxious hearts, and I hope and trust that the government will see their way clear to allow this matter to go to the select standing committee on Marine and fisheries.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, for over an hour and a half the hon. gentleman has regaled the house with a dissertation on fishery affairs on the Pacific coast. I shall not attempt to follow him, either in the extreme language he has used in describing matters which are capable of being discussed in the most ordinary way, or in the extravagant manner in which he has referred to this matter.

These regulations arose out of certain matters which were brought to my attention as Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I wish to take a measure of responsibility for the order in council to which reference has been made. Canada has a very valuable canned salmon business, which is largely limited to the Pacific coast. Our exports of that class of goods amount to from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000 a year. I think for the past two years they have amounted to something over $6,000,000 yearly, so it will be seen that this business is very important. About half these exports, roughly speaking, go to the United Kingdom, while our exports to Australia total over a million dollars, and in addition very considerable quantities go to other countries scattered throughout the world. It is highly essential that, so far as possible, we should maintain the quality of this product. Canada has achieved a very good name for its canned salmon in all the markets of the world. During the last ten years, in fact for a good many years, we have been faced with keen competition from the United States in fish packed in Alaskan waters and in adjacent American waters, but in more recent years Japanese salmon caught off the Siberian coast and the northern coast of that country has been a very serious competitor with our product in the world market; and during the past three years or so Russia also has come on the market with an excellent product in the form of canned salmon, making the competition against the Canadian product more and more keen.

We have been rather jealous of our pack. Efforts have been made for years to ensure that it should be uniform and of high quality. It is quite true that salmon of the same variety caught in different sections will frequently be somewhat different in colour and in the quality of the product, but efforts have been made for many years to maintain at least some standard of excellence in our product. During the past year, through information obtained from the commercial intelligence branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, we learned that the Canadian pack was deteriorating in some respects. Some portions of the pack had been called in question by importers, and indeed very serious loss to our business was threatened because of the lack of excellence in the pack. During the past three years a very close study was made of the problem and an inspection system was perfected last year. This system is not considered to be the final word but it was certainly the result of a very careful study by all concerned, and of a genuine effort to meet an exceedingly difficult problem with which we were confronted, that of inspecting, without too much cost, this very important problem.

My hon. friend himself admitted, after outlining to the house what he considered would be a satisfactory system of inspection, that it would be too costly to place an inspector to inspect every fish as it went through the various processes of packing, and so it was decided to appoint a board of inspectors and to stipulate that before the goods were approved they should receive a certificate from that board. The hon, member was good enough to pay a high compliment to these inspectors. He said that they were capable men, honourable men and good men. I do not think he would dare say otherwise. They were chosen by the trade in conjunction with the officers of the Fisheries department, and I think they are making a genuine effort to maintain the standard of excellence we have achieved and which we hope to preserve.

In any matter of this kind there are bound to be difficulties. I fear I shall have to ask the house to permit me to go back very briefly and refer to what has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)—some of the earlier history of the canning business. I do so merely for the purpose of making clear the point under discussion. Twenty, twenty-five or thirty years ago it was the custom in this country to issue a licence to the cannery and to allocate to that cannery a specific area which was to be in water contiguous to it, and all fish in that area had to be carried to that particular cannery. That worked quite satisfactorily for a great many years, as the hon. member himself has admitted, but certain abuses crept in, one of them being a tendency on the part of the owner of the cannery to retain complete control of fishing gear and so on. The federal government in those days issued what was known as a boat rating, allocating to each cannery thirty or forty boats according to its capacity. Each boat was licensed, the licence was held by the cannery, and the cannery would permit a certain crew to take boats out and fish, the fish being delivered to the cannery. Long before my hon. friend came into the house, I had taken the opportunity to point out some of the abuses which accompanied that system, and I was quite pleased to endorse fully the action of Mr. Ballantyne, when he was Minister of Marine twelve or fourteen years ago, in changing the system. During the past few years however the whole coast has been open; that is to say, fish might be caught near Prince Rupert and carried five hundred miles down the coast and canned in a cannery on the Fraser river or at Vancouver.

Obviously it is not good business to carry fresh fish such long distances, and in many instances by the time the collecting boats had collected the fish and carried it four or five hundred miles down the coast to the canneries at Vancouver or thereabouts, as great a period as forty-eight hours and sometimes sixty hours would elapse, and more than that indeed. Now I say it is obvious that the more quickly fish can be canned the better the quality of the output; and generally speaking our competitors on the other side of the Pacific, the Japanese and the Russians, and also the Americans in Alaskan waters, catch their fish and take it to canneries located within a comparatively short distance of the place where it is caught. So that their fish is fresh and firm and the colour is not impaired. On the other hand, a fish might be carried for two or three days and still might not be too bad. It might not be bad in the sense of being spoiled, but it would not be what we call prime product.

During the last year or so there has grown up a new practice and it is this. Individuals would have boats of a certain capacity, gas boats. I do not mean the small fishing boat but something of the tug type—my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) could give a better description of it than I can. The type of boat I am speaking about is a power boat with capacity for carrying the catch of a score or more of fishing boats, and it would go up the coast and collect from this and that fisherman throughout the fishing grounds, dumping these catches into the hold and carrying the fish hundreds of miles down to the cannery or selling it to some cannery in the neighbourhood. It may be asked, what is wrong with that? Well, there was certainly this wrong with it, that it imperilled the excellence of the catch; and I submit to the house this point at least, that whatever else this or any other government does in connection with our fisheries or in connection with our products generally, if we have any control at all we ought to see that the product is placed on the market in as prime a condition as it is possible to have it, and anything that detracts from such excellence must command and challenge the attention of this house.

Now there is positively no question that the excellence of our pack was impaired and that it deteriorated as a result of this practice. The hon. gentleman would have the house believe that we are going to deprive the fishermen of a free market. In his closing remarks he said that these fishermen were having their livelihood imperilled by this order in council. What are the facts? I say to the hon. gentleman, or perhaps I should say it to the house as it is quite useless to address my hon. friend: All questions have two sides. Of that there is no doubt. This government is not disinclined to listen to any reasonably honest presentation of the other side of any of its actions or the questioning of any of its actions. However, I am disinclined to attach much importance to much that the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I think he knows more about fish than any hon. member on this side of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: On that side of the house, that is possible.

An hon. MEMBER: Any side.

Mr. STEVENS: As I say, there are two sides to all questions. I am quite willing and quite prepared to admit that there are two sides to this question. We are not adverse to this matter being called into question and to having it examined carefully, but we should look at some of the facts before we jump to conclusions.

The Pacific coast of British Columbia is divided into three large fishing districts, and each fishing district contains from six to a dozen subdistricts for inspection purposes. The districts are very large and each contain a large number of canneries. The hon. gentleman sought to leave the impression with the house that there was but one cannery to a district. The hon. member shakes his head, but he will remember that I interjected while he was speaking to point out that that was not the case. Perhaps I should have secured a map of these districts, but I think I am safe in saying that there are from ten to fifteen canneries in each district, and even more in some districts. I will admit that last year they were not all operating, but a great many were. The fishermen in a district are at liberty to sell their fish to any cannery in that district. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I say positively that that is the case. I shall repeat it so that there may be no doubt about what I am saying. The fishermen in any one of these districts are at perfect liberty to sell their fish to any cannery within that district.

Mr. NEILL: Subject to this twenty-four hour rule.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, but he is within twenty-four hours of any point in that district. Due to weather conditions it might be possible that a fisherman out on the west coast of Vancouver island could not come around the lower or nothern part of the island to some remote cannery on the inside of the channel within twenty-four hours, but there are a number of canneries on the west coast of Vancouver island quite convenient to the fishing grounds where the fish are naturally caught. The fish to which my hon. friend referred that are caught outside and are brought into the Fraser river are largely fish caught by seiners out in what might be called extraterritorial waters. The fishermen on the west coast of Vancouver island near where my hon. friend lives have a number of canneries in that vicinity to which they can sell their fish. There are no complaints made as to the facilities for selling fish in that district.

This order in council which has been beleaguered so vigorously this afternoon, which has been condemned by my hon. friend, is precisely in the terms of another order in council which has been on the statute books —if you like to use that term—for many years. The hon. member has been sitting in this house for seven or eight years while that other order in council has been in force and he has not said a word about it. That order in council proscribes the movement of fish from Queen Charlotte island to the mainland. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) knows that.

An hon. MEMBER: Prescribes?

Mr. STEVENS: Proscribes the movement of fish from Queen Charlotte island to the mainland. This order in council was prompted by the previous order which has been in force for years. Did we hear the hon. gentleman spend an hour and a half in condemning the government which he was supporting at that time because of that order in council?

Mr. NEILL: That is not in my district.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman says that that is not in his district, but is the whole Pacific coast in his district? For an hour and a half he has been talking about the whole Pacific coast. As far as the fishermen in his district are concerned they can sell their fish to forty or fifty different canneries contiguous to his district. The point to be brought to the attention of the house is that an order in council in precisely the same terms has been in force for years.

Why was this order in council passed? As I have intimated, information came to us from all parts of the world—the hon. gentleman cited one from Australia—that there was a deterioration in the standard of our fish.

Mr. NEILL: That is hardly fair. The letter I quoted had nothing to do with quality.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend be kind enough to contain himself? He has had an hour and a half of this.

Mr. NEILL: The minister must not make a mistake.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend did not catch what I said. I will put it in the first person. Information came to me in my capacity as Minister of Trade and Commerce from Australia, Great Britain and different sections of the world that our canned salmon was deteriorating in its standard, that it was not as good as it had been. I became somewhat alarmed about this and I took up the matter with my colleague, the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau), and the outcome was this order in council. After studying the situation for months we found that the movement of fish over long distances on the Pacific coast caused a deterioration in the condition of the fish when brought to the canneries for canning purposes. We felt that it was desirable to restrict the movement of fish virtually within the district in which they were caught. The order in council provides for a movement of twenty-four hours, and the hon. gentleman asks how we are going to enforce that. I will admit that with clever men designing to evade it, it can be evaded just the same as any other regulation. However, we are advised by the inspection officers, and they are a fine group of men, that it can be enforced and that they will be able to control that movement, which in my opinion and in the opinion of those most concerned is seriously affecting the salmon pack. It is felt that the delivery of fish to canneries within a reasonable distance of the place where they are caught will result in an improved pack and the saving of this industry from serious loss in its reputation and standing abroad.

I wish to refer to some statements made by my hon. friend, because I think it would be a great mistake to allow them to remain on Hansard unchallenged. I admit that his manner of presenting his views is very effective, certainly when it is not tried too often. He said that this order in council stated that the fish must be landed within twenty-four hours, and he then went on, with tragedy in his voice, to say that the order did not state that they must be canned. He said that they could be allowed to lie there for an indefinite period. Does he or anyone else think that a cannery with thousands of dollars at stake is going to receive nice fresh fish and allow them to lie on the wharf in the sun? The first principle of proper cannery operation is to get the fish canned as quickly as possible.

Mr. NEILL: Why not say so?

Mr. STEVENS: No one needs to say it to any intelligent person. That is the first principle of successful operation of a cannery, so that when the fish come within the twenty-four hour period to the cannery, they will be canned as quickly as possible.

The hon. gentleman said that something had been put over and that this had been done in the dark. All I can say is that in my department we gave it a great deal of study and thought. There was no attempt to put anything over; it was done just as was the previous order, under the terms of the act that empowered us to do it, and it was done for the purpose that I have mentioned.

The hon. gentleman referred to the inspectors, indicating, as I said a moment ago, that the inspectors were capable. Then he spent about fifteen minutes ridiculing the system of inspection we are at present carrying on. I have already intimated that we do not assume that this system of inspection is perfect. It has been put into operation for one purpose, namely to seek the improvement of our product. How is the inspection carried out? It is carried out precisely the same as that of almost any other product that is put into a container.

Mr. DUFF: Under the Meat and Canned Foods Act?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. Take fruit that is boxed or barrelled. It is inspected by selecting a number of boxes, taking one here and there, and inspecting them. If any suspicion is aroused by the boxes that are opened, a closer inspection is made and a larger number are opened. When these canned salmon are brought to the point of export, generally Vancouver—although it is not essential that they come to Vancouver because the inspector will if necessary go to an outport—and put into the large sheds, the inspector goes into the warehouse, takes a box here, then passes over a dozen boxes and takes another there, and so on, and inspects the condition of the salmon in the can. If he finds the pack is not up to the standard fixed by the inspectors and the department, then the shipment is not given a certificate for export as No. 1.

The hon. gentleman read a letter which he had received from Australia. Just what his point was in reading that letter I could not quite see; I followed him with some care, but I did not just see the application. He now disclaims any suggestion that his reason was that the pack was inferior. The letter referred to this: Canadian canned salmon had been shipped to Australia and it was labelled "pinks" or "chums" or whatever quality it was, but some unscrupulous individual or dealer in Australia took the labels off and put on others indicating that it was first-class red salmon, sockeye, although it was not sockeye and it was not first-class red salmon, so that this admittedly inferior salmon was being marketed in Australia as No. 1 fresh, thus injuring our reputation in that market. Officers of my department were brought into contact with the matter and it was taken up with the Australian government and adjusted, I think quite satisfactorily, because the Australian government would not knowingly countenance anything of the kind.

Further, suggestions have come from Great Britain as to the inferiority of the pack. I am sorry that the matter comes up in this form, because we are simply giving publicity to it and probably doing still further injury to the reputation of our salmon. We are exceedingly jealous of the standard of our products, not only canned fish but other commodities, but now that we are discussing this, I am referring to canned salmon. We feel it is our duty to do everything we can to maintain the high standard of that product. We want the people abroad to feel that when a Canadian official inspection certificate goes with a shipment, it will carry the same weight abroad as would grain shipment certificates. That is what we are seeking to do, and what we have done was with one desire and one object only, namely, to achieve that end.

In regard to the fishermen, let me say this: no fisherman is forced to take his catch to any one cannery, as was urged. On the contrary, as I have already indicated, he is at liberty to take his fish to any cannery within the sailing distance mentioned in the order, and without doubt he will have the chance of any one of at least a dozen canneries where he can market his product. I can give more detail of what has been going on with regard to the practice that I have mentioned of these collecting boats going out, but I do not think it is desirable to do so. I do not wish to stir up undue controversy, but I should like to impress upon the house that what I have said is our object, our desire.

My hon. friend referred a moment ago to wheat. He said: What would you think if we were to pass a law saying that our wheat had to be taken to one elevator? In the first place wheat is not a perishable article like fish; it is an entirely different kind of product; and in the second place, as I have already shown to the house, there is no such limitation.

Let me say to my hon. friend and to the house that the government is disposed to give the fullest consideration to any reasonable representations that may be made as to, shall I say, the adverse effects of this order, if there are any such. We are quite prepared to receive those representations and to give them every consideration. I deplore the extreme terms in which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni put forward his case. It is very difficult to administer fisheries; there are conflicting interests. I deplore the reflection upon the cannery interests, because I believe on the whole the men operating the canneries on the Pacific coast are doing the best they can for the trade in which they are engaged. That their interests at times conflict with those of the fishermen, would be expected, and they undoubtedly do. But I want to assure the house that there was no ulterior motive, no attempt to put something over. This was not done in the dark; it was done in the open and for the good of the industry, and we believe it will be beneficial thereto. At the same time I say again that should there be any representations it is desired to make, the government will be pleased to receive them.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my protest with that of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), even at the risk of incurring the wrath of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and even though I may be blamed by him for taking up some time, although I shall not take an hour and a half. I believe what has happened regarding these orders in council and the conditions affected by them warrant the attention of the house being called to the whole matter. I have not many remarks to make about the particular order in council to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred and covered fully and to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied. I wish to speak with especial reference to another order in council that has been passed and that is, I believe, more harmful in its effect and will certainly do more damage to those engaged in the industry than the order in council which has just been under review.

I want first, however, to protest as strongly as I can against the methods used in making these changes without any reference whatever to parliament, and especially changes that are of importance and that might have serious effects. Changes are now made in the law simply by order in council and neither the fishermen concerned nor even members of parliament are aware of them until they see them in either the newspapers or the Canada Gazette. In 1930 the fisheries committee reviewed the whole of the present fishery act. Matters went along rather harmoniously at that time and after every one of us was allowed an opportunity to put forth his ideas. At that time we had a chance to speak on every clause and section. But since that time there have been dozens of changes until to-day the only parallel I can call to mind is the jig-saw puzzle. It is just about as great a puzzle to find out what the act really means as to put together one of those pictures. I ask the committee this question: What is the purpose of the fisheries committee, and why have we one at all. A few days ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) introduced a bill concerning the inspection of hay and straw. Before that bill proceeded far it was referred to the committee on agriculture, so that full opportunity would be given for discussion. Surely in connection with fishery matters we are entitled to the same consideration; surely we should be entitled to a hearing. I maintain all matters of importance affecting the fisheries should go first of all before the fisheries committee so that full opportunity for discussion might be afforded, and so that hon. members may be in a position to make their representations.

The fishing industry should also have a specially appointed minister. To-night it would appear that we have two acting ministers of fisheries. One spoke in reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and the other is termed the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau). I believe the fishing industry, involving millions of dollars and the employment of thousands of people, should have devoted to it the full time of a minister. I am bold enough to state that had the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who was previously Minister of Fisheries, still been in that position, I doubt very much if these orders in council would have passed without first having the approval of the committee or of the House of Commons. I say, further, that if the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Finance had continued to act as Minister of Fisheries, I believe he would have given that consideration to hon. members and to the fishing industry in general.

It might be interesting to the house to hear how some of the representations are made regarding the industry. The deputy minister for the past few years has made trips to British Columbia in the interests of the fishing industry. The Minister of Finance, when he was Minister of Fisheries, made one trip, for which we were pleased and also grateful; the British Columbia fishermen were very much pleased with the interest he displayed. When the deputy minister comes to the coast, meetings are arranged with the fishermen. There are two distinct bodies I might say in the fishing industry, namely those who are engaged in fishing and have boats and nets, and the canning interests. I am sorry there are two such distinct bodies, because I maintain the sooner they cooperate and come together the better it will be for the industry.

When the deputy minister comes out west meetings are arranged between the various bodies. I want hon. members to bear in mind, however, that while the meetings with the fishermen are open to the public and the recommendations made to the minister are broadcast, the canning interests also have a secretary in attendance taking notes. They are very cute about it. They do not hold their meetings until after the meetings with the fishermen and the deputy have been completed. Then it is that the canners hold a secret conclave with the deputy minister all on the quiet and so put forward their resolutions and recommendations. Naturally I am very much interested in the fishermen, and still hold that interest. With that in mind I decided to go to one of the meetings of canners, because representing a fishing constituency I thought I ought to know or hear both sides of the industry. You should have seen the look of consternation and fear when I walked into the meeting of canners. They took fright. One of them got up and said, "Mr. Deputy, I thought this was a private meeting where we would be allowed to talk in secret with you. Is the hon. member going to be allowed to listen in?" As a result I was asked to withdraw until they had had an opportunity to discuss my presence and the whole matter. At the time I wished I had a camera, because the moment I entered the room there was a look of consternation in the faces of those men. They were preparing to put recommendations before the deputy minister in secret. In my view that is not the proper way to carry on. The canners and fishermen who have mutual interests should have joint meetings, and at those meetings both the cannery interests and the men should place their proposals before the deputy or the government. When the fishermen hold their meetings first, the canning interests have time to know what is being proposed or opposed by the fishermen. They then meet in secret and tell the deputy minister what they believe should be done for the good of the industry. They are not thinking or acting on behalf of the fishermen—oh, no; they are acting on behalf of themselves, the vested interests. The cannery interests have considerable capital at hand, and are also in a position to send deputations to Ottawa. In fact, I believe that has actually been done; a deputation did arrive not long ago, at a time I believe previous to the change of the act, by order in council.

We have always understood that we would be told when changes were going to be made. But in connection with the order in council no consideration was given to us at all. Like a bolt from the blue it was put into effect. The first we learned about it was when the notice appeared in the Gazette.

The statement is made that the cannery interests represent all the canners, but I suggest that is not true. In support of that contention I shall read from a letter before me received from Colonial Packers Limited of Vancouver, British Columbia. I believe the deputy minister received a similar communication, reading in part as follows:

> The canned salmon section of the Canadian Manufacturers Association is the only association formed to date by the salmon canners and they certainly do not represent one hundred per cent of the canners, of whom we believe there are nineteen. They are the body who are consulted in cannery matters as a rule, but it is extremely doubtful whether half the canners in British Columbia are members, but the fact that it is dominated by the three large companies is unquestioned.
>
> Regarding the amendment to section 27a of the Meat and Canned Foods Act which states "No certificates shall be issued for canned salmon that has not been landed fresh at a cannery for canning within twenty-four hours after being caught, excepting fish that has been gutted and iced immediately after being caught" we should like to inquire; Why not?
> Surely the inspection board was created to function in these cases. If they are satisfied that the salmon was fresh when packed what bearing has the length of time in which they were landed on the matter? According to this regulation if a canner lands salmon twenty-five hours after being caught and cans it immediately he is deprived of all chance of a certificate whereas if the salmon is landed twenty-three hours after capture and held in the cannery for a further twenty-four hours it can obtain a certificate if the board passes the product although it might be much older fish than the other. Does this make sense?

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said there were two sides to the story, but fortunately or unfortunately there are three sides to it. I shall give another side which he has entirely omitted. Not being Deputy Minister of Fisheries, he is probably not aware of what I am about to state. He said the object of the change was to have the fish properly gutted and iced, and so kept fresh and in proper condition. Last year certain canning interests on the Fraser river brought in from the American traps over 27,000 American caught sockeye salmon which were later canned, stamped and sent, I believe, to Great Britain. That is the information I have, and I have stated it to the deputy minister. I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in his seat, because I should like to tell him that the sockeye salmon caught in those traps might have been there two, three or four days, and the longer they are kept in traps the greater is their deterioration. Although brought from the trap to the canneries within probably four hours, they may have been in the trap for five days and so would not be as fresh as fish caught in other districts and brought perhaps a forty-eight hour journey to the cannery.

There is another aspect. I might point out in passing that the canneries who had objected to the poor fishermen sending their fresh salmon across the line when they could obtain better prices there last year themselves deliberately bought fish from the American traps and brought fish in from the United States because they could purchase them a little cheaper. They practically told the fishermen of the Fraser to do what they liked with their fish, because they could buy cheaper on the American side. I think that ought to be taken serious notice of, and I am glad the acting Minister of Fisheries is in his seat. Not only has objection come to the acting minister from the Colonial Packers Limited, but objection has come also from the cooperative association, and, through its secretary, Mr. Maiden, from the British Columbia Fishermen's Protective Association of New Westminster, which is composed of hundreds of members. I might point out that there are over fourteen hundred individual licences issued on the Fraser river, and all those men are vitally concerned in this matter of the transport of fish.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and myself are not the only ones who hold the views that we are expounding here to-night, because I note in The Province of February 6 that the Hon. Mr. Howe, the Minister of Fisheries for British Columbia, attended a meeting in New Westminster, and, speaking about this very same thing, the transport of fish from one area to another, said:

> As dominion inspection of canned salmon takes place it safeguards the public irrespective of where the fish had been transported from to the cannery.

That is the opinion of Hon. Mr. Howe, who is in charge of the fisheries for the province of British Columbia. So we are not alone in regard to this matter.

The most serious matter, however—and I say it in all seriousness to the acting minister—is the question of purse seines in the gulf of Georgia. I might say that on the 8th of February I wrote the acting minister regarding this matter and I received a reply from him dated the tenth, in which he says the question is still receiving consideration. I will just ask you to note that, Mr. Speaker, because at the time that letter was written the order in council had been passed or was being passed. I think it is unfair to write a letter to a member saying that this would receive consideration, "this" being the protest that I was then making against purse seining in the gulf of Georgia, at a time when the order in council had already been passed. I would like some explanation of that, especially if the acting minister is going to reply, because the order in council is of the same date. I do not know who is responsible for the orders in council which have been put into effect, but we had an explanation to-night of who was responsible for at least one of them, when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) took the responsibility for the one regarding the gutting and cleaning of salmon. The men engaged in the industry have been entirely ignored, and by this order in council which allows purse seines in the gulf of Georgia have had it put over them. I will send this map to the minister when I am through. I have it marked, and if he will examine it closely he will see that the area now taken in by the order in council practically cuts across the mouth of the Fraser and blocks the whole river. I would remind him also that gill nets cannot operate where seines operate, so that if seines are allowed here to catch pinks in the mouth of the Fraser it will do away entirely with the men who use gill nets. That is point number one. I am also drawing his attention to another point, that the individual fisherman fishes far into the area now open to seines. It will absolutely do away with the individual fisherman, and at a time like this I maintain is very serious indeed. The acting minister may say: Oh yes, but the pink salmon are in far better condition being caught out there than after they come up the Fraser river. This is questionable, Mr. Speaker, but even so the pink salmon in the Fraser river is not such a serious matter as to warrent the use of seines, because from the particulars before me I find that in 1931, out of 83,000 cases that were canned in district No. 1, which is the Fraser river district, there were only 557 cases of pinks. The year before there was a smaller catch, 13,375, and out of that 896 cases of pinks. So the matter of catching pinks out there is not as serious as either the deputy or the acting minister would have us believe. Another point overlooked entirely is this, that the pink salmon that is caught there does not all go into cans; part is canned, but a great part of the catch is dry-salted and shipped abroad. The Japanese fishermen sent more dry-salted pink salmon to Japan last year than was canned, according to the return of the deputy minister, which I have in my hand. It was valued at roughly $12,000,000. And pink salmon is not only canned and dry-salted; it is also sold to the public and used as one of our excellent fishes to eat fresh.

Another serious matter, and one I would ask the hon. minister to pay some attention to, is this: In 1930 there was a treaty adopted by Canada, called the Sockeye Salmon treaty. It was acceptable to this country, but up to date it has not been passed by the Senate of the United States. I had great hopes that with the change of administration this would pass the United States Senate this year. But by passing order in council No. 274 and allowing purse seines in the mouth of the Fraser and the gulf close to the international boundary I claim we have struck a serious blow at the chances of the passage of that Sockeye Salmon treaty by the United States Senate. If we had approached them and said, "You are using traps and seines below the international boundary and are catching the majority of the fish; we spend thousands of dollars a year in breeding fish which on the return journey are caught by the destructive methods used on your side, by both seines and traps", we might have come to an agreement that would allow us a fifty per cent catch. But now we are attempting to retaliate. We say: They are using seines; now we will use seines. And I suppose this is going to be the thin end of the wedge for the introduction of traps; because they use traps we will say the Canadians might as well use them too. I am very sorry that this move was made at this time, especially since a bill has just been introduced into the Senate of the United States asking for the abolition of the use of fish traps and seines for the catching of salmon in the Washington state and Puget sound area. I have information to the effect that this bill has been introduced, and I have every reason to believe that it has a good chance to pass the United States Senate.

As I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, on the Fraser river we have about 1,400 individual fishermen. The use of seines at the mouth of the river will actually drive many of those fishermen away or at least curtail their opportunity to earn a livelihood. By using seines at the mouth of the river they will also catch many sockeye; it is stated by the British Columbia Fishermen's Protective Association that there will be probably two pink salmon for every sockeye caught when using seines. Permitting the use of each purse seine will do away with about 150 or 200 fishermen; each seine is equal to about that number of men. The use of seines in certain districts may be all right; I am not saying they never should be used in some districts, but if the minister will take note of this map which I have marked very carefully I believe he will agree that the individual fishermen will be driven off the Fraser river. The fish will not be able to pass the seines and individual gill net boats will be unable to work. It is true that in the United States they have used seines and traps, but we have condemned and still condemn all such methods.

I do not know that I have a great deal more to add with regard to this matter. I believe the order in council has been far too drastic, and I think this and the preceding order in council should have been referred to the committee on marine and fisheries. I thought it was the policy of the department and of parliament to give that committee something to do. Both the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself are members of that committee, but apparently it is not to function at all; apparently all regulations are to be put into effect by order in council. The functions of parliament have been taken away, and really if this kind of policy is carried on much further there is little use in our coming here in an endeavour to represent our constituencies if we are to have no chance to present the case of the people who send us. As I say, this order in council affects hundreds of fishermen on the Fraser river. Just why the policy of the department, which has previously been to curtail the use of seines, should be departed from at this time when thousands of men are unable to get employment, I am at a loss to understand. I protest against this measure as strongly as possible. I did not want to bring forward a want of confidence motion, but I am going to ask with all the power I can that the acting minister seriously consider this whole matter and see if it would not be possible to refer all the recent orders in council to the fisheries committee where they can be properly dealt with, and in the meantime to defer any action allowing the use of seines in the gulf of Georgia.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I wish to support the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) in this matter. I have a number of fishermen in my riding, and whenever I meet them they always complain about the changes in the regulations. They do not know what is going to happen from one year to another. I think altogether too many changes are made to suit the whims not of the fishermen but of the canners.

I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is not in his place; I was going to take exception to the licking he undertook to hand out to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. The minister made the statement that the arguments of my hon. friend were not understandable. Apparently the people in Comox-Alberni understand them; the hon. member has been sent here for many years with big majorities. If there were a by-election in British Columbia to-day and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were to contest the seat, I am sure the minister would be lucky if he did not lose his deposit. The people of British Columbia have a warm feeling for the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

We in British Columbia are all anxious to see the quality of British Columbia salmon maintained. I am not going into details, but I ask the acting minister it if would not be possible even now to cancel this order in council and refer this proposed regulation to the committee that is ready for action but has nothing to do. I am not a member of that committee, but I do not believe it has done anything this session. Goodness knows this problem could have been threshed out long ago. The minister of Trade and Commerce was in Vancouver a short time ago, and no doubt he discussed this matter while he was there. It is not at all likely that he had any representations from the fishermen, and I should like to know where the minister got the information that led him to believe these changes should be made. It seems to me any proposed changes should be considered in Vancouver, which would permit the fishermen to make representations in their own behalf. The canners can come to Ottawa, but the fishermen are not able to do so.

I will not take up more of the time of the house, but I do think the government should drop this business of government by order in council. What good are we here? What are we here for? This matter could have been threshed out long ago by the committee on marine and fisheries, and I would ask the minister even now to consider cancelling this order in council and leaving the matter to that committee.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I do not intend to answer in detail the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Munn). My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has fully covered the ground. With regard to the two matters brought up by my hon. friend from New Westminster, particularly with reference to purse seining at the mouth of the North Fraser river, let me assure the hon. member that we will study the question very closely. This is a very important matter, and this government has in mind only one end; that is the welfare of the fishermen, of the business interests and of the country at large. Those orders in council were adopted after consideration by the officials of my department, who are men of long experience, and by the government. After listening to my hon. friends, however, let me say that we will again consider these matters, and I hope we will come to some reasonable conclusion. That is all I can say at the moment.

ALLEGED MALADMINISTRATION IN DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I would ask to be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words with regard to a matter brought up the other day by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with regard to some repairs made on the trail between Bamfield and Pachena, on the west coast. My hon. friend brought this matter up the other day without any previous notice, and I want to say that he was unfair to the Minister of Marine and even to this house when he made the statements he did about the minister.

This is a contract for $1,000 for repairs to five little wooden bridges on that trail and the hon. gentleman made the statement that he was bringing up the matter here because he had received no satisfaction from the Minister of Marine although he had been in correspondence with him since October last—

Mr. NEILL: With his department.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —without results, without reply. I could not answer the other day; my hon. friend had his file in his hands and I had none here. However, I was amazed when I came back to my office to discover that the first and only letter which was directed to the minister by my hon. friend was a letter dated February 9, 1933. This letter was received at my office on the following day, the 10th, and the hon. gentleman brought the matter up in this house on the following Tuesday, the 14th. Now I say, Mr. Speaker, that this statement was absolutely unfair to the minister—the statement that he had been in communication with the minister since last October. I have his statements here. He said, "I have been writing to the minister since October."

Mr. NEILL: It should have been the department.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And further he says that "you cannot get replies to letters." I say that was absolutely unfair. I had only one letter which was received at my office on the Friday, and on Monday morning, when I came back from the week-end in Montreal, I wired immediately to my marine agent in Victoria, asking him for particulars about that contract. My hon. friend, in that letter dated February 9, summarized the charges he made the other day, that in connection with that contract of $1,000 the contractor had made a profit of $700. On the Monday I wired to my marine agent in Victoria in these words:

In connection with McDonald contract repair bridges on trail between Bamfield and Pachena, it is necessary to know at once how long McDonald took to do work, how many men he employed, what wages he paid to each, amount of material McDonald supplied and how much profit he made on the job. Wire reply soon as possible.

That was on the 13th, the following Monday, and before waiting for my reply my hon. friend got up on the following day and made the charges which I have just stated. The hon. gentleman compared this contractor to highwaymen, to Bill Miner, who robbed the Canadian Pacific, and so on.

Now what are the facts? The answer I received was this:

Your wire repairs bridges Bamfield. Work lasted twenty-seven days. On account lateness of season men worked every day at ten and one-half hours per day September twentieth to October seventeenth. Crew consisted six men, four men at four dollars per day and board, one at five dollars per day and board, one at six dollars per day and board, total wages seven hundred and forty-five dollars. Expenses food ninety-six dollars camp equipment and launch hire one hundred and seventeen dollars, material furnished by contractor forty-two dollars. Contractors profit represented by wages as already stated at six dollars per day. Contractor also carried out considerable additional work. Work completed thoroughly satisfactory manner.

My hon. friend stated that he had been in communication with the minister since October last without receiving any reply or any satisfaction. As a matter of fact, he had been in communication with my assistant deputy minister since last October and he received an answer to every letter he wrote, obtaining every possible detail with regard to the contract.

I do not want to take up the time of the house giving full details, but I can assure the house that the hon. gentleman was treated in the fairest possible manner by my department. I can also assure the house that my instructions to my officials are to be considerate to every member of this house whether on the other side or on this side, and if there is one instance in which those instructions have been carried out to the limit it is on this occasion. They even sent my hon. friend the tender for these works, not only the details but even the tender, and he received every explanation.

There was absolutely nothing wrong in this matter. It was a small contract of $1,000. The hon. gentleman said that they should have asked for tenders. Well, he was told why tenders were not called for by my department. It was suggested by our agent at Victoria, Colonel Wilby, that no tender should be called for in order that local labour only be employed. That was the information given my hon. friend by the department. The works had been estimated by one official of my department to cost $1,300, and they were estimated by Colonel Wilby himself, who is an engineer, to cost $1,220.

Mr. NEILL: Was he on the ground?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is the information I received. As a matter of fact, the total work cost $1,189.72.

Mr. NEILL: More than the contract.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —and the profit of the contractor, according to the information I have received, was exactly $162, that is, his wages for 27 days at $6 a day.

Mr. NEILL: How did it come to $189 more than the contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The contract was for $1,000 plus certain materials to be supplied by the department. We supplied lumber to the value of $154.35, hardware to the value of $35.37, and the contractors supplied the rest to the value of $42. I claim that my hon. friend was absolutely unfair to the minister and to this house when he represented the facts in the manner he did. There was nothing in this contract that was at all reprehensible. I thought it was only fair to the house and to the officials in my department that I should give this explanation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Salaries, $865,692; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The increase is very small.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think it would be well to ask the minister to have this item stand. The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has suggested that all items dealing with salaries should stand until the legislation in connection with the salary deduction is passed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think that position is quite fair. Perhaps we could take up the contingencies.

Mr. NEILL: I do not see how we could pass one portion of the vote and not the other.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is this vote for?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The amount is arrived at by taking the average for the six months in the current year. The amount is split up as follows:

Clerical and other assistance, $15,000.
Printing and stationery, $9,500.
Sundries, $15,500.

This is $2,000 less than last year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps this part of the item should also stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Lighthouse and coast service — amount required to pay compassionate allowance to John Davidson, formerly lightkeeper at Cape Mudge, B.C., $500.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is this vote for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is a compassionate allowance to John Davidson, former lightkeeper at Cape Mudge. The same vote has been in the estimates for years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In what district is that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) can tell you.

Item agreed to.

Marine signal service, $99,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has a signal been placed on the light upon the island of Anticosti in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think any new apparatus was installed last year. This vote is for service, not for new construction.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES

Mines and geological survey—for administration of the Explosives Act (chap. 62, r.s., 1927), $10,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are there any salaries in this item?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): It is partly salary.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then perhaps this item could stand.

Item stands.

Miscellaneous—grant to Imperial Institute, $9,733.33.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister explain the reason for this grant?

Mr. GORDON: This is under an agreement with the United Kingdom and the other dominions. It is one of those institutions that were set up in Great Britain for the purpose of assembling information in connection with the mineral resources of the empire. Under the agreement each dominion contributes so much money, Canada's contribution being as is indicated in the item, $9,733.33.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that in Canadian funds or English currency?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How long has this agreement been in force between the government of this country and those of England and the other dominions?

Mr. GORDON: If I recollect aright, since 1923.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How long has it to run?

Mr. GORDON: At the present time a conference is taking place in London with a view to consolidating the various efforts such as this that have to do with assembling empire information with respect to many matters including minerals, and I am hopeful that after this conference has concluded its work, all these matters will be consolidated in one information bureau. If that takes place, then this vote will disappear and probably be absorbed in a general vote covering items of this character.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are any reports from this Imperial Institute available at present?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They have been available for eight years.

Mr. GORDON: I imagine there are reports, although I have seen them only when I have sought some special information. At times I have received information from the institute with respect to certain minerals. I have not seen any comprehensive annual report; I am not sure there is one.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not wish to be disrespectful, but as a matter of fact is the institute anything more than a post office, if I may so say, or a collection office through which are transmitted reports received from various parts of the empire? In other words, is a synopsis made of these reports and a new report published, or are just such pamphlets as are thought to be of use to some particular part of the empire transmitted through that office?

Mr. GORDON: I would not go so far as to say that it is merely a post office. It is essential, and the mining industry considers it essential, that information should be assembled from various parts of the empire showing what minerals they have in abundance, what minerals they are short of, what minerals we could export to them, what minerals we are short of and could get within the empire, and whether those mineral deposits have been developed or are capable of being turned into industry. Matters of that kind are assembled in the Imperial Institute and from time to time the Dominion of Canada has turned toward the institute for that information. Personally I believe the institute has been of more service to the colonies than to the dominions; that has been my view for some years, and I am not at all wedded to the continuance for any great period of time of this institute without a revision of its activities. As I said a few minutes ago, I believe after the conference to which I have referred these various activities will be coordinated, their expense reduced and their usefulness to those seeking information about various parts of the empire and their products increased.

Mr. RALSTON: What I was really trying to find out was whether anything was done there in the way of expert work or whether it was more or less clerical, if I may so term it, synopsizing the various reports received. It occurred to me that the transmission of these reports from various parts of the empire could, in these times when conditions are difficult, be done directly between the different parts of the empire instead of the information having to go through a central office, and that such reports as were useful to us could be used in our Department of Mines and others discarded rather than that they should all go to a central bureau and be distributed from it.

Mr. NEILL: Did I understand the minister to say that this institute had been in operation only since 1923?

Mr. GORDON: That is my recollection.

Mr. NEILL: I have an idea, unless I have the wrong name in my head, that this had been running for about forty years and that at one time it was considered as being of great advantage, but for some years it has died out altogether. Could this information not be obtained through Canada House?

Mr. GORDON: I believe so.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $2,000,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the minister explain the increase of $250,000?

Mr. GORDON: The increase is because more coal has been moved subject to what is known as subvention. This increase is to take care of that extra movement of coal upon which subvention is paid.

Mr. REID: Is this a rebate given to the railway companies for transporting coal?

Mr. GORDON: No. Under the coal subventions the money is paid to the producer of the coal, not to the railways. The subvention applies not only to a comparatively small movement for the railways, but east and west for coal used for industrial purposes. That is where most of the money involved in this vote goes.

Mr. NEILL: Does this cover payment to the coal mines in Vancouver island?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: As this amount is larger than formerly and as I presume we are voting it for the future, am I justified in assuming that the grants will be continued after they lapse as they will in June of this year?

Mr. GORDON: It is the intention of the government at present to see that the various orders in council establishing the subventions are renewed, and those who contemplate making the usual spring contracts have been advised that it is the intention of the government to renew these subventions in order that there will be no anxiety in regard to entering into contracts for the coming year.

Mr. NEILL: For what period will they be renewed—a year?

Mr. GORDON: The subventions being payable out of a vote of this character are of necessity only for the current year, because they come out of money voted by parliament for the purpose and not under a statute. Therefore this will be until the end of the fiscal year 1934.

Mr. NEILL: But the existing grant runs out in June, 1933. Will the government renew it for another year or will it be renewed only for nine months?

Mr. GORDON: If it were possible to renew it for a whole year, I see no objection to doing so, but my view at the moment is that we can renew it only until the end of the next fiscal year. If it is renewed again, then it would be for a twelve months period.

Mr. BENNETT: Or done by a supplementary estimate.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
