OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, November 15, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table of the house several orders in council passed pursuant to the relief measures, all referring to payments of money.

REPORT OF PIG COMMISSION

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to lay on the table of the house the report, asked for last night by hon. members, of the British reorganization commission on pigs and pig products.

QUESTIONS

SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF COMMISSION

Mr. BOTHWELL:

1. What returns, if any, has the government received from the Saskatchewan relief commission, or the Saskatchewan government, this year, on account of the notes taken from farmers of that province for relief extended from September 1, 1931, to date?

2. What moneys, and on what dates, have been advanced by the government to the Saskatchewan relief commission, or the Saskatchewan government for relief purposes, since March 31, 1932?

3. What is the amount of indebtedness incurred by the Saskatchewan relief commission, and not paid, up to November 1, 1932?

Mr. GORDON:

1. None.

2. To the Saskatchewan government for the credit of the Saskatchewan relief commission for relief: May 19, 1932, $1,500,000; July 25, 1932, $2,000,000; August 18, 1932, $1,500,000 and for seed and seeding operations: April 6, 1932, $2,000,000; April 12, 1932, $2,000,000; May 4, 1932, $2,000,000.

To the Saskatchewan government by way of loans to enable the province to make loans to municipalities, and for other governmental services: April 24, 1932, $500,000; September 14, 1932, $646,962 04.

3. No information.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—GRANBY, QUE.

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. Did the municipal council of the township of Granby make an application for unemployment relief money in 1930?

2. If so, what was the amount?

3. On what date did the provincial government of Quebec produce its accounts with respect to this application?

4. Were representations made to the federal government regarding the settlement of these accounts?

5. If so, by whom and on what date were such representations made?

Mr. GORDON:

1 and 2. Under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, federal approval was given to a program of relief works submitted by the province of Quebec on behalf of Granby township, consisting of road works, water works, and bridge work, the total estimated cost of which amounted to $6,000, to which the Dominion government agreed to contribute 25 per cent or $1,500.

3, 4, and 5. No accounts have yet been received from the provincial government in respect to the works above referred to. On August 11, 1932, the Dominion wrote to the province stating that it was understood that accounts covering the works referred to had been forwarded to the province by the municipality, and asking if accounts would be rendered to the Dominion government. Under date of August 24 the provincial authorities replied stating that they were awaiting a reply to communications addressed by the province to the municipality.

CLARK STEAMSHIP COMPANY

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Did the Clark Steamship Company receive subsidies from the government during the past ten years?

2. If so, what were the amounts of subsidies and for what purposes were they granted?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Yes.

2. (a) For each season of navigation on the St. Lawrence from 1922 to 1924, inclusive: (1) Quebec and Natashquan, etc., $85,000 per season for a weekly mail, passenger and freight service on the north shore; (2) Quebec, Gaspé and Paspebiac, $30,000 per season for a fortnightly passenger and freight service on the south shore.

(b) For each season of navigation on the St. Lawrence from 1925 to 1934, inclusive; (1) Quebec and Natashquan, etc., $85,000 per season for a weekly mail, passenger and freight service on the north shore, with larger ships; (2) Quebec (or Montreal) and Gaspé, $60,000 per season for a weekly passenger and freight service on the south shore, with larger ships.

(c) Murray Bay and North Shore (winter service): (1) December, 1928 to March 1929, inclusive two round trips each month between Murray bay and north shore ports: Subsidy, $32,900 for the season. (2) December 1929 to March 1930, inclusive two round trips each month between Murray bay and north shore ports, Subsidy, $32,900 for the season.

SS. ARCTIC

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. What amount of money, if any, was paid by the Canadian government to any one as compensation, damages or otherwise in connection with the death of Wilfrid Caron, third officer of the ss. Arctic?

2. What amount of money, if any, was paid by the Canadian government as compensation, damages or otherwise in the case of the death of Desmond O'Connell, drowned in trying to save one Wilfrid Caron on the night of July 9, 1923?

3. If any money was paid in the case of Desmond O'Connell: (a) to whom was it paid; (b) what was the amount paid; (c) on what date was it paid?

4. Were the lives of Wilfrid Caron and Desmond O'Connell covered by any Workmen's Compensation Act?

5. If any settlement was made in both or in either of the above cases, what were the terms and who were the parties thereto?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. $3,920.44 (Grant $3,500, funeral expenses, etc. $420.44).

2. $1,914.65 (Grant $1,500, funeral expenses, etc. $414.65).

3. (a) His mother. (b) $1,500 (c) June 30, 1924, $500, July 26, 1924, $1,000.

(a) Brady & Harris (b) $224.00 (c) Nov. 9, 1923.

4. The legal officers of the crown did not think so and special grants were obtained from parliament.

5. Answered by No. 3.

[Mr. Stevens.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES—DISMISSALS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Were employees of the Post Office Department dismissed since the month of August, 1930, on charges of political interference in connection with provincial elections?

2. If so, how many of these employees were dismissed since that date in each province for political interference in connection with provincial elections?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—RESIGNATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since August 1, 1930, have any postmasters resigned after receiving a circular from the Post Office Department?

2. If so: (a) to how many postmasters in each province were circulars forwarded; (b) how many postmasters resigned in each province after receiving these circulars; (c) what are the names and respective addresses of those who resigned in the province of Quebec, and the date of resignation of each postmaster?

WHEAT MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Prime Minister said yesterday that he would ascertain whether orders in council had been passed concerning guarantees for the sale of grain.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was about to rise to inform the house that the order in council of September 12, 1931, P.C. 2238, was dealt with last year and was also referred to by the Minister of Finance in the budget. Order in council P.C. 1576 of July 11, 1932, was precised and notice thereof given in the Gazette according to the terms of the statute of July 16, 1932, at page 133. Order in council No. 2077 of September 20, 1932 was precised and an abstract then made was published in the Gazette on October 1, 1932, at page 784, all in accordance with the terms of the statute. I will lay them on the table now or send them to my hon. friend. Perhaps they had better be laid on the table.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—MR. F. N. MURPHY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour. I have in my possession correspondence in connection with a returned soldier by the name of F. N. Murphy, of northern Saskatchewan, who joined the first battalion early in the war and was demobilized in 1919. When he returned he was placed on land purchased by his father. The father never lived on the land, the soldier himself having lived there from the time it was purchased. Since this man has not had any revaluation of that land, no discount, while others who apparently were never in the front line trenches have had a revaluation, will the minister investigate the matter and see that justice is meted out to this returned man, who is trying to make a living on that land in northern Saskatchewan.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Had the hon. member referred this inquiry to me or to the soldier settlement board, the information would have been promptly forthcoming. There is no question in my mind, without even referring to the file, that this returned soldier would have received a revaluation under the remedial legislation passed by this house if he had fallen within the statute as then passed. There is no question about it. In all the files I have reviewed I have never come across one single case where a returned soldier was refused the right to take advantage of this remedial legislation. As regards the present case, I will look into the matter and a reply will be given either directly to the hon. member or in the house.

Mr. McINTOSH: I might say for the benefit of the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am giving him information. I might say for the benefit of the minister that every request made of the department met with but one answer, namely, "Mr. Murphy is not a returned man"—referring to the soldier's father. I think it is time an impartial investigation was held and the matter cleared up, because up to the moment nothing has been done—nothing but discouragement to the soldier affected.

FARM RELIEF—SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I have here a telegram which I have received from the secretary of representatives of eleven villages in the drought-stricken area of southern Saskatchewan. They state that they are unable to pay their share of the cost of direct relief this winter because they have not the money. They are willing, however, to obligate themselves to repay later on their share of the amount required. Will the Prime Minister assure the house that the government will help these villages to finance the situation so that they may be in a position to take care of their destitute in the coming winter. Is he willing to confer with the representatives from this drought-stricken area with a view to enabling them to meet the situation?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The position has been made so clear and so many times that one is rather surprised that such a question should be asked by any hon. member. The Dominion government has no contact with villages or other municipalities. They will make their claim to the provincial administration and the government of the province communicates with the dominion. It is the only constitutional means by which communication can be maintained between the municipalities and the dominion, namely, through the provinces; and in all other provinces, as in that province, such communications are going on from time to time as the occasion may necessitate. If the villages will communicate with their government at Regina, I am perfectly certain that that government will take the proper action.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to thank the Prime Minister for the consideration he has given these destitute people.

RADIO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (Timiskaming-North) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, according to a newspaper item recently published, the radio commission is to undertake an inspection tour, shortly, throughout Canada. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), perhaps the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), might inform the house whether it would be possible for the commission to begin its inspection in New Ontario, where radio reception is very poor?

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Marine) (Translation): In reply, may I state that nothing has been decided in this respect. However, I shall be pleased to communicate to the commission the wishes of my hon. colleague.

BROADCASTING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Solicitor General, the Acting Minister of Marine, whether it is true that new licences for broadcasting stations have been issued recently.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): I do not think any have been issued since the commission was appointed.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

The house resumed from Monday, November 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom—Mr. Bennett.—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on article 6. Shall this article carry?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I presume that now that the government has tabled the report of the pig commission in the United Kingdom we shall be in a position to get a summary of it today. Of course, it does not remain long on the table before it goes into the usual channels of distribution. Sooner or later it will be available to the house. Could we get a summary today from the minister?

Mr. STEVENS: I would point out again to the committee that as far as the government is concerned we are most anxious to give the fullest possible information. I have before me a brief summary of this report but it must be remembered that until this report has been given effect to by legislation of the British parliament, discussion, other than the perusal of an interesting document, cannot have any effect upon the acceptance or otherwise of the agreement. I think that fact should be borne in mind, otherwise we are liable to get into a long discussion in connection with the views of the British pig products commission without adding anything to the usefulness of the debate. I again assure the committee that as far as I am concerned and I am sure as far as the government as a whole is concerned, we are most anxious to give the fullest possible information compatible with the reasonably expeditious passing of the business before the committee. There has not been time to study the very voluminous report of this commission, but after glancing through it I believe the following points might be of interest to the committee.

First, that although Great Britain consumes sixty per cent of the world's exports of pig products, the industry in that country is poorly organized and has at least fifteen important weaknesses.

Second, the bacon supplies must be stabilized and imports restricted. The sale of pigs under an annual contract system between pig raisers and the curers, together with the application of a quota system on imports, are recommended.

Third, the curers receive spasmodic instead of regular supplies due to the allocation of a large amount of pig production to the pork market. I might say that this report differentiates very clearly between bacon hog production and pig products or ordinary pork production. Segregation of the bacon and the pork requirements is recommended, the former to be carefully controlled by contracts and import quotas, the latter to be left unregulated.

Fourth, the cost of production of bacon in Great Britain is much too high owing to inefficiencies in the industry. I want to make it clear that these are the views of the commission; I am offering no opinion.

Fifth, research in connection with pig offal and other by-products is to be undertaken.

Sixth, a well organized markets intelligence service responsible to the development board is to be inaugurated.

Seventh, a pigs marketing board and bacon marketing board responsible to the pig industry development board are recommended for the rationalization of the industry and a quota advisory committee to determine requirements of bacon in Great Britain.

Very roughly stated, these are the matters dealt with in the report. There are certain statistics given but I think they really repeat what were given yesterday. However, for the information of the committee and its guidance and enlightenment, I shall give the percentages of total imports from different countries. The report gives the following percentages for the period January to August, 1932:

| Denmark | 64 |
| Poland | 9·8 |
| Netherlands | 5·9 |
| United States | 4·5 |
| Sweden | 3·7 |
| Lithuania | 4·2 |
| Irish Free State | 1·4 |
| Canada | 3 |
| Other countries | 3·5 |

Mr. DONNELLY: According to an editorial which appeared in a recent issue of the Live Stock Journal, it would appear that what the minister has just said is correct, that, practically speaking, this is to be a quota system.

Mr. STEVENS: It is difficult to hear the hon. member.

Mr. DONNELLY: I gather from this editorial that this matter is to be organized in England along much the same lines as the wheat pool was organized in Canada, the farmers of Great Britain are to sign up and those who do sign up will receive certain consideration and certain prices for their hogs, while the others will receive no consideration whatever. Perhaps I had better read a sentence or two from this editorial which puts the matter in shorter form.

An hon. MEMBER: What paper is that?

Mr. DONNELLY: The Livestock Journal, a well known British publication. The editorial reads:

> The farmers will be guaranteed a return that is to vary reasonably with the cost of feeding of normally used feeding stuffs. It will not be a price obtainable by anybody who may choose to send a pig to the nearest factory regardless of the factory's current requirements. It is one to be paid for pigs contracted to be sold.

In other words, the man who signs this contract will be guaranteed a price and the man who does not, will not be guaranteed a price. What I should like to know is whether the Canadian farmer who exports hogs is to be in the position of the farmer in Great Britain who signs a contract or of the farmer who does not.

Mr. STEVENS: I must repeat that editorial opinions based upon this report, no matter how intelligent they may be, cannot be accepted as the decision of the British parliament. It would be but poor speculation for me to answer the question of my hon. friend. I emphasize again the futility of entering into a discussion of this question of contracts. I am bound to say to my hon. friend, if I say anything, that it is suggested in the report that there shall be contractual arrangements entered into internally between growers and producers and, externally, with importers, the whole basis being the regulation of the pig and pork industry of Great Britain. I appeal to hon. gentlemen and state that any opinion which I might offer is quite worthless because the British government itself has not come to a decision upon the matter. I think hon. gentlemen should be at least reasonable in the questions they ask; I am willing to answer any question which it is possible to answer, but there are certain things I cannot answer. I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but I think he will see the point in my observation.

Mr. DONNELLY: I quite agree with the minister that anything he might say to us apparently is not of any value in connection with this matter. I am thoroughly convinced that this is another promise, a promise to do something which will never materialize. I say to the minister that the farmers throughout the country have been fed up with these promises and we think it is time we got something real, something which will be of some advantage. Last night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) told us that he never advocated a greater production in pigs. I sat in the audience up in Clinton in South Huron and listened to him speak. If he did not advocate a greater production in the hog industry then I do not understand the King's English—I'm a Chinaman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DONNELLY: He told us distinctly that in 1931 he did not advocate going into pigs but he told us also that he went around the country and sold a lot of sows to the farmers. He said he had gone out of the pig growing industry himself at that time, but he said that at the time of speaking he had again taken up pig raising. He said that he thought we were going to get a better price for our hogs and he advised our farmers to go into the hog industry. There is no mistaking the words he uttered there. I do not understand English if that is not the impresion he left on the audience. This is just another promise, another shifting, and the farmers getting nothing. We had the same thing during the 1930 election campaign and we are still getting it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is scarcely necessary to rise, because no one knows better than the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that if he was in the Clinton audience and heard what I said, he did not hear me say what he reports me as having said.

Mr. YOUNG: If I correctly understand article 6 of the agreement, it is this, that Great Britain declares her intention of establishing a quota system, and further on that if she does so, our share of the quota will be

2,500,000 hundredweight which will be admitted into British ports free of duty. But that admission free of duty is conditional on Great Britain establishing a quota system. Supposing she declares her intention of establishing such a system, and in the report just read by the minister that is recommended to the British government. For my part I find it very difficult to understand how she can make a quota system work, and it is my opinion that when she has tried it, the British government will have to modify its plans and perhaps have to abandon that system. If then Great Britain does not establish a quota system; if she desires to protect her hog producers by means of a tariff, then under this agreement not a single pound of Canadian bacon can enter the United Kingdom free of duty.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is all wrong in that. That is provided for in the agreement.

Mr. YOUNG: The article distinctly states:

> In any legislation which they may submit to parliament for regulating the supplies of bacon and hams from all sources into the United Kingdom—

—up to a certain point. That is only the quota regulation. Under no other condition shall we get free entry.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. YOUNG: That is the way the article reads.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In studying article 6, in which naturally I take a certain amount of interest, I must confess with others I am unable to determine exactly what measure of assistance will be given. That has not yet been decided. The interpretation I can draw from it, however, is this, that the condition of the pig industry in Great Britain being unsatisfactory, a commission has been appointed which has now completed its work, its purpose being the reestablishment of the pig industry there, which must carry with it some degree at least of price stabilization at a decent level. This may be done in one way or another. The quota system may be applied in different ways, but one application of it might well be this, that having estimated the number of hogs which can properly be produced in Great Britain, they will admit into that country freely no more than sufficient to make up any deficiency as between the amount produced at home and that required for home consumption. When one speaks of regulating the hog industry and regulating imports, the most common way of regulating imports is to erect some sort of barrier against imports in excess of the amount required, and this barrier would in all probability be a tariff in some shape or form. Then, within the amount necessary, a certain amount will be allotted to the different dominions, each of whom might ship in freely within the restricted marketing field the amount allotted to it. The probabilities then are—and again I am in the position of all others that we do not know just what Great Britain will do—if the importation is regulated and restricted by means of some form of tariff against other commodities and against quantities in excess of the British requirements, the effect will be a rise in price and we, having our product admitted free up to the maximum allowed us, will receive the advantage of that increase. I see at least some hope, while not one that would lead me as a farmer to raise many hogs, that after the law has been passed and the regulations brought down, we shall share in the improved conditions and better markets in Great Britain.

There is, however, another point I want to bring forward at the moment. I am not going to stress again the question of exchange. That applies, of course, to hogs as to other commodities and it has been thoroughly dealt with on all sides and on many occasions. But let me suggest that with hogs above anything else, if we are to take advantage of this market, we must be in a position to regulate, supervise and control not only our own hog production, but our hog export and our hog market. To take full advantage of this, it will be essential that the marketing board which was discussed a few months ago should be established, because to me at least, it is obvious that one of the chief conditions under which the British importers will do business with Canada will be that they may depend at all times upon receiving from this country the requisite number of hogs week after week and month after month, no matter what the state of the market may be. I come from the mother country, but that was a long time ago. From what I know of British habits, from what I have read and heard from men with whom I have spoken, I gather that the British importer will not take the trouble to advertise and to develop a taste for hogs or any other commodity coming from Canada or any other country unless he is quite certain that, after he has developed that appetite and the potential market, the market will be filled.

While the conference was in progress and while I was in attendance to gather the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table, I had an opportunity of coming into contact with a number of the delegates and officials there. That question was discussed by me with them and there was unanimity on the part of all those from Great Britain with whom I spoke, that while that country would be quite willing to transfer a portion of her trade in bacon and other commodities from Denmark and other countries outside the empire to Canada, that could be done only if the British importers and consumers were as well assured of receiving a regular supply of uniform quality from us as they are now assured of receiving from Denmark. The same provision applies to cattle. To my mind it is obvious that if we are to get this business, the appointment as soon as is reasonably possible of an export board which can supervise and control that trade, becomes essential. I know this is in the mind of the government. May I express the hope that in order that we may take as full advantage as is possible of whatever conditions may be imposed—and it will be noticed that I am not speaking now of what conditions may be imposed—not only will the question of exchange be dealt with, but a marketing board will be established which will be able to guide, regulate and control that trade so that we may take full advantage of any opportunities that are offered.

Mr. POULIOT: Would it not be appropriate to quote Shakespeare on the matter? Is it not refreshing to think that this agreement can be compared with that well known play A Midsummer Night's Dream?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Much Ado About Nothing.

Mr. POULIOT: This article is very interesting; it relates to the pig industry, but it should read the "potential" pig industry. To complete article 6 may I read an excerpt from page 124 of Hansard of October 12, when the right hon. the Prime Minister said:

> Under favourable marketing conditions and with a price maintained continuously above the cost of production, Canada has potential possibilities—

Those potential possibilities are synonymous with hog futures:

> —for the production of 8,500,000 hogs by 1937—

When several of us and many farmers throughout this country will be dead, as well as many hogs:

> —permitting of an export volume of 300,000,000 pounds of bacon and 10,000,000 hogs by 1942, permitting of an export volume of 500,000,000 pounds of bacon and hams.

That is an enormous, a voluminous quantity of hogs and bacon and ham. During the last weekends I had the opportunity to visit and meet farmers in different communities in Ontario and Quebec, and I find that the farmers are reading Hansard with great interest. They read the speeches made by every member of this house and pay particular attention to the speeches delivered by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. They tried to read between the lines of the excerpt I have just quoted to understand what the right hon. gentleman meant by potential hog possibilities. They asked me for an explanation and I gave the same explanation to the farmers of Ontario that I gave to the farmers of Quebec. I said: Suppose Joe want to borrow $500. He goes to the bank manager who asks him, "What is your security?" Joe replies, "I can offer you gilt-edged security, something as good as a first-grade bond, and that is my potential hog possibilities in five years, that is, the hogs I shall have by 1937." Then another fellow said, "What should I do to get $1,000?" I told him that was very easy, that he had only to go to the bank manager and offer him as security his potential hog possibilities in the next ten years. "Oh," he said jokingly, "write it down on paper and I will go to the bank manager and see him about it."

The reason, Mr. Chairman, why the farmers are in difficulties at the present time is because of the low prices of agricultural products. Conditions are so bad that in one township not far from here the farmers owe $75,000 for tax arrears. Will they be able to pay those tax arrears with potential hog possibilities? I do not know, but it seems rather doubtful. Prosperity was to come back, but as the lady has not yet returned I hope that the government will do something more definite for the relief of the farmer than simply to offer him these potential hog possibilities.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is one point I forgot to mention in connection with the export price, and it is really a very important point. As those who are at all familiar with the industry well know, a small exportable surplus hanging over the market and with no adequate facilities arranged for its sale, has a very deleterious effect upon the domestic price. Last year, for example, for about two months centreing around August and September, the average price of hogs in Canada fell from eight to four cents a pound. No new factor had been introduced during that time except this, that our production had slightly increased and that in consequence there had come on the market five per cent of an exportable surplus. The advantage of being able to export such a surplus is not merely in the price which you may receive for that exportable surplus itself, but there is the greater advantage of ridding the domestic market of that quantity in excess of domestic requirements. It does seem to me that to have even an open market in which we can get rid of that exportable surplus, even though the price may not be very attractive, has a very beneficial and stabilizing effect upon the prices received for the far greater number of animals sold in Canada itself. That is one point which we must keep in mind when we are considering the export of such commodities as hog products and other products of that type, when for the present at least and during recent years the number we export is but a very small percentage of our total sales.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Chairman, I noticed in the press this morning that the Hon. Howard Ferguson, Canadian High Commissioner in London, had given a statement to the press—I think on Saturday—in which he prophesied that, owing to article 6 of this treaty, the hog industry in the Dominion of Canada would make every Canadian farmer rich within the next year or two. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is possible that the High Commissioner has some information about this matter that the minister has not got. No answer.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, that sort of tactics is not fair. My hon. friend knows very well that as long as he is on his feet I am not privileged to get up. He is not going to get away with that sort of thing.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am sitting down.

Mr. STEVENS: I was waiting until my hon. friend followed the ordinary course in debate and sat down to permit me to rise.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

There is an answer and a very definite answer. In the first place it would be an extraordinary thing if Hon. Howard Ferguson did not have more up-to-date information than I have about what is happening in England; there is no doubt in the world that he has, because he is a very live individual and is very closely in touch with what is going on. It might be of interest to the committee for me to give the substance of a cablegram that we have received from our own officers in London. It is to the effect that the British government has already taken action to reduce the imports of bacon from continental countries by twenty per cent, effective midnight November 22, and that Danish prices and Canadian prices have advanced four shillings per hundredweight already. I am not advancing that, and I would suggest to my hon. friends opposite not to interpret it as such, by way of suggesting that some wonderful utopian period is being ushered in. I am stating it as a simple fact. It is an indication which I think we can reasonably accept that this particular arrangement is going to be beneficial to Canadian trade.

Mr. SANDERSON: I had no intention of being discourteous to the minister at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SANDERSON: I wish to say to hon. members opposite that I have nothing to learn from them. Apparently the minister is not quite sure whether the High Commissioner in London has any more information about this matter than he has. I shall come nearer home. A few days ago the Minister of Agriculture in the Ontario legislature, Colonel Kennedy, made a statement in which he pictured a very rosy future for farmers in the hog industry. He said that in a year or two the hog industry would increase ten fold or twenty fold, and that it would come to a point—and I am suggesting that he is probably a prophet or a son of a prophet—whereby as a result of this wonderful treaty the farmers in the province of Ontario would be able to pay their taxes from their activity in the hog industry. Perhaps he had some information the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not got.

A few moments ago the minister said discussion was futile; I think that is correct. There is not a single, solitary commitment in article 6 which will benefit the farmers in Canada engaged in the hog industry. It is all eye-wash and window dressing. It is possible that something may work out of it, but in the meantime there is nothing to it at all. The minister and his supporters say, "Look at what this government has done for the farmers in Canada." A few moments ago he quoted prices, and in that connection I want to say to him that on Saturday in the county of Perth the farmers received only 2.90 cents per pound for their hogs. That is the lowest price paid for hogs in the history of farming in the province of Ontario. Yet this government comes to parliament with not even a half-baked article concerning this important industry. They would have been far better if they had left to some future date, this alleged aid to the hog industry, because I want to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce—and the Prime Minister who, I am glad to see, is in his seat—that the farmers of the province of Ontario are fed up, sick and tired of promises made by this government to them. They want something real. They want the government to fulfil some of its promises. If this agreement is all that is to be offered the farmers of Ontario, so far as the hog industry is concerned, they will soon learn that there is nothing to it at all.

True, this discussion is futile, but the fault is not with the opposition but with the government. They bring in an article which means nothing at all. It simply means that if so and so happens, or if the commission happens to report so and so the United Kingdom may take a certain amount of Canadian bacon and ham at world prices. It offers no solace or comfort to the farmers in Ontario. I make that statement despite what the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture in Ontario or that great mogul the High Commissioner in London, may have to say.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I will come to the rescue of the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, and explain why he has given an interview to the press. At page 14 of the Montreal Gazette for Saturday last I find the following:

> The High Commissioner, the Financial Times said, predicted that Canadian farmers were going to be more prosperous than they had been for a long time and that the British bacon quota would do more for them than any other single thing.

There is one reason for that statement, and it is this: Mr. Ferguson, the High Commissioner is a farmer. On his farm down at Kemptville he has great potential hog possibilities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: Why do you protest? I am defending him with all my strength.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to prolong this debate but I should like to express my appreciation of the fact that the minister by tabling the British hog commission report has at least given something to hang our hats on.

Mr. POULIOT: Do the hon. gentlemen opposite desire the Hon. Mr. Ferguson to carry his potential possibilities with him?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Témiscouata should remember that the House of Commons is a gentleman's club. In this particular instance the hon. member for Melville has the floor.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have something before us that we can hang our hats on. We are now in a position to go home and tell our constituents that after persisting a long time we received a summary of the report upon which all our hopes have been raised for the past two or three months with respect to anticipated hog production and marketing in Canada, and throughout the empire. True, the summary is not very extensive, but perhaps it is the best the minister could give. As I mentioned yesterday I have before me a summary which appeared in the Livestock Journal, made by a very reputable editor. Although the summary before me goes much farther than does that of the minister, it bears out to a great extent what he has said. It indicates also that about three-quarters of the report concerns the production of hogs. Great Britain has reached the stage when she has to do something to reduce the vast number of breeds of hogs obtaining in that country. But we know that in Canada that action was taken long ago. They are about ten years behind us in this and other respects in relation to the grading of farm products. A great deal of their activitiy has been directed towards securing good quality, and an effort to secure a desirable type of bacon hog for the market. Then, further, the summary before me mentions a number of matters in connection with breeding. I shall not go into that, however, except to draw attention to it. A comparatively small part of the report deals with marketing. I do not know that we can do anything but simply wait and see how this thing turns out. I would appeal to the government, however, not to encourage our farmers to enter into an active hog producing campaign at a time when hogs sell for only two cents a pound at western points.

I would suggest that we do not produce more and more hogs until we can see what the effect of the agreement may be on hog prices. Those countries nearer to the British market will learn more quickly the condition of the bacon market, and we do not need to scurry into the production of more hogs, thereby probably sagging the market still lower.

We have in Canada a low farm commodity price, a condition such as we have never known before, a condition which affects not only hogs and hog products but the entire list of farm commodities. In fact, Mr. Chairman, never since Adam was a boy, as the old saying goes, have hogs been as cheap as they are today. Yet the government is not only contemplating but has actually entered into a campaign for greater hog production. I make that statement, notwithstanding what has been said by my good friend the minister. I came back on the train with some of his officers, and I have been reading the newspapers which latter certainly indicate that that was the purpose of their meetings in Saskatchewan. I believe the government would do well to be a little canny in entering into one more crusading campaign looking to more hog production, for fear they make the situation worse. Time enough to get excited when we see how the trade arrangement works out. In the meantime all we can do is to look on, and continue steadily with our own operations—not jumping in and jumping out—but continue steadily with our program of always growing some hogs for the market, to the extent of the feed and water supply available and the prevailing prices. By that process we will hit it right sometimes, at all events. But jumping in and jumping out, you may miss it both ways, miss it at every jump. I would strongly advise against any such policy.

May I refer to the answer given yesterday to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown):

> Mr. Brown: Is there any suggestion in the report that they might put a tariff on foreign hogs?
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): Before the commission went into session a suggestion was made by certain associations in the old land that a tariff should be put on against even the dominions, the pig producers of the United Kingdom to have preference over all. However, I do not think that that is recommended in this report.

Well, I sincerely hope not only that the minister does not think it, but that he is quite sure it is not recommended. But I wish to draw it to the attention of the committee that there is in the old country a very definite desire on the part of the pig association, or whatever the official name is, to have a duty levied on foreign hogs and also on the hogs of the dominion. There is no question about that.

May I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), if there were any other organizations, departmental officials or anybody who supported this idea, either before the hog commission or before the economic conference here in Ottawa so that we may know just where we stand in respect to this matter; and why a quota was selected instead of a small tariff, such as apparently the pig growers in the old country really desired?

May I also ask the Minister of Agriculture—the Minister of Trade and Commerce will excuse me directing my question to the Minister of Agriculture, who was after all the first to divulge that he had the report; I quite understand he may have got it that morning and not had an opportunity of telling his colleagues—if there was any discussion before the commission that he is aware of, indicating that other organizations or associations or individuals were also desirous of having a duty placed upon bacon and hams in the United Kingdom?

Mr. STEVENS: Canadian associations or United Kingdom associations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My question included all. Whether it was before the commission in Great Britain or before the economic conference here in Ottawa.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think we are in a position to state what confidential recommendations were made in reference to it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is the answer we always get. Anything that transpired at our own economic conference cannot be told, but we are told what transpired outside, before the commission in Great Britain. Well, I suppose if that is all that I can get, it is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I quite agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that it is absolutely useless to enter into a detailed discussion of this matter, because we do not know the nature of the legislation to be passed in the United Kingdom upon the recommendation of this commission. I would like, however, to direct one observation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have read the digest of the recommendations of the commission, and to my mind it does three things, besides setting up very elaborate machinery; first, endeavours to increase the price both to the producer in England and to the producer in Canada; second, to stabilize the price; and third, to eliminate foreign competition by progressive limitation of foreign imports, directed mainly at Denmark. Now, Mr. Chairman, you also find in the recommendations of the commission that they hope in two years to double the production of bacon in the old land. So even if there were any advantage in this article, any "potential possibilities" as referred to by a previous speaker, for the producer of bacon in Canada, if as a result of the advocacy of the Minister of Agriculture and other hon. members the farmers of Canada go extensively into hog production, what guarantee have we that we will not entirely lose the United Kingdom market, or that a tariff will not be imposed against Canadian bacon of that kind in the old country?

I also see, in regard to the telegram read by the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the High Commissioner's office in London, that there is already in the old country a wide agitation against the increase in bacon prices. You will find organizations like the Wholesale Grocers' Association of Great Britain already protesting most vigorously against this increase. Bacon as we know is the food of the poor, and this is already being called in Great Britain a "stomach tax" upon the poor. Even if we admit that there might be some benefit for the Canadian producer, there is great danger. There are going to be electoral contests staged in Great Britain, and this cry may be used by one or the other of the parties in regard to the "stomach tax" on the poor for the alleged benefit of producers of hogs in Canada. This whole agreement is crowded with potential perils such as I have mentioned, and instead of helping the cause of empire unity it is full of menace towards that cause. I think it is a pity if we are going to raise a barrier between the ordinary consumer in the old country and the producer in Canada, although I am in favour of any fair method that can help our producers.

But I agree with the minister that there is no use discussing this now, we do not know what the old country is going to do, whether they will accept the recommendation of that commission, which I think is a very able commission, so I do not see how the house can discuss this article any more than articles 1, 2, 3 and 4. The only article we can discuss is No. 5, because there we have something definite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister if he acted on the suggestion made from this side of the house, that he inquire of the British government whether their interpretation of this section is in accord with his own; the point being that the minister contends, I understand, that the British government by this section obligates itself not to put any duty on bacon coming from this dominion for five years. If that is the view also of the British government we ought to know it authoritatively.

Mr. STEVENS: The position taken is that we have the agreement before us, and as I stated last night there is no dispute or misunderstanding as far as the British government and this government are concerned on the interpretation of this clause. Certainly it would be most inadvisable that upon any query being made as to the meaning of it a cable should be sent to the British government asking a re-interpretation, when the government, as far as we are concerned, are perfectly satisfied with the interpretation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not agree with my hon. friend. If a difference of view arises in the House of Commons of Canada as to the meaning, and the minister is unable to say authoritatively that the British government interprets the section as he does, then it seems to me it is a duty which he owes to hon. members of this house and to the hog producers of this country to obtain as quickly as he can an exact statement from the British government. I believe the minister will yet regret not sending the message.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Before it is carried may I make a suggestion to the government? I am very glad the Prime Minister is in his seat. Yesterday we heard that the government had guaranteed the wheat of the west. Whether it is good or whether it is bad I am not yet ready to express a view, but may I ask the government seriously to consider if it is not advisable to give the same warranty to the farmers who raise hogs, to those engaged in the dairying industry, in potato-growing, to those who have greenhouses, to those—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must state his question.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I will put the question with reference to the hog industry, and it will not be with regard to a possible hog industry but the actual industry.

Mr. GOTT: What about the decline in exports due to the Australian treaty?

Mr. POULIOT: I thought the hon. gentleman was an expert only in onions.

Mr. GOTT: In bacon alone there was a decline of $20,000,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Let the hon. gentleman discuss that with Mr. Ferguson, and while he is in England we will have peace in the House of Commons. If the move that has been made by the government with regard to guaranteeing wheat is a good move, it is just as good for the hog industry. If it is necessary for the wheat industry it is just as necessary for the hog industry and for agriculture as a whole. For this reason I ask the Prime Minister whether he is not ready to consider at once guaranteeing the hog industry in order to provide some actual relief to the farmer in Canada the same as is done for the wheat business.

Article agreed to.

On article 7:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass legislation which will secure for a period of ten years from the date hereof to tobacco, consigned from any part of the British Empire and grown, produced or manufactured in Canada, the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco, so long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below 2/0½d. per pound, in which event the margin of preference shall be equal to the full duty.

Mr. GOTT: I have no desire to hold up the debate for one moment, but I should be remiss in my duty as a representative of a tobacco district if I did not point out one dangerous aspect of this agreement. I hope that my recommendation in this regard will be accepted. Article 7 reads:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass legislation which will secure for a period of ten years from the date hereof to tobacco, consigned from any part of the British Empire and grown, produced or manufactured in Canada, the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco, so long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below 2/0½d. per pound, in which event the margin of preference shall be equal to the full duty.

The tobacco growers of Canada certainly appreciate the fact that through legislation we are going to have 49 cents per pound preference on all tobacco grown in Canada, but I would draw attention to these words: "grown, produced or manufactured in Canada."

I would point out the possibility of United States flue-cured tobacco being brought into Canada and manufactured in this country for export, in connection with which there is a rebate of 99 per cent. That would permit the Canadian manufacturer to import American flue-cured tobacco on which he would pay the duty, and he would then enjoy a refund of 99 per cent of the duty if the tobacco were manufactured for export purposes. I hope the government will close up that gap by adopting these words: "grown, produced or manufactured in Canada from Canadian tobacco." That is all I want changed.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I note, at page 128 of Hansard, English version, October 12, that the right hon. Prime Minister stated that the preference would greatly benefit those who grow the variety of tobacco known as Bright, in the district of Norfolk. I should also like to inquire whether the farmers who grew the varieties known as "Petit Quesnel, Petit rouge" and "Parfum d'Italie"—the latter being really a Canadian tobacco, notwithstanding its foreign name—will equally benefit by this preference, or whether it is but a sham. That is of great interest to farmers. It is not only a question as to whether preference will be really profitable to farmers of the district of Norfolk who grow the variety of Bright tobacco, but it is equally one of protecting the farmers who grow the "Parfum d'Italie, Petit rouge" and "Petit Quesnel" and all the other good varieties.

Mr. GOTT: Speak in English.

Mr. POULIOT: I apologize to the hon. member if I spoke a language that he does not understand. However, in order to be fair I will continue in English. I hope the government will be as fair to him as I am.

Mr. GOTT: I am probably the only member in the house who follows the hon. gentleman's speeches.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for that remark and for his benefit I will continue to speak in English.

Mr. GOTT (Translation): Many thanks.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is certainly a genial colleague and he speaks very good French. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is something astounding in connection with the tobacco situation. I want to quote the words of the Prime Minister in his speech delivered on October 12. It is the credo of Toryism. It is an explanation by one who did not sleep on the night the agreement was signed. He was on vigil and his remarks are of the utmost importance. That is why I am glad to quote them. The right hon. gentleman said:

In 1930, the United Kingdom imported 236,934,505 pounds unmanufactured tobacco, of which Canada supplied 3,976,017 pounds, while Canada's total exports for that year were 5,365,869 pounds. In 1929, Canadian exports were 7,244,045 pounds while for the first seven months of 1932 they were 8,941,215 pounds. The maximum Canadian production was in 1931, being 51,300,000 pounds.

Those figures show that the Canadians smoke Canadian-grown tobacco. The right hon. gentleman continued:

Canada's potential production of Bright flue-cured tobacco for five years may be conservatively estimated at 50 per cent increase, and within ten years at 100 per cent increase.

This is only a guess on the Prime Minister's part and there is nothing in it. We are promised a great future for tobacco just as we have been promised a great future for hogs, but this promise is just as empty as the pockets of the farmers. If they do not die of misery in the next five years they will be able to grow 50 per cent more tobacco; if they live for ten years, they will be able to grow 100 per cent more tobacco. I am sure this promise was made in good faith but there is nothing behind it, it is just a potential possibility for the tobacco growers. I should like to have something definite about this matter, I should like to have the particulars in connection with le petit Quesnel, le petit rouge et le parfum d'Italie.

Mr. SEGUIN (Translation): I cannot allow this item to carry without pointing out that I am rather amazed that my colleague the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott), wishes to congratulate the government on the clause inserted in the trade agreements in connection with tobacco, when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), explained this part of the agreements, I was astonished to hear him state that the existing duties would be maintained; I can find no changes. I immediately put the following questions to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens):

1. What were the existing duties on Canadian tobacco entering the British market previous to the agreements entered into at the last Imperial conference?

The hon. Minister gave me the schedule comprising all these duties. I already had them.

2. What are the duties in force as a consequence of the agreements of the last Imperial conference?

To this the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce replied:

That article 7 of the agreements between the United Kingdom and Canada, signed on August 20, 1932, secures for a period of ten years to Canadian tobacco the margin of preference above indicated on foreign tobacco, so long, however, as the duty on manufactured tobacco does not fall below 2/0½d. . . .

That is, the hon. Minister replied that there had been no change and that the preference which existed previously, would be continued for a period of ten years. I wonder, sir, what advantage will the Canadian tobacco grower derive from these trade agreements, since the preference remains the same. It is true that it is contended that our tobacco trade with the empire could be greater, considering the United Kingdom's large tobacco imports. However, if no further preference is given, I cannot see how our tobacco trade with the empire will increase. Our tobacco growers will therefore reap no benefit. The preference existing since 1923, is maintained, and, to make things worse, it is stated that this will be continued for ten years. I think that it is most deplorable for our tobacco growers, and I cannot do otherwise than draw the attention of the government to the fact.

Mr. CAYLEY: Mr. Chairman, there are a few points in this article which I should like the minister to make clear. I notice that the preference to be given is about 49 cents, but no guarantee is given that this preference will be maintained. The article reads:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass legislation which will secure for a period of ten years from the date hereof to tobacco—

I shall leave out the next clause because it does not refer to Canada. The article continues:

—grown, produced or manufactured in Canada, the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco,—

If we stop there we are sure of the 49 cents or the two shillings half penny per pound preference, but we must go on.

—so long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below two shillings half penny per pound, in which event the margin of preference shall be equal to the full duty.

Mr. GOTT: I think the hon. member has not read the article correctly; two shillings half penny per pound is not 49 cents.

Mr. CAYLEY: How much is it?

Mr. YOUNG: He does not know.

Mr. STEVENS: The question asked by my hon. friend is not unreasonable; he suggests that should the British parliament reduce the duty on tobacco to a point below two shillings half penny per pound—

Mr. CAYLEY: How much is that in Canadian money?

Mr. STEVENS: At par it would be about 49 cents but at present rates of exchange it would be worth 38 or 39 cents. Should they reduce the duty to a figure below two shillings half penny per pound, then the margin of preference would not be equal to that amount. That is arithmetically correct, but may I point out that in 1919 the margin on tobacco, stemmed or stripped, ten per cent or less of moisture, was eighteen and one-sixth pence; in 1925 it was twenty-seven and one-quarter pence, and in 1932, twenty-seven and one-quarter pence. The general tariff in 1925 ranged from eight shillings two pence per pound to nine shillings one penny, in one case for tobacco with ten per cent moisture or less and in the other, for tobacco with more than ten per cent moisture. The corresponding general tariff rates in effect today are nine shillings six pence per pound and ten shillings six and a half pence per pound. There is very little likelihood of the British parliament abandoning the duties on tobacco, that is something of which I think we need have no fear. As long as the duty is above two shillings half penny per pound, then we get the margin of preference I have indicated. They are guaranteed for a period of ten years from the date of this agreement.

May I take the opportunity, while I am on my feet, of pointing out that in 1925 legislation was passed in Great Britain fixing this rate of duty for a period of ten years and giving to us the preference which I have just indicated.

Mr. GOTT: 1923.

Mr. STEVENS: My information is 1925, but it may be 1923 if my hon. friend says so. Be that however as it may, in this conference we picked up the same principle, the same preference and ensured it for a period of ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Continued it.

Mr. STEVENS: Continued it for ten years from the date of this agreement. May I say to the hon. member for South Essex who spoke a moment ago, there is no need to have any apprehension about the question of manufactured tobacco, partly or wholly composed of foreign raw tobacco, because the whole matter is based upon the raw leaf tobacco and the original document, the privileges and advantages of which we have enjoyed for eight years or more, is simply carried into this agreement and continued for another ten years. So if we have had no disability during the past eight years, we are unlikely to have any difficulty in the ensuing ten years, even though the interpretation he puts on the article is correct, with which interpretation he will permit me to say I do not agree.

Mr. CAYLEY: Then I take it that the new agreement is in no way different from the 1923 agreement that was entered into; this is a continuation of that agreement for ten years from the date of this one.

Mr. STEVENS: The 1923 legislation.

Mr. CAYLEY: But while the minister sees no possibility of any change arising out of the latter part of this article, at the same time I wonder why men from all parts of the empire discussing this problem, should insert that. It seems to me they must have seen a possibility of some change in the future and, indeed, in the near future, or they would not have inserted that clause. If it is no good there, it should be left out. Perhaps the minister will tell me that it might just as well have been left out. Before I take my seat, although this may not be applicable to this article, I should like the minister's opinion regarding the 99 per cent drawback that is given to foreign tobacco manufactured in Canada and then reshipped.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend possibly means my opinion in regard to the system of drawbacks generally, in this instance applied to tobacco. If one might be permitted to digress into a purely hypothetical question, I may say to my hon. friend that I have never very strongly favoured the 99 per cent drawback system. It has been accepted and practised in Canada for many years.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And all over the world.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. There are, however, times when the 99 per cent, which is generally accepted, may be too high, but at the present moment I would prefer not to be drawn into, shall I say, an academic discussion of the matter. I have doubts as to the advisability of the drawback in regard to some lines. So far as tobacco is concerned, I have not studied the situation from that angle, so I am unable at the moment to give my hon. friend an intelligent opinion on the subject.

Mr. CAYLEY: As regards the latter part of this article which refers to the possibility of duties on foreign tobacco being reduced, the minister spoke of that as not being important. Might it just as well have been left out entirely?

Mr. STEVENS: The British regulations protect us fully in regard to the 99 per cent drawback on foreign tobacco being manufactured in Canada and then being exported, so my hon. friend need have no fear on that point. My officers have looked up the regulations in regard to that and I am assured that is correct.

As regards the suggestion to leave out this last phrase, I would say this to my hon. friend: If he will look at it in a broad and general way, it is clear to me that the British delegates said this: The practice has been in Great Britain for many years to charge a rate of duty running around nine shillings a pound. If I have the date correctly, 1925, eight years ago, Great Britain extended to empire countries a preference of forty-nine cents a pound, or approximately fifty cents. They carried that on in perfect good faith during that period of eight years. They now say to us: We will extend that for ten years—and they do so—but ten years is a long period and I suppose that the British delegates felt that it was reasonable to say that should in the future the British duty fall below 2s. 0½d., which was the spread, then the full amount of the duty, whatever it might be, would be the spread, because it merely sets the thing in an accurate light. But in the face of all the evidence we have before us and the practice and custom of all countries in dealing with duties on liquors and tobacco, there is very little likelihood of that coming up.

Mr. GOTT: Will the minister assure the tobacco industry that there will be no chance of importing raw leaf from the United States, receiving the 99 per cent drawback, manufacturing the raw leaf and shipping it into Great Britain?

Mr. STEVENS: All I can say to my hon. friend and all I think it is reasonable to ask me to say is that the British regulations do not permit it at the present time and there is no indication that there will be any change in those regulations.

Mr. GOTT: Only through the words as contained in the article: "Or manufactured in Canada."

Mr. STEVENS: More than that. The hon. member will notice in the article it refers to this:

> Grown, produced or manufactured in Canada, the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco.

Foreign tobacco is emphasized in this clause.

> So long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco—

Again it is emphasized. My point in that regard is that the clause in itself provides sufficient protection, but if the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member questions the clarity, shall I say, of the language used in the clause, then I fall back on the British regulations and say that they, at the present time and as they have been throughout, would not permit and clearly protect the Canadian grower of tobacco against the contingency which he fears.

Mr. CAYLEY: Has the minister those regulations that we may know beyond doubt?

Mr. STEVENS: For me to elucidate the British regulations fully is, I confess, very difficult. We must bear in mind that in Great Britain they operate their tariff provisions in a manner different from ours. The Imports Duties Act, the McKenna Duties Act and the other various acts are separate statutes. Then they clothe the board with certain powers and that board passes regulations from time to time. I could plough through the different acts and so forth, but frankly, I believe the committee would be very much bored if I were to do so. I shall read part. This is a document known as Notice 27A, dated August 23, 1920, dealing with "Preferential duties of customs in Great Britain and Northern Ireland on goods consigned from and grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire." I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it would be doing an injustice to the committee for me to read this at length.

Mr. CAYLEY: Might I just ask this question? Is any distinction made between manufactured tobacco, Canadian grown, which is exported to Great Britain, and manufactured tobacco, partly Canadian and partly American, which is exported to the British market?

Mr. STEVENS: Great Britain from time immemorial has put sugar and tobacco, both of which are very important items of revenue for Great Britain, into the same category, and they do not allow the mixing of either sugar or tobacco empire grown with the foreign product. In order to earn the preference it must be an empire product.

Mr. GOTT: That explains the whole thing. I am perfectly satisfied now, but before I was not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no doubt that this margin of preference need not be retained if Great Britain sees fit to reduce or abandon it. Am I correct in that?

Mr. STEVENS: I must respectfully decline to have words put into my mouth. I would rather express it in my own way. I will repeat what I said before. Since 1925 the duty on tobacco has been from 9/6d. up to 10/6½d. per pound, depending on the moisture content, and for eight years we have enjoyed a preference of 2/0½d. per pound, or roughly 49 cents. There has been no question about it whatsoever. Under this article that preference is continued, but the reservation is made that should the British parliament reduce the duty on tobacco to a point below 2/0½d. the margin of preference to Canada and empire countries will be simply the remaining full amount of duty whatever it may be.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is exactly as I heard the minister the first time, but it does not answer my question at all. I suppose the question does not need an answer because I take it, and I just wanted the minister's confirmation of my interpretation if he thinks I am correct, that there is nothing whatever in this section to prevent the government of the United Kingdom from reducing the margin of preference from 2/0½d. or 49 cents per pound, or from wiping it out altogether. But if there is anything to prevent that to which the minister can direct my attention, I shall be very glad if he will do so.

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing specifically stated in the article to prevent them doing it, but there is the history of the taxation of tobacco in Great Britain which stands behind the article. From time immemorial tobacco has been one of the chief sources of revenue for Great Britain, and it is wholly unlikely that they will reduce the duty from 9/6d. to below 2/- per pound. Furthermore, this applies not only to Canada but to all parts of the empire, to South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and other empire countries, all of which are equally interested with ourselves.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I take it that my hon. friend feels that the government of this country is reasonably safe in trusting the government of the United Kingdom not to reduce this margin of preference.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Quite.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I should like to ask why the government of this country were not able apparently to induce the British government to take for granted that this government could be relied on not to reduce the preferences given in schedule E and referred to in article 9. Apparently the government of this country is bound hard and fast not to reduce those margins of preference. Why the distinction? In the one case it seems that it was necessary to have this government bound absolutely tight not to reduce the margin of preference, while in the other this government apparently seemed to think they could take it for granted that Great Britain would not reduce the margin of preference, and they did not bind Great Britain in the agreement. What is the reason for the distinction?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no difficulty, none whatever, in answering that question if we are permitted, Mr. Chairman, to proceed to the discussion of schedule E.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would prefer the minister to answer it now because the question arises properly out of the construction of this article.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no difficulty whatsoever in answering it, Mr. Chairman. I am simply pointing out to the chairman that we would be wandering; that is all, and I do not wish to wander without the house knowing that I am quite aware of it. The answer can be stated very simply and clearly. In schedule E there are some 223 items, and speaking offhand about half of them involve the imposition of duties—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): More than half.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend can state the proportion as he sees fit; we will not dispute over that. In another proportion of the items there are decreases. Consequently a more specific declaration was required than is required in this instance. Furthermore, as I have said at least three times already, we are here dealing with a duty which has been in force for approximately eight years, and under this agreement we are simply carrying forward into another extended period of ten years what we have been enjoying for a period of eight years. We had therefore no hesitation whatsoever in accepting the position as outlined in article 7.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I understand the minister clearly, that it was necessary in regard to the items mentioned in schedule E, numbering several hundred, that a definite agreement should be arrived at, but that with regard to the one item referred to here it was apparently not considered necessary to have a definite agreement with the United Kingdom. I want to say that although the minister has given the same explanation three times, which was not an answer to the question that was asked, each time that he gives it I find it a little more difficult to understand why one country should be bound and the other not be bound to maintain a certain margin in preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister seems very loath to give any credit whatsoever to what took place at the economic conference of 1923.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I am afraid in this instance at least he will have to give some credit.

Mr. STEVENS: Very gladly, if it is due.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have in my hand the Summary of Conclusions of the economic conference of 1923, and the paragraph which relates to tobacco reads as follows:

> At present the duty on tobacco varies according to kind, being of course higher on cigars than on unmanufactured tobaccos. On the latter it is about 8s. 2d. per pound, on which the empire enjoys a preference of one-sixth or, say, on raw tobacco of 1s. 4d.

That was as long ago as 1923. The British government was then giving a preference to the other parts of the empire of its own volition, and had been doing so for some time previously because it suited its own purposes. It did so under its own fiscal system without being bound in any way. The paragraph continues:

> His Majesty's government would be prepared to adopt the course proposed in regard to sugar, i.e., to stabilize the existing preference for a term of years or alternatively they are prepared to increase the preference to one-quarter, i.e., to about 2s. on unmanufactured tobacco at present rates, the amount of the preference of course varying as the basis varies.
> As a result of consultation with the oversea representatives concerned, it has been decided to adopt the second alternative, that is to say, to raise the preference from one-sixth to one-quarter.

So that it was at the conference of 1923 that the decision was made by the British government of its own free will to make the preference what it is at the present time. Legislation was introduced in the British parliament after the conference in accordance with what the British government of the day said it would do and it was approved by the British parliament. They fixed the rates after consultation. At the present time I understand, as the result of this conference, they are continuing the preference in accordance with the terms of the article in the agreement we have just read.

There is the difference however—and it serves to illustrate a point I have been trying all along to make—between a system of consultation between different governments of the empire, being each free to act upon its own position, and a system of bargaining which binds governments for a term of years to maintain tariffs at certain levels. The relative merits of the two methods is, I think, apparent. In 1923 the British government took the course which served its own interests, but which after conference it believed would best further the interests, also, of the empire and has maintained that course without having any question arise as to whether or not it was bound and restricted in its fiscal freedom by virtue of some agreement with the dominions, to maintain certain duties against the interests and will of the British people. The British government has kept the duties on because it served its interests and those of the empire so to do.

Now we come to this year's plan, and we find that the moment discussion on the article respecting tobacco is opened, a difference of opinion arises as to whether or not in this clause the British freedom in fiscal matters is not being restricted in some degree, as a consequence of the agreements signed at the recent conference. In other words in consequence of fixed duties, or duties purporting to be fixed for a term of years, one begins to sense at once the feeling of restriction and restraint. In one quarter it is asserted, on the other hand in another we have doubts and misgivings as to whether or not the conditions set forth will be carried on for the period mentioned. I believe it is wholly advantageous to the British government to do as it pleases with its own fiscal policy, just as we who are on this side desire to do with respect to the articles under schedule E in the agreement. Certainly, from the point of view of Canada, it is much better that producers here should not be led by any false hopes or false beliefs into embarking upon a scale of production which, later on, they may find has not been justified, in view of action which the British government may take are perfectly free to take in the matter of reducing duties, or, if they so wish, of eliminating them altogether.

Article 7 agreed to.

On article 8:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite the governments of the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates to accord to Canada any preference which may for the time being be accorded to any other part of the British Empire, provided that this clause shall not extend to any preferences accorded by Northern Rhodesia to the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the territories of the South African High Commission by virtue of the customs agreement of 1930; and further will invite the governments of the colonies and protectorates shown in schedule D to accord to Canada new or additional preferences on the commodities and at the rates shown therein.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I read schedule D?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Schedule D covers nearly four pages, and it is not necessary to read it. I call to the attention of the committee these words in article 8:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite the governments of the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates to accord to Canada any preference . . .

And so on. The word "invite" as used in this article is, I presume, intended to convey the same meaning as it does in other articles of the agreement. I understand it means that His Majesty's government will undertake to see that the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates grant a certain preference to the dominions—in this particular instance, to Canada. That means that the British government undertakes to see that the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates will be obliged to raise certain of their duties against the world, in order to give a preference to the dominions, in other words, impose additional taxation upon themselves. That is part of the agreement to which we in this free parliament are asked to lend our support, an agreement which is to bind the colonies which have not yet acquired the full right of self government, and protectorates which are still powerless in dealing with their own fiscal matters. The effect of the article is to impose taxation upon the people in those non-self-governing colonies and protectorates, without any previous expression of the will of the people themselves.

I have not time to read to the committee articles concerning this particular clause which have been appearing in the British press and in the press of other countries. May I say in a word however that in the mind of so great an authority on international economic and fiscal questions as Sir Arthur Salter and in the minds of many others, it constitutes the worst feature of the entire agreement. It opens up a question so large as to cause one to be amazed at the slight consideration which its implications could have received. One wonders that anything of the kind could come from a conference lasting so short a time and with so many other matters of grave concern to consider.

In a word I shall attempt to express the significance of what I have in mind. Up to the present time the rest of the world has in matters of international trading enjoyed a certain feeling of good will towards the British empire, because until recently, all countries were free to trade with Great Britain and with her colonies and protectorates on a free-trade basis. Foreign countries were free to trade with the great colonial empire of Britain on the same terms as did the United Kingdom and other parts of the empire. In what is known as the colonial empire foreign countries of the world had enjoyed the same trading privileges as had the different parts of the empire. The provision now before us, however, to the rest of the world makes of the colonial empire a closed preserve, instead of an open market. What may result by way of retaliation against British trade is a matter exercising the minds of the people in Great Britain and may well concern us as well here in Canada. The article means that, as parties to the agreement, so far as we are concerned, we are taking the position that so far as lies within our power we are going to make a closed preserve out of the colonial empire in order that in the words of the Prime Minister, we may shut out the foreigner. That is economic war on a world scale, when it is attempted in this fashion. It has the inevitable effect in matters of trade of setting other nations of the world against the British Empire.

I have before me an article written by F. W. Hirst, a former editor of the Economist which appeared in the Nineteenth Century of October, 1932. Speaking of this particular matter he says, after reference to other dangerous features of the agreement.

I can hardly believe that the House of Commons will tamely renounce its power to reduce at any time any tax which it has levied; for this is the most ancient and esteemed of all its privileges, the historical basis and the very essence of its authority.

It goes on to speak about the effect of making these tariffs permanent for a period of five years, in addition to imposing them at all. He has a further paragraph as to the effect of this particular kind of article in the agreement on foreign trade.

To this should be added the danger involved in the adoption by Great Britain and the dominions on a much extended scale of discriminating duties against foreign countries. A free trade empire disarms foreign hostility; an empire which aims at closing or partially closing its markets against foreign countries invites hostility; and such a policy may end in another series of disastrous tariff wars, which would make the task of universal disarmament not merely difficult, but impossible.

I have in my hand the exact quotation from Sir Arthur Salter, who has been referred to many times and whose reputation needs no commendation in this house. In an article which Sir Arthur wrote a very short time ago, which has been widely quoted from in the press, he says:

Last, and not least important, what will be the relations between Great Britain and the dominions on the one hand and the vast colonial —or non-self-governing—empire on the other? Will the governing principle of policy continue to be to lead each constituent unit as far and as fast as possible along the path of both prosperity and a participation in government? Will it be an open empire, supplying its resources and offering its markets freely and equally to the world? Or will it tend to be more of a closed preserve in breach of the main traditions of the last century?

So far we have been considering the self-governing members of the British Empire, and it is they who conducted the negotiations. But it was contemplated throughout that the preferential arrangements agreed upon would in general apply also as regards the "colonial" empire; that is, that large part of the empire which is in whole or in part non-self-governing. The colonial empire is likely, then, to enjoy—or to suffer—the consequences of the Ottawa decisions. But it cannot, I think, be denied that their interests received a very subordinate consideration. We find no proposals for specific preferences for characteristic products of the colonial empire, such as rubber.

This opens a new issue in imperial development of the utmost importance. Increased imperial preferences with the dominions raise, as we have seen, the problem of most-favoured-nation treatment, the principle incorporated in agreements with equal and independent states. The application of preferences to a dependent empire, especially of preferences decided with special regard not to its interests but to those of the self-governing members, raises the question as to whether the basic principle of policy should be the "open-door" or the "closed preserve."

The former has been the guiding principle of British policy for more than half a century.

Elsewhere he goes on to speak of the concern to the rest of the world.

Nevertheless, it is not only of the utmost importance to the British colonies themselves; it is also (to adopt phrasing from the report of the United States commission of 1922) a matter of serious concern to the rest of the world if, in the greatest empire, the old mercantile principle of the reservation of colonial products and colonial markets to the mother country is reintroduced. The breach with the old British tradition is not yet very considerable, if we measure it by its economic effects; but it is a recent innovation, which has already been extended, and is likely to be extended further as a result of Ottawa.

We thus see that Great Britain has recently made a substantial, though still partial and incomplete, change in her domestic policy from free trade to protection. She has made some tentative, but hesitating steps towards the goal of an integrated imperial economic unit by negotiation with the self-governing dominions. She has simultaneously taken a few steps towards a closed colonial empire.

Elsewhere he goes on to stress again how dangerous that particular policy is, not only to the trading relations of the British Empire with the rest of the world, but even to the peace of the world. I say, Mr. Chairman, that for a parliament that has reached its present autonomous position after years of struggle such as we have had in this dominion, I think it ill becomes us, having regard to the rights and future evolution of these non-self-governing dominions and protectorates, by any act which it is possible for us to avoid, to reduce them still further in their position of subordination to any government in any part of the empire.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I think it only fair to the committee to disabuse the minds of hon. gentlemen of much that is apparently concerning the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). In the first place it will be noted that His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom undertook to invite the governments of the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates to accord to Canada certain preferences, schedule D. I am glad to be able to inform the house that the following colonies have already, very gladly and cheerfully, passed legislation giving effect to this article in the agreement: Jamaica, Trinidad, Antigua, St. Vincent, British Honduras, Fiji, Federated Malay States and Hongkong.

An hon. MEMBER: They were told to do it.

Mr. STEVENS: And there may be some additional of which we have not yet been officially advised.

Now the right hon. gentleman referred to what is commonly known historically as the Boston Tea Party, and indicated that this is on a par with what lost the thirteen colonies to the British crown. In that instance it will be recalled that taxation was proposed direct from London. In this instance each of the colonies passes its own legislation and deals with the matter voluntarily on its own behalf.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Upon invitation.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the right hon. gentleman said—he did not use this language himself, but he quoted an article, apparently with approval, in which it was indicated that Canada had done nothing in return for the concessions granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there was no reference in anything I read about Canada's part in it.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I misunderstood the article quoted from Sir Arthur Salter. He may not have used the word "Canada," but he did state that the colonies received nothing in return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think so.

Mr. STEVENS: However, be that as it may, the fact is that in schedule F there is a list of items particularly requested by the colonies, of immediate and direct practical interest to them. I shall not read them in detail, I only draw the attention of the committee to schedule F. This was an arrangement that was made between the British authorities with advisers of the colonies present, and the matter was most cordially discussed, and has been cheerfully accepted by the colonies, and the concessions granted have been given as I have indicated.

In addition to what I have said in regard to schedule F, many of the items in schedule E are of distinct advantage to the colonies, and Canada extends to the colonies the British preference, extends to them certain special concessions, and we receive from the colonies in return the concessions indicated in schedule D. That I think is all that it is necessary to say at the moment in reply to the right hon. gentleman's observations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The paragraph which my hon. friend had in mind, I think, is this, from Sir Arthur Salter's article:

> The colonial empire is likely, then, to enjoy —or to suffer—the consequences of the Ottawa decisions. But it cannot, I think, be denied, that their interests received a very subordinate consideration. We find no proposals for specific preferences for characteristic products of the colonial empire, such as rubber.

I think that what my hon. friend has just said about all that has been done being done simply at the instance of the advisors of the colonial empire rather than at that of representatives from their legislatures, with whatever limited powers they may have, bears out the truth of what Sir Arthur Salter says.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. STEVENS: There were members of their legislatures here. Furthermore, schedule F contains a list of items of peculiar interest to the colonies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Were there any official delegates from the British colonies or protectorates at the conference?

Mr. STEVENS: If the right hon. gentleman refers to members of governments, I am not aware of any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mean official delegates.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in the sense my right hon. friend has in mind. There was the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with Sir Edward Davson and some others representing the colonies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are all shown in the official list as advisers to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. STEVENS: Sir Edward Davson represented the West Indies at the last imperial conference in London.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture is not here, seeing that we are dealing with the marketing of agricultural products. I have known for some time that the marketing of wheat and grain has been under the Department of Trade and Commerce, but it is news to me that the marketing of all agricultural products should be under that department. I always thought that the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa had to do with the marketing of agricultural products, while the provincial departments of agriculture were concerned with production. Now the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken charge of it all and we are inclined to ask, Why a Minister of Agriculture at all in these times? The Minister of Agriculture says himself that his presence is important. I notice a clipping in the Ottawa Journal in which there is a report of a speech made by the minister in Kansas City. The dispatch is dated November 13. The report reads:

> Hon. Robert Weir, Canadian Minister of Agriculture, told a luncheon gathering at the American Royal Livestock and Horse Show here Saturday that "agriculture is one of the most important considerations in the trade plan we are formulating."
> The minister was one of a number of agricultural authorities of other nations to address the luncheon and he spoke very briefly. In complimenting those responsible for conduct of the show, he said:
> "I believe I need only remind you of the importance of my presence at the parliament session at this time to convince you how important I consider this show that I would take a day to attend it," the minister said.

He admits himself that he is important and we have to agree with him. I think his presence here is necessary. I notice, under schedule D, No. 14, that reference is made to bacon and hams coming from Ceylon. A little while ago I referred to hog production and I was told that I was altogether wrong. I have here the press report in the Toronto Globe, showing what the Minister of Agriculture said, at Clinton on September 29:

In regard to prices, the minister said he could make no prophecy on this subject. "But I will tell you this," he added: "Two years ago I sold my hogs; today I am buying hogs."

What does that mean? It means simply, if I understand what the minister is talking about, that the price of hogs will improve and that he is going into hog production himself, and is advising the farmers to do the same. Every farmer at the meeting at which the minister spoke took that meaning from his words. That was what he was advising the farmers to do, to go into hog production. But that is not his only utterance. He has made other statements and I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of September 16, 1932, in which he is reported to have said:

"The British government has definitely committed itself to a policy of restriction with the object of raising the price of bacon in the United Kingdom," said Mr. Weir today. "If they can carry out this commitment the price of bacon should be higher in Britain within a year. Our farmers, if they wish to take advantage of the advance in prices, should make provision now for it takes 10 months to produce a hog. Too much emphasis cannot be placed on raising the right kind of pigs that produce select bacon. Unsatisfactory hogs which cannot be exported, always tend to depress our market."

In order to assist the farmers the practice started a year ago will be augmented. It provides them with select sows, bred to select boars at the actual cost they would bring at the slaughter houses. The government pays half the freight, and bears the cost of experts who choose the sows at the live stock yards and the other expenses. In this way farmers can get high grade bred sows at very little more than they will get for their under grade ones.

These are definite statements made by the Minister of Agriculture, and any man who understands English surely can take no other meaning from his words than that he is advocating that farmers of Canada go into the production of hogs again. I cannot understand why he should say, as reported at page 1138 of Hansard:

I have not at any time, either before or after the conference, advocated a campaign for increased hog production, whether the price was 2 cents or any other price.

The statements contradict one another, and I leave it to the committee to judge just what he meant.

Article 8 agreed to.

On article 9:

His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule, provided that nothing in this article shall preclude His Majesty's government in Canada from reducing the duties specified in the said schedule so long as the margin of British preference shown in that schedule is preserved or from increasing the rates under the intermediate or general tariff set out in the said schedule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Consideration of this article will involve taking up the items in the schedule one by one. Before that is commenced, may I say a word as to the chief objection we have to the schedule, considered as a whole. It is that it seeks to raise the tariff still higher and seeks to maintain the tariff at a certain rate over a period of years. That is an innovation so far as this parliament is concerned. I do not think that ever before this parliament has bound itself to maintain a tariff schedule of any appreciable extent if of any extent at all over a period of years. We have already discussed very fully the reasons why such should not for one minute be admitted as a precedent or a correct procedure, but I should like to add to the quotation I gave a moment ago from Mr. Hirst's article in the Nineteenth Century of October, what that distinguished authority has to say in regard to the same sort of thing where it is being done by the British government across the seas. It helps to make clear wherein the position which the Liberal party in Canada is taking is on all fours with the position taken by at least two of the political parties in the old country:

But there is also a grave constitutional objection to making the customs duties of the United Kingdom dependent for a term of years on the will of one or more colonial legislatures. It is an exact inversion of the policy of George III and Lord North, which lost us the American colonies. The colonial assemblies at that time preferred to fight rather than submit to a trifling customs duty on tea which Great Britain imposed.

The present parliament may persist, even in the face of shrinking trade and employment, in its determination to maintain or increase protective duties. But surely it cannot pretend to prevent its successors from touching the taxes which it is about to impose, or the taxes which it has already imposed since it was elected? Earlier in the year Liberals foresaw the danger, and issued a warning in the shape of a resolution passed by a unanimous vote of the National Liberal Federation at its annual meeting in April. The resolution ran as follows:

"In view of the Ottawa conference and the danger that this country may find itself committed by commercial treaties with the dominions to permanent tariffs of a discriminatory character on imports from foreign countries, it (the National Liberal Federation) gives notice in advance that no such treaty can be permitted to interfere with the constitutional right of parliament at any time to reduce or remove any such taxes."

This constitutional right is a privilege won from the crown by centuries of hard struggle; and it should be equally precious to the parliaments of the self-governing dominions, on whom it was freely conferred by the wisdom of our own legislature. I can conceive of nothing more invidious than this interference by the dominion governments with our right of control over our own budget. Curiously enough, it is a right which two important British ministers emphasised so lately as February 9, 1932, during the tariff debate. Mr. Baldwin said:

"Much of the debate has run on the difference between the permanent and the temporary nature of the tariff. There is no such thing as permanence in politics. Whatever one parliament does, it is in the power of another parliament to confirm, to increase, to diminish, or to abolish."

Here we have the true constitutional doctrine, unambigously expressed by the leader of the Conservative party. Mr. Walter Runciman (President of the Board of Trade) said in the same debate:

"The other objection taken to our proposals is that they are permanent. Certainly nothing in our fiscal system is permanent. The yearly budget comes up for discussion here and for examination in committee of ways and means, and is varied from time to time according to the constitution of the house and the opinion of the electors."

That, Mr. Chairman, expresses the position of the Liberal party of Canada quite as emphatically as it does the position of the Liberal party in the old world with respect to this innovation of maintaining tariffs by binding agreement. We regard it as being unsound constitutionally, as being in no sense a legal method of procedure, and as being fraught with no end of possible serious consequences. The object of this innovation has been made abundantly clear by the Prime Minister, and it is to the intent of the legislation quite as much as to the legislation itself that we are opposed so strongly. The Prime Minister has told us that the purpose of the legislation was to make the foreigner pay some tribute for the privilege of trading within the British Empire. Speaking in Calgary on September 6, of the effects of the agreements reached at the recent conference, he said:

One thing was certain, however, that nations outside of the empire would be asked to pay some tribute for the privilege of trading within the empire.

So far as Canada is concerned, that tribute is to be paid by the higher taxes which it is now sought to impose under this agreement. It was equally emphatically stated by the Prime Minister that the object was to shut out the foreigner. That again is the purpose of this higher tariff which we are now being asked to enact. We want to have trade within the British Empire, as has been said repeatedly, but we do not want it at the expense of the possibility of trade as well with other countries of the world. In so far as Canada is concerned we believe that she should be free to trade with all countries just as largely as her interests may seem to render it wise for her so to do and as she may find it possible to do.

There is another feature about this particular tariff schedule which is thoroughly bad and that is that it has been so arranged as, in many cases, to do away with the difference between the rates of duty of the intermediate tariff and of the general tariff. That undoubtedly has been deliberately designed so as to make next to impossible the arriving at trade agreements with other countries by destroying the margin of trading benefits which would offer favourable opportunities to the formation of such agreements. I do not believe that it is possible to emphasize too strongly how inimical to the future development of Canada's trade this particular legislation is likely to be, and particularly so at this time in the world's history when everything is more or less in a state of flux and where there is very little in the way of certainty, from one year to another as to what one country may be able to continue to do or as to what changes in trade conditions may come about in the relations between any one part of the empire and other countries or between different parts of the empire themselves. As regards the agreement itself, I think when we begin to discuss it item by item, we shall see that it is not so much an agreement or tariff schedule for the purpose of promoting trade within the British Empire as it is a schedule of tariff rates to make increasingly difficult and in many instances impossible, trade with the rest of the world. It is because of these features that, in the first instance, we object to the schedule considered in its entirety. As we discuss the different items I think it will be seen why, with regard to the interests of the Canadian consumer, with regard to the interests of the Canadian producer as affected by the cost of living and the costs of production—I shall not except the interests of the Canadian manufacturer because he is interested also in the cost of living and the costs of production—the tariff rates as imposed by this schedule are bound to work injury rather than good and to make more restricted than ever the present strangled condition of trade in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure the committee does not wish to thresh out again a question which has been discussed over and over, but I cannot allow the observations of the right hon. gentleman to pass without very briefly reiterating what has been said previously by the Prime Minister, by other hon. members of the house and by myself. In so far as the major portion of the general tariff schedule is concerned, there is nothing in the world to hinder this parliament from taking any action it likes in raising, lowering or abolishing duties imposed. Schedule E constitutes about one-fifth of the whole tariff; there are about two hundred and twenty-three items as compared with one thousand, roughly speaking. In regard to those particular items we do undertake by this agreement to maintain a spread; there is no question of that, but in so far as the article read a moment ago by the right hon. gentleman, dealing with the freedom of parliament, is concerned, I need hardly state that freedom is still present. However, we expect parliament to respect this agreement just as this and other parliaments have respected the agreements which were made by the right hon. gentleman for four and twelve year periods. I should like to direct his attention to a most amazing inconsistency in his position. This afternoon he twitted me because I had failed to give him credit for securing the tobacco preference for ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: That was something to be boasted of. I have under my hand the minutes of the conference of 1923, in which appears the statement that the Liberal party had secured that preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. I said that the British government had given it voluntarily.

Mr. STEVENS: The preference obtained by the right hon. gentleman was for ten years—that was virtuous, but this being for five years, it is iniquitous. I shall not labour further this question other than to say that the references to margin of preference and the preservation of the margin of preference are limited to schedule E of this agrement.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to read the whole schedule unless there is general consent not to do so. I can bring the schedule before the committee item by item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood at the outset that we would take up the agreement article by article, and that as we dealt with each article we would deal with the schedule referred to therein. This we would wish to do item by item.

Mr. RHODES: So far as I am concerned I would be quite content to take up the schedule item by item, with this pious hope that when we come to deal with the same items in committee of ways and means, we shall not repeat ad nauseam the same discussion which we carry on in this committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make quite clear to my hon. friend why we wish to take up the schedule item by item? We do not want to be asked to vote for the third reading of this bill until we know what is in the schedule, what the extent and effect of the tariff changes proposed are likely to be. We had to vote on the second reading without a knowledge of what we were doing, but we do not want to vote in the same way on the third reading if there is a possibility of avoiding doing so. If my hon. friend would prefer to go into committee of ways and means now and take up the tariff resolutions, we shall be agreeable to drop further discussion of the agreement at this stage, and take up ways and means, dispose of the resolutions and then come back to the other articles of the agreement. We shall from discussion of the tariff resolutions in committee of ways and means know all we wish to know about the various tariff proposals. Whichever is more agreeable to my hon. friend, we are prepared to do.

Mr. RHODES: I am ready to discuss the question with the Prime Minister, but the leader of the opposition will recall that the Prime Minister gave what he considered and what, of course, we consider as very cogent reasons why we should proceed with the agreement in the first instance before taking up the schedule in ways and means. To put it briefly, he said that to do otherwise would be putting the cart before the horse. But if it would facilitate the proceedings and secure the passage of these agreements through the house, the matter might be worthy of discussion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is just as well to discuss the schedule first.

Mr. RHODES: While I am on my feet, may I say that the right hon. gentleman, in making some observations with respect to these agreements, made his strongest objection to the circumstance that in many of the items the intermediate tariff had been placed upon a parity with the general, and therefore impeded our bargaining power with other countries with respect to the items in question. I have only this to say to my right hon. friend, whether his argument be sound or not, he was unfortunate in broaching it at the moment when we are going to consider the schedule item by item, because the very first item in the schedule is cocoa butter, and with respect to that item, the duties on the intermediate and general tariffs have been precisely the same for a number of years and through several revisions under his leadership. If, therefore, it be sound policy to have the intermediate and general tariffs on the same level with respect to cocoa butter, the argument applies with equal force to other items in the schedule. I have only this observation to make, that my right hon. friend would have been well advised to have waited until we had passed this item and come to some other item which had received from us different treatment from that given by my right hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: Then we shall deal with the schedule item by item.

Schedule E—Canada.

Customs tariff—20a. Butter produced from the cocoa bean, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 3 cents.

Mr. DONNELLY: From what countries do we import cocoa butter? Is any manufactured in Canada? How much comes from the United States and how much from the United Kingdom? Is this some preferred trade or will some Canadian industry be assisted?

Mr. RHODES: For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1932, we imported 4,400,000 pounds of cocoa butter worth $654,000, of which $618,000 worth came from the Netherlands, $14,000 worth from the United States and $10,000 worth from the United Kingdom.

Mr. YOUNG: Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: Production in Canada in 1930 amounted to 1,500,000 pounds worth $329,000.

Mr. YOUNG: I notice that the average price of the importations from Britain is about twenty cents a pound, and from other countries, about fifteen cents a pound. I presume that is due to the difference in exchange. These are the values for duty.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. RHODES: I have before me no statistics as to the cost of an individual pound. I take it my hon. friend has used his pencil and divided the cost by the number of pounds.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must bear in mind that cocoa butter, like many other commodities, has varying degrees and qualities, so that one would not be safe in making a computation of that character and putting the proper price per pound on the highest grade of cocoa butter.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister say that the value of imports from Great Britain as stated, are the values for duty as fixed by our customs department? He says that we received $10,000 worth from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: That would be the value for duty.

Mr. YOUNG: That is to say, for customs purposes the pound is valued at $4.86⅔, and when we say we import $10,000 worth, we are importing $10,000 worth figuring the pound at $4.86⅔, while actually it is worth between $3 and $4. Therefore, as a matter of fact this $10,000 worth reported as being what we get from Great Britain greatly overestimates the amount we actually get from that country.

Mr. RHODES: The figures do not segregate the total poundage and allocate them to the different countries. I gave merely the total imports and the value was allocated to the different countries.

Mr. YOUNG: The point I want to make is this: When the government say that they imported so many thousand dollars' worth of goods of a certain kind from Great Britain, how do they arrive at that valuation? Is that not the value for duty as reported to the customs officials, on which value duty is collected?

Mr. RHODES: The figures given in the quarterly report of the Trade of Canada indicated that the importations from Britain during that year were 47,045 pounds.

Mr. YOUNG: That does not answer my question. An importation of 47,045 pounds valued at $9,774 brings the price to almost twenty cents per pound, but I find that the price from other countries amounts to only fifteen cents per pound. I want to know whether that discrepancy is not accounted for in this way: in reporting the quantity we get from Great Britain, you call a pound $4.86⅔, and that is the way in which you arrive at the figure $9,774. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. RHODES: That question ought properly to be directed to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. YOUNG: He is in his seat. He can answer.

Mr. RHODES: I do not see what bearing it has upon the case in point.

Mr. YOUNG: It has a tremendous bearing. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue will answer.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is quite correct as the hon. member for Weyburn says: the value of the pound is taken at $4.86\frac{2}{3}$. That was the value of the pound when the dollar was related to it and when the tariff was put on.

Mr. YOUNG: That brings us then to this position, that for the first time in the history of Canada the trade returns, official figures, published by the government, with respect to our trade with other countries, are not to be relied on. They report that we have a trade of so many thousands or millions with other countries, and now on the minister's own confession we find that these figures are not reliable and that the $9,774 worth of this commodity which we are supposed to have bought from Great Britain is really only $6,636 worth.

Mr. RHODES: My answer to that would be that it shows that we have all the more opportunity for doing trade with Great Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: It means this, that my hon. friends opposite have been more successful than they have themselves boasted in shutting off trade with this country. It means that Canada's trade has been stifled to a much greater extent than even my hon. friends claim. It also means that our trade statistics are no longer reliable.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is unfair to say that. Everyone knows that in the present fluctuating state of the pound its value for duty purposes is $4.86\frac{2}{3}$. My hon. friend is ready at arithmetic and he can easily figure it out for himself. His suggestion that the trade returns give a false impression is unworthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG: If it is true that $9,774 is equal to $6,636, then I am wrong; but if $6,636 is less than $9,774, I say that the returns are false.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is entirely overlooking the fact that the actual number of pounds is given in the figures here. My hon. friend, of course, can make any argument he likes on that, but it is quite improper for him to say that the figures are not correct. It may be that his argument is sound with respect to the value, but that is another matter entirely.

Mr. YOUNG: When we get the annual returns of Canada's trade the amount is given in dollars and cents, and the figures are not reliable according to the minister's own admission.

Mr. RHODES: It is quoted in both pounds and dollars and cents.

Mr. YOUNG: The total figures are not quoted in both pounds and dollars. They are quoted in dollars. When the conference was in session and the British delegates were figuring on the possibilities of trade in cocoa butter, for instance, with Canada, were they told that these importation figures were not reliable, that $9,774 was really not the true figure?

Mr. RYCKMAN: They did not have to be told; they knew it.

Mr. YOUNG: I think it is a pretty serious state of affairs when we can no longer turn to our own official trade returns to find out the truth about what we want to know. Now my hon. friend says that we take from Holland $618,000 worth. We are increasing the rate from two to three cents a pound under the intermediate and general tariffs. I presume the object is to divert trade from the Netherlands, because the big importation is from the Netherlands, the imports from the United States amounting to only $14,000 and from Brazil to $11,000. We have been told frequently that the object in raising these duties it is to hit back at those who have been raising their tariffs against us. I want to ask the minister now, what tariffs has the Netherlands been raising against us?

Mr. RHODES: Obviously, Mr. Chairman, I would not come armed with statistics to answer questions of that character. There has been no raising of tariffs by the Netherlands against us, so far as I know, and even if there had been, that would be a matter for the Netherlands. I am sure that my hon. friend will still adhere to his position that the Netherlands is perfectly free to make its own tariffs to suit its own purposes. It is not so long since I heard the argument extremely well made, if not by the hon. member for Weyburn by hon. members who sit around him, that the British delegates at the conference were shrewd enough at making bargains to take us into their camp. I can assure my hon. friend that they were thoroughly cognizant not only of the matter of poundage but as to the imports of commodities covered by this agreement.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps so, but the people of Canada were not so enlightened. When we saw from the trade returns reported that our trade had shrunk to $570,000,000, we thought that that was the actual state of affairs, but we find it has shrunk to away below that. Apparently the Netherlands has not been raising tariffs against us, but now we are raising tariffs against the Netherlands. Are they any different from us? Will they not retaliate by raising their tariffs against us? I would ask the minister what our trade, imports and exports, was with the Netherlands last year.

Mr. POULIOT: In the meantime may I express a view on the matter and make a suggestion to the government? I shall not make it to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, but through Hansard to the Prime Minister himself. Does England grow cocoanuts? No. The cocoanuts come from Java, a possession of the Netherlands south of Asia. Cocoanuts also come from Sumatra and other islands in the tropics. The nuts are imported into Holland and are there converted into cocoa butter. The cocoa butter is exported from Holland to Great Britain, and then re-exported to Canada, and under this agreement this cocoa butter coming originally from Holland will enter Canada under the British preference as a re-export from England. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite are familiar with the English trade figures and know very well that during the year 1921 England's re-exports amounted to £64,000,000. So under this agreement no duty will be imposed on cocoa butter shipped from Holland and re-exported to Canada such as is imposed on the foreign product. In other words, it will be accorded the British preference although it will really be coming in as a semi-smuggled commodity.

And now, having made my preliminary, may I suggest this to the right hon. the Prime Minister? He has been blessed with those earthly goods which the farmers and the unemployed do not enjoy at the present time. May I suggest to him that a good way in which he could help this country would be to start a new trade in Canada in competition with Holland? Let him import cocoanuts from Java and have them converted, in an appendage to the Eddy Company in Hull, into cocoa butter so that instead of converting wood into matches that company will be turning cocoanuts into cocoa butter.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure that we have all been entertained by the humorous remarks of my hon. friend. I was asked for our trade with the Netherlands. Our imports from the Netherlands in 1931 were $7,287,000, and in 1932, $5,827,000; and our exports to the Netherlands in 1931 were $10,477,000, and in 1932, $13,502,000. May I say to the hon. member for Temiscouata, who has been having a most interesting joke all to himself, and has shared it in part with hon. members on this side of the house, that there is not much danger of that which he has in mind happening, because goods the product of foreign countries, if they are to secure the British preference in Canada, must have a certain proportion of British Empire content. I believe they must have 50 per cent empire content. The increase in duty is comparatively small when the article is translated into the use to which it is usually put, namely for use in confectionery. The actual application of the three cent rate as opposed to the two cent rate will make no serious difference, but it will have the tendency of diverting trade to British Empire concerns.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has told us that in the year ending March, 1932, we sold to the Netherlands goods valued at about $15,000,000, and purchased from them only about $5,000,000 worth. In that instance trade was almost three to one in our favour. In this one item alone he slaps at that trade, and is going to reduce the $5,000,000 worth of trade with Holland by two-thirds of a million dollars. I ask the committee, Mr. Chairman, if that is in the interests of Canadian trade? I ask this question: Is there not likely to be a reaction on the part of the Netherlands to a course of that kind? I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce how much wheat we sold to Holland, and whether or not this agreement is going to affect our sale of wheat in the future?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the article carry?

Mr. YOUNG: No, it does not carry.

Mr. COOTE: While the minister is getting the information I should like to ask whether or not we have a trade agreement with the Netherlands, and if under that agreement the Netherlands enjoy the benefit of the intermediate tariff?

Mr. STEVENS: We have a trade agreement with the Netherlands through what is known as a most favoured nation treaty. They enjoy the intermediate rate. The hon. member for Weyburn asked for figures in connection with wheat. In 1931 we exported 7,672,000 bushels; in 1932 we exported 8,473,000 bushels.

The CHAIRMAN: I think these questions should be asked in a discussion of the agreement in general. We should confine ourselves to the articles themselves.

Mr. YOUNG: We are dealing with the items now.

Mr. STEVENS: I had not quite completed my remarks when the chairman called me to order.

The CHAIRMAN: I repeat that I believe the committee should confine themselves to the article. A discussion of the general trade of Canada should not be had at this time.

Mr. YOUNG: It certainly should.

Mr. STEVENS: I am bound to point out that in countries such as Holland the credited trade is that landed at the great ports, and shipped from Holland into Germany and other European countries of the interior. Therefore one must be careful when making an estimate of trade figures concerning Holland.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not go through Holland in bond?

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily. They are merchandised at the ports of entry.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend seems to be under the impression that no harm can be done by raising the tariff against a country which merely sells our goods for us, or a country which does not buy merely for home consumption. I am not so sure about that. If in the minds of Hollanders we should raise the idea that we are attempting to aim a blow at their trade with us, there is bound to be an unfavourable reaction in that trade. I should like to figure out, or have the minister figure out for me—which would be better —what the actual applied rate will be from the Netherlands. The price of cocoa butter from that country averages about fifteen cents a pound, carrying a duty of three cents a pound, or about 20 per cent. In addition to that there will be an excise tax of three per cent which will be based not on one dollar but on $1.20, or the duty paid value. Is that correct? So, with those figures we find that the applied rate on this article from Holland will be about 23$\frac{3}{5}$ per cent. Let us compare that with the rate on the same article from Great Britain, which comes under the British preference. In the schedule we find that for Great Britain the tariff item reads "free". Then we have an exchange dumping duty of from six to eight cents per pound, or roughly speaking about 20 per cent. To that we add the three per cent special excise duty. I should like to ask the minister what will be the difference in the actual applied rate on this commodity coming from Great Britain and from Holland?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has it under his hand.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member need not attempt to confuse the committee by dealing with excise as if it were applicable to this item alone. It applies to all of them.

Mr. YOUNG: I know it.

Mr. RHODES: For purposes of comparison he may as well eliminate excise from the discussion.

Mr. YOUNG: No, no.

Mr. RHODES: He may as well not consider excise at all, because it applies to other importations.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister does not know what I am coming at.

Mr. RHODES: From the viewpoint of my hon. friend's argument, it does not matter. I do not know what question the hon. member has submitted to me but I am called upon to answer.

Mr. YOUNG: All right, I will answer it myself. Hon. members will recall that we have always contended the special excise tax is nothing more than a customs duty under another name. The actual applied rate on this commodity from Holland is going to be 20 per cent on the valuation of fifteen cents per pound, plus three per cent excise, making a total of twenty-three and a fraction per cent. The actual applied rate from Great Britain will be about the same thing. So, where is your boasted preference? Undoubtedly the rate is now free from the British Isles, but when the commodity is brought in we will find that the British exporter will pay practically the same rate as the Hollander. There is no question at all about it.

Mr. STEVENS: Then, my hon. friend ought to be happy.

Mr. YOUNG: No,—because another factor comes into it.

Mr. STEVENS: Another nigger in the wood pile.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend wants to know why I insist upon counting the excise tax. I shall tell him why. Because the Canadian produced article does not pay it. This article ostensibly produced for the benefit of the British exporter will benefit nobody but the Canadian producer. The minister has told us that we produced a million and a half pounds of this commodity in Canada. We import four million pounds. The increase in the duty is one cent per pound; therefore the increase in cost to the Canadian consumer will be $55,000. My hon. friend says that does not amount to much. If every item in the tariff schedule which, on the surface, does not appear to amount to much, were eliminated, we would not have much tariff left. It may look very small, only a cent a pound on a commodity we do not use to any very great extent. In the aggregate however it amounts to $55,000.

I want to know what Canadian industry is affected. Can the minister tell us where this product is manufactured in Canada, and by whom?

Mr. STEVENS: This material is used very largely in the production of confectionery. When translated into terms of confectionery, providing the whole duty is charged to that commodity, it amounts to about one-fifth of a cent per pound. Surely that is nothing to be alarmed about?

Mr. YOUNG: These are hard times, and we have to look after the small things. I did not ask the minister who consumed this stuff, I asked him who produced it in Canada. I want to know what industry is getting this $55,000. Where is it being made, who is producing it, how many employees have they, what do they pay in wages? I want to find out what this industry is costing.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely it is not reasonable to ask us to have under our hands virtually all the information that the Bureau of Statistics have in regard to the manufacturing concerns in Canada. I confess that we are prepared to go to great lengths in satisfying my hon. friend, but I am sorry I have not under my hand that information.

Mr. YOUNG: I know I am asking a lot, but my hon. friend must not forget that these men who came and asked for this tariff must have given the government the information. Surely the government did not give them this without knowing something about their business. I said a moment ago that this diversion was going to cost $55,000, but that is on the basis of an increase of one cent a pound in duty, but the total duty will be three cents a pound, and the total cost to the people of Canada will be three times $55,000, or $165,000. I want to know what the people of Canada are getting in exchange for that $165,000 extra that we are going to pay for our cocoa butter. What do these people pay in wages?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, it would take a verbal contortionist to attempt to follow my hon. friend in his discussion. If I attempted to accept his various premises I would be hopping like Eliza from one cake of ice to another. If only I could nail him down to one thing at a time I could answer him.

In the first place he said: Who asked for this protection? Let me say that nobody asked for it. It was not dealt with as a matter of protection at all. It is one of the items on which we agreed with the British government to give them a preference. It was not dealt with on the basis of protection at all. My hon. friend is labouring this three per cent excise tax upon imports again. He could not do more than repeat over and over the arguments he made in the house last year. We cannot get any further ahead in the discussion on that item. Let us agree with my hon. friend that to the extent that that three per cent excise is applied it means an additional three per cent protection. My hon. friend knows well that the statement was made last year, and we still adhere to that position, that while undoubtedly it affords incidental protection to a certain extent, it was applied as a matter of producing revenue.

Another thing my hon. friend assumes, and I cannot follow him in that assumption, is that the people of Canada are going to pay $55,000 more—

Mr. YOUNG: I do assume that.

Mr. RHODES: Of course he multiplied it and had it up to $165,000, it is well that I interrupted him or he would have had it up to half a million. But as a matter of fact if these goods come from Great Britain nobody pays the $55,000. If on the other hand they come from countries which have to pay the three per cent tax, then the $55,000 goes into the treasury of this country. Even if that is done it by no means follows that it would cost the people of this country one cent more to purchase the ultimate finished goods into which cocoa butter goes, because as pointed out by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) translated into terms of confectionery, if the whole $55,000 were charged to that commodity it would mean an increased cost of only one-fifth of a cent per pound on the best material. I will say in that case it would unquestionably be assumed by the manufacturer and not passed on to the public, unless we introduce a one-fifth cent piece in Canada.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. I wish to correct an error in Hansard of yesterday, in connection with these tariffs. At page 1115 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce gives two tables showing some comparisons of duties in relation to the present trade agreements. It is merely a clerical error. He gives the British duty on eggs as 1s. 2d. to 2s. 1d. per dozen, which is a gross mistake, because it runs from 1s. to 1s. 9d. per great hundred. That is an entirely different thing. I do not think the minister would like to have an incorrect statement like that remain on the record.

Mr. YOUNG: Judging from his remarks just before six o'clock, the Minister of Finance did not quite grasp the point I was trying to make. I do not think it is due so much to lack of understanding on his part as to a want of clarity on mine. However, I will try to explain briefly now what I had in mind. Under this legislation the duty on cocoa butter is to be increased from two cents to three cents per pound both in the intermediate and in the general rates, while the nominal rate under the preference will still be free. Now, we import 4,000,000 odd pounds, and one cent per pound added to the price of that would represent $40,000 a year. We produce at home 1,500,000 pounds, and one cent per pound added to that would be the equivalent of $15,000, or a total of $55,000 per year. That, I pointed out, would be the cost of diverting this trade to Britain. When I said that the cost to the country would be three times that amount, or $165,000, I meant that the total rate of three cents per pound would be charged the Canadian people and that would be what the industry in Canada would cost us. The cost of protecting the industry, I indicated, would be the total rate of three cents per pound or $165,000 a year.

The minister said that the object of this legislation was to give a preference to Britain, and he quoted figures to prove that the rate from Britain under the new arrangement would be practically the same as the rate from other countries. During the supper hour I secured the latest bulletin from the department in regard to the exchange rate. The pound today is quoted at $3.73, and the value declared by the department is $3.71; that, subtracted from $4.40, leaves 69 cents. That 69 cents then is the dumping duty that will be imposed on the pound sterling in the next two weeks. Sixty-nine cents on a valuation of $3.73 is 18½ per cent, so that the dumping duty from Britain will amount to 18½ per cent; and adding to that three per cent we get the duty paid value, which would be approximately 21 per cent. That will be the duty on this article coming from Great Britain. The rate from the Netherlands or the outside world will be three cents a pound on a valuation of 15 cents, or approximately 20 per cent. Add to that the three per cent dumping duty on $1.20 and you get 23½ per cent or thereabouts, so that the preference to Britain is not three cents a pound but about 2½ per cent. That is about all the preference that Britain is getting under this arrangement.

The minister says that this was done to give Great Britain a preference. May I ask him whether, at the time this item was put in the schedule, he had in mind giving Great Britain such a slender preference as that?

Mr. RHODES: I can only answer my hon. friend's remark by saying that if Britain had a preference before, which was the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite—that the tariff remained free, two and two, under them—we certainly have increased the preference to the extent that we have changed it to free, three and three. With respect to the other portion of the hon. gentleman's argument, I have nothing to add to what I said before dinner.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not so much concerned with what was done before. If the Liberal party were not logical in their stand, that is their own funeral. I want to know what the situation is now. Here we are passing legislation under an agreement with Britain, under which she is to have apparently a preference of three cents a pound on this article. But the fact is that when we figure it out the preference amounts to only two per cent, a mere negligible fraction. My contention is this. If the rate of three cents a pound is high enough to shut out that article from Holland or from other countries, a rate substantially the same will shut it out from Britain, so that we shall be getting the product made in Canada. My hon. friend says that this is a revenue item, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a very good point when he said that this is an article that may be regarded as a luxury inasmuch as it is used in the making of confectionery, so that it could very well carry a revenue rate. I agree with him, but what I am afraid of is that this legislation will operate in such a way that no revenue will accrue, for the simple reason that the goods will be shut out of Canada; so that while we pay the extra three cents a pound duty we shall not be paying it into the revenue of the country but into the pockets of certain Canadian manufacturers. The question I asked before supper and the question I ask now is: What is the Canadian industry which is affected? Where is it or where are they located, what number of men do they employ and what do they pay in wages?

Mr. RHODES: The industry affected is the very large and widespread biscuit and confectionary industry which covers the whole of Canada. It would be quite impossible to answer my hon. friend's question categorically, in detail, nor do I consider it advisable or appropriate to take individual companies by name throughout Canada in relation to this or any other item.

Mr. YOUNG: The industries mentioned by my hon. friend are the consumers of the product. Who are the producers?

Mr. RHODES: They are both.

Mr. YOUNG: The confectionery manufacturers, then, make their own cocoa butter.

Mr. RHODES: Some of them do.

Mr. YOUNG: Is there any industry that makes it on a commercial scale?

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that there is ample capacity in the industry to meet all Canadian requirements.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not the question. Ample capacity to meet all Canadian requirements means, I take it, that the minister intends so to frame the tariff that all Canadian requirements will be supplied by Canadian factories, which is the very thing I was afraid of. It will divert revenue from the treasury into the pockets of certain manufacturers, and I want to know who they are.

Mr. RHODES: I will repeat once more, and for the last time so far as my hon. friend is concerned, that if the importations come in free no duty is paid. If the importations do pay a duty then the revenue goes into the treasury. So that my hon. friend's deduction that the increase from two to three per cent in the duty means an increase in the amount of money that will be made by the manufacturers is entirely wrong. He is mistaken.

With respect to his question as to what industries are affected, I may say to him that that is not a question which ought to be answered in detail.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a perfectly proper question.

Mr. RHODES: Does my hon. friend mean to assert that I should mention the individual companies by name?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Do they want to be hidden in the cellar?

Mr. RHODES: It is not what they wish to have done; it is a question of the proprieties. I have told my hon. friend what he has a right to know in answer to his question.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister says that if the importation comes in free no duty is paid. Now I have shown that the importation will not come in free even from Britain. It will pay approximately 21 per cent, almost as much as it will pay coming from Holland. I wish to know, and I think the members of this committee have a right to know, what industry is affected by this. From what the minister says, the industry in Canada is going to supply the entire Canadian market with a certain product if it gets the three cents per pound duty, and that industry will take the three cents a pound out of the pockets of the people. We have a right to know who they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely the minister can give that information. Parliament is entitled to all the information in detail. This is really like a new budget and I think the minister should reconsider the answer he has given.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is a very important one. I can remember that in connection with the tariff schedules of 1930 the Prime Minister when acting as Minister of Finance did not hesitate to speak about specific industries. There was in particular a glass industry at Hamilton which it was hoped would be promoted by certain high tariffs which were discussed in this house. No injustice to any particular industry suggests itself to my mind or, I imagine, to the mind of any other hon. member.

The one feature of the argument of the hon. member for Weyburn which I think is deserving of some consideration by the Minister of Finance is his contention that the imposition of these duties does not give effective preference to Great Britain. If the minister has an answer to that argument, I should like to hear it. I must say that I was surprised as the hon. member for Weyburn developed his argument, but if he is correct in saying that the duty against Great Britain is practically as high as the duty against Holland, then it would seem that these duties are not such as will divert trade from non-empire to empire countries but will simply impose additional protection for the benefit of Canadian industry. If that is so, surely we are justified in offering the severest criticism of what the government has done in this respect. If because of its protectionist mandate received in 1930 the government felt that it was its duty to give additional protection to the cocoa butter manufacturers of Canada, there was only one proper way in which to do it, and that was by means of a regular budget. In that case the rates of duty could be altered as conditions changed and as the wishes of the people of the Dominion of Canada might dictate. If the hon. member for Weyburn is right and the effect of this particular duty—doubtless there are hundreds of other articles in the same category—is not to divert trade from foreign to British sources, is not to give additional business to manufacturers or producers in other parts of the empire, but is simply a left-handed way of giving additional protection to Canadian manufacturers, a trade agreement is not the proper place for such an item. Being placed in this agreement the rate cannot be changed without a breach of our obligations in honour to the parties to the agreement.

I do not think the Minister of Finance can toss this argument off in the summary way in which he has sought to dispose of it. He read a lecture to the hon. member for Weyburn and said that he proposed to say this and say it for once and the last time. It seems to me that the argument is a very serious one and should be answered. The members of this committee are entitled to know whether this schedule is merely a subterfuge to give additional protection to Canadian manufacturers or whether it is to bring about a bona fide diversion of trade from non-empire to empire sources. If it represents a real concession to Great Britain, I for one would not go very far in arguing against it, because I realize that there must be two parties to an argument; we must make concessions in order to get concessions. I think we are getting some valuable concessions under this agreement, but if this particular item is merely a subterfuge to give additional privileges to certain producing interests in this country, the committee and the house should know.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) has just done what is very frequently done in this house; he has attributed to me a statement which I did not make. He could not torture the English language in such a way as to make me say what he claims I did say. I think I should be the last person to say to the committee that I refused to say more than so and so. What I did say was that I would repeat to the hon. member for Weyburn for the last time something which I had repeated prior to the dinner recess. That is entirely different from saying that if the hon. gentleman submitted a question to me I would refuse to answer.

I want to say to the hon. gentleman that although I have not recently been in the house quite so long as he has, I have been a member for a great many years. I came into this house nearly a quarter of a century ago, and I do not propose to take any instructions from him as to the manner in which I ought to conduct myself in this house. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of exercising, as they have every right to do, their right to speak and to present their arguments. Sometimes they present those arguments in a vehement manner; sometimes they are presented, as my hon. friend has just done, in an unfair manner, but the moment an hon. member on this side replies, hon. members opposite claim they are receiving a lecture. At no time have I ever attempted to take an attitude of that kind.

Coming to the argument of my hon. friend, I would say that this increase in the intermediate and general tariffs of one cent per pound was not imposed at the instance of the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I heard the minister say that.

Mr. RHODES: We never saw them. This was imposed as part of the agreement which we made with the mother country. The increased duty was given as a matter of preference, for that and for no other purpose.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does it give it?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has suggested that because we increased the duty from two to three cents per pound we have therefore increased the protection to a Canadian industry. Let me say to him that under the government which he supported the tariff was free, two and two. Did that protect, or did it not?

Mr. YOUNG: Apparently it did.

Mr. RHODES: I submit that it is only a question of degree.

Mr. ILSLEY: Precisely.

Mr. RHODES: This increased duty was imposed as a preference, the idea being to divert as much of this trade as possible to the mother country, and it does divert it to the extent to which it comes in free. The argument that there is an increased cost to the consumer falls entirely by the way. The item comes in free today just as it did under the government which my hon. friend supported. It has been suggested that because I did not wish to give names I was withholding information which should properly be given. I do not wish for one moment to withhold any information which this committee should properly have. If the committee insists, I shall give the names, but I do not see that any good purpose will be served.

Mr. YOUNG: We insist.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there any reason why we should not have them?

Mr. RHODES: It is only a question of discussing the business of individual companies. The hon. member for Hants-Kings referred to glass, but that is an entirely different matter. In that case the duty was imposed upon the distinct understanding that the price would not be increased. It was increased, and the government acted promptly to restore the old position.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no difference.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend apparently has a thirst for information, perhaps brought on by too much confectionery. The manufacturers of cocoa butter in Canada are Fry's and Bakers. I am informed that all the other confectionery manufacturers are importers of this commodity.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister give us the number of employees and the wages paid?

Mr. RHODES: I have not those statistics.

Mr. RYCKMAN: And the ages of the wives.

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend is interested in that information, he can get it, but we are not. What we are interested in and what we have a right to know is how many employees will be supported by this form of regulation, what they receive in wages, and what it will cost the country. I have no desire to make political capital for the Liberal party out of this incident, but the minister has stated that the duties were the same under the Liberal government. I say they were not, because at that time the preference meant free entry. There was no dump duty on exchange, and that is the manner in which the increase has come about. My hon. friends opposite have said: of course, the British pound is below par and we must add a special dump duty of 69 cents on a valuation of $3.73, or something like eighteen per cent. We never did that. Then in addition, there is the three per cent excise tax.

Mr. CANTLEY: You never did anything.

Mr. YOUNG: We never did that. The rate, free, under the Liberal regime was f-r-e-e. Now it means twenty-one per cent. We would like to have this information.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry but I have not that information.

Mr. YOUNG: I suggest that the item stand until the minister can give the committee the number of employees and the wages paid.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend may ask for the figures, but they are not obtainable. I am advised that the Bureau of Statistics does not compile figures unless more than three or four industries are affected; therefore the figures are not obtainable.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to intervene in this part of the debate for long, but I remember distinctly that during the special session the Prime Minister said that he was raising the tariff in order to decrease unemployment. At the same time he indicated the relation that existed in his mind between high tariff and employment. Therefore, if the Minister of Finance is a true disciple of the Prime Minister, he must follow in his footsteps, and in that case he must undoubtedly learn before raising the tariff, the number of people who will benefit from that increase in securing work. I base my argument on the Prime Minister's statement: This is why I believe it is very strong.

Mr. YOUNG: There is another question I should like to ask the minister. He says that this was done with the object of giving Britain a preference. I want to ask him whether the British delegates asked for this preference and, if they did, whether they understood it would amount to only two or three per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I shall not for a moment attempt to become responsible for what the understanding of the British delegates was in respect to the implications of this or any other item of the tariff. I can only assume, as do hon. gentlemen opposite and, I think, quite properly, that the British are shrewd traders, keen business men, and they knew very well what they were about.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—79. Florist stock, viz.: Azaleas, rhododendrons, pot-grown lilacs, rose stock and other stock for grafting, seedling carnation stock, araucarias, bulbs, corms, tubers, rhizomes and dormant roots, n.o.p.; seedling stock for grafting, viz.: Plum, pear, peach and other fruit trees: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many, if any, of these items come from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Imports under this item were $677,000, of which $28,000 worth came from the United Kingdom; $38,000 from the United States, and almost the entire remainder from the Netherlands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the statement which the minister has before him indicate which of the items would come from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I cannot give the individual items. The item is a complicated one and the amount covers the whole.

Mr. POULIOT: Rhododendrons grow wild in South Africa.

Mr. NEILL: I trust the hon. member for West Kootenay will hear me say that I support this item. I am sure he will be gratified. This is a very modest form of protection, only 15 per cent and 20 per cent. While it is not popular to advocate protection in these days of reaction against the extreme high tariff policies of hon. gentlemen opposite, yet I am not ashamed to say that to a moderate degree I am in favour of a tariff especially on a new industry. There has grown up in British Columbia, possibly in the district represented by the hon. member for Nanaimo and also in the district I represent, an industry in this class of bulbs. The growers have been very hard hit in the last year or two, because when Britain imposed a duty on foreign imports it practically shut Holland out of the British market, with the result that Holland redoubled her efforts and unloaded her goods on the Canadian market with disastrous consequences to this young and growing industry. In my district there is a man who has made a specialty—I think he is known throughout Canada—of the production of rhododendrons; growing and propagating them in the open air he could supply the whole of Canada. I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver Centre intends to oppose this item—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. NEILL: —but I intend to support it and I hope the hon. member for West Kootenay will be pleased.

Mr. COOTE: I think the first two items illustrate the very dangerous nature of the agreement which has been negotiated, because we are raising the tariff against Holland on goods that come largely from that country, and it is only natural to expect that Holland will not feel very gracious towards us over this treatment. Holland has been a good customer for Canadian wheat, and I am afraid we are doing a very unwise thing in imposing what may seem to be small, irritating tariffs, but which may result in action by Holland to cancel the treaty that we have with that country. When I was in Montreal within the last ten days I met a man who had just returned from Europe, and who said he had been talking to one of the largest wheat importers in the Netherlands in an effort to interest him in Canadian wheat. The importer, however, said that they were no longer interested in importing our wheat because we did not seem to want to take any goods from them. That is something we cannot ignore. I regret very much that in negotiating this trade agreement with Great Britain, instead of raising tariffs against countries like Holland, we did not offer Britain some concessions, for instance, in the form of a reduction of tariff on textiles. That would have been of much greater benefit to Britain and of considerable benefit to Canada, and it would not have put us in so much danger of losing our trade treaty with Holland, which is so good a customer of ours. The figures given this afternoon indicate that Holland is buying twice as much from Canada as we are buying from her. It is unfortunate that we should raise duties against such a good customer in order to secure this trade agreement. It is one of the objectionable features of the agreement.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to say very plainly that in this matter I am in absolute agreement with the principle advanced by the hon. member for Macleod. In the first place I am strongly in favour of trade within the empire. In the second, I have no objection at all to diverting trade from a country that will not buy our goods to one that will. It, is however, bad policy and unsound business, at a time when markets are being so largely closed against us, to alienate a good customer like Holland which has consistently purchased from two to three times as much in value of our goods as we have bought from her. This is going against the principle which has been enunciated of diverting trade from countries that will not trade with us to countries that will, and I join very strongly in the protest of the hon. member for Macleod. It surely would have been possible to make an agreement with Britain without attacking one of the few countries that will do business with us, especially when we consider the number of countries that have practically closed their doors to us and the comparatively small and specialized nature of the business that nations such as Holland carry on.

Mr. YOUNG: I am in hearty agreement with the sentiments of the two hon. gentlemen to my left in regard to antagonizing Holland. A story very similar to the one told by the hon. member for Macleod came to me of a miller from Holland at present in western Canada who was approached with regard to purchasing Canadian wheat. "Why should I buy Canadian wheat?" he asked. "Why not?" was the retort. "Because your government" he replied, "has imposed prohibitive duties on the very few things that Holland sells to Canada, and so there is no reason on earth why we should buy your wheat. You have done your level best to destroy Holland's trade with you, and I am not going to buy your Canadian wheat. That is my answer."

Mr. NEILL: Would the hon. gentleman regard a duty of 15 per cent as prohibitive?

Mr. YOUNG: On some articles, yes. Formerly these articles came in free from all countries. Now they are free from Great Britain, 15 per cent intermediate, and 20 per cent general tariff. If Great Britain could not compete when they were coming in free, can she compete when the effective duty is 21 per cent? Because you have to add the dumping duty on to your excise tax and it makes a duty of approximately 21 per cent against these goods coming in from Great Britain, as compared with 15 per cent plus 3½ per cent under the intermediate tariff. The rate is actually higher on goods coming in from Great Britain than from other countries.

Mr. NEILL: Then you cannot kick.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not where my kick comes in. My kick comes in here, that we are putting on a tariff against all countries which is going to shut out these goods and compel us to buy them from the Canadian producer. I want to ask the minister if any representations have been made to the government by anyone in Canada interested in the production of these goods that these duties be imposed; and if so, by whom?

Mr. RHODES: I am not aware of anybody in Canada having asked that these duties be imposed.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that there have been such representations.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. RHODES: I am not aware of any, and I am advised by my technical officers that we were not requested to impose these duties. The same observations apply to this as to the other item. It was a matter of negotiation between our delegates and those of Great Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: Surely the British delegates never asked that a thing that was coming in free should now be taxed 21 per cent, a higher rate under the British preference than under the intermediate tariff. I understand that representations were made by a company which aspires to produce certain of these goods in Canada, and the people of Canada are going to be made to pay. Further, this tariff will not bring in any revenue because it will be prohibitive, and the people will have to buy the Canadian goods.

Mr. SPENCER: How many of these flowers can be produced in either Great Britain or Canada?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can answer the question with absolute accuracy. I can only answer on the advice which is given to me. I am told that the production of practically all of these items is common to Great Britain and Canada, and in British Columbia there is a very substantial industry.

Mr. COOTE: In negotiating the trade agreements was the matter kept in mind of trying to protect the trade we now enjoy with countries with which we have trade treaties? It seems to me that that is very important, and I should like to know whether care was taken not to interfere unduly with our trade with these other countries.

Mr. RHODES: There is an old maxim that you cannot make an omelet without breaking eggs, and you cannot enter into trade agreements designed to divert trade into empire channels without, to a certain extent, taking it away from other channels. In negotiating this agreement there was no desire to injure the trade of any country with which we have friendly trade relations, but if the incidents of the treaty is to take away a certain amount of business from other countries, it is simply the result of the agreement and it cannot be helped.

Mr. COOTE: Was any care taken to divert trade from countries which have a favourable trade balance against Canada rather than from countries compared with which we have a favourable trade balance?

Mr. RHODES: To a very large degree that might be true, but it must be borne in mind on the one hand that we felt we were receiving marked concessions from the mother country, and on the other hand we were met with requests from them in return. All I can say is that the agreement as finally reached is the result of the pooled judgment of the two delegations.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—83. Potatoes, as hereunder defined: (a) in their natural state, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 75 cts.

Mr. RHODES: There is no change in either the wording or the rates of this item. It is inserted in the agreement merely for the purpose of guaranteeing the continuance of free entry.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—143a. Cigarettes, the weight of the paper covering to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, $3.50 and 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, $4.10 and 25 per cent; general tariff, $4.10 and 25 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: The old rate was $4.10 plus 25 per cent in all three columns. The new rate is $3.50 British preferential, $4.10 intermediate and $4.10 general, plus 25 per cent in each case. What will be the applied rate on these goods coming from Great Britain and from the outside world?

Mr. RHODES: The details would be a matter for the National Revenue department, and I would not attempt to go into all the ramifications. But if my hon. friend will look at the parallel columns he will see the change in the rates.

Mr. YOUNG: That is the change in the nominal rates; I want to know the change in what will be collected. Formerly it was $4.10 plus 25 per cent from Great Britain, and now it is $3.50 plus 25 per cent, plus the dumping duty of about 18 per cent, plus 3 per cent excise. I would like to have it all added up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Figure it out for yourself.

Mr. YOUNG: I am directing my question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think the figures are plain, and judging from past performances my hon. friend is very skilful in handling figures. It has been said that figures do not lie, but I was going to suggest, without any offence, that the hon. member for Weyburn has made figures come closer to it than anybody else that I know of.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I think we must give first place to the department over which my hon. friend presides.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Frankly I think the hon. gentleman should do his own arithmetic. If we do not challenge his results I do not want the hon. gentleman to imagine that we accept it; for I for one do not.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Weyburn need not be unduly alarmed about this item. So far from there being a reduction in revenue, if there is any change at all I anticipate that there will be an increase, and I will state why: There was imported last year $97,000 worth of cigarettes affected by this item, and it was felt that we would perhaps be able to increase the imports of this special type of cigarettes. If we do, our revenue will be increased rather than diminished.

Mr. YOUNG: If the reduction is genuine that might be true, but if this ostensible reduction should turn out to be really an increase in the duty, I do not think the importations will increase very much. That is why I asked my hon. friend to figure out what will be collected.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a reduction.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister says that figures do not lie, but some people come pretty close to making them do so. Remember what happened this afternoon in regard to the trade figures.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is ingenious and resourceful, and I have the greatest admiration for the nimbleness of his mind. This afternoon and early this evening he was arguing that an increase in tariff involved an increase in the cost of the goods. Now, if you please, he takes the other tack and suggests that if we reduce the duties we are still increasing the cost of the goods. I should like to know where my hon. friend would like to stay, which side of the argument he would like to take. As a matter of fact he knows perfectly well that under this item we are reducing the duty.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not so sure about that; I am not so sure that the minister is reducing the duty. It may be that he is reducing the duty from $4.10 plus 25 per cent to $3.50 plus 25 per cent, but we must remember that the exchange dumping duty has to be added, and a three per cent excise tax. I want to know what the whole thing will amount to. As has been stated before, figures may be made to convey a false impression. I do not suggest for a moment that the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or whoever was responsible for issuing these trade figures did so with the idea of deceiving the public, but—

O, what a tangled web we weave,
When first we practise to deceive!

When the practice of putting on false valuations was adopted it was unavoidable that returns should be false.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is not fair. The hon. member may have been speaking in fun, but I resent any allegation of false figures. As long as the hon. member for Weyburn has been living and walking around the pound has stood at $4.86⅔. Today in England the value of the pound is at the same figure, and there has been no change. We have taken the pound at the figure England has placed upon it, namely $4.86⅔, and that is the figure today. Of course, probably because of the depression, the pound in New York stands at something like $3.32. Today the valuation fixed by the Department of National Revenue is $3.71. The fallacy of the hon. member's argument rests in the fact that he believes the pound will always be at $3.32, or $3.71, as the case may be. He believes that there will always be a dumping duty, and he hopes it will be continued, because every calculation he has made has been on the assumption of a dumping duty with the pound at $3.71 or $3.32. I ask the hon. member, for whom I have the greatest respect, not to say that the figures are false. The explanation is clear on the face of it; there is no doubt as to how the computation has been made.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister says the pound is worth $4.86⅔ in Great Britain. Well, I will give him a chance to make a fortune. I will sell him British pounds at $4 each; certainly if they are worth $4.86⅔ he can make some money. Will he take my offer? Certainly he will not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Really, that is silly—absolutely silly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do not be alarmed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not a bit alarmed; it is just obstructing, that is all it is.

Mr. YOUNG: I am trying to figure out what this duty would be. As near as I can calculate it the price would be $5.26 per pound. Maybe I am wrong; if I am, perhaps my hon. friend will check my figures or figure it out for himself. The duty levied under the general rate will be $5.57, leaving a preference of only 31 cents per pound. Is it the intention of the government to extend only that preference?

Mr. RHODES: I can say nothing further to my hon. friend. I cannot attempt to follow him in his argument. I have assured him that if he will look at the figures he will see that there has been a reduction in the duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—144. Cut tobacco, per pound: British preferential tariff, 80 cents; intermediate tariff, 95 cents; general tariff, 95 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—145. Manufactured tobacco, n.o.p. and snuff per pound: British preferential tariff, 75 cents; intermediate tariff, 90 cents; general tariff, 90 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—146. Ale, beer, porter and stout, when imported in casks or otherwise than in bottle, per gallon: British preferential tariff, 25 cents; intermediate tariff, 35 cents; general tariff, 35 cents.

Mr. COOTE: What reduction of revenue is expected under this item?

Mr. RHODES: It is doubtful whether there will be any reduction; in fact if the importations increase as a result of the reduction in duty there will be an increase in revenue. The imports in bottles last year amounted in all to $388,000. Of that amount, $318,000 came from the United Kingdom and $55,000 from Japan.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—147. Ale, beer, porter and stout, when imported in bottles, per gallon: British preferential tariff, 30 cents; intermediate tariff, 50 cents, general tariff, 50 cents. Provided that six quart bottles or twelve pint bottles shall be held to contain one gallon.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—152. Lime juice, fruit syrups and fruit juices, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: What are the importations under this item, and from what countries do they come?

Mr. RHODES: The importations last year were valued at $204,000. Of that quantity $171,000 worth came from the United States and $22,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—156. Ethyl alcohol, or the substance commonly known as alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl or spirits of wine, n.o.p.; gin of all kinds, n.o.p.; whiskey and all spirituous or alcoholic liquors, n.o.p.; amyl alcohol or fusel-oil, or any substance known as potato spirit or potato oil; methyl alcohol, wood alcohol, wood naphtha, pyrosylic spirit or any substance known as wood spirit or methylated spirits; absinthe, arrack, or palm spirit, brandy, including artificial brandy and imitations of brandy, n.o.p.; cordials and liqueurs of all kinds, n.o.p.; mescal, pulque, rum shrub, schiedam and other schnapps; tafia, angostura and similar alcoholic bitters or beverages; and wines, n.o.p., containing more than forty per cent of proof spirit, per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $8; intermediate tariff, $10; general tariff, $10.

Provided, as to all goods specified in item No. 156 when of less strength than the strength of proof, that no reduction or allowance shall be made in the measurement thereof for duty purposes, below the strength of 15 per cent under proof.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—157a. Amyl alcohol or refined fusel-oil, when imported by the Department of National Revenue, or by a person licensed by the minister, to be denatured for use in the manufacture of metal varnishes or lacquers, to be entered at ports prescribed by regulations of the minister, subject to the Excise Act and to the regulations of the Department of National Revenue, per gallon: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 cents; general tariff, 25 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—159. Spirits and strong waters of any kind, mixed with any ingredient or ingredients, as being or known or designated as essences, extracts, or ethereal and spirituous fruit essences, n.o.p., per gallon: British preferential tariff, $8; and 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, $10 and 30 per cent; general tariff, $10 and 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—160. Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, lotions, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind:—

(a) when in bottles or flasks containing not more than four ounces each: British preferential tariff, 60 per cent; intermediate tariff, 90 per cent; general tariff, 90 per cent.

(b) when in bottles, flasks or other packages, containing more than four ounces each, per gallon: British preferential tariff, $5; intermediate tariff, $5 and 40 per cent; general tariff, $5 and 40 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister tell us what were the importations under this item, and from what countries they came?

Mr. RHODES: In bottles of four ounces or less, importations were valued at $75,000. Of that amount $56,000 worth came from France; $10,000 from the United States and $5,000 from the United Kingdom. In bottles over four ounces the importations were valued at $56,000. Of that amount $38,000 worth came from France; $12,000 worth from the United States and $4,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—166. Acetone and amyl acetate: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: Where does this come from?

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year amounted to $108,000, and came entirely from the United States.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it expected that trade can be shifted to Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: This is one of the items upon which the British delegates laid particular stress. They felt they could supply this to advantage.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—168. Malt flour containing less than 50 per centum in weight of malt; malt syrup or malt syrup powder; extracts of malt, fluid or not; grain molasses—all articles in this item upon valuation without British or foreign excise duties, under regulations prescribed by the minister, per pound: British preferential tariff, 3 cents and 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 5 cents and 30 per cent; general tariff, 10 cents and 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—171. Comic periodicals for juveniles: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—171. Books, printed, periodicals and pamphlets, or parts thereof, n.o.p., not to include blank account books, copy books, or books to be written or drawn upon: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister please give us particulars of importations under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: The imports last year were valued at $2,536,000, of which $1,476,000 came from the United States, $886,000 from the United Kingdom and $132,000 from France.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—178. Printed advertising matter issued by railway systems: British preferential tariff, free:

Mr. SPENCER: There is nothing in the other two columns.

Mr. YOUNG: There is probably none coming from outside the empire.

Mr. RHODES: This item is applicable only under the British preference.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—188. Plain basic photographic paper, baryta coated, adapted for use exclusively in manufacturing albumenized or sensitized photographic paper: British preferential tariff, free: intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—192. Roofing and shingles of saturated felt: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is there any record of the imports under this item?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that it is impossible to segregate the items, but the total importations last year under the whole item were $60,000 in value.

Mr. SANDERSON: Are these saturated felt shingles manufactured in this country, and if so, where?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, they are manufactured in this country in very large quantities. I am advised that there are about ten different industries manufacturing them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A different type from this, isn't it?

Mr. RHODES: A similar type, I understand. But I am advised that Great Britain has been specializing more in felt, whereas Canadian manufacturers have been specializing in asbestos.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is there any record of importations from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that the only course open to the officers of the department was to take the whole item, importations of which amounted to $60,000 in toto; but there would be no way of segregating the amount which would be imported under the item we are now discussing.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The whole thing is small, but could any estimate be made as to the proportion of goods of that character which will come from Great Britain?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. RHODES: The item is small, but if the hon. member will look at the parent item he will see it covers a very wide range of commodities—tarred paper and prepared roofings, including shingles; fibreboard, strawboard, sheathing and insulation, manufactured wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, n.o.p.; blotting paper, not printed nor illustrated. There is no method whereby we can compute how much the importations, if any, were under the item felt shingles.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—199. Waxed stencil paper for use on duplicating machines: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—203. Chemical compounds composed of two or more acids or salts soluble in water, adapted for dyeing or tanning: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was this free all across in the last schedule?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—203. Aniline and coal tar dyes, soluble in water, in bulk or packages of not less than one pound weight: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: This was free all across the line before?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister give the importations and the sources?

Mr. RHODES: Importations last year were, in value, $2,000,000, of which $972,000 came from the United States, $570,000 from Germany, $320,000 from Switzerland, and $165,000 from the United Kingdom.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend think that ten per cent will switch the trade to Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Well, that is problematical.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are satisfied?

Mr. RHODES: At all events the British asked for it, and were satisfied with this spread.

Mr. YOUNG: Our heaviest importations came from the United States; only $165,000 came from Great Britain. The rate from the United States in the future is to be 10 per cent; the rate from Great Britain, forgetting about the excise, will be 18 per cent on the present value of the pound. If Great Britain could not compete with the United States when they were free on both sides, how is it expected she can compete now? The preferential rate will be actually higher than the general.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give any better answer to my hon. friend than I gave to the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart). It was a matter of agreement, and our British friends were satisfied. We will see how it works out.

Mr. YOUNG: They are easily satisfied.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—206. Bacteriological products or serum for subcutaneous injection: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask why this has been put on? Were very strong representations made to the government that this duty be put on these sera?

Mr. RHODES: This item was one of those which was specially requested by the United Kingdom delegates. The imports last year of commodities embraced in this item amounted in all to $115,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask how these imports were distributed? To what extent did they come from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Almost entirely from the United States.

Mr. HOWDEN: Have we any guarantee that we shall have a ready and adequate supply of these important materials from the British manufacturers? Because it is very important that we should have an ample supply of these sera, available at all times.

Mr. RHODES: I can quite understand the interest of my hon. friend and his peculiar knowledge of the subject matter embraced in this item. I can only say in answer that inasmuch as this item was specially requested by the British delegates we must assume that they were particularly interested in it, and feel they are in a position to supply the requirements, both as to quality and quantity and delivery of our Canadian necessities.

Mr. HOWDEN: At a satisfactory price?

Mr. RHODES: I should think so, unquestionably.

Item agreed to.

Custom tariff—207. Blood albumen: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Sal. ammoniac and nitrate of ammonia: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Oxide of cobalt: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Bichloride of tin and tin crystals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Sulphate of copper (blue vitriol): British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where does this commodity come from? How much do we import from the United Kingdom and how much from other countries? This is a very important spraying material.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $140,000, of which $48,000 came from the United States; $37,000 from the United Kingdom; $30,000 from Belgium and $24,000 from Germany.

Mr. BROWN: This item is of great importance to the agriculturist. It is just an extra burden laid upon him at a time when the prices of all farm products are depressed. Sulphate of copper is used very extensively in the west in treating grain for smut, and Bordeaux mixture is used by fruit growers. This is an extra burden imposed on the farmer.

Mr. RHODES: I must respectfully demur to the view expressed by my hon. friend. In the first place, the imports totalled $140,000, and the hon. gentleman must realize that this commodity is used in industry as well as by the agriculturist.

Mr. BROWN: It will be a burden on industry, then.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot understand how it can be a burden on industry because we have not gone so far as to put on a tariff for revenue. This comes free from Great Britain. If my hon. friend agrees that there should be tariffs for revenue, he cannot object to the free entry of this article.

Mr. BROWN: But it was free under all tariffs before.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, but does not my hon. friend think that the farmers of Canada would like to get a free commodity from Great Britain rather than from Germany, Belgium or France, if by so doing we can carry out an agreement?

Mr. BROWN: This is one of the items that violate the principle laid down by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin at the opening of the conference, that we should secure preferences by reducing tariffs rather than by raising them.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend can inform me how we can establish a preference with respect to an item which before was free to Great Britain, except by imposing a duty against other countries, unless we give a bonus on importations, then I shall be glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. BROWN: This is one of the items on which I would not have tried to give a preference.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the domestic production of this article, if any?

Mr. RHODES: There is none produced in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister be good enough to allow us to go back for a moment to "ex 208—sal ammoniac and nitrate of ammonia." In the original this appears to be sulphate and not nitrate of ammonia. If I have not forgotten my knowledge of fertilzers, this is an important fertilizer ingredient, and the situation is much worse here than it is in connection with the item to which my hon. friends behind me are objecting, because the duty is not ten per cent but twenty-five per cent. Why is it described as nitrate of ammonia instead of sulphate?

Mr. RHODES: This does not touch sulphate of ammonia. The imports of sal ammoniac and nitrate of ammonia last year were valued at $114,000.

Mr. NEILL: Where was nitrate of ammonia before?

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will refer to the votes and proceedings he will see there an item of sulphate of ammonia in connection with ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the item we are now discussing, the entire importation last year was from the United States, was it not?

Mr. RHODES: Is the hon. member speaking of sal ammoniac?

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, sulphate of iron.

Mr. RHODES: We have not come to that item yet.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Sulphate of iron (copperas): British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year amounted to $11,000, of which $10,000 came from the United States and $1,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Cream of tartar in crystals and tartaric acid crystals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: What were the importations last year?

Mr. RHODES: The imports amounted last year to $308,000, of which $131,000 came from the United Kingdom; $61,000 from France; $61,000 from Germany, and $36,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Phosphorus and compounds thereof, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister give the same information in regard to this item.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $38,000 and came entirely from the United States.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is rock phosphate included in this item?

Mr. RHODES: There are a number of other phosphate items, some of which will follow subsequently. The total importations amounted to $38,000 last year.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it expected that Great Britain will be able to supply our wants?

Mr. RHODES: That is the expectation.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Can the minister tell me definitely under what item phosphate rock used as fertilizer comes in?

Mr. RHODES: The item to which my hon. friend refers is not touched; it remains the same.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Oxalic acid: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: If the minister would give us the importations under each item it would expedite matters.

Mr. RHODES: The total importations last year under this item were $16,000, of which $12,000 came from Germany and $4,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Oxide of tin or of copper: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The importations last year, under the parent item from which this was selected, amounted to $57,000, of which $46,000 came from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208. Sulphate of zinc and chloride of zinc: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year amounted to $65,000, of which $40,000 came from the United States and $21,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208b. Bisulphate of soda or nitre cake: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item amounted to $130,000. They came entirely from the United States.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In connection with this item I should like to make a very brief comment, which I think will apply as well to other items. This is the class of item where the total importations are not very high and there are no importations whatever from Great Britain. I understand the hope is that Great Britain will replace other countries in supplying these commodities but it does seem to me that this must inevitably be at a higher cost. Where Great Britain exports an appreciable quantity of any commodity, even though it is a small percentage of the total, it demonstrates that she is able to compete and sell at the market price, but where she does not export, the assumption cannot be otherwise than that she was not in a position or was not willing to sell in competition with other countries and at the price then prevailing. If she is prepared to take over the market in a commodity such as this, it must be at an additional price. It seems to me that that deduction is not only logical but inescapable —if she could not sell at the price then obtaining, she will not be able to sell at the same price even though the market is her own. Her only hope of replacing other countries will be by a rise in price to such a point as will make sales possible. I may be wrong, and I hope I am, but it seems to me that that is the only logical deduction which can be drawn.

The question then arises whether or not the additional price to be paid by the people of Canada will warrant the diversion of trade. That is a moot point and my remarks in connection with this item will apply to others. This is not a large item and it may be possible that a slight increase in price may be made without great harm being done. If it were possible for Great Britain to export even fifteen or twenty per cent of the total importations of a commodity, it would show that her manufacturers were capable of selling at the prices then prevailing, but when she does not export at all, it seems to me that she will sell only at an increased price.

Mr. RHODES: I always listen with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) because I know he approaches these subjects from a thoughtful and studious point of view. It may be that his reasoning is sound; if it is, all I can say is that those who have been complaining that when we enter the British market under a preference of ten per cent we shall not obtain any increase in price, must admit that the same argument works both ways. My own impression is that it does not follow that there will be an increase in price. There is only a limited importation of the commodity in question, and I think we should be safe in taking the position that this being such a relatively small matter, it was not worth while for Great Britain to attempt to fight for the market. However, now that she has a sheltered market to the extent of this small preference, it will be to her advantage to attempt to supply this market, and in doing so I think the price will take care of itself. That, of course, remains to be seen. I hope my hon. friend is right.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I hope I am wrong. I might point out to the minister that the parallel he draws does not apply. In the case of the preference given by Great Britain there is a clause in the treaty which states that we shall not take advantage of the duty in order to raise prices; we must sell at world prices.

Mr. RHODES: There is that additional feature.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If a similar clause were applied to each of these items, the situation would be quite clear.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know whether or not the importations under these items are for the use of manufacturers or consumers?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that they are largely for use in manufacturing.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208d. Calcium chloride, not in solution, for road-treating purposes only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item amounted to $463,000, almost entirely from the United States. I am advised that this is a commodity which can be supplied with advantage by the mother country. It is a bulk commodity and could be shipped cheaply by water transport.

Mr. COOTE: Were there any importations from the United Kingdom?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208e. Xanthates, cresylic acid and compounds of cresylic acid, used in the process of concentrating ores, metals or minerals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item amounted to $221,000, of which $218,000 came from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208h. Ethylene glycol, when imported by manufacturers of anti-freezing compounds to be used exclusively in the manufacture of anti-freezing compounds, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister give us the figures with regard to the importations under this item?

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year amounted to $188,000, of which $101,000 came from the United States, $63,000 from the United Kingdom, and $22,000 from Germany.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is any of this compound manufactured in Canada? This is an article in very common use in this country and it seems to me as though the imports would hardly supply the demand.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. RHODES: There is none manufactured in Canada.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister anticipate that with these new rates we shall be able to buy anti-freezing compound as cheaply as heretofore?

Mr. RHODES: I do.

Mr. COOTE: I hope that proves to be correct.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—209. Bichromate of potash, crude; red and yellow prussiate of potash: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item amounted to $17,000, of which $12,000 came from the United States and $1,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—210. Peroxide of soda; silicate of soda in crystals or in solution, bichromate of soda; nitrate of soda or cubic nitre, n.o.p.; sulphite of sodium; nitrite of soda; arseniate, binarseniate, chlorate, bisulphite and stannate of soda; prussiate of soda and sulphite of soda: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the minister what was the reason for placing nitrate of soda in this particular item? It is a very important fertilizer, and my information is that no nitrate of soda is mined in the British Empire. I wonder if I am correct in that. Why was it made dutiable at 15 per cent intermediate and 20 per cent general? The consumption in Nova Scotia is, I am told, about 5,000 tons a year, and at least ever since I can remember it has always been free under all classifications. Practically the only source of mined nitrate of soda is Chile, whence it comes via the United States, and has always come in free. There may be some reason from the standpoint of the extension of British trade for making it dutiable at 15 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 20 per cent under the general, but on its face it appears to mean simply that the farmers of Nova Scotia who are importing nitrate of soda will pay 20 per cent duty on their importations whereas formerly they did not. The price of nitrate of soda runs from $40 to $50 a ton and I anticipate this duty will increase the cost by $10 a ton.

Of course it is fair to say that there are substitutes. There are synthetic nitrates; there are other chemicals which have a nitrogenous content, but the most soluble and the most satisfactory type is Chilean nitrate. At least that is the opinion of farmers in my district. I note by item 210e that nitrate of soda for certain manufacturing purposes has been taken out of the general classification and still is free under all tariffs. It would appear prima facie there is an unjustifiable discrimination against the farmer and in favour of the manufacturer in relation to that matter of nitrate of soda. I have made some inquiries about the nitrate situation. I would not be taking up the time of the committee in talking about this matter if it were not one of some importance in the province from which I come. I am told that the ordinary substitutes which serve somewhat the same purpose are sulphate of ammonia and cyanimid. Cyanimid is manufactured at a plant near Niagara Falls and sulphate of ammonia is manufactured by the Consolidated Smelters at Trail, British Columbia. If I am incorrect in my statements I shall be glad if the minister will correct me. This, however, is the best information I can get, and it would appear that this imposition of a duty of 15 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 20 per cent under the general is simply a protective tariff for the purpose of forcing fruit growers and farmers to purchase these substitutes which are manufactured in Canada instead of the fertilizer to which they are accustomed. There are other nitrogenous fertilizers such as nitro chalk which is manufactured in Britain, and nitrate of lime, but they are not well known and not extensively used. I should be glad if the Minister of Finance would state the reasons for the change that was made in this particular case. If it really will have the effect of diverting trade into British channels without imposing an additional burden upon Canadian producers, I should like to know that, but from the best information I can get it is a burdensome impost. There is no reason for laying this burden on the farmers and removing it from the manufacturers.

Mr. RHODES: I did not wish to rise and interrupt the hon. member for fear he would say that I was reading him a lecture.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not have minded.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend seemed to take objection in that respect a short time ago. As a matter of fact he is entirely in error. If he will look at item 663b in the tariff he will find that materials for fertilizers come in absolutely free; they are not touched at all.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That is the compound.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister is entirely mistaken.

Mr. RHODES: The minister is relying on the advice of his officials and he would prefer to take their advice at this time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are these materials not free only when they are used for compounding and manufacturing into fertilizers? Nitrate is used in its natural state.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will read the item to which I made reference, he will find that it says:

> Articles which enter into the cost of the manufacture of fertilizers, when imported for use exclusively in the manufacture of fertilizers: free, free, free.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is exactly what I said. Nitrate of soda, as I have been discussing it, is not used for that purpose; it is used for putting on the ground in its natural state. If it is brought in to be compounded or manufactured, everyone knows that item 663b makes it free; but unless it is to be used for manufacturing purposes or unless it is to be used for the manufacture of explosives in regard to which a special exception was made, it is dutiable at 20 per cent. The question I am asking the minister is this: Is there some reason of high policy that makes that advisable?

Mr. RHODES: If the article to which my hon. friend refers is used in the manufacture of mixed fertilizers, it still comes in free.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not the point. I am talking about its use other than for being made into mixed fertilizers; the way it is used in fertilizing orchards. Of course in the fertilization of potatoes, mixed fertilizers are put on, but I am told that about 5,000 tons of nitrate of soda a year are ordinarily used straight, without being mixed. Now it is made dutiable at 15 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 20 per cent under the general, and I think it is a reasonable question to ask what kind of policy is behind this action.

Mr. RHODES: It remains to be seen whether the commodity will cost any more than it did before. It still comes in free from Great Britain. As my hon. friend says, if they use it without mixing it and they import it under a duty, they will pay a duty. If they import it from Great Britain, they will not pay a duty. But if they mix it with any other commodity, they pay no duty, wherever it comes from. As a matter of fact they could mix it with sand if they wished so to do, so that the matter is not very serious.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is any nitrate of soda mined in the British Empire?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then that will dispose of that argument.

Mr. RHODES: They can manufacture it.

Mr. COOTE: Perhaps we can find out the importations of this article and whence they have come.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under the whole item, that is the parent item, amounted to $1,413,000, of which $1,086,000 came from the United States, $106,000 from Chile, $100,000 from Germany and $66,000 from the United Kingdom. That includes all the sodium.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister now give us the importations of nitrate of soda by itself? Was the bulk of the importations from Chile?

Mr. RHODES: Our imports for 1932 from Chile were 48,515 hundredweight, valued at $106,000.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I endorse every word that was said by my hon. friend from Hants-Kings. We have been told so often that this government was going to make the tariff work for the farmer. I really do not see how it is working for the farmer. It does not work for the farmer with respect to butter or bacon, and it works against the farmer on sulphate of copper and on nitrate of soda. Nitrate of soda is a very important fertilizer which our farmers have been trained to use, and the funny thing about this duty, Mr. Chairman, is that there is practically no nitrate of soda produced in the United Kingdom. From the United Kingdom last year we received only $919 worth; from the United States $477,154; from Chile $106,156; from Belgium and Germany very little. What is the minister's explanation for taxing the farmer on this very essential fertilizer when practically none comes from England?

Mr. RHODES: The answer I would give to my hon. friend is this, that it is not anticipated that the farmer will pay any more for this commodity.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How do you know?

Mr. RHODES: It remains to be seen. I may be quite wrong. If the price were increased as a result of the preference my hon. friend's argument would be well founded, provided the farmers wish to use this commodity in its natural state; but if they use it in a mixed form, they pay no duty.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It means that they must pay the duty or manufacture it themselves.

Mr. RHODES: No, they can mix it themselves. They can mix it with sand if they wish to do so. My hon. friend's argument would hold good if the price were increased as a result of this arrangement.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It cannot be otherwise.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How do you know that the price will not be increased?

Mr. RHODES: That remains to be seen. We have made this agreement, and we disagree as to its results on this particular item. I believe I am right; my hon. friend thinks he is right; a year hence we shall know which is right.

Mr. YOUNG: If at the end of a year you find that the price is increased, what can you do about it?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows the answer himself. It will be just too bad.

Mr. YOUNG: You cannot do anything about it. Who asked for this legislation?

Mr. RHODES: The same answer holds as I have given with respect to other items. This item was a result of the negotiations. It was one of the items which was—

Mr. HOWARD: Slipped over.

Mr. RHODES: No. It was an item agreed to by the representatives of the mother country and of Canada. It was not placed in the agreement at the instance of any Canadian industry. It was not placed here for the purpose of affording protection to a Canadian industry.

Mr. YOUNG: It must have arisen spontaneously. No Canadian industry asked for it, no British industry was interested in asking for it, but yet it is here.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot accept my hon. friend's ipse dixit. He says that no British interest asked for it. They may have approached the British delegation. We were not dealing with British industries, but with the British delegates. There were many commodities on which they sought a preference, and a preference, I might inform my hon. friend from Lisgar, by way of increased duties in some cases.

Mr. BROWN: I have no doubt of it.

Mr. RHODES: There is nothing sinister in this item.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister say that the British delegates really asked for this item when they do not produce the commodity?

Mr. RHODES: I have every right to say that. We certainly did not force it upon them. I cannot take the attitude that we had a specific request from the British government with respect to every individual item, but many of these items were arrived at as the result of very long conservations, and other items were discussed which do not appear in the agreement at all, as my hon. friend can well realize. But the mere fact that this particular item is in the agreement and has been agreed to by the British government is sufficient evidence, I think, that it met with their approval.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It does seem to me that perhaps with perfectly good motives the Canadian delegates in connection with this item must have been ill advised by their officials. The officials surely could not have been fully acquainted with all the facts. Here is an article which is used in very large quantities. It is used in one particular condition, in its natural state, and for one specific purpose, a purpose which no other single commodity and no mixture will answer. It is a material which the minister states is not produced in the British Empire. Obviously then it cannot be supplied directly from the British Empire. One of two things must happen: Either the farmers will continue to import this article in its original state from countries where they are getting it at the present time, in which case, as the minister says, the price will be increased by the amount of the duty, or else they will have to turn to some other material for their fertilizer, or use a compound which experience has taught them is not as suitable. I am not censorious, Mr. Chairman. I voted for the agreement because I think the good in it more than counterbalances the bad, but I do believe that this item has been inserted in the agreement through a misapprehension of the facts brought about by a lack of knowledge on the part of the Canadian delegates. I suggest that an inquiry be made as to the possibility of supplies of this material being obtained from countries within the British Empire. If that is found to be impossible, then utilize the machinery which is being provided, discuss the matter with the British government, and avoid imposing additional costs upon farmers at a time like this.

Mr. RHODES: I am in entire accord with my hon. friend from Red Deer; if this tariff change resulted in an increase in cost to the farmers it would be most unfortunate. But by no means does it follow that it will. I have found our British friends extremely reasonable in matters of this kind, and if it should happen that as a result of the agreement the farmers have to pay an additional cost, we could make representations to the British government. I have no hesitation in saying to the committee that if that is the result we will make representations, because I am quite sure they would be the last to wish us to continue an arrangement which might not be of advantage to them, and which would be a disadvantage to certain of our people.

I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but I should like to point out again to the committee that if this commodity is brought in in its raw state it is dutiable, unless imported from the mother country. I am advised by customs officers that it can be brought from anywhere if it is mixed. As I have said, if they only mix it with sand, the fact remains that it is mixed. I do not believe this item will prove any obstacle to the farmers, but should it prove to be a disadvantage I repeat we shall be only too pleased to make representations to the mother country.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I appreciate what the minister has said, and what he is prepared to do. My suggestion is that the correctness of these two premises be ascertained: First, whether some disadvantage will accrue to the farmer if he uses it other than in its original state, and, second, whether it can be purchased from the mother country or other parts of the British Empire. If it cannot be used except in its original state, save at a disadvantage, and if it cannot be brought in from the British Empire, I think it will be unnecessary to wait until proof has been shown before dealing with the matter.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Chairman, there would seem to be something rather mysterious about this item. Apparently it has slipped in without anybody knowing anything about it. I suggest to the minister that the item may have been considered in the dying days of the conference when matters were rather hectic and in a state of chaos. Possibly the British delegates put a fast one over. Probably the Canadian Manufacturers' Association worked too fast for the Canadian delegates, and the Minister of Finance did not notice that.

Mr. RHODES: I shall not admit that that happened. If it did, it happened without any knowledge. I am quite sure the hon. member for Red Deer will have no objection to the item if the commodity comes in without an increased price.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should be happy to have it that way.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I say that if as a result of the agreement the farmers are placed at a disadvantage, certainly we shall be glad to make representations to Great Britain.

Mr. MYERS: I am very glad to hear the minister's assurance in connection with this item. I probably know as much about fertilizers as any other hon. member of the committee, because for many years I have had occasion to use it. Under ordinary conditions the mixture we use for almost all crops is composed of four ingredients, namely, nitrate of soda, acid phosphate, muriate of potash and sulphate of ammonia. As the minister has said, if these are imported from any country in the world and mixed, as they are mixed in many plants in the maritime provinces and, I presume in other parts of Canada, they come in absolutely free of duty from any country. Nitrate of soda is the one ingredient used at times by itself. In the cultivation of potatoes we seldom mix nitrate of soda in our fertilizer. The reason is that nitrate of soda, once placed on the ground, is exhausted; ten days after it is used it has done its work. No farmers put nitrate of soda in the fertilizers which they put on the ground before the potatoes are planted. They wait until the potato plants are above the ground, and then if the plant is weak or delicate, they may use the nitrate of soda. If the tops are rugged and vigorous, they do not need it. But occasionally we do have to use nitrate of soda, and I submit that with the price of potatoes as it is the farmers would be bearing a heavy burden if the cost of fertilizer was increased. I feel certain the minister will consider this matter and that the farmers will be protected.

Mr. ILSLEY: What the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said concerning potatoes could be magnified ten thousand fold concerning apples. Nitrate of soda, being a very soluble fertilizer, is most favoured by apple growers. The results obtained from the use of it are apparent in the same season. I cannot add much to what I have previously said, but I am told the ordinary consumption in Nova Scotia is about 5,000 tons a year. This is a very expensive fertilizer, costing $40 to $50 per ton, and to place a duty of 20 per cent upon it would mean an increase in price of about $10 a ton. I should like to read a paragraph from the speech made by the Prime Minister on November 8 as it appears in Hansard at page 955. I bring this to the attention of the Minister of Finance in the hope that with the good disposition he has shown he or the government may do something to take this item out.

The Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> In schedule E, item 210, in respect of "nitrate of soda or cubic nitre n.o.p." a new item 210e has been added, as follows:
> "210e. Nitrate of soda or cubic nitre imported by manufacturers of explosives for use exclusively in the manufacture of explosives in their own factories: free; free; free." Although item 210 as set forth in the agreement carries the rate of free, 15 per cent and 20 per cent. The two governments after consultation have satisfied themselves that the United Kingdom is not in a position at the moment to supply Canadian requirements of nitrate of soda.

Of course not; they cannot supply any.

> But when it is in a position to satisfy Canadian requirements for all purposes the rate of duty will be as set forth in item 210.

My submission is that every good reason for making that exception in favour of manufacturers of explosives is a good reason for making it apply to the growers of apples. We cannot vary this agreement, we cannot move amendments, and we cannot, I suppose, rationally vote on items—or can we? But certainly I would ask the Minister of Finance to take that matter up and see if he cannot get that nitrate of soda out.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There was only one possible reason for placing it on the free list as far as manufacturers of explosives are concerned, and that is that it would cost them more if it were not on the free list. Surely if it will cost the manufacturers of explosives more it will cost the farmers more if they have to use it in its original form, and surely it is much more important to see that the farmers are saved any additional cost than the manufacturers of explosives.

Mr. RHODES: I am quite content to have this item stand until I satisfy myself beyond question as to one or two of the questions which have been submitted to-night. I have given the answers which have been supplied to me by the officials of the department in every instance. I will verify those before the next sitting.

Mr. NEILL: I might mention one fact which does not seem to have been touched upon regarding the inclusion of nitrate of soda in manufactured fertilizers. I understand there are certain chemicals or constituents of fertilizers with which nitrate of soda cannot be mixed; they react unfavourably against each other in some way. That is one reason why it should not be limited to that item, where it is included among manufactured fertilizers.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I suggest that if possible all these fertilizers be put under one name? I suspect that the manufacturers, who were better represented at this conference than the farmers, obtained this concession in order to be able to sell to the farmers compound fertilizers, which would probably be more advantageous for the manufacturer than for the farmer. This item is very insidious, because so many different names are employed; you have "phosphorous and compounds thereof," "phosphoric acid," "acid phosphate," and so on. It is not clear at all. It takes an expert to decipher all these items as applying to the farmers. When we come to fertilizer compounds as taken out of the hands of the manufacturers it is clear, but when you come to the other items you have to look with a pair of double glasses to identify them. That is why I suspect that while the farmer was not represented at the imperial conference the manufacturers were given a good hearing.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot allow the remarks of my hon. friend to go unchallenged. These items were taken out and put in their several branches purely as a matter of departmental technique. They do not apply by any means only to the farmers; most of these items are used in the tanning, textile, and mining industries, and very little in the farming industry. So that the deduction my hon. friend makes is not warranted.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—210d. Sodium, sulphate of, crude, or salt cake: British preferential tariff, ½ cent per pound; intermediate tariff, ⅝ cent per pound; general tariff, ⅝ cent per pound.

Mr. RHODES: Imports last year under this item were $80,000 in value, $52,000 from the United Kingdom, $26,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—210e. Nitrate of soda, or cubic nitre imported by manufacturers of explosives for use exclusively in the manufacture of explosives in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—ex 211. Chloride of aluminum, or chloralum: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were $13,000, of which $12,000 were from the United States and $1,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—212. Sulphate of alumina or alum cake; and alum in bulk, ground or unground, but not calcined: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Imports last year amounted to $608,000, of which $522,000 were from the United States, $54,000 from the United Kingdom, and $30,000 from Germany.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before you declare this item carried, may I refer to articles 171, 171a and 178 over which no discussion took place? I think that Canadian citizens of French extraction should be afforded the privilege of receiving books, coming from France, duty free.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member cannot discuss the question without having a motion to this effect adopted.

I shall first put it to the vote.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will so move, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Casgrain that the committee revert to items 171 and ex 178 for reconsideration.

Mr. RHODES: I suggest that if my hon. friend desires to make some observations in regard to this item, he will have his opportunity in ways and means. We will have to consider this item again in ways and means.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With the understanding that we can discuss it in the committee of ways and means.

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to curtail discussion, but when the subject was opened this afternoon I particularly expressed the hope that when we discussed item by item the schedules in the bill we would not repeat the item under ways and means. I do not wish unduly to curtail discussion under ways and means, but I wish to have that understood.

Customs tariff—215. Stearic acid, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Imports last year amounted to $83,000 of which $46,000 came from the United Kingdom, $22,000 from the United States, $13,000 from the Netherlands.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—216. Acids, n.o.p., of a kind not produced in Canada. British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.
Phosphoric acid: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: It is impossible to segregate from the parent item the exact importations. The total importations under the parent item last year amounted to $236,000, of which $128,000 came from the United States, $67,000 from Germany, and $26,000 from Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—216. Nitric acid, not including glass containers, when in packages weighing not more than one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, it is not possible to give statistics relative to the importations of chemically pure acid. The total importations last year, under the item from which this was extracted, were $22,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—217. Sulphuric and muriatic acids, not including glass containers, when in packages weighing not more than 100 pounds, per hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 22½ cents; general tariff, 25 cents.

Mr. RHODES: The same explanation holds with respect to this.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—218. Acid phosphate, not medicinal: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BOUCHARD: This item is a new burden on the farmer's shoulders. If you will look at the quarterly report of the trade of Canada for the year ended March, 1932, you will see that not a pound of this fertilizer, called superphosphate or acid phosphate of lime, comes in from the United Kingdom. The bulk of it comes from the United States.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

We imported $748,000 from the United States, a little from Belgium and over $200,000 from the Netherlands, and the duty collected last year under this item, if I am correctly informed, amounted to $7,574. This commodity is much needed by our farmers and unless the minister can give us some explanation I do not see why, in view of the fact that this fertilizer is not being produced in the United Kingdom, a duty should be imposed against the United States, Belgium and the Netherlands, especially when you remember that the promise was given the farmers that tariffs would always work in their favour. Far from that being so, I find that in this as in many other items the tariff is working against them.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has apparently overlooked the fact that the farmers for whom he speaks, when they imported this commodity, even from Great Britain, had to pay a duty of 12½ per cent whereas today they import it free.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Yes, but none comes from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: I know, but we are speaking of the past. Because none has come in the past, it does not follow that none will come in the future, and even if the farmers import it from the United States, if they use it in mixture, they pay no duty at all.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I gave the figures to prove that with the increased duty the amount collected from the farmers will be even greater in the future. The highest rates were: British preferential tariff, 12½; intermediate, 17½; general, 20. Now it will come free from Great Britain, but not a pound has come from that source.

Mr. RHODES: Yes. Last year we imported $5,000 worth from Great Britain, according to the trade figures. The total importations last year were $194,000, of which $189,000 came from the United States and $5,000 from Great Britain.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I wish the minister would tell me where he got his figures.

Mr. RHODES: These are the figures supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BOUCHARD: And the figures I have given are supplied by the department too.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They have a special set for the government.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at page 261 of the quarterly report of the trade of Canada he will find it there indicated that we imported from the United Kingdom last year, 77,662 pounds.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister be kind enough to tell me what quarterly report he has, because I have figures for the year ended March, 1932, and I am quoting from page 250.

Mr. RHODES: This is for the months of January, February and March, 1932. I have the figures for the twelve months ended March 31, 1932.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The figures I have given will be found at page 250.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What item?

Mr. BOUCHARD: This item, acid phosphate.

Mr. RHODES: I would refer the hon. member to page 261.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The figures appear at page 250.

Mr. RHODES: We are not on the fertilizer item but acid phosphate.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Yes, and I read, "acid phosphate, not medicinal." In the item at page 250, at the top of the page, the commodity is referred to as superphosphate or acid phosphate. Has the term acid phosphate one meaning in one blue book and another meaning in another? It is indicated as a fertilizer.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that the figures which my hon. friend cites at page 250 are the importations under 663b, and those would be additional to acid phosphate imported under item 218.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are the British likely to be able to supply us with acid phosphate? This is a very important fertilizer which is widely used in the district from which I come, and as the minister's figures indicate, nearly all of it comes from the United States. I should like to know, and probably the committee would like to know, whether it can be supplied from British sources. Is there any reasonable prospect of that being done?

Mr. RHODES: This is one of the items on which the British delegates laid particular stress. They asked particularly for this item and they propose to supply in quantities. They indicate that they are in a position to do so.

Mr. CAYLEY: How much of this is produced in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: There is only one producer in Canada and as I advised the committee there are no figures available. The Bureau of Statistics does not release figures with respect to industries unless there are three involved, so that we have no figures to give.

Mr. CAYLEY: There is no large amount, then.

Mr. RHODES: Quite a substantial amount.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the name of the producer?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know, and I am advised that we cannot get that information from the department.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there no information with regard to where the industry is located?

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister is incorrect in stating that he cannot get the name of the company. He cannot give the amount but he can give the name of the producer.

Mr. RHODES: I merely pass on the information given me by my officers, and of course my hon. friend realizes that that is the best answer I can give under the circumstances.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This will be one of the prospective industries?

Mr. RHODES: There is no mystery about this—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not to you but to us.

Mr. RHODES: If the name can be procured I shall be happy to get it. I will endeavour to get it. I can see no objection to giving it.

Mr. YOUNG: The statement appeared in the press not long ago that because of these items in this agreement a certain Canadian industry would start manufacturing fertilizers which would serve as a substitute for fertilizers now being used. We have the right to know whether this was done at the instance of that industry, whether it will be the only one to benefit and whether there were others interested in having this legislation passed.

Mr. RHODES: I can only give my hon. friend the same answer I gave a moment ago —this was not asked for by any Canadian industry. It was one of the items upon which the British delegates laid particular emphasis; they regarded it as being among the important items, so much so that they included it in that group and that is why it is in the agreement.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—219. Sulphuric ether and chloroform: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—219c. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals, such as are used for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, when in packages not exceeding three pounds each, in weight, the weight of such packages to be included in the weight for duty:: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $25,000, of which $16,000 came from the United States and $9,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—229. Soap, common or laundry, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 50 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $1.50.

Mr. YOUNG: What were the importations under this item, and the Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $560,000, of which $552,000 came from the United States and $7,000 from the United Kingdom. The production of soap in Canada was valued at $9,000,000.

Mr. YOUNG: The figures for laundry soap are not given?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry to say that the figures are not segregated.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister tell us the approximate value per pound? I have figured it as being about 15 cents per pound on the importations; is that correct?

Mr. COOTE: While that information is being looked up, could the minister tell us whether any distinction is made between castile, toilet and other varieties of soap?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member will observe that the next item deals with castile soap.

Mr. COOTE: Mention is made of common or laundry soap and castile soap, but I was wondering if soaps other than castile are covered by a separate item.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know whether or not my hon. friend has a copy of the tariff before him, but it contains three items dealing with soap. Item 228 covers soap powders, powdered soap, mineral soap and soap, n.o.p., which would include all soap except common or laundry soap and castile soap. Then the next two items cover common or laundry soap and castile soap. Those are the three divisions.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. COOTE: It is only in connection with common and castile soap that any changes are being made?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It has been stated once or twice that no representations were made by manufacturers in connection with certain items. Were any representations made by Canadian manufacturers in connection with these soap items?

Mr. STEVENS: None whatever.

Mr. YOUNG: Heretofore the duty on soap under the general rate was $1 per hundred pounds and under the preferential rate 65 cents per hundred pounds, a difference of 35 cents per hundred pounds in favour of the British manufacturer. Even with that preference the importations from Great Britain were negligible. We are increasing the general rate to $1.50 per hundred pounds, an increase of 50 cents, and decreasing the preferential rate from 65 to 50 cents. However, under the exchange dump something like $3 will be added to the British preferential, which makes that rate twice as much as the general rate which would apply to the United States. Great Britain was unable to compete when she had a preference of 35 cents, and she will have no possible chance of selling anything under this present arrangement. The only person who will benefit will be the Canadian producer of soap. We are told that he produces $9,000,000 worth of soap, and I should like to know how much additional we shall have to pay under this arrangement.

Mr. STEVENS: None whatever.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister argues that under this higher rate we will have to pay no more for our soap, but I contend that this arrangement shuts out the United States and will raise the price in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said so?

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. members opposite said so when they raised the tariff, and I will give the proof. If our Canadian maufacturers had not been taking advantage of the tariff to increase the prices, no American soap could have been sold because the Canadian manufacturer would have been able to undersell the American. However, he raised the price almost to or to the level permitted by the tariff, and because he did so, the American was able to sell in this market. The Canadian manufacturer has taken advantage of the tariff and he will do so in the future; he will raise his price by 60 cents per hundred pounds, and the cost to the Canadian consumer will be increased by that much. I should like to know who are the manufacturers of laundry soap in Canada, where the stock of the companies is held, the number of employees and the wages paid.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall not attempt to answer that question because the information is not and could not be expected to be available. We have lowered the tariff, as far as British imports are concerned, from 65 to 50 cents per hundred pounds. The importation of this class of soap is not extensive as compared with the present production in Canada, but it is anticipated that there will be increased importations of British soap. The same thing applies to the next item, which covers castile soap, in which case we have taken off one cent per pound and allowed it to come in free from Great Britain. In both instances it is a lowering of the tariff.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend is not going to give the information for which I asked, but I think I have a little of it. Canadian manufacturers of laundry soap are branches of English firms.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is Sunlight soap manufactured?

An hon. MEMBER: One or two may be.

Mr. YOUNG: They are branches of English firms. This increase in the duty under the general rate is not going to benefit the British manufacturer in his home factory. It is going to affect the profits he makes in his Canadian factory, and that will be done at the expense of the Canadian consumer. The minister says he is not in a position to give us the information asked for in regard to Canadian production, but when we know that our soap is going to cost so much more, we have a right to know how much more will be paid to Canadian workmen in the form of wages. I would ask that the item stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: Stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Customs tariff—230. Castile soap, the weight of the cartons and wrappings to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, two cents; general tariff, two cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—229. Soap, common or laundry, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 50 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $1.50.

Mr. YOUNG: Is item 229 carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Who carried it?

The CHAIRMAN: The committee did.

Mr. YOUNG: No, they did not.

The CHAIRMAN: I asked: Shall the item carry? and nobody objected, so it is carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, I think we had better understand this situation clearly, otherwise we shall not make as much progress as we have been making. In regard to the item of common or laundry soap, the hon. member for Weyburn distinctly said that he wished it to stand. While some hon. members said "carried," the question was never properly put to the committee, and if, sir, you insist on forcing this to a vote tonight, we are prepared to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN: There was no question before the committee. After the hon. member for Weyburn asked that the item stand, I asked: Shall the item carry? and nobody spoke, so I called out "carried."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that in regard to a previous item the Minister of Finance very courteously stood it over in order to get some further information. I suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might very well do the same in this case. We are quite interested in knowing who the producers of soap are in this dominion.

Mr. STEVENS: There is not the slightest objection on my part or on that of any other member of the government to giving all the information possible, but I submit to my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite: Is it quite reasonable to expect that a minister could come here with all the information he might be called upon to give?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. Let the item stand.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to delay the committee, but let me deal with the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn. He asks: Who are the soap manufacturers in Canada? I suppose we all know pretty well, generally speaking, who they are: Lever Brothers; Proctor and Gamble; the old Royal Crown out on the coast, which firm is now, I think, absorbed by Lever Brothers; Pugsley, Dingman and Company. Unless I am mistaken some of the packers manufacture soap as well. There is a large number of soap manufacturers, and I submit this to my hon. friend from Weyburn, who has pretty stubborn views on matters of tariff: Does he honestly think it is reasonable to expect us to come here with all such information, including the number of employees? We can get it, but it is practically impossible to carry on the business of the house and bring all such information here. I ask the committee to take my word for this: I assure them that the manufacturers of soap did not come here asking for any increase in the duty on that commodity. Will they accept that as a very definite statement from me? I submit further that in these two items there is a lowering of the tariff to Great Britain. They are items in respect to where we might reasonably expect some increase of business with Great Britain, and the consumers in this country will not suffer a particle because, let me point this out to my hon. friend, the soap business is well diversified. In Canada quite a number of manufacturers are competing one with another, and in addition to that a number of manufacturers of soap in Great Britain who probably have not been exporting to this market may get in under this item with the reduced tariff. There is nothing whatever in the item that is alarming or that will cause any disturbance. In view of the fact that we have certainly done our best on this and other items to give to the committee the fullest possible information, I submit to my hon. friends that they should not press for this unduly.

In regard to the passing of the item, we all know that these items are not submitted formally in the way of reading a resolution and so forth. By courtesy from one side to the other we pass these items in perhaps an informal way. There was, however, no intention on this side to force the item through. I submit that we are trying reasonably to meet, as courteously as we can, the wishes of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. YOUNG: I have no complaint to make about the courtesy of either of the ministers, but my hon. friend asks whether it is reasonable for us to request the ministry to come down to the house with all this information for which we are asking. I shall answer his question by asking another: Is it reasonable of the government to ask us to pass this legislation, which will affect the price of these commodities to the Canadian people, without our knowing or making some attempt to find out what the effect will be in additional cost to us, and what benefit we shall receive for this protection to Canadian manufacturers? —for it is nothing else. Does he not think it is reasonable for us to have this information, so that when we go back to the country to justify his action, we shall be able to tell the people what benefit we are to get from it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have been keeping perfectly still, waiting to hear the explanations for all these increases in the intermediate and general tariffs. There are 138 of them in the whole of this schedule, and it becomes more apparent than ever that this agreement will work detrimentally to the interests of the Canadian consumer. Another thing that is apparent is that wherever a manufacturer's item happens to be in question, it is given some preference, but on the other hand, if it is a consumer's item or one touching any of the basic industries, an increase is provided. I just want to say to my hon. friend and to some hon. gentlemen on the other side who are now objecting so strenuously to this item standing over, that when they come to examine these schedules they will find they are not just what they looked like at first glance. So far as I am concerned, I still oppose this agreement as vigorously as I can. I am waiting for the iron and textile items to voice more strenuous opposition, but may I say, in passing, that it becomes more apparent, when you hear the explanation of the ministry and look carefully into the schedules, what a neat piece of work this was as against the consuming public of Canada. They are the people who are going to pay the piper in both instances, and unfortunately we get from England nothing but what we have always had, and that is entry into their market free.

Mr. COOTE: Can the minister give the committee any reason why there is a reduction in the British preferential tariff on two kinds of soap, that is, common or laundry soap and castile soap, while the great range of toilet soaps, large quantities of which are used in this country, is not changed at all? Is there any reason why there should not be an increase in the British preference on toilet soap?

Mr. RHODES: The best explanation I can give to my hon. friend is that as to the first kind of soap, it was a matter of agreement; these items were satisfactory to our British associates. The other soaps to which my hon. friend refers are in the main a luxury soap and therefore ought to carry a substantial rate of duty.

Mr. CAYLEY: Can the minister give us some assurance that there will be an increased importation from Great Britain because of this additional preference?

Mr. RHODES: That is anticipated.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—232. Glue, liquid, powdered or sheet, and gelatine, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent and 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent and 5 cents per pound; general tariff, 25 per cent and 5 cents per pound.

Mr. MALCOLM: Would the minister give the reason for the increase in the intermediate and general tariffs in the specific rates, and the reason for the reduction in the ad valorem rates?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can give the technical explanation, but this is one of the items that was agreed to by the empire producers all around. It is satisfactory to our own manufacturers and to the British manufacturers.

Mr. MALCOLM: I hope the minister realizes the extent of the duty. A specific duty of five cents a pound is under normal conditions fifty per cent of the value of the commodity.

Mr. RHODES: It is a high duty, I admit. The imports of glue last year were $235,000 in value, of which $123,000 was from the United Kingdom, $55,000 from the United States, $20,000 from Germany, and the balance from a large number of other countries. Our imports of gelatine last year amounted to $335,000, of which $60,000 came from the United Kingdom, $23,000 from the United States, $81,000 from Australia, $24,000 from Belgium, $22,000 from France, and $16,000 from Japan. These two items form part of a total production in Canada which amounted last year to $1,210,000, the major portion of which was glue, but the items are not segregated.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would submit to the minister that he has to consider 232 and 232b together. There is a decrease on vegetable glue in item 232b. The intermediate rate has been reduced from 35 to 25 per cent, and the general from 35 to 27½ per cent, while the British rate has been increased. Will the minister explain why there should be an increase in the British preferential and a reduction in the other two rates?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is inadvertently in error. The British rate was formerly 17½ per cent and it is now 10 per cent, so there is a reduction in the British preference.

Mr. MALCOLM: And the intermediate and general rates are increased?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not want to bother the minister, but can he give the committee the value of our exports of glue stock last year?

Mr. RHODES: Our exportation of glue stock for the year ending March 31, 1932, was $20,927.

Mr. MALCOLM: There has been no increase in our exports for the last two years. They have been decreasing.

Mr. RHODES: Our export of glue stock in 1931 was $28,911.

Mr. MALCOLM: It has been as high as $90,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—232b. Vegetable glue: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—232c. Gelatine, edible: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports under this item last year were $113,000, of which $56,000 came from the United Kingdom, $11,000 from the United States, $17,000 from Australia and $15,000 from France.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—234. Perfumery, including toilet preparations, non-alcoholic, viz., hair oils, tooth and other powders and washes, pomatums, pastes and all other perfumed preparations, n.o.p., used for the hair, mouth or skin: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year were $873,000, of which $165,000 came from the United Kingdom, the same amount from France, and $533,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—236. Surgical dressings, antiseptic or aseptic, including absorbent cotton, lint, lamb's wool, tow, jute, oakum, woven fabric of cotton weighing not more than seven and one-half pounds per one hundred square yards, whether imported singly or in combination one with another, but not stitched or otherwise manufactured; surgical trusses and suspensory bandages of all kinds; sanitary napkins, spinal braces and abdominal supports: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. HOWDEN: What was the value of our imports last year?

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year amounted to $439,000, of which $173,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $263,000 from the United States.

Mr. HOWDEN: Were representations made to the Canadian government by Canadian firms with regard to this item?

Mr. RHODES: No, there were no requests from Canadian manufacturers with respect to this item. It was one of those items upon which the British government laid particular stress, and I am advised that Great Britain is in a position to supply many times the demand in Canada.

Mr. HOWDEN: The reason I ask is this: The cost of this commodity is excessive at all times, and the practice of the government on a number of items such as this has been to remove the duty altogether from the commodity coming from Great Britain, and to leave the intermediate and general rates as they were. I was wondering if that could not have been done in this instance. The action here taken is bound to increase the cost of this commodity to Canadians, and we can very well do with a cheaper article.

Mr. STEVENS: Carried.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Wait a minute.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend asked a question I am afraid I did not hear it.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was wondering if the government could not take the action in connection with this particular item that they have taken concerning others, that is to say, remove the duty on the English article altogether. A few minutes ago the minister said that this was one article in connection with which the British delegation was most definite. It would have been well for the Canadian people, and probably the British delegation would have been pleased, if the duty had been removed altogether. The minister has said no representations were made by Canadian firms, therefore I see nothing to prevent a removal of the British preferential rate.

Mr. RHODES: When I made the statement to which the hon. member refers, I was replying to the hon. member for Weyburn concerning another matter. So far as I know, no representations were made by Canadian manufacturers, but it was felt that, having due regard to Canadian manufacturers, we could do nothing less than preserve the existing preferential rate.

Mr. HOWDEN: If no objections were made by Canadian manufacturers it seems to me that even yet, the matter might well be considered, and the Canadian people given the advantage of a lower rate on this item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I find myself very much in accord with the hon. member who has just spoken. A commodity of this kind should be sold as cheaply as possible. In this instance the consumer is the one who is suffering, who is called upon to pay hospital bills, and in my view his interests should come before those of the manufacturer. Where the duty against Great Britain has not been changed, but that against competitors increased, there can be no doubt that some slight increase in price will be the result. I should have been delighted to see the preference given to Great Britain by a reduction of tariffs against Great Britain, the other rates remaining as they were. Medical and surgical supplies, above all other things, even the commodities used by farmers, should be allowed to come in as cheaply as possible. The people who require them are those who have been put to exceptional expense at a time when they cannot earn money, and their needs should come before those of the manufacturers. I am prepared to go so far as to place their interests ahead of those of the farmers. They stand in a class by themselves, and should be protected at all costs.

Mr. RHODES: I believe the hon. members for St. Boniface and Red Deer are labouring under the misapprehension that in this item we are increasing the cost of surgical dressings and hospital supplies. My hon. friends are mistaken in that assumption.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister give an assurance to that effect?

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is there to show that the prices will not be increased?

Mr. RHODES: The bulk of dressings which come under this item are used for entirely different purposes than in hospitals. Representations have been made to me in connection with other phases of the tariff by deputations representative of medical and hospital interests, but I have had no expressions of disapproval of the action of the government with respect to this item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Some of the dressings may have no relation to hospital work, but spinal braces and articles of that class are required only by those who are really in need of them.

Mr. CAYLEY: While the minister assures us that the cost will not be raised, will he hold out any hope that it may be lowered?

Mr. RHODES: As production increases costs may be lowered. A deputation which appeared before me today pointed out that they had only recently sent a very substantial order to the mother country for surgical dressings, and they were quite satisfied with the prices quoted. Representatives of three of the largest hospitals in Canada called to see me, and that was their reaction.

Mr. JACOBS: Did they come to express their satisfaction?

Mr. RHODES: I shall say that the conference was harmonious in every respect. In so far as this item was concerned there was no disagreement.

Mr. CAYLEY: Do I take it that the price is lower than it was? Is that why they were satisfied?

Mr. RHODES: I regret to say I cannot give that assurance.

Mr. CAYLEY: They would have no reason to be satisfied unless the price had been lowered. The hospitals are having hard times these days.

Mr. HOWDEN: As I understand the situation, the British preference remains the same, and the intermediate and general tariffs have been increased. A short time ago the minister said that in the past the large majority of these imports had come from the United States. If that is so one might expect that the price of these commodities would be raised. The British manufacturers are receiving no advantage because their preference is not being increased. We will do the British manufacturers no good, and the Canadian consumer will get the worst of it. I suggest to the minister that if at all possible the duties on the British commodities be removed altogether.

Mr. BLAIR: Hospitals are charitable institutions in these days, and I am sure many of the hospitals will suffer from the effects of this change. Reports I have received would lead me to that conclusion, and I think some consideration should be given to the matter. Hospitals are experiencing financial difficulties, and the minister must realize that by removing the tariff some help could be given to them. We would do well to allow free entry of these items from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: We have received representations respecting other phases of the agreement, but we have received none in objection to this item. To the hon. member for St. Boniface may I say the result will be keen competition between Canadian and British firms for that share of the market which hitherto has been partly supplied by foreign countries.

Mr. COOTE: The minister says that the hospitals had no objection to the changes in this item, but some of the patients will object when they have to bear the costs incurred by the additional tariff. We are making a very bad mistake in increasing the general tariff to 35 per cent on articles such as spinal braces. If these new tariff rates are to stand I think item 236 should be split, so that such items as spinal braces could be taken out of that class on which the general tariff is to be increased from twenty to thirty-five per cent, because many of these will be brought from the United States and will have to pay the thirty-five per cent rate.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member is mistaken; I think all these are made in Canada. There is not a hospital in the country that does not make them for their patients. We do not import them at all.

Mr. COOTE: I think the minister might give the importations.

Mr. RHODES: I gave the figures; I do not know whether my hon. friend heard them. I explained that the larger portion had no reference to the hospital and medical supplies which the hon. gentlemen had in mind when they made their criticism in the first instance.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

NEW GOVERNMENT LOAN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF COMPLETION OF SUBSCRIPTION

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourns, if I may be permitted I should like to advise the house that although it was contemplated in its inception that the time within which the new government loan could be subscribed would be continued until tomorrow, we have today passed the mark which gives us the complete sum required. This is rather encouraging in the circumstances, because I do not think it is generally recognized that this is the first time in the history of Canada that a bond has been issued in Canada by the Dominion government bearing a four per cent coupon. Having that in mind I think we have reason to be very grateful that the whole amount has been subscribed by the public.

I should like in this connection formally to recognize the splendid work which was done by the national committee under the chairmanship of Sir Charles Gordon and the vice-chairmanship of Victor Drury, and by the members and associates who have worked so hard to bring about this successful issue.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, November 16, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

FEDERAL CHARTERS GRANTED 1931-32

Mr. RINFRET:

1. How many federal charters were granted by the companies branch during the last fiscal year, 1931-32?
2. What was the revenue of the companies branch during the same year?
3. How many charters were granted: (a) in 1928-29; (b) in 1929-30; (c) in 1931-32?
4. What was the revenue of the companies branch during these same years?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. Letters patent.. .. .. .. .. .. .. 760
   Supplementary letters patent.. .. 197
   Total.. .. .. .. .. .. 957

2. $263,833.

3. (a) Letters patent.. .. .. .. .. 1,202
   Supplementary letters patent. 328
   Total.. .. .. .. .. 1,530

   (b) Letters patent.. .. .. .. .. 1,280
   Supplementary letters patent. 328
   Total.. .. .. .. .. .. 1,608

   (c) Letters patent.. .. .. .. .. 760
   Supplementary letters patent. 197
   Total.. .. .. .. .. 957

4. (a) $711,314; (b) $651,241; (c) $263,833.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

DISMISSALS OF GASPE EMPLOYEES

Mr. GOBEIL:

1. Were there some dismissals of federal government employees for political partisanship in the county of Gaspe, Quebec, from October 1, 1926, to October 1, 1927?
2. If so, on whose recommendation were such dismissals made?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. Yes, 38.

2. 23 on recommendation of Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux; 15 on recommendation of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

NATIONAL RESOURCES INTELLIGENCE BRANCH

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Are steps now being taken to transfer the natural resources intelligence branch from the Interior department to the Department of Trade and Commerce?
2. If such transfer is to be effected, to what branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce is the transferred branch to be attached?
3. What are the functions of the natural resources intelligence branch?
4. What is the number of persons employed in that branch?
5. Out of the total number of persons employed in that branch, how many have been born in Canada?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. There is no such branch in the Interior department. The work formerly done by the national resources intelligence branch is now part of the work done by the national development bureau.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The national development bureau is a bureau of information on Canada's resources, development, and geography and for the promotion of the sound development of Canada's national estate.

4. 71.

5. 52.

CENTRAL GOLD RESERVE

Mr. SPENCER:

What was the amount of money in the central gold reserve on the 31st of October, 1932: (1) in gold; (2) in dominion notes?

Mr. RHODES:

(1) $11,081,733.32; (2) $10,300,000.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ALBERTA ELEVATORS—OVERAGES

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River) moved:

For return showing the overages of each elevator company operating in the province of Alberta during each of the last ten years.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to this motion on Monday at which time the hon. member was not in the house. I do not know whether or not he has read my remarks, but I might say that I pointed out that it has not been the practice of my or any other department to disclose the operations of any private concern. In the annual report of the Board of Grain Commissioners most complete statements are given of overages and other matters pertaining to the operation of elevators, but it has not been the practice to disclose what each elevator or each company had on hand. My hon. friend wrote the department some time ago and I think the deputy minister replied in much the same manner in which I am now replying. I would suggest to the house that if my hon. friend is agreeable this resolution be dropped for the time being until it is decided whether or not we should disclose the operations of private companies.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is quite understandable but I would draw his attention to the fact that a few years ago when the Grain Act was under revision a very full list of the names of companies operating and their overages was published and became part of the record. With all due deference to the minister, I fail to see when a company has a certain quantity of goods on hand at the end of the year why that information should not be considered as a matter of public concern.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will drop the resolution for the time being and talk this matter over with me I am sure we can reach an agreement. There is no desire on my part to withhold any proper information.

Motion dropped.

RADIO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire from the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) who, at present, is acting for the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), whether it is a fact that La Patrie of Montreal has obtained a permit to operate a broadcasting station, under the call CKEP?

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in reply I wish to state that, yesterday, I notified my hon. colleague, the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), that I would make a correction, today, to the statement I made yesterday. My statement was that no broadcasting permit had been issued since the Radio Commission had been appointed. I used the word "appointed." This may have been the cause of some ambiguity, I therefore wish to dispel such ambiguity, if it exists. I should have said: "since the commission had been sworn in." No permit was issued except one—and this is my reply to my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay—of 100 watts to La Patrie. The permit was issued by myself, as interim Minister of Marine, previously, however, to the commission being sworn in, the latter had no say in the matter.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East) (Translation): Does the hon. minister think it proper to issue permits to new stations when a commission is appointed in order to place radio broadcasting under state control?

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): It is a debatable question. If I assert it is, my hon. friend will maintain the contrary. I, therefore, will allow my reply to stand as I gave it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): It is absolutely the opposite to what we did last session.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): We followed the ordinary routine. We equally granted these privileges to La Presse and the Star.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): May I, sir, put another question—with reference to the same subject—to the interim Minister of Marine? Some time ago, we were informed by the press that the Radio Commission was to undertake an inspection tour throughout the country. I trust that the commission will not overlook the electoral division which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this is not a time for debate.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Text): I am putting a question, Mr. Speaker. (Translation): I wish to inquire from the hon. minister as to whether the commission will carry out an inspection tour in my constituency which comprises the following districts: Montmorency, Charlevoix-Saguenay, l'Ile aux Coudres, Ashuanipé, New Quebec, the island of Anticosti and the Canadian Labrador coast. The reason for putting this question—and I leave it to the good common sense of all—is that in these districts which are far remote, there are localities where reception is poor.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): In reply to my hon. friend, I may say that I have no idea what the plans of the commission are, however, I shall be pleased to communicate to them the request of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay.

SOCKEYE SALMON TREATY

On the orders of the day.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes), in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Bennett), to inquire if the government is now considering the making of representations to the government of the United States with respect to the ratification of the sockeye salmon treaty.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should prefer to take this as a notice of question in order that I may make myself familiar with the recent developments within the department.

WINTER WORK IN OUR PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to put a question to the Acting Minister of Marine (Mr. Dupré). As he is aware, the navigation season will soon close; generally, the employees whose services have been required during that season are placed at the disposal of the board of harbour commissioners. I wish to inquire whether it would be possible, this year, to request these various boards, especially those connected with inland harbours, such as Quebec, Three Rivers and Montreal, to employ, as much as possible, on winter work, the men who were at their service during the summer season.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Marine) (Translation): I can assure my hon. friend that I shall convey to the Minister of Marine, who will be back in a few days, the request he has just made.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that many soldier settlers are having great difficulty in meeting their payments on account of the very low price of farm products and, that if these are met, they will not have enough to carry on for the new year, I should like to ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to force these payments.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Since, I believe, November, 1930, after a very thorough investigation of the condition in which soldier settlers in common with many others found themselves, I caused the various superintendents throughout Canada to be circularized by the then board and afterwards by the director, the instructions in substance being that every possible leniency be extended to soldier settlers; that where it appeared that a soldier settler, not through malingering, being able to pay just refused to pay, but through misadventure was unable to make his payments falling due on account of his loan, then in no case should departmental action be taken that would prompt or cause such a settler to leave his homestead. That policy has been consistently followed, is being followed today and will continue to be followed until prices revive and the settlers are in better condition.

ANGUS SHOPS, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals whether he is aware that any definite steps have been taken prior to today, as to the opening of the Angus Shops in Montreal?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I know of no such steps.

BRITISH DUTIES ON COPPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I should like to address a question to the government. I notice by press reports this morning that the British government have suspended for the present the duties on copper in connection with the preference. This, no doubt, will lead to further negotiations. I should like to ask the government if it will not be possible in these negotiations to have the word "smelted," which was deleted, reinserted in the new agreement?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend is making statements of fact that, so far as my information goes, are not facts. There was no deletion of any words from anything in connection with the arrangements between Great Britain and Canada. As regards my hon. friend's question, he must know that it cannot be answered categorically at this time. The whole question of this and any other matters that affect Canadian interests will be carefully considered by this government in conjunction with the British government in due course.

Mr. MUNN: My information is from reliable sources that the word was deleted.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I would state most definitely to my hon. friend that it was not deleted.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I should like to ask the government if they have seriously contemplated giving up trying to make this capitalistic system work and have turned their attention to laying a foundation for a cooperative commonwealth?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The cooperative commonwealth has not been cooperating in the last few weeks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: I was not making a joke. I am glad the house is so humorous. I am asking a question and I expect an answer from the government. If my hon. friend was witty just now, I did not catch what he said.

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Has the Minister of Justice received the report from the Superintendent of Penitentiaries in connection with the riots in Kingston penitentiary?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The report has not yet come to hand. The investigation is rather a long one, 900 or more prisoners having been asked to make any complaints they have. That part of it is concluded. Now, I believe, the superintendent is examining the officers of the penitentiary and as soon as that is completed, he will make his report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the government if they will give to members of the opposition the same opportunity as the Minister of Justice has said is being given to prisoners in the penitentiary, to make any complaints they may have to the government?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my right hon. friend knows he has that opportunity and will have it on the supplementary estimates when they are before the house. In the supplementary estimates there is a vote for penitentiaries. I cannot commend the attitude of my right hon. friend in his question. It is no joke; it is a very serious matter, and the laughter with which his remarks were greeted by the other side of the house, was entirely uncalled for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My remarks were not intended as a joke.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The right hon. gentleman's followers took it as such.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a very serious matter. We have had no opportunity to voice any complaints on unemployment or anything else.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to address to the Minister of Labour who is always very good in giving any information he can. Since the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), has given to the house and the country approximately the number of unemployed according to the census of 1931 and since, by additions thereto, at the present moment we have over 700,000 unemployed in Canada, may I ask the minister if he can give to parliament approximately the total number directly and indirectly on dominion relief at the present moment?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I do not know that I can be so specific as to answer the question as "at the present moment." It would be rather difficult for me to do so. Again, it is rather difficult to define "unemployed." That has given rise to difficulties that confront anyone who tries to make an estimate. But I shall say that the total number, men, women and children, on relief, I think for the last month, is something over 800,000. I may say that that includes 144,000 who, according to governmental figures covering a period of ten years from 1919 to 1929, have been on the average unemployed. It also includes some 140,000, sometimes called transients, and as nearly as the Department of Labour can estimate, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent of those—and probably it is more than that—are very new arrivals in Canada.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—MR. F. N. MURPHY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), asked me a question in connection with soldier settlers. This question, which is to be found on page 1147 of Hansard, is as follows:

I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour. I have in my possession correspondence in connection with a returned soldier by the name of F. N. Murphy, of northern Saskatchewan, who joined the first battalion early in the war and was demobilized in 1919. When he returned he was placed on land purchased by his father. The father never lived on the land, the soldier himself having lived there from the time it was purchased. Since this man has not had any revaluation of that land, no discount, while others who apparently were never in the front line trenches have had a revaluation, will the minister investigate the matter and see that justice is meted out to this returned man, who is trying to make a living on that land in northern Saskatchewan.

I made answer from memory to that question yesterday, but since then I have had an opportunity to inquire into the details of the matter and my answer of yesterday is borne out by the fact. Shortly put, Eugene Murphy, father of F. N. Murphy, the man to whom reference was made, entered into an agreement as a civilian with the then soldier settlement board on September 13, 1921, to purchase the west half of 28—47—6— west of the third meridian. Neither in the application to purchase nor in the agreement for sale nor in any subsequent correspondence between the department and Eugene Murphy was there any intent disclosed that he was merely buying this land for his son.

With respect to revaluation of soldier settlers' lands, I would refer the hon. member to section 68 of the Soldier Settlement Act. At the time the revaluation amendment was passed in 1927, F. N. Murphy was not a settler who had agreed to purchase any land from the board and consequently, although a returned soldier, was not entitled to benefit under that legislation. The father, Eugene Murphy, who had agreed to purchase the property from the board, being a civilian, was not entitled to benefit under the revaluation measure. The legislation with respect to the thirty per cent reduction became effective on May 30, 1930. On the decease of Eugene Murphy, the executor assigned the title and interest of the late Eugene Murphy in the agreement to which I have made reference to F. N. Murphy. F. N. Murphy was at no time qualified or established in accordance with the provisions of the act and regulations, which latter are statutory and define the powers of the department with respect to the establishment of settlers and the manner in which settlers may be qualified with a view to such establishment. It may be observed further that F. N. Murphy is a settler who holds, not an agreement for sale with the department, but an assignment and extension of his late father's agreement and is not eligible under the provisions of the amendment above referred to to participate in the benefits thereunder.

The position is very plain. I was not a member of the House of Commons when the legislation was passed in 1927. I have no complaint to make as to the effect of that legislation, but I am sure that the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) in making the observations he did yesterday was misinformed as to what the facts were. I believe that he was a member of this chamber when that legislation was passed and must have known that the soldier to whom he referred could not by any stretch of the imagination become entitled to a revaluation under the legislation.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): While what the minister has said might be correct, I think there are extenuating circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the hon. member going to ask a question? There is no motion before the house and there is nothing to debate. If the hon. member has a point of order to state he has the right to state it.

Mr. BLAIR: I think in view of the extenuating circumstances in Mr. Murphy's case some leniency should be shown—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot see that any point of order is involved in that.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I say briefly in reply to the Minister of Labour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled already that there is nothing before the house. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question he is at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then I shall if this is the only method of approach open to me. May I ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of his answer regarding the case of F. N. Murphy of northern Saskatchewan? Must I take the answer which he has given me to-day as final, meaning that there is no further redress for this returned soldier on the land?

An hon. MEMBER: You will look after him.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I will look after him and you, too.

Mr. GORDON: I have no hesitation in trying to answer the hon. member's question. Placing it upon the ground that he is now taking, I can assure him that I entertain the same feelings towards the returned soldiers and to the same degree that he does, but as for transgressing the statutes of this country, which I have no authority to do and no intention of doing, I can only repeat what I said before. The answer I gave is final. It is given in pursuance of the statute that was passed in 1927, and undoubtedly, as I observed before, the provisions of that statute came under the keen observation of my hon. friend from North Battleford. He did not anticipate Mr. Murphy's case when the statute was going through, and I do not propose to transgress the statutes of this country on the application of the hon. member.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thought the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have a question to ask.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member has exhausted his right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has already answered the hon. member, and the entire time of the house cannot be monopolized by any one member.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not trying to monopolize the time of the house or anything else, Mr. Speaker. Might I ask the minister why he could not specially investigate F. N. Murphy's case under his own government's legislation of "peace, order and good government"? I would like an answer to that. Why?

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether since the conclusion of the last session any advances in cash or any further guarantees have been given by the government to the Beauharnois corporation.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Obviously I am speaking without notice of the question, but I may say that there have been no advances other than those indicated by the returns already tabled in the house.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT LOANS AND GUARANTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Might I ask the Minister of Finance whether certain returns which were to be brought down respecting government loans and guarantees to various institutions will soon be available?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I advised the hon. gentleman yesterday that they would be brought down in the course of a day or so, and I fully anticipate that they will be laid on the table to-morrow.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Thank you.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

TIME OF COMING INTO FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the government if there was any understanding that any portion of the trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom should not be put into force, so far as Great Britain was concerned, on the fifteenth of this month, that being the date on which the royal assent in Britain was given to certain of the provisions of the agreement? Our understanding has been that the agreement went into force in its entirety on both sides, but according to today's press it would appear with respect to many items in the tariff and one article that the British government does not propose to take action in accordance with the terms of the agreement at the present time. Has there been any understanding between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain that there would be that latitude accorded to either side?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think my right hon. friend will recall that the agreements will go into full force as quickly as the necessary legislation and regulations and other provisions giving effect to the terms of the agreement can be passed by the two parliaments. There are one or two reservations I recall—I have not them under my hand—of a temporary character by the House of Lords which have to be dealt with separately because of certain legislation in Great Britain being affected.

BRITISH DUTIES ON COPPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHARLES B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether in view of the action of the House of Lords in connection with the preference and the fact that one of the largest copper producing mines happens to be in his constituency, he will give that matter his personal attention?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be very glad to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF BILL NO. 8

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom—Mr. Bennett.—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Customs tariff—240. Ultramarine blue, dry or in pulp; whiting or whitening; paris white and gilders' whiting; blanc fixé; satin white: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: We cannot hear what is taking place.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): We are on schedule E, item 240. Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister is ready with his figures.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I have declared it carried. Nobody appeared to have anything to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not believe this committee is properly constituted yet. I beg to move that the committee be empowered to revert back to the item just declared carried.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Very well, we shall do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with these items I wish the minister to give information in the courteous manner he gave it yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): No member rose in his place when the item was called.

Mr. EULER: Oh well, do not be arbitrary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hon. members opposite are too noisy.

[Mr. Stevens.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York Sunbury): We are all too noisy.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $205,000. Of that amount $104,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $72,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—241. Litharge, other than for battery purposes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to have the same information in connection with this item.

Mr. DONNELLY: I cannot understand why this item appears in the schedule.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $136,000. Of that amount $64,000 worth came from the United Kingdom and $72,000 from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: Was there any home production?

Mr. DONNELLY: If the duty has not been changed, why does it appear in the schedule?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I think at times some confusion occurs, because some items appear in the votes and proceedings of October 12, which do not appear in the schedule to this bill. I believe there are some forty in number, and no doubt my hon. friend is confused.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister give us the figures to show Canadian production of this article?

Mr. RHODES: This is part only of a total production in Canada of red lead and litharge which amounted in all to $623,000.

Mr. TOTZKE: Did we export any of this?

Mr. RHODES: The exports under this item are not classified, so I am sorry to say I cannot give that information.

Mr. YOUNG: This item shows an increase in the intermediate and general rates, the British preferential rate remaining as it was before. I presume this was done in the interests of some Canadian industry. What industry was it?

Mr. RHODES: No; this change was not effected at the request of a Canadian industry. It was requested by Great Britain, and was one of the terms to which we agree in the exchange of agreements.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—242. Dry red lead and orange mineral; zinc oxides, such as zinc white and lithopone: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $1,250,000. Of that amount $257,000 worth came from the United Kingdom; $681,000 worth from the United States, $168,000 worth from the Netherlands and $60,000 from Germany.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is any of this produced in Canada at all? Has it all to be imported?

Mr. RHODES: This is part of the sum total which I gave under the previous item. The total production in Canada last year of red lead and litharge was $623,000. There is no division in the items showing which amount should be credited to each.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—245. Ochres, ochrey earths, siennas and umbers: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $58,000, of which amount $6,000 worth came from the United Kingdom, $40,000 from the United States and $7,000 from France.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—249. Varnishes, lacquers, japans, japan driers, liquid driers, and oil finish, n.o.p., per gallon: British preferential tariff, 20 cents and 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 cents and 25 per cent; general tariff, 20 cents and 30 per cent.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to have the figures to show the imports.

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports were valued at $128,000. Of that amount $22,000 worth came from the United Kingdom, and $103,000 from the United States.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did we export any of this at all?

Mr. RHODES: Last year the exports of varnishes were valued at $19,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—253. Putty of all kinds: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year amounted to $19,000, of which $14,000 came from Belgium and $4,000 from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: In this item I notice the British preferential rate is 17½ per cent, while the intermediate and general rates are 27½ per cent. The importations and rates of duty from the United States and Holland will not be affected by an exchange dumping duty, but importations from the United Kingdom will. The applied rate from the United Kingdom, forgetting about the excise, will be about 36 per cent, as against 27½ per cent from other countries. I ask the minister if he believes Great Britain can compete on that basis?

Mr. RHODES: I hope my hon. friend will not think me in the slightest degree discourteous if I refuse to follow in connection with each item, the argument he produced several times yesterday concerning rates of duty. The best answer I can give is that Great Britain is satisfied with the item as it is, and feels that with this preference she can operate.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not blame the minister for not wanting to follow me in my argument, because that argument applies to practically every item. Practically every item in the British preferential column should have 18½ per cent added to it before it should be compared with the rates from other countries. When that is done it will be revealed that in many cases the new preferential rate is higher than the rate to the outside world. That makes a farce of the whole trade agreement. I do not blame the minister for not wanting to follow me in my argument, but I believe it is the duty of hon. members on this side of the house to place on record in every case what the applied rate will be, so that the world will know the exact meaning of the agreement.

Mr. RHODES: I am perfectly content that my hon. friend should place his interpretation on the application of the duty, and have it on record in Hansard.

Mr. DONNELLY: If I bought $100 worth of this article bringing it from the British Isles, what is the actual duty I would have to pay?

Mr. RHODES: The duty would be 17½ per cent, less 10 per cent for direct shipment. The same precisely as last year and the year before under this act.

Mr. DONNELLY: Plus dumping duty and excise tax. I want to know what duty I would have to pay.

Mr. RHODES: I would have to get the figures in each case from the Department of National Revenue. As my hon. friend knows, the exchange rate varies every two weeks. I could not give it at the moment.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand it is about $3.73. You ought to be able to figure it out.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you figure it out?

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think the minister's explanation has been quite satisfactory. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) is in his seat, it is his duty to figure that out. If none of the ministers know, the minister's officials are before them, there are no men in Canada better qualified than these officials to tell us what these rates would be.

Mr. RHODES: I hope that my hon. friend is not under the impression that we do not desire to give complete and full information. If my hon. friend from Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) wishes a specific answer with respect to the duty on a pound of putty as of today I will have the computation made and brought down before the committee rises.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—254. Gums, viz.: amber, arabic, Australian, copal, damar, elemi, kaurie, mastic, sandarac, Senegal, tragacanth, gedda, and barberry; gum chicle or sappato gum, crude; lac, crude, seed, button, stick and shell; ambergris; pontianac: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item amounted to $750,000, of which $14,000 came from the United Kingdom, $617,000 from the United States, $81,000 from British Honduras, and $23,000 from New Zealand.

Mr. HOWARD: Does the finance minister realize that most of the items mentioned in No. 254 are the raw material for manufacturers in Canada, and that when he increases those items it means he is increasing the cost of their product and their sales price to the Canadian consumer?

Mr. RHODES: All the gums in this item are available through empire sources of supply; and the London market in gums, if not the greatest, is one of the greatest markets in the world. Therefore I do not subscribe to the statement of my hon. friend that it involves an increase in price. As a matter of fact three of the items embraced in this list can be obtained only within the empire.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. HOWARD: I was basing my statement on the figures the minister gave. There were practically no imports from the British Empire last year, nearly all were from the United States.

Mr. RHODES: Because they were purchased from United States sources it by no means follows that the articles originated within the United States. The three items I referred to, and they are very important items, are lac, kaurie and copal; there are also perak and damar.

Mr. TOTZKE: The minister might tell us whether this London market was in existence prior to this date. The exports from there might have come in under the old rates. They were free then?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, but there was no preference and for that reason we might very well buy them all, as we have many other commodities, through New York.

Mr. TOTZKE: It would follow that the price would be increased to the consumer in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In view of the very small amount that came in from empire countries last year and the large amount from the United States, does the minister think that the difference in duty will enable British countries now to ship these articles in?

Mr. STEVENS: This happens to be one item that I discussed with the representatives of the colonial governments and the practical men, the advisers, from the West Indies and other colonies. Some of these gums are produced in the West Indies. The large dealers in New York bring the gums there, and from there they are warehoused and merchandised to Canada. The large market in the United States naturally gives a merchant in New York some advantage over one in Canada, particularly where there is no duty, as in the case prior to this. Under this tariff, as far as the West Indies are concerned, we will trade directly through Canadian channels by Canadian National boats to Canadian ports, without any additional cost to the consumer, because the market is a fairly standardized market. Others of these gums come from India and the African colonies, I have not in mind the details. These are dealt in on two big markets, as far as we are affected, namely New York and London. Heretofore there has been no duty, the result was that the propinquity of the New York market to Canada has given them some advantage; but with this duty the business will in all probability, be diverted to the London market giving the empire sources the opportunity of merchandising their own products direct to Canada, and it is not expected that there will be one particle of increase of cost to Canadian dealers.

Mr. DUFF: They can still come through the United States in bond from the West Indies.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they could not, and secure the preference.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister any guarantee that there will be no additional cost?

Mr. STEVENS: We have the usual guarantee of trade practice, and what we consider satisfactory assurances in that regard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If these articles originate within the empire and have been so developed or finished in the United States—

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said that or suggested that. If he did not I want to be corrected. I understood him to say that a great many of them came from parts of the empire originally, and were treated—

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —in the United States, and prepared for market.

Mr. MORAND: Warehoused.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a very ordinary term in trade. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) understanding shipping thoroughly, will appreciate this. Warehousing, storage, is what I am talking about.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Was there no treatment further than just handling or warehousing?

Mr. STEVENS: That is all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: A year from now we will know whether there is anything in this or not. I hope both the ministers and the other members of the house will be here at that time and be able to see what the outcome is. But, being free, only a little over $4,000 came in from empire countries last year as against $177,000 from the United States. This 15 per cent duty is not going to have the effect of bringing these goods from empire countries, but it is going to have the effect, I am satisfied, of increasing the price to the Canadian consumer.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not got the right figures. Already some of the biggest world dealers, empire dealers, have been in Canada, if they are not still here, making contacts for development of this business in Canada, and it is on a very satisfactory basis.

The total amount imported from empire sources was $118,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—256. Printing ink: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Imports last year were valued at $272,000 of which $38,000 came from the United Kingdom and $232,000 from the United States.

Mr. EULER: How much was produced in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: About $2,000,000 worth. It is a highly developed industry here.

Mr. YOUNG : Are all varieties of printers' ink produced in Canada, or do some varieties have to be secured from other sources?

Mr. RHODES: There are certain inks we have to import. They will be dealt with in the following item; I think rotogravure inks are the ones in question. I believe all others are manufactured here.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the reason for the reduction in the general tariff from 25 per cent to 20 per cent?

Mr. RHODES: It is the other way about; the general tariff is increased from 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, under this agreement the rate from Great Britain is 12½ per cent. Add to that the 18½ per cent exchange dumping duty and you get a British rate of 31 per cent, to say nothing of the excise tax. Hitherto ink from the United States has paid a duty of 20 per cent, but when that rate was in effect Great Britain could not compete. I want to know how Great Britain can compete under a 31 per cent duty as against a 25 per cent duty. The net result will be an increase of 5 per cent on inks coming from the United States, with absolutely no chance of importations of the same articles from Great Britain. This is a straight protective tariff.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I really think I must intervene for a moment. The hon. gentleman has repeated his formula over and over again, but that formula is fallacious. He does not see it, but perhaps I may be able to explain it to him. I sat quietly last night while the hon. gentleman spoke about the dumping duty on cigarettes and how much more must be paid, and said that Great Britain could not break through the barricade because of that dumping duty. There is no dumping duty on cigarettes; there is no dumping duty on anything that pays an excise tax, and I believe my hon. friend, with his experience, must know something about that. Now the hon. gentleman has instanced this last case, and he wants to know how business can be expected with Great Britain exporting under a 31 per cent duty as against a 25 per cent duty to the United States.

A moment ago an hon. gentleman opposite gave the case of a Canadian importer taking $100 with which he desired to buy goods. As every hon. member knows who has considered the question—as I am sure the hon. member for Weyburn has considered it—in the country with the currency depreciated to the greatest extent you can buy the greatest amount of goods for your money. Surely that is plain. So what happens to the importer with his $100? He goes to Great Britain and pays less there and contributes more to the revenue. If he goes to France or to the Netherlands with his $100 he pays more to the man who sells him the goods and contributes less to the revenue. The astute English business men who were over here asked for the chance to do business with us, and with the pound depreciated this will work to their advantage. Surely my hon. friend will not object if the revenue of this country is increased. That is the situation. One hundred dollars is not a constant sum all through the game. You can get more goods for less money in Great Britain and contribute more to the revenue, while in France you get less goods and pay the country a smaller sum. It is very simple.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, it is very simple. If my hon. friend had been in the house some days ago when we were discussing this question of currency and its effect on prices he would have heard some references to its effect on prices in Great Britain. The depreciation of the British pound has affected the price level in Great Britain by something like two and a fraction per cent. The minister says that because the British pound is depreciated we can buy more goods with our Canadian dollar. That is true in terms of the British pound, but when we go over to Great Britain and buy a commodity we pay for it in British pounds, and the British producer determines his price on a cost basis figures in British pounds.

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. STEVENS: With what do you purchase your British pounds?

Mr. YOUNG: You purchase your British pounds with Canadian dollars, and the world price of commodities is not affected by what any country does with its domestic currency. The world price is fixed by world conditions and is always measured in terms of gold; that is the ultimate measure. Now the minister says we can buy more British goods with our Canadian dollars, and that therefore the British exporter will get more goods into this country. As a matter of fact, taking this particular item covering printer's ink, when you buy a given quantity of printer's ink in Great Britain, that ink is sold in competition with the world. Britain's price must be somewhere in close relationship with prices in other countries, and when you bring those goods to Canadian shores, no matter with what currency you pay for them, you must pay a duty of 12½ per cent plus another duty of 18½ per cent in addition to the excise tax. When you buy the same article in New York you pay a duty of 25 per cent, despite what the minister may say.

Mr. STEVENS: Plus exchange.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, plus exchange in each case.

Mr. STEVENS: You have ignored the exchange with the United States all through your argument.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that, because when we were discussing this matter of exchange the other day I asked the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Revenue if they had imposed an exchange dumping duty on countries whose currencies were not depreciated. They laughed at the idea, and said they had not.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course we did not.

Mr. YOUNG: The United States dollar is valued at par, and the duty on the article is 25 per cent. With the British pound you add an exchange dumping duty of 18½ per cent, making the British rate 31 per cent as against the United States rate of 25 per cent. The minister cannot get away from that.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—256a. Rotogravure ink: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—264. Essential oils, n.o.p., including bay oil, otto of limes, and peppermint oil: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports amounted to about $715,000 in value, of which $121,000 came from the United Kingdom, $379,000 from the United States and $122,000 from France. There is practically no production in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—276b. Cotton seed and crude cotton seed oil, when imported by manufacturers of cotton seed meal and refined cotton seed oil, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such commodities, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports were valued at $1,600,000, of which $386,000 came from the United Kingdom and $1,216,000 came from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—277. Palm and palm kernel oil, unbleached or bleached, not edible; shea butter: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $33,000, of which $2,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $30,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—278. Oils, viz.: Cocoanut, palm and palm kernel, not edible, for manufacturing soap; carbolic or heavy oil; olive oil for manufacturing soap or tobacco, or for canning fish: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year were valued at $1,916,000, of which $130,000 came from the United Kingdom, $1,555,000 from the United States and $117,000 from Ceylon.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—284. Earthenware tiles for roofing purposes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—287. Tableware of china, porcelain, semi-porcelain, white granite or ironstone: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $3,050,000, of which $2,336,000 came from the United Kingdom, $34,000 from the United States, $227,000 from Japan, $153,000 from Czechoslovakia, $117,000 from France and $113,000 from Germany.

Mr. YOUNG: This item shows an increase in the intermediate and general rates, the preferential rate remaining free. According to the figures just given by the minister, Great Britain in the past has practically dominated this market. I take it that the importations from France and Germany were of special varieties not produced in Great Britain. Why was it necessary to increase the rates in order to give Great Britain a further preference when she already controlled the market?

Mr. RHODES: If those importations were of special varieties, then they should pay something to the treasury of this country. As a matter of fact, while Great Britain did dominate the market, at the same time we imported commodities to the value of over $700,000 from foreign countries.

Mr. YOUNG: I take it that the minister accepts the doctrine that special varieties of what we might call higher class goods should pay a higher rate than the more common varieties?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—288. Earthenware and stoneware, brown or coloured and Rockingham ware; "C.C." or cream-coloured ware, decorated, printed or sponged; and all earthenware, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $470,000, of which $173,000 came from the United Kingdom, $152,000 from the United States, $50,000 from Germany and $43,000 from Japan.

Mr. DUFF: I notice there is a 25 per cent duty against goods coming from Great Britain; why was not that rate made free the same as the other items?

Mr. RHODES: There is a very large establishment in western Canada and one in Quebec which manufacture these articles. All I can say is that this being part of the agreement it is evidence that the rate agreed upon was satisfactory to the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUFF: It may not be satisfactory to the consumers of Canada that these two plants should have a 25 per cent protection. It will mean that the consumer will have to pay 25 per cent more for this commodity.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—289. Baths, bathtubs, basins, closets, lavatories, urinals, sinks and laundry tubs of earthenware, stone, cement, clay or other material, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

The imports last year were valued at $336,000, of which $256,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $77,000 from the United States.

Mr. DUFF: What was the Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: The production in Canada last year of sanitary earthenware was valued at $3,200,000.

Mr. POWER: On the theory that cleanliness is next to godliness, why not make this item free?

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice that the only rate changed is the intermediate and I should like to know why this rate was changed when there were no imports from the countries enjoying that rate.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend a specific answer as to why this individual item was increased except to say that it widens the degree of preference to Great Britain.

Mr. POWER: It is the same.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is the same to the United States.

Mr. RHODES: The intermediate under the old rate was 30 per cent and it has been increased to 35 per cent.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why was it changed?

Mr. RHODES: Because it widens the margin of preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not only in the case of this item but in the case of the previous two items an increase has been made in the intermediate rate while the general rate has been left the same. In each instance the intermediate rate has been raised to the level of the general. Is not the real reason for this change to take away any opportunity which may offer in the way of negotiating trade agreements with other countries that are prepared to give special concessions to us? Do not these items illustrate that this whole tariff has been framed not so much to give preference to Great Britain as to make impossible trade with other countries of the world?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot quarrel with my right hon. friend in his interpretation of the agreement but I assure him that from our point of view the object was to widen the preference and increase the importations from British Empire sources. Of course that will be done only to the extent which we diminish imports from foreign countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think these changes have been made to further the objective as stated by the Prime Minister, namely, to shut out the foreigner.

Mr. STEVENS: He never said that.

Mr. YOUNG: He said, "that is the one thing we have done."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is reported on page 835 of Hansard.

Mr. DONNELLY: I cannot see why the intermediate rate should be changed as no goods have come in under that rate. Goods came in under both the general and British preference and there must be some other reason for this change.

Mr. RHODES: If none came in before then no one will be injured. Great Britain accepted this change as a wider preference and the only preference which could be given under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to quote from page 835 of Hansard as follows:

> Another says that we have closed the doors of the world's markets, that we have shut out the foreigner. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that that was one of the first things he was going to do if he got the British preference, and that is the one thing we have done.

Mr. YOUNG: The only thing they have done.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is right, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Prime Minister?

Mr. CAYLEY: The minister has told us that the total production in Canada is valued at $3,200,000 while the value of the total imports amounts to only one-tenth of this amount. As far as I can see the only parties who will be benefited will be the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. RHODES: There is another point of view which I think is of equal value, that it will make competition all the more keen between the Canadian and British manufacturers.

Mr. CAYLEY: The British manufacturer is not coming into the market; he imported only $256,000 worth.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—300. Crucibles of clay, sand or plumbago: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The importations last year under this item were valued at $61,000, of which $40,000 came from the United Kingdom and $21,000 from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is another case of shutting out the foreigner. Previously this item was free to all countries but now the intermediate and general rates are 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I doubt if a 15 per cent duty will of necessity shut out the foreigner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will help.

Mr. RHODES: Admittedly it will help, but it is not by any means a prohibitive duty.

Mr. REID: Are any of those crucibles manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: If so, they are not listed as such. We have no record of any being manufactured in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 312. Asbestos in any form other than crude, and all manufactures thereof, when made from crude asbestos of empire origin: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were as follows:

| | Total | From United Kingdom | From United States |
|---|---|---|---|
| Asbestos packing. . | $ 58,000 | $24,000 | $ 32,000 |
| Asbestos brake lining | 240,000 | 55,000 | 184,000 |
| Asbestos, n.o.p. . . | 257,000 | 22,000 | 224,000 |

Mr. CAYLEY: What are the Canadian productions?

Mr. RHODES: Our total exports last year amounted in value to $3,437,000, the great bulk of which was crude asbestos.

Mr. POWER: What was the production of manufactured asbestos?

Mr. RHODES: We exported manufactures of asbestos to the value of $105,000, of which $60,000 went to the United Kingdom.

Mr. POWER: What was the production of manufactured asbestos?

Mr. RHODES: I shall try to get those figures. I do not have them under my hand at the moment.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister received representations from Canadian asbestos firms to this effect; I have received a letter but I do not have it with me. As I understand the matter, asbestos yarn enters Canada under a 20 per cent duty, but asbestos brake lining, which is made up from yarn, comes in free and competes with a certain Canadian industry. The yarn is the raw material of a certain Canadian industry and pays 20 per cent duty, while the brake lining is a manufactured product and comes in free. Perhaps representations have been made to the government along these lines, because I have seen a letter protesting against the anomaly that seems to exist. I am not asking that the rate on the manufactured article be raised, but I am suggesting that the rate on the raw material be lowered in order to give Canadian manufacturers an opportunity to do business.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member is correct; as he has pointed out, there is an anomaly in respect to this article, but in connection with these agreements we dealt only with the items as touching these agreements. The question of revision is one which will have to be dealt with at the regular session; that is the only time when we can deal with the anomaly.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—318. Common and colourless window glass: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Customs tariff—319. Glass in sheets, and bent plate glass, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Customs tariff—320. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Customs tariff—321. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes exceeding seven square feet each, and not exceeding twenty-five square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Customs tariff—322. Plate glass, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under item 318 totalled $650,000, of which $30,000 came from the United Kingdom, $14,000 from the United States, $501,000 from Belgium, $57,000 from Czechoslovakia and $36,000 from Germany.

Under item 319 the imports amounted to $275,000 of which $88,000 came from the United Kingdom, $51,000 from the United States:

Under item 320 our imports amounted to $608,000 of which $124,000 came from the United Kingdom, $488,000 from the United States and $46,000 from other countries.

Under item 321 our imports totalled $173,000 of which $69,000 came from the United Kingdom, $77,000 from the United States and $27,000 from other countries.

Under item 322 our imports totalled $271,000, of which $128,000 came from the United Kingdom, $55,000 from the United States and $73,000 from Belgium.

Mr. POWER: I do not want to be sarcastic, but will the minister tell us whether there were heavy importations of glass somewhere around September or October, 1930?

Mr. RHODES: I will secure the information for my hon. friend. I may assure him I have no information of any special imports at that time. My hon. friend may be quite right in his assumption.

Mr. POWER: I do not know.

Mr. EULER: Are we at liberty to discuss any of these items, particulars of which have been given by the minister?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I could not refuse the hon member anything.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps it would facilitate the work of the committee if we discussed them all together, if that is agreeable to the committee. It is rather difficult to deal with them separately.

Mr. EULER: At the moment I desire to discuss just one item, namely, 320, plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each. When one looks at the rates that obtained before, namely, British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent from all other countries, and compares them with the proposed tariff rates, namely, free under the British preferential tariff and 25 per cent from all other countries, because the intermediate and general rates are the same, one would think this is perhaps an outstanding effort to transfer business from foreign countries to Great Britain. I have no particular quarrel with that at the moment, but I should like to give to the committee information that I have received, which points to the conclusion that this change in the tariff is going to have exactly the opposite effect of that desired or intended. One would think from this, since this kind of glass is placed on the free list in Great Britain, the cost to the Canadian consumer should be less if anything, and also that the business should go to the British producer of this kind of plate glass. That would, I think, ordinarily be true, but under the circumstances of which I have knowledge, and perhaps the minister has also, it does not appear to me it is going to work out just in that way. I am told by glass importers in this country, men whose word I have no reason whatever to doubt, that practically all of this kind of glass which comes into Canada, comes from four countries: Great Britain, Belgium, France and the United States, the importations from the United States, according to the figures given by the minister, being by far the greater. The glass manufacturers of those four countries are in a combine, what is usually known as a cartel. It was understood pretty well that the business went largely to the British and Belgian manufacturers and also to those of the United States. This importer of glass states that this is almost surely going to be the result, that the foreign manufacturers are now going to be absolutely shut out, but the United States manufacturer or the Belgian manufacturer, being a member of the same cartel of which the British manufacturer is a member, is not going to yield the advantage which he has under the provisions of that cartel, and the consequence will be that the British manufacturer must yield to them. The final result will be that the British manufacturer, who has a preference under this agreement will increase the price of the glass he sells to Canada. That seems a rather anomalous condition, that while the duty on glass coming from Great Britain is being reduced from 7½ per cent and made free as against a 25 per cent handicap on foreign countries, in order to enable the Belgian and the United States manufacturer to compete in the Canadian market with the British manufacturer, as he has a right to do under their cartel arrangements, the British manufacturer, not because he wants to, but because of his obligations under the cartel, will have to increase the price of glass to the Canadian consumer in order that the foreigner may get his share of the business. That is the way the matter has been put to me. As confirmation of it, I am informed that the British producer of glass was not at all in favour of this arrangement. Perhaps the minister can say with regard to that. It may be that those who made the arrangements had not the fullest information in regard to the situation. Further, here is a most peculiar situation. The price of this particular kind of glass is 15 per cent less in Canada today than it is in Great Britain, the country of manufacture.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you opposed to that?

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend has anything to add to the argument or wishes to dispute mine I shall be very glad to listen to him after I am through. The point I want to make is this: The purpose of this arrangement is to transfer business from foreign countries to Great Britain, and, as I have said, I have no particular fault to find with that if it can be done without increasing the price to the Canadian consumer. On the face of it, one would not expect the price to be increased; in fact, it should be decreased because the item now enters free whereas formerly it paid a duty of 7½ per cent. But if it results as those who spoke to me say it will, surely it is an unfortunate condition for the Canadian consumers because at the present time they are able to buy this glass 15 per cent cheaper than it can be bought in the country of manufacture. In fact, the gentleman who communicated with me went so far as to say that those importing glass in Canada will buy just as much as they can at present prices because they believe that under the agreement they will have to pay more before very long.

Mr. RHODES: Only a few days ago I had a conference with the principal distributors of glass who are purchasers in Canada, and will be to a greater extent under this arrangement, in the presence of the representative of the principal British exporter, and I may say to my hon. friend that they were absolutely satisfied with the assurances that were given by the British producers that there would be no increase in price.

I would point out to my hon. friend with respect to the cartel arrangement, if such exists, that it is not all-embracing so far as the industries in Great Britain are concerned, and further, there is one industry of which I have knowledge in Great Britain which was purchased by Canadian interests a short time ago, and which is about to be started on a very active scale, and which has never had any active associations with any former cartel or any cartel now existing.

Mr. EULER: Located in Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. My information is that there is ample capacity in the existing plants of Great Britain, apart altogether from the plant to which I have just referred, to make for very keen competition. In view of the fact that the distributors in Canada are satisfied that there will be no increase in price and with the assurance of the representative of the leading British firm who appeared before me, I am satisfied to take their assurances that that condition will not come about. But if they did not live up to their word I think my hon. friend would find that the competition I spoke of would more than take care of the situation. At least, that is my judgment of what would happen. I would greatly regret if the condition of which my hon. friend has spoken did arise, because in that case the results of the arrangement would be unfortunate.

Mr. EULER: I wanted to advance that view as it was communicated to me in the best of faith, I believe. Time will tell.

Mr. YOUNG: I would have thought that profiting by the experience of September, 1930, the government would have been very careful about introducing this legislation. I well remember, on the last Saturday sitting of the short session of 1930, the Prime Minister standing up in his place and telling us that the government were increasing the duty on glass. What for? Because, he said, the consumers of glass in Canada are in the grip of an international cartel, and we are going to encourage the establishment in Canada of a factory that will produce glass for our own use at a reasonable price, free from the tentacles of this cartel, and we have satisfactory assurances, the Prime Minister said, that the price will not be increased to the Canadian consumer. What happened? The ink was hardly dry on that arrangement before the price of glass in Canada doubled.

Mr. STEVENS: Then what happened?

Mr. YOUNG: What I hope will happen again in this case. As I say, the price of glass was doubled, and it was discovered that this firm which was going to open a glass factory in Canada was owned and controlled, body and soul, by that very same cartel. We were raising the duty on glass in Canada to protect ourselves from that very cartel, and actually we were delivering ourselves into its hands. The minister asks: Then what happened? What happened was this: Such an agitation arose in the newspapers and throughout the country when the fallacy of the government's position in saying they could accept those assurances from the manufacturers was seen, that there was nothing for it but to remove the duty.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh no.

Mr. YOUNG: It was shown beyond peradventure that those assurances were not worth the paper they were written on, if they were written. They could not be depended on, and as the price of glass increased, the government removed the duty. We are being told again now that the government have received satisfactory assurances that the price will not be increased in this case, and the minister says that if it is increased the competition of Canadian producers outside the cartel will force prices down. It did not the other time. The minister also says that the distributors of glass in Canada are satisfied. They did not complain the other time because they saw what was coming and they got in their supplies beforehand to take advantage of the increased price. Article 4 of this agreement provides that if at any time Canadian producers cannot supply Great Britain with her requirements at world prices the preferential duties do not apply. Why not such an arrangement for Canada? I ask the minister what provision this government has made to protect the Canadian consumer similar to the provision which the British government has in this agreement to protect the British consumer. Has any such provision been made?

Mr. STEVENS: The answer to my hon. friend is under his nose. This article is free, and we cannot make it any more free. My hon. friend also says that Great Britain has undertaken that if certain things happen the preference will be taken off. We are taking off the duty before we start, because glass is to come in free. While we differ from the hon. member very markedly in the theories he propounds in regard to tariffs and other matters, at least we have always given him credit for being sincere and fair. But is he fair in his criticism of the Prime Minister and the government in connection with the glass episode of two years ago? What happened? Down to a certain point the hon. member set out the facts correctly, but at that point his prejudice prevented him from giving just a little bit of credit to the government for something they did. What happened? The moment it was clear—and it did not take long to make it clear—I will go farther and say the moment there was evidence the company was about to break faith, or did not intend to keep faith, the Prime Minister, who was in London at the time, was cabled by his colleagues in Canada. Immediately a cable was sent back which said, "Take that duty off." That was a very salutary action, because it showed the industries of Canada—and there are many industrialists who are prepared to take advantage of conditions—that as far as this government is concerned they had broken faith with an undertaking, and that the government would not tolerate such action.

Whatever else my hon. friend may charge us with, whatever else he may say concerning our policies, no matter what his condemnations of our actions may be, I suggest that at least he should have the courtesy to extend credit to the Prime Minister and government when they took action promptly, expeditiously and definitely. In connection with these items I fail to understand the attitude of the hon. member. What have we done in this instance? So far as Great Britain is concerned we have taken off the duty in the glass schedule. My colleague the Minister of Finance has stated clearly,—and I am prepared to corroborate everything he has said,—that the glass industry of Great Britain is by no means tied up in a cartel. There is competition, keen competition, and there is no doubt in the minds of the British government, the British delegation or the British glass industry that this is one of the most valuable things we can give Great Britain under the treaty.

Here is an instance where we meet the views of the leader of the opposition. He has complained that we have not eliminated the duty in connection with many items, and has asked why we did not lower the rates. In this instance we have wiped them out. Could we do more? The hon. member for Weyburn has said that this is a farce and that it is of no value. But I ask him this question: Could we do any more than we have done? I think if he will reflect for a moment concerning the action of the government in connection with a Canadian industry which had received protection two years ago, and had failed to carry out its obligations, he will decide that the government acted in a most expeditious manner, and that the removal of the protection offered at that time was in the interests of Canada. He must further agree that in this instance, where we have placed glass on the free list, we have done all he could have asked us to do, no matter what his theories or ideas may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has asked if they could have done more. Let us look at the three items concerning glass, to which he has just made reference. Examination will show that while there has been a small reduction in order to give Great Britain free entry, there have been considerable increases in both the general and intermediate tariffs. If we examine tariff item 318 dealing with common and colourless window glass we find that while the government has decreased the British rate by 1½ per cent, it has increased the intermediate rate 2½ per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: No; there is a reduction of 7½ per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figure before me appears to be 1½ but it may be blurred.

Mr. RHODES: The figures on the right hon. gentleman's schedule may be blurred, but he will find the old rate was 7½ per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My copy reads 1½ per cent, but there may be a flaw in the printing. I beg the minister's pardon. Then, let us take the next item. We find that there has been an increase in the intermediate rate from 22½ per cent to 25 per cent, making the intermediate and general tariffs the same. That change would prevent any arrangement being made with another country. Then, in connection with "plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each, n.o.p." the British preferential rate is changed from 7½ per cent to free, and in both the intermediate and general rates there is a change from 10 per cent to 25 per cent. Clearly that change is made to shut out the foreigners.

In other words a survey of the schedules taken together shows a net result of a very considerable increase in duty on articles needed for purposes of construction and shelter, articles which serve domestic, business and commercial ends.

Mr. RHODES: The right hon. gentleman omitted to indicate that in connection with common and colourless window glass, where the duty was formerly 7½ per cent it is now made free.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister indicated that before.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. Concerning glass in sheets, where the duty was formerly 17½ per cent it is wiped out entirely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned that.

Mr. RHODES: Then, the right hon. gentleman referred to plate glass, not bevelled, and stated that there had been increases in the intermediate and general rates. He did not lay stress on the fact that we had wiped out entirely the former duty which obtained under the British preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes I did.

Mr. RHODES: The right hon. gentleman did not refer to item 321, "plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes exceeding seven square feet each, and not exceeding twenty-five feet each, n.o.p." In connection with that item the former rates were: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent and general tariff, 27½ per cent. The new rates are: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent. The committee will note that the British preferential rate is free, that the intermediate rate has not been disturbed and that the general rate has been reduced 2½ per cent.

Mr. VENIOT: In connection with item 318 I should like to point out that while the Minister of Trade and Commerce has complained that hon. members on this side of the house have not been quite fair, in giving reasons why the government have abolished the duty on plain glass he himself was not fair. What are the facts? I believe it was on September 17, 1930, that the item was first dealt with. At that time the tariff on imports of plain glass was changed from 7½ per cent ad valorem to a specific duty of 4½ cents per pound.

Immediately, on September 23, two or three days after the change had been made, importers of glass in Canada sent out circular letters in which they pointed out that on account of this increase in duty a 120 pound box of plain glass which had formerly cost $5.63 would have to be sold wholesale for a little over $11. I remember well that when the change was made I pointed out that it could not be satisfactory. I asked the minister if it would not be possible to leave the item, and to make a provision in it to the effect that when a Canadian firm could supply the demand, the specific duty should apply. The reply from the Prime Minister was that the item could not be so treated. He said they had received an absolute guarantee from a firm in East Hamilton that the increase in duty would not involve an increased price to the consumers. What are the facts? The letter from the firm in east Hamilton did not lay down any such proposition. The letter laid down this proposition: As the cost of production is lowered by the increased production we will give the benefit of the lower cost to the consumer.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that the assurance?

Mr. VENIOT: Now, one minute. It was stated on the floor of this house that within three or four weeks 350 to 400 men would be employed in East Hamilton. Was that firm given three or four weeks to prepare their manufacturing establishment and go on with the work? No. Look at the record; you will find that between the 9th and 14th of October, an order in council was passed bringing back the duty to an ad valorem basis of 7½ per cent and abolishing the 110 per cent increase. The firm were not given the opportunity, they stated in their communication and in interviews in the press that they were not given the opportunity to proceed along the lines that they had laid down. If when the order in council was passed abolishing the specific duty that firm had been given more time, as they asked, they might have been in a position to go on preparing the manufacturing establishment. But no, they were distinctly told that they would not have the benefit of this increase. The reason for the government withdrawing the increase in duty was that a howl went up throughout the length and breadth of the land when it was seen that before the industry could be established in Canada the importers of common glass were taking advantage of the duty and doubling the price to the consumer. It was not because this firm had broken faith with the government.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Trade and Commerce complains that I was not quite fair, did not give the government the credit due them for the action they took in removing the duty they put on glass in September, 1930. I am going to be generous with the government and give them all the credit they want. I will give them full credit for removing that duty with no other object in mind than the public interest. But then I ask this question: In view of the fact that the people who broke faith then making it necessary for them to remove the duty that they had put on at that time, are the same people who control the glass manufacture of the world today, why do the government put themselves in their hands again? It is true that they have removed the duty from glass coming from Great Britain, but in some cases they have increased it on glass from other countries, and, it being all under the same control, why do they put themselves in the hands of that cartel?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not all controlled by the cartel. That is the reason.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not do the same as the British government did in article 4, say that unless they can supply all that we require, at world prices, this preference does not apply.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Customs tariff—319. Glass, in sheets, and bent plate glass, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—320. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—321. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes exceeding seven square feet each, and not exceeding twenty-five square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—322. Plate glass, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 339. Lead capsules for bottles: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister tell us what the imports were?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no separate information regarding importations. It is a comparatively small item, a new item in the tariff in fact. It came under the general item before.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—340. Type for printing, including chases, quoins and slugs, of all kinds: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Was there much imported last year?

Mr. STEVENS: We imported $100,000 of which $39,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $58,000 from the United States.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I see it is altogether by way of reduction in this case.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—341. Babbit metal and type metal, in blocks, bars, plates and sheets: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is an important article. There is no lowering of the duty against Great Britain but there is an increase in the duty both intermediate and general from 15 to 20 per cent. I suppose that is another effort to shut out the foreigner.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—348d. Copper in bars or rods, when imported by manufacturers of trolley, telegraph and telephone wires, electric wires and electric cables, for use only in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was all the importation of this item from the United States last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There again, both copper and iron bars when imported by manufacturers for use only in manufacture, were free in all cases, both under the British preference, the intermediate and the general tariff. Now they are ten per cent under the intermediate and general. None of this material came from Great Britain, the minister has just told us. It simply means that there is going to be an additional cost for construction, which will be passed on to the consumer, and the foreigner will be more effectively shut out.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—349. Brass in bars and rods, in coil or otherwise, not less than six feet in length, and brass in strips, sheets or plates not polished, planished or coated: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Figures please.

Mr. STEVENS: Importations, $142,000, of which $48,000 were from the United Kingdom and $94,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—350. Wire, of all metals and kinds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Importations $79,000, of which $13,000 from the United Kingdom, and $64,000 from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: Those are not the figures I have.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the last two items, the figures given by the minister are different from those we get from the trade returns.

Mr. STEVENS: It may be a different period. This is for the fiscal year 1932.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does this item include all kinds of fencing wire?

Mr. STEVENS: Other than iron or steel.

Mr. YOUNG: I think this item would do as well as any to illustrate what actually happens when we buy goods in Great Britain, in view of the exchange situation. A British manufacturer of wire offers for sale a certain quantity for say £100. A Canadian wishing to buy that wire figures that £100 will amount to $373 Canadian money. Then he gets figures from an American manufacturer on the same material. The American manufacturer will probably say, I will sell it for $330 American money. The nominal value of the pound sterling is $4.86, but the value in American funds is only about $3.30, $330 translated into Canadian money is $373. So whether we buy in one country or the other the cost of the goods is substantially the same to us. Now the Canadian importer will figure this way: If I buy this wire in Great Britain the rate of duty will be 10 per cent plus the exchange dumping duty of 18½ per cent, making 28½ per cent. If I buy in the United States the rate of duty will be 35 per cent, with no exchange dumping duty added. We have a rate of 28 per cent against Great Britain as compared with 35 per cent against the United States. So when my hon. friends say that Great Britain, because of the depreciated value of her pound, will undersell us to such a tremendous extent as to wipe out this exchange dumping duty, it is nonsense.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course my hon. friend has established a premise to suit his conclusions.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps you can shatter it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In addition to what the hon. member for Weyburn has said let me point out that the net result of the change is another very considerable increase in the duties. There has been a slight reduction in the British preference, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, but as against that there have been increases from 17½ per cent to 30 per cent in the intermediate tariff and from 20 per cent to 35 per cent in the general tariff, making the rates almost prohibitive as far as the intermediate and general tariffs are concerned. Here again we have a very considerable increase in the cost of production in this country.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—350, 351, 353, 353a, 354, 361, 711: Aluminum and alloys thereof, crude or semi-fabricated, viz., pigs, ingots, blocks, notch bars, slabs, billets and blooms; scrap; bars, rods and wires; angles, channels, beams, tees and other rolled or drawn sections and shapes; pipes and tubes; plates, sheets and strips, including circles; leaf or foil, less than ·005 inch in thickness, plain or embossed, with or without backing; wire and cable, twisted or stranded, reinforced with steel or not; aluminum powder: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Here we have several items combined into one. The total imports amounted to $1,590,000, of which $417,000 came from the United Kingdom, $1,056,000 from the United States and $117,000 from other countries.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are these figures for all the items?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. These are a number of items virtually all the same consolidated into the one item now known as 353.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nearly all those items refer to material used for construction purposes, and there has been a very considerable increase both in the intermediate and general tariffs, thereby increasing the cost of production.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—352. Coin locks of which solid brass or bronze are the components of chief value, plain, polished or plated: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I ask where these come from at the present time?

Mr. RHODES: This is a new item, and we have no trade figures available that would enable me to answer the question of my hon. friend. I may say, however, that in Great Britain they are specializing in the manufacture of this type of lock, and they particularly requested this item.

Mr. CAYLEY: Would the minister tell us what a coin lock is?

Mr. RHODES: It is a lock with which my hon. friend no doubt has come in contact in various public places, in which a nickel is dropped in a slot for the purpose of opening a door.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—354. Manufactures of aluminum, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Could we have the figures on this item, please?

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports under this item amounted to $1,000,000, of which $61,000 came from the United Kingdom, $913,000 from the United States and $29,000 from other countries.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. YOUNG: Is there any Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: It is almost impossible to segregate the items to indicate the Canadian production under this particular item. The total production of aluminum of all kinds in Canada was valued at $4,500,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In this case the preference is given by an increase in the intermediate and general tariffs instead of by reducing the duty under the British preference, as was done in some other cases. I wonder if the minister could tell why that plan was adopted in regard to this particular item? This is a very substantial increase in connection with a commodity that comes very largely from countries other than those within the United Kingdom.

Mr. RHODES: I can only give my hon. friend the answer that it was part of the general agreement and apparently was satisfactory to our associates from Great Britain.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us how much aluminum kitchen ware is manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: That is the next item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item 354 also serves to illustrate wherein what we have before us is not so much intended to increase the British preference as to increase the general tariff and shut out the foreigner. Under the general tariff the old rate was 25 per cent; now it has been increased to 30 per cent. Under the intermediate tariff the old rate was 22½ per cent; now it is 30 per cent also. The intermediate and general tariffs have been made the same, evidently with the intention of making it more difficult for any agreement to be reached with any foreign country which would help trade between our country and other countries of the world, and help the consumer in Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. gentlemen opposite have complained that I have harped too much on the exchange dumping duties, and they have suggested that they would like a change of argument. I find that in computing the duty on goods coming from Great Britain I have been overlooking one factor, that is, that the duty levied will be based on the par value of the pound. Let us see how this will work out in connection with item 354a. Let us take the case of a man who purchases in Great Britain aluminum worth one hundred pounds sterling, which in Canadian money is $373. In this case the duty is 20 per cent, but that duty is levied on the pound at $4.86, or on the value of this purchase at $486. The actual amount paid is $373, so the duty figures out to something like 26 per cent on the actual value of the goods, as against a 30 per cent duty against the foreigner. That does not take into account the exchange dumping duty, either. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue can explain that away.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have already explained it, and I am sorry my hon. friend cannot understand. The Canadian importer will come home with more goods, if he buys in Great Britain, than he will obtain in another country. That is the answer, and in addition the revenue of the country is increased.

Mr. YOUNG: That might be an answer if it were correct, but it is not correct.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—354a. Kitchen or household hollow ware of aluminum, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year under this item were valued at $153,000, of which $7,000 came from the United Kingdom and $133,000 from the United States.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What was the Canadian production ?

Mr. RHODES: Last year the Canadian production was valued at $1,499,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This is an article of increasing importance in the household economy of the average housewife of Canada, and I should imagine that the net result of the change will be an increased production for the Canadian manufacturer rather than a diversion of trade to Great Britain. This is another case where the preference has been created by increasing the tariff against foreigners. Considering the total imports in comparison to the Canadian production, and the fractional percentage of those imports which come from Great Britain, it seems to me that in all likelihood the net result will be an increase in cost to the housewife. I must confess that this sort of preference does not appeal to me as being at all sound.

Mr. RHODES: I doubt if there is any possibility of an increase in cost to the housewife, because I am informed that the capacity in Canada is sufficient to supply five times the requirements for this class of goods.

Mr. DONNELLY: I did not hear the value of the Canadian production, and I should like to know also if the minister has received a guarantee from the Canadian manufacturers that they will not increase the price because of this change?

Mr. RHODES: The production last year was valued at $1,499,000. So far as this agreement is concerned, we have received no guarantee from the manufacturers; in fact, they were not consulted in this respect.

Mr. DONNELLY: No guarantee has been received from the Canadian aluminum manufacturers?

Mr. RHODES: So far as I am aware the first knowledge they had of this change was when the items were published in the newspapers.

Mr. POULIOT: This item reminds me of Russia. A large quantity of oil was imported from Russia in order to provide production for the manufacturers of aluminum. There seems to be a mystery in connection with this oil business. Sometimes we find a snake in a barrel of molasses, but nobody seems to know what is in these cargoes of oil which are arriving from Russia. I am wondering if this preference will not have the effect of destroying the good results which it is expected will be obtained by the importation of oil from Russia. I should like to know also if the aluminum company has agreed to this preference.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot enter into a discussion with my hon. friend with respect to the oil phase of his argument, but apparently the Canadian manufacturers of aluminum are in a position to supply this article at a price attractive enough, based in terms of oil, to our Russian friends to cause them to want to do business with the Canadian interests. I cannot see how this tariff will affect any opportunities which the aluminum company might have, to do the same thing in the future; it will have no bearing upon the cost of their commodity so far as exports are concerned.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just coming to the point of my argument. The aluminum manufacturers have traded with Russia, receiving oil in return for aluminum. If we get aluminum from Great Britain, what will we receive as compensation? What will the British manufacturers of aluminum give us in return for this preference?

Mr. CAYLEY: A few moments ago the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) answering the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) made the statement that the dump duties in connection with exchange made no difference which he could see. This statement recalled to my mind an item which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of last evening. It is a despatch from Manchester, England, and reads:

The Manchester Chamber of Commerce is joining other cotton trade organizations in making representations to the Canadian tariff board concerning the Ottawa agreements and their resultant tariffs on the cotton trade.

The Manchester chamber believes reductions in the Canadian tariff already announced are unlikely to enable British cotton, artificial silk and textile exporters appreciably to increase their trade. The chamber emphasizes the importance of the earliest possible removal of the exchange rates, dumping duty and other additional taxes and to replace them all by one single straightforward tariff for each class of goods.

Mr. DONNELLY: This is another item in respect to which the British preferential and general tariff rates have not been changed, the only change being in the intermediate rate, under which there are no importations. The minister has stated that this change has been made without consulting the aluminum people, so the government must have had some other reason for taking this action. I should like to know the real reason for making this change. Was it done just to have a change, or why? No importations are coming in from the intermediate countries; they all come in under the British preferential and general tariffs. A change has been made in the intermediate rate and I should like to know what effect it will have on the trade.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member will note that the increase in the intermediate rate is two and a half per cent. Inasmuch as we have placed a duty of 30 per cent upon the raw material, we could not properly place a lower duty upon the finished article, otherwise a premium would be placed upon the importation of manufactured goods.

Mr. YOUNG: I presume the raw material is made up of aluminum in sheets, and I cannot understand why it is necessary to place a duty against that commodity. My information is that Canada is the cheapest place in the world in which to manufacture aluminum due to the fact that we have such immense water power close to tide water. Why should such an industry have a protective tariff?

Mr. RHODES: It is in conformity with the agreement arrived at to have aluminum free within the empire.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not understand.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It was suggested a short time ago by one of my hon. friends to my immediate right that I had voted in favour of all of these items and therefore I was heartily in agreement with them. It is quite true, owing to the way in which they have been brought down as part of an agreement, I have voted for all these items, just as my hon. friends have voted against every item which gave an advantage to us in the British market.

Mr. YOUNG: Name the items.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Just as they have voted against any preference, any advantage we might have in the British market. Owing to the fact that each had to defend an opposite viewpoint of one agreement, it is impossible to support one item without supporting all, or to oppose one without opposing all. Were these schedules brught down as part of a Canadian budget, if they had no further implications and were to be considered wholly upon their merits, my attitude toward them might have been different. In view of what has been done, I am in exactly the same position as are my hon. friends; I have supported some things I do not like for the sake of things which I consider offer some value. I believe we get more than we lose. There are things which, I am sure, my hon. friends, in their hearts, would like to support, but they feel they cannot swallow others. Placing one against the other, and taking all we receive and all we pay, I believe we have an advantage, and for that reason I support the agreement. That, however, does not debar me from expressing any criticism I feel like offering with respect to the part of it with which I do not agree.

Mr. POULIOT: In the columns of to-day's Ottawa Journal, I read this heading:

To aid return of prosperity across Europe.
Great Britain, France and Germany form economic alliance.

This is very serious. The item we are considering is a small one but I wonder whether the commodity that will be manufactured under this preference will be made in Germany. This is a point I brought up yesterday. It is of the utmost importance, on account of the fact, as was stated, that the re-exports of the United Kingdom amounted in 1931 to £64,000,000. Those were goods imported into Great Britain and re-exported from that country. I wonder if the government has any assurance that the goods under this item that will enjoy the British preference will be manufactured in Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member will bear in mind that the provision with respect to empire content would provide that the aluminum in question would come from Great Britain rather than from Germany.

Mr. POULIOT: Nevertheless, the excerpt which I have read shows the ingress that Great Britain has to foreign trade.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will realize that there is a large variety of items with respect to which an agreement of that character could be arranged just as there is under the Canadian tariff a large variety of items with which we could deal similarly.

Mr. POULIOT: I point this out as a matter of general principle only.

Mr. YOUNG: On several occasions during the present debate I have endeavoured as best I could to figure out what the actual applied rate would be on goods coming from Great Britain. The ministers have not seen fit to accept my figures; they have said that they could not work the matter out in this way. I should like to ask the minister on this item, 354a, kitchen or household hollow ware of aluminum, n.o.p., 20 per cent under the preferential tariff, to figure out for us, or have his officials do so,—I am sure they can —exactly what the applied rate will be on $100 worth of aluminum coming in under that item, including the exchange dumping duty.

Mr. RHODES: I shall endeavour to get that information for my hon. friend, as I have already agreed to do with the hon. member for Willow Bunch with respect to putty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend from the west is unduly alarmed about this matter. The object is to keep aluminum out and let the Canadian manufacturer get all the advantage of the 30 per cent. It is protection to the extent of 30 per cent on a household article, and it is done for the purpose of giving the Canadian manufacturer the whole of the Canadian market. My hon. friends may not have intended to do that, but it is useless to say they are going to give the British any advantage in the Canadian market with a 20 per cent duty under the British preference. The whole of this market will go to the Canadian manufacturer, and the Canadian consumer will pay the price. That is the situation as I see it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the minister tell us what the duty was on kitchen or household hollow ware of aluminum at the time the present administration came into office, and also on the following item, nickel?

Mr. RHODES: The rate of duty is the same as it was under the Dunning budget.

Mr. YOUNG: Was that an answer to my question?

Mr. RHODES: No, to that of the leader of the opposition. Did my hon. friend wish the computation now? I am sorry to say I cannot make it now.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister's officials can make it.

Mr. RHODES: My officials assure me it would take considerable time to do it.

Mr. YOUNG: Then let the item stand until we get it.

Mr. RHODES: I shall undertake to give it to my hon. friend before we move the agreement out of committee.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—355, 356. Nickel in ingots or blocks, n.o.p.; nickel bars and rods, not including bars or rods depolarized or otherwise processed for use as anodes; and nickel in strips, sheets or plates: British preferential tariff, free.

Mr. RHODES: This is a new item. It is merely for the purpose of guaranteeing free trade in nickel within the empire. Our imports last year amounted to $221,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Whence did that nickel come?

Mr. RHODES: From the United Kingdom, $37,000; from the United States, $183,000, and $1,000 from other countries.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—361. Gold and silver leaf; Dutch or schlag metal leaf; brocade and bronze powders: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were $96,000, of which $27,000 came from the United Kingdom, $39,000 from the United States and $30,000 from Germany.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—370. Rollers, copper, adapted for use in calico printing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year amounted to $88,000, of which $51,000 came from the United Kingdom and $37,000 from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the British preferential, intermediate and general tariffs, this article came in free before. Both the intermediate and general tariffs have now been increased.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend is quite correct.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—377c. Ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, slabs, billets, n.o.p., of iron or steel, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of forgings for use exclusively in the manufacture of forgings, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $3; general tariff, $3.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year amounted to $24,000, of which $3,000 came from the United Kingdom and $21,000 from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that the intermediate tariff has been raised from $2.25 to $3, and the general tariff from $2.50 to $3 per ton, making the general tariff almost prohibitive, I should say.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It should help trade with Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of National Revenue says that this ought to help trade with Great Britain. May I say that I believe every hon. member on this side of the house is desirous of trading with Great Britain to as large an extent as possible so long as we can get for our money goods of equal value in quantity and quality. But on what grounds can the Minister of National Revenue justify any government taking away from the people the right to purchase where they please with what is the fruit of their labour, whether it be manual or intellectual labour? Surely one thing a man possesses with which he has a right to do as he pleases is the fruit of his own effort, whether put forth by hand or brain. What right has any government to say that he shall not be free to get the real value, not the nominal value merely of his labour, wherever he pleases? A man is paid wages for his labour or receives a salary for intellectual and other services; that is the nominal reward, the real reward is what that money will buy. When the Minister of National Revenue says that we must buy from Britain even if we have to pay a higher price for the commodities or accept commodities of a poorer quality, it seems to me that he is asserting on behalf of the government a power which no government has the right to exercise over the people, and which cannot be defended. I should like to hear the minister's defence of taking away from the people in this manner a part of their income; for that is what he is doing. It is an arbitrary method of taking from wage and salary earners a portion of their incomes as expressed in the real commodities which they can buy with the fruits of their labour.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: If I may answer in a few words the question of the leader of the opposition, when he was leader of the government in no case where a tariff was imposed by his administration did the workmen of whom he speaks not have to pay, because the goods came in under a duty. There is nothing new about that. I did not say to the right hon. gentleman that we "must" buy from Britain, but the object of this tariff, of the items which have been considered and are afterwards to be considered, was, without wrecking any established interests, to influence trade to travel between the different countries of the empire. I think that that object has been well accomplished in what has been done. All these tariff items were not fixed by us. There were two parties to the agreement, and the other party had to be considered. They knew what they wanted, and some of the items here represent what they wanted. The charge is made in England that we got the advantage, and the charge has been made in Canada, and in this house, that they got the advantage. But it is idle to say that we are interfering with the rights of the workingman or with the privileges of the people of Canada because under this item the duty is being raised fifty cents a ton in the one case and seventy-five cents in the other. To make that contention seems almost foolish, if I may use the word. This is the point that should be considered. These items are not ours unless we agreed to them. It may be that we should not have agreed to some of them if they had not been asked for, but we acceded to them because we felt that we also were getting advantages in the agreement. The agreement, I submit, is altogether consonant with the rights of every citizen of Canada, but the trouble with my right hon. friend and those whom he leads is that they want to buy from foreign countries whenever they possibly can instead of trading, as I submit should be done, in the interests of the empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong in his last statement. But referring first of all to the comparison he made between these tariffs and the tariffs under the previous administration, may I point out that under the previous Liberal administration the tariff in Canada was lowered time and time again to afford more in the way of freedom of opportunity to purchase commodities wherever the individuals in this country might wish to purchase them, and to provide more in the way of freedom of trade. Under the present government the tariff has been increased time and time again until it has now reached prohibitive heights. It has made trade altogether impossible, and according to the Prime Minister apparently that has been done deliberately with a view of preventing trade with other countries.

The Minister of National Revenue knows he is quite wrong when he says that we on this side of the house prefer to trade with foreign countries rather than with Britain. Let me tell him that the opposite is the case. We prefer to trade with Britain, other things being equal, but we do not propose to be told that we must trade with Britain no matter how adverse an influence that trade may have on our incomes. When you reach a point in the imposition of tariffs that you no longer receive revenue from them, when the tariff becomes prohibitive to that extent, its effect is simply to prevent trading, and it becomes an income tax in another form. It means that the individual—and the smaller his income the more he will feel the tax—is no longer able to purchase with his income the same number of commodities or get the same satisfaction of his wants which he otherwise would be able to get. It simply becomes a means of increasing the cost of living all around.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would point out to the Minister of National Revenue that those of us on this side deeply resent the statement which he has made. So far as diverting trade is concerned, his own department is diverting trade right against the wishes and the desires of the government. Why is it that Japanese raw silk, which is sold at exactly the same price in New York and Yokohama, can be imported from the United States for less money than it can be imported from Yokohama? The excise tax on 100,000 yen worth of silk from Yokohama is $1,495 on the par rate of exchange of 49.85. The same shipment coming from the United States will pay an excise tax, on the current rate of exchange, 25½ cents, of $765, and the importer makes $730 by importing it from New York rather than from Yokohama. The minister knows this, and knows perfectly well also that our transportation companies lose the haulage by water from Yokohama to Vancouver, and the haulage by rail from Vancouver to Toronto and Hamilton, Sherbrooke, Galt and other places. The trade is of course credited to the United States when it is really of Japanese origin. We wish to sell wheat to Japan, and my hon. friend by his departmental ruling on exchange is diverting trade to the United States from a friendly country. Our whole policy in the Dunning budget was to divert trade to countries willing to trade with us, and it ill behooves the minister to state that hon. members on this side of the house were trying to divert trade to foreign countries.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It has been obvious to one who has had to do with the imports of Canada that there was a scurrying around to find out where, in these distressed times, goods could be obtained not at their proper value but below their value. There was an effort to bring such goods into Canada to compete with manufacturers in this country who are trying to make a living for themselves and their workmen. That is a well known fact.

Mr. MALCOLM: Was there any firm producing raw silk in Canada?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am not talking about raw silk. Probably my hon. friend understands Japanese trade; I do not know any of the details concerning the Japanese case he has mentioned. I do know, however, that the people of this country have recognized that the party led by the right hon. gentleman opposite—

Mr. MALCOLM: That has nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —were glad to trade out of Canada and out of the empire, when they could. A few cents difference in price would very soon interfere with the business being done in the interests of Canada. I state that positively, and I will take it back on no occasion, because it is a fact. What we are seeking now is trade within the empire.

Mr. MALCOLM: All right.

Mr. RYCKMAN: To say that we want to keep out the foreigner is distorting the matter. The fact is that we want to trade within the empire and also to trade with the foreigner. But, if there comes a time when we have to choose, I tell my hon. friends opposite that I am for trading within the empire, and I think the majority of people in Canada hold a similar view. I believe we can help ourselves and our fellows. That has been the purpose before the government, and that was in the minds of the delegates from all parts of the empire who were parties to these trade agreements.

Mr. POULIOT: The Prime Minister has made trade impossible, and now he is trying to correct his mistake.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the minister is so anxious to trade with Great Britain, certainly his actions belie his words. Ever since this government has been in office it has increased duties against Great Britain on commodities Great Britain could sell to us. He forgets or ignores entirely the fact that when the Liberal party was in office it was aiming at a fifty per cent preference for Great Britain. That is something the minister failed to mention. The government opposite destroyed that objective the minute they were permitted to take office destroyed it completely—and now they have the audacity to stand up in the committee and state that the Liberal party wanted only to trade with foreign countries. Hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for placing obstacles in the way of trade with Great Britain, and today the Canadian people are suffering in consequence of that very action. That is the position in which they have placed Canada, and it is to that attitude on the part of the government, reflected so definitely in these schedules, that we are objecting.

Mr. RHODES: This discussion originated out of a complaint on the part of the leader of the opposition to the effect that we had increased the duty under the general tariff by fifty cents and under the intermediate by seventy-five cents in connection with the item dealing with ingots, forgings, and so on. Let me point out to him and to the hon. member for West Edmonton, who has spoken with unusual warmth, even for him, that they are beside the mark in their statement of facts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not much.

Mr. RHODES: When the statement is made that under the Liberal regime the then government was aiming at a fifty per cent preference for Great Britain, hon. members on this side of the house are forced to the conclusion that the Liberal party must have been very bad marksmen. I have in my hand the celebrated Dunning budget, in connection with which, although it is not generally realized, there were very substantial increases in duties not only under the intermediate and general tariffs, but against Great Britain herself. Those increases were made on important items, imports which under normal conditions would involve large sums of money.

The leader of the opposition has complained, on behalf of the poor workingman, that there has been an increase of fifty cents in the general and seventy-five cents in the intermediate rates in the item I have mentioned. Let me point out to him that under item 377a of the Dunning budget respecting "blooms, cogged ingots, slabs, billets, n.o.p., sheet bars, of iron or steel, by whatever process made, n.o.p." the duty against Great Britain was increased from $1.50 to $2.50 per ton. Under the intermediate tariff the increase was from $2.25 to $4 per ton, and under the general tariff there was an increase from $2.50 to $4.50. I ask the right hon. gentleman and those associated with him how he would characterize an increase of that kind, when today he complains that we have increased the intermediate and general rates by seventy-five cents and fifty cents respectively—not by $1.75 and $2, as was the case under the Dunning budget.

Then, let us turn to item 377 of the Dunning budget, "ingots of iron or steel n.o.p. per ton" and we find that the duty of $1.50 against Great Britain was not changed. But, if you please, they increased the intermediate tariff from $2.25 to $2.50, and the general tariff from $2.50 to $3. There was an increase in that item similar to the one of which he now complains.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was done with the British preference?

Mr. RHODES: Let us now deal with subdivision (d) of item 379 in the Dunning budget. This part of the item deals with "rods, in the coil, not over .375 inch in diameter, when imported by manufacturers of wire for use exclusively in the manufacture of wire, in their own factories." Under subsection (d) the old intermediate rate was $3.50 per ton, and the rate under the Dunning budget was $4.50. The old rate under the general tariff was $3.50 and under the Dunning tariff it was raised to $5.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is not telling about the British preferential rate.

Mr. RHODES: The British preferential rate remained the same in connection with the last two items I have mentioned. I am calling attention to the fact, however, that at that time the Liberal party was increasing the duty under the intermediate and general tariff precisely as we are doing today under the item now before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One or two items is very different from one hundred and fifty items.

Mr. RHODES: But I have referred to items in the Dunning budget almost identical with the one now before this committee. The item now under consideration deals with ingots and forgings. From the Dunning budget I read an item dealing with "blooms, cogged ingots, slabs," and so on. I think it only fair to the right hon. gentleman and to the committee that I should indicate these facts, in view of his criticisms and those of his colleagues. There is a small increase under this item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the Dunning budget there were only about six items in connection with which the duty was increased.

Mr. RHODES: Eleven.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I imagine the minister is splitting some of the items. In the present instance there are over one hundred and thirty items, without splitting at all, under which the duty is increased in the intermediate and general tariffs, and a very large number in connection with which the duty is increased against Great Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister has the Dunning budget before him perhaps he would point out an item in it in which the effective rate from Great Britain was made higher than it was under the general or intermediate tariffs.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; if the hon. member will look at item 377a in the Dunning budget he will find that the preference against Great Britain had been $1.50 per ton, but under the Dunning budget it was raised to $2.50 a ton.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not the question I asked. I want to know if the minister could name an item in which the effective rate from Great Britain was raised to a point higher than the effective rate from other countries.

Mr. RHODES: I can only state the facts as I understand them. If the hon. member suggests that an increase from $1.50 to $2.50 a ton is not an effective increase, then I must say that I do not understand what an effective increase is.

Mr. YOUNG: I am speaking of comparative rates.

Mr. HEENAN: I was wondering if the minister could explain the position we are in now. Some time ago we spent many thousands of dollars, through the Department of Trade and Commerce, I think, in propagating a new creed by which school children and other citizens of Canada obligated themselves not to purchase anything but Canadian-made goods. Now we have made an agreement with another country in order that they may send goods into Canada, which we have pledged ourselves not to buy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Amend the creed.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—378. Bars and rods, of iron or steel; billets, of iron or steel, weighing less than 60 pounds per lineal yard:—

(d) Hot rolled, valued at not less than 4 cents per pound, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—378. Bars of iron or steel, hot rolled, 5 inches in diameter and larger, when imported by manufacturers of polished shafting for use in their own factories, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $7; general tariff, $7.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—378a, 378c. Sash or casement sections of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled, not punched, drilled nor further manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of metal window frames, for use in their own factories, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $7; general tariff, $7.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—380. Plates of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled:—

(a) Not more than 66 inches in width, n.o.p., per ton: British preferential tariff, $4.25; intermediate tariff, $8; general tariff, $8.

(b) More than 66 inches in width, n.o.p., per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $6; general tariff, $6.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a terrible one. The general tariff on plates of iron or steel has been increased from $7 to $8 under (a); the intermediate tariff has been increased from $6 to $8, so that both intermediate and general are placed on the same level. Then under (b) there is an increase in the general tariff from $5 to $6 and in the intermediate from $3 to $6—it is doubled—and British preference is left the same in each case. Those two items alone will serve materially to increase the cost of construction and other items that enter into general production costs and costs of living in this country.

Mr. RHODES: May I point out that the three preceding items we passed showed very substantial reductions in the British preference. Naturally they passed by without comment. I do not complain of that. In the case of the increases to which my right hon. friend has just now referred, in most instances they are relatively less than they were under the Dunning budget. There the increase in one particular item that I have in mind was from $2.50 general to $4.50, almost double, whereas in this case the increase is from $6 to $8 and $7 to $8. So the relative increase is very much less than on the item to which I have referred.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister mean to say that under the Dunning budget the rate was $2.50 and it is now $7?

Mr. RHODES: No, my hon. friend has misunderstood—

Mr. DUFF: No, I have not; I am asking a question.

Mr. RHODES: It was not on this same item. I was only comparing relative increases. I said that the increase on the item to which I referred a short time ago was from $2.50 to $4.50 general. In this case the increase, as the right hon. leader of the opposition pointed out, was from $6 to $8 and from $7 to $8. I am not dealing with the same commodity; I am only making a comparison of relative increases.

Mr. DUFF: I understand exactly what the minister is doing, but what I want to know is, on the item he was talking about what was the duty under the Dunning budget, and what is the duty under this agreement?

Mr. RHODES: The rates under the Dunning budget were $4.25, $6 and $7, and for the next item, free, $3 and $5. The rates now are $4.25, $8 and $8 as against the $4.25, $6 and $7; and free, $6 and $6 as against free, $3 and $5.

Mr. DUFF: Quite a difference.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; I was making the comparison only for the purpose of showing the relative increases. I had nothing else in mind. The imports last year under this item, of the not more than 66 inches wide amounted in all to $289,000 of which $80,000 came from the United Kingdom, $159,000 from the United States, and $50,000 from Belgium. Of the more than 66 inches wide importations were $1,560,000, of which $860,000 came from the United Kingdom, $621,000 from the United States, and $75,000 from Belgium.

Mr. YOUNG: Any produced in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: There is only one producer. We have no statistics as to the amount of his production.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Can the minister give the value per ton of items coming under these specific duties? I want to get some idea of the ad valorem rate.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. STEVENS: It would be very difficult to arrive at from any statistics we have before us, because there is variation in the sizes, the thicknesses, and the quality of the plates; and to take an average would be very misleading.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I quite appreciate that.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is it not true that the importations of this commodity last year were very low, probably only a small fraction of what they were in previous years?

Mr. RHODES: In the wider width the figure for last year was $1,560,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was calling attention to the fact that the importations were very much heavier in former years.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what struck me, that with prices as they are at present for iron and steel the duty of $4.25, $6, $7 and $8 per ton must be a very heavy ad valorem duty, and must give an almost complete monopoly to this country.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that most of this plate is worth $40 to $50 a ton, using round figures.

Mr. MALCOLM: How much would it cost freight and other charges to import a ton of this from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: I am afraid I could not answer the question; freight rates vary almost daily, as my hon. friend knows. But these heavy bulk commodities carry a very low rate. That is particularly true of ocean freight.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not think there is anything on which the minister would have been better advised to have a difference between the intermediate and general rates than on plates of iron and steel. Provided that Great Britain is given a preference so that the diversion of trade might benefit Great Britain, there is no reason why he should not make the intermediate lower than the general, to give more trading value. The importation of this steel is from Great Britain, Belgium, or the United States, I think the minister realizes that a two way tonnage can be built up via Hudson bay of cargoes of wheat to Belgium, bringing back steel plates, if industry is to develop at all in the west. I submit that in leaving both the intermediate and general tariffs at the same point the minister is handicapping himself very materially in doing any business with Belgium.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—381. Sheets of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled: (a) ·080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What were the total importations?

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports totalled $2,226,000, of which $340,000 came from the United Kingdom, $1,856,000 from the United States and $30,000 from Belgium.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This helps to illustrate the really protective intent of this particular change. The old rate was 7½ per cent, 12½ per cent and 12½ per cent, while the new rates are 7½ per cent, 20 per cent and 20 per cent. The minister just told us that the importations last year amounted to $2,226,000, of which $340,000 came from Great Britain. The rate remains the same on imports under the British preference, but is increased from 12½ per cent to 20 per cent under the general and intermediate tariffs. As the general and intermediate rates carry the bulk of the imports, and the tariff is unchanged under the British preference, the item constitutes an increase under the general and intermediate tariffs of 60 per cent. The added cost to the Canadian consumers, if the imports remained the same, would be $140,000, and to this must be added whatever extra charges may be made by the Canadian manufacturers who will now enjoy an increase of 60 per cent in their protection. This is a drastic increase made under the pretence of aiding Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend is quite right from his point of view, but if the goods come from Great Britain they pay precisely the same duty they would have paid under the old tariff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the consumers pay a good deal more.

Mr. RHODES: Not necessarily; that remains to be seen. Our views differ in that respect and time alone will tell, as my hon. friend from West Middlesex said a few moments ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should say to my hon. friend that this has been done on the part of the government with full knowledge that the dumping duties and the valuations, in the manner in which the tariff is administered at the present time, will be sufficient to shut out these imports from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: I must differ with my right hon. friend there. The arrangement is made with the agreement of our British friends, who are satisfied that they can do business under it.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the minister mean to say that this exchange dumping duty will not be collected? There is no use saying they will not have to pay duty if they come from Great Britain, so long as that duty is imposed.

Mr. RHODES: I did not say anything of the kind, as my hon. friend knows full well.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I made a request of the minister that he have his officers figure out an exact rate which would apply on item 354a, which covers household aluminum ware. I understood him to say that he would have this done during the dinner recess, and I wonder if he can give the committee the figures.

Mr. RHODES: I did not say I would have it done during the dinner recess; I said I would have it done by the officers of the Department of National Revenue before we came out of committee on this bill. It was too late to get the officers to-night, and I propose to have this information available at the next sitting of the committee.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to protest against this whole proceeding. There is no reason why this matter could not be figured out in ten minutes by the officers of the department. We are asked by the government to put into effect a tariff, and when we ask what that tariff is, they cannot tell us.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. I asked what would be the actual applied rates on certain goods coming in from Great Britain included in this tariff. The Minister of National Revenue cannot figure it out, the Minister of Finance cannot figure it out and the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot figure it out. I asked that it be figured out by the officers of the department, and I am now told that they could not do it during the dinner recess. I have tried to do it myself, but the ministers tell me I am wrong. How do they know that I am wrong? I think we have a right to this information, and if we cannot get it in any other way, then I think the committee should rise and report progress and the house should continue with other business until the information is available.

Mr. STEVENS: The manner in which my hon. friend has treated this matter in the last two or three days, and is now treating it, does not strike me as being reasonable, and I say that in a courteous way. There is no doubt that one could take a hypothetical case upon which to figure and arrive at a certain result, but that would not give anything which would be reliable or definite. There is only one way in which this matter can be dealt with to justify the placing of the reputation of government officials behind it. Let us consider kitchen and household hollow ware. In the first place, my hon. friend has not intimated whether he wants the retail, the wholesale, the export or some other price. Let us take some common factor which is capable of an accurate comparison. For the sake of illustration, let us take pig iron. Let us take the London and Pittsburgh prices quoted on a day when we can get the exchange rate in both countries—it must be remembered that the exchange rate which varies from day to day is very important. When we can get the exchange factor, we can figure from that point, but this requires a search in the journals for particulars because in no other way can you obtain an accurate comparison. I think my hon. friend has been arguing, perhaps not from false premises but from premises which are a little in error. He takes a certain amount of money and he translates that into a rate of exchange which might or might not be correct, and from that point he builds up his case. He is considering the exchange adjustment duty as though it were a penalty or a dumping duty, which it is not. What he speaks of as applying to Great Britain, applies to a score of other countries with depreciated currencies. I am taking up a little time, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that we can get away from a discussion of this matter upon every item.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. member has made a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. STEVENS: It was not made in the form of a motion.

Mr. YOUNG: I am quite willing to make such a motion.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is too good natured to do anything like that at this stage.

[Mr. Young.]

In dealing with any one of a dozen countries with depreciated currencies it is obligatory under the law that those currencies shall be considered as of a certain value. When an article enters the country the customs officer must look up the quotations on the milreis, the lira, the franc, the yen, the tael, the dollar, the pound or other currency, depending upon where the article originates. During the war, and in recent years, when exchange rates were fluctuating repeatedly, it has been and is the custom to stabilize such rates for a week or two; an artificial exchange rate is declared, otherwise it would be hopeless to ask the customs officials all over Canada to be posted upon the day to day or hour to hour rates. Sometimes these set rates may be good for a year; it depends entirely upon the fluctuations in exchange as between this and other countries. The customs officer turns to his bulletin and gets the rate of exchange, and if the article in question has come from a country with a depreciated currency, under the regulations and the statute he must impose a penalty, if my hon. friend chooses to call it such, or an exchange adjustment duty, as I prefer to call it, which brings the invoice price up to that figure. I will not say that these fluctuations occur daily in connection with all countries, but they occur often enough to prove to be a confusing factor. It would be quite fruitless for us to take an item, strike an exchange rate which we think is right, and start to figure on that basis. As an example, let us take the differential in exchange between here and the United States. If we have a 30 per cent duty against a certain article coming from the United States, when that article enters Canada the Canadian purchaser must find dollars to pay for it in addition to paying the 30 per cent duty, and for those dollars he pays 13 per cent in exchange. He pays not a 13 per cent penalty but a 13 per cent premium upon American dollars with which to pay his indebtedness. My hon. friend will see that that is a factor which must be always borne in mind. In making his calculation my hon. friend adds or subtracts, as the case may be; he takes that differential in exchange and calls it a customs duty. It is not a customs duty at all; it may have a similar effect, but it is an exchange factor due to the necessity of buying other currencies with Canadian funds. Perhaps my hon. friend will accept the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, that we take, say steel or iron or something which has a common factor where there is a world price, shall I say, in Pittsburgh or London, and figure out a comparison on certain commodities and give it to my hon. friend tomorrow. But I submit to him and to the committee: it is not profitable nor does it add to the information of the committee to raise on each item these hypothetical cases. We do not wish to be discourteous; we do not wish to say to my hon. friend each time: We do not agree with your figuring; we think you are wrong. I am quite certain the gentleman who has helped my hon. friend to do his figuring—my hon. friend will admit he has a good adviser in this—could undoubtedly figure it out quite well; but I think in some of the figures he gave he was calculating on the basis of a rate of exchange that must have been applicable a month or two ago. Therefore nothing is to be added to the arguments here or to the clarifying of matters by these more or less futile discussions over hypothetical cases.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think the problem is quite as difficult as the Minister of Trade and Commerce would seem to believe. The normal value of the pound is $4.86⅔. The government has said that it should be $4.40. The actual value fluctuates from day to day, so to avoid the difficulty my hon. friend mentions of having to take account of the fluctuations from day to day, every two weeks the department sets an average value for those two weeks. The other day, November 10, it issued this bulletin: "The average value of the pound sterling declared by the department for special duty purposes is $3.71, effective for entries during the period November 16 to 30, 1932." The actual value of the pound yesterday was $3.73 Canadian funds. The government had declared the average value for the present two weeks to be $3.71. They have also declared that the pound should be $4.40. I have been calling it an exchange dumping duty, but my hon. friend prefers to call it an exchange adjustment duty. I do not care what he calls it; it is a duty anyway; but that duty, whatever it is, shall be the difference between $4.40 and the rate they have fixed of $3.71, or sixty-nine cents. So that particular duty will be sixty-nine cents on an investment of Canadian money of $3.73. It is only a simple matter in artihmetic to figure out that that amounts to 18½ per cent. That is how I have arrived at this exchange adjustment duty, if my hon. friend prefers to call it that.

What I have been asking all along is that the minister take the ad valorem or specific rate, or both, as the case may be, based not on the invoice value of the goods in Canadian currency, but on what is declared to be the value for duty; figure that out; add to it this 18½ per cent and whatever the excise tax amounts to, and give us the total. In addition I believe there is ten per cent off the regular duty for direct shipment. That can be figured out. The arrangement the government has made for fixing every two weeks the average value of the pound in Canadian currency will avoid the difficulty of coming to an actual estimate. I do not see why we cannot have that total rate submitted to the committee in a few minutes. When we are passing these items, we have a right to know what the actual rate is going to be. I would be willing to wait until tomorrow, but by tomorrow many of these items will be through, and we want to know and have it right on the record exactly what the rate will be against Great Britain.

Mr. DONNELLY: Just before six o'clock, when we were discussing item 253, I asked the minister to tell me what duty I would actually have to pay if I bought that article in England. I wonder if he can give me the figure now.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is on precisely the same question as the hon. member for Weyburn. I have told him we cannot give that computation now, but we shall do the best we can to give it before the committee rises.

Mr. DONNELLY: I make the same protest as does the hon. member for Weyburn. I understood we were to have this at eight o'clock. It would take only a minute or two to get it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that it was difficult to arrive at prices. There should be no difficulty about that. We have the price scale of goods in England, in the United States and in different parts of the world. We can take the average price for those goods and figure out what the duty will be. In England, when they went off the pound sterling, it was believed the price of goods there would go up; on the contrary, it went down two per cent. In the meantime in the United States the price of goods has dropped about 14 per cent, so the price of goods in England, by her going off the gold standard, has been kept up by about 12 per cent. It is not very difficult to figure out what these duties should be.

The hon. member for Weyburn, in figuring this out, has neglected one factor. The pound sterling at the present time is worth something in the neighbourhood of $3.73. The government calculates the duty not on $3.73, the amount paid for the goods, or on $4.40, but on $4.86⅔, which makes the duty even higher. This should be figured out so that the committee, as we go through the items, will know the actual duty that will have to be paid on each of them. If we do this we may find that the duties on articles coming from Great Britain are higher than on articles coming from other countries.

Mr. RALSTON: I quite agree with the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for Willow Bunch. I do not see what difficulty there is in the ministers having prepared for the committee a computation which has been repeatedly given in the house and which, while it has not been challenged, at the same time has not been fairly met. It is because the country does not realize the total amount of duty which is being imposed that there is not a stronger protest against the system which is now in force in this country. The request which has been made is a reasonable one and it should be quite easy to work out the answer. I have had an opportunity more than once to do exactly the same thing in connection with various items, and unless the government is ashamed of the rate of duty which is being charged, it might at least give us the benefit of the computation which can be readily made in respect of any item. What we want is a statement from a responsible minister of the crown as to the percentage of duty actually chargeable in connection, let us say, with this particular item, at today's rate of exchange and at the current rate at which the pound is fixed. Then we shall have an idea just how much duty is being charged. Perhaps the house realizes in a general way how much duty is being imposed, but I do not think the country does and I do not believe this can be brought home to the government themselves until they take their lead pencils and figure out how much this imposition of a duty on the pound at par, when as a matter of fact the goods are being bought at, say, $3.72, means, plus the three per cent excise tax, plus, in some cases, a specific duty, plus an ad valorem duty. Then there is the special dumping duty representing the difference between the fixed rate of the pound for let us say the current two weeks and $4.40, which is the rate which has been fixed for the pound for some time. These are things which the committee ought to know and which the ministers can fairly be asked to give. There is no mystery about it at all. There is no reason why statisticians should not sit down and in fifteen minutes, if they are really serious, give us this information in connection with any one of these items.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth was not present this afternoon or he would have heard me give an undertaking, in connection with a similar question which was submitted by my hon. friend from Weyburn, and another hon. member, that before we would ask the committee to rise and report the resolution we would ask for a computation to be made in each instance by responsible officials of the department.

Mr. RALSTON: I heard my hon. friend give that undertaking tonight, but it does not assist us in getting at these figures now. I am suggesting that it could be done in ten minutes by anyone who is familiar with the matter, and there is no reason why we should have to wait till the last minute for the information.

Mr. SPOTTON: If you were here more than one day a month you would learn about it.

Mr. RALSTON: At least perhaps I am as ornamental as my hon. friend who is here all the time. I do submit, Mr. Chairman, that if my hon. friends are really serious about giving the committee the information a computation could be made in a very short time and we should not have to wait until the committee rises.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is unwilling to give the information until just before the committee rises, perhaps he will be good enough to tell the committee whether the calculation of The Economist of London in its issue of October 22, 1932, is a correct one. The Economist has prepared a special supplement dealing with the Ottawa agreements. It is a careful statement of the effect of the tariff changes, and I should like to read to my hon. friend one of the paragraphs which deals with this matter. The statement is:

> The (Canadian) tariff is, however, payable on the value of the article translated into dollars at the rate of $4.86 to the pound, and not at the actual rate of about $3.70 to the pound. In many cases this provision alone neutralizes the British preference in comparison with countries which are on the gold standard.
> In addition to the ordinary tariffs, imports into Canada are chargeable with three other taxes. The first of these is the sales tax, now at the rate of 6 per cent, which is not essentially protective, since it is also payable on home products. The second, is the special excise tax, amounting to 3 per cent, which, despite its name, is payable only on imports.

These two taxes, making a charge of 9 per cent, are levied upon the value of the imports plus the tariff which has been paid. Thus, if $100 of imports are subject to a tariff of 30 per cent, these taxes will amount to 9 per cent of $130, or $11.70.

The third of the special taxes is the dumping duty. Until recently, this duty had scarcely any effect upon United Kingdom trade, because it was most unusual for traders in this country to sell their goods in Canada at a price below that charged here. But, owing to the fact that the Canadian government fix arbitrary and different values for the exchange of pounds into dollars when calculating prices in the United Kingdom and in Canada, this duty has become a heavy charge upon British imports into Canada. Under the ordinary regulations concerning this duty if an imported article is offered for sale in Canada at a price less than its "fair market value" in the country of origin, a duty equal to the difference between these prices is payable. At the present time (i.e., the period October 16 to 31, 1932) the value of the pound is declared fixed at $3.82 for the purpose of calculating the selling price of British goods in Canada; but for the purpose of determining "fair market value" in the United Kingdom the pound is at present fixed at $4.40. Hence, at the rates now in operation, if the price of an article in pounds is identical here and in Canada, it is still necessary to pay a dumping duty amounting to 58 cents for every pound of the value.

This duty in particular has met with much opposition from Canadian importers of British goods, and even before Ottawa expectations had arisen that it would be reduced. These expectations themselves at the present time are an additional barrier to British trade, because they lead importers to delay buying stocks from the United Kingdom pending a reduction, with the consequence that, when orders have to be executed at short notice, they frequently go to the United States.

I think that that is an exact statement of the situation with which it purports to deal. If in any particular it is wrong, will some member of the ministry please so inform the committee?

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the committee that members are here to give their own opinions and not to quote editorials. I did not want to stop the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was quoting, Mr. Chairman, the calculation of a recognized financial journal of the highest standing with respect to the effect of these new duties upon trade.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee will understand that it is easy to get the opinion of any man, but members are here to express their own opinions.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not always easy to get an opinion, Mr. Chairman, because we have been trying in vain all day to get the ministry to give an opinion and make a calculation. Now when we have the opinion of an expert economist, why should we not be allowed to hear it?

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is always happy to hear the opinions of the hon. member for Willow Bunch, but quoting from books and editorials is absolutely out of order.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman has read an extract from The Economist. Naturally one attaches a very great deal of weight to anything that appears in The Economist, which is a very reliable journal, and I am not going to call in question the statements it makes except in certain particulars. What is being overlooked in all these discussions is this: Take liquor, for instance. These duties are not applicable to liquor at all. Or take articles not made in Canada—and there are many items in our tariff schedules dealing with that class, far more perhaps than is generally realized. They are classified as goods of a class or kind not made in Canada, and the special duty does not apply to them. It is not as simple as some seem to think to pick out a tariff item at random and state what is the rate on it. The matter is complicated, but there is no mystery about it. Nearly everyone knows just what the nature of these taxes is. There are two phases: One is the imposition of duties, and the other is the meeting of an emergency in the differentiation of currency values. That is an entirely different matter, and that must be borne in mind. It does not matter what our views may be on currency and exchange, and I submit this to my friends to my extreme right; the fact remains that currency is a problem apart and distinct from customs and excise duties, and must be so treated. I do not know whether it would be of any help to indicate what is the usual course pursued with respect to a given article which is actually dutiable, and let me make clear that this special duty does not apply to all articles.

The value of the pound for customs duty purposes is figured at $4.86⅔, and by the way, it must be borne in mind that these duties are based upon the application of that rate. Then there is the question: Is the article dutiable or not? Is it subject to the special dump, so called? I will use that term because it is familiar, although I object to it. Assuming that it is subject to the special dump, then we come to the point where the pound is fixed at $4.40. I pause to interject this: That is not an amount that was arrived at in a haphazard way, not by any means; after the most careful calculations by the best experts which the government has in its service computations were made after Great Britain had gone off the gold standard of the rise that had taken place in commodity values in Great Britain over a certain period, and the rise was estimated at about ten per cent. If you take approximately 10 per cent off $4.86⅔ you have about $4.40. That is not precise, but it is approximate. Then we take the current rate of exchange, which happens to be at this time about $3.71 in Canadian funds, so that we have a difference, as the hon. member indicated a moment ago, of sixty-nine cents. That is the amount of the special exchange adjustment duty that is imposed. Let us remember that if we are dealing with an article under import, that is the proper amount. Then we compute the three per cent excise, which is a revenue tax, and then the sales tax is computed. I suggest, however, that it is not fair—and I say to my right hon. friend that this is another exception I take—it is not fair and just to say that you take three per cent and six per cent, making nine per cent, and figure it on $1.30, which is $1 plus 30 per cent duty, and that the result is a little over 11 per cent. That is not fair, because the six per cent sales tax is applicable to Canadian goods as well.

Mr. YOUNG: We are not counting sales tax.

Mr. STEVENS: The sales tax should be eliminated from all these calculations.

Mr. RALSTON: Except that the sales tax is applicable on $4.86⅔, when as a matter of fact the goods have cost only $3.72.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but there again we get into the realm of differentiation of exchange. I agree with my hon. friend that the computation is made on $4.86⅔, but again I say I must make some allowance for the difference in the value of currencies. We do not wish to penalize Canadian industry and Canadian production, and it certainly would not be fair to disregard the difference in currency values. I hope the committee appreciates that this matter is not as simple as it seems, and that one cannot take a hypothetical case and reach a satisfactory solution. If on a certain day we take a given import from Great Britain and compare it with an import from the United States or some other part of the world on the same day, then we can make a comparison between the British preferential, the intermediate and the general rates as the case may be. But it certainly is not as simple as it appears, and we do not feel that we should be called upon merely to do some rapid calculation on hypothetical cases. That is what I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, who by the way, was not here this afternoon or yesterday when this matter was discussed so often. He must grant this, that sometimes we become a little weary of reiteration. I say to him and to his colleagues that to-morrow we will endeavour to bring in some comparative cases which we believe will be informative and accurate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the minister will concede that the very circumstances he has mentioned are the reasons why, at this time at least, we should not have further difficulties placed in the way of getting goods from Great Britain. We have been told that the purpose of the agreement is to further inter-imperial trade. We have been told by the Prime Minister that the agreements are to prevent trade with other countries. In view of all that has been said, it is becoming increasingly apparent that the agreements are not going to help inter-imperial trade to any extent. I doubt very much whether there will be a greater tendency to trade within the empire than is evidenced by the information contained on the lead pencil I have in my hand. This article would indicate where the government is making certain of its purchases at a time it is stressing trade with Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: Purchased three years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not. This is a lead pencil bearing the notation "40 H.B. Government of Canada", and the United States is indicated as the country of origin.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did not your government do the same thing?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they did not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He could not get a pencil that is not made in the United States.

Mr. BOURASSA: I cannot understand the position taken by hon. members on this side of the house. For three weeks they have been denouncing—and I denounced with them—these treaties as obstacles in our world trade. We stated that they would have the effect of forcing us to trade too closely within the empire. The argument put forward by the minister is quite sound; and, holding the views I expressed in opposition to the agreements, I consider that these dispositions, the effect of which is to decrease the difference between duties exacted on British goods and those exacted on foreign goods, tend to correct the defect in those treaties which we have denounced. Apparently, the difference between the duties levied on British goods and those levied on foreign goods is not quite as large as would appear from the schedules. Therefore I approve of those dispositions for the same reasons I have denounced the treaty.

Mr. RALSTON: I was not in the house yesterday, and judging by what has happened this evening it would not seem that I had missed much because, as I understand it, we are still at the stage where we are asking the government to furnish a simple computation with regard to duties. The hon. member for Labelle, who has just taken his seat, has just given his reason for supporting the government in the present instance. The reason other hon. members and I object is that it imposes undue taxation upon the people of Canada. If hon. members opposite would look across the line to the United States where, I suppose, there is some commercial intelligence, they would find that notwithstanding the change in exchange, the dump duty which is applied against sterling here has not been applied so far as the United States is concerned. Therefore we must conclude that this is an invention of the Canadian government against goods from Great Britain. We might as well settle down to that. At this time we are asking for only a simple arithmetical computation as to the amount of duty chargeable in connection with a few articles. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that that information will be furnished tomorrow. That is different from the statement made by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that it would be furnished tonight before the committee rose.

Mr. RHODES: No, before the committee reported the bill.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the Minister of Finance said it would be supplied before the committee rose. At any rate we are confronted with the same difficulty all the way through the schedule. I submit that for the benefit of the government as well as of the committee we must, and ought to have the information which has been asked for. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will see to it that the computation is made, and that a certain number of examples are set forth. I believe such information would show in a striking way the taxes being imposed upon the people of Canada by way of duties.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not carried. The minister has given reasons why the government does not care to make the computations for which I have asked. They would not like to risk the reputation of any of the experts in government departments. They suggest hasty computations are unfair, and perhaps we cannot blame them. But I have no such reputation at stake, and I am willing to make a computation. If I am wrong, perhaps the ministers opposite will put me right. I have made a computation of what the actual applied rate will go on one British pound sterling worth of goods described in item 354a as kitchen or household hollowware of aluminum. It figures out like this: The quoted rate here from Great Britain is 20 per cent. That will be applied on $4.86⅔ although the goods only cost $3.73 Canadian. This 20 per cent on $4.86 is equal to 26 per cent on $3.73; that would be the ad valorem rate. There is a ten per cent reduction if the goods are shipped direct to Canada, which would leave it 23·4 per cent. Then the special excise tax of 3 per cent, which is in reality a duty, will be based on $1·234 or 3·7 per cent. The exchange adjustment duty —my hon. friend preferred to call it by that name rather than exchange dumping duty— will be 18·5 per cent, making 45·6 per cent. In addition to that we have a portion of the 6 per cent sales tax. So my estimate is that the actual charges applied against a British shipment of these goods would be 47 per cent or more. If I am wrong, let the experts of the department say so. But I make this offer to the minister; I am willing to drop this whole matter until all these items are through the committee if the minister will promise that when we get into ways and means he will furnish us with another column to this schedule showing the actual applied rate, all things included, on all goods coming from within the British Empire.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the hon. gentleman would have more influence with this house if he had had the courage to go a little further. Why doesn't he move that this item be struck out?

Mr. YOUNG: That would require a lot of courage.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, which you haven't got. The arrangement is either beneficial or it is not; that is logical, isn't it? If it is beneficial, it should pass; if it is not, those who are opposed to it should have the courage to oppose it to the extent of moving that it be struck out. Will the hon. member who has just sat down do that?

Mr. YOUNG: I would do that in a minute if the chairman would not rule it out of order.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McGIBBON: I will yield the floor to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in order that he may have an opportunity to do that.

Mr. DONNELLY: This treaty is signed and is supposed to be in effect, yet we are sitting here trying to find out what the treaty is and we are unable to do so. The public is anxious to find out what it is, and no one seems to know. How can we tell whether it is good or bad? We have been endeavouring for the last two days to find out something as to the rates of duty we have to pay. Unless we know something about it we just have to take a pig in poke.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am still waiting to hear from the hon. member for Weyburn.

An hon. MEMBER: You are too late; the item is carried.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It seems to me that the time of this committee will be saved by doing what has been suggested. I think the ministers in charge of this tariff are sufficiently reasonable not to ask the committee to pass the items without knowing what they really mean, yet that is what is being done. Is it the admission of the minister that the tariff as now sought to be passed is so complicated, so involved, so intricate, that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce with their advisers, cannot tell us offhand what the actual tariff is of which we are now asked to approve?

Mr. GEARY: It is shown in the agreement.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows perfectly well just what the tariff is in connection with any one commodity dealt with in these schedules. It is as clear as the noonday sun. The only question that arises is the mathematical and technical computation which has to be made by the trained officials of the Department of National Revenue, who have to deal with numerous factors, many of them variable from day to day, such as the price of the goods themselves, and the exchange. I have told my hon. friend, as I told the committee before, that I would endeavour, before we rise from committee, to have a number of typical instances worked out, following the inquiries made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and brought to the committee, dealing with the duty on a given day on the basis of a given rate of exchange. I submit that that is a fair answer. It would be utterly impossible for us to attempt here to figure out complicated duties with all these variable factors on a given item on the spur of the moment. The duties themselves in their terms are known to my hon. friend; their application in individual instances is subject to the factors of which I have spoken.

Mr. RALSTON: There is only one variable factor, isn't there—the rate of exchange on a given day?

Mr. RHODES: No, there are several variable factors. There is the question whether the goods are subject to excise duty. If they are, they are not subject to the so-called dump. And if they are of a class or kind not made in Canada they are excepted. So there must be technical knowledge with respect to the individual items in every instance. The question is not as simple as the hon. gentlemen would suggest it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Can the minister inform the committee how many of these types of goods are included in the items we are discussing, that is, not subject to excise tax and not made in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: There is one item alone, respecting chemicals and drugs, which covers every known drug or chemical used in Canada but not made in Canada. That illustrates the difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the committee is entitled to that information. If we cannot get it today perhaps we could have it to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. RHODES: As I have pointed out, we will endeavour to get the information. But hon. gentlemen realize that with respect to any one of these questions they could, by going to the Department of National Revenue, obtain the information much more readily than they can under these circumstances. We cannot be expected to be prepared to give information of that kind offhand. But I assure hon. gentlemen that we will not press the committee to pass this until we have satisfied their reasonable curiosity.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Trade and Commerce disputes assertions made in The Economist as read by my right hon. leader——

Mr. RHODES: I am not calling in question the fairness of the suggestion, neither am I offering any objection to the inquiries submitted. All I say is that we cannot give this information offhand.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is it not a fact that customs officers are making these computations every day at the different ports in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, on instructions from the Department of National Revenue dealing with the variable factors of which I have spoken.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wonder how the customs officials work out these duties at the various ports of entry. Do they take as long as this to do it?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend does not seem to realize that in this matter the Department of Finance is not the administrative department; it comes under the Department of National Revenue. We have not the information in our department; it must be obtained from the Department of National Revenue in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister not admit that we as members of this committee who are asked to pass these items are entitled in every case to know exactly what we are doing and what duties we are imposing?

Mr. RHODES: Having heard the arguments of my hon. friend I would say that he is in dire need of a good deal of information, and it will be my endeavour to satisfy his curiosity so far as that may be possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One point was raised by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario which I think should be dealt with at once. The hon. member asked why someone on this side did not move to reduce or strike out one or other of the different items. May I say that if we refrain from such a course it is because we do not want to make a mere pretence of doing something which we know cannot be done in the circumstances. The Prime Minister has made it perfectly clear that this agreement is to go through exactly as it has been framed, and for us to move to reduce any item would be to simply pretend we were doing something which we all know will not be done. We desire to make it perfectly clear, however, what is the significance of these increases in duty.

Mr. RHODES: I take no exception whatever to the statement just made by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He has accurately stated the position, and I have nothing to add.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Customs tariff—381a. Sheets of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled, with silicon content of ·075 per cent or more, when imported by manufacturers of electrical apparatus, for use in the manufacture of electrical apparatus in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we taking only the one item now? We might take the next three items together.

Mr. RHODES: In the schedule to the bill my right hon. friend will see that there is only the one item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is hoop steel, hot or cold rolled, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN: No, we are dealing with item ex 381a.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to this item I see an increase from 12½ per cent to 20 per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs, while the British preference remains the same. I also observe that the total importations last year amounted to about $2,225,000, and that of this total only about $340,000 came from Great Britain. Here we have a tariff increase of about 60 per cent which will cost the Canadian consumer about $140,000 more on this one item alone.

Mr. RHODES: No, my hon. friend is entirely in error. If he will look at item 386p in the votes and proceedings he will observe that there is no change in the duty under either the intermediate or the general tariff. We have reduced the British preference from 7½ per cent to free.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we are talking about different items.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—382a. Hoop steel, hot or cold rolled, plain or coated, ·064 inch or less in thickness, not more than 3 inches in width, when imported by manufacturers of barrels or kegs or by manufacturers of flat hoops for barrels and kegs, for use exclusively in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This is a new item entirely. We have not disturbed the duty under either the intermediate or general tariffs; we have simply removed the present preference rate of 7½ per cent and placed these goods on the free list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We must be on the wrong item.

Mr. STEVENS: Look at item 386q.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is comparing a different item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The chairman called item 382a.

Mr. RHODES: This is a new item, taken out of item 386q, or perhaps I should reverse my figures. May I suggest to hon. gentlemen that if they would use the bill instead of the votes and proceedings we might escape some confusion.

Mr. MALCOLM: There are two items bearing the same number.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the bill there is an item ex 382a.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course hon. gentlemen will understand that when "ex" is used it means that the item is lifted out of item 382. When it goes into the votes and proceedings it must be a new item, and there it will be found as item 386q.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Take page 16 of schedule E, and take item ex 382a. It is shown here with the proposed rates free, 12½ per cent and 12½ per cent. What were the old rates?

Mr. RHODES: They were 7½ per cent, 12½ per cent and 12½ per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then take the next item, which is also ex 382a, with the rates at 7½ per cent, 15 per cent and 15 per cent. What were the old rates?

Mr. RHODES: The old rates were 7½ per cent, 12½ per cent and 12½ per cent. That item has not been called yet.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that in the votes and proceedings we will find these all under one item. What is his explanation now, after the Minister of Finance has said there are two different items?

Mr. MALCOLM: The fact of the matter is that the items are described in the bill not by their proper numbers but by the numbers of the previous items from which they were taken.

Mr. SANDERSON: Are these goods manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: May I ask my hon. friend to which item he refers?

Mr. SANDERSON: Item ex 382a and the following items, at the top of page 16.

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am asking the minister; he will answer.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. CANTLEY: I thought you were looking for information.

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that there is no hot rolled strip steel manufactured in Canada.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister hesitates; is he absolutely sure of that?

Mr. RHODES: My officials inform me that I am correct. I submitted the question to them before I gave the answer to the committee.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then were any representations made by the iron and steel interests of Canada with regard to these items?

Mr. RHODES: There was a joint agreement on the part of the iron and steel producers of the empire, who met at Montreal, in which they concurred in the proposals contained in these items.

Mr. SANDERSON: A joint agreement between whom?

Mr. RHODES: Between the iron and steel producers of the empire.

Mr. SANDERSON: Including, of course, the iron and steel producers of Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: And that joint conclusion was recommended to the government? Are these items the result of that agreement?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it was recommended to the government and adopted in the main by the government.

Mr. SANDERSON: And the government readily fell in with the recommendation?

Mr. RHODES: No. In some cases the government changed entirely the recommendations, but with respect to the items in question my hon. friend will see that in the main we have reduced the preference from a stated percentage to free. I was dealing not with the whole list of submissions but with these particular items.

Mr. SANDERSON: In the main the government coincided with and agreed to the recommendations of the iron and steel interests of Canada in connection with these items?

Mr. RHODES: In the main the government accepted the views of the iron and steel interests of the empire, including Canada; some of the recommendations were rejected.

Mr. SANDERSON: Did the government make any investigation in connection with the iron and steel industry before they came to their conclusion, or did they just take the recommendation of the iron and steel interests?

An hon. MEMBER: Rot.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. member had better keep quiet.

Mr. RHODES: I might say that the whole schedule was revised in 1930 and the government was in possession of considerable information. It was only in the light of the information which they had that the government came to the decision it did at the conference.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has pointed out that all these items are not manufactured in Canada. What were the importations from the United Kingdom and other sources?

Mr. RHODES: Under the heading of hot rolled, narrow steels, the imports last year were valued at $256,000, of which $13,000 came from the United Kingdom, $205,000 from the United States, $19,000 from Belgium and $14,000 from Germany.

Mr. VALLANCE: This change would have a tendency to transfer the trade with foreign countries to the mother country. At the time the representations were made to the government by the iron and steel industries, were the consumers also heard?

Mr. RHODES: It would be impossible to consult the consumers unless we covered the whole of Canada, individual by individual. I can hardly conceive of that being necessary, inasmuch as we have placed these commodities upon the free list and in practically all instances removed the duties hitherto obtaining under the British preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not on the free list.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is it fair to assume that the government raised the intermediate and general rates from 7½ to 12½ per cent upon the recommendation of the iron and steel interests of Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Not necessarily. I have told my hon. friend that in the main we accepted the agreement arrived at between empire producers, but it by no means follows that in the case of an individual item the specific rates in question were those which were recommended at the time. All I can say is that the items as they appear now were those which were finally agreed to by the representatives of Canada and the mother country.

Mr. SANDERSON: I think it is fair to assume that the government lent very attentive ears to the iron and steel industries of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: In the case of the item in question, the largest consumer in Canada was present and was agreeable to the proposal.

Mr. YOUNG: Were all the secondary manufacturers who use these commodities represented?

Mr. RHODES: I would not undertake to say that all the secondary consumers were present, but I would say that the interests affected were reasonably represented.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Dominion Bridge Company?

Mr. YOUNG: A secondary manufacturer who consumes large quantities of this commodity and is interested in its production might not be negligent with respect to his own interests in acceding to these duties. We should like to know whether the secondary manufacturers, the real consumers of these commodities, were represented by their association, we will say.

Mr. RHODES: Do I understand that my hon. friend objects to the placing of a number of these items upon the free list?

Mr. YOUNG: I just want to get at the facts. Certain manufacturers are consumers of this article and they will be affected by the change. In some instances the rates have been increased under the intermediate and general tariffs. Are these manufacturers who are affected by this increase being granted compensation by way of increases in other items?

Mr. RHODES: It may be that there are other increases, but at the moment my hon. friend is taking objection to an item in which there is an increase of only 2½ per cent in the intermediate and general rates.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are we discussing both the items numbered 382a, or just one?

The CHAIRMAN: I really do not know.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has stated that the rates are free, 12½ and 12½. If we are discussing only the first item, I have nothing further to say, but I notice that the second item carries the rates 7½, 15 and 15. If we are discussing both items together, the minister's information is hardly correct.

Mr. RHODES: It was requested that I give the imports last year in connection with this particular item. I stated that the only change in this item was an increase of 2½ per cent in the intermediate and general rates, but my reference to the free list applied only to the first item.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell us who are the users of this commodity, and just where we will find the item in this schedule in which they are interested and from which they will receive a compensation for the increased duty they are to pay?

Mr. RHODES: It is quite impossible to answer in detail the question asked by my hon. friend. I might say that the item second removed from this one carries an increase in the intermediate and general rates which may have the effect of improving the condition of the consumers to which my hon. friend refers. There is no change made under the British preferential.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has stated that the largest consumer of this particular article was consulted and was agreeable to the change, but I should like to have it made clear just who he has in mind in referring to the "consumer." There are consumers and consumers. Let us assume, for example, that this steel and so forth is required for bridge building. I suppose the last consumer would be according to my hon. friend's reasoning, the company that does the construction work on the bridge. If that be the case, I should like to point out that there is a consumer beyond that company, the ultimate consumer, who has to pay for the bridge; that includes those who cross and pay tolls and the like. I can understand the government permitting the iron and steel industry to divide up the British Empire amongst themselves and arrange what will be one man's finished product will be another's raw material, but to arrive at what will be paid by the consumer and taxpayer, in the last analysis we have to go as far as the users of the commodities. According to what the minister has told us, I am afraid all the government has done is to make things easy in the manufacturing line, but to arrange matters so that the actual burden will fall on the real consumer, who is the last man to pay.

Mr. RHODES: To answer the last part of my right hon. friend's question, I think his position is ill-founded, certainly with respect to the preceding item, because the ultimate consumer cannot be affected if the goods come in free as they do now. Let us take the present item. My right hon. friend has in mind structural steel as used in bridge building. If an attempt were made to build a bridge with the materials that come in under this item, it would be unsafe for my right hon. friend to travel across it, even on foot. This is steel .080 inch or less in thickness. It is thin strip steel. When I said "consumer," I meant the immediate consumer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was referring to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. RHODES: The ultimate consumer is always the one who must pay in the end, but if the immediate consumer gets a commodity cheaper, presumably the ultimate consumer will get his commodity cheaper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not if you make a monopoly of the industry in the meantime.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—382a. Band steel, hot rolled, ·080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This next item has reference to precisely the same type of commodity, except that it is slightly thicker. The imports of this class of goods last year amounted in all to $235,000, of which $1,000 worth came from the United Kingdom, $213,000 from the United States, and $20,000 from Belgium.

Mr. DUFF: How much is manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Some of this thicker variety, I am informed, would almost come up to bar steel, and bar steel is produced in Canada; but I am told by my technical advisers there is no possibility of segregating the amounts, so far as our trade figures are concerned, to indicate the amount produced in Canada last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me point out the real significance of this change. Under the old rates the British preferential was 7½ per cent. It remains at 7½ per cent. Under this tariff the general tariff is increased from 12½ per cent to 15 per cent, and the intermediate tariff is increased from 12½ per cent to 15 per cent. In other words, the British preferential is left just where it was and the duty is raised against other countries, thus giving more in the nature of a monoply to the manufacturing industry in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I think my right hon. friend has inadvertently confused his items. He is speaking now of item 382b, band steel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, item 382a.

Mr. RHODES: I thought we had just passed that, and the figures I gave were with respect to the second one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has quite unintentionally overlooked the second item; his eye has caught the first one.

Mr. RHODES: I gave the figure for both. I announced just now that the item I referred to was the companion item and had to do with the thicker class of sheet steel, and I was giving my figures with respect to 382b. In the case of 382b the original rate was $4.25 British preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not yet on 382b.

Mr. RHODES: I thought 382b had been passed and I gave the figures with respect to 382b.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister will look at the bill, he will see that there are two items 382a, side by side. My hon. friend, each time he has spoken, has let his eye fall on the first one where the British preference is free, and we on this side, who are watching the interest of the consumer, are looking at the second one where the rate is 7½ per cent British preferential. I do not know why they should both be under the same item, but they are. The second one ought to be called 382a2, or something of that sort.

Mr. RHODES: They are derived from the same old item, but in one case we put the British preferential free and in the other it remains at 7½ per cent. I am sorry I was confused in my figures. I thought we had passed on to 382b.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I direct the attention of the minister to this: the beginning of 382a is:

Hoop steel, hot or cold rolled, plain or coated, ·064 inch or less in thickness.

Then 382a in the second instance says:

—·080 inch or less in thickness.

They are the same thing.

Mr. RHODES: No, they are not; they are of different thickness and are used for entirely different purposes. One is cooperage steel and the other is used for a different purpose.

Mr. HEENAN: Can the minister tell me now what percentage of the material that goes into this United Kingdom material is from the United Kingdom and what percentage comes from foreign countries?

Mr. RHODES: It will have to qualify under the empire content, otherwise it cannot come under the British preferential. My hon. friend knows the empire content is not less than fifty per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister did not catch my question. I realize the qualification is fifty per cent. The question I asked was this: Can the minister give us information as to what percentage of the material that goes into United Kingdom commodities comes from the United Kingdom and what percentage comes from foreign countries?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give my hon. friend that information. It would have to be dealt with in each individual case in the Department of National Revenue; it is an administrative matter. I have no such figures with respect to any one of these commodities.

Mr. HEENAN: I am sure the ministry must have thought of this when they were discussing the agreements with the British Empire delegates. Can he tell me the rate of wages paid in the industries in the United Kingdom and the hours the men work in those industries?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have under my hand no data which I could use to enlighten my hon. friend. It would be a very difficult and complex matter to follow one commodity through several industries with the many employees they have. I have not the computation.

Mr. HEENAN: The reason I ask the question at this time is this: I know the Prime Minister refused to have the advice of men acquainted with labour, on labour matters at the conference. This is about the only government participating in the conference that did not have a man acquainted with labour matters as an adviser. Inasmuch as we have been discussing on some of the items, especially on article 21, the question of conditions of employment, I was wondering whether the minister had inquired into the conditions under which these commodities are manufactured so far as labouring men in Great Britain are concerned, also as to the conditions of labour prevailing in the countries from which Great Britain derives some of her raw materials. At an economic conference one would naturally expect economic questions of this character to be considered. It might also have been considered opportune to discuss the conditions under which these materials are manufactured in Canada, the hours of labour and wages of Canadian workingmen. I felt that all these matters should have been gone into at the economic conference, and I am sorry to hear from the minister that they were not considered.

Mr. RHODES: In answer to my hon. friend, if I can answer his observations, I would say in the first place that no question has been raised by labour anywhere, so far as I am aware, with respect to the hours of labour arising out of these conference agreements. Surely my hon. friend does not suggest that we in Canada should take a certain attitude with respect to what Great Britain should do with respect to hours of labour in industry and other matters which are entirely within the purview of the British parliament. Unless my hon. friend is prepared to take that position I cannot see the bearing of his remarks at the moment.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would point out to the minister that steel, for instance, is being treated as an empire industry, and I submit that in the case of an industry which you are standardizing as such the question of wages and working conditions might very well be gone into.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall that question be discussed on this item?

Mr. HEENAN: That is just the attitude of the government, Mr. Chairman, that labour questions ought not to be discussed in connection with this agreement.

The CHAIRMAN: They might better be discussed on the second or third reading of the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: We are interested, Mr. Chairman, in the question of labour content with respect to this item. The government evidently took notice of the labour content and labour conditions in Russia because they have repeatedly pointed out that it is their intention to shut out imports from countries which have a lower living scale than Canada. If we are going to permit the importation of empire commodities half of the labour content of which comes from foreign countries, surely we ought to take this question of labour content into consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: This item as well as any other gives us an opportunity to ask the government whether any discussion took place or any understanding was arrived at that advantage shall not be taken of the preference by the British manufacturer to increase the price to the consumer of goods not manufactured in Canada and coming in free under the British preference, and heavily taxed when imported from foreign countries. The ministers will remember that there is a provision in the Customs Tariff, which the government considers is of some use, to prevent an increase of price under the shadow of the tariff wall. Is the same thing to apply to British goods coming in either free or at a comparatively low rate of duty as compared with the duty on the same goods from foreign countries?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not sure that I got my hon. friend's question quite right, as it was rather a long one. I think it was to this effect: Were there discussions at the conference regarding the adjustment as between different parts of the empire having regard to labour conditions in different parts of the empire?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not speaking of labour conditions but of the cost to the consumer of goods which are coming in free under the British preference or at a low rate of duty and on which a heavy duty is charged against foreign countries. Is there any provision or understanding whereby the British producer will be penalized if he puts up his price to the Canadian consumer under the protection of the tariff wall imposed against the foreigner?

Mr. STEVENS: No, not so far as there is any specific reference to it in the agreement. It will be obvious, I think, to all of us that should such a thing happen the value of the preference would be dissipated to the extent to which the abuse was perpetrated. Further, there is always the question of competition within Canada. There may be goods not made in Canada, to which, of course, that would not apply. But if my hon. friend asks if there is anything specifically provided in this agreement to deal with that situation I would say no, other than the declarations of general principle contained in the various articles that we shall come to after this article is passed, and where this question I think might more properly be discussed.

Mr. RALSTON: This item gives me the opportunity to ask the question, but I am willing to defer the discussion if the minister wishes. The government felt there was some virtue in putting a section in the Customs Tariff whereby when producers of goods took advantage of the duty so as to maintain or increase prices to the consumer the duty can be wiped off. Is that correct?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend makes that statement as though it applied to all goods exported from Canada, but it applies only to a limited number of items—copper, lead, zinc, wheat and so forth.

Mr. RALSTON: I find I have not made myself clear. I am saying that in the Customs Tariff there is a provision to the effect that in the event of a producer taking advantage of any duty imposed under the act to increase the price of his goods to the consumer or to maintain prices at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to the general economic conditions in the country, the governor in council is empowered to remove such duty. That is provided in section 17 of the Customs Tariff as enacted in 1931. We have provided at least so far as the Canadian manufacturer is concerned that the consumer shall be protected against exploitation behind a tariff wall. That is what the government said they were trying to do, though some of us had a good deal of doubt about the efficacy of the provision; but let us assume that it is efficacious and that the consumer is protected against the Canadian manufacturer. Why should he not be protected in the same way against the British manufacturer who now is entitled to have his goods come in free or at a rate substantially lower than the rate imposed against the foreign manufacturer?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no corresponding provision in this agreement so far as I know.

Mr. RALSTON: Does not the government think that there should be? Can there be any reason why we should attempt to protect the Canadian consumer against an increase by the Canadian manufacturer and not do exactly the same thing as against the British manufacturer, especially when, as I am reminded by my leader, they are given a monopoly? Take this very item. The Minister of Finance said that at least one large consumer had been heard. I happen to have a consumer in my constituency, a manufacturer of fish barrels, who uses a very large quantity of this stuff. Is there any provision in the Canadian tariff law or in the arrangements under the trade agreements which will enable the government to penalize a British manufacturer if he charges, let us say a ten per cent instead of a 7½ per cent increase on the goods which he produces for a certain consumer? Against the foreign consumer there is 12½ per cent duty, and against the British manufacturer there is only 7½ per cent, making a spread of 5 per cent. Let us assume the British manufacturer says: "I can go up to 10 per cent, because the American has to pay 12½ per cent." Is there anything to prevent his doing that, with the result that the Canadian consumer my constituent, would not get the benefit of the five per cent duty and the spread between the British preferential and general rates?

Mr. STEVENS: Precisely that which has always existed, the well recognized principle of competition in trade. My hon. friend knows very well that this parliament is not likely to be asked to legislate to penalize a foreign manufacturer for any given act. But we have the open competition in trade, and in the item to which my hon. friend has just made reference there is free entry under the British preferential tariff.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is 7½ per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: To which item are you referring?

Mr. RALSTON: To item 382a.

Mr. STEVENS: The British preferential rate under item 382a is free.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two items with that number; I am referring to the second one.

Mr. RHODES: The argument presented by my hon. friend in connection with the cooper in his constituency falls to the ground, because, under the former tariff, the British preferential rate was 7½ per cent and the intermediate and general rates 12½ per cent. Today the intermediate and general rates are 12½ per cent, and the British article comes in free.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that.

Mr. RHODES: How does he suggest that his cooperage friend in Yarmouth will be penalized by having to pay a higher price to a British producer?

Mr. RALSTON: Probably I have been very stupid in making my presentation. I am asking my hon. friend the simple question: How is the manufacturer in Yarmouth, Shelburne, or any importer of goods from Great Britain going to get the benefit of reduced duties unless there is some provision in the tariff to provide that if the British manufacturer puts up his price, let us say, 10 per cent, you may deprive him of the benefit of the duty as was done in the case of the Canadian manufacturer I mentioned. Surely that is a simple question. I am not asking what the duty was before; I am saying that this government has adopted the principle of protecting the consumer against possible exploitation. Having done that, have they done it with regard to goods coming into Canada from the British manufacturer when the goods are not manufactured in Canada at all? The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been talking about competition. The statement has already been made that there is no competition in Canada for this particular article because the American manufacturer cannot bring his goods in unless he pays a duty of 12½ per cent. Then, the British manufacturer has all the way from nothing up to 12½ per cent to work on. Is there anything to prevent the British manufacturer from adding 10 per cent to his price because he has a protection of 12½ per cent against the world?

The CHAIRMAN: That item is passed. We are on the second item 382a, concerning band steel, hot rolled, etc.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure hon. members opposite will realize that it is difficult to confine one's remarks to one item. There happened to be two items with the number 382a. I find no fault with that, but I do not think the chairman should confine us too closely to one or to the other, so long as we use one for the purpose of discussion.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot follow my hon. friend's argument. If he wishes to protect his cooper down in Yarmouth against a preference contained in this trade treaty, the only alternative I can suggest is that we put the duty back to 7½ per cent and leave him as he was, under the tender care of my hon. friend. I make that statement with all due deference. How does he expect the government to be able to follow the question whether a cooper down in Yarmouth, buying a few strips of cooperage steel, will know that he is paying a price which represents the fair market value? Surely my hon. friend wants to compare equal things. He knows that there are in the treaty provisions to the effect that with respect to some commodities we must compete at world prices. He knows that there is a world price in wheat, copper, zinc and lead. But certainly there is not a world price or a world market for cooperage steel, particularly when it comes down to such a small amount as would be required by the gentleman to whom my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. RALSTON: I must say I find it equally difficult to follow the minister. The government has said in respect of Canadian made goods that they can follow the price of an article on which a tariff is imposed, that they will see to it that the consumer is not exploited, that they will prevent the use of the tariff for the purpose of maintaining or increasing duties to the consumer. Now the Minister of Finance tells us that he cannot follow that down to the consumer. That was exactly the reason for section 17 which was put in in 1931. There is no question that this government said they could follow the price to the consumer, and that they could find out whether or not a manufacturer was using the tariff for the purpose of increasing his price. Does section 17 mean anything at all?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend's argument would have force if we were putting on a duty, but as a matter of fact we are taking off a duty and putting the article on the free list. For that reason I cannot follow him at all.

Mr. RALSTON: I am calling my hon. friend's attention to a new principle which was introduced into the Canadian tariff last year and which was received with great acclaim by hon. members opposite. The Prime Minister boasted of it a great deal. The effect was that although the government was going to raise duties they would protect the consumer. I am pointing out that the government are now creating in Canada an absolute monopoly for British empire producers on this particular brand of steel. There is the difference between free and 12½ per cent in favour of the British producer. The foreign producer has no chance at all. Having given that monopoly will the minister be as careful to see that the consumer is not exploited as he said he would be to see that the Canadian manufacturer does not exploit the consumer, by putting on the penalty of imposing a duty in case advantage is taken of the 12½ per cent rate? It seems to me that is a fair question and the minister ought to answer it.

Mr. RHODES: I understand it all right, but I am not attempting in a multitude of words to discuss my understanding for the purpose of burying the real kernel of the matter. Surely my hon. friend does not suggest that a duty of 12½ per cent creates a monopoly in Canada. If he does, I can only say that for years he supported tariffs of 30 to 35 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: You cannot get away with that.

Mr. RHODES: If a 12½ per cent duty creates a monopoly, what does a 30 per cent duty create?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is not the point.

Mr. RHODES: I will not submit to the suggestion that because my hon. friend lays down the premise that a 12½ per cent duty creates a monopoly, it therefore does. I do not subscribe to that at all.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this any check on the British manufacturer? We have no manufacturers of this commodity in Canada; therefore there are only two places from which it can come, namely, the world in general and the British Empire in particular.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion is out of order because the item has been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Take the next item; the same matter comes up again.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—382a. Band steel, hot rolled, ·080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall make my point on this item; it will do me just as well. Here we have a case where the British preference was previously 7½ per cent, and still remains that way. But we have the intermediate and general tariffs increased from 12 per cent to 15 per cent. That means that we are giving to the British manufacturer a spread or a shelter of 7½ per cent. In view of the principle which was laid down for Canadian manufacturers and to which the government subscribed, I am asking my hon. friend if the government have considered, or will consider, or if they have made any arrangement whereby, if the British manufacturer instead of simply bringing in his goods at the regular reasonable price, plus 7½ per cent, puts on another 2½ per cent, or another 5 per cent, but still manages to come in under his American competitor—whether the minister will take into consideration the striking out of the duty which really protects the British manufacturer?

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend thinks I am going to place myself in the position of stating that this government will police the prices of individual commodities and pursue them in small units down to the last consumer, I may say to him that he is entirely mistaken. The only answer that I propose to give is that if the British producer does not sell the commodity at a reasonable price he cannot expect to get the business or to keep it.

Mr. RALSTON: He has a shelter of 7½ per cent to enable him to do it. If my hon. friend means he is not going to police the price to the consumer then I take it to be true that section 17 of the Customs Tariff means nothing; he is not going to police the price so far as the Canadian manufacturer is concerned, therefore the protection we supposedly had is gone.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 382b. Band steel, hot rolled, more than ·080 inch in thickness, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, $4 per ton; intermediate tariff, $8 per ton; general tariff, $8 per ton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How much is imported from Great Britain, and what are the total imports?

Mr. RHODES: I gave the figures some time ago but was mistaken as to the item. The total import amounted to $235,000, of which $1,000 came from the United Kingdom, $213,000 from the United States, and $20,000 from Belgium.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister give the average value of this commodity, so that we know what the specific duty would be as an ad valorem duty?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that the ordinary commercial forms would run between $35 and $40 a ton.

Mr. MALCOLM: This class of steel is rolled in Canada, is it not?

Mr. RHODES: To a certain limited extent; if it is thick enough to be a bar it may be produced in Canada, but in the thinner forms I am told that it is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): According to the minister's own figures, only $1,000 worth was imported from Great Britain, which would be about 18 tons. There is a preference to Great Britain of 25 cents a ton, so that the total preference would be $4.50. When you study the figures and find that of total imports of $235,000 only $1,000 came from Great Britain, and then observe the change in the intermediate from $6 to $8 per ton and in the general from $7 to $8, it is a tremendous increase.

Mr. RHODES: This is one of the items upon which the British representatives laid particular stress, and apparently they were quite satisfied.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But on the basis of last year's imports it gives them a preference of only $4.50 on the total.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but they have the preference as against $8 in the intermediate and $8 in the general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Finance keeps talking about the British representatives being satisfied. I should think they ought to be, and I should think the Canadian manufacturers ought to be satisfied, because together they have been given a monopoly of the British empire on iron and steel—that is what it means. They could not ask for much more. But why does the minister not speak in terms of the Canadian consumers, the people of Canada who have to buy these materials and who use the articles into which in part they enter? No item could better illustrate what I have been pointing out. that under the pretext of doing something for British trade the present administration is really seeking to raise tariffs to create monopolies for special interests in the British Empire, and to exclude the foreigner. Let me illustrate. The present British preference on this item, $4.25 per ton, has been lowered to $4. Twenty-five cents per ton is the extent of the reduction in favour of Great Britain. Look at what has taken place in the matter of tariff increase. The general tariff has been increased from $7 to $8 per ton and the intermediate from $6 to $8 per ton, an increase of $1 and $2 respectively, and there is a reduction of only 25 cents in the British preferential rate. As was pointed out, only 18 tons came into Canada from Great Britain in an entire year; all the rest were entered under the intermediate or general tariff. Nothing could make it clearer that the whole purpose is to help privileged interests in the monopoly which has been given them by the government.

Mr. RHODES: I take exception to my right hon. friend's attempting to place us in the position of having forgotten the consumer. We have not for one moment lost sight of the consumer. But when I replied to the hon. gentleman opposite by saying that this is an item in which the British government took particular interest, and that they were satisfied when they entered into the agreement, I was dealing with it only in respect to the agreement. My right hon. friend suggests that to offer a reduction of 25 cents a ton is a very small concession. Let me say that if it is only 25 cents, it is 25 cents lower than was provided by my hon. friends in the Dunning budget, which he lauds so frequently. Furthermore, when he criticizes the increase in the intermediate tariff by $2 and in the general tariff by $1, may I point out that these increases are far smaller than those given in the items I mentioned this afternoon from the Dunning budget. It does not lie in the mouth of my right hon. friend, therefore, to criticize these items. I assure my hon. friends that it is my hope that the consumers in Canada will derive substantial benefit as a result—

An hon. MEMBER: Of the extra prices they have to pay.

Mr. RHODES: —of the benefits which will accrue to them in the working out of these agreements, in the prices of various commodities.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think, however, the Minister of Finance will admit that this whole discussion has arisen largely on account of his original statement that manufacturers of steel in Canada and Great Britain met and discussed and decided which items could best be made in Canada and which could best be made in the United Kingdom. In other words the whole business of the empire was divided among the manufacturers in the empire. The rate on this particular class of steel was $4.25 per ton under the previous budget, and the spread between the British preferential rate and the intermediate rate was $1.75. So the only preference the British manufacturer was given in this market was $1.75. He could not raise his price more than $1.75 without coming into competition with Belgium and the United States. The minister must see that, this agreement being for five years, and it being stated that the differential must be maintained, the British manufacturer who has been given the trade in this specific item, apparently by common consent, can if he so chooses, and if the minister does not wish to take advantage of his power under section 17 of the Customs Tariff, ride up to $1.50 or $2 a ton more than normal price, because the market is his. If the goods were made in Canada to any substantial extent, which the minister says they are not, of course Canadian competition might control the price. The minister has given us the figures, and none of this steel came into Canada from Great Britain under the existing tariff of $4.25 as against $6 intermediate, while $213,000 worth came in from the United States, and $20,000 from Belgium. The spread which is now created between $4 and $8 must of necessity be used, or there will be no diversion of this trade from the United States to Great Britain. If the British manufacturers could not get the business with a spread of $1.75, they naturally would ask for a greater preference. The minister has given them a $4 preference. There is nothing in this act, unless as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), says, the government take full advantage of section 17 of the Customs Tariff; to prevent the British manufacturers from riding as close to the cost from Belgium or the United States as possible. Then we ask, is the minister going to take advantage of section 17 of the act, which the Prime Minister said he will use to control the prices of the Canadian manufacturer? That is the question. You have apportioned certain items to British industries by common consent; you have agreed that the trade in certain classes of hoop and band steel and cold rolled steel which are not made in Canada in large quantities shall be given to the British manufacturer. That is splendid, if he can get the goods at world prices. But what is to prevent the abuse of the $4 preference? Is there anything in the act? Is the government going to take advantage of section 17? That is what we are asking the minister.

Mr. RHODES: I told my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), a little while ago that there was a limited quantity of this material produced in Canada in thicknesses that approximate bar steel. There is nothing to prevent Canadian manufacturers from producing—

Mr. MALCOLM: Nothing except the limited market.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. But he can be very sure that if there is an attempt on the part of the British manufacturer to ride up, as he says, to the height which the increased preference gives him he will find competition arising on the part of the Canadian producer. It is not long since I heard my hon. friend discuss the question of protection along general lines, and I must say that in large measure I subscribe to his point of view. He pointed out that the most dangerous thing that could be done would be to have a tariff too high, which would create that fierce competition. I am not saying this tariff is that high; I am not in a position to say that, but certainly if it is at a profitable height he will find that the Canadian producer will create that competition which will take care of any such condition which might arise.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think the minister will agree that when I made the remarks to which he refers I did say that when fierce competition existed the result was monopoly. We are at that point now in the steel industry, because my hon. friend admits the meeting of all the manufacturers of steel in the British Empire for the purpose of dividing the market in this country.

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am only taking the statement of the minister, who said the empire steel men did have a conference and did divide up the market. That may work to the benefit of the consumer if we get world prices, but the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth complimented the minister and the government on section 17 of the Customs Tariff, by which the government said they would not allow the consumer to be exploited. I think section 17 of the act does provide a remedy, provided the government wish to put it into effect, whether the exploitation be by monopoly or otherwise. But the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has a right to point out that if the Canadian manufaucturer is to be regulated by that section, when a certain line of business is given to the British manufacturer that manufacturer should also be regulated by the same section. I think that is the point.

Mr. RHODES: I can only give one answer to my hon. friend, and it may not satisfy him. Let me assure him that as far as I am concerned personally I am prepared to stand or fall, as to the merits of this agreement, by the acid test of whether, in its working out, a situation such as he refers to will arise.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—382c. Strip steel, cold rolled or cold drawn, ·080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This is the same material, except that it is cold rolled. Last year the importations under this item were valued at $284,000, of which $18,000 came from the United Kingdom, $235,000 from the United States and $12,000 from Sweden.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the Canadian production under this item?

Mr. RHODES: There is only one producer in Canada; the production is not separately classified, and I cannot give the figures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this the steel from which skates are made?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that certain very fine qualities of steel coming under this specification would make skates.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, the situation is that after this schedule is put into force there will be no importations from Great Britain. There are practically no importations from Great Britain now, as the figures given by the minister show, and with these duties in force it will be practically impossible for that class of steel to be brought in from the United Kingdom. The importations will continue from the United States. Some, however, will be produced in Canada; one company in Canada is making this kind of steel now. By the imposition of this additional protection against United States competition, and a degree of protection against British competition which makes importations impracticable, that company hopes to increase its sale of this steel in the Dominion of Canada. I am credibly informed by those who know that the result will be an additional heavy burden upon the skate manufacturers.

The criticism of the schedule that readily suggests itself to any member of this committee is that when you get schedules arrived at by agreement between primary manufacturers of steel products without taking into account the interests of the secondary manufacturers, you get a result such as we have in this schedule. It does not stop there, of course; it goes on to the ultimate consumer. I am not acquainted with the steel business; if the minister can point out any respect in which my predictions are not based upon fact I shall be very glad to have the explanation, but that is the story as I get it from those who should know.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from Pictou has had a wide experience in steel, and he tells me that skates are not made from cold rolled steel. But whether or not that is so is beside the question so far as the argument of my hon. friend is concerned. I am prepared to deal with that argument on its merits so far as I can. In connection with the export of skates, the skate manufacturer receives a 40 per cent drawback, even in connection with home consumption. Assuming that the manufacturer purchases in the United States the amount of steel necessary, the amount involved would be only six-tenths of five per cent, so I do not think the fears of my hon. friend will be realized in practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where does the minister get the five per cent?

Mr. RHODES: The general tariff is increased from 15 per cent to 20 per cent, so that the addition will be only six-tenths of five per cent. I do not think for a moment that this will have the alarming result which my hon. friend apparently foresees.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. CANTLEY: My hon. friend from Hants-Kings has a little knowledge which leads him astray. I rolled thousands of tons of skate steel for the skate manufacturing company in Dartmouth, and I have yet to learn that any considerable quantity of the skates made there are made from cold rolled steel. As the minister pointed out, under the tariff the difference is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am amply repaid for my interest in this particular item by having got the hon. member for Pictou upon his feet. Despite the fact that he has at times gone out of his way to make some very harsh remarks about myself, I have always paid him the tribute of being the outstanding authority on the steel business in this house. I would like to point out to the hon. member and to the minister that before I made any remarks about skate steel I asked the minister if the steel mentioned in this particular item went into the manufacture of skates and he replied that that was true to some extent. The argument I made was predicated upon that statement, not upon any alleged knowledge on my part of the steel or skate business. If there is another item in this tariff covering steel for this purpose, then the argument I made in reference to this item will apply to it.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever the number of the item is, there has been an increase in the intermediate and general rates from 15 to about 20 per cent, and a preservation of the British preferential rate at about 7½ per cent. The argument which I have made has not been shaken in the slightest degree by the somewhat acid observations of the hon. member for Pictou or by the remarks of the minister. My argument is that when you get a division of the territory and the formation of a tariff schedule by the manufacturers of primary steel products in this country and Great Britain it is inevitable that the secondary manufacturers and, of course, the ultimate consumer, will have to pay an increased price. You will have injustices, you will have monopolies, you will have bad results all along the line.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—383. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel:

(a) Coated with tin, of a class or kind not made in Canada, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

(b) Coated with tin, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.
(c) Coated with zinc, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister give the value of the importations under these three items, and the Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: Under 383(a), the imports last year were valued at $33,000, of which $27,000 came from the United Kingdom and $6,000 from the United States. There was no Canadian production as this is of a class or kind not made in Canada. The imports under 383(b) last year were valued at $3,252,000, of which $3,046,000 came from the United Kingdom and $206,000 from the United States.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is ordinary tinplate.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the production in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: There is only one producer in Canada and we have no statistics of his production.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister any idea of the number of employees and the value of the tonnage produced?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give my hon. friend any figures. The only producer of this article is a branch of a large industry in the United States, the United States Steel Corporation, at Ojibway.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that the production is very small compared with the importations.

Mr. RHODES: I have no figures, so I cannot enlighten my hon. friend. Under 383 (c), the imports last year were valued at $915,000, of which $541,000 came from the United Kingdom, and $365,000 from the United States. The production in Canada was valued at $4,180,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I intend to refer particularly to 383 (b), coated with tin, n.o.p. I am not absolutely sure but I believe this is the commodity out of which most of the cans for canned goods are made.

Mr. STEVENS: Ordinary tin-plate.

Mr. RALSTON: I would point out to the committee that the changes in this item serve to emphasize the point which I have been trying to make and which has been made most effectively by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), namely, that an opportunity is now being given to the British manufacturer to take advantage of a spread of 20 per cent. This can be added to his cost of production which will increase the price to the Canadian consumer under the guise of an imperial preference. I submit that this item indicates the absolute necessity of the government taking some steps—I think this might be done under the statute—to see that the Canadian consumer is not penalized by these changes. As the hon. member for North Bruce has said, the British manufacturer can ride along behind this 20 per cent tariff and add 17½ per cent or 18 per cent to his cost price, which even with the freight and other expenses will enable him to undersell goods from the United States. I submit that this is a striking illustration of how the cost to the consumer can be increased. This article is used extensively all over the country by fruit canners, fish canners and those engaged generally in the canning industry.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has again asserted this doctrine in connection with this item, but there is a very definite and I think conclusive answer to his fears. As he states, tin-plate is used very largely in the canning of fish, fruits and vegetables, and lobsters and salmon.

Mr. RALSTON: Lobsters are supposed to be fish.

Mr. STEVENS: I will pause here to give my hon. friend the benefit of the knowledge of a student in Oxford university. He was asked what a lobster was and he said it was an animal, that it was red and that it went backwards. The professor said that that was a very good answer only it was not an animal, it did not go backwards and it was not red. I might apply that to the argument of my hon. friend, but that is just an aside. The fact is that tin-plate is used I think most extensively in the canning of salmon, then in the canning of lobsters and then in the canning of fruits and vegetables. A very large proportion of these canned products are exported, in which case there is a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid as well as a drawback of the alleged or so-called dump duty. I trust that this information will dispel the fears of my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: How does a drawback apply when the article comes in free?

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to importations under duty. In the case of Great Britain where the so-called dump or, as I prefer to call it, exchange adjustment duty applies—

Mr. YOUNG: Is there a drawback on that?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: This is an exchange adjustment duty, as my hon. friend prefers to call it, but I have been pointing out the difference between free and 20 per cent. There is no rebate when the article comes in free from Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: But my hon. friend surely sees the force of my answer.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: They can import the cans from the United States and get the 99 per cent drawback.

Mr. RALSTON: What I am pointing out is this: if the British manufacturer adds 7½ per cent to his price nobody gets a refund.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not my point. Whether they get it in free or from the United States at 20 per cent, it makes no difference, because they get 99 per cent drawback on the portions exported.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister tell me the amount of production of the plant at Ojibway?

Mr. STEVENS: Yesterday, when my hon. friend was not present, that point was fully discussed. Under the practice followed by all governments in the disclosure of statistics, it has never been the custom to disclose statistics where only one firm is involved. The question is one of fairness.

Mr. RALSTON: It is very nice to be missed, and I am glad my hon. friend takes note when I am away; my absence evidently makes a difference. I am, however, glad to be present tonight. My hon. friend is unable to give me the amount of production at Ojibway?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, for the reason stated.

Mr. RALSTON: Apart from exportation, a very large amount of canned goods is consumed in Canada by Canadians and they are being subjected to what I have been pointing out, namely, this possibility of advantage being taken of the 20 per cent duty against foreign tin-plate in favour of the British manufacturer. I still urge upon my hon. friend as strongly as I can the necessity for protecting the consumer in this particular instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just by way of supplementing what the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said a few minutes ago about the possibility of the British manufacturer taking advantage of the changes in the schedule to increase the price to Canadian consumers, would the minister kindly note this point: let us take item 383:

This commodity is not made in Canada; it has to come from Britain. Under the British preference it is free at the present time and it was free formerly, but whereas the intermediate and general rates were formerly only five per cent, they have now been raised to 15 per cent. What is to prevent the British manufacturer from immediately increasing his prices to the extent of the difference between the five per cent and the 15 per cent or increasing his price to the 15 per cent limit? There is nothing whatever to prevent him from doing that. The point, however, which I want to bring out at the moment, and which I do not think has been brought out as yet, makes the situation even worse. It is this: Under this agreement we have tied ourselves to abide for five years by the increased price which may be levied. What applies to this item applies to every case where there is a margin of preference. In other words, once the British manufacturer has seen his chance of increasing his price and has shoved it up to the limit of his opportunity, not only is there no redress by way of taking from him any benefit he may derive from any duty, because the item is free under the British preference; he actually can laugh at the Canadian government and people and say: Your government has agreed that you will be bound for five years by the margin of preference which has been fixed and you cannot alter that margin. And that margin in this case would give him 15 per cent, which is the rate under general and intermediate tariffs.

Let us take the next part of the item: "(b) Coated with tin, n.o.p." This is free under the British preference, and the rate under both intermediate and general tariffs is to be 20 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that for five years to come we cannot change the duty; we are in honour bound to maintain it. They cannot deny that the British manufacturer may immediately raise his price right up to the point where he begins to feel competition from abroad over either the general or intermediate tariff, because they are now made the same. Then when a protest comes from the Canadian government or the consumers generally, he will simply answer: We told you all about this matter; this is part of the arrangement; you left it to those of us who wished to make an empire monopoly of the iron and steel industry to carve the thing up in the way which would suit ourselves best; then you introduced legislation which would implement what we suggested in a manner which would make it binding upon Canada for the next five years. This is very serious. What I am pointing out is true of every single item in this entire tariff schedule where the rate is free so far as the British preferential is concerned and where there is a certain rate of duty for the intermediate and general tariffs and only as a lesser degree wherever a preference is given.

Mr. STEVENS: Every word, every argument that the right hon. gentleman has made now and for the last few hours on this point was applicable during all the years past when he was in office and when previous governments were in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How could that be? The tariff is now 15 per cent when it was formerly five per cent, and the government have tied us up for five years.

Mr. STEVENS: These rates have been in effect for ten, twenty years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They could be changed each year; they might have been changed any year.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman says in effect that where you have a spread between the British preferential and the intermediate of 10, 15, or 20 per cent, there is a danger of the British manufacturer taking full advantage of that and penalizing the Canadian consumer. That has applied ever since 1897 when the British preference was introduced; it applied then just as much as it does now. It applies to a much greater extent, I might say, under the Dunning budget.

Let me come specifically to the two items with which the right hon. gentleman has been dealing. The first item:

Coated with tin, of a class or kind not made in Canada.

This is free from Great Britain and 15 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs. The facts are these: there are twelve or more companies in Great Britain rolling that class of commodity. There are five large concerns, all competitors in this market. This has been going on for years. It is true that we have increased the intermediate and general tariffs under this item to 15 per cent, but you can take the next item where the spread for years has been more than 15 per cent, and nothing has been said about it. The possibility does not arise any more now than it did then. You have first the fact of competition; that is one thing. Let us take the second item to which my right hon. friend refers and about which he is very much alarmed. Previously the rates were: British preferential, 7½ per cent; intermediate, 12 per cent, and general, 15 per cent. We have taken off the 7½ per cent and made it free so as to let British competitive business enter Canada free. Now my right hon. friend says that what will happen is that these iniquitous British manufacturers will take advantage of the full amount of the tariff up to 20 per cent. I am reminded that this steel business, as I have already intimated, is the most heavily competitive business there is in Great Britain.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is more competitive than coal?

Mr. STEVENS: I would say it is equally competitive.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is the situation with regard to coal? One concern in Canada has all the business.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it has not. I was talking this afternoon to one of the biggest coal producers in England who is here on business, who markets his coal through other sources than the one at which my hon. friend has hinted. But, coming back to the iron and steel business, I do not think I need hesitate to give the name of an authority. I refer to Mr. Frater Taylor, who is one of the most competent authorities in Great Britain, a gentleman formerly resident in this country. I was talking to him a few months ago and he described to me the competitive nature of the iron and steel business of Great Britain. In fact, it has been so competitive that it has driven a great deal of the British business off the world market because of its internal competition, the cutting of prices and the ruination of some of the plants. Now, many of these plants and industries are improving under present conditions that obtain in Great Britain; their export business is improving considerably, and I can assure the right hon. gentleman and the committee we shall have here ample competition to obviate any fear that may arise in my right hon. friend's mind on account of the present rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one knows better than my hon. friend that the whole trend of business has been towards consolidations and combinations, and nothing leads to combinations and consolidations more than tariffs. We have never heretofore had anything comparable to this attempt to create an empire monopoly in a particular industry. While there may have been at the time the conference was meeting here competition between certain concerns in one industry in Britain, after these gentlemen had all met together around one table and had agreed what they were going to do, there was no guarantee that that element of competition was going to be maintained to the same degree for the next five years. The minister says that it has not happened before that advantage has been taken of the tariff to raise prices to the extent that we are now raising the tariff, and for the reason that there has always been hanging over the heads of those concerned the certainty or the probability that in cases of the kind at the very next session of parliament the tariffs would be changed, and there has also been authority in our own tariff whereby when combinations do exist and enhance prices the government may take the initiative in lowering or removing the tariff duties. The government have told us the way in which they intend to protect Canadian consumers when they find that advantage is being taken of the tariff. They are going to alter the tariff. But that remedy cannot apply with respect to the commodities in this schedule, because there is no tariff to remove. That is the serious part of it, and not only is there no tariff to remove, but what is more serious still the government have tied themselves and the country into a position where no action can be taken for five years to come. In the normal way parliament would act by impliedly threatening these gentlemen that if they attempted monopolistic prices or the undue raising of prices the tariffs would be lowered. That is no longer possible. I do not wonder that we have been told over and over again that these British representatives went home pleased with what they had accomplished. They ought to be mighty well pleased, for they not only got a monopoly for five years, but a monopoly in such a form that they can put their prices up just to the point at which the tariff stands and have it maintained there.

It will also be observed that these tariff duties have been materially raised over the former tariffs. The former tariff of 5 per cent has been raised to 15 per cent in one instance, and in another instance the tariff of 12½ per cent has been raised to 20 per cent. You now have the position in regard to two classes of commodities coming in under this very item that they will come in in each instance free of duty under the British preference, and this parliament is bound for the next five years not to remove the duty on the general tariff, which in one case is as high as 15 per cent and in the other 20 per cent, against all the other countries of the world, and then no matter how much advantage may be taken by British manufacturers of that protective feature to raise their prices. I do not believe that anything could possibly be worse.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have been listening with intense interest to learn something about the steel industry. I notice that one question in respect to one of these items has not been answered in spite of the extensive and intensive discussion. I think it is 383. It is that item under which the importation is almost wholly from Great Britain, over $1,000,000, the importations from other countries being so small and insignificant that they might well be ignored. The question I wanted to ask was why have the intermediate and general tariffs been raised substantially on this item? It could not have been to divert trade to Great Britain, because Great Britain already has practically the whole trade. Why were the intermediate and general tariffs raised unless it was for the purpose of permitting a price increase, as was suggested by the leader of the opposition and his friends? While listening to the discussion with a great deal of sympathy, I was sorry that that point was not answered and no explanation given.

Mr. STEVENS: Up until about a year ago Great Britain had lost its tin-plate industry to the United States. It is a long and complicated story and I am not going into it in any detail, but during the past year Great Britain has been winning that business back. It is one of those items on which we can do Great Britain a distinct benefit and our own consumers certainly no harm, because I have been in close touch myself during the last few months with the big consumers of tin-plate in this country—the canners—and I assure the committee that the canners of Canada are delighted to have this tin-plate coming in free from Great Britain. Great Britain is capable of supplying this market, and this is one of the big pieces of trade we can give to her, a trade which historically has been Britain's, but which through circumstances which I shall not now analyze she lost three or four years ago to the United States. We believe that by this action, this trade may be kept to Great Britain. I assure the committee that there is no need to fear that the tin-plate manufacturers will penalize this market.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not think it is necessary for me to assure the minister that I was asking purely for information, and I certainly hope the result will be what it should be. The placing of any article on the free list certainly should not raise the price. My only curiosity was as to why the question was not answered and why the intermediate and general tariffs should be raised when Great Britain already had the entire trade. I gather it is to guard against the possibility in coming years of some foreign manufacturers flooding our market with these goods at unfair prices and thus putting the British manufacturer out of business. I hope that that is the reason, and that the effect of these new duties will be as we all hope it will be, to lower prices to the consumer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, have we passed item 383, paragraph (c)?

Mr. STEVENS: We took them all together.

Mr. RHODES: They were all called together, but there is no objection to further discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one feature common to all these last six items we have been discussing, and that is that in every case the intermediate tariff has been made the same as the general tariff. I need not read them all, as they appear in the schedule attached to the bill, but in all of these cases the intermediate has been made the same as the general tariff, although as the tariff previously stood that was the case in only two of these six items. The effect of that is that while we have tied ourselves to maintain these high rates for five years we are also making it impossible in that period of time to benefit by the difference between the intermediate and general tariffs in negotiating an arrangement with any other country which might help to offset the ill effects of the monopoly which is being created in this manner. The more one probes into this thing the more vicious it appears at every turn. It could not possibly be worse.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—385. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of rust, acid or heat resisting steels, hot rolled, valued at not less than five cents per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am in entire agreement with the leader of the opposition on the point he last raised. In my opinion it is the worst feature of these schedules that we have destroyed the intermediate tariff by making it equal to the general tariff, and to the extent that we have done this in all these items we have destroyed our power to receive and retain special treatment from other countries in return. To my mind that is a very unfortunate feature.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the hon. member has said applies not only to this item, but to sixty or more of them.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am not speaking of only six items, but of all the items in the agreement.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Item 386 is next.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, 385a.

Mr. STEVENS: Please follow the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): We have now reached item 386.

Customs tariff—386. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, as hereunder defined, under regulations prescribed by the minister:—

(a) Plates, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture or repair of the pressure parts of boilers, pulp digesters, steam accumulators and vessels for the refining of oil, in their own factories, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $5; general tariff, $5.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I shall read subsection (m) later.

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports under this item were valued at $184,000. Of that amount $41,000 worth came from the United Kingdom and $142,000 worth from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were all free before; why was the change made?

Mr. RHODES: To give a preference. This was an item upon which Great Britain laid particular stress.

Mr. POULIOT: My remarks will be very brief, because I am speaking on a matter of principle. Now that there is a change of government in the United States why should we alienate the good will of our neighbours?

Mr. ROBINSON: How about the Hawley-Smoot tariff?

Mr. POULIOT: The Hawley-Smoot tariff was passed by the administration which the Prime Minister, with his scheme of waterways, has tried to support. Perhaps he was the best canvasser outside the United States for the Hoover administration. Now that that administration has been defeated we have to view matters from another angle. I am sorry to speak in that way, but as a Canadian it is my duty to do so. We are sorry to see trade continually decreasing, and for the sake of the people of Canada who are in very bad circumstances on account of decreased trade, I make these few remarks. Are we to continue our trade decrease? That is the whole matter. I believe it is my duty to voice a protest, in the hope that better times will follow in due course.

Mr. RHODES: With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata, may I point out that it is hardly correct to say that there has been a change of government in the United States. True, there has been an election, but so far there has been no change of government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But, like this government, it will change very soon.

Mr. RHODES: If there is one country in the world which has always taken the stand —and I am not finding fault with it—that tariffs are matters peculiarly of their own concern, it is the United States. I am sure it is the last country in the world which could take exception to any tariff legislation we may wish to pass, whether it affects them directly or indirectly.

Mr. POULIOT: To a certain extent I agree with what the minister has said. To his comments concerning the actual administration of the United States I cannot take exception. But every one in this country and in the world knows that President Hoover started a tariff war, and his example was followed by European countries. His experiment proved to be detrimental to Canada, nevertheless we know that his endorser in this part of the world was the Prime Minister of Canada.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Is the hon. member speaking to the item in question?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, I think I am, and I shall state why: I am speaking of the effect a certain policy has had on the trade of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Vicious protection.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, as the hon. member has said, it has been a policy of vicious protection. The important point is that we are on the wrong road. Extreme protection was originated by President Hoover. He took that course because he believed himself to be one of the saviours of the world.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I do not think the hon. member is directing his remarks to item 386. Is he coming to it?

Mr. POULIOT: No, I am not coming to it; I am adding to it. I am against it. I cannot see what beneficial results can accrue from this change in tariff. I am speaking generally, and have chosen to make some statements on this item. I should like to express my views in the matter once and for all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I am thankful to hear the hon. members applaud, because it proves that they are listening. If they will listen I shall try to convert them, although I realize I have a very difficult task. I desire only to refer to some of the results of the movement towards general increase in tariffs which gained momentum three or four years ago. At that time President Hoover said he was protecting everybody; in fact he used the same language that our Prime Minister used afterward. What has been the result? There has been a depression in the United States and, under a similar policy, a depression in Canada, which is becoming worse from day to day. This is my protest, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that you will record or register it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether in the resolutions which he has placed before the house there are items which do not appear in schedule E of the bill, but which relate to the matter we are now discussing?

Mr. RHODES: The items do not relate to the agreement as such, but they make the necessary adjustments in view of the fact that certain items have been split up and others have been taken out of the general list. They are what might be termed consequential items, and are introduced to bring our tariff in line with the conference alterations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In item 386 as it appears in the bill there are two special items, namely (a) and (m). The part marked (m) is subdivided into parts (i) and (ii). In the resolutions which my hon. friend laid on the table there are, in addition, items 386 (p) and 386 (q) which do not appear in schedule E to the agreement. Do I understand from him that these last two are simply what he terms consequential or readjusting items?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. As a matter of fact the particular items to which the right hon. gentleman has referred have been dealt with previously tonight.

Mr. MALCOLM: What is meant by the expression "under regulations prescribed by the minister" as it appears in the main part of item 386?

Mr. RHODES: That wording is in the parent item at the present time. Its purpose is to enable the Minister of National Revenue to impose regulations should he deem it necessary so to do.

Mr. MALCOLM: What regulations would be needed in connection with this item that are not needed in others?

Mr. RHODES: These regulations are laid down prescribing the method of entry and the declaration forms which are necessary in respect of goods for particular use. This is a matter concerning administration with which I am not personally very familiar, but I am told the practice has been followed for several years.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does it apply to other items?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, to quite a number of them.

Mr. MALCOLM: It seems rather strange.

Mr. RHODES: No; this is not new, it was in the old item.

Mr. MALCOLM: While the minister's explanation is fairly satisfactory I hardly see why it should be in here and not in some other comparable items. Item (a) of 386 would appear to me to be almost a repair item, dealing with:

(a) Plates, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture or repair of the pressure parts of boilers, pulp digesters, steam accumulators and vessels for the refining of oil, in their own factories.

Free from Great Britain. I may be mistaken, but I should judge that for the type of oil refining and paper manufacturing machinery for which these plates may be imported free from Great Britain, but are dutiable to the extent of $5 a ton from the United States, they would always come from the people in the United States who made the original machines. The minister pointed out that the sum total of imports of this class was only $114,000, and that practically all of it came from the United States. The item has been free in all columns until the present. I hardly think this change is going to be of any great help to British manufacturers. I think the manufacturers who have to import these plates to repair machinery will just pay the tax of $5 a ton.

Mr. RHODES: These two items are taken from the parent item No. 386 in our tariff, which reads as follows:

Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, as hereunder defined, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

That is the heading of the article. I am informed that it has been in the tariff for many years. My hon. friend if he had before him the item would observe that it covers almost three pages; it is subdivided under (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), down to (o). The first sub-item referred to here was in the original parent item as free, free, free, but it does not follow that the same applies throughout the subdivisions in the various columns, as I think my hon. friend had in mind; because the very next item carries a duty in the intermediate and general, and so do items (e), (f), (h), (k), (l), (m), (n), and (o).

Mr. RALSTON: One item of (m) is free.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister will notice that in this item 386 (m) there are two divisions, (i) and (ii). Under the rate as it was prior to the conference, in each case the intermediate was 7½ per cent and the general tariff 10 per cent. Under the tariff as it now stands the intermediate in one case has been raised to 15 per cent and in the other to 20 per cent; and the general has been raised to 15 per cent in one case and to 20 per cent in the other. Will the minister tell us why, when they were both the same before, they are now different rates, in one case 15 and the other 20 per cent, as against 7½ and 10 per cent? Why were they not both made the same as they were before?

Mr. RHODES: They cover two different types of commodities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They did before.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I am not in a position to give a definite answer, other than to say that these are what emerged as a result of the agreement between the British and Canadian representatives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister's reply enables me to state what I am most anxious to bring out, namely, the contrast, as far as enlightening the House of Commons in respect to what it is doing in a matter of taxation is concerned, between this way of making tariffs and the way tariffs have been made hitherto. In the old days, as my hon. friend well knows, before a revision of the tariff was attempted there was something in the nature of a tariff commission appointed. It used to be composed of members of the administration, who went from one end of the country to the other, and if tariff changes were sought the parties desiring them were allowed to appear and make out their case. Other parties were also heard, the farmers were given opportunity to state their views, consumers generally were allowed to appear and state their views, with the result that when the government came to the House of Commons with its proposed tariff changes it was able to give the reasons why the tariffs were being fixed at particular rates. Later, when that practice was discontinued, there was established a tariff advisory board, and before that board parties likely to be affected by any change in the tariff were given opportunity to be heard; so that when the Minister of Finance was presenting his budget with its tariff changes he was in a position to say, not merely that one party in interest had been heard, but that all parties had been heard and given a chance to state how they would be affected by the changes.

Now my hon. friend tells us: This was agreed to at the conference. Let us follow that. The conference was a secret conclave, no one except the members of the administration who were present knows anything about what took place, or is supposed to know. In other words the public, the ones who are affected by what has taken place, have no knowledge whatever of the reasons which actuated the administration, and the administration is now unable to give reasons, beyond "this is what was agreed to." And, as the minister told us a few minutes ago, agreed to as a result of discussions between the manufacturing interests in the old country and the manufacturing industries in Canada, the special interests which are being given added favours. How the government can expect the people of the country to have any confidence in a tariff fashioned in that way I fail to see.

Mr. RHODES: With what my right hon. friend has said as to what is known as a revision of the tariff, that is the bringing down of a budget and dealing with tariff items therein, I am in entire accord. But my right hon. friend must realize that it is a far different matter when you are dealing with an agreement, as we are at the present time. Of necessity conferences have to be in secret. It would be unthinkable—I do not know that in all history it has ever been otherwise—that agreements should be entered into between one nation and another in any other manner. My right hon. friend must also bear in mind that it very frequently happens, I might almost say invariably, that in the course of negotiations a country will grant in respect to individual commodities more concessions than it would at first be disposed to agree to, and the other might do the same thing. In the final analysis, in order to bring about a meeting of minds, there is compromise. Therefore with respect to individual items such as the one in question, it is impossible for me to give my right hon. friend any other reply than I have given. I submit that on this point there is a distinct difference between tariff items which arise by reason of an agreement between nations, and tariff items which are dealt with in the ordinary way in respect of a budget. In the latter case the question which my right hon. friend asked would be susceptible of answer, because it would be the direct result of the government's action with respect to its particular policy. In the case of an agreement it might be—I do not say it is—that in respect to these items we might very well have desired to carry them at the same relative levels as they heretofore held, but as a result of the conference discussions this is what emerged as something upon which ultimately we all could agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend—and I think he must admit it—that what we have before us at present is to all intents and purposes a budget. It is a very much larger tariff revision, I think, than has ever taken place in this house before. There may have been two others comparable in size, but really it is a very extensive revision of the tariff. If what had been done at the conference had been merely to increase the preference to Great Britain by the lowering of existing rates, leaving the intermediate and general tariffs where they were, I could see some force in what has just been said about arriving at an agreement in regard to the changes in the tariff. But it goes away beyond anything of that kind. This arrangement increases the general and intermediate tariff on over 130 items, I think, and when you split them up as has been done in the schedule you can easily make two or three times that number. It is an increase in the intermediate and general tariffs on all those items—

Mr. RHODES: Not all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the 130 or more, yet in regard to all those increases there is no reason to be given as to why they are made, other than that it was agreed to by representatives of industries between representatives of the different governments, at a secret conference to which the public had no access at all. I think my hon. friend must see in his heart of hearts the weakness of his case.

Mr. RHODES: I rise to say only one word. I cannot add to the argument I made previously; it may be good or bad. I think it is good and absolutely sound, and I can tell my hon. friend that in my heart of hearts I believe the answer I have given is the only one I could give in the circumstances.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to ask my hon. friend if he is the minister referred to who prescribes the regulations, or it is the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. RHODES: It is the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would feel a great deal more comfortable about it if it were my hon. friend. I think the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, both of whom are vitally interested in the questions of revenue and of trade, are sometimes defeated in their aims simply by the absurd regulations that are drawn up in the Department of National Revenue. Some of the benefits which are supposed to accrue under these treaties may be entirely nullified by regulations made in that department. If there is on disturbing factor in the busines world today it is that no importer knows under what rate he can import his goods. With reference to these regulations, if they are to be prescribed by the Department of National Revenue as it has been administered during the past year of two, I think the Minister of Finance should let us know what the regulations will be. This afternoon I pointed out one item which has been called to our attention; that was the importation of silk, in connection with which according to my information the regulations are defeating direct trade. I am quite sure that is not being done at the wish of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of anyone else who wants direct trade with the countries with which we do business; it comes about simply because of a certain regulation which provides that if the goods come from the country in which they are produced the excise is collected on the par of exchange, while if they come from New York the excise is calculated on another amount, making it cheaper to bring the goods from New York than direct from the country of origin. There will be a number of regulations in the administration of these items, and I ask the Minister of National Revenue to take a little interest in the matter himself and not leave it entirely to a few officers in the department.

Mr. RHODES: It by no means follows that because this provision is in the act, as it has been for many years, any regulations have been or will be set up under it. Upon that point, however, I will make the necessary inquiries and advise my hon. friend at the next sitting of the committee.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GORDON: I desire to lay on the table of the house certain orders in council passed pursuant to the relief measures.

QUESTIONS

MORDEN, MAN., COAL CONTRACTS

Mr. BROWN:

1. Who was given the last contract for the supplying of coal for the public building and experimental farm at Morden, Manitoba?
2. At what price was the contract let?
3. Were tenders called for? If so, what were the names of those tendering?
4. Was the contract let to the lowest tenderer?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Monarch Lumber Co., Morden, Man.

2. Public Building, $5.30 per ton; Experimental Farm, $9.20 per ton.

3. (a) Yes, by public advertisement; (b) Corona Lumber Yards, Ltd., Winnipeg and Morden; Jarvis Jickling, Morden, Monarch Lumber Co., Morden; J. P. Suderman, Morden; Deep Seam Coal Sales, Ltd., Winnipeg; Deloraine Coal Mines, Ltd., Deloraine; McCabe Bros., Grain Co., Ltd., Winnipeg; Canadian Dinant Coal Co., Ltd., Dinant, Alta.; Coal Sellers Co., Ltd., Calgary, Alta.; Midland Coal Mining Co., Ltd., Midlandvale, Alta.; Superheat Coal Co., Ltd., Ardley, Alta.; United Coal Co., Drumheller, Alta.

4. Yes, to the lowest local tenderer for total requirements, suitability and calorific value considered.

*EASTERN PASSAGE, N.S., AIR STATION

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) Are any seaplanes stationed at Eastern Passage, Halifax county, Nova Scotia, under the authority of the government or any department; (b) if so, how many; (c) if not, were any seaplanes stationed there since January 1, 1931, and how many, and for what period?

2. How many men are employed at Eastern Passage in connection with such planes, or with the station at which they are stationed, including pilots, observers, mechanics and watchmen?

3. Under the authority of what department or branch of the government's service do such men act?

4. What was the original cost of the planes which have been since January 1, 1931, or are now, stationed there?

5. What has been the cost of the maintenance of such station at Eastern Passage since the arrival of any planes there?

6. What has been the cost of transportation of planes, men and supplies to such station?

7. (a) How many government-owned motor cars are attached to such station; (b) how much did they cost, and what has been the cost of their maintenance and operation since their arrival there?

8. How many persons engaged in smuggling or rum running have been apprehended as a result of the presence at such station of such planes?

9. Has any property, smuggled or attempted to be smuggled, been seized as the result of the presence there of such planes? If so, what is its value?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman, I see, is not in his place. This question touches on the administration of law and if the information sought were given, the effect would be to render to a very considerable extent nugatory the efforts that are being made in that connection. I would ask the hon. gentleman to reconsider his question, and as regards any information he may require, the files of the department might be made available for his personal perusal. There are certain questions which, if asked, would have the direct effect of lessening the possibility of enforcing the law, for the enforcement of which these steps have been taken. The expenditures of course, will all be covered in due course by the Auditor General's report.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

*PREVENTIVE SERVICE BOATS

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. What preventive service boats which were in the service in 1931, were disposed of in 1932?

2. What was the age of each of such boats, and the reason for disposing of them respectively?

3. What disposition was made of each of the boats so disposed of, and in the case of those sold, what was the sale price?

4. What are the names of the boats acquired by the preventive service in 1932, and what is the age of each boat so acquired?

5. As to the boats so acquired, were they purchased, leased or how otherwise acquired, and in the case of those purchased, what were the purchase prices respectively?

6. Have any of the boats acquired this year been conditioned or repaired since being so acquired, and if so, what has been the cost of such conditioning or repairs of each?

Mr. BENNETT: The same answer to a lesser degree may apply to this question which, in any event, would have to be an order for return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

MOUNT-MURRAY, QUE, POST OFFICE

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has any change been effected with respect to the location of the post office and the postmaster at Mount-Murray, in the county of Charlevoix?

2. Were any complaints made against the conduct of the postmaster?

3. If so, what was the nature of these complaints?

4. Who made these complaints?

5. Who was appointed postmaster at Mount-Murray recently?

6. By whom was appointee recommended?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. General complaints were received from Messrs. Philippe Bergeron, Gonzague Tremblay, Alfred Brisson, Cyrias Dufour, Raoul Lappointe, but departmental action was based on inspections made in February and September, 1932, which led to the discovery of serious irregularities.

5. Cyrias Dufour.

6. Antoine Cimon, of La Malbaie.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CHARTERED BANKS OF CANADA

Mr. COOTE:

For a copy of the return made by the chartered banks of Canada to the minister as required under subsection 2, section 91 of the Bank Act as on the last day of June, 1932.

DISMISSALS OF GASPE EMPLOYEES

Mr. GOBEIL:

For a return showing a list of the names of all employees of the federal government who were dismissed in the county of Gaspe between October the 1st, 1926, and October the 1st, 1927, the said list to show: (a) the names of such employees; (b) the nature of employment; (c) the name of the person who recommended their dismissal; (d) the reason for their dismissal.

MOUNT-MURRAY, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, requests, correspondence, petitions, and other documents, exchanged between the Post Office Department at Ottawa and the Post Office Department at Quebec, with respect to the dismissal of the postmaster of Mount-Murray in the county of Charlevoix. Also a copy of all sworn or other statements dealing with the resignation of said postmaster, in the possession of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Before we leave this motion, I might make this observation: It has not been customary, so far as I have been able to ascertain, to provide for submission to the house of interdepartmental correspondence that results in executive action being taken. After the action is taken the minister must assume the responsibility and correspondence between him and various officials of his department resulting in his taking such action has not heretofore been regarded as a proper subject for a motion to lay before parliament. The minister must assume the responsibility. Those members of the house who are practising lawyers will realize that that distinction has been very clearly drawn by the court of last resort in Great Britain in dealing with the question of the production of documents.

Motion stands.

BRIGHT FAN INQUIRY

Mr. McINTOSH:

For a copy of all correspondence including letters, telegrams, radiograms and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Marine, and any of his officials or any other department of the government and any of its officials, and any other person, body, corporation or association, including the members of the Mellish Commission instituted to investigate the sinking of the British freighter Bright Fan in Hudson strait; also copy of the evidence adduced at said investigation as well as any letters, telegrams, radiograms and other documents made use of during the investigation but not included in the evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: This motion offends perhaps more than the previous one, because it asks for the production of letters, telegrams and radiograms that were exchanged between a minister and his officials in connection with a pending matter. This makes it quite clear that if it were in a court of law it would be a privileged communication. So far as the evidence is concerned it will be brought down in due course with the exhibits that were attached to it. With these exceptions the motions are in order, but as they now read, they transgress the general rules that have been adopted by this house in connection with the transaction of public business.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the Prime Minister if the evidence will be forthcoming?

Mr. BENNETT: When it is concluded, it can be laid on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member allow the motion to stand for amendment?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Motion stands.

WINNIPEG COKE SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a communication from a coal company in the city of Winnipeg with regard to the question of coke as manufactured by the Algoma Steel Corporation of Sault Ste. Marie. The communication, in part, is as follows:

> The coke previously sold in this market was an American product and there was a wide spread between the laid-down cost and the retail price. At the instance of a combine in western Canada, the Canadian Pacific is compelling us to make further shipments of Canadian coke through American ports and over American railroads in bond. A further fact is that the docks at Fort William have been refused to us, as set out in our attachments, with a view to preventing competition of coke with western coal.

I should like to ask the government if it will make inquiries with regard to this situation. It seems extraordinary that we cannot secure in Winnipeg the Algoma product.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The question of finding markets for Canadian fuels has, as the hon. member well knows, been given considerable attention and has been the subject of investigation by both the late and the present governments. In a large measure the efforts have resulted in displacing foreign fuels in the competitive areas of Manitoba and generally in that province. Therefore, today I think I am fair in stating that probably 90 per cent of the fuel burned in that province—of course the percentage is subject to review; I may be overstating or understating it slightly—is supplied by coal from the western provinces.

With respect to the immediate subject matter of the interrogation by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I shall have the officers of the department inquire into it and see what is the true situation. If there is on anyone a hardship that can be remedied by governmental action, such action will be taken.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Acting Minister of Marine a question in regard to a press dispatch in this morning's paper respecting the nature of harbour improvements in Vancouver? What is the exact nature of those improvements to be?

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Minister of Marine): An order in council has been passed for expenditures in connection with the extension of Long Point pier and also an extension to the cold storage yard.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if it is his intention at this session of parliament to amend the Old Age Pensions Act so that a person who is seventy years of age and in all respects eligible for a pension, should not be deprived of it merely because it becomes necessary for him to move from one province into another?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): With respect to the effect of the old age pension legislation, my view is that perhaps this legislation should be subject to further review from a number of angles.

Dealing directly with the interrogation of the hon. member, I may say that the government has not given any consideration so far with a view to bringing in any legislation at the present session of parliament.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Chinese officials have refused to meet the Hon. Mr. Marler and that some of the authorities in China have requested that a check-up be made of all industries in this country to ascertain if any Japanese are employed on products exportable to China, I would ask if the Prime Minister will now consider the advisability of appointing a special representative from Canada to China so as to facilitate trade relations between the two countries?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is not usual, Mr. Speaker, to ask without notice on the orders of the day a question of the character indicated, involving as it does international relations. Provision has been made within the last twelve months for special representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce to take up location in China, and they have undertaken their duties there. I think the practice, Mr. Speaker, is not one that should be established in this house of asking questions prefaced by a statement alleged to be a statement of fact, because so far as one reading it in a journal is concerned it may have the effect of doing the very opposite of what the hon. gentleman desires.

I think the house should take cognizance of the fact that a telegram was read a few moments ago in which a statement was made as a statement of fact. It was a very serious statement. It may or may not be accurate. The rules indicate that such telegrams should not be read in this house at this stage.

The statement just made by the hon. gentleman if correct would involve a rather serious question. I suggest that we should be a bit careful in dealing with our international relations especially in times when great consequences often follow from very small beginnings in matters of this kind. I shall, however, look into the matter and advise the hon. gentleman, and if he has any desire to inform himself and will apply at the office I assure him that at all times I shall be glad to try to satisfy his very commendable curiosity.

Mr. REID: For the benefit of the Prime Minister I might say that the information I received was contained in an address delivered by Mr. Leon Ladner of Vancouver, who told an audience that the interests of Canada suffered because she had not a representative in China.

Mr. BENNETT: The report of the statement in the Vancouver Sun adds nothing to the hon. gentleman's former statement.

Mr. REID: In the Province.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram in my hand dated Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, November 12.

Mr. ERNST: It took a long time to get here.

Mr. McINTOSH: The telegram is from the second vice-president of the Fraternal Protective Association of Unemployed Citizens and Taxpayers of Saskatoon, and is addressed to the Prime Minister. The telegram draws attention to a certain document which the Saskatchewan Relief Commission requires applicants for relief to sign. The document requires those desiring relief to mortgage their homes, their chattels, all moneys not statutory exempt and—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Has the hon. gentleman a question to ask? He knows quite well that it is out of order to precede questions with a lengthy statement on the orders of the day.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have two questions to ask, Mr. Speaker. My first question is this, whether the government in granting relief to the citizens and taxpayers of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan cities and other centres throughout the dominion demand directly or indirectly of the provincial governments such security as that mentioned and which necessitates the violation of the sanctity of the homes of those seeking unemployment relief? Further, did the government of Canada either directly or indirectly give the Saskatchewan Relief Commission authority to demand any such security before supplying relief?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, nothing could better illustrate the soundness of the rule which does not permit of the reading of such telegrams on the orders of the day. May I say that the province of Saskatchewan is charged under the British North America Act with responsibility, and we have made contributions because of the national character of the emergency to assist them in carrying out their work. The telegram to which the hon. gentleman referred, and which took five days to reach here, has substantially been in the hands of a great many members of the house, and some of these telegrams came from sources which at once made their authenticity questionable, but I presume the hon. gentleman has served the purpose he had in mind.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then the Dominion government says it is powerless to prevent such a state of affairs—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: All right, give us order.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom—Mr. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne, in the chair.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: We were on item 386.

Mr. RHODES: Last night the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) put a question to me with respect to the provision found in section 386 of the customs tariff, which reads as follows:

> Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, as hereunder defined, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

He asked me what regulations were outstanding and what regulations had been issued. I answered that inasmuch as it concerned the Department of National Revenue I could not give him the information at the moment. I made inquiry this morning and I find that no regulations have been issued under this provision although it has remained on the statute for many years, and therefore no regulations are outstanding.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister give us the information as to the actual applied rate of duty on goods coming in from the old country?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand, and with the leave of the committee I shall put on Hansard, a proper comparison and a full answer to the hon. member's question, which will be found at page 1235 of Hansard. When I read this I think the members of the committee will well understand why one was unwilling to do the mental arithmetic on the instant as requested by the hon. member. I should like to emphasize, as I tried to do before, a point which has received no consideration whatever from hon. members, but one which I think should receive their attention. It is an important factor which affects every transaction. I hold in my hand a statement showing a comparison of duties on household hollowware of aluminum imported from the United Kingdom before the pound sterling went off the gold standard, with the prices as they obtain at the present time.

Mr. YOUNG: "At the present time" means with the treaty rates in effect?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes. In compiling this table the assumed market value has been taken as two shillings. The British preferential rate under tariff item 354a is given at 20 per cent less 10 per cent. The sales and special excise tax are nine per cent, computed on the duty paid value. The following table will give the comparison to which I have referred.

Prior to September, 1931

| | Cents |
|---|---|
| Value for duty | 48.67 |
| Duty (20 per cent less 10 per cent) | 8.67 |
| Sales and excise taxes | 5.16 |
| Duty and tax paid value | 62.5 |

Present Time

| | Cents |
|---|---|
| Purchase price at exchange say, 3.71 | 37.1 |
| Value for duty | 48.67 |
| Duty (20 per cent less 10 per cent) | 8.67 |
| Sales and excise taxes | 5.16 |
| Dumping duty (difference pound at 4.40 and 3.71) | 6.9 |
| Duty and tax paid value | 57.83 |

So, with 57·83 cents one may buy an article with a formerly laid down value of 62·5 cents.

Mr. YOUNG: If I followed the minister's figures correctly the duty now will be practically 20 cents on an investment of 37 cents in Canadian money, which is considerably more than 50 per cent. I will admit my estimate made last night was wrong, because I estimated only 47 per cent. But according to the minister the duty will be beyond 50 per cent. Under the circumstances I believe we should have similar statements in connection with every item from now on throughout the schedule, so that we may know exactly what the preferential rate will be.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In reply I merely state that my answer is as it appears on Hansard. From the statement placed thereon the hon. member, by doing some arithmetic, will find it very easy to make calculations by which the Department of National Revenue will agree to be bound. I think in fairness to myself and others the hon. member should do his own sums.

Mr. YOUNG: I am quite willing to do my own arithmetic, but before these items are passed I should like to figure out what the actual applied rates will be. I do not wish to wait until Hansard comes out tomorrow to have the figures. If I heard the minister correctly the total duty on the article at the present time will be 19·9 cents, or approximately 20 cents, while the price of the article is only 37 cents. One need do only a simple problem in arithmetic to learn that the duty is considerably over 50 per cent. I can see that without figuring.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 387. Steel grooved (or girder) rails for electric tramway use, weighing not less than 75 pounds per lineal yard, punched, drilled, or not, of shapes and lengths not made in Canada, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $7; general tariff, $7.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388. Iron or steel angles, beams, channels, columns, girders, joists, piling, tees, zees, and other shapes or sections, not punched, drilled, or further manufactured than hot rolled, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, n.o.p., per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $3; general tariff, $3.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What are the particulars in connection with this item?

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year under this item were valued at $2,315,000. On that amount $271,000 worth came from the United Kingdom; $1,882,000 worth from the United States and $162,000 worth from other countries.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388b. Iron or steel angles, beams, channels, columns, girders, joists, piling, tees, zees, and other shapes or sections, not punched, drilled or further manufactured than hot rolled, n.o.p., per ton: British preferential tariff, $4; intermediate tariff, $7; general tariff, $7.

Mr. RHODES: The value of the imports under this heading for the last year was $797,000, of which $24,000 came from the United Kingdom, $640,000 from the United States and $115,000 from Belgium.

Mr. YOUNG: I suppose the figure of $24,000 that came from the United Kingdom is taken from the trade returns, and is one of the exaggerated figures we were discussing the other day. The actual imports from the United Kingdom will be considerably less than that. If the British manufacturer of these articles could not get into the market before to any greater extent than that, will he be able to do it better with this reduction? Apparently the market is dominated by manufacturers outside the empire, and the duty on goods outside has not been reduced.

We know the difficulty under which railroads are now operating; we know they are experiencing financial difficulties and that they will be approaching this government for help. Here we are charging them 12½ per cent on their equipment. To my mind it is poor business to make them pay the extra price for their equipment and then have them come to the government asking money from the treasury.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend made precisely the same argument yesterday.

Mr. YOUNG: It will stand repeating.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that any good purpose would be served by loading up Hansard with the reply I made before. I think perhaps the hon. member will not judge me discourteous if I simply say ditto to what I said last night.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 388. Iron or steel side or centre sill sections, of all sizes not manufactured in Canada, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, not punched, drilled or further manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of railway cars, for use in their own factories, per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $3; general tariff, $3.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are any of these articles made in Canada at all?

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that practically none of this is made in Canada. I may point out that this is an entirely new item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—392. Forgings of iron or steel, in any degree of manufacture, hollow, not less than twelve inches in internal diameter: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—393. Tires, of steel, in the rough, not drilled or machined in any manner, for railway vehicles, including locomotives and tenders: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell us what the applied rate will be against Great Britain in this case?

Mr. RHODES: I will first give the figures. The imports last year under this item were $444,000, of which $147,000 came from the United Kingdom and $297,000 from the United States. I take it the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is submitting the same question with respect to this item as he has with respect to a number of others. In this case also I shall have to submit the same answer.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—394. Axles and axle bars, n.o.p., and axle blanks, and parts thereof, of iron or steel:

(a) for railway vehicles, including locomotives and tenders: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—401. Wire, of iron or steel:

(a) barbed fencing, coated or not: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(b) twisted, braided or stranded, including wire rope or cable, coated or not, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(c) drawn flat or cold rolled flat after drawing, coated or not, n.o.p., not more than ·25 inch in width and less than ·1875 inch in thickness: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(d) coated with zinc, or spelter, curved or not, in coils, ·144, ·104 or ·092 inch in diameter, with tolerance not to exceed ·004 inch, and not for use in telegraph or telephone lines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(e) coated with zinc or spelter, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(f) single or several, covered with any material, including cable so covered, coated, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(g) n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister give us particulars?

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year, under the first item, barbed wire, amounted to $125,000 in value, of which $10,000 came from the United Kingdom, $39,000 from the United States, $34,000 from the Netherlands and $28,000 from Belgium.

Mr. YOUNG: Canadian production?

Mr. RHODES: Canadian production, $535,000. Of wire rope, the imports last year were $215,000, of which $152,000 came from the United Kingdom, $28,000 from the United States, and $30,000 from Sweden. Flat wire; the imports last year amounted to $4,000, of which $2,000 came from the United Kingdom and $2,000 from other countries. Galvanized wire for fencing purposes; the imports last year amounted to $39,000, of which $2,000 came from the United Kingdom, $10,000 from the United States, and $24,000 from Germany. Galvanized wire, n.o.p.; the imports amounted to $26,000, of which $5,000 came from the United Kingdom, $15,000 from the United States, and $6,000 from other countries. Covered wire, item 410 (f); imports last year, $18,000, of which $3,000 came from the United Kingdom and $15,000 from the United States. Item 401 (g), n.o.p.: imports last year were $139,000, of which $14,000 came from the United Kingdom, $118,000 from the United States and $7,000 from other countries.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. gentleman if it is in this item that the government has succeeded where others have failed? I should like to have a concrete case in order that I may know when it has happened.

Mr. BROWN: The particular article under this heading that is of interest to us is the first part, fencing, coated or not. This is an article that has been admitted into Canada free of duty since the very early days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. On the coming in of that tariff I myself was able to buy barbed wire I think at the cheapest price it was ever sold in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: How much per hundred pounds?

Mr. BROWN: It was $2.75 a hundred. I had to fence a half section at that time, and at my local point it cost $2.75 a hundredweight. Barbed wire is one of the most essential things on a western farm, if we are to keep live stock at all. We have not the facilities for making such elaborate fences as the old snake or cedar pole fences that we see all over Ontario. We must have barbed wire; if stock is to be kept to any considerable extent it is one of our most essential requirements. In these days when farming is being carried on, not at a very small profit but at an absolute loss, why the government should see fit to impose this extra burden upon the purchaser of barbed wire I cannot understand. Of course we know that the indicated purpose behind these treaties is to divert trade to Great Britain—

Mr. CANTLEY: Are you opposed to that?

Mr. BROWN: Take the figures that have been read to us by the finance minister. Only a trivial amount was imported from the United Kingdom, I think about $10,000—

Mr. RHODES: That is right.

Mr. BROWN: Take that in comparison with the figures from the Netherlands, Belgium and the United States, which if my memory serves me right ran in each case about $40,000—

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. BENNETT: No; $28,000 from Belgium, $34,000 from Germany and the Netherlands and $39,000 from the United States.

Mr. BROWN: Well, no matter what those figures are, the amount imported from the United Kingdom is trifling compared with what we receive from other sources, taken along with our Canadian production. I cannot think it possible that this increase in duty of 10 per cent will divert any considerable amount of that trade to Great Britain. It seems to me it can have no other effect than to increase the price of the wire we receive from other countries, as well as increase the price that we have to pay to our own manufacturers. This is one matter on which I am sure we should have the unanimous support of all hon. members from the west if they were free to speak their minds, as we certainly will have the unanimous support of the voters of the west in our opposition to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who asked for this change in the tariff in regard to barbed wire? Was it asked for by the Canadian manufacturers or by the British delegates?

Mr. RHODES: There was no specific request for this item. It was not included among those on which the British government laid particular stress, but it was one of those which they included as being beneficial to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to give the house some figures to prove that this preference will not be of the slightest use to any British manufacturer of barbed wire. I wish to quote prices which were given me by a reliable authority, and which the government can check up. These are actual prices for barbed wire, translated into Canadian funds, per 2,240 pounds:

| | Continental | British |
|---|---|---|
| October, 1930 | $46 90 | $63 20 |
| October, 1931 | 48 40 | 69 40 |
| November, 1932 | 48 80 | 72 50 |

The ten per cent preference here will be absolutely useless to Great Britain. This is nothing but straight protection to the Canadian manufacturers of barbed wire and an additional burden on the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. WILSON: It is not often that I take up the time of the committee, but the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar have brought me to my feet, since it happens that I was brought up in the hardware business. The hon. member says that $2.75 is the lowest price at which barbed wire was ever sold. I want to inform him that I sold barbed wire at $2 per hundred pounds, when it was made in Canada and carried a duty of three-quarters of a cent per pound. When the Liberal government made it free they put the Canadian manufacturer out of business, and now we are paying more for barbed wire.

Mr. BROWN: May I ask the hon. member for Wentworth if he sold that wire at Pilot Mound, Manitoba?

Mr. WILSON: That is not the point at all.

Mr. BROWN: That was where I bought it.

Mr. WILSON: That may be so, but I am saying that when there was a duty of three-quarters of a cent per pound on barbed wire it was made in Canada by Canadian manufacturers, gave work to Canadian workmen, and sold for less money.

Mr. BROWN: Will the hon. member contend that the removal of that duty made barbed wire higher in price?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to ask if these duties are now in effect.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; they have been in effect since October 13.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what I understood, and this brings up not a potential situation or a matter of imagination or prophecy, but an actual fact. During the last week, no doubt in common with other hon. members, I have been in receipt of a number of telegrams and communications from consumers of barbed wire in western Canada, complaining of a recent and substantial increase in the retail cost of that commodity, which increase has come about within the last ten days. When the matter was brought up in the house a short time ago, I think by the hon. member for Battle River, I believe it was intimated that some action had been taken to stop the dumping of barbed wire into this country at unfair prices, but that the actual fair market price had not been altered in any way. There is no doubt in my mind that any increase in the price of barbed wire at the present time is serious. I think that will be admitted on every side. It is a fact that farming is being carried on at a loss, and the slightest increase in our cost of production is a matter of very grave consideration. In addition, every tendency today whether on the part of governments, of individuals or of organizations, is towards mixed farming, if possible getting away from that great overproduction of wheat and turning to other lines of agriculture. As a matter of fact, to a very large extent the agreement itself, so far as it concerns farm products, is based upon that increase in mixed farming. As the hon. member for Lisgar has said, and as everyone acquainted with western Canada knows, mixed farming there is practically dependent upon the increased use of barbed wire fencing. It cannot be otherwise. Barbed wire forms a very substantial and an inescapable portion of the cost of farming, particularly if you go into cattle raising or other forms of mixed farming. I think the house is as one in deploring anything that may increase the cost of this commodity, but whether it is a result of the treaty or a most unfortunate coincidence, the fact remains that the price has gone up, and that from every side we are receiving complaints. This increase may be due to the fact that dumping has been stopped; we do not know. The farmer does know, however, that the price has increased and that he is paying more for his barbed wire.

Mr. STEVENS: Has my hon. friend any information as to the extent of the increase complained of?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think I can get that information, though most of the wires simply complain without giving very definite statistics. I did not bring those telegrams with me because I did not know this item was coming up today, but I think one or two of them contain actual figures. Certainly definite statements have been made, and in some cases they are backed up by exact figures as to prices paid.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is an almost inescapable inference at least, with these tariffs having been in effect for the past three or four weeks, that the increase in price is a direct result. Rightly or wrongly that is the inference drawn, whether it is a necessary increase or whether the retailers are taking advantage of the situation. I do not know what are the facts, and the farmers do not know, but they do know that the price has gone up. If that is the inevitable result of this agreement then I think this is one point that certainly must be discussed and if possible corrected, because the whole argument in favour of the British preference is that it will result in the diversion of trade —which I for one should be very glad to see— but that this diversion of trade will be made without increasing the cost to the consumer or placing an additional burden upon those who may use the articles imported. There is the whole difficulty. If the treaty has this result it will not be the foreigner who will pay the cost of the agreement; it will be paid by the consumer here. If that is to be the result the whole basis is wrong.

I will not go further, but I am asking the minister to institute as soon as possible the most careful inquiry into the matter. I am not asking him to take my statement; I am not even asking him to accept any telegrams that may be sent, because at times they are wholly unreliable. In view of the statement that prices have increased, and the widespread complaints that have been made, together with the fact that it is of such great importance to have these prices as low as possible without inflicting injury upon anyone, I ask the minister to look into the matter. We want barbed wire to be sold at the lowest possible legitimate price, and in view of these facts I ask the government to make the fullest inquiry. If they find that someone has been attempting to exploit the consumer as a result of this tariff, or that under this tariff we cannot get barbed wire as cheaply as we formerly could, I ask the government to use the powers contained in the treaty and remedy that injustice, if any has been brought about.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to intervene in this debate, Mr. Chairman, merely to make a very few observations. The hon. member for Red Deer used the words "as low as it can be purchased legitimately." I suppose he is aware of the fact that during the past several months in this country barbed wire has been dumped on the Canadian market from the Netherlands. As a matter of fact, the wire was brought from Germany unbarbed into the Netherlands and then barbed and shipped here by water to Vancouver. The price at which it has been sold was admittedly a dump price. It is only necessary to point out to the committee that the entire requirements of Canadians for barbed wire have been met practically by Canadians.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Quite.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Red Deer is fair enough to admit that that is correct, and I commend that to the hon. member for Lisgar. Now, the total importation, when barbed wire was free across the board, was not $85,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was as high as $125,000.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. BENNETT: I was coming to that. It did reach a maximum of $125,000 but the average was something like $85,000. But Canadians have supplied their own requirements in barbed wire and have had keen competition with the whole world. Recently however barbed wire has been dumped upon the Canadian market by foreigners to destroy Canadian industry, just cold-bloodedly—admittedly in cold blood. I will give the committee an illustration. Not long since orders were taken for Canadian barbed wire. The Dutch interests have in this country a representative in the person of Mr. Leith Murray. They went so far as to say, "We will undersell you, whatever your price may be. Substantially that will be the effect. There will be no dumping duty on it and we will sell this Dutch wire in this country regardless." Now, the price at which the Canadian is selling barbed wire at the present moment is $2.32 per hundred pounds, while the price in the United States is $2.60. The competition formerly was between the United States and Canada, and the Canadian interests were able to purchase barbed wire delivered at the head of the lakes, in competition with Pittsburgh wire delivered at the head of the lakes, when the item was on the free list, and undersell them. I well recall—I was not actively interested in politics at the time and was not in the house—that Mr. Walton, manager of the largest wholesale firm in Canada, Marshall, Wells & Company, explained to me the extent to which we Canadians were producing our own requirements, and he pointed out barbed wire as an illustration. Being free across the board, it was being produced by Canadians cheaper than it could be delivered by the American producers in the United States.

There has arisen however a situation which is entirely different from that. A foreign interest has resolved to destroy the Canadian market—

Mr. YOUNG: Maliciously?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. The hon. gentleman can hardly conceive anything not being done that way. I did say however that they have resolved to do it, and having resolved to do it they set out by reducing prices to accomplish that end.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could not that be met by means of ordinary dumping duties?

Mr. BENNETT: One of the difficulties is to determine how you can apply the dumping duty to certain commodities. In the Netherlands there is no market for barbed wire, and to find a fair market price for barbed wire where there is no sale for the commodity is an exceedingly difficult thing, and section 36 of the Customs Act, to which the hon. gentleman refers, contemplates the sale being made cheaper than the sale that is made to the people of the country in which the commodity is produced. Owing to the fact that the wire itself comes from Germany and is barbed in the Netherlands, and that there is no market at all in the Netherlands for barbed wire, you cannot apply that section, which contemplates the ascertaining of the domestic price for the commodity and then comparing that with the price for which the commodity is being offered in the country to which it is exported.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why was this tariff change not postponed until the regular budget came down, instead of putting it here under the guise of a British preference, which, as I see it, is absolutely useless.

Mr. BENNETT: Presently I shall deal with that phase of the situation. Perhaps I might do so now. Great Britain sold only $10,000 in our market in a given period. Larger quantities were sold by Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium. Those are the four countries from which our importations came, the United States being $34,000, larger, as a matter of fact, than any of the other three. Now, the position is this. If Great Britain could supply it we should prefer to buy it from Great Britain. We have never made any bones about that, to use a colloquial expression. There has been no raising of the price by the Canadian producer, none at all. His price is $2.32 and the American price at the moment is $2.60. It is difficult to ascertain the market price for barbed wire in a country where barbed wire has no sale. It has in Germany, and the domestic price there bears a close relation to our own. As most hon. members know, barbed wire is not used in Great Britain commercially as it is here, and in the Netherlands there is no market at all.

When this matter was presented for our consideration we said, "We will make it free, but we must at least see that the British producer has an even chance as compared with those who are dumping their product on this market." I had occasion to point this out the other day. A few years ago the entire agricultural production in Canada, including fruit and vegetables and every form of agricultural activity, embracing live stock as well, amounted, roughly, to $1,600,000,000, of which only $300,000,000 worth was exported. The other $1,300,000,000 were consumed by 10,000,000 people, indicating of course that the domestic market is still by all odds the great market for Canadian producers—the very greatest market there is.

Mr. YOUNG: Have you made allowance for duplications?

Mr. BENNETT: I merely take the figures as the statistical department have prepared them, and I have every reason to believe that under Doctor Coats' direction every possible likelihood of erroneous figures being produced has been eliminated. I can only give them as they are. I have the figures for the last three years, but I take the round figures for one year, and as I have said, of $1,600,000,000, roughly, we exported $299,000,000, or, to use round figures, $300,000,000, leaving $1,300,000,000 of agricultural products consumed by 10,000,000 people—that is, before England went off the gold standard. The very essence of the maintenance of some form of industrial life in this country is to maintain that domestic market, and to do that we must give a fair chance to industry, just as the agriculturist has asked for an even chance with New Zealand butter or Australian products, or in relation to any form of agricultural activity whatever it may be. The Canadian producer says, "All I want is a fair chance in my own market." Now, when you find Canadian barbed wire being sold to Canadians at 28 cents per hundred pounds less than in the United States, and when you find, so far as you can ascertain, that the price at which barbed wire is being offered in the Netherlands is lower than the cost of production, on any fair basis of production costs, are you not bound to take steps to give the Canadian a fair chance, and to give the Englishman that chance as well? We have said to the Englishman, "We will make it free and give you a fair chance, that is, even competition with the Canadian," and if he has an even chance in this market with the Canadian, why should we be so solicitous about those who are making no contribution to our welfare?

Mr. YOUNG: What about the farmers? It is the farmers of whom we are solicitous.

Mr. BENNETT: The farmers, if the situation is left to work out its logical conclusion, will eventually pay any price the foreigner may demand.

An hon. MEMBER: They can't live that long.

Mr. BENNETT: Someone says they cannot live that long, but I have seen Canadian industry destroyed and the foreigner fix prices. My hon. friend from Red Deer used the word legitimately and used it properly, and I can see that he meant that if there were not an even chance afforded either to his own country or to Great Britain with respect to this commodity it was not legitimate nor fair. It is to overcome the dumping practice in this market in connection with barbed wire that this step is being taken, and the only method by which that could be accomplished is this. You may think you have devised other methods, but this is the only really effective method that will do it; and if, as the hon. member for Red Deer has found, a hardship is worked in any particular class, the agreement is provided to meet that situation, just as it has done with respect to one or two other matters, since the agreements were signed, both in Australia and elsewhere. I think I could give more striking illustrations of what has happened recently in connection with orders that were given to Canadian producers of barbed wire, the base price being $2.32. Those who have given the orders have been asked by the Dutch agents in this country to cancel them and to substitute Dutch wire, made first in Germany, barbed in the Netherlands, and shipped to Canada by water, to supplant the Canadian product made by Canadian people who consume a part of that $1,300,000,000 which constitutes the largest market the Canadian farmer has for his product—the home market.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The very fact that the great percentage of our market is supplied by Canadian industry would indicate that any increased cost of importation, supposing it were brought about, should have no effect upon the price. That is, if the price were being raised in Canada, I mean apart from any temporary and unfair dumping of which I am not speaking at the moment, this would show that the industry or part of the industry or the retailers under the industry were taking unnecessary advantage of the tariff, because it is not the imported article that sets the price. I am merely asking that under the circumstances the government ascertain whether in any districts there has been an unnecessary increase in the legitimate price and that, if so, they take the necessary steps.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the hon. gentleman that this is a matter in which I had considerable interest. My information at the moment is that there has been no increase in price by Canadians, but the foreigner, taking advantage of the situation, has been endeavouring to get a higher price on the theory that he now has a monopoly of the market, having cancelled the orders of the Canadian producers and driven them out. If that is what the committee wants to have done, all they have to do is to make it clear. They will not get it so far as this government is concerned.

Mr. BROWN: The Prime Minister directed a remark to me commending the attitude of the hon. member for Red Deer when he admitted the larger proportion of our requirements was provided from the Canadian market. I did not need to admit that definitely when I pointed out that we had a very small proportion—

Mr. BENNETT: From Great Britain.

Mr. BROWN —from Great Britain, another small proportion of our requirements from foreign countries and some $550,000 worth from Canada, which in itself is an indication that we are getting most of our requirements from our own producers. Therefore I do not think the Prime Minister need emphasize the point that my attitude should be the same as that of the hon. member for Red Deer. The Prime Minister has made another very interesting admission, namely that Canadian manufacturers of barbed wire have been providing for Canadian requirements in competition with the United States, and they have been doing that for thirty-five years without a duty.

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. BROWN: I know whereof I speak. Barbed wire was put on the free list by the first Fielding tariff in 1897. I had occasion, as I well remember when I was fencing my farm about which I spoke, to come into contact with a very strong protectionist who was complaining that the Fielding tariff had not reduced duties at all. I immediately pointed to what I had done in fencing my own farm at the price I have already indicated, because of the reduction that was brought about in the price of barbed wire by the Fielding tariff. He said: "Oh, that was the worst thing that was done for Canada." I said: "You cannot have it both ways." He was arguing about the Fielding tariff having reduced no duties, and he was also complaining that it had. This is characteristic of the arguments we are hearing these days from the other side of the house. I have been contending all these years that Canadian manufacturers could compete with other manufacturers without these large protective duties, and the Prime Minister has at least admitted the fact that for thirty-five years the Canadian manufacturer of barbed wire has been supplying the major portion of our requirements and yet barbed wire has been on the free list. When we are discussing this matter of prices, it should be borne in mind that I am speaking of retail prices I had to pay in my town, and probably the prices quoted by the Prime Minister are wholesale prices. We must not get confused over these matters.

Mr. BENNETT: But the retail price is not a matter over which the federal government has any control.

Mr. BROWN: I admit that. When the hon. member for Wentworth challenged the price I gave, he should remember he was giving the price in Ontario, very near to where the wire was made, and I was quoting the price away out on the prairie where it had to carry a large freight rate.

Mr. GOTT: That shows that factories are needed out there.

Mr. BROWN: That is about as wise as any other remarks made by the hon. gentleman. I was quoting a price that carried a very high freight rate, so that the statement of the hon. member for Wentworth is not necessarily a contradiction of mine.

Granting that the statements of the Prime Minister in regard to the situation that prevails in Holland are correct, why should this material be brought in under the guise of diverting trade to Great Britain? Why should it have been made a part of this imperial agreement? If the situation which he describes needed to be met, it was quite possible to meet it in some other way and not to include this item in an agreement to which we are bound for a period of five years. That is one point to which we object.

Mr. STEVENS: May I answer a point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer? Since he spoke I have received definite information that neither by the manufacturer nor by one of the large distributors throughout western Canada has there been any increase in the cost of barbed wire in the period mentioned.

Mr. SPENCER: Is any safeguard being provided against increases?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is possible that the communications which I and others have received refer only to the stopping of temporary dumping. I am not making any assertion as to that. I am simply stating the facts as to the prices paid. May I, while I am on my feet, express my agreement with one point raised by the hon. member for Lisgar? If these tariffs had for their purpose not so much the diversion of trade as the protection of Canadian industry from unfair dumping, I certainly think it would have been far better, with that end in view, to introduce the item definitely as part of the Canadian tariff which may be altered at our discretion at any time, instead of making it part of the agreement.

Mr. YOUNG: I am sorry the Prime Minister has left his seat. While he was speaking I took down some of the figures he quoted. He spoke of $1,300,000,000 worth of Canadian farm products being consumed by 10,000,000 people in a year. I asked him if he had made any allowance for duplications, and he said the figures he gave were accurate. This would mean $130 worth consumed annually by every man, woman and child in Canada, or $650 worth for a family, in addition to tea, coffee, tropical fruits and such other foodstuffs as we bring in from abroad. It does not require any close scrutiny of the figures to realize there is something wrong with them. If the Prime Minister's information as to what is going on in Holland in connection with barbed wire is no more accurate than his information in connection with the consumption by the Canadian people of foodstuffs grown on Canadian farms, then I think he is acting without sufficient information in raising these tariffs. The imports of barbed wire were $125,000 from all sources, of which $10,000 came from the United Kingdom, leaving $115,000 coming in from abroad. The Canadian production, the minister tells us, was $535,000. The total consumption in Canada must therefore be $660,000 worth, of which $115,000 comes in from abroad. In order to divert that $115,000 worth which comes in from abroad, and only $33,000 of it comes in from Holland, either to the United Kingdom or Canadian factories, we, the people of Canada, are going to pay an extra 10 per cent on the whole $660,000 worth, or $66,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. YOUNG: It is going to cost us $66,000 to divert $115,000 worth of business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister tells us that there is no market in Holland for barbed wire, and that is why he cannot fix a price. But there is a market in Holland for Canadian wheat, and as was stated in the house by several hon. members the other evening, the ministers in Holland have said that they would not buy Canadian wheat because our government is doing its level best to stifle all Holland's trade with Canada. I want to know something about this Canadian industry which is going to get this extra $66,000. How many men does it employ and what wages are they paid?

Mr. RHODES: In the first place I must take exception to the deduction of my hon. friend that there is going to be an increased cost of $66,000. We do not admit that for one minute. I do not propose to traverse the ground I have covered on previous occasions but I do not by any means admit my hon. friend's contention that there will be an increase in price.

Mr. YOUNG: There has been already.

Mr. RHODES: No, there has been none; we have that officially and that statement stands. The argument of my hon. friend and of others who have opposed the placing of a duty of 10 per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs is predicated entirely upon the assumption that there will be a corresponding increase in price. If there is no increase in price their argument falls to the ground. I presume if there were no increase in price they would agree to the proposition that it is far better to purchase from Great Britain than from foreign countries any given commodity. Perhaps they will not subscribe to that, but at all events that is our view on this side of the house. My hon. friend asks how many are employed and what wages they are paid. I am surprised at his modesty. I wonder that he did not ask their ages, their weight and the colour of their hair. It is absolutely impossible to give my hon. friend the information he desires because this is only one branch of an industry with many ramifications. We have no data and nothing to indicate how many men in the industry as a whole are engaged in the manufacture of barbed wire. In fact, I doubt very much if the industry itself would be able to make that computation with any degree of accuracy because of the wide ramifications of its manufactures. But the main thing upon which we should centre our attention is whether this provision will or will not increase the price to the consumer. If it does not increase the price, then nothing but benefit can result.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister says that he has no data as to the number of men employed or the wages paid in the manufacture of barbed wire. If he has not, then I want to know what arguments were presented to the government in favour of this legislation by those who asked for a higher duty on barbed wire. The one reason they must have had for doing this was that the industry was going to employ Canadian labour, and surely the government must have asked the extent of the labour employed and the wages paid in order to get some idea of what this additional cost to the farmer was going to yield to labour in this country. If not, the government were guilty of giving the manufacturers everything they asked for without looking into their case.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has again, as he so frequently does, made a statement on his own ipse dixit and then predicated an argument on it as if it were gospel truth.

Mr. YOUNG: Then shatter my argument.

Mr. RHODES: I will to this extent. The manufacturers had nothing to do with this item. They may or may not have been consulted, but my hon. friend fails to grasp the fact that in a conference which produces an agreement, it must be a matter of agreement all around. Since these agreements were reached I have discussed with manufacturers their effect upon their industries, and many of them had not the remotest idea that the tariff as affecting their particular industry was to be touched at all.

Mr. YOUNG: Was it a grab bag you had?

Mr. RHODES: I will not admit to my hon. friend that it was a grab bag or anything else. This agreement was evolved as a result of the conference in precisely the same way that any other agreement would be evolved under similar circumstances. My hon. friend must rid his mind of that all-pervading suspicion of his that because this agreement has resulted in a certain change of tariffs, therefore the changes were made because of the machinations of some manufacturers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one point I should like to bring out in regard to the relation of the tariff to a possible increase in price. There may be at the moment a difference of view as to whether or not there has been an increase, but I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that there may be an increase between now and the end of the next five years. Assuming that this increase of tariff had been made in the usual way, not as an agreement with Britain dealing with the British preference, but as part of a budget regularly brought down by the Minister of Finance, the government would have told us that should the price be increased they would have it in their power to reduce or remove the duty. That, they have been telling us all along, is the method open to them if the Canadian manufacturer, not the British manufacturer, tries to increase his price. But take the position of the Canadian manufacturer who in a trade agreement with Britain gets this advantage. In this agreement we are obligating ourselves not to alter that tariff for five years. We are taking away the one remedy which in the past, according to the government's own admission, the consumers had against high tariffs. But by this agreement we are giving to the Canadian manufacturer a monopoly for the next five years, so far as it can be created by the tariff, and during that period of time we cannot change the tariff. The situation is altogether different. This barbed wire item only serves to illustrate what is true of a very large number of items in this tariff agreement. Previously the Canadian manufacturers were to a certain extent controlled in respect to their prices, because the government had always the power to lower or to remove the duty, but now they are in an entirely different position, in an especially favoured position by virtue of which they can say to the government: You have no power to change this tariff because parliament has obligated itself—this is the government's point of view—in order to maintain the preferential margin that is given to Great Britain, to retain this tariff as it stands for a period of five years. That is the serious aspect of the whole matter.

Mr. RHODES: I think it should be understood in connection with any undertaking in regard to an increase in price that it does not necessarily mean that that commodity shall remain forever at a given price. So far as I am concerned, and I am speaking only for myself, I should like to see the price of barbed wire double, and the price of wheat double and treble. I would like to see commodity prices increased throughout the country and throughout the world, because I believe that that is one of the fundamental conditions that must precede a return to prosperity. Bearing that in mind, may I say that the undertaking with respect to an increase in price has reference in all instances to an increase which arises out of action which has been taken with respect to the tariff. I point out to my right hon. friend the statement which was made by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago when he said that if as a result of this action there was an increase we had our remedy under certain provisions of this agreement, which we have.

Mr. RALSTON: Under this agreement?

Mr. RHODES: There is provision for consultation.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, pshaw!

Mr. RHODES: I may tell my hon. friend that since this agreement has been signed, sealed and delivered, we have had occasion to communicate with the mother country and have had a satisfactory response to representations we have made to them.

Mr. RALSTON: I have been trying to find out what it means.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will find out before the committee rises because I purpose to move certain amendments. I have no doubt in the world that an improved condition will follow, because this government will not be a party to the continuation of legislation which would have a subversive effect on the industry of the farmer.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to direct my remarks to a statement made by the minister a moment ago, the accuracy of which I shall not challenge. I think he spoke in absolute sincerity, but may have created a misapprehension or misunderstanding. He has said that the government has satisfied itself that the price has not been increased. I think the facts are that at least in certain districts—and I am placing my statement at an absolute minimum—some farmers are obliged to pay more than they were paying. In that way the price has been increased to them. I accept the minister's word when he states that the industry in Canada, the regular wholesale and perhaps retail price, has not been interfered with. I point out however that the statement to the effect that the price has not been increased may be misapprehended by those who read his remarks. As I have said I believe the minister meant that the regular wholesale and retail price of Canadian goods has not been increased, but as the result of the stoppage of dumping some farmers may be paying more today than they were paying a little while ago.

Mr. RHODES: My statement was based upon the assurance which we have received from the largest producer and largest distributor in Canada. I have had inquiries made in the city of Ottawa, and I find the hardware dealers in this city are not charging one cent more than they did a week or a month ago. I am advised further that the T. Eaton Company throughout Canada are charging no more. I say to my hon. friend that I cannot conceive of a situation where a retailer could increase his price by reason of the fact that the dump was applied to foreign barbed wire, because he is able to get barbed wire from Canadian distributors for the same price as he has been paying for the past three months. We will pursue the inquiry further, as far as we can. As hon. members know however we cannot constitutionally take action in connection with the retail sale of a commodity in a given community, but we will keep close watch upon the situation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was merely differentiating between the price in Canada and the increase in price certain farmers have to pay, due to local conditions.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, this is one of those rare occasions when I feel I should like to take up two or three minutes of the time of the committee. I have listened very carefully to the temperate and reasonable argument of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman); I have listened to the much less temperate argument of my dear old friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown); I have listened to the very eccentric argument by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young)—very true to form—and I have failed to find in any one of those arguments a criticism of the essential facts set forth in the schedule which provides that, after all, there shall be afforded to the British manufacturer in the Canadian market that opportunity which we as Canadians seek for our own. I have failed to find in any one of the arguments advanced a suggestion as to why we should desert or operate against the British manufacturer in favour of the manufacturer from some point outside the empire. I do not wish to labour the matter, but desire merely to lay before the committee an obvious fact upon which I should like to hear discussion, and concerning which I should like to hear the remarks of any hon. member who desires to dispute it. The point is this: Why should it be said that the Canadian manufacturer and British manufacturer should not have full opportunity, and that this tariff as laid down in the terms set out in item 401, providing for tariffs of free, 10 per cent and 10 per cent, should be used to help people outside the British Empire? If any hon. member will tell the reason why that should be done, I for one should be happy to listen to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one desires to help people outside the empire; it is our desire to help the consumers and farmers in Canada.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That answer will not do.

Mr. RALSTON: In answer to the hon. member I would say that we find difficulty in discovering why both the British and Canadian manufacturer should be entitled to charge the Canadian consumer 10 per cent more than they charged before.

An hon. MEMBER: They are not doing it.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point my hon. friend has missed altogether.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): No.

Mr. RALSTON: I just wish to say a word or two about what would appear to be something in the nature of a fatherless child. Apparently the British manufacturer did not want this item; the Canadian manufacturers did not want it, and I take it that the farmers did not want it. I do not believe the government really understands how it happened that this item was put in the agreement. The fact remains however that it is here.

Mr. MORAND: It is there for the workmen, who are also consumers.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Finance is not sure that the Canadian manufacturers had anything to do with it at all. I should have thought they would have been interested. The Prime Minister has given what I take to be the real reason for the government putting this duty into effect. He has said the reason they are imposing the 10 per cent duty is because they are unable to impose a dumping duty. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre quite properly asked the Prime Minister why, if Canadian interests were being injured the dumping duty provisions were not invoked. As I understood him the Prime Minister replied that the reason was that they were unable to determine domestic prices in countries like Holland or Germany, and that therefore it was impossible to use these provisions. I remind the committee and the Prime Minister that the provisions for dumping duty include not only basing duty on the domestic price in the country of origin, but there is a further provision in section 37 of the Customs Act for fixing a fair market price, another provision in section 41, and another in section 43. Section 43 makes no mention of domestic price at all. That section gives the Minister of National Revenue power, under authority of the governor in council, to fix any price he likes as a fair market value of goods, regardless of what domestic prices may be or what costs of production may be.

I should like to put on record section 43 (1) which was passed immediately after this government came into power. It is as follows:

43. (1) If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council on a report from the minister that goods of any kind are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers or manufacturers—

Which is what the Prime Minister said was being done.

--the governor in council may authorize the minister to fix the value for duty of any class or kind of such goods, and notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the value so fixed shall be deemed to be the fair market value of such goods.

I submit my right hon. friend and his government have had ample opportunity to deal with any injurious situation which may have arisen. I believe the Prime Minister's reason for imposing the 10 per cent duty falls to the ground. One is driven to look for the real reason, and to try to find out why a straight 10 per cent duty was imposed, notwithstanding the fact that the government had the right to fix a dumping duty. There is, I submit, only one reason left, that is the reason which has been given and reiterated in this committee, the reason that by putting on this duty and agreeing to maintain the margin of preference for five years a fixed duty of ten per cent has been imposed against the Canadian consumer in favour of the Canadian manufacturer. There can be no other reason. There is ample opportunity to deal with any special situation, but evidently that is not deemed to be enough. I ask my hon. friends, do they think ten per cent would ever meet the situation? Of course not. We have now a static and frozen duty of ten per cent for five years. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Bell) suggests that we ought to give the British manufacturer the same position as the Canadian. He has been in that position for the last thirty-five years. These goods have been coming in from the British manufacturer, and the Canadian manufacturer had no duty to protect him. Exactly the same position exists at the present time. The one thing that is done is to add this irritating dumping provision, put on by my hon. friends, and to fix a definite duty of ten per cent which has got to be maintained for five years.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Against the foreigner.

Mr. RALSTON: But in favour of the Canadian manufacturer and against the Canadian consumer. I pointed out last night that the Canadian manufacturer and the British manufacturer can each ride immediately under that ten per cent tariff and adjust their prices accordingly, and I have failed to get from my hon. friends any suggestion that they would invoke the provisions of section 19 and strike out the duty in case they found it was being taken advantage of. That is one of our great objections to this treaty, not only to this item but to 138 other items in this tariff where free entry from Great Britain is provided but also a fixed duty against the rest of the world, in order that the Canadian manufacturer may have the benefit of it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): May I ask my hon. friend if the effect of what he has just advanced would not be, if carried to the length which he suggests, to provide free trade entirely along all lines in this country, and the absolute destruction of the British preference?

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all. My hon. friend forgets that, as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has pointed out, for thirty-five years we have had free trade in barbed wire, and the manufacturers are still getting along. It is remarkable that at the time of the imperial conference, when the British manufacturers did not want it, and according to the Minister of Finance the Canadian manufacturers did not want it, advantage is taken of this occasion to put on a straight tariff item of ten per cent—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Against the foreigner.

Mr. RALSTON: We have had the benefit of free trade in barbed wire for the last thirty-five years, yet it has been produced and sold by Canadian manufacturers in very large amounts, and we are still awaiting the information as to how many employees there are in the industry.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot allow my hon. friend to place in the mouth of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, words which he never used. My hon. friend says that according to the Minister of Finance the Canadian manufacturer did not want it, the British manufacturer did not want it. The Minister of Finance never made any such statement.

Mr. RALSTON: What I understood him to say was that they were not consulted in any way, and he knew of no representations of any kind from the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Finance was very clear and very reasoned in his statement. What he said was this, that there was no specific demand from manufacturers, either British or Canadian. He said it arose, as nearly all the other items in this agreement arose, out of conversations and conferences leading up to what we might say is the consummation of the whole, namely the agreement. My hon. friend, is a very able lawyer, and when speaking in the house is not restrained by the ordinary rules of court procedure and is therefore able to put statements in very clever and skilled manner, getting on the record arguments which have not been advanced at all—

Mr. RALSTON: You are too flattering.

Mr. STEVENS: It is too bad. I might say something more but probably I had better refrain. Another point; we cannot allow to go unchallenged the reiterated statement of hon. gentlemen opposite that because an item is placed in the tariff it immediately follows as a matter of course that Canadian manufacturers take advantage of that tariff. We challenge that statement, we claim that it cannot be sustained. In the present instance my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) said he had heard that prices had increased. We instituted at once official inquiries and I gave a moment ago the answer, namely, that the chief manufacturing concern in Canada producing these goods had positively not increased its price in any sense. I have also official information that the T. Eaton Company, one of the biggest distributors in western Canada, have not increased their price one iota. I also have official information from the trade in the city of Ottawa that no increase has been made here. We have not had time to make inquiry further, but that ought to be accepted at its face value for the time being.

My hon. friend referred to section 43, he said: Why did not the Minister of National Revenue invoke section 43? I invite the hon. member for Lisgar, the hon. member for Weyburn, and a number of others to witness this, that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, amidst some considerable desk-thumping from other members around him, endorsed absolutely the doctrine of applying section 43.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: And challenged, in fact berated, the Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. RALSTON: That is not even clever.

Mr. STEVENS: It must be clever, because it is what my hon. friend did. Moreover it is true. He berated the Minister of National Revenue; he said, he has section 37, he has section 41 and section 43, why doesn't he use section 43? That is precisely what my hon. friend said, if that is not an invitation to invoke section 43 I do not understand the English language. Of course when you put the hon. gentleman "on the spot" as it were, he naturally wants to get out of that dilemma. The hon. gentleman is very skilful about invoking some excuse to entangle his opponents or the government.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. YOUNG: They are entangled in barbed wire now!

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has never got disentangled mentally or any other way, that is the trouble. The Prime Minister made a very complete statement of the situation and I am not going to repeat it. In regard to this question of barbed wire there is no doubt that during the past year or more Canada has been subjected to unfair practices in trade. That applies not only to barbed wire but to other commodities. It is an unfortunate condition that exists in the world, it is not peculiar to Canada. It arises out of a quite well-known economic condition; merchants all over the world find themselves in possession of large stocks of goods, or in possession of plants that they desire to keep going. I presume Canadian producers would do the same thing. If they can dump their excess products on some other market and thus maintain at least a salvage price for that portion, so as to cut down the percentage of overhead on the whole, they do so. It has been a practice, a bad practice, a very embarrassing practice, and one which the whole world is now studying with a view to getting rid of. We were faced with this condition. My hon. friend from Red Deer was fair enough in his observations to say that he did not advocate that Canadian consumers should take advantage of a condition of that kind, he was satisfied if the ordinary principles of fair trade were observed. Now the Prime Minister indicated this problem, and my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth laughed at him. The Prime Minister properly said that it was very difficult to secure under section 6 of the Customs Act, the dumping clause, the evidence upon which that clause might be applied. That is for the very simple reason that barbed wire has no local sale in Belgium that would enable this government to fix the sale price in that country. "But," the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth says, "that does not matter; why did you not invoke section 43?" That is a different section altogether, and in this case we did not desire or choose to invoke section 43. Here we have this arrangement by which we give an advantage to the British manufacturer in this market. The Canadian consumer is ensured fair treatment for two reasons: First, he has had fair treatment in the past from the Canadian manufacturer and there is no indication that this will be changed; in the second place he has the competition of the British producer as a check upon the Canadian manufacturer. I think I can say with some degree of assurance, based upon the experience we have had in the past, that the consumer of barbed wire need have no apprehension with regard to increased prices due to this tariff. I agree with my colleague the Minister of Finance when he says that whether they be products of the farm, of the mine or of the forest, or the general products of industry in this country, I sincerely hope all commodities experience a substantial increase in value within the next year or two. I think there is not a country in the world, or any government, or any leader of agriculture or industry, but will join in the fervent expectation and desire that commodity prices will increase, so I would not for a moment say that the prices of barbed wire will not increase in the next two or three years. I hope barbed wire will increase in price, as my colleague has said, just as I hope wheat, butter, lumber, copper, iron, fish and all other products will increase in price.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the minister sits down I should like to ask him just one question on that point of prices. Would the minister give the committee the average wholesale price of barbed wire at Fort William for each of the last four years?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not that information under my hand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is rather important.

Mr. STEVENS: I will endeavour to secure that information, but I could not give it to my hon. friend offhand. I presume it can be secured from some of the trade journals, and I will endeavour to have that done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I thought the experts would have that.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry I do not have it before me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could the minister give the price last year?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Prime Minister was able to give a figure.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister mentioned the figure of $2.32 as the price in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I want the comparative figures for the last four years.

Mr. STEVENS: I will say this: Bearing in mind the fall in the prices of the basic commodities that enter into the manufacture of barbed wire, such as pig iron, steel billets, rods, bars and so forth, I would say there has been a considerable diminution in the price as compared with 1930, 1929 and 1928. I would hazard that guess.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Undoubtedly there should have been a drop, but we do not know whether or not there has been.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There has been a great fall in the price of the raw products.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and I imagine there has been a drop in the price of the finished article. I will hazard my recollection, not based upon anything definite before me; it is that the price of barbed wire three years ago was something like $3. I think that is a fairly accurate statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to say just one word in reply to my hon. friend. The tortuous argument into which he has been driven and in which he has become entangled shows to what extremities hon. gentlemen opposite must go in order to becloud what is the real issue in connection with this item. My hon. friend, who is usually pretty logical, I think went pretty far afield in his endeavour to get some comfort from the fact that I had pointed out to the Prime Minister that section 43 was there to be used if the condition which he considered existed made that action necessary in his opinion. I just want to remind the committee again that I was endeavouring, if I could, to find the justification for the ten per cent duty. The right hon. Prime Minister had said that the ten per cent duty was necessary in order to protect the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian workman. I was pointing out to him that section 43 provided specifically that the governor in council might, if they found the interest of Canadian manufacturers in their opinion prejudicially affected, put on a special value for duty purposes.

I want to say to my hon. friend that when he reads Hansard I do not think he will find that I made any suggestion or conveyed any idea such as he suggests, that I approved of section 43. If the minister will look at the record of the debates at that time he will find that I opposed as strenuously as I could just the sort of thing contained in that section. I pointed out that it was placing in the hands of the government a power which they were not entitled to exercise, the power of parliament to impose taxes and duties. I say to my hon. friend as positively and seriously as I can that I do not approve of section 43 and never have approved of it. I simply said to his leader, "If you were in the straits you have suggested, do not tell us you had to put on a ten per cent duty. Two years ago you took power to impose a special dumping duty by fixing a market value for duty purposes."

I just want to make this further point; I believe that already my hon. friend and the government to which he belongs are coming to realize—and it arises out of this imperial conference—that the provisions of section 43, and similar provisions, are not good for the trade of the dominion. We find in this agreement a provision whereby the surcharges on British goods are to be removed just as soon as possible, and this is one of the surcharges. So let my hon. friend take no comfort whatever from the fact that I referred his leader to section 43. I was only showing that he had ample power to accomplish the purpose he said he desired to accomplish, without putting on a 10 per cent duty. My hon. friend has not answered the contention made from this side of the house, that there was no reason under the sun for putting a 10 per cent duty on barbed wire at this time, and making it binding on us for five years, except one. That one was that he felt that putting 10 per cent on when the budget is brought down would be only fixing it from year to year, and that therefore the Canadian manufacturer would not have the benefit of a fixed agreement such as we have in the pact now before us.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has said that he opposed the adoption of section 43. May I remind him that he was a member of the government that first put section 43 on the statute books, which at that time was limited in its application to natural products. All we did was to enlarge it and apply it to other products. My hon. friend was in the government that originated the legislation and approved of the principle. We only extended the application of that principle.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to tell my hon. friend that I was not a member of the government which took that action; that was done before my day. As he says very fairly, the section only applied to a limited list of agricultural products, and at that time it was bitterly opposed by the then leader of the opposition.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The section was general in its application to natural products.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and of the minister one point that as yet has not been mentioned in connection with this question of barbed wire. My point is that the price the farmer receives for his cattle is the only money with which he can buy barbed wire. The Prime Minister stressed the fact that we had a big advantage in connection with barbed wire in that it was sold here at $2.32 per hundredweight as compared with $2.60 in the United States. I find that yesterday the top price for cattle in the Toronto stockyards was $4.50, and that at Chicago it was $8.50, or almost double the Canadian price. The United States farmer, we see, has more money with which to buy barbed wire, though I imagine he gets that wire as cheaply as the Canadian farmer buys it.

There is another point which I think has been overlooked; it is that in connection with many of these articles the farmer must pay the retail price, whatever that may be. Very often the farmer cooperatives find that they cannot fill their requirements from Canadian manufacturers or jobbers. In some cases they have refused to sell cooperative associations and the cooperatives have had to get their supplies from outside. I do not know whether that condition has ever obtained in connection with barbed wire, but it has in many other commodities; and once this duty is placed on barbed wire, any Canadian cooperative concern which wishes to secure barbed wire for its customers, may have to go outside for its requirements and pay this duty. It seems to me that wherever a tariff is put on for the benefit of the manufacturers there should be provision that they shall sell freely to cooperative organizations on the same terms as to jobbers and regular wholesalers. This I think is a very important point. It is owing to the tariff that certain wholesalers, jobbers and manufacturers in Canada persistently refuse to sell to cooperative organizations. I would suggest to the government that they insert in the customs tariff the provision that wherever there is a refusal to sell to cooperative organizations the tariff will be taken off.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member for Lisgar declares that we are merely sitting in our places over here and are afraid to speak. May I say for his information that in Marquette we are buying barbed wire cheaper today than ever before; it has not advanced one iota. Another thing I want to tell him is that we are not so keen on the use of barbed wire; we prefer Page wire. Good farmers will fence their farms with Page wire. You can pick out every member on the other side who fences his farm with barbed wire and you will find that he has a coil of it in his stomach. I remember the hon. member for Lisgar rising in his place a short time ago and lamenting about hides. Does he know that the hides of cattle in Canada are ruined by barbed wire? I would advise every farmer in Canada to fence his farm with Page wire. If the farmers would do this it would raise the price of their hides, and there would be no need for us to go to South America to bring in hides, as we are forced to do, selling our own hides at a ridiculous figure. The hon. member for Macleod compares the prices of cattle in Canada and in the United States. A good herd of cattle will sell at 5 cents when poor ones are not worth half a cent. I do not know what he is comparing them with. I have become tired of listening to these arguments, because they are all wrong. Let the farmer fence his farm with as much Page wire as he can and get away from this barbed wire argument, which is not helping agriculture one bit. I will say this to the hon. member for Lisgar. If any duty is raised through action on this side he will hear me speak about it, because it will be taken away if I have anything to say about it, and propaganda such as he is putting forward for political purposes will not be worth anything when the time comes for him to go to the country.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Marquette is always amusing if not convincing. He says they are buying barbed wire in Marquette cheaper today than ever before. I cannot accept that statement as being in accordance with the facts because I am quite certain that the price is no lower in Marquette than it is in Lisgar, and it is not as cheap in Lisgar today as it has been in the past. However, that is not important.

Mr. MULLINS: There is not nearly the demand for barbed wire in Marquette that there is in Lisgar.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member says that we should fence with Page wire instead of barbed wire. I agree with him absolutely.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the duty on Page wire?

Mr. BROWN: Does he think of the difference in the cost? The hon. member for West Hamilton can sit back in a comfortable chair, knowing nothing about the concerns of the farmer, and criticize me for not being as temperate as the hon. member for Red Deer. This is the second time my conduct has been compared with that of the hon. member. All I can say is that if hon. members opposite knew as well as I know, from practical experience extending over a great many years, the conditions that confront the farmers today, they would not be able to present the case as temperately and unconcernedly as some of them do. Will the hon. member for Marquette agree to support me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BROWN: —in advocating a reduction in the duty on Page wire? He ought to know, as we all know, that to fence with Page wire involves a tremendously higher cost than the use of barbed wire. It costs almost a fortune to fence a farm today with Page wire. This is my personal business, but I may tell the hon. member that I put a sheep fence around a quarter section two years ago and it cost over $600, and if I had not had old posts of my own the cost would have been a great deal more. Hon. members must bear in mind that the posts for Page wire also cost a good deal more. Why does not the hon. member for Marquette come forward and advocate a reduction in the duty on Page wire? If he did so he would see how far he would get with hon. gentlemen opposite. So much for my hon. friend from Marquette. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is astute in diverting an argument from the strict point at issue, said that our objections were based upon the assumption—these may not have been his exact words—that immediately prices would be raised. Now, we know perfectly well and he knows that the business men, the manufacturers, are too astute to raise their prices immediately. But is it not to be expected, in the light of past experience, that the increase in duty will result in an increase in price? I am amazed—perhaps I should not say amazed, because nothing that happens on the other side amazes me now—rather, I might say that it is strange that farmer members opposite should accept the assurance of the government that prices will not be raised as a result of the increase in the duty, notwithstanding that they were firmly convinced that the increase in the duty on butter would result in an increase in price to the farmer. Why, the very purpose of putting on tariffs is to raise the price. That has been admitted again and again. While, therefore, we may not expect an immediate rise in the price of barbed wire, we must remember that this agreement extends over five years. Furthermore, while we have agreed in this treaty to maintain a margin of preference, that is to say, of 10 per cent as between free and 10, there is nothing in the agreement that will prevent the rasing of the duty on barbed wire from 10 to 20 per cent in the next five years. I do not fancy that will be forbidden under the terms of the agreement. Since the government has entered upon the course of protecting the manufacturer in Canada to the extent of 10 per cent, we have no assurance that hon. gentlemen opposite will not continue in the path in which they have started.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am sorry that the minister could not give the hon. member for Bow River the information asked for in respect of prices for each of the last two or three years, because I have in mind that the price of iron and steel, the raw material, having dropped considerably in the last two or three years, wire should show some corresponding degree of diminution. As a matter of fact, without knowing the relative prices both of iron and steel and of wire during the last two or three years, we are not quite certain whether the dump price paid for Dutch wire or the price paid for Canadian wire is really a fair price when you consider the cost of the raw material itself.

Mr. MULLINS: May I ask the hon. member for Lisgar why he fenced that quarter section of land with Page wire.

Mr. BROWN: To hold the sheep in.

Mr. MULLINS: For the simple reason, if he put the sheep in there with that barbed wire, he would see the wool hanging on the wire all over the place. He knew the barbed wire would strip the sheep and that is why he used the Page wire. Why did they stop using barbed wire in Belgium? Why did they ship it over here and dump it into this country? They did so because they knew they could not use it successfully on their farms, and any farmer that uses other than Page wire is making a mistake. It is better for him to fence his farm with Page wire even if it does cost a little more. We in Marquette are getting pretty well away from barbed wire, but I cannot speak so definitely about the district from which the hon. member comes. I know we prefer to fence our farms with Page wire rather than barbed wire. Barbed wire, however, is not costing any more today—and I am speaking of the present time—than it did previously; it is to my knowledge, as cheap today as it ever was in Marquette.

Mr. BROWN: That has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think I would have risen had it not been for the fact that the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) would seem to wax somewhat eloquent in defence of this increase in duty, and that the minister assures us there will be no increase in price. It will be something new in the calendar of prices if there is no increase when a duty is imposed. Obviously, the object in imposing a duty is to keep competition out. I admit we are human and are always ready to get whatever we can under the provisions of this agreement.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am unalterably opposed to this agreement, but there is one industry in Canada and that is rubber, where they have not been taking full advantage of the duty which is provided.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That is very human.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is human for a manufacturer. What I wanted to remark was this: like my colleague from the east I am surprised that the dumping duty was not invoked. I must congratulate the government on the fact that this is one item in connection with which they did not invoke the dumping duty when they had an opportunity to do so. That, in itself, however, makes me rather suspicious of the increase.

There are some very interesting things in connection with this increase. One of them is that there has been a reduction in connection with raw products entering into the manufacture of wire and it is rather remarkable that wire, unlike wheat, cattle and sheep with which the hon. member for Marquette has endeavoured to pull the wool over our eyes, has not dropped seriously in price. One would look for a greater reduction. My complaint is that the excessive tariff imposed by my hon. friends opposite has been the cause of this. When they were able to invoke tariffs, world prices prevailed, but the farmers are suffering a very severe reduction in the prices of their commodities. My hon. friends from West Hamilton and South Essex and some others must have known who were the users of upholstery. The farmers have not an opportunity of using it these days; they sit on wooden seats. As regards wire entering into the manufacture of upholstery the duty is just one-half that on barbed wire. It is remarkable how much information the Prime Minister, a bachelor, has about ladies' apparel. There is no increase in the duty on steel entering into the construction of stays. That is allowed to remain at five and a half per cent or one-half the amount charged against barbed wire. My hon. friend can sit and read his paper in comfort on springs, the duty on which is one-half that upon barbed wire.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): They do not wear stays nowadays.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where did my hon. friend get the information? I was not aware of that; I thought they were still in use. The fact that they are not used any more of course explains why this government did not put a duty on them. It is remarkable that while hon. gentlemen are satisfied to admit free of duty articles which they in urban localities have to use and which they may require as a raw product in their manufactures, wherever the chance arises they give their unanimous approval to any proposal to soak the consumer a little bit more.

Mr. CAMPBELL: As regards prices, I should like to put on record some figures that have been sent to me in correspondence I have had from the west. My information is that a new price list was issued by the Canadian manufacturers of barbed wire on September 27, 1932. This was an increase of nineteen cents for a spool of barbed wire to wholesalers. My correspondent says that by the time this reaches the farmer it would probably mean an increase of from 30 to 35 cents per spool. This, of course, had nothing to do with the treaty; the treaty could not be blamed for fixing this price, but the application of the dumping duty against importations of barbed wire from Holland prior to that is blamed as being the cause of this. I do not know whether that is so or not. Possibly the minister could give us some further information with regard to these prices.

There is one thing to which I wish to draw the minister's attention. In a letter which I have from a western importer, he states that in November, 1932, the continental price of standard barbed wire was $48.80 for 2,240 pounds in Canadian funds. He quotes the same quality of barbed wire in Britain at $72.50 per 2,240 pounds in Canadian funds. His whole argument is that ordinarily it is utterly impossible for barbed wire manufactured in Britain to come into Canada. Of course I am not altogether convinced that is true, because I find from the figures quoted in Trade of Canada we imported for the twelve months ending March, 1932, barbed wire to the following amounts:

| From | Value |
|---|---|
| Great Britain | $10,382 |
| United States | 39,076 |
| Belgium | 28,330 |
| Germany | 13,470 |
| Netherlands | 33,752 |

It would appear fairly obvious that if there were the disparity in prices which these figures indicate, it would be impossible for this barbed wire to come in from Great Britain. The minister, however, might enlighten us upon this question because it is very important as to the relative prices on barbed wire manufactured on the continent and in Great Britain.

I may say that the same importer points out in his letter that a Hamilton manufacturer of barbed wire charges $2.47½ per spool for standard barbed wire, four-point, delivered at Fort William, but the same manufacturer ships that down the St. Lawrence river, around the Panama canal, up the Pacific ocean to Vancouver and delivers it there for $2.35 a spool to meet competition. He is endeavouring to prove that the application of the dumping duty did give the local manufacturer an opportunity to act in restraint of trade, to take advantage of the local consumer in eastern Canada and on the prairies. Possibly the minister might give us some information on that point. I would ask him particularly if he has any information to confirm or challenge the figures given to me by this wholesaler as to the difference in price between British and continental barbed wire. I will send the papers over to the minister so that he can have a look at them.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure that my hon. friend will realize that one cannot, merely by looking at figures given by one wholesaler, confirm or contradict the figures. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre a few moments ago gave comparative figures as to the British and continental prices, showing the price in Great Britain higher than on the continent. I can neither confirm nor challenge the figures. But what I do wish to point out to the committee, as I have already done, is this: We do not deny, in fact we know, that at the present time and for the last year or thereabouts there has been a definite dumping of this commodity from the continent of Europe, and we know pretty well how they evade the dumping section of the act. But as I intimated a moment ago, we do not consider we are justified in calling upon the Canadian industry or Canadian dealers to fix a definite and fair price based upon a deliberate dumping from a foreign country. This dumping is a class of business which unfortunately has been going on all over the world. Everybody deplores it, and I think there is a genuine desire on the part of all countries to get away from it. I think it is more or less useless to go into a long discussion of it. One thing is certain, that the price of barbed wire today is lower than it has been for several years. We do claim also that the Canadian industry has treated the Canadian consumer with absolute fairness, and I do not think anybody challenges that statement.

Mr. SPENCER: Does not the minister think the price of barbed wire ought to be lower in view of the price of farm products?

Mr. STEVENS: I have already admitted that. There is no doubt that there ought to be a lower price today than previously because of the drop in the price of raw materials. May I point out one thing in that regard? The hon. member for West Edmonton a few moments ago said that there had not been a corresponding drop in the retail price as compared with farm products. That is true. Why? Largely because wages have not fallen. I am not prepared at all to subscribe to the doctrine that there should be a wholesale drop in wages, but that is one of the fixed charges which have not come down in correspondence with the fall in commodity prices. What we are all hoping for is a restoration of fair commodity prices so that there may not be any need for a serious reduction in wages, which would add to the distress of the country still further.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I quite appreciate what the minister says with regard to the domestic price of barbed wire. I went into this matter very fully and I find that in Canada in September, 1900, the price of galvanized barbed wire was $2.80 per spool, and that the price ran as high as $4.80 in 1920, after which there was a progressive drop to $2.60 in October, 1932. The price is lower today than it was in 1900.

But the principal point that I wished to make in the remarks I addressed to the minister was with respect to the alleged difference between the British and continental prices. It is possible that the prices quoted for continental barbed wire were distress prices, not the regular prices, but the figures quoted to me and which I gave to the committee a moment ago showed the British price to be fifty per cent higher than the continental price. If that be the case there is no possibility of barbed wire coming into Canada under this item at all. It would simply mean an increased price to the consumer. Further, the figures showing that there were importations from Britain last year nearly equal to the importations from different continental countries would seem to disprove that alleged difference in prices, because if there was that difference in prices certainly no barbed wire would have come in from Great Britain. These figures, however, have been broadcast throughout the country, and I think most hon. members have received the same telegrams and communications that I have, and if the minister has any prices available, I think they should be put on record to show whether the figures I have quoted are correct or not.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. STEVENS: I have had a very brief opportunity of glancing over the paper my hon. friend has sent me. I notice that it is a statement computed by a Canadian firm on the Pacific coast representing a Holland exporter; that is, it is an importing firm on the Pacific coast representing Holland interests. I also notice that the figures quoted are the same as those given by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I think it would be most unfair to the British manufacturer to accept without careful checking prices given by the representative in this country of Britain's competitors. I do not know anything that could be more unfair than that. I do not say that this gentleman would deliberately mislead, but of course he is working in his own interests, and he wishes to preserve the continuance of what we know to be the dumping of continental barbed wire on to this continent. He represents those who are doing the dumping and consequently I would be very hesitant to accept his figures as fair. I would not say that they are not right because I have not had time to check them.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Like the minister I feel that the figures may not be correct in view of the fact that we did import a very considerable quantity of barbed wire from Great Britain last year, which would hardly have been possible if there had been such a difference in price.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I see it, this tariff item effects three purposes. It gives the country an opportunity to understand what the government meant when they said they were going to make the tariff fight for the farmer. It affords protection to a manufacturer when the interests of that manufacturer conflict with that of the consumer. Apparently the manufacturers of barbed wire got along very nicely for nearly a third of a century with barbed wire on the free list, until we came to a time quite recently when barbed wire came into this country from Holland at a cheaper price. That was too good a break to let the farmers, the buyers of barbed wire, enjoy. That would never do. A break in favour of the farmers was something that this government could not entertain. Therefore they came to the rescue of the manufacturer and put a ten per cent duty on barbed wire. Is that a fair way of putting it, Mr. Chairman? I think it is. Free barbed wire for many years operated satisfactorily, and stood up against competition. At this time, however, when farmers are in difficulties—I was going to make specific mention of the dairymen, but I shall speak generally—when all farmers are at the bottom of the ditch, and at a time when before long the whole country will be in the same ditch, drastic tariff changes upwards are made and pegged. This tariff change also permits the ministry to pad up still further the list of more or less fictitious preferential duties in favour of the motherland. When we come to the item concerning cream separators we will have a further very striking example of this fact.

These tariff changes serve another purpose, namely, that of gradually widening the gulf concerning tariff matters existing between the ministerial and opposition sides of the house. I am sorry for those who have to use barbed wire, because indigestible as it may be I am a consumer myself. I think the tariff issue between the two historic parties will be made more clear by this objectionable change of putting barbed wire off the free list so that when we go to bat next time we will know exactly where the government stands, and will have a clear conception of just how the government seeks to make the tariff fight for the farmers of Canada. I think hon. members will agree that this discussion will not effect any changes in the schedule now before us, but I felt I should voice my protest as strongly as possible. Possibly I shall have something further to say when we come to another item, cream separators, which in my view is equally outrageous.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there a clause in the agreement which prevents re-export from Great Britain?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN: No.

Mr. RHODES: No doubt the hon. member is aware of the provision which calls for empire content of not less than 50 per cent. Possibly that is the provision he has in mind.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the minister sure Great Britain will not import cream separators from the United States and send them back to Canada?

The CHAIRMAN: Order; we must confine ourselves to the item in question.

Mr. POULIOT: I am doing so.

Mr. RHODES: That action cannot be taken in regard to cream separators.

Mr. GOTT: I have listened to the debate on this item, and the only two objections I have heard from hon. members opposite are, first, an objection to buying British goods and second, an objection to buying Canadian goods. Of the two evils the latter is the greater.

An hon. MEMBER: That is very pretty.

Mr. BROWN: That is a distinct contribution to the debate.

Mr. POULIOT: Change your wires.

The CHAIRMAN: The next item is—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not yet agreed to item 401; I understand we have only covered the first part of it.

The CHAIRMAN: No, I read it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Although there is not much more to be said in regard to the barbed wire item, there are one or two general comments I should like to make. I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) of item 401 contain no changes in the British preferential rates. There have been four changes in the general tariff. In two cases the change is from free to 10 per cent, in another from 20 to 25 per cent, and in another from 30 to 35 per cent. In the intermediate tariff there are changes in all seven sections of the item. They are as follows: From free to 10 per cent; from 22½ to 25 per cent; from 15 to 20 per cent; from free to 10 per cent; from 17½ to 20 per cent; from 25 to 30 per cent and from 17½ to 20 per cent. The purpose of the changes in the intermediate tariff is to bring the intermediate rates to the same level as those appearing in the general tariff. These changes make it difficult, if not impossible, to negotiate agreements with other countries wishing to trade with Canada. It may be all very well to consider the advantage of the British preference as it applies to a British industry, but when we look at the iron and steel schedules as a whole we find that it is a case of carving up the industry of the British Empire in the interests of manufacturers. Where changes have been made they have been made for one group of manufacturers to serve the interests of other manufacturers. That might be well enough if some advantage ultimately accrued to the consumer, but it cannot be supported when in the long run the added cost is passed on as extra taxation to the consumer. Giving an advantage through the British preference must not be considered from the point of view of one industry alone, but from that of the country as a whole. Our objection to the schedule in its entirety is that there has been consideration for only that which is of advantage to the manufacturers concerned in the iron and steel business in its different forms, and that it ignores altogether the injurious effect the changes will have on other interests in the country, particularly the great consuming public.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—406: Coil chain, coil chain links, including repair links, and chain shackles, of iron or steel:
(b) less than one and one-eighth inches in diameter: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports under this item last year amounted to only $46,000. Of that amount $25,000 came from the United Kingdom, $10,000 from the United States and $11,000 from other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There again is the same objection. The British preference remains just where it was, but the general and intermediate tariffs have been shoved up five per cent. In each case the tariff was very high before, standing at 20 per cent, and it is now at 25 per cent. The object is not only to raise the tariff, but, as has been pointed out, to peg the price for the next five years so the Canadian manufacturer may be sheltered behind excessively high tariffs during that time.

Mr. DUFF: What was the value of these goods manufactured in Canada last year?

Mr. RHODES: It is impossible to give an accurate answer because they were not classified separately. The total production of which this would form a part was $1,000,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—407a. Chains, of iron or steel, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were valued at $89,000, of which $12,000 came from the United Kingdom, $75,000 from the United States and $2,000 from other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, could there be an example more palpable than this of endeavouring to increase the tariff under the pretext of giving Great Britain an increased preference? The British preferential rate remains at 20 per cent, the same as it was previously. If the government had wished to give a real preference to Great Britain they could have lowered the tariff to 15 per cent or 10 per cent. But instead of doing that they shove up a tariff standing at the high figure of 30 per cent, making it 35 per cent. Further, they changed the intermediate rate from 27½ per cent to 30 per cent. This is an instance of simply increasing protection without in any way helping the Britisher.

Mr. NEILL: This change in tariff will add to the cost of logging in British Columbia: my hon. friends from British Columbia reproached me the other day for not being wildly enthusiastic about the agreement, this item is an illustration of why I am not. No doubt it will increase very considerably the cost of operating in logging camps.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—408. Malleable sprocket chain and link belting chain, of iron or steel, including roller chain of all kinds for operating on steel sprockets or gears, when imported by manufacturers of agricultural implements for use exclusively in the manufacture of agricultural implements, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The imports under this item last year amounted to $24,000, of which $6,000 came from the United Kingdom and $18,000 from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This, as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has said, is just another instance of tariffs being made to fight against the farmer. The item relates to articles which enter into agricultural implements. The policy of the late Liberal administration was to free agricultural implements from duty as far as possible, and this item was free all across. Hon. gentlemen have left it where it was under the British preference, but they have put the duty up to 10 per cent in the intermediate and 10 per cent in the general. The minister has just shown what a small proportion came from Great Britain compared with the amount imported from other countries. It is another instance of a tariff for manufacturers, made by manufacturers, and put on the statutes by a manufacturers' government.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409. Cream separators and complete parts therefor, including steel bowls: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understood from a remark made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few days ago, when someone mentioned cream separators, that he had good justification for making this change. We would like to hear his alibi right now.

Mr. STEVENS: And I trust it will end the matter. It has been alleged that there is no value in this item, as regards the extension of British empire trade, because we do not bring cream separators from Great Britain.

Another allegation was that this will merely result in an increase in the price. I am going to deal briefly with both those points, but I hope as completely as necessary. First may I say that Canada will have access to other markets for cream separators. That should be borne in mind. Cream separators were introduced into this country, as far as Great Britain is concerned, about forty years ago, and it is rather interesting to know that the head of the firm which introduced the first cream separator into Canada at that time, was R. A. Lister of the R. A. Lister Company. I had a call the other day from the son of the gentleman who was and I assume still is the head of this firm, and had an opportunity of discussing the question with him from the standpoint of trade with Great Britain. This company sold very substantial quantities of cream separators to Canada. The history of the business is divided into pre-war and post war periods. This old country firm manufactured cream separators very extensively up to the outbreak of the war, when they turned their plant over to the British government for the manufacture of munitions, and the exportation of cream separators to Canada virtually stopped. They have exported some few to this country since. Another point is that very substantial quantities of cream separators have been imported annually into Canada from other countries, notably the United States and Sweden. Sweden, as hon. gentlemen will recall, is among the best manufacturers of this article in the world, they are very efficient and their product is very good. I will give a statement which with the permission of the committee I will place on Hansard:

The importations from the United States, roughly speaking, averaged $350,000 a year during this period. Belgium in the first ten years exported practically none, but during the last ten years Belgium has exported a very considerable number. I have not all the figures for 1932, but I notice that Sweden also shipped a considerable quantity of cream separators to Canada during that period. Those importations were as follows:

| 1910 | $ 4,081 |

A review of these figures indicates that we have had very material quantities of cream separators imported into this country. Great Britain, one of the earliest producers of cream separators, and one of the countries that in the earlier days prior to the war shipped us considerable quantities, is capable of producing and marketing cream separators in Canada successfully. In addition, I am assured by the representative of the British firm to which I have referred that they have made contacts with Canadian concerns to distribute their cream separators in Canada in what they hope will be increasing quantities. In return, they have made arrangements for the distribution in Great Britain of such Canadian agricultural machinery as may be suitable to that market.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did this company in England make these arrangements before or after the conference?

Mr. STEVENS: They were made after the conference, and as a result of it. Now I should like to say a word in regard to production. I should like to give the imports in numbers, not in dollars, for the sake of comparison, with the corresponding figure for production in Canada. Then the committee will have in mind the extent to which the domestic production corresponds to the importation:

| | Imports | Canadian production |
|---|---|---|
| 1923 | 5,530 | 14,279 |
| 1924 | 12,030 | 11,155 |
| 1925 | 10,998 | 11,897 |
| 1926 | 18,055 | 17,649 |
| 1927 | 23,658 | 16,643 |
| 1928 | 16,910 | 14,921 |
| 1929 | 19,451 | 13,431 |
| 1931 | 23,838 | 7,218 |

A comparison of these figures would indicate an increase in importations during the last ten years much greater than the production. In that regard it clearly shows the nature of the business in Canada. I submit to the committee in the first place that the British manufacturers of cream separators are competent to effectively supply this market. For the moment I am not suggesting that there should be a total exclusion of foreign cream separators, but I do submit that there is a sound case here for giving the British manufacturers a chance in this market, when you bear in mind that for our Canadian producers of cream separators we are securing equivalent treatment in the markets of the other dominions. In other words, we will have an opportunity to sell our goods in the other dominions just as freely as Great Britain can sell her goods.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have there been any exports from Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I have the figures for the export of cream separators from Canada, which are as follows:

|---|---|
| 1923 | $176,190 |
| 1924 | 82,185 |
| 1925 | 108,698 |
| 1926 | 101,685 |
| 1927 | 100,092 |
| 1928 | 77,197 |
| 1929 | 51,991 |
| 1930 | 37,339 |
| 1931 | 30,792 |

Mr. NEILL: Where did they go?

Mr. STEVENS: I understand that a very considerable quantity went to the United States, though some went to New Zealand and some, I think, to South Africa and Australia. I think we exported a considerable quantity to empire countries, though I have not those figures before me. Then we also had a considerable re-export business; that is, we exported foreign cream separators from Canada as well as those of domestic production.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suppose the machines exported are United States machines.

Mr. STEVENS: Not all, but I presume they were mainly United States machines; I think it would be safe to say that the great proportion of our re-export would be machines of American manufacture.

The point I am making is that in this business there is a capacity for expansion, both Canadian and British, without doing any injury to either the consumer or the producer in this country. As I have already indicated, we have received an added advantage in the markets of the other parts of the empire, and we are giving to Great Britain an advantage in this market so far as foreign competition is concerned. At the same time we have already developed in Canada a very healthy and substantial business in the production of cream separators. I questioned the gentleman with whom I spoke as to the price at which Great Britain could lay down those cream separators here; I must say that he spoke with reasonable reserve and I felt safe in putting confidence in what he said. He assured me that not only could they supply the market, but that the price would not be advanced over the price that had been paid for foreign separators as well as for their own. He told me there was no possibility or danger or likelihood of an increase in price because of this adjustment. I think they fully appreciate the value of this market for cream separators, and today are arranging for sales organizations throughout the country for the purpose of selling these machines.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did he disclose to the minister the reason why the British manufacturer got out of the market?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he did, and I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. He said they lost their business during the war because they turned their factory over for the production of war materials. During that period they were agents for a Swedish cream separator company, and in their foreign business they acted for that company. While I am not certain who was the chief exporter to Canada of the cream separators recorded as from Sweden, I am reasonably sure that it was from this particular firm. Having got back into business again, they are now prepared from their British factory to supply this market in quantity.

Progress reported.

Friday, November 18, 1932

The house met at 10.30 o'clock.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EASTERN PASSAGE, N.S.—SEAPLANE STATION

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) Are any seaplanes stationed at Eastern Passage, Halifax county, Nova Scotia, under the authority of the government or any department; (b) if so, how many; (c) if not, were any seaplanes stationed there since January 1, 1931, and how many, and for what period?
2. How many men are employed at Eastern Passage in connection with such planes, or with the station at which they are stationed, including pilots, observers, mechanics and watchmen?
3. Under the authority of what department or branch of the government's service do such men act?
4. What was the original cost of the planes which have been since January 1, 1931, or are now, stationed there?
5. What has been the cost of the maintenance of such station at Eastern Passage since the arrival of any planes there?
6. What has been the cost of transportation of planes, men and supplies to such station?
7. (a) How many government-owned motor cars are attached to such station; (b) how much did they cost, and what has been the cost of their maintenance and operation since their arrival there?
8. How many persons engaged in smuggling or rum running have been apprehended as a result of the presence at such station of such planes?
9. Has any property, smuggled or attempted to be smuggled, been seized as the result of the presence there of such planes? If so, what is its value?

PREVENTIVE SERVICE BOATS

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. What preventive service boats which were in the service in 1931, were disposed of in 1932?
2. What was the age of each of such boats, and the reason for disposing of them respectively?
3. What disposition was made of each of the boats so disposed of, and in the case of those sold, what was the sale price?
4. What are the names of the boats acquired by the preventive service in 1932, and what is the age of each boat so acquired?
5. As to the boats so acquired, were they purchased, leased or how otherwise acquired, and in the case of those purchased, what were the purchase prices respectively?
6. Have any of the boats acquired this year been conditioned or repaired since being so acquired, and if so, what has been the cost of such conditioning or repairs of each?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DISMISSAL OF ALLAN A. KENNEDY

Mr. DUFF (for Mr. Urquhart):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports and other documents, relating to the dismissal in or about the month of February, 1932, of Allan A. Kennedy of Inverness, Nova Scotia, from his position in the Department of Public Works as general repairer to telegraph services.

DISMISSAL OF MR. LOUIS LEMONDE

Mr. SEGUIN (for Mr. Fontaine):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, reports, petitions, and other documents exchanged between the Post Office Department and any persons from July 28, 1930, with respect to the dismissal of Mr. Louis Lemonde, the postmaster at Saint Jean Baptiste, Rouville county; also a copy of all documents in the possession of the government relative to the said postmastership.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. REID:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the provincial government of British Columbia and the Prime Minister or any minister of the federal cabinet, regarding the price charged the users of gasoline, between January 1, 1932, and September 30, 1932.

CANADIAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which, if he is not prepared to answer today he possibly might answer on a future occasion: What, if any, is the policy of His Majesty's government in Canada in regard to the situation in the far east and to the Lytton report?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to furnish the hon. member with an answer on Monday. Might I say to him that the whole question is sub judice and it is a question of policy which in its entirety I do not think should be communicated to the house at this time.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister mentioned two days ago that we would probably receive a report of our delegates to the disarmament conference in the course of a few days. The report was being printed at that time, I understand.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As the right hon. gentleman will realize, the conference has not yet concluded its labours, but the senior member of our delegation, the Right Hon. Sir George Perley, has furnished me with an interim report and I have been discussing with him just what action might be taken upon it. Whether or not I should lay upon the table the interim report and he should make a short statement or I a long statement is a matter which is not yet settled but which we shall deal with on Monday.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

The house resumed from Thursday, November 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom—Mr. Bennett.—Mr. MacDonald (South Cape Breton) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We were considering item 409.

Mr. BROWN: A few days ago I made some remarks with regard to cream separators, and on that occasion the Prime Minister said that when the explanation was given I would probably be satisfied. I presume that the explanation that was then said to be forthcoming was that given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday. I can quite understand that the reasons advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce were satisfactory to the Prime Minister and perhaps quite satisfactory to both the British and Canadian manufacturers, but surely, Mr. Chairman, we must have failed completely to impress upon the government our point of view if the Prime Minister thinks that the reasons that have been advanced can be satisfactory to us.

The Prime Minister has said that this agreement was based upon and consistent with Conservative policy during the past two years; that is, the policy of protection. We are quite willing to admit that is true, and it is just because it is true that we object to this agreement in general and to this item in particular.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has told us that there would be no increase in price. His whole argument was based on the assumption that there would be no increase in price, but our objection to this item is that it will inevitably be followed by an increase in price. Just at that point we find the great difference between the position taken by the government and that taken by those on this side of the house. No increase in price? You will notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce at page 1283 of Hansard said:

First, may I say that Canada will have access to other markets for cream separators. That should be borne in mind.

How can we have access to other markets for cream separators when we are imposing a prohibitory tariff against separators coming in from other countries? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this 25 per cent duty is a prohibitory tariff and will necessarily exclude the separators which are now coming to us from Sweden, Belgium and the United States. So how can it be said that we shall have access to other markets? The separators that are now coming to us from other countries cannot possibly climb over a 25 per cent tariff wall. If the foreigner should attempt to come in over that tariff wall by reducing his price, we know what the attitude of this government would be and has been to an attempt of that kind. It used to be contended that the foreigner would pay the duty.

Mr. CANTLEY: So he does in many cases.

Mr. BROWN: My hon. friend from Pictou says, "So he does," but the government take mighty good care that the foreigner does not pay the duty. If the foreigner tries to put an article into this country at a price lower than it is selling for in his own country and tries to absorb the tariff, this government takes care that that shall not be done. How can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that we shall still have access to other markets? The contention of the government is that this 25 per cent tariff will not increase the price. Again let me point out as I did yesterday the inconsistency in the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. They reduce the duties on cigarettes and liquor, and say that that will decrease the price. Possibly. Then they increase the duty on butter and say that that will increase the price. Then when it comes to barbed wire and cream separators, the imposition of a duty is to have no effect at all upon the price. That is the kind of argument we get from hon. gentlemen opposite. We maintain, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the assertions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that this 25 per cent duty will inevitably increase the price.

When some of these items have come before the committee and inquiries have been made as to the reason for the increased duty, the government has not been able to tell us from what quarter came the pressure for these new duties. In this instance we know from where the pressure came. According to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce it came from the Lister firm, which, according to the minister, were the first to introduce cream separators into Canada. Well, possibly that is true. I may be wrong in this point, but I remember a separator known as the Alexandra which, I think, the Lister company introduced. When that separator was first sold in our part of the country one could hear it running a mile away. There may be other separators from England with the details of which I am not familiar.

Mr. STEVENS: The statement by the hon. member has been most unfair. Without accurate information under his hand he should not have made such a statement about a business concern.

Mr. BROWN: I am simply stating the fact.

Mr. STEVENS: No; the hon. member is knocking a firm about which he knows nothing. He does not know whether or not his statements are accurate.

Mr. BROWN: I am talking about separators introduced forty years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: I maintain that the hon. member has made a most unfair statement.

Mr. BROWN: Then, there is another feature to this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Order.

Mr. BROWN: It is quite evident that one has no difficulty stirring up trouble in committee. I venture to say, however, that hon. members opposite who represent farming constituencies are just as much exercised over this matter as we are—and a good deal more.

Mr. ROWE: Not one iota.

Mr. BROWN: They are exercised not only from the standpoint of the farmers' interests, but from that of the next election.

Mr. ROWE: Not one iota.

Mr. BROWN: I am old enough to remember when Sir John A. Macdonald introduced his national policy. The reason given at that time was that the policy was introduced to protect infant industries. So, down through the years we have listened to the contention that infant industries should be protected. Later we have heard the argument that we should continue protection of decrepit industries. The Prime Minister himself has indicated that possibly there may be certain industries to which, if we had to begin over again, we would not afford protective tariffs. Since those industries have been established however, and in view of the fact that they cannot be continued without protection, he proposes to support them. The position now is that while years ago we were asked to protect infant industries, we are now asked to protect inefficient industries.

But this agreement goes much farther than that. It asks us to protect not only infant industries in Canada but infant industries in Great Britain. It asks protection for industries which, perhaps for the reasons the minister has mentioned, have been unable to supply the Canadian market. Mr. Chairman, I object strongly to that practice. So far as I know the demand has never come from this side of the house, and certainly never from the organized farmers of Manitoba whom I represent, that the British people should tax their food for our benefit. We have never made that demand. Indeed, hon. members on this side of the house have declared definitely that such a demand would not be for the welfare or unity of the empire. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think I can quite properly take the ground that we resent any demand from English manufacturers that we should impose an additional burden upon our farmers for the benefit of either a new industry or industries in Great Britain for which there is hope of revival. That is a strain to which we should not be subjected; it imposes on us too great a sacrifice for the promotion of empire unity.

Then there is a further matter that I should like to call to the attention of the minister. As a reason for its acceptance by the committee the minister urged that the changed tariff would help the export trade of manufacturers of cream separators. Let us grant that that is true. That position however simply confirms us in the opinion we have expressed so frequently during this debate, namely, that this agreement was made not in the interests of consumers but in the interests of manufacturers and producers. Then, there is a further point to be taken into consideration in an agreement of this kind. We have heard a great deal about the demand for fair competition and fair opportunity to supply our own market. Let us see how this change intereferes with the right of farmers to have a fair opportunity in their own market. A few days ago I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question concerning the dumping duties which could be used by other dominions in the event of cream separators being sold there at a price lower than they were sold in Canada. He replied, of course, that nations would have dumping duties when their interests were adversely affected. Of course I expected that answer; perhaps he thought my question was foolish. Nevertheless there is sometimes method in what appears to be madness.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN: The point I wish to bring out is that we are brought into competition with other producers of dairy products. We are told again and again that in the production of butter New Zealand has natural advantages over Canada. That is perfectly true. But that is no reason why, in addition to those natural advantages, New Zealand should have a further advantage over us brought about by an act, not of their own but of our government, and one which places us at an artificial disadvantage. I do not know what the duty on cream separators in New Zealand is, I have not had time to look up the information. But I venture to say that in a country like New Zealand, whose products enter into competition with ours, their farmers, are not unduly handicapped by duties on cream separators. There may be small revenue duties, but I venture the assertion that farmers in that country are not handicapped by a heavy duty on cream separators; I venture the same assertion in regard to South Africa; I venture the same assertion in regard to Denmark. This last mentioned country is perhaps our chief competitor, at least one of our chief competitors, in dairy products in the British market. I venture to assert that the farmers of Denmark are not unduly handicapped in their business by duties placed upon cream separators.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an additional reason why we should oppose this item in the schedule, and why we lay so much emphasis upon it. Perhaps hon. members from other parts of the dominion, representing other industries, may not realize as much as we do the seriousness of this item. I do not think there is anything in the whole agreement which, from the standpoint of the great primary producer in Canada, is as objectionable as this most iniquitous tariff against cream separators.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, were I not to voice my protest against this item I should be neglecting my duty. Yesterday the minister stated that a man named Lister came into his office and intimated to him that Great Britain could supply cream separators to Canada. I have information before me from a firm doing a large business in cream separators in western Canada. Any information I have received previously from this firm has been authentic. In this instance their statement is that Great Britain does not make the cream separators, so-called, that farmers need for the separation of milk from cream. If the information this firm gives me is correct, and I feel certain it is, because the importations from Great Britain have been nil, we can arrive at no other conclusion than that the Canadian producer of dairy products will pay the extra duty of 25 per cent. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) mentioned that the reduction in excise on cigarettes and liquor had resulted in reduced prices. I can verify that, being quite a cigarette smoker myself; every time I buy a package of cigarettes I make a nickel.

An hon. MEMBER: You will make a lot of money!

Mr. BEAUBIEN: So if it works that way when the excise or duty is reduced it must work the other way when the duty is imposed or increased.

The information in this letter is, in part as follows:

> About eight or ten months ago I saw a financial statement of an English company which manufactures and distributes butter and other dairy products and the statement also mentioned that they manufactured dairy and creamery equipment. I wrote for prices on cream separators and was told that they made only heavy power separators for creamery use and that the small separators for dairy farms were imported from Sweden.
> I think it a great mistake to cut off the competition between domestic, American, Swedish and other countries in the matter of such a necessity of production as cream separators. We find that farmers are not able to buy separators now and complain that the cream cheques are so small that they cannot pay for the ones we have sold them.
> I know of only two Canadian makes, the Renfrew, made in Renfrew, Ont., and the Massey-Harris, which, I suppose is made in Toronto.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What about De Laval?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: He says he does not know whether De Laval separators are made in Canada or not, but he knows that a few years ago De Laval imported separators into Canada and sold them to Canadian dairymen.

Mr. STEVENS: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am quoting a letter from a firm which does a large business selling separators to farmers in western Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: We would be better able to judge of the information if we had the name of the firm. I think we are entitled to the name. I gave my authority yesterday.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I expected that from the minister, and I am prepared for it. I am doing exactly what the minister and the right hon. Prime Minister have done; they read letter after letter without giving names. The Prime Minister even read a letter last year from a lady who commended him for reducing civil service salaries, and when he was asked to give the name he would not give it. I am just as much entitled to the privilege. The quotations I have given are from a letter from an authentic firm; any information they have given me has proved to be correct.

Mr. ROWE: Do they manufacture in Canada?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am glad to see my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), smile. If my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe and my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Senn), think they are going to play the same trick on the farmers in the next election, they are badly mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, I will withdraw the word trick," I will just say "playing the trick." I know my hon. friend from Dufferin Simcoe is too intelligent to broadcast to the farmers the imposition of this duty on cream separators. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of these agreements is what? Nothing else than to benefit the manufacturing industries of this country. The producers and consumers of creamery or dairy products have never been consulted. The only people that have been consulted are English or Canadian manufacturers. That is what I say in western Canada and in all other parts of Canada. I ask of my friends from the eastern townships, where I spent my last week-end, those friends of mine from the eastern townships who slid into power on a pound of New Zealand butter: Are you going to tell your farmer friends who voted for you on that question that the government has done the very thing which is going to hamper the dairy industry to a greater degree than it is hampered today? In western Canada we are getting anywhere from 13 to 15 cents a pound for butter, and the minister and the government have to admit that the only reason for imposing this duty, if there is a reason, is either revenue or to protect the industry. When the duty becomes so high it ceases to bring revenue to the country, but it increases the price to the man who has to buy the commodity.

Mr. MULLINS: May I ask the hon. member, if the price of cream separators has increased? Is not the Massey-Harris separator as good as any in the country? I have had one for forty years.

An hon. MEMBER: That is one of the old Listers you have got.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am not concerned whether the price increased yesterday or today—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: —but let me warn my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins) that he will never be able to go back to his county, with that cream can and the old cow, if he tells the people that the party that he supports, has increased the production costs of the dairyman. I know my hon. friend objects to this, but I can say, with all the respect I have for him, that if he goes back to the constituency of Marquette and repeats the argument he made in 1930 the old cow will not bawl, she will cry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I plead with my farmer friends on the other side of the house, who in 1930 asked the farmers to support them; I plead with my personal friends from the eastern townships who I know contributed a great deal to the belief of the farmers that the Bennett government would give everything to the dairy industry and all would be well; I plead with these friends of mine now, and others, to stand up in this house and fight for the farmers' interests, knowing that if the farming industry does not become prosperous nothing will prosper in this country. As a final plea I ask my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe, one of the best-looking men in this house, a man who is always smiling—I am only sorry he is not the Minister of Agriculture, because he is one of those back-benchers who would make a good Minister of Agriculture—to stand up in this house and tell this government that if they are going to impose these penalties on the farming industry, and especially the dairy industry, he is not going to support any such project.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Lisgar and the hon. member for Provencher each have made the bald statement that there will be an increase in cost, and they have based their whole complaint against these provisions upon that assumption. If the cost is not increased then their argument is worthless.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then why the duty?

Mr. RHODES: The duty is for preference and for empire free trade in cream separators. Let me say this to my hon. friends: I take it that if they could get a separator at a given price they would prefer to buy it within the empire rather than without. They must assent to that position, otherwise they must take the ground that they prefer to buy from without rather than within the empire.

[Mr. Mullins.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I interrupt the minister to tell him that if present conditions continue the farmers will not have money with which to buy separators from anyone.

Mr. RHODES: I only wish to say that I do not assent for one moment to the proposition that these proposals will result in an increase in the cost of separators. We will find very fierce competition on the part of the British now that they have an opportunity in this market. But there is one point to which hon. gentlemen have not made reference; for many years past, with the exception of the bowl, every part imported for servicing cream separators had to pay a substantial duty, and under the provisions of this agreement these parts now come in free.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: From where?

Mr. RHODES: From within the empire.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But they do not come in free from the United States or Sweden?

Mr. RHODES: Just wait one second. Under the tariff which was supported by my hon. friend from Provencher, when parts came in they were assessed at varying duties. For example, if made of iron or steel they would be dutiable under item 446, under which they paid 15 per cent under the British preference, 27½ per cent under the intermediate and 35 per cent under the general tariff. If made of aluminum they paid 15 per cent under the British preference, 22½ per cent under the intermediate and 25 per cent under the general tariff. If they were nickel plated they paid 30 per cent under the preferential tariff, 37½ per cent under the intermediate tariff and 45 per cent under the general tariff. If made of copper or brass they paid a duty of 20 per cent under the preference, 27½ per cent under the intermediate and 30 per cent under the general tariff. Now those preferential duties have been all swept away, and those parts can come in free.

Mr. BROWN: I suppose the Minister of Finance expects us to accept that argument as a valid reason for supporting this agreement. Probably the minister is stating the facts accurately with regard to the duty on imported parts, but supposing that tariff was in effect under the Liberal government, as he has suggested, and supported by members on this side of the house, is that any reason why the duty now should be imposed upon the complete article? Surely not. It does not make his case any better or our case any worse.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly I am not going to let my genial friend the Minister of Finance get away with that. The minister is trying to impress upon the house the wonderful service being rendered the farmers of Canada by this government through the removal of the duty on cream separator parts. If his argument is sound; if it helps the farmers to take the duty off the parts, why put a duty on the finished article? Truly I cannot understand that reasoning. The government takes the duty off cream separator parts and gives that as an action that will benefit the consumer of cream separators. On the other hand it puts on a duty of 25 per cent on the finished article. I cannot understand that logic. Perhaps my brain is not working well this morning, though I went to bed fairly early last night.

Mr. STEVENS: I confess that it is very difficult to follow the reasoning of some hon. gentlemen opposite. I suppose that one of the difficulties of our form of parliamentary procedure is—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The present government.

Mr. STEVENS: There we have another illustration of it. It is simply impossible for us to reason out these things in a logical way and, shall I say, according to the facts, without interjecting partisan politics. I am not saying that my hon. friends opposite have a monopoly of this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with that. So that my hon. friends will not accuse me for the next five minutes at least of being partisan, I grant that they have not a monopoly of that weakness or that fault, which is perhaps inherent to our system, but I should like to invite hon. gentlemen now to concentrate for a moment, in a logical way, upon this question.

Mr. BROWN: You have not a monopoly of logic, either.

Mr. POWER: It is no use.

Mr. STEVENS: I grant you it is not. I did not expect my hon. friend from Lisgar to interject a provocative statement at that moment. Can he not at least receive in the proper spirit the attempt I am making to approach the question from a business standpoint?

Mr. BROWN: I do not think the minister will say that in my remarks I did anything but attempt to argue the question on valid, sound premises.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not name my hon. friend; I have been talking in generalities. I am inviting the whole committee to consider this question from a logical standpoint rather than to allow our prejudices to interfere. I imagine it is hopeless, but I will go on. There are certain facts which I think the committee must bear in mind. The first is that as far as cream separators are concerned we now have free trade, if I might use that term, within the empire. That is, as far as Canada is concerned we have free access to the markets of the empire. That is of some value to Canada. I cannot agree with hon. gentlemen opposite when they suggest that we must look askance at some advantage to the industrialists of Canada. I think it is a desirable and commendable thing if that is secured. That is my position, and that is point number one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before the minister leaves that point may I inquire if there ever has been any obstacle in the way of trade within the empire?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; practically every part of the empire had a duty on cream separators. Now we have free entry to those markets. Just on that point let us consider for a moment precisely what was the argument advanced by the Minister of Finance a moment ago. Let us look at this matter calmly and dispassionately. There have been duties. I am not blaming my hon. friends opposite at all, but as a matter of fact there have been duties on parts. The hon. member for Provencher asked a question which I think was very proper, but which I also think is very capable of being answered. He asks what that has to do with putting a duty on the finished article.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I caught my hon friend correctly. He asked, if it was desirable to take the duty off parts, whether that was not a sound reason for taking the duty off the finished article.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, that was not what I said. I took it that the Minister of Finance was arguing that the removal of the duty on parts was a benefit to the farmer. Then, if his argument was sound, I asked why the duty should be put on the finished article.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so; that is what I had in mind, only I left out the word "farmer." That is quite right. There is an anwer and, I think, a valid answer to that. The manufacture of cream separators in Canada has been carried on by three firms for a very considerable number of years, but a substantial part of that manufacturing has been in the way of assembling. In nearly all industries there are some parts of machinery that can be made better elsewhere, because of the quantum factor, and such parts are brought in. Such items as bowls and some other things have been brought in as finished parts and assembled with the other parts of Canada. Now, by the step we have taken in removing the duty from Great Britain at least on all these parts, we are contributing something towards lessening the assembling cost in Canada. That is axiomatic and I think it will be accepted in the discussion of industrial development.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If the taking off of the duty on parts that are made in foreign countries is an advantage to the cream separator producers in Canada, would it not work just as well if there were no duty on cream separators to the farmers?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will follow me I will try to make that point clear. In the first place, the cream separator as such does come in free from Great Britain and remains free. But parts for repairs also come in free from Great Britain under the new arrangement we are making. If any large distributors wish to bring in repair parts—and I fancy that in all machinery there are certain parts that wear out before others do and consequently have to be brought in—they will have those free from Great Britain; and they were not free before. Now, there is some compensation from that standpoint alone for the imposition of the duty on the finished article.

Mr. EULER: Was any substantial quantity of parts brought in from Great Britain before?

Mr. STEVENS: I gave the list last night.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the list of imports which the minister gave last night are parts included?

Mr. STEVENS: I will have that in a moment. I am informed that the only parts that can be traced are bowls, of which some $24,000 worth were imported.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A list of imports was given last evening. Does that list include parts?

Mr. RHODES: Separators came in to the value of $455,000, and bowls, which have always been free, came in to the value of $24,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I would ask my hon. friend from Provencher, who I am glad to see has responded in a very nice spirit to my advances, to follow me.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My response is just until you finish your argument.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite all right. At least I appreciate his temporary courtesy. There is this point which I would ask him and other hon. members to consider. In his remarks the hon. gentleman seemed to labour under the impression that there was in this nothing of any value for the farmer—that is, in the agreements or in our trade with Great Britain as represented in those agreements. Nothing at all. Well now, I invite him to consider this point. We are clear that under these agreements there are, for the producers of butter, cheese, powdered milk and so forth, all those things that are indigenous to the dairy industry, very definite and valuable preferences in the British market. The representatives of the British people say, "We are giving you these valuable concessions for your dairy industry in our market. Is it therefore not reasonable for you to give us a chance in your market with some of the machinery we produce and are able to supply you with?" That is not an illogical position to take; I submit that it is sound.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But I submit that you are putting under a handicap the producers of that very commodity on which you have a preference in Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: No. That is where my hon. friend is in error, I think. He and the hon. member for Lisgar as well as the hon. member for Weyburn, in all their arguments, assume that at once there will be an increase in the price of cream separators.

Mr. BROWN: We do not assume that the increase will be at once—put it that way.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the assumption is that as a result of this there will be an increase in price.

Mr. BROWN: Put it that way.

Mr. STEVENS: But that does not follow at all. I showed last night that we were importing, for instance, from the United States and from Sweden large numbers of cream separators. Now, if we can increase production in Canada and absorb part of that, if we can give to Great Britain part of that business, does it not follow that there is likely to be a reduction? As a matter of fact I am told that in all probability there will be a reduction in the cost of production and therefore in the price of cream separators, as a result of increased production on the one hand and on the other—

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister points out the advantages which the farmer of Canada gets in the British market for farm products.

He will admit that we have to take world prices for those products. Has he the same assurance from the cream separator importers from Great Britain that their commodity will be sold at world prices?

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. STEVENS: I am not through. I am sorry to continue the discussion, but I can see that it is likely to be lengthy and I think we ought to try to make these points clear. The argument I submit may not be accepted, but I submit it and appeal to the reasonableness of my hon. friends. I submit that with an increase in production through this tariff against the foreigner the chances all are that the Canadian separator will be produced at a lower cost, and we have then the competition of the British cream separator manufacturer which we must not disregard.

Mr. EULER: I do not quite appreciate the consistency in saying that the production of the Canadian manufacturer will be increased and at the same time stating that there will be stronger competition from Great Britain. The two things do not seem to be consistent.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give the statistics on which I base that statement. Let us take any year you like—the year 1931 for instance. In that year we imported from Sweden 5,218 cream separators; from Finland 916; from the United States 14,763, and from Belgium 2,683, or total imports amounting to 23,838. Our production was only 8,000. Suppose we divided that between Great Britain and ourselves—let us assume that for the sake of argument: that would give 12,000 additional to Canada; and if Canada gets 12,000 additional cream separators to produce, my hon. friend knows, and none better in this house, that we shall have a corresponding reduction of overhead charges.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend's contention is that the business which has been going to foreign countries like Sweden will go to Great Britain without diminishing the output of the Canadian producer.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it will result in a marked increase in Canadian and British production. I am quite clear on that point.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And a lower consumption owing to the price.

Mr. STEVENS: No, a lower price. That is inevitable. I am as clear in my own mind on that point as my hon. friends are clear on their basis of reasoning. Let me give my hon. friend by way of illustration some of the results of the British preference which we have enjoyed since last April. I think it is desirable to put this on Hansard for our information, because after all, in discussing these agreements, whatever our political views may be, I think we are more interested in the welfare of the country than in anything else. I shall now give a list of exports for the seven months' period ended October 31, 1931, and 1932. If an increase is shown for 1932, which has been one of the worst years in the history of the world, surely it is evidence that there is some benefit in this preferential arrangement with Great Britain which has been continued to us under this agreement. I give these figures by way of illustration and to support my point that this benefit will be applicable to the other items we are now considering. The list is as follows:

Agricultural and Vegetable Products

Those figures indicate that in these trying times our trade with Great Britain is expanding and has expanded since the preferential duty arrangement was made last April. We are contending that because of our obvious experience in this matter these schedules which are now being submitted will prove to be beneficial to trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. We ask hon. gentlemen to view this matter from the broad standpoint of the welfare of both countries. We are quite satisfied that the economics of the thing will demonstrate that there is advantage in this to the Canadian manufacturer, in that he gets his parts free; there will be protection to the Canadian consumer, in that he has the competition of the British Empire in cream separators and incidentally he receives the benefits of a chance of increased production with lowered overhead, which we contend must inevitably result in a reduction in price.

I desire to say one word to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I am sorry he has sought to cast reflection upon such a reputable British firm as the Lister company.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BROWN: I operate one of their machines at home.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend said he did not know whether or not it was their machine.

Mr. BROWN: It was one sold by the Lister company, I presume during the time they were not manufacturing.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend said he has had it for forty years and that it runs like a threshing machine. I ask him, is it fair to cite the name of one of the most reputable firms in Great Britain and refer in argument to the standing and excellence of its products? Is it fair to take advantage of one's place in parliament to cast reflection upon their products merely for the sake of bolstering up an argument? Is that fair game? Why is it, when my hon. friend comes to a British or Canadian manufacturer, he begins to suspect? Why is it that all foreign manufacturers are beyond and above suspicion in his mind? Why is it that my hon. friend in all his arguments will insist that there is some sinister motive behind Canadian industry? I say to him, and I know there are hon. gentlemen opposite who have had wide experience in these matters who will corroborate me, that by and large the Canadian businessman, the manufacturer or distributor is a man of ethics equal to any in the world. It may be that in this country, as in all countries—I am glad to say it is disappearing—there are individuals who will take advantage of this, that or the other and not be what we call fair traders. It is most unfortunate that such an impression should go abroad in connection with the Canadian manufacturer. When you look at both sides of the various problems with which they are confronted, when you hear the stories which I get every day, when you get the other side, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred justification is found for the position taken.

In my estimation parliament ought to take pride in the industrial development of this country. We should take pride in that development, because as the Prime Minister intimated yesterday, every industry which is made successful means further assistance to the primary producer, the farmer, the lumberman and the miner. We must not forget that there is also mineral and lumber production which is equally meritorious to that of farm production. When I say that I am not trying to disregard the rights of the farmer because I am just as anxious as any hon. member of this committee to see him prosper. I know his difficulties, I sympathize with his burden of debt and the low commodity prices which he receives. I know his problems are almost insufferable, but this condition does not apply only to the farmer, it is applicable also to the lumber and mineral producers. Let us as Canadians in this parliament give to the Canadian industrialist, the manufacturer, the manager and the tens of thousands of workers at least the credit that they are good Canadian citizens and entitled to every consideration. We should not always base our arguments upon the implied assumption that there is something wrong with the industrialist of this country and something sinister in his motives.

Mr. BROWN: I thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the lecture he has given this committee in general and me in particular. I did make reference to a machine which was imported forty years ago, and I said it ran like a threshing machine. I have not the slighest doubt that the English manufacturers and the Canadian manufacturers have since that time improved their product to a very great extent. So that was no reflection on the present capacities of the Lister Company. But the fact of the Lister Company coming to our Canadian government and asking them to impose a 25 per cent duty on cream separators is not calculated to foster better relations betwen the different parts of the empire, and I have no hesitation in saying that. In all of this debate I have never seen fit to criticize the British people for doing what they saw fit to do. Indeed, I have always resented the idea that we should try to impose upon them the conditions of their fiscal policy. I have consistently taken the ground that they should do what they thought fit, and I have made no complaint up to this time of the attitude of the British government or of any British industry. But when it is stated that a British manufacturer comes to Canada and asks to have a 25 per cent duty imposed—

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit me just a word, because I presume he desires to have his facts right, the British manufaturer did not come to Canada and request that a duty be placed on cream separators. The manufacturers of cream separators in Canada did not know and had not the faintest idea of the proposals in question until they saw them published in the press. This item was included in the list solely because it was a concession which we felt we could grant in view of the circumstances and the fact that the British government laid particular stress upon it as one item which they deemed of importance.

Mr. BROWN Supposing the facts are as just stated—

Mr. RHODES: They are.

Mr. BROWN: It does not alter the fact. The Minister of Trade and Commerce when he presented this matter to the house laid great emphasis on the fact that the R. A. Lister Company wished to get into the cream separator business in Canada. The manner in which those negotiations were carried on is a matter of complete indifference to us, but the fact remains that in order to benefit the British manufacturer a duty of 25 per cent has been imposed on cream separators.

The Finance minister complains that we base our argument on the assumption that prices will increase. We on this side are just as much warranted in that assumption as is the government in its assumption that prices will not increase. There is the wide difference between the two sides of the house. Hon. gentlemen opposite maintain that protective duties do not increase prices; we maintain that they do, and the country may just as well know that that very vital difference exists between the two sides of the house.

In regard to the duty on parts, on which the Finance Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have laid emphasis, under the tariff which was in existence up to September, 1930, item 442b provided:

> Materials which enter into the construction and form part of cream separators when imported by manufacturers of cream separators, for use exclusively in the manufacture of cream separators, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister . . .

shall enter free under the British preferential, the intermediate and general tariffs.

And 442c:

> Articles of metal when imported by manufacturers of cream separator parts for use exclusively in the manufacture of cream separator parts, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister . . .

shall enter free under all three tariffs.

Mr. RHODES: While my hon. friend is upon that point, will he allow me to enlighten him? What was done under the law which was supported by my hon. friend from Lisgar was this, that when the manufacturer wanted to import his parts he got them in free, but when the poor, lowly farmer on the plains imported his parts for repairs under the British preference he paid all the way from 15 to 20 per cent. My hon. friend must bear that fact in mind when he criticizes us for taking care of the manufacturer and neglecting the farmer.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Item 409 in this agreement provides free entry under the British preference and a 25 per cent duty under the intermediate and general tariffs. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few moments ago to indicate that the old tariff on parts for separators was higher than the new tariff listed here, but I do not see any change. Will the new tariff apply to all parts? I see that bowls are mentioned.

Mr. RHODES: Any part which goes into a cream separator can now be imported under the British preference free, any component part whatsoever that is wanted by the farmer for repairs. Prior to this agreement, although cream separators themselves were free across the board the manufacturer could import any part he wanted duty free, but when the farmer wanted to import a repair part he paid a duty, if it were made of iron or steel, of 15 per cent under the British preference, 27½ intermediate, and 35 per cent general; if of aluminum, 15 per cent under the British preference, 22½ per cent intermediate, and 25 per cent general; if nickel-plated, 30 per cent under the British preference, 37½ per cent intermediate, and 45 per cent general; if of copper or brass, 20 per cent under the British preference, 27½ per cent intermediate, and 30 per cent general.

Mr. COOTE: Will repairs coming in from other countries than the United Kingdom pay the same rate of duty as they do now?

Mr. RHODES: If the machines were imported from a foreign country they would pay 25 per cent under this arrangement as compared with 45 per cent, if nickel-plated, under the old tariff; if of iron or steel, 35 per cent under the old tariff and 25 per cent under this tariff; if of aluminum 25 per cent under the old general tariff, and 25 per cent today; if of copper or brass, 30 per cent under the old general tariff, and 25 per cent today.

Mr. COOTE: Will dumping duties be applied on importations of cream separators from Great Britain? What basis of value will be established by the Customs department? For instance, if a cream separator costs ten pounds in England, will the importer be allowed to bring it in free of duty and pay the present rate of exchange, $3.70 for each pound, in other words $37, or will there be a dumping duty applied on that value by the government?

Mr. RHODES: I would prefer that that question be answered by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue. My hon. friend will remember that a bill has been brought down to amend the Customs Act having reference to section 43.

Mr. COOTE: I do not think this matter refers at all to section 43. What I am trying to find out is whether we can bring in cream separators from England and pay the actual rate of exchange for the British pound existing at the time of importation, or whether we will be compelled to pay duty which will be the equivalent of the difference between the rates of, say, $3.70 and $4.87 on the pound. I think that is a very important point.

Mr. STEVENS: If I may, I will answer the hon. member in two ways. First, so far as the present situation is concerned, if an item on the free list is imported into Canada today it will pay a special exchange adjustment duty. That is one answer. Does my hon. friend understand that?

Mr. COOTE: That will apply to cream separators.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. But under article 17 in the agreement there is this understanding by the government of Canada:

> They further undertake to give sympathetic consideration to the possibility of reducing and ultimately abolishing the exchange dumping duty in so far as it applies to imports from the United Kingdom.

I state very frankly to my hon. friend that the government is very carefully studying this matter. Its experts are now working on it, and we are trying to solve what is admitted by all to be one of the most difficult problems confronting the different countries of the world today. So while my first answer is accurate, so far as the present day conditions are concerned we are hoping and intending, so far as lies within our power, to get away from that exchange dumping duty or, as it is sometimes called, exchange adjustment duty.

Mr. COOTE: I have a further question. I presume the three per cent excise tax will apply on cream separators, and also the dumping duty the minister has just mentioned. Will they be the only duties collected on cream separators imported?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. The excise tax is a revenue tax applied practically to everything.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, up until the introduction of this agreement with the United Kingdom, Canada was a world market for cream separators. I think the minister agrees with that statement. Now there is the proposal to restrict that market. Some time ago I asked the minister a question when he was pointing out that today we had a market in Great Britain for farm produce. I pointed out to him, as he well knows, that that market was only assured to us provided we would take the world price. In view of the fact that we have now closed this Canadian market as a world market,—at least, that in my view is the intent of this agreement—and that we will create in Canada a market for empire goods, and among others cream separators, I ask the minister, have we the same assurance from the other portions of the empire that we will be able to buy these cream separators at the world price? Before I take my seat I should like to say to the Minister of Finance that the farmer himself very rarely imports repair parts into this country, unless he has an implement or cream separator not sold or manufactured here. The manufacturers and dealers who sell separators in Canada always carry the parts. We may take a De Laval, a Massey-Harris or any other separator or, for that matter, Swedish separators, and find that in connection with each we can readily buy repair parts from those who either sell or manufacture the machines, or assemble the repair parts.

No doubt the minister will tell me that there are pirate dealers throughout Canada who make a business not only of selling machines but the repair parts for machines they do not sell. No doubt the Minister of Finance will say that the tariff on repair parts he was talking about was designed to get at those pirate dealers.

I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to answer this question: Have we the assurance from the other dominions and the mother country that cream separators will be sold in Canada at the world price, in view of the fact that we have to deliver our products to their markets under a similar condition?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member has touched upon a number of points. In the first place, the dealers handling parts to whom he referred paid the duty on those parts, just the same as anybody else would. Presumably that duty would be included in their price, so that it might be passed on. No doubt they would deal with it in whatever way they thought best. The fact remains however that they woud pay the duty on the repair parts; I should like to have that point clear.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is not what the Minister of Finance said.

Mr. VALLANCE: We will suppose that an agent in western Canada, or any other part of Canada, handles Massey-Harris separators, and obtains repairs from their plant in Toronto. Massey-Harris does not pay the tariff; therefore the farmer buys without a tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, if it is a Canadian product it does not carry a tariff; that is clear. But repair parts that are imported, whether by a manufacturer, a dealer or anyone else, are subject to duty. The only time they are not is when they are imported for incorporation in an assembled machine. There is no question about that.

Then I shall direct my remarks to another point made by the hon. member. He said that we Canadians have guaranteed to Great Britain that we will sell our farm produce at the world market price. We have not done that at all.

Mr. VALLANCE: What about the agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: That does not apply to butter, cheese, milk or those other commodities about which we are now talking. A world price is not guaranteed on those items.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why not?

An hon. MEMBER: There is a duty on them.

Mr. VALLANCE: "Duty" nothing.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall read article 4:

> It is agreed that the duty on either wheat in grain, copper, zinc or lead—

Those are the four commodities, namely, wheat, copper, zinc or lead—

> —as provided in this agreement may be removed if at any time empire producers of wheat in grain, copper, zinc and lead respectively are unable or unwilling to offer these commodities on first sale in the United Kingdom at prices not exceeding the world prices.

And so on. So, as far as dairy products are concerned—cheese, butter, condensed milk, powdered milk—we come under such undertaking. Cream separators are precisely on the same basis as butter, cheese, milk or any of the commodities I have mentioned.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister will agree that they give us ten per cent and we give them 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes we do. We give them 25 per cent on cream separators, and on farm produce they give us ten per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: We get 15 per cent on cheese, 15s per hundredweight, specific, on butter; on condensed milk, whole, sweetened we get 5s per hundredweight, and 20 per cent on other milk products.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have no assurance that the price of cream separators obtained from them will be the world price.

Mr. STEVENS: No more than we have given such assurance on the farm products to which I have just referred.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Would the minister give us the rate of duty against Swedish separators coming into Canada? I have had occasion to look into the purchase of separators.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member ask for the proposed duty? It is 25 per cent.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The rate prevailing before.

Mr. STEVENS: They came in free before.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood the Minister of Finance to say that repairs were coming in free. Do I understand the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say that they come in free only when they are to be assembled in a machine?

Mr. STEVENS: By a manufacturer in his own plant. Does the hon. member ask about the arrangement under these provisions?

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they do not come in free.

Mr. SPENCER: Not even from British countries?

Mr. STEVENS: They come in free under the British preference.

Mr. SPENCER: There will be a tariff on repairs from foreign countries.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, twenty-five per cent, in contradistinction to the rates charged previously, which were all higher.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Under the old tariff the repair parts imported by assemblers or manufacturers of cream separators came in free?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I thought I had made that clear. Any part that was brought in for repairs, whether by a manufacturer, a dealer or a private individual, bore the duties which we have indicated. They were higher than they are under this arrangement.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They will have to pay duty now?

Mr. STEVENS: They will pay now 25 per cent, instead of 30, 37, 45 and so on. But free from Great Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister tell us what rate of duty Great Britain is imposing on cream separators from the outside world.

Mr. STEVENS: Twenty per cent, and free as far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. VALLANCE: According to the figures for the period 1910-1932, given last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada's imports of cream separators, none came from the United Kingdom. So, if Great Britain is going to avail herself of the opportunities in the Canadian market, presented by this agreement, in my opinion she is going to build up trade in a new type of separator. The information I have is that in the years from 1910 to 1920 all the importations from the mother country were separators of a type used in the factories, not the type used by the farmer. If by this you are going to shut out today the Vega Swedish separator, I say you are doing the dairy industry in western Canada—I speak only of that because I have knowledge of it—a great injustice. The Vega separator has done more to bring down the price of separators in Canada than any other thing I know. I operate one of them on my own farm. Whether this 25 per cent will entirely shut it out I do not know, but I believe the Minister of National Revenue will see that it is shut out, because he will place an arbitrary valuation upon it. I do not care what the minister says regarding the 25 per cent encouraging inter-empire trade, it is only going to encourage it at the expense of the user of cream separators. If we can get an assurance from the Minister of National Revenue, or from the government, that importations from sources that are now supplying Canada with cream separators will be taken at the valuation at the port of entry, and that the Minister of National Revenue will not be allowed to place a fictitious and artificial valuation on them for duty purposes in order to exclude them, I think we can pretty much agree to this proposal now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When this government came into power they found on the free list in all columns, preferential, intermediate and general, a considerable number of items of particular interest to agriculture. One item was binder twine, another was farm fertilizers, another was barbed wire, and now cream separators. Three out of those four commodities have been taken off the free list, as far as the intermediate and general tariff is concerned, and in some cases all tariffs—

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I would like to ask a question. What ingredient that goes into the composition of fertilizer is not on the free list today?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I regret I cannot hear my hon. friend. He can mix any kind of fertilizer he likes, I am trying to talk my own talk. I see that even the Minister of Trade and Commerce appreciates that, inasmuch as he lectured me for that kind of inadvertent remark the other day. I was pointing out that it seems to be the policy of this government to take all these key commodities that were free to the farmer before and put a tariff on them. I do not berate them very much for that, they are carrying out the policy that they enunciated at the last election, they are running true to form. That is one of their promises that they are carrying out, and doing it to the full. They are making the cleavage between the two historic parties more distinct than ever. When the next election comes the people will have no doubt which is the high tariff party and which is the moderate or revenue tariff party.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They have not been able to distinguish that for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, they distinguished the difference in the United States the other day, and they will not have any trouble distinguishing it here now. I want to point out that farmers today are not in a condition to have their morale further destroyed by this continual jacking up of tariffs. If the average farmer on the prairies lost his separator by fire or otherwise, how could he replace it today? Even though prices are not made higher, unless they go down in keeping with the price of his commodity that he sells, he is going to get worse off all the time. Prices of equipment and general supplies for the farm have not gone down in proportion to prices of what the farmer has to sell. He will be fearful that this is going to be repeated in the case of both wire and cream separators.

My information is that our manufacturers of cream separators are not running anything like full capacity now; some of them are almost idle. Last evening the minister expatiated freely on the advantage of having new firms establish themselves in Canada. But if those who are now here are only running part time how will it help to have new firms establish themselves for the manufacture of this commodity? It seems to me he is only going to cut up the now small business there is, into smaller allotments so that each and all will lose out.

However, I suppose if we talk till doomsday on this question it will not make any difference in our respective attitudes. I think it is profoundly wrong on the part of the government to do what they have done in regard to wire and cream separators, I think it is a great mistake. It is hard on the purchasers of these commodities, and later on it is going to be hard on the government. To the latter of course, I will not take any exception. I would ask them, though, if it is possible to reconsider this item. I think we were told yesterday that some of these questions were going to be reopened with the British government. I do not plead for the sake of the government, because I have no particular brief for my hon. friends, but I plead for the dairying industry, always an exacting laborious industry, a very, very trying occupation to those engaged in it, summer and winter, Saturday and Sunday; and now the government is just going to put one more straw on the back of the dairyman. And it is the last straw that breaks the camel's back, or the dairyman's as the case may be. It will be also the last nail in the political coffin of hon. gentlemen opposite. There have been a lot of last nails, I think we have a whole package of them accumulated for this purpose. I do not know that we need another, so I appeal to them to reconsider this item. They are making a profound blunder not only from the standpoint of the dairymen of this country but from the standpoint of their own political hides; I have no particular regard for those, but I have for the dairying industry of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: Some reference has been made to the members from the eastern townships, where butter is an important product, and one in which the members for that section of the country are very much interested. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has asked the government to reconsider its position. May I ask the hon. gentleman just what he would like the government to do? The government have reduced the duty on separator parts, and separators are still introduced into Canada free from Great Britain.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They do not make them.

Mr. YOUNG: They were always free.

Mr. HACKETT: They were always free, but the position of the dairyman and the person who uses separators has been improved at least to the extent that the parts now will come in free. The hon. member for Melville presided for a number of years over the department which is most interested in the farmers, and it seems to me but fair to ask why, during the rather long period of his administration, some of that compunction and that feeling which he now expresses for the farmers and the users of separators did not find expression in a reduction or the entire elimination of the duty on separator parts. I believe that if there is one utensil which has remained at a very high price level it is this particular one, notwithstanding the fact that it was free across the board. This would seem to indicate that our only hope of obtaining a reduction in price is by enabling our own manufacturers to increase their production and thereby reduce the price of the utensil.

I thank the hon. member for Provencher for being so solicitous for the farming communities of the eastern townships. I beg to assure him that the member for every constituency in that section of the country is in his seat and has followed these discussions with particular interest.

Mr. COOTE: I think it is very misleading to keep on saying that cream separators may be imported free from any country within the empire. As closely as I can figure it out, it seems to me there is a duty of at least 18 per cent against separators in addition to a 3 per cent excise tax. If the figures which I have worked out very roughly are correct, any farmer in Canada who imports a cream separator from Great Britain or any other part of the empire and which costs him $100 will have to pay $18 duty and $3 excise.

I think the hon. member for Stanstead has just put the case very clearly. This change in the tariff is principally for the purpose of enabling the Canadian manufacturer to get a larger market in Canada. Of course he believes that there will be no increase in price. I should like to ask the government very definitely what organization they have in any department of the government to see whether or not there is any increase. I should like to say also that I think we should have a decrease in the price of separators. There has been a drop of at least fifty per cent in the price of our butter. At one time this year in western Canada the price of butter fat dropped to 20 per cent of what it was four or five years ago, but there was no corresponding drop in the price of cream separators. There has been no drop yet, and I do not think there will be a drop after this arrangement comes into operation. I do not suppose there would have been a drop in any case, but I am afraid this will prevent any decrease which perhaps might have come about otherwise.

Then I should like to ask the government whether the exchange dumping duty applies to importations of cream separators from Sweden. I understand that Swedish currency is depreciated in Canada just as much as if not a little more than the British currency. Is this exchange dumping duty to apply against importations from Sweden or any other country which has depreciated currency? Then there is one other question. Would the exchange dumping duty apply against other countries within the British Empire than Great Britain? For instance, would it apply in the case of importations from Australia or New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: The exchange adjustment duty applies naturally to countries whose currency is depreciated. It will apply to European countries to which my hon. friend refers as it does to Great Britain. The precise value of these different currencies is declared, of course, by order in council based upon the Customs Act, I think.

Mr. COOTE: Is that done in connection with each country?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. In regard to Australia I do not think the exchange adjustment duty is applied.

Mr. COOTE: Then I suppose it would be possible for an importer in Canada to have his cream separator sent from Great Britain to Australia and then reshipped to Canada. In that way could we evade this exchange dumping duty?

Mr. STEVENS: That is rather a subtle suggestion, and I think perhaps an importer might give it the once over. I should not like to put the official imprimatur on it.

Mr. COOTE: I am looking for a way to keep down the price of cream separators, and I am putting that question to the minister now.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is a clever suggestion.

Mr. EULER: If that were done once, would the government allow the practice to be continued?

Mr. STEVENS: I would rather not speculate on these ifs.

Mr. COOTE: Again I would like to ask the minister if there is any organization in his department, or in any department of the government, to see whether any increase does take place in the price of barbed wire, cream separators and other classes of commodities which have been mentioned here.

Mr. STEVENS: Very close track is kept of the variations in prices of goods; officers of the Department of National Revenue and of the bureau of statistics, as well as officers of the Department of Labour administering the Combines Investigation Act, all keep close tab on these matters, and the members of the government are kept informed. I may say that I know the Prime Minister takes a very deep interest in that particular kind of information.

Mr. COOTE: Is it the duty of any of these officers to report to the government any increase in price?

Mr. STEVENS: In a sense that is rather a strange question. It is just as I have indicated; these matters of prices are carefully kept track of, and the information is laid before the ministers and before the government. I think, of course, my hon. friend wants to know if there is any officer who is specifically instructed to keep a check on these prices and take action under any statute or regulation. I should say there is no officer with such a specific duty.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Before this item carries I think the house and the country might as well realize that it will mean an increase in the price of cream separators. In 1930 we had assurance from this government in connection with various commodities on which duties were increased; they told us that there would be no increase in prices. The government gave us to understand that they had the assurance in writing from the manufacturers that there would be no increase in price. We were led to believe that the government would assume the responsibility of removing the duties where prices were not reduced in accordance with world prices. We had that assurance from the Prime Minister and I would ask the government now whether anything has been done since 1930. I ask this house, has anything been done by this government since that time? They realized that they should take into consideration the fact that when world prices dropped there should be a corresponding drop in our own commodities. It has been drawn to the attention of the house by members at various times that there have been either increases or no reductions, and we are entitled to know what action has been taken. In speaking of items that were dealt with in 1930, I will refer once again to oil products. The case was clearly proved. We had the definite assurance of the Prime Minister in 1930, but nothing was done and it does not appear to be the intention of this government to carry out the undertakings they gave the people. As regards the minister's assurance that there will be no increase in price, that is just so much more humbug, such as we got in 1930. Everyone who has listened to the discussion that has taken place on this and on other items under this agreement will realize that where there is an increase in duty there will be a consequent increase in price to the consumer, and the farmers who have to buy cream separators might just as well make up their minds right now that they will pay more for that commodity.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Finance a little while ago made quite a point of the fact that under the old regime the manufacturers of cream separators were allowed to bring in parts duty free, while farmers wishing to bring in the same parts for repair purposes paid a duty. Will he tell us what inference he draws from that statement, or what significance he attaches to it.

Mr. RHODES: It is obvious that they get their repair parts now free under the British preference, whereas before they paid a substantial duty; and even in the case of repair parts from foreign countries there will be a reduction in practically every instance as compared with the former rates, because now they pay 25 per cent whereas in respect of some items the duty formerly went as high as 45 per cent under the general tariff. Now, as I say, it is 25 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has answered that part of my question to which I do not attach so much significance. What I regard as important is the fact that the manufacturer got his parts free while the farmer paid a duty. What significance does the minister attach to that point which he made?

Mr. RHODES: None, except that the manufacturer was placed in a preferred position as against the farmer. He got parts free where the farmer paid a duty.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad the minister admits that. He admits now that tariffs do raise prices.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will no longer tell us that tariffs do not raise prices. There is another question I want to ask. We have on the statute books certain anti-dumping laws which provide that if the foreign exporter wishing to get his goods into this country undertakes to pay the duty, an additional special dumping duty will be imposed. Can the minister tell me whether Great Britain has such a provision in her customs laws?

Mr. RHODES: Great Britain would have no necessity for it in relation to Canada because our currency is of greater value.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not mean in relation to Canada; but in her Customs Act has she any anti-dumping provision which would forbid foreigners to dump their products in the British market? I understand she has a duty of 20 per cent on cream separators. Has she a provision which makes it impossible for the foreigner to pay that duty and bring in separators?

Mr. STEVENS: The British system is different from ours. I am glad my hon. friend raised that question because it reminds me of something I overlooked a few moments ago when he inquired what the British duty was on cream separators, and some of the other hon. gentlemen inquired with regard to parts. It must be borne in mind that Great Britain imposes its duties on a c.i.f. basis, which is a very much higher basis than we are on, ours being the f.o.b. basis. Take cream separators for instance. The Canadian duty would be imposed on the cost of the article in Great Britain. In the case of a Canadian separator going into Great Britain, the duty would be based on the cost of the article, plus freight, plus port landing charges and all other charges, as I indicated the other day. So that you have an entirely different basis, and your ratio of duty imposed in Great Britain, although it might appear to be lower, might actually be higher. So much for that. My hon. friend asks whether Great Britain has a dumping duty provision similar to ours. They have not the same provisions as we have. Great Britain operates its import act very largely by regulations under the treasury board, and broad general powers are given to that body. It is under the treasury board, the official being known as the Commissioner of Customs and Excise, and they invest the board and the commissioner with very wide powers. They have not the same dumping provisions as we have but, as we do, they insist upon a sworn declaration of the accuracy of the invoice, which must be in just as clear terms as we call for. And, of course, they have a provision for the imposition of penalties in any case where there is an inaccurate or false declaration.

Mr. YOUNG: That puts us in this position then. Britain has no anti-dumping laws but she insists of course on a true and accurate invoice. But if the Swedish manufacturer of cream separators wishes to absorb the British duty and sell in Britain at the same price as he would sell in Sweden, he may do so. These separators cannot of course be transhipped to Canada, but the effect of that possibility to the Swedish manufacturer would be to force the British manufacturer in Great Britain to compete with the imported article, would it not? We should therefore find the price of separators in Britain coming down to the world level, and so the Canadian manufacturer who is looking for additional protection would find himself in competition with British separators selling at world prices. That would not hurt the farmer very much; he would not object to that. I want to look at the figures the minister gave last night. Home production, according to the figures he gave us, has declined since 1929 from 13,431 to 7,218. That is, the production of separators in Canada has been cut about in half. But our exports of the same article have been cut about eight. We export only about one-eighth of what we did two years ago. This world market we are losing. The other night tinplate—item 383, I believe—was under discussion. There is an increase in the duty on tinplate from the outside world and the minister told us that those who produce the commodity, and the biggest user of it in Canada, were present and did not raise any objection. We asked him if there were any secondary manufacturers to whom the commodity would be a raw material and who might find themselves handicapped by that increase in duty, and would therefore expect some compensating increase in the duty on their product. Now, the manufacturer of cream separators uses tinplate to a large extent, and as a result of the increase in duty under item 383 he will find himself in the position of paying higher prices for some of his raw material.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is no doubt well informed, but I should like him if he could to indicate just what tinplate is used in the manufacture of separators.

Mr. YOUNG: The discs are coated with tin.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think a disc manufactured from tin-plate would wear very well.

Mr. YOUNG: They do not, they get rusty very quickly.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid my hon. friend is in error.

Mr. YOUNG: No, I am not in error; I know there is a considerable amount of tinplate material used in these machines.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid I must challenge that statement.

Mr. YOUNG: I know the tin wears off very quickly, they get rusty and you have to renew them.

The result of this change will be to increase the cost of some of the raw material to the manufacturer. He will then seek compensation in the way of a higher duty upon his finished product. After this principle has been established it will be found that the cream separator man will have a real kick coming when we try to take off his duty; he will say, "You have increased the cost of my raw material and I must increase the cost of my finished product." The man who has been encouraged to go into the manufacture of tinplate will object to having the duty removed because of the investment he has made. The result of this legislation will be that more cream separators will be manufactured in Canada and Britain and the 23,838 separators which came in last year will be excluded from this country. Where will those separators be sold? They will be sold on the world market, there will be a dumping of separators somewhere. Our Canadian manufacturers will not be in a position to compete in the world market as they can compete at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member ought to be happy.

Mr. YOUNG: Because our Canadian manufacturers cannot compete? No. My hon. friend might be happy in succeeding in raising the cost of manufacture to a point where our manufacturers cannot compete in the world markets, but I am not. I would be much happier if he would create a condition of affairs where our manufacturers could compete in the world markets. This legislation increases the cost of production and puts our manufacturers in a position where they cannot lower the cost to the Canadian consumer.

I should like to refer to an argument made yesterday by the Prime Minister and repeated in part this morning by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As a reason for the increase in duty, the Prime Minister said that it had been done in order to encourage the Canadian workman to consume Canadian farm products. He said that this country produced some $1,600,000,000 worth of farm products of which $1,300,000,000 was consumed in Canada. I asked the Prime Minister if he had made any allowance for duplications, but he replied that he considered the figures to be correct. I took the trouble to check over these figures and I find that in order to find a year in which there was $1,600,000,000 worth of farm products produced in Canada, the Prime Minister had to go back to the days of the Liberal regime in 1929. The Prime Minister has evidently forgotten that there has been a change of government and that there is no such wealth produced today. Today the total value of farm products produced is $880,000,000, just about one-half what it was in 1929.

As far as consumption by the Canadian people is concerned, let us see what happens to this production before it reaches the people. Some 3,000,000 horses have to be fed, some 8,000,000 cattle have to be fed, some 3,600,000 sheep have to be fed, some 4,700,000 swine and 65,000,000 poultry have to be fed; all these animals have to be fed before the people of Canada get a chance at this production. The Prime Minister simply took the gross value of all farm products produced in Canada and said that that is what we consume; he forgot that the hay is destroyed in producing milk, that the milk is destroyed in producing butter and cream and that the only thing that counts is the final product. I suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that when they refer to a possible market for our farm products they take pains to see where the stuff is consumed.

Mr. COOTE: Can the minister advise whether or not the United States places an exchange dumping duty against Great Britain and against Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no special duty imposed by the United States but it must be borne in mind that they have, first, a very high rate of duty, and, secondly, a specific provision in their tariff which enables the president, through machinery which can be very promptly put in motion, to impose an embargo or increase the duty as he thinks fit whenever it is disclosed to him that any industry or interest in the United States is affected injuriously. This power is quite frequently invoked.

Mr. COOTE: That is somewhat similar to the power exercised by our Minister of National Revenue under section 43? I have been told that cream separators are free under the United States tariff. If that is so, apparently that country is treating Great Britain much better than we do. If that is so, it needs some stretching of the imagination to call this a preferential treatment for Great Britain.

Mr. CAYLEY: This is a most important item to the farm industry and I was wondering whether or not the National Dairy Council was consulted before this change was made. It seems to me that there is no other body or organization in the dominion which it would have been more logical to consult in connection with this matter. I know there was a body of farmers who desired to make representations to the government before anything was done, but they were not successful in their efforts.

Mr. RHODES: Neither the dairy council nor the manufacturers were consulted. This was dealt with as a matter of government policy, it was one of the items upon which Great Britain laid particular stress.

Mr. COOTE: Does the United States place a duty upon cream separators from Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Some of them are allowed in free but if they are above a certain value they carry a duty.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that the United States is treating us better than we are treating Great Britain, because we place an exchange adjustment duty against cream separators coming in from the old country while the United States has no such duty against Canada. We are in effect placing a duty of eighteen or twenty per cent upon cream separators coming from Great Britain. So far as I am concerned, I protest very strongly against this item, I think it is a mistake to have it in the agreement and the government should take up this matter with the British government in an endeavour to have the item changed by mutual consent.

Mr. YOUNG: Is this an item where the American tariff is reciprocal?

Mr. RHODES: I think the answer is in the negative.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) made a very reasonable request when he asked that the government, through the Minister of National Revenue, allow cream separators to come in under the present duty without any interference by the placing thereon of an arbitrary value. The Minister of National Revenue is in his seat and I should like to get some assurance from him that this reasonable request will be acceded to. Before I take my seat may I say to my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) that the only reason I mentioned the eastern townships was that I spent a very pleasant week-end there last year, and the people were so kind to me that I could not forget them.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: When speaking on the agreement as a whole I indicated that I thought this particular item was from our point of view the worst item in the whole schedule. I singled it out as the one which in my opinion would be the most difficult for the government to defend. It has been stated by the ministers who are representing the government and defending this agreement that all arguments from this side of the house are based wholly on the assumption that prices will be increased. It has been indicated, and I think quite correctly, that the final proof will be supplied by the actual circumstances that arise. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. That of course is true. It is equally true as applied to any other item or any other piece of legislation brought down in this house dealing with conditions with which we have not had previous experience. But in making an assumption it is reasonable to ask, is it based upon logic, upon experience in other lines which might well be applied to the particular case before us? That is about all we can do. As a matter of fact, the government itself is assuming just as much as anybody else when they say that there will not be a price increase. The question is, what are the logical grounds for the assumption? All discussion would be wholly useless were we to accept the situation that we must wait and see. We cannot do that.

What are the facts? They are well known, and have been reiterated so often that I do not care to repeat them. Cream separators have come in free for many years. Now a certain condition has arisen and a duty of 25 per cent is being placed on all separators coming in from any country outside the British Empire. We turn to past years and find that a number of years ago Britain exported quite a substantial number of separators to this country. That business was stopped during the war because the factory was turned over to other purposes, and during the last few years no separators have entered this country from Britain. What are we to assume by that? We can only assume that at the price which is being paid for separators in Canada the British did not find it profitable to compete. In view of the fact that for the last five years Great Britain has been combing the earth looking for opportunities to increase her export trade in every direction, we can only conclude that she has not sold separators in this country because she could not sell them at the price fixed by competition in this country. I think we can accept that.

The purpose of this new provision is twofold, and both purposes are perfectly legitimate. One is to permit Great Britain to sell a number of separators here, increasing her business by means of the preference. The other purpose is to enable the manufacturers of Canada to sell a larger proportion of their separators. The result anticipated by the minister is that there will be a greater output of separators on the part of both Great Britain and Canada, and that with that greater output the chances are in favour of a possible reduction in the price. Is that likely to be the case? Time alone will show. But to my mind, going upon the facts we have, as Great Britain has not been able to sell separators in Canada at present prices, it seems to me that only one of two things can happen: Either the Canadian manufacturer takes the whole market and in view of his larger output is able to continue to sell at present prices, or else prices will rise to a sufficient extent to allow Great Britain to sell separators at a profit in this country. Those are the only two alternatives.

As to the former, that Canadian manufacturers may supply the entire market at present prices, so long as they supply the separators we want and they are of good quality, I do not think exception can be taken to that. But why bring that in as part of this agreement? That would be no good to Great Britain. The only possible benefit that can come from this to Great Britain is from an increased price. I think we are warranted in assuming that, and therefore I think the argument which has been advanced as to the weight which this imposes on the dairy industry is well founded. True, it is only an assumption but I think it is a reasonable one.

The statement has been made that as a counterbalancing factor the price of repair parts will be lower than it was. If that be true, it will apply, of course, to those separators which are sold in the future. Just what value would a lower price on repair parts be to the farmer who owns a separator if those repair parts can only come from Great Britain and are not suitable for the farmer's purpose and the machine he now has? If you practically exclude repair parts from the country which made the separator, the lower price of the repair parts does not help the farmer at all.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will bear in mind that while repair parts enter free from Great Britain, the duty on repair parts from all other countries has been decreased very substantially.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Precisely, and to that extent undoubtedly it may be of some benefit to the farmer. In conclusion, without taking up any more time, I can only make the assertion that I look upon this item as not only unwise but unfair, as one which it will be most difficult to explain and defend in the country, and looking to the future I think we can only anticipate a higher price. It is one item to which I, in common with others, take great exception, believing it to be unnecessary as well as unwise. I might be asked, why then did I vote for the agreement? I voted for it, as I stated before, because against its disadvantages there must be offset the advantages of the British market for our butter and dairy products. You have to balance one against the other. But I do not think it is necessary to give with the one hand and take away with the other. If the farmer of this country requires a wider market for his products I think it is unfair to give him that with the one hand, and then partially deprive him of the benefit by taking away something with the other hand.

Mr. CAYLEY: In response to a question which I asked a few minutes ago the minister stated that this was a matter of government policy and therefore the National Dairy Council had not been consulted. I presume that would also apply so far as the British government is concerned. But I notice that in the schedule, under article one, free entry is provided into the British market for our butter and cheese and other milk products for three years certain. After that it is uncertain. That to me is a clear indication that the British government must have consulted their agricultural interests. In another article of the agreement reference is made to bacon and ham and pork products, and the provisions of that article are subject to a report to be made by a commission which is investigating farming conditions in Great Britain. I am convinced that the farmers of Canada have had a raw deal. They have knocked at the doors of the government asking to make representations so that the great industry of agriculture might receive some benefits and, at least on one occasion, they were refused. I point out that this government might better have left these two items of barbed wire and cream separators off the list entirely, because no matter what their explanations may be the farmers are feeling they are being imposed upon by what the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) has described as a great octopus. I am convinced that there is a whole family of them imposing upon the farmers, keeping prices up to a point they cannot reach. At the same time their farm produce, the only commodity they have to sell, is selling at ridiculously low prices. How can they go on with the prices they are receiving for their butter, cheese and milk; how can they pay for their equipment from the small receipts taken in for their produce. They are feeling keenly that this high tariff government is no friend of the farming industry.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have been called to my feet by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien). In answer I state that we are dealing with an agreement the terms of which must be kept. But if there is unfair trade and the government is in a position to act, it will most certainly use any instrument which comes to hand to prevent such a condition. For many years of my life I have been connected with the cream separator business. I am only sorry the Hon. Thomas Low, late Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house, was not present because he would bear out the further remarks I have to make.

I have been debating in my own mind whether some of the information I am about to disclose is of such a confidential character that I should not give it to the committee. I have decided however to state the facts as I know them. If any person tells you that this tariff change was sought by manufacturers, do not believe it. The statement has been made that they did not seek it, and I wish to add my testimony to that effect. Let me say also that the business in cream separators is diversified throughout the whole world, and yet it is in very few hands. A situation arose when it was more important for manufacturers of cream separators in Canada not to manufacture, but to import from the United States. There are two such concerns with establishments both here and in the United States. Another cream separator company stated it was unfair that cream separators and parts should be free for the manufacturer, and yet a duty levied upon the farmers. Therefore there was the situation of one company being willing to take the protection, and the other company unwilling. As the Hon. Thomas Low could tell you that condition continued. If a duty on cream separators had been asked from previous administrations I am sure, owing to the strength of opinion which would have supported it, that duty would have been granted. Now, what will be the effect of this tariff change? The effect of the agreement with the United Kingdom representatives is that cream separators and parts thereof enter free. I feel satisfied if hon. members would examine the invoices in our custom houses they would find that the most important importer of cream separators and parts has been a company doing business in Canada. That will not continue, because that company—and a strong company it is—is quite able to manufacture those parts in Canada. This country, instead of the United States, will reap the benefit of such business. As the industry well knows, that is a plain fact.

Then, as to price: Do not believe that there is any danger of higher prices, because competition is now keen. These manufacturing concerns in Canada can manufacture at as low a price as they can manufacture in the United States. The suggestion may be offered that a greater market would give them an advantage in the United States, but I am suggesting that the two big concerns can tune up and give the farmer of Canada a cream separator at the price he is now paying. There will be no occasion for raising prices, and I feel sure the competition is so keen they will not be raised.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister has mentioned two large companies. Will they not tune together, and thereby exact greater prices from the farmers?

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is just as little likelihood of their tuning together as there is of my agreement with my hon. friend opposite. I know that in the British Empire there is a factory which is subsidiary to the major factory situated in Sweden. But when we speak of factories in Sweden, the United States and Finland we must remember they are all under one control; we are speaking merely of a main company with subsidiaries. I assure the committee that in my opinion this, on balance, is all to the good. There is that anomaly with regard to parts which, I submit, is unfair, and I do not think any hon. member of the house could reasonably defend it. That is wiped out. Parts will come to the farmer at lower prices brought about by competition. The business which formerly, for convenience sake, was done in the United States, will be done in Canada.

Why was one of these manufacturing concerns strongly opposed to a duty on cream separators? Because, powerful as they were, they were manufacturing other dairy machines which were going into the United States duty free. They said, "Do not disturb the present situation, because if you do there will be trouble." This representation was not made to the Conservative party, but to hon. members opposite when in power. But, on balance, in my view this is all to the good.

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister disturbs the relationship in existence between the company he has mentioned and their export business to the United States, would he not expect they would lose a certain amount of Canadian business as a result.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think we will lose no Canadian business at all; in fact I think we will gain more.

Mr. DONNELLY: We have heard so much discussion on this cream separator item that I am led to wonder how we may expect Englishmen to export cream separators to Canada. Looking at the records we find that we have been exporting to Great Britain a large number of cream separators, and Great Britain has been exporting none to Canada, notwithstanding the fact that British cream separators were entitled to come in here free, as they will continue to be so entitled. What is going to arise to enable Great Britain to ship cream separators here? They will be on the same basis as they were before, they have been free, they are going to be free. But in some mysterious way they are now to come in. The only way I can see is that there is going to be an increase in price, if the price goes up then they will be able to come in. But there is something back of all this, there must be, as a reason why Great Britain has not been exporting cream separators to Canada. The fact is that the article made in Great Britain has not been favoured by Canadians, that is the whole story.

Then as to repairs from Great Britain being free, we are using no British machines, so we shall not want any repairs. What good will they do us? Then as to the great benefit to the farmers. We get cream separators in free now, we get the bowls in free, and if you take all other repairs that a man operating a cream separator requires what do they amount to in a year? About a dollar a year; so he may make a saving of five cents a year. But he will have to pay more for the separator. The government is making a great hurrah that they are going to save the farmer five cents a year on repairs. That is all it amounts to, it is another case of humbug, window-dressing, something to deceive the farmer.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have a few remarks to make on this item. Perhaps I could do it much better after we resume.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall item 409 carry?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, Mr. Chairman. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion on this item, and particularly to the statement made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this tariff increase will not increase the price of the finished article. That is an argument that has been used by the government in defence of other increases in the tariff, and in order to bolster up that argument they frequently point to the fact that there have been no increases in the prices of manufactured products in Canada since they came into office. Perhaps that argument is good, but let me point out to the government that there has been a tremendous falling off in prices all along the line since this government came to power, and that the spread between the primary and secondary products is much wider than ever before. Undoubtedly that is the result of the protection received by the manufacturing industry of Canada.

In connection with the cream separator industry may I say that I cannot conceive any reason why this industry needs any particular protection. I do not know any good reason that can be suggested as to why it should receive protection. We do know that the British manufacturer, as has been very properly pointed out by several hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, is manufacturing the larger sizes of separators used in large creameries, and that even their own requirements are supplied from foreign sources. I think it is evident that they will have to reorganize their industry at least if they are to actively compete with Canadian manufacturers. Not only do this government persist in giving protection to Canadian manufacturers almost to the point of exclusion; they take the opposite course when the raw products used by the same manufacturers are in question, and that is what has happened here. The raw products which enter into the manufacture of cream separators have been reduced pretty well all along the line, and the argument that repair parts for the separators now in use by the farmers of Canada will be cheaper does not mean very much. That saving will amount to very little in the case of the average farmer who purchases these repair parts. One thing is sure, as the hon. member for Lisgar said; when the government increased the protection on farm implement parts, repair parts manufactured by independent industries who did not manufacture the complete article went up in price. There may be some reduction in these parts, but it will be very slight. The fact remains, and it has been self-evident throughout the discussion on tariff matters, that these increases will raise the price paid by the consumer. It seems to me nothing more need be said in that connection.

Hon. gentlemen opposite argued formerly that by increasing the tariff we created more employment for people in Canada, and in consequence created a larger consuming public for our natural products. If there were any possibility of creating a secondary industry in this country that could consume all the farm and manufactured products there might be something in that argument, but by no process of reasoning can it be argued that we are even within measurable distance of that state of affairs. Moreover, it does not help even in countries where they can almost consume all their own products; on the contrary it has created a very difficult situation for the consumers in those countries, and in general has helped create more unemployment. So the argument put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite that this change will be beneficial to anyone—that is, anyone but the manufacturers of cream separators in Canada—has no basis. Undoubtedly those manufacturers will take advantage of the protection they are afforded. I have watched this process of the application of tariffs fairly closely, because it is one of the things in which I have been very greatly interested. As I said the other day, I know of only one industry in Canada that has not taken and is not taking full advantage of the protection afforded them. I refer to the rubber industry. Hon. gentlemen may argue that to the extent of three or four per cent other industries do not take that advantage, but why are protective duties necessary?

Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated in connection with this particular item—I believe it was the Prime Minister who made the statement—that the Canadian manufacturer of cream separators could compete with the American manufacturer, that he could produce an article equal in value at an equal cost. I think he stated that the Canadian manufacturers had so perfected their organizations in Canada that the same separator was selling wholesale for at least $28 less in Canada than in the United States. In the next breath he said he would have to admit that the importation from the United States into Canada was very considerable. No, Mr. Chairman, every time you increase the tariff on a given product you can be dead sure that the consumers who purchase the goods will have to pay almost the whole of that increase.

Mr. GOTT: If there is an increase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend says "if there is an increase." I have just pointed out that instead of increases in prices we should have reductions all along the line that we have not had.

Mr. MALONEY: Where is the increase?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend lives another year or two he will see the increase, or if there is a reduction in world prices he will find that the Canadian product will not be reduced accordingly. That will be the position. Hon. gentlemen opposite assured the electors of this country that if they were returned to office they would increase the price of dairy products. That was one of the pet schemes on which they were elected. Have they done so?

Mr. GOTT: Yes, in western Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I am glad my hon. friend can say so. They have not done it in my constituency, and I am vitally interested. This year one of my neighbours who had been milking fifteen cows told me, when I asked how he was getting along, that he had given all but three of those cows to his neighbour, because, he said, the remuneration he was receiving for the products of those cows would not pay for washing the milk spots off his overalls.

Mr. GOTT: May I ask a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will have his chance when I am through. He will have a chance also to explain to his electors just why he has not carried out the promises he made when they elected him in 1930.

Mr. GOTT: I did not make any promises.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A great many other hon. gentlemen will have that opportunity also. May I tell my friends opposite that their electors are just waiting for an opportunity to hear the explanations that my friends may have to offer. Then, on top of that disappointment, they are taking the opportunity of loading upon the back of the farmers just a little more in the way of costs, and that in an industry which they have nearly destroyed already.

Mr. GOTT: Is this drama or comedy?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what hon. gentlemen opposite have done. And then forsooth they turn around and say to us, "You would rather trade with the United States or some other foreign country than with Britain." May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the only interest that concerns me is the interest of the great consuming public of Canada. That is the only interest I have ever had.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Who is not a consumer?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. gentlemen opposite who live under the protection afforded them in manufacturing are usually not very heavy consumers. For the most part, if you come to examine it as minutely as I did some years ago, you will find that most of them are wearing and frequently eating foreign products; and most of them are always yelling, if they require anything in the way of raw products, to have such commodities come in duty free. That is the position which my hon. friends opposite occupy. Then they talk about our right-about-face in matters of this kind. If there is any raw product required in any given manufacture, they are here in full force asking that it be made free, and then when they get their product manufactured they place a respectable duty upon it so that they can milk the producers of the country in the process.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410l. Ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, grinding mills, rock drills, percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills, n.o.p., and complete parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in mining, metallurgical or quarrying operations: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tarif. 25 per cent.

Mr. BRADETTE: Can the minister give us some information in regard to this item?

Mr. RHODES: Under this item the imports last year amounted to $1,013,000; $309,000 came from the United Kingdom, $678,000 from the United States and $24,000 from Germany.

Mr. REID: Will the minister consider adding the words, "for road construction purposes as well." Many municipalities and provincial governments are in the market for rock crushers for road-making purposes, and this item is confined to machinery for metallurgical or quarrying operations. There will be a doubt regarding this matter when a municipality or a provincial government wishes to purchase a rock crusher for road purposes.

Mr. RHODES: Is the hon. gentleman asking that the item be enlarged to include crushing machinery for road purposes?

Mr. REID: Yes, if a preference is given.

Mr. RHODES: Of course the hon. member will realize that we cannot amend the article without further consultation. Is he merely asking whether such machinery is included in the item?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: No, it is not.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why not?

Mr. REID: This is rather important.

Mr. RHODES: There has been no change in the item so far as the wording is concerned; it is the same as it has appeared in the tariff.

Mr. BRADETTE: I gather that most of the crushers which are extensively used in the mining areas of this country have come from the United States, and the fact that we are increasing the tariff is bound to react on that fundamental industry in the mining sections of Canada, because the miners, like all primary producers, must obtain their machinery as cheaply as possible if they are to carry on. I have received protests in this connection, and some of those who are complaining are afraid that this will increase the cost of mining operations. Take the Porcupine district. Some ores there are yielding $7 per ton now and the committee will readily understand that the cost of production must be kept as low as possible or a mine like Hollinger will have to close its doors and then thousands of people who are employed the year round will be thrown out of work. I think the committee should give this matter thorough consideration. It is true that in Canada today we have an industry which manufactures some parts of big machinery used in these operations, but if my information is correct most of the heavy machines come primarily from the United States and England. As regards giving a preference to the English manufacturers, that is fine; but a large number of these machines must necessarily come from the United States and, I repeat, we cannot jeopardize the mining industry in this country by adding to its operating costs.

Mr. RHODES: Even under the old tariff of 10 per cent British preference we imported over $300,000 worth of mining machinery from England, and the obvious conclusion is that by widening the preference from 10 to 7½ per cent that importation will be still more largely increased. May I say that we have received no protests whatsoever from the mining industry in Canada with regard to these proposals.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What are the imports from foreign countries?

Mr. RHODES: From Germany, $24,000, and from the United States $687,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the present duty on rock crushers used for road-making purposes?

Mr. RHODES: It is difficult for me, even with the officials of my department here, to give a categorical answer to my hon. friend because the probabilities are that crushers used in road-making come under another item, 422a or 427. It is a matter of ruling by the National Revenue department.

Mr. BRADETTE: The fact remains that at present our mining industry must of necessity purchase machines to the value of half a million dollars per annum, and I can see no other effect, from the change in the intermediate and general tariff, than to increase the cost of this machinery to producers in Canada. I suppose it is impossible at this time to have these tariff schedules changed, but I can frankly inform the minister that I have received protests from the mining districts, particularly from the new mines in northern Ontario, to the effect that any increase in the tariff will result in increased cost of production. I know that the minister wants to be fair to the mining industry, but surely in view of the fact that we are importing half a million dollars worth of absolutely necessary machinery required by our mines in this country, he must admit that any increase in the tariff against the United States is bound to result in an increase in the cost of production in that industry, inasmuch as we import so much from that country.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 410o. Coal-cutting machines, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: I want some information in regard to this item. Some years ago this was put on the free list with a view, I believe, to cheapening the tools of production. As we all know, the coal industry from east to west is in a very bad condition, heavily bonused in the east, heavily bonused in the centre, rather slightly and shabbily bonused in British Columbia. So far as I learn, these machines are not exported from England to any extent, but are obtained in the United States, and certainly on the Pacific coast they will be brought in from that source. What is the importation from Great Britain, and what is the idea of increasing the duty, with its inevitable result upon this distressed industry?

Mr. RHODES: Usually my hon. friend is singularly well informed upon practically any subject on which he speaks, but I regret that in this case he is misinformed as to production in England. As a matter of fact they specialize in this type of machinery there, and are particularly efficient in the manufacture of coal-cutting machines. I may say to the committee that this is one of the items which Great Britain especially requested.

Mr. NEILL: What are the import figures?

Mr. RHODES: I am unable to give that information because I am informed by the officials that the figures are not segregated.

Mr. NEILL: How does the hon. minister know that the British are particularly successful in manufacturing and exporting this article?

Mr. RHODES: That information has been obtained upon inquiry.

Mr. NEILL: It seems to me to be one word against another. The minister has been informed that this is a very successful industry and I have been informed that it is not, and there are no figures available. I did take the trouble to attempt to obtain the information for which I have asked, and the minister is correct in stating that the import figures are jumbled up with the imports in connection with other articles. I have attempted to strike an average of the items under which this article comes which is imported from Great Britain, and I find it to be something like ·025 of one per cent. If that is correct there cannot be very large importations from Great Britain. Perhaps this argument may be rather specious because there might be a whole lot of this particular article and a small number of the other articles which go to make up the aggregate of the item. I shall not refer particularly to the undesirable system of lumping different articles together. So far as I can make out from the records of the Bureau of Statistics there will be a very small benefit to Great Britain because of this item. Unless the minister has positive knowledge that there have been so many thousands of these machines valued at so many hundreds of thousands of dollars brought into this country, I think we must accept the figures before us which show that there has been only a small number brought in. Can the minister give us any information as to the importations from the United States?

Mr. RHODES: I do not think the hon. member is justified in arriving at the conclusion that because we did not import a large quantity of coal cutting machinery from Great Britain when this article was free across the board, it follows therefore that they are not manufacturing a quantity and an excellent quality of this class of machinery. As a matter of fact, Great Britain is a fairly substantial exporter of this particular machine. The figures from the Department of Trade and Commerce disclose that last year she exported over half a million dollars worth of this commodity, some coming to Canada. The information from the mining industry is that the British machine is a highly efficient and modern product.

Mr. NEILL: Does the Canadian industry say it is satisfied with it?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. When I say the Canadian industry I hope my hon. friend will not take it that I mean the whole industry. Such information as we have been able to gather is to the effect that it is a highly efficient machine.

Mr. NEILL: And is used by Canadian coal miners?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Does any of that information come from the Pacific slope?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot say "yes" to that.

Mr. NEILL: I will go a little further and say that my information is that on the Pacific slope they have to get their machines from the United States. This change will mean an increase in the price to the extent to which the duty is being put on, which is 20 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: Ten per cent.

Mr. NEILL: The industry will be penalized. It is ten per cent for the general?

Mr. RHODES: Ten and ten per cent.

Mr. NEILL: Although ten per cent may not seem very much it means a lot to an industry which is so dilapidated as this one. There may be some importation of these machines into eastern Canada, but the machines used on the Pacific coast are imported from the United States and the industry in that part of Canada will have to continue to import from that source.

Mr. COOTE: Will the exchange adjustment duty apply to this item? I understand that that duty is charged in connection with goods of a class made in Canada, and I was wondering if it would apply to this item.

Mr. RHODES: The exchange adjustment duty has a general application. My hon. friend need not put his query with respect to each individual item; he can take it that this duty is applicable in general.

Mr. BRADETTE: Are we discussing item 410a?

Mr. RHODES: No, 410o as appears in the bill.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412a. Offset presses; lithographic presses; printing presses and typemaking accessories therefor, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Could we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. RHODES: What particular information does my hon. friend desire?

Mr. MARCIL: Where do these machines come from?

Mr. RHODES: The imports of the total item, out of which we have taken this one, amounted last year to $941,000, of which $123,000 came from the United Kingdom, $731,000 from the United States, and $84,000 from Germany.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412b. Flat bed cylinder printing presses, to print sheets of a size 25 by 38 inches or larger, and complete parts thereof; machines designed to fold or sheet-feed paper or cardboard, and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—414. Typewriters and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many were imported last year from the United Kingdom and the United States?

Mr. RHODES: The imports for last year were valued at $297,000, of which $11,700 came from the United Kingdom, and $285,000 from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it hoped to encourage the importations from the United Kingdom?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. I am told that already there has been an increase in the importations from Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has any order been placed by the government for English typewriters?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that in preference to Canadian typewriters?

Mr. RHODES: We are dealing with preferences.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—422a. Trench and ditch excavating machines, round wheel or vertical or ladder boom, chain and bucket type, for digging vertical or sloping bank ditches: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Were there any importations last year from Great Britain?

Mr. STEVENS: The item is not segregated but I happen to know that there is a very substantial business now being done and the prospects for a marked increase are very definite. Certain connections have been made during the last six months which should prove to be very beneficial.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427. Ball and roller bearings: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this article manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Practically not.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 427. Machinery, viz.: Power churns, power milk coolers, power fillers and cappers, power ice cream mixers, power butter printers, power cream savers, power bottle sterilizers, power brine tanks, power milk bottle washers, power milk can washers; ice-breaking machines, valveless or centrifugal milk pumps, sanitary milk and cream vats; none of the foregoing to include motive power: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 428a. Engines for motor trucks or motor buses when of 100 h.p. or more: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—429. Cutlery of iron or steel, plated or not:

(b) table knives and table forks: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

(c) pen knives, jack-knives, and pocket knives of all kinds: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(d) knives, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(e) spoons: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

(f) scissors and shears, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(g) razors and razor blades: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assume that there is a substantial importation from Great Britain under this item.

Mr. RHODES: Our imports last year of knives and forks alone were $229,000, $167,000 from the United Kingdom, $33,000 from the United States, $16,000 from Germany and $11,000 from France.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a fact that 15 per cent has been retained on table knives and forks, the blanks of which are imported free, and that on all the other items the duty has been removed? Could my hon. friend explain why that is the case?

Mr. RHODES: That is because there is a very substantial industry in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Pressure from local interests.

Mr. RHODES. No. Protection is given along the same lines as has been given for the past five years to an industry which has been established here. The duty has been reduced five per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431b. Adzes, anvils, vices, cleavers, hatchets, saws, augers, bits, drills, files, rasps, screwdrivers, planes, spokeshaves, chisels, mallets, metal wedges, wrenches, sledges, hammers, crowbars, cantdogs, and track tools, picks, mattocks, and eyes or polls for the same: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The importations last year were $963,000, $174,000 from the United Kingdom, $638,000 from the United States, $116,000 from Germany, and $16,000 from Sweden.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an increase of 7½ per cent in the intermediate and 5 per cent in the general tariff. Can my hon. friend give me the names of the industries in Canada which will benefit by this increased protection?

Mr. RHODES: The tool makers are listed in the Canadian Trade Index as follows:

Accessories Manufacturers Limited, Montreal, Quebec.

Allard Machine and Tool Company, Toronto, Ontario. Amalgamated Electric Corporation, Limited, Toronto, Ontario.
Armstrong, Mervin, Toronto, Ontario.
Bridgeport Manufacturing Company, Bridgeport, Ontario.
Brown Engineering Corporation Limited, Toronto, Ontario.
Bryant, Pattern and Manufacturing Company, Limited, Windsor, Ontario.
Butler, William, Machine Company, Hamilton, Ontario.
Canadian Atlas Steels, Limited, Welland, Ontario.
Clark Machine Company, Thorold, Ontario.
Colonial Tool Company, Limited, Walkerville, Ontario.
Connor Machine Company Limited, Windsor, Ontario.
Dominion Rubber Company Limited (rubber machinery shops), Kitchener, Ontario.
Ford-Smith Machine Company Limited, Hamilton, Ontario.
Gibb's Tool and Stamping Works, Vancouver, B.C.
Hafer Machine Company Limited, Victoria, B.C.
Haliburton & White Limited, Montreal, Que.
Homer & Wilson, Hamilton, Ontario.
Jackson & Clark Limited, Vancouver, B.C.
Kartzmark & Sons, Hamilton, Ontario.
Lunn, G. J., and Company, Montreal, Que.
Milton Foundry Machine and Tool Company, Milton, Ontario.
Montreal Locomotive Works Limited, Montreal, Que.
National Steel Products Limited, Sherbrooke, Que.
Peerless Engineering Company, Toronto, Ontario.
Precision Tool Works Limited, Toronto, Ontario.
Pyramid Manufacturing Company Limited, Welland, Ontario.
Roelofson Elevator Works, Galt, Ontario.
Strom Machine Shop, St. Catharines, Ontario.
United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada Limited, Montreal, Que.
Whitfield, John Company, Limited, Toronto, Ontario.
Worth Machine Works, Toronto, Ontario.

Mr. YOUNG: What was the production in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: The production in Canada last year of saws was $877,000; axes, $529,000; drills of all kinds (tools), $346,000; drills—metal working, $18,000; punches and shears, $144,000.

Mr. YOUNG: It seems quite an extensive list of goods on which to have the price increased in order to grant this preference.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 438a, ex 438b, ex 438c. Motor vehicles, n.o.p., not including motor buses: British preferential tariff, free.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many automobiles have been brought in from Great Britain and of what classes?

Mr. RHODES: I shall have to give the imports under the different headings. Under 438a we imported last year $223,000, of which $221,000 came from the United States. Under 438b we imported last year $2,557,000, of which $2,544,000 came from the United States and $9,000 from the United Kingdom, and motor trucks we imported to the value of $939,000, of which $849,000 came from the United States and $90,000 from the United Kingdom. Under 438c we imported last year $1,037,000, $785,000 of which came from the United States and $239,000 from the United Kingdom.

Mr. MARCIL: What classes of automobile are we importing from the United Kingdom, costly cars or cars of medium value?

Mr. RHODES: The largest list of passenger cars which came from England would be in the higher priced group, although there was a limited number of cheaper cars, namely, the Austin and Morris.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the government expect the cheaper cars will be replaced by English importations?

Mr. RHODES: I should not like to say that. We are allowing for keener competition however and the English manufacturer will have his opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was a time when all governments advocated the taxation of luxuries. This however seems an effort to admit luxuries free. The very expensive cars which only the wealthy may hope to purchase, are now admitted free of duty, whereas they used to carry 15 per cent. To my mind the only effect the change will have is to let in luxurious cars free of duty when in fact they represent a source of revenue we might have had. They could have been taxed under the head of luxuries.

Mr. RHODES: If the right hon. gentleman's statement of fact is correct, and for the moment I shall not quarrel with it, his conclusion also is correct. He must remember this however that, assuming we do lose the impost on a few of the higher priced cars coming into Canada, the chances are far greater that it will be made up by income taxation from the increased earnings of companies now afforded a larger opportunity to do an export business. Canada is in a far better position to manufacture motor cars than any other portion of the empire, with the possible exception of Great Britain. This change gives us entry into larger markets.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister think any exception would have been taken if the government had asserted at the conference that they were quite willing to remove the duty on all cars except those of a highly luxurious type, and had asked that duty on such cars might remain? A satisfactory source of revenue would have been provided, and would have maintained the precedent of taxing luxuries where possible.

Mr. YOUNG: I wonder if I understood the minister correctly. I understood him to say that the higher the profits our manufacturers could make, the more revenue we would have in income tax, and that therefore he was justified in enabling them to make as great a profit as possible at the expense of our people. I do not believe the minister really intended to subscribe to that principle. The other day when discussing one of these items I made the following statement:

This item shows an increase in the intermediate and general rates.

The preferential rate remained free.

According to the figures just given by the minister Great Britain in the past has practically dominated this market. I take it that the importations from France and Germany were of special varieties not produced in Great Britain. Why was it necessary to increase the rates in order to give Great Britain a further preference when she already controlled the market.

The Minister of Finance replied:

If those importations were of special varieties then they should pay something to the treasury of this country.

Then, later, I asked the following question:

I take it that the minister accepts the doctrine that special varieties of what we might call higher class goods should pay a higher rate than the more common varieties?

To that question the minister replied: Yes. I took it at that time that the minister subscribed to the doctrine that higher priced articles should pay a higher rate. It would seem however that in connection with this article he is not living up to that doctrine.

Mr. RHODES: That may be quite so, Mr. Chairman. I have no quarrel with the argument my hon. friend is making in this particular instance which, as he no doubt will admit, is rather unusual. My answer is however that this is a conference agreement.

Mr. YOUNG: Did anybody ask for it?

Mr. RHODES: No manufacturer or individual asked for it. It arose out of the conference agreement.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. YOUNG: When the minister states so frequently that nobody asked for this or that increase, but that it arose spontaneously from the agreement I am reminded of the time when Moses came down from the mountain only to find the children of Israel worshipping the golden calf. He turned to his brother Aaron and said, "What did these people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them?" And Aaron replied, "The people brought me their gold; I cast it into the fire and there came out this calf."

Mr. NEILL: Which is Moses?

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member is saying this agreement arose spontaneously out of the conference, that it just came out.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—440j. Trawls, trawling spoons, fly hooks, sinkers, swivels, sportsmen's fishing reels, bait and hooks, and fishing tackle, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: This is another item which will affect adversely the interests of the commercial fishermen, although on the surface it would not appear to do so. The previous rates were 20 per cent under the British Preference, 25 per cent intermediate and 30 per cent general. Now, under this agreement the government makes the rates, free, 25 per cent and 30 per cent. As I say on the surface it would appear not to hurt the fishermen, but the fact is that it does. The reason is that there are one or two commodities included in this item which, through other items of our tariff, came in free from every country as a special concession to the commercial fishermen. I have not all those items before me, but I have one just a few pages over. We notice in the item the term n.o.p., which I believe is the short form of the term "not otherwise provided for." But this is not a Canadian tariff. This is a treaty being made with Great Britain, and the expression, "n.o.p." can apply only to those articles not otherwise provided for in this document or agreement.

Mr. RHODES: No, no; my hon. friend is wrong in that assumption. The term n.o.p. is used in the item as it stands in the tariff today and as it will continue to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: I must apologize to the committee; I skipped item 438b concerning motor cycles or sidecars therefor.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest we finish the item we are discussing.

The CHAIRMAN: Very well.

Mr. NEILL: The minister's suggestion is that it refers to our tariff, but it does not say so. The expression is "n.o.p." which means not otherwise provided for. Our general tariff is not before the British government, and when the expression n.o.p. is used it must mean n.o.p. as regards this document. I believe trouble will arise in the future in this matter. This n.o.p. can refer only to the tariff before us, or that limited tariff with which we are dealing today. We will suppose that these articles come in from the United States and we attempt to impose a tax of 30 per cent. Well, in those circumstances it is no argument for the fishermen to say that under item 682c the rates for swivels are free, free and free because after all this is a tariff arrangement with Great Britain; it is not an arrangement with the United States. I submit there should be at least a definition that it is n.o.p. of the Canadian tariff. I should like to know how we are to get an article in free under item 682c of the customs tariff when a bargain has been made with Great Britain that such commodity shall carry a burden of 30 per cent. I ask the minister for a definite explanation of how he can make the expression n.o.p. apply to some other document not before us?

Mr. RHODES: I believe I can give a clear explanation,—at least I trust I can. My hon. friend will observe these schedules are attached to the agreement, but the law as affecting the tariff will be based upon the tariff proposals as contained in the resolutions in committee of ways and means. This item will be dealt with there. The expression n.o.p. will have reference to our tariff, just the same as it does today. If my hon. friend will look up the item 440j in the existing customs tariff he will find precisely these same words, including n.o.p. I therefore wish to assure him that the n.o.p. has reference to our Canadian tariff.

Mr. NEILL: It is in our ways and means committee, certainly, but what will the Britishers say? It will be misleading.

Mr. RHODES: No, the Britishers thoroughly understand the situation as I have explained it.

Mr. NEILL: I hope so.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438b. Motor cycles or sidecars therefor: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This is an entirely new item. It means we place motor cycles and side cars on the free list. Our importations last year were $241,000 of which $84,000 came from the United Kingdom and $156,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—441. Guns and rifles of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: If they are not made in Canada why do you put 5 per cent on the British preference?

Mr. RHODES: We have reduced the British preference from 10 per cent to 5 per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Why not let them in free?

Mr. RHODES: Well, it is a fair revenue producer. Sporting rifles we felt should bear some tax.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445c. Electric telegraph or telephone apparatus and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445d. Electric wireless or radio apparatus and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: A great many of these goods are made in Canada at present?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, an increasing quantity, yet at the same time we imported a very large quantity last year, to the amount of $4,160,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The old rate of duty was 27½ per cent; what was gained by raising it to 30 per cent? It merely means additional protection to the manufacturer, and he will pass that on to the consumer.

Mr. RHODES: If one insists upon bringing the goods in under the general tariff he will have to pay 2½ per cent more duty. On the other hand my right hon. friend will realize that under the British preference we have reduced it from 15 per cent to free.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Assume the consumer wishes to buy a Canadian article, he will just have to pay that 2½ per cent additional.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend and I will have to continue to disagree with respect to what will happen in that case.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What percentage comes from the United States under the general tariff, and what percentage from Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Last year we brought from the United Kingdom $42,000 and from the United States $4,086,000 and from Germany $30,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the Canadian manufacturers of these machines satisfied with this arrangement?

Mr. RHODES: They were not asked as to their views.

Mr. MARCIL: I thought they had been consulted.

Mr. RHODES: No, they were not.

Mr. MARCIL: Were the English manufacturers consulted?

Mr. RHODES: They may have been by the British delegates, but not by us.

Mr. CAYLEY: Did you receive any protests?

Mr. RHODES: I know of none.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445e. Electric storage batteries, composed of plates measuring not less than eleven inches by fourteen inches and not less than three-quarters inch in thickness; complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445k. Flame proof electric switch gear, for use underground in coal mines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446. Electric steam turbo generator sets, 700 h.p. and greater of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446a. Steel bicycle rims, not enamelled nor plated: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these manufactured in Canada to any extent?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Bicycles are made here in large quantities.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: Yes, but the rims are imported.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446a. Golf shafts of seamless steel, coated or not, but not chromium plated: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Bottles or cylinders of seamless steel used as high pressure containers for gas: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The old rate under the general tariff was 25 per cent, that has been raised to 35 per cent. What was the reason of the addition of 10 per cent to a tariff already so high.

Mr. RHODES: No, the former rates were 15, 27½ and 35 per cent. The new rates, free, 25 and 25; a reduction all round. You should congratulate us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I do.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Steel balls, not larger than three-eighths inch in diameter, commonly known as "burnishing balls": British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—476. Surgical and dental instruments of any material; surgical needles; X-ray apparatus; microscopes valued at not less than $50 each, by retail; and complete parts of all the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What was the value of the imports of these surgical instruments from Germany, the United States and France?

Mr. RHODES: It is impossible to give the exact figures, but I will give the total importations of the parent item from which this item was extracted. It is part of total imports amounting to $1,458,000 of which $51,000 came from the United Kingdom, $1,216,000 from the United States, $123,000 from Germany and $46,000 from France.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister realizes that this increase of ten per cent in intermediate and general affects, practically speaking, one province only, the province of Quebec. As the minister very well knows, the teaching in our medical schools in Quebec is based entirely on the French method and the teaching in the French universities. The whole of our professorial staff, as far as our universities and medical schools are concerned, have been taught in French universities; the descriptions of surgical operations contained in our technical books, including the instruments used, are altogether French. The students, the doctors graduating from these universities have been taught the French instrumentation. They have been taught nothing else. First they are taught the methods and then the use of the instruments, and you are simply exacting a premium from the practice of medicine and surgery in the province of Quebec. I mention Quebec particularly because we are practically the only province where French methods and French teaching are entirely followed. These surgical instruments include needles, x-ray instruments and microscopes. Do you realize that in our French universities and medical schools, as well as our French Canadian hospitals, and even in those medical units that have been organized recently, French instruments are used exclusively? We cannot exchange them for one very good reason. Two-thirds of the medical practitioners in the province of Quebec, especially those practising in the rural communities, do not read or understand English. Therefore it is impossible for them to substitute surgical instruments manufactured either in England or in the United States for the French instruments they have been using in the past, and it seems to me this legislation is going to place a great handicap on a profession which already is extremely handicapped in these times of stress. For these people a 10 per cent increase will make the price almost prohibitive as far as the purchase of French instruments is concerned. Surely the government is not so poor that by means of the tariff they must tax our universities, our hospitals, our medical men and so on. I am under the impression that under the heading of surgical instruments will come even those instruments which are used in our colleges for teaching the pupils. They are all of French manufacture, and the reason these articles were free under all tariffs in the past was because of the fact that Quebec is in an extremely awkward situation in this respect. So I say that this tariff is simply a premium levied against our French Canadian medical profession.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to support the remarks of the hon. member for Rimouski Mr. Chairman. I have noticed in the French Canadian press several statements to that effect. For years the province of Quebec has been in the habit of giving scholarships to certain students who go to the universities in Paris and come back to Canada with the knowledge they have obtained there. We all know that science would be very much poorer today if it were deprived of the knowledge which has been gained by French scientists. In Quebec we have many people who have been taught the French methods, and certainly they would be placed under a great handicap if they were penalized by this tariff. I hope the minister will find a way out.

Mr. RHODES: I beg to assure my hon. friend from Rimouski as well as my hon. friend from Bonaventure that this is the first time this aspect of the matter has been brought to my attention.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is exactly what I thought. Will the minister allow me one question? Were any consultations held with the college of surgeons of the province of Quebec, with the authorities in control of our French Canadian hospitals or with the medical profession of that province? I am rather surprised that the French Canadian representatives in the cabinet, particularly those from the lower part of the province of Quebec, have not entered a protest. I think this step is not justified. I do not think for one second that the government took this action wittingly; I am quite sure that the aspect of the case I have brought to the fore today has not been given due consideration.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend did not permit me to conclude. I was going to say that since our friends in Quebec are compelled to use these French instruments for the reasons outlined by my hon. friend from Rimouski, who is thoroughly familiar with the matter, this seems to me to be a case in which they should receive some special consideration. I may say to my hon. friend that I think he has made out a reasonable case, and I can assure him that the matter will be examined with extreme care. We will discuss the question with the British authorities, as my hon. friend will appreciate we are compelled to do under the terms of this agreement, and if any amelioration can be arrived at which will meet the objection my hon. friend has in mind, we will be only too happy to see that it is done. The object we had in mind was not to increase the expense to the hospitals or the medical profession at all; our sole object was to deflect into empire channels purchases of this kind. I am not minimizing the force of the argument of my hon. friend; it would be sound if they imported only $100 worth of these instruments, but I might point out that out of a total importation last year under the parent item of $1,458,000, we imported from France only $46,000 worth, so the items under review here would entail much less than that amount.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But the minister must remember that the French Canadian hospitals and universities are few in number.

Mr. RHODES: I am saying that the blow would not be very heavy even if they were compelled to pay this 10 per cent, but I assure my hon. friend that the matter will be gone into with the British authorities to see if we cannot make an arrangement which will meet the objection raised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am in entire sympathy with what the hon. member for Rimouski has just said. I have some knowledge of these things, because I happen to live and practise in a French Canadian district in Manitoba. I cannot entirely agree with my hon. friend, however, when he says that Quebec is the only province that will be affected by this measure.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I said, "practically."

Mr. HOWDEN: I believe I am correct in saying that Swedish surgical instruments are the best on the market, and in the opinion of the medical profession where I come from certainly the next in order would be United States instruments. Instruments from these countries rank very highly in comparison with other surgical instruments, and to a very large extent they are used in our hospitals and by the medical men of the west.

This item is on a par with the other item referring to sera, toxins and so on, and to the other item covering surgical dressing. I might remind the committee that hospitals generally are charitable institutions which must be kept up by municipal and provincial grants and to a very large extent by donations from private individuals. I can assure you, sir, that hospitals generally are having a pretty hard time to get along just now. I might say a word for the medical men also, and assure the committee that at the present time they are not having a very fat time of it. These instruments and surgical appliances generally, together with dressings and other things, exact a pretty big toll from the average medical man, and a very large toll from the hospitals. I should have thought that in considering these items the government might have made good their revenues from other sources instead of taxing what are practically charitable institutions. There is no other institution in the land which gives so freely of its time, effort and expense in serving the people of Canada as the medical profession and the hospitals. I think this matter should be looked into by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. RHODES: I may say to my hon. friend from St. Boniface that he is assuming that of necessity this will involve an increased expenditure by the hospitals.

Mr. HOWDEN: That must be so in connection with X-ray apparatus.

Mr. RHODES: I have had occasion to make some inquiries into the matter of X-ray apparatus, and that will not be the case.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not?

Mr. RHODES: My information, after some careful inquiry, is that the British X-ray apparatus today is the equal of any in the world. They have made tremendous strides in X-ray apparatus, particularly in connection with photography. In fact, they lead the world today to a marked extent.

Mr. YOUNG: Do they tell you that themselves?

Mr. RHODES: Our idea in this was not that the hospital should pay more but that we should buy from empire sources, and as a result of the agreement arrived at the British manufacturers of X-ray apparatus and equipment of that kind are today arranging to have in Toronto headquarters where they will have their machines on exhibit, and where there will be experts for servicing. As speedily as possible they propose to have a central distributing area in each of the provinces so that the matter of servicing will be taken care of. There is no question about either price or quality. My hon. friend has said that Swedish surgical instruments are the best in the world. I must say that he is reflecting upon the members of his profession if that is so, because we do not import any from Sweden.

Mr. HOWDEN: I can assure the minister that I have bought a considerable number of Swedish instruments myself and they are the most expensive instruments in this country.

Mr. RHODES: I can say to my hon. friend that they must have come from the United States—

Mr. HOWDEN: Maybe.

Mr. RHODES: —because there were no importations from Sweden. I do not know that there is anything more I can say except that we have every hope and expectation of being able to supply the hospitals with these commodities from empire sources at no increase in price.

Mr. HOWDEN: The Minister of Finance will have a very hard time convincing the medical men in our part of the country that the British X-ray apparatus is the best on the market.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must not misunderstand me; I said so far as X-ray photography was concerned they led the world. As regards the apparatus itself, I said it was the equal of any in the world.

Mr. HOWDEN: I can assure the minister that the western hospitals are to a very large extent equipped with American and European X-ray apparatus, German and French. Those that are already installed will from time to time require new tubes and other repairs, and there is no doubt that the increase in the tariff, intermediate and general, on these articles is bound to result in an increase in the cost of operating hospitals as well as in cost to medical men. We might ask the Minister of Railways what he thinks about it, but I suggest that this article might well be taken in conjunction with the articles of surgical dressings and sera. These three articles will cost the hospitals and medical men and as well the people of this country decidedly more. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I would not take up the time of the committee discussing this matter but I was asked by a medical friend, rather a well known man, whether I would present this statement to the committee as a matter of general principle applicable to questions such as the one now under consideration. His view is that in connection with instruments or medicine or any of those things upon which the lives and the health of the people directly depend, the first consideration should be not any question of business, not any question affecting the individual or the country producing or selling the commodity required, but that rather, in matters where the lives and the health of the people are directly concerned, the sole consideration should be the ability of those who require such instruments to get them where they can best be procured and at the cheapest price. That consideration alone should prevail. The opinion which this gentleman expressed was certainly that it would increase the cost or else force them to buy what they might not regard as equally suitable for the purpose. The principle he laid down, which in my opinion is a sound one, was that in such matters it was not a question of ordinary business but that the lives and the health of the people should take priority of any other consideration, and medical men should be able to buy the instruments they liked best at the cheapest prices. I pass that on to the consideration of the minister because I believe that the principle enunciated is absolutely sound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—488. Nitrate and acetate of lead, not ground; platinum and black oxide of copper, for use in the manufacture of chlorates and colours: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year were $67,000, of which $14,000 came from the United Kingdom and $51,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of cotton, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 3½ cents; general tariff, 4 cents.

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year were $13,000 under this item, of which $8,000 came from the United Kingdom and $4,000 from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522c. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of cotton, including threads, cords and twines generally used for sewing, stitching, packaging and other purposes, n.o.p.; cotton yarns wholly or partially covered with metallic strip, generally known as tinsel thread: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 3½ cents; general tariff, 4 cents.

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year were $327,000, of which $76,000 came from the United Kingdom, $185,000 from the United States and $53,000 from France.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522d. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, mercerised, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers to be further manufactured in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 522. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, number forty and finer, when imported by manufacturers of mercerised cotton yarns for use exclusively in the manufacture of mercerised cotton yarns, in their own factories—until December 31, 1933: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free; thereafter: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. FACTOR: What does this mean, "until December 31, 1933"?

Mr. RHODES: They may be imported free until that date, and thereafter the rates will be as specified. That is in accordance with the agreement, to enable the completion of an industry which is being established in Canada to manufacture them.

Mr. YOUNG: Did they ask for it this time?

Mr. RHODES: This is a matter of agreement, and was in being.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is the industry located?

Mr. RHODES: In Guelph.

Mr. YOUNG: Owned by whom?

Mr. RHODES: It is a branch of one of the biggest industries in the world, Aberfoyle.

Mr. YOUNG: They didn't ask for this.

Mr. RHODES: I am not suggesting that they did not ask for this because they certainly did, but the agreement was made long before the conference.

Mr. YOUNG: This is one case where the Canadian manufacturer did ask for something.

Mr. RHODES: We had to make good our undertaking and the British agreed that they would recognize it.

Mr. CAYLEY: Who made this agreement before the conference?

Mr. RHODES: It was agreed between the Canadian government and this industry that we would admit their goods free until such time as they were in position to manufacture.

Mr. CAYLEY: In what year?

Mr. RHODES: They were in discussion with the government for at least two and probably six months prior to the conference.

Mr. CAYLEY: There were some parties interested in this agreement who had the privilege of interviewing the government.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend misunderstands me entirely. This agreement was made apart altogether from the conference and it had to be recognized in honour when we came to the conference agreements.

Mr. CAYLEY: It was not discussed at the conference?

Mr. RHODES: No.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. CAYLEY: I mentioned this morning that the farmers had not been given a chance to interview the government in order to make their wishes known as to what they desired to be in the treaty agreements but here is a case where evidently—

Mr. RHODES: I cannot allow my hon. friend to make that deduction. The farmer has the same right to make representations to the government as has anybody else and he has never been denied an opportunity of doing so. This agreement was made long before the conference and my hon. friend is now saying that because we dealt with these people at that time we dealt with them in a different way with respect to the conference. We have done nothing of the kind.

Mr. CAYLEY: In most of the answers to my queries the minister stated that no one was consulted, that it was just a matter of agreement.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: That is not so in this case.

Mr. RHODES: This agreement arose prior to the conference which had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. MARCIL: From what I read in the Montreal papers I understood that conferences were held between Canadian and British manufacturers long before the imperial conference took place, and that the arrangements arrived at were submitted to the government. Is there anything in that?

Mr. RHODES: There were any number of conferences of various kinds between different interests, but that had no reference to this agreement at all.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, not bleached, mercerised nor coloured, n.o.p., and cotton seamless bags: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent and 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 25 per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. SPENCER: What was the old schedule?

Mr. RHODES: This is a straight deduction of one cent per pound under the British preferential.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523a. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, bleached or mercerised, not coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent and 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 27½ per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. TOTZKE: What is the difference in this item?

Mr. RHODES: We have reduced the specific rate one cent per pound.

Mr. TOTZKE: What was the tariff prior to 1930?

Mr. RHODES: Fifteen, twenty-two and a half and twenty-five per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: What were the imports?

Mr. RHODES: Our total imports last year were valued at $1,049,000, of which $575,000 came from the United Kingdom, $426,000 from the United States, and $33,000 from Switzerland.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523b. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, printed, dyed or coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent and 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 32½ per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What were the imports?

Mr. STEVENS: Our imports were valued at $5,343,000, of which $2,365,000 came from the United Kingdom, $2,108,000 from the United States, $239,000 from Italy, $219,000 from Czechoslovakia, $170,000 from Belgium and $81,000 from France.

Mr. CAYLEY: What is the Canadian production?

Mr. STEVENS: The production is not completely classified. The production of denim is valued at $1,255,000; of ducks and drills, $1,756,000; of flannelette, $1,750,000; of gingham, $200,000; of shirtings, $1,500,000, of other prints, $6,376,000 and not specified, $4,500,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think this item proves conclusively that the Canadian manufacturer does take full advantage of any protection. It will be found that the imports from the United Kingdom have run along fairly steadily despite the fact that hon. gentlemen have increased the duty very materially. To my mind this is a clear indication that the Canadian manufacturer takes full advantage of the protection afforded him, otherwise the Britisher could not sell a dollar's worth in Canada. When the depreciated currency is taken into consideration, the total duty against the British importer is something like 58 per cent. That is the price the Canadian consumer must pay for these excessive duties. I am not complaining of the imports from England but I do say that this is a clear, concrete case of soaking the consumer. The trade is doing it to the fullest extent and my hon. friends know that this is one of the items which enter largely into the requirements of the homes throughout the country.

I do not intend to say anything more in connection with these textile items but I must comment upon the care taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to see that this industry receives the maximum protection, amounting almost to exclusion. I think it is grossly unfair to the consuming public that such protection should be given. In 1930 we were told that extra duties were being imposed in order to provide employment in Canada but I am informed that the result has been that under one-half of the employees are now working. I protest as vehemently as I possibly can against these excessive duties placed upon an article so important in the lives of the Canadian people.

Mr. SANDERSON: What were the rates prior to 1930?

Mr. STEVENS: On piece, dyed cottons the rates were twenty, twenty-five and twenty-seven and a half per cent, and on yarns, dyed, twenty, twenty-five and thirty per cent.

Mr. TOTZKE: No specific duty?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523, 523a and 523b. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, composed of yarns of counts of 100 or more, including all such fabrics in which the average of the count of warp and weft yarns is 100 or more: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 32½ per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. HEAPS: I would ask the minister what factors are taken into consideration in granting protection to a Canadian industry.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad my hon. friend has asked that question because it was fully considered when these matters were under consideration. One of the factors considered is the cost of raw material, but the main factor entering into this particular industry is the difference in labour costs in Canada as compared with other countries producing this article. The other factors considered are the normal factors of commerce such as overhead and the usual charges, but the two main factors are cost of labour and cost of raw material.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not the raw material enter this country free?

Mr. STEVENS: In this case, yes.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the difference in labour costs in Canada and Great Britain, which happens to be a competitor in this commodity?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not that information here, but when this matter was under discussion I brought the British representatives into close and direct contact with the representatives of the industry here, and we had them visit various plants in Canada. There is a difference in the way the industry is carried on here and in the old country. The machining part of it is somewhat different, and the labour factors are not on an exact parity. So far as they were comparable wages in this country showed a marked appreciation over those in the old country. I recall, and my hon. friend will recall, that he put on Hansard and I put on Hansard in days gone by comparative statements of labour costs here and in England, and roughly, as I recall, they were about double in Canada as of that day. But on close examination it is shown that this comparison is not as accurate as might appear on the face of it. I can merely say this, that the labour factor is an important factor, and while it is not exactly comparable due to the different methods followed in Great Britain, my hon. friend can rest assured that the labour cost is much higher here than in Great Britain.

Mr. HEAPS: It would have been very interesting if we could have had exact figures on labour costs. My own information is that labour costs in the textile industry in this country are less per unit than in Great Britain; that is, the number of looms handled by one employee in Canada is so much greater than in England that the actual labour cost per unit is less. Where we take into consideration that this industry is protected to the amount of 60 or 70 per cent, and this is not an over-estimate, it is certainly getting something in the way of protection which represents far more than the difference in labour costs. I was interested in this question because on many previous occasions I have on behalf of the textile workers in Canada urged that their wages were altogether too low especially when the industry was receiving so much protection. A couple of years ago, I think the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce will remember, that we put up a rather strenuous fight in this house in regard to the protection given to the Besco Corporation and the benefits it was receiving, having regard to the working conditions prevailing in that particular industry, and I was very glad indeed to observe the sympathy we received from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce as we protested against the conditions prevailing, particularly with regard to the hours of labour.

Some time ago I sent a communication to the British Trades Union Congress to ascertain the wages paid in the textile industry in Great Britain, and on August 23 I received a reply from the research department of the Trades Union Congress. This communication shows that women, eighteen years of age, engaged in the textile industry in Lancashire, in the bleaching, dyeing and finishing sections, receive 18 shillings per week, plus 7 shillings and ninepence, or 25 shillings and ninepence per week. In Scotland they receive 15 shillings, plus 7 shillings and ninepence, or 22 shillings and ninepence per week. In Yorkshire women, eighteen years of age, receive 18 shillings, plus 43 per cent minimum. I have not figured out the exact amount that would be according to the present rate of exchange, but I know that in Great Britain the textile industry is highly organized so far as the employees are concerned and that they work a maximum of 48 hours per week.

In Canada what did I find? I wrote to the minimum wage board of the province of Quebec and in reply I received this document which I have in my hand, showing the wages for female employees who come under the minimum wage board. For the first six months they receive $6 a week; for the second six months $7 a week; for the third six months $8 a week, and for the fourth six months $9 a week. The experienced worker receives the sum of $10 a week. It must be borne in mind that before an employee is entitled to the sum I have just mentioned as being the weekly maximum she is compelled to work a 55-hour week. It means that a girl starting to work in the textile industry in the province of Quebec receives 11 cents an hour, and to an industry in which such working conditions prevail we are asked to give 70 per cent protection. I do not think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Finance or any member of this house can claim that the wages which are being paid in this industry in the province of Quebec entitle the industry to the protection which parliament is being asked to give. If this item did not come before us in a treaty we would have the opportunity of submitting an amendment, but unfortunately it is hardly possible for us to do that in the form in which it appears before us. I remember very well that the present Prime Minister some three years ago, when the Dunning budget was under consideration, and we were protesting against the protection being given the steel industry, particularly Besco, drafted an amendment, which was moved either by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or myself, and which was more or less accepted in principle by all sides of the house, that where an industry was not paying its employees a decent standard of wages and providing reasonable working conditions it was not entitled to protection. I think that that resolution applies so far as the textile industry in this dominion is concerned because no one will claim that six or seven or eight or nine dollars a week is a decent living wage in the province of Quebec or any other part of this dominion.

When the minister speaks of the handicaps on the Canadian industry, I would point out that there are also certain handicaps on manufacturers abroad, particularly the British manufacturer. When he has to buy his raw material in the markets of the world he is compelled to buy with a depreciated rate of exchange. That is a handicap to him because when his exchange is depreciated and he buys raw cotton in the American market, our exchange being much higher than that of the exchange on the English pound, the Canadian manufacturer has that great advantage over the British manufacturer. Then when he exports goods to the Dominion of Canada he has to pay a double penalty on account of depreciated currency. I hardly think that is doing right in so far as Great Britain is concerned. In fact, I believe that by the tariffs we are putting up against Great Britain Canada is treating her worse than a great many foreign countries concerning which we have heard so much in this committee.

Then, there is a further aspect to this problem. This afternoon when discussing the item of cream separators the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated quite properly it was only logical that if we were selling goods to Great Britain we should buy goods in return. I agree that is logical. We are now dealing with a commodity Great Britain could export to this country, and we are not only putting a protective tariff against her but one which, in its essence, is exclusive. In the last couple of days I observed in one of the local papers an item describing a meeting held in Manchester by the Manchester chamber of commerce. For the information of hon. members I shall read part of the article:

> The Manchester chamber believes reductions in the Canadian tariff already announced are unlikely to enable British cotton, artificial silk and textile exporters appreciably to increase their trade. The chamber emphasizes the importance of the earliest possible removal of the exchange rates, dumping duty and other additional taxes, and to replace them all by one single straightforward tariff for each class of goods.

I do not intend unduly to labour that point, but I come to the next point in the dispatch, which is as follows:

> The chamber also hopes a new Anglo-Russian trade agreement will soon replace that which will expire shortly.

What does that mean? It means that this despatch from the Manchester chamber of commerce indicates that, first of all, they complain of the fact that they are unable to do business with Canada on account of the various obstacles placed in their way. Further it indicates that in view of the obstacles placed before them by the government of the day, they are going to look for new markets in order to find a point of export for their goods. Where do they look for new markets? They turn to Russia, which has been mentioned so often in this house, a country with which it has been said we ought not to do business. Part of our trade treaty deals with the Russian situation, yet as a result of our own action in Canada, we are practically compelling Great Britain by a series of tariffs to find markets in Russia.

For the moment I am more interested in labour cost in Great Britain and Canada, in connection with which the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for the time being at least, has not been able to give us very definite information. I venture to say however from information I have been able to secure—whether it is right or wrong I cannot say—that the actual labour content of goods produced in Canada is less than in Great Britain. That may be due to a number of causes, chief of which may be the more up-to-date equipment to be found in Canada. I know that in the past the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance have been very fair, so far as wages are concerned. They have done their bit, and on many occasions have spoken in favour of fair wages and fair working hours for employees and labourers. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this question: If unsatisfactory conditions prevail in the textile industry will the government of which he is a member take the same steps they attempted in regard to Besco, and force textile industries to give to the young girls and other employees in their charge at least an eight hour day and a minimum wage?

Mr. STEVENS: At this point I believe I would do well to take advantage of the somewhat general discussion which has developed to make one or two observations in regard to this matter. In so doing I shall try to avoid duplication as we proceed with other items in connection with which the same observations would apply.

The hon. member has been quite reasonable, and with practically all he has said I have little fault to find. There is this to say however, and this statement applies to the textile list, that we were confronted with a very serious condition and problem. Speaking to other items I have intimated that the world condition has been very chaotic in the last few years. Many industries have become bankrupt. If one wants evidence of that he has but to recall what the Prime Minister said a few days ago. I remember his words clearly because I noted the circumstances at the same time he did. He told of an instance where one concern in Great Britain engaged in the textile industry had applied to the courts for a reduction of £3,000,000 in its capital structure. In other words, during the last few years, due to abnormal economic conditions that and many other concerns had actually imperilled their capital. The firm in question lost £3,000,000 in capital. That is, there was a loss in operation calling for that reduction. After giving careful consideration to the matter the court reduced it. How does that affect us? It means that during the preceding year or two an industry that had impaired its capital to the extent of £3,000,000 must have been selling its products below cost of production. I think that is an inevitable deduction, and cannot be disputed.

Mr. MALCOLM: Possibly there was a loss in inventory.

Mr. STEVENS: There might have been, but generally speaking it can be taken for granted that there was a loss in operation of that amount.

Mr. YOUNG: Possibly they were not operating at all.

Mr. STEVENS: No doubt the hon. member can find many things which might have happened, but I am attempting to speak in broad general terms of economic law which enters into a matter of this kind.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think the minister will admit that the loss in industry during the past two or three years has not necessarily been an operating loss. Shrinkage in inventory values has caused terrific losses.

Mr. STEVENS: No doubt that is true. However it indicates a loss in operation, whether by inventory or in cost of manufacturing. As a corollary of that we know that goods are being offered on the world's market at figures with which the normal cost of production cannot compete. My hon. friend opposite who has had wide experience in business will agree with that. That is the position with which we in Canada were faced. There were certain industries established employing large numbers of persons; that condition applied to the cotton, woollen and textile industries generally. A very substantial number of persons were employed. The government could have taken another course; we could have stated, "Well, we will do nothing; we will let the tariff stand as it is. Let industry sink or swim under that protection." Had we done so there can be no doubt that the textile industry would have been wiped out in Canada, because other countries in their struggle to preserve industry were willing to sell goods, whether they were inventory or newly manufactured goods, at sacrifice prices. We, however, chose the other course; to impose sufficient tariff protection to preserve that industry through this emergency. I agree that the wisdom of that course is open to question, some may say we should have taken the other course. As a matter of fact we took that course.

Hon. gentlemen are quite right in asking what we propose to do. This is what we propose, and it is clearly set out in the agreement. In the first place we have reduced the duty by practically one cent a pound to Great Britain through this list of specific taxes. But we propose to give to the British competitor of the Canadian industry access to the tariff board in this country, he is at liberty there to make whatever case he can to show that there is unfair protection.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Why did not the government form the advisory tariff board before the conference, then they would have had full information.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I do not wish to be distracted into a discussion of that; my hon. friend may criticize that. I will quote the article:

Article 11. His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that during the currency of this agreement the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production, provided that in the application of such principle special consideration shall be given to the case of industries not fully established.

That reservation does not apply to the cotton industry now under discussion. Furthermore:

Article 13. His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that on the request of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom they will cause a review to be made by the tariff board as soon as practicable of the duties charged on any commodities specified in such request in accordance with the principles laid down in article 11 hereof and that after the receipt of the report of the tariff board thereon such report shall be laid before parliament and parliament shall be invited to vary wherever necessary the tariff on such commodities of United Kingdom origin in such manner as to give effect to such principles.

I do not know of any process that could be fairer than that. We feel that the duties on textiles in this country are high, there is no disputing that—

Mr. SANDERSON: A frank admission!

Mr. STEVENS: But we were confronted with a condition, and had to make a choice, and during this period of depression we felt it was not justifiable to adopt a course which would inevitably close a large number of these plants and throw more people out of work. I submit that having in mind this emergency condition of the last two years, it was better to keep these plants going, and consider these broad economic questions later. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that that was the better course.

Now my hon. friend asks me in regard to wages. I have already intimated, and I cannot emphasize this point too much, because I happen to have been in touch with the British authorities who discussed and considered the matter, that it is not possible to make a fair comparison of wages between Great Britain and Canada. My hon. friend knows, for instance, that in the Canadian mills an operative will have charge of a larger number of looms than in the old country. So that while the nomenclature of the task may be the same, in Canada the actual number of looms tended by one operator may be larger, and it may be argued that that justifies the differentiation in wages. But the point intervenes there that in Canada there is more extensive mechanization, and greater limitation of manual labour. In other words in Great Britain they have limited mechanization to a certain degree as compared with Canada. So the comparison is difficult. Another point to keep in mind is one that my hon. friend himself referred to. In Great Britain the cotton industry is perhaps one of the most highly organized from a labour standpoint. Union requirements over there prescribe a limitation of the number of looms and of the degree to which mechanization may go. In Canada there is a different situation.

My hon. friend asks me also: Do I think it is fair that the rate of wages which he quoted should be paid in Canada? I would not wish to subscribe to the statement that it is fair, I have not given the matter specific study. I think it ought to be very carefully studied, and I believe it will be. But after all that is a matter which comes under provincial jurisdiction, because the minimum wage law is a provincial law. For the sake of the discussion here I am assuming that the provincial authorities in Quebec have examined this matter and are satisfied. I would suggest to my hon. friend that it is scarcely fair to quote the wages paid to what might be called apprentices. He will agree with me that a person tending a machine will become much more nimble after six or twelve or eighteen months than in the first few months.

Mr. HEAPS: I quoted them all.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but I am pointing out that for purposes of comparison the first six months or so ought not to be taken into consideration. But as regards the fairness of the wages paid under the Minimum Wage Act in the province of Quebec, I would not wish to offer an opinion now. I say to my hon. friend, that can well be disclosed by those interested in the labour question when the matter comes before the tariff board. I am authorized to say this, that it is the intention of the Dominion government that as soon as the tariff board is organized, or as soon thereafter as possible, this whole question shall be reviewed by that board. We know it is complex, we know it is difficult, we know that there are a great many interests in Canada concerned,—when I say that I am thinking more of employees than of the textile industry from an investment standpoint, because I frankly confess that I am not interested in that in any way. I am interested, however, in the existence or perpetuation of the industry in this country, if possible. I do not wish to see towns in Quebec and Ontario, the two provinces chiefly affected,—there are some in the maritimes and I think possibly some in a small way on the Pacific coast—I do not wish to see these towns and villages or the industries that sustain them injured unnecessarily. I want to make that clear. I think most of the employees in them are happy as long as they can secure employment, and let us bear this in mind that in this industry there is a better rate of employment today, as far as continuity is concerned, than in any other class of industry.

Mr. HEAPS: What hours are they working at present?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot tell.

Mr. HEAPS: More than three or four days a week?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes, I know that in many of these industries they are working full time, and some of them are working twenty-four hours a day. Of that we can get further particulars. But I think my hon. friend can take it that in this textile industry, generally speaking, the extent of employment is greater than in any other class of industry. In itself that is a good thing in these days, and the question of whether they could carry on as at present or whether they should be laid bare to competition is one which we submit will be subjected to the scrutiny of the tariff board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Can my hon. friend state how many are employed in the whole textile industry?

Mr. STEVENS: I have the figures for the cotton textile industry. The number of employees was 18,500, and the salaries and wages paid total $14,500,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Have you the salaries and wages separate?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I have not. I will give the figures I have here:

|---|---|
| Number of plants | 77 |
| Capital invested | $87,000,000 |
| Number of employees | 18,500 |
| Salaries and wages | $14,500,000 |
| Value of product | $58,000,000 |

Those figures have reference to the cotton textile industry. I think perhaps we can get the figures for the other industries if they are required, but there is no question that in the textile industry generally there is a very excellent standard of employment so far as continuity of work is concerned.

Mr. REID: But is the minister aware that in 1919 it was sworn before a parliamentary committee that this industry made a profit of 291 per cent, and that $5,000,000 worth of stock was purchased for only $500,000?

Mr. STEVENS: I happened to be the chairman of the committee that brought out those figures. There was only one concern, in the province of Quebec—for the moment the name has escaped me—that happened to make that profit, and I will tell my hon. friend just how it happened. This industry, like many others in Canada, had fixed its cost of yardage by past experience. As they ran a certain pattern of cloth for a few days on a given loom and then changed to another pattern—because they could not run continuously on one pattern for this market—naturally the cost was fairly high. Then they turned to the production of khaki cloth, and they ran twenty-four hours a day throughout the year on that cloth. The result was that at the end of the year they found themselves with an extraordinary profit. I may say that a very substantial portion of that profit was taken away by means of the excess profits tax, which was a war measure and which has been abolished. My hon. friend can rest assured that the textile industry today is not making anything in the nature of abnormal profits; some plants are getting by, and some are barely doing so. The one isolated case he has quoted is very clear in my recollection, and it should not and cannot be taken as an example of the whole industry.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to say just a word or two in reply to the statement of the minister. I think it is generally recognized that after what happened in 1929 the textile industry, together with other industries, was confronted with a very serious situation. There is no doubt that many countries were willing to dump their goods into Canada if they were given the opportunity to do so. But when we hear of other countries that are anxious to dump their goods I always feel that we must bear in mind that perhaps no other country in the world dumps more goods than Canada. I cannot forget that every bushel of wheat sent out of this country is shipped out far below the cost of production. I know it is very difficut to find a way to improve that situation, but nevertheless that is the fact.

The minister speaks of the serious situation of the textile industry in Great Britain and the losses it sustained over a period of years. He said the capital of one concern had to be written down by £3,000,000, but when this was done the workers in that industry did not suffer as a result. In this country, particularly in the province of Quebec, there are workers in that industry who never have had anything approaching decent working conditions or wages. The minister himself has submitted figures which completely corroborate everything I have said. He has told us that there were 18,500 people employed in the textile industry and that in salaries and wages they received $14,500,000. By dividing the number of employees into the wages and salaries received I find the average to be about $780 per annum. If we deduct from that the amount paid salaried officials who receive fairly high rates of pay, the committee can get some idea of the very low wages received by those employed in the industry. In 1928 a committee of the house was sitting before which certain information was given by those who were in a position to know. I think perhaps in those years the men and women were better employed than at present, but it was stated before the committee that the average wage of the girls employed in the industry was considerably less than $7 per week.

When I gave that figure with regard to the minimum wage of girls employed in the industry I was rather overstating the case, because those were the wages paid girls employed for the full week. It so happens that a large number of the people employed in the textile industry work on a piecework basis. Often they go down to the factory in the morning and find no work to do. They probably hang around outside for quite a long time, and then perhaps work a few hours a day. There are no wages for the time they do not work, so because of the intermittent character of the work in many factories the average wages of the girls, according to a sworn statement made before the committee, was between $6.50 and $7. I pointed out that the minimum rate was $6 per week, but that was for a fifty-five hour week. In Great Britain, as I have pointed out, the factories are highly organized, and I would suggest that the standard of living in the textile industry is somewhat higher than is the case in Canada.

Then I think my second contention was also proved by the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I claim that the labour cost per unit was lower in Canada than in Great Britain. My first question to the minister this afternoon was very simple; I asked him what factors were taken into consideration by the government in determining the amount of protection given by the government to a particular industry. Practically the only answer I received from the Minister of Trade and Commerce was the statement that labour costs were substantially the determining factor.

Mr. STEVENS: I thought I made that fairly clear. I said there were two main factors, the cost of raw material and the labour cost. Then I said there must be considered also the usual factors which enter into such operations, the usual overhead charges such as interest on capital, light, heat, power, taxes and so on.

Mr. HEAPS: All these things make it so much worse for this item. A few years ago I happened to be in the centre of the textile industry in Great Britain, and the cost there for light and power was considerably higher than the cost in Canada. Then there is the question of the cost of raw material. As I have already pointed out, that is also against production here; the British manufacturer is compelled to buy his raw material in the United States market at a depreciated rate of exchange and ship it to Great Britain. Our dollar is at a considerably higher value than the English pound and consequently our manufacturers have an advantage over the British manufacturers in the exchange situation. When the British manufacturer attempts to send his finished product into Canada he is taxed first of all on account of the American exchange and then he has to pay a dumping duty in Canada. In the third place, as the minister pointed out, in the matter of machinery they are far more up to date in Canada than in Great Britain. That is absolutely true and that is why labour costs in Canada are lower than they are in Great Britain. Therefore if the argument is that owing to raw materials and labour costs we are compelled to give the manufacturers 75 per cent or something approaching that figure in the form of protection, then I cannot see anything in that argument and I think he can afford to compete almost without protection at all. But my main contention is that in the wages paid to industry in Great Britain during this whole period there has been comparatively a slight reduction, whereas our girls are earning the most miserable pittance, one which in my opinion ought not to entitle industry to one iota of protection until such time as the employees are enabled to enjoy a reasonable standard of living.

We are told that this matter will go before the tariff board and that all these arguments can be presented there. We are told that the tariff board will hear representations and adjudicate upon them and pass judgment. I remember the arguments which a few years ago, when the tariff board was functioning in this country, were advanced by some gentlemen who now sit to the right of the Speaker. They said then that the tariff board was the mouthpiece of the government. I wonder how much different it will be when there is a new tariff board in operation. I had hoped to have a very definite declaration from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance that the protection given to this industry would operate much in the same way as it did in connection with Besco a few years ago, and that unless the employees were provided with a decent standard of living, decent wages and decent conditions to work under, then the protection would be wiped out, just as these hon. gentlemen said when they were in opposition. So far the minister has shelved the responsibility on the tariff board. He can do better than that if he wants to, because when he was sitting on the left of the Speaker he waxed eloquent on the $100 a month minimum. The wages in the textile industry, as worked out by some of my friends on the basis of all those employed, from Sir Charles Gordon downwards, amount to about $60 a month, and for the sake of giving these employees $60 a month we have to give a protection ranging as high as 100 per cent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My colleague has so fully covered the ground and has answered so well the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that very little remains to be said, but I should like to emphasize one or two points. The minister spoke about the reduction in capital structure in the textile companies of the old land. Everyone knows that there was overcapitalization there. In the old country, however, it seems that they were able to protect the standards of the workers to a certain extent; the employers had to take certain losses. In this country, on the other hand, we have in the textile firms a splendid example of watered stock—not merely overcapitalization but absolutely fictitious capitalization. Some hon. gentlemen may remember that a few years ago the history of some of these textile firms was placed on Hansard by the hon. member for Beauharnois, and so startling were those figures that when one newspaper in Montreal published them it was immediately intimidated with the threat that the advertising would be withdrawn if the publication of the figures were continued. That illustrates how strong these textile industries are and how ruthless—yes, and as the hon. member for Bow River suggests, how free the press is. The fact is the companies were afraid to face the publicity.

The minister may talk as much as he likes about normal costs, but normal costs in this connection imply costs under a condition of highly-inflated capitalization. That is what normal costs have meant in this country, and this it seems we must keep up.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. STEVENS: No statement of mine justifies that last observation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the implication is there.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The inference is that the costs in the past were what were termed normal costs and that now difficulties are being encountered. Special help must be given. I say that the normal costs were those that were based on a capital structure that cannot be justified under any proper conception of ethics. We are starting with that false basis and attempting to keep to that line at whatever cost. Our contention has been that the protection of industry is no guarantee whatever of the protection of workers engaged in that industry. Go to the United States and you will find that the most highly protected industries there, the textile industries, have been precisely the industries that over a long period of years paid the lowest wages.

The minister makes a special plea for the textile industry on the ground that we are in the midst of an emergency. But similar action has been taken in Canada almost since confederation and is continued now in the present depression. One would imagine however that since there is a depression, if industry is to be protected the workers in industry should also be protected. I read to the house a little earlier in the session advertisements which were being put out by the city of Montreal showing that Montreal was an excellent labour market—why? Simply because they had a rather subservient native labour group and secondly because they had a very heavy influx of poor immigrants eager to obtain jobs however low the wages might be. That advertisement was put out by the city of Montreal. The same kind of advertisement was published by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company. Here we have a population who have not yet been able to obtain protection through trade unions, and who are unable to obtain protection at the hands of this house.

It does seem to me that even though we are told that the terms of the treaty cannot be altered, we have a certain responsibility to our own people in Canada. I quite admit that it is difficult to make a fair comparison between conditions in this country and in Great Britain, but I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that in the old country they have unemployment insurance, they have a much better old age pension act, they have sickness insurance and provision for a great many social amenities about which we know nothing whatever in this country. In the province of Quebec, where many of the textile factories are located, they have not yet even adopted many of the schemes that have been adopted in other provinces of the dominion. So there is another side to this matter of comparison.

The minister takes the position which has been taken by the treasury benches ever since I became a member of this house, he shelters himself behind the British North America Act and says: we cannot do anything because some of these matters come under provincial jurisdiction. I do not think that that is a fair position to take. We have it entirely in our power when granting protection to stipulate the conditions under which such protection will be given. There is not the slightest doubt about that, and that argument has never been controverted. It is beside the mark to say that this matter must be attended to by the minimum wage board of the province of Quebec. We are granting special privileges and I contend that it is our absolute right under the British North America Act to state the conditions under which those privileges shall be granted. We must remember that the general public is being taxed very heavily in order to protect these industries and the general public ought to insist that there should be at least some protection for the workers. We come back to the point made by my colleague and which I think the minister has skilfully evaded, that protection for industry should be made contingent upon a decent standard of living for the people engaged therein.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, this item brings up the whole matter of protection. I remember the special session of 1930 when the right hon. the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) said: we will give protection to the industries in order that they may keep their men at work—a promise which was made not only to this house but to the country as well. The Prime Minister made that statement from his seat in which we so seldom see him. What is protection? We hear about the Prime Minister protecting everyone, protecting those who are old and those who are young, protecting the men and protecting the women, protecting the rich and protecting the poor, protecting those who have beards and those who are clean shaven. He protects everyone, but what happens finally? We begin to realize that what he has said may have sounded very nice but there is nothing behind it. Now is the time to think, now is the time to place the real facts before the committee in order that we may see the situation as it is.

I should like to offer my sincere sympathy to the colleagues of the Prime Minister whose remarks are never listened to. Hon. members opposite have not the courage to say to the Prime Minister what I would say were I in their place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: Instead of speaking to me, why do they not speak to him? Surely they have his ear; surely they can tell him that the people should be protected. Protected against what? Protected against the big interests that exploit the people more than they have ever been exploited before. I know some manufacturers, I have spoken to them about protection and asked them why they insist upon having protection. The answer has always been: We do not need it but we try to get as much as we can. That is what is behind the petitions they always present to the government. They should let the government alone in order that the Prime Minister and his colleagues may have time to think not only of those who control these special interests but of their partners, the workingmen. Without the workingmen the manufacturer can do nothing.

When we advocate the rights of the people, what are we told? We are told that the Liberal party is spreading communism throughout the country. I say to the Prime Minister through Hansard, because we do not see enough of him in the chamber, that he himself is offering the strongest excuse for communism. He forgets that the working classes of this country must be protected by the government of which he is the leader. I am sorry to have to speak in this manner but I am not a rubber stamp; I feel it my duty to express freely the sentiments of the electors who have honoured me with their confidence. I speak here as a free man to a man who is free to do that which is best for the interests of this country but who is not free to follow a stupid policy which will bring the country to ruin.

The Prime Minister stated that high tariffs would increase employment, but there would be just as many people employed in this country as there were when he took office. What happened? Yesterday the Minister of Labour stated that 800,000 people out of our total population of 10,000,000 were receiving relief from this government. This is only one phase of the situation. Not only are 800,000 unemployed in distress during these dire times, but there are those who work for mere pittances. I might mention the railway employees who though still on the pay-roll are receiving only a small fraction of their former decent salary. Many of these men only have one period of work every three months.

What about Dominion Textiles, that mushroom industry? Other industries, such as the pulpwood industry, obtain their materials in this country, but it is an entirely different matter with the Dominion Textiles. They import their cotton from outside and they now enjoy very considerable protection. Is this company now employing as many people as they promised the Prime Minister in 1930 they would employ? It is very important that we should have this information in order to find out whether or not the management of this concern is true to its word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think you were a member of the house when I advocated the payment of reasonable wages in the province of Quebec, in which move I had the support of many hon. members. I was not asking for high wages—I am an advocate of moderation—all I wanted was a reasonable wage for the workingman in order that he might live in some comfort, in order that he might have sufficient money to provide food for himself and his family, in order that he might clothe himself and his family and be able to send his children to school. The managers and board of directors of the Dominion Textile Company have no heart. They want their employees to work for them for nothing. They treat them like slaves, and is there any guarantee now that they will be treated any better in the future? Is there any guarantee, in spite of the promises which have been given to the leader of the government in writing, that those who are unemployed will be given work? Will they fulfil their promises? Will they keep on their pay-rolls the men they now have and the men who were struck off and who need work?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will they?

Mr. POULIOT: That is the question.

Mr. ROBINSON: Did your Prime Minister keep the promises he made in 1919 to the people?

Mr. POULIOT: In 1919 the Tories were in power and Sir Robert Borden was the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROBINSON: Well, your leader, then?

Mr. POULIOT: I respect my leader because he never promises anything that he cannot do, and he also realizes that he is human and never thinks that he is superhuman or a demigod. That is the difference between the two leaders in this house.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

There is another aspect of this question. This country, you and I, Mr. Chairman, and everyone in this house, and everyone outside of it, are being asked to protect this mushroom industry. These new items mean that the Dominion Textile Company will get more profit from the tariff, but no more employees will be put on the pay-roll. My hon. friend from Bow River knows that, and I know it, because I know the directors of that concern. In the end, because protection must be afforded to the greater number, parliament will have to vote huge sums of money to give direct relief to these people who are out of work. Instead of the Dominion Textile Company doing its duty, living up to the solemn promise that it made to the leader of the government, we the members of the House of Commons will be asked to vote sums by way of direct relief to people who suffer because their employers have not kept their word. It is a serious matter, and the money that we shall be asked to vote is the people's money.

Another thing that will result from this preference is that the Dominion Textile Company will charge more for their goods, in violation of their undertaking not to charge more if the tariff was raised. You heard that promise, Mr. Chairman, because you were in the house at the time, that if the tariff was raised prices would not be increased. But the Dominion Textile Company will charge higher prices, and you and I when we buy their goods in any store will have to pay more, but the employee will not get any more wages. The directors will put additional profits in their pockets. That is the whole story.

Mr. SPOTTON: All right, sit down, then.

Mr. POULIOT: I will surely not sit down, because it is a case where the teacher is now my pupil, and the teacher has a lot to learn. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to speak in that way to a gentleman who is a little older than I am.

Mr. SPOTTON: The hon. gentleman said that that was the whole story, and I simply suggested that if that was so he might sit down.

Mr. POULIOT: It is the whole story. It is an exposition of the facts. But now let me draw my conclusions. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is this country ready to pay more for clothing just in order to give more money to Sir Charles Gordon and the directors who surround him in the Dominion Textile Company? I know that Sir Charles Gordon was the chairman of the committee in charge of raising the last loan. He was supposed to do very well, but the loan took a long time to be subscribed. Of course, I know that that was not his fault. As president of the Dominion Textile Company he enjoys a preference greater than is granted to anyone else by this government. So much is that the case that in January last the Montreal Gazette published a supplement giving the views of all the prominent industrialists in this country, and while there was no interview from Sir Charles Gordon, there was one from another Mr. Gordon, who is one of the officers of the Dominion Textile Company, and amongst all the contributors to that supplement Mr. Gordon was the only one who said that protection during the last year had helped his industry a lot. It has helped him personally, Mr. Chairman, but it did not help his industry at all.

It is a very sad state of affairs, Mr. Chairman. I do not like to be disagreeable to anyone; I do not like to say unpleasant things, but if ever there was a time when we should come down to cold, concrete facts it is right now, and not after the adjournment. Are we going to let those employees suffer until after Christmas, and during those days when we celebrate the birth of the Lord who said: Peace on earth, goodwill towards men? There is a French proverb, of which I do not know the English translation, which runs: "Ventre affamé n'a pas d'oreilles." I will attempt to translate it for the benefit of my hon. friend who interrupted me a moment ago: "When one is hungry one listens to nothing." I am sure that my hon. friend could not have been fasting because he was listening to me.

I am a supporter of social order and of moderation more than the Prime Minister is and just as much as any other member of this house. If I use plain language it is because it is essential in view of the situation confronting us. The farmers have nothing, no money at all. How can they buy goods if, on account of the protection, those goods become dearer? What will happen to all those people who for a time were working for the Dominion Textile Company but who are now unemployed? What will happen to them? They are people of sane minds who are ready to abide by our laws. What do we expect from them, if they have not enough to eat, if they cannot procure food for their families or clothe them? What will the government do about it? The Prime Minister said on one occasion: "I will end unemployment," but he meant that he would aid it with the help of the provinces and municipalities. When we vote even one cent for unemployment we have to know the reason why, and as you know, Mr. Chairman, we should be in a much happier position if we were not obliged to do so. But the circumstances compel us to vote relief moneys. We have to do something to relieve the unemployment; we have to see to it that those who are engaged in industry, those who carry on big business in Canada have the social spirit, and that they do not forget the word of the Lord: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Their neighbours are the men who work for them, the labourers who have contributed to the fortunes and wealth of those controlling the business. Had it not been for the men and women working for the Dominion Textile Company those now at the head of that industry would not be as prosperous as they are today.

The hon. members from Winnipeg who have preceded me have indicated that there is plenty of watered stock in the textile industry. Where has it gone? That is one of the mysteries which future history will disclose.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Possibly part of it went down the Beauharnois canal.

Mr. POULIOT: Then it is drowned.

Mr. QUINN: Do not talk about Beauharnois.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends should not speak about Beauharnois when they know very well that members in their party received moneys from Beauharnois to carry on their election campaigns. In these times those who are prosperous should come to the aid of the needy; the richer they are the greater sacrifices they should make. If the Dominion Textile Company have enjoyed protection I suggest at this time the profits should be reasonably curtailed. What the company has it has taken from the backs of the people; the other fellows have had to pay for it. In conclusion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank hon. members opposite for their very careful attention. It is time to see to it that industries are rationalized; it is time that everyone had his just dues. When the country owes nothing to certain people it should pay nothing. The people who must now be assisted are those who have suffered because the promises of one or several concerns have not been kept. We are accused by the Prime Minister of having been influenced by the passions of people who preach socialism. Well, if socialism is the love of one's neighbour, let me say that I am a socialist. Again, if socialism consists of devotion to the poor, the weak and the hungry, I am a socialist. I do not believe that is socialism in the sense usually condemned by some leaders of the state. We have had enough of words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: We must deal with plain facts, but unfortunately when I state that we must deal with real facts I have to use words. What is humbug?

Mr. CHAPLIN: We are witnessing an example of it right now.

Mr. POULIOT: Humbug is an expression which had been covered by the dust of centuries, but was unearthed in London about two years ago. Since then it has travelled a lot. I should rather describe than define the term. Humbug consists of those statements, which, I believe I am in order to state, are not according to facts, and which are made in order to create false hopes. Mr. Chairman, have I spoken forty minutes?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, forty minutes.

Mr. QUINN: Tell us more about humbug.

Mr. POULIOT: If you insist that I abide by the rules of committee, I shall be content, because I am not a socialist in the bad sense of the term.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): I was going to suggest the hon. member ought to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. RHODES: I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata. He is always entertaining and sometimes informative.

Mr. QUINN: Sometimes.

Mr. RHODES: I have gathered that he does not altogether like the Dominion Textile Company and I accept his statement that he is a socialist.

Mr. POULIOT: In the good sense of the term.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I am prepared to place my hon. friend on the top layer of socialism. I must say however that he has failed to enlighten me as to why he takes such grave objection to the item now before the committee. Inasmuch as he was most vehement in his utterances I take it he must have some objection. As a matter of fact the item we are discussing does not increase duties; on the contrary it removes entirely the duties under the British preference upon a wide range of commodities which formerly bore duties of 17½ per cent plus 3 cents per pound, 20 per cent plus 3 cents per pound and 22½ per cent plus 3 cents per pound. I fail to understand why my hon. friend should object to our placing these items on the free list, especially after the reference he has made to the Dominion Textile Company. It would be extremely interesting to me, and I am sure enlightening to the committee and the country, if he would show how these reductions are going to help the Dominion Textile Company, increasing as they do the competition that it will have to meet from a highly specialized industry in the mother country.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to thank the minister for his explanation. I am glad to see that the government is on the way to conversion!

Mr. HEENAN: Did I understand that one of the ministers in his reply stated that the government or parliament had not the right to govern wage conditions through the tariff?

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. gentleman was in his seat he would know what has been said. I do not think it is incumbent upon us to repeat it.

Mr. HEENAN: That is true; unfortunately I was not in my seat at the time. But I have been informed that one of the ministers stated that parliament had not jurisdiction to adjust wages under tariff items.

Mr. STEVENS: No such statement was made.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, words to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS: No, nor words to that effect.

Mr. HEENAN: Then in case there is any mistake I want to remind the ministers that they have the right. I quote no less an authority than the present Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I was referring to the three sitting in the front row.

Referring to the then ministers.

Not a minister has offered an explanation, not a minister has offered any sympathy or shown any interest in this matter. I am not sufficiently an expert to say that items 377a, 377b and 377c cover the ambit of this particular industry, but I imagine that they would. In connection with these items we have an opportunity of saying to this industry: "Yes, the parliament of Canada is prepared to give you protection sufficient to enable you profitably to produce these articles"—the minister could do that just as easily as sitting there lolling in his seat—but before such tariff will apply you will satisfy the governor in council that the conditions of labour, the hours of labour and the wages paid are such as will afford a decent living! That is what the government could do; that is what parliament could do, and I say right now that that is what parliament should do before it goes a step further.

So that there may be no mistake I remind the minister that that is what he said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister a little while ago suggested that the very high profits of the textile companies had been made in connection with the war, and were exceptional.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt? I do not wish the discussion to go off at an angle. I said that the particular figures quoted by the hon. member were figures with which I happened to be familiar, because I was chairman of the committee that investigated. I referred to that particular instance; I did not refer to the matter generally at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad of that, because certainly the impression given was that these very high figures were exceptional and not general. In fact the minister apparently had for the moment forgotten even the name of this company.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember it now; I had forgotten it. It was Paton's.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was such a trivial thing that the minister had even forgotten the name of the company.

Mr. STEVENS: It was thirteen years ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What we are trying to impress upon the committee is that these high profits that have been referred to are not so exceptional, but have been common; and that together with the high profits there have been very low wages. I referred a little while ago to certain statements put upon Hansard on June 15, 1931, by the member for Beauharnois. May I quote one or two very briefly. From 1924 up to this date the company referred to, the Dominion Textile Company, has paid without interruption dividends which are equivalent to 150 per cent on the initial investment of $500,000, and 15 per cent on the second subscription of $2,500,000 made in 1922. Then turning to another company, I read one statement in regard to Montreal Cottons. That company for the financial year ending December 31, 1929, the last for which I have figures, shows that its common stock, for which not a cent was paid, has a value in the books of the company of $3,000,000, and that after having paid dividends at the rate of 6 per cent on this watered stock it still has a surplus in accumulated profits not distributed of $633,000.

I happen to have in my desk the Financial Post of June 18, 1931, in which are given ten years' earnings of the Dominion Textile Company, which I desire to place on Hansard:

| Year | Earnings | Dividends | Surplus |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1920. . . . | $1,845,375 | $ 535,842 | $4,053,044 |
| 1921. . . . | 1,931,010 | 635,842 | 4,636,591 |
| 1922. . . . | 1,907,237 | 735,842 | 5,007,700 |
| 1924. . . . | 1,767,529 | 1,035,842 | 5,390,003 |
| 1925. . . . | 1,948,668 | 1,035,842 | 5,665,017 |
| 1926. . . . | 1,905,309 | 1,260,842 | 5,999,164 |
| 1927. . . . | 2,101,896 | 1,260,842 | 6,529,987 |
| 1928. . . . | 1,903,832 | 1,260,842 | 6,862,657 |
| 1929. . . . | 1,976,668 | 1,316,692 | 7,211,415 |
| 1930. . . . | 2,079,931 | 1,485,646 | 7,498,035 |

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

---

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the committee took recess, Mr. Chairman, I was giving the earnings of the Dominion Textile Company over a period of years. Possibly it might be just as well to bring that statement up to date. According to the Financial Review of 1932 I find these figures to be:

| | 1931 | 1932 |
|---|---|---|
| Manufacturing profit.. .. | $1,085,251 | $1,071,245 |
| Dividends: Preferred. .. | 135,842 | 135,842 |
| Dividends: Common.. .. | 1,350,000 | 1,350,000 |
| Total surplus.. .. .. .. | 7,515,552 | 7,363,266 |

It will be seen that there was only a slight drop in the total surplus in 1932. I do not intend to detain the committee by giving the figures with regard to the other textile companies, but they tell a very similar story.

With regard to wages, the last figures we have are those contained in the Canada Year Book for 1932. If there has been any change since the publication of this volume it has been in the direction of a lowering of wages, owing of course to the cut in wages and to the fact that most of the employees are working on part time. At page 359 of the year book are given the average earnings in a number of leading industries. In connection with cottons, the male employees numbered 11,369 while the females numbered 8,157, a total of 19,526. In 1929 the average wage was only $771, while the average days of full and part time operation numbered 258. I think the contrast between the profits secured by this company and the wages paid in the textile industry amply demonstrate the point we are trying to make, namely that the protection of the industry does not involve the protection of the workers employed by it.

Without prolonging the discussion, there are two or three questions I should like to ask. Why should not surplus, accumulated during years of prosperity, be drawn upon in a time of depression? Why should this particular group of industries be given such special privileges that they can maintain their surplus almost untouched? I ask why there should be a dole given those not in poverty? In the care of individuals who are in the bread line the utmost care is taken to see that they are not given relief unless they actually are in necessitous circumstances, but in this case the textile industries that have been fat and flourishing throughout these past years, and that are still in a very fair condition, paying dividends and retaining their surpluses, are given this tremendous dole amounting to millions of dollars. We have never had explained in this house the reason why arrangements of this kind should be made. Why, I ask, should we give preferential treatment to the textile industries? There are many other lines of business that are practically bankrupt, some of them absolutely so. We have been trying to point out from this corner of the house that the great wheat industry is in a very bad way in the west; in fact the agricultural industry all over Canada is in a bad way, with many farms mortgaged and some of them threatened with foreclosure. Apparently there is no effort on the part of the government to make any provision that will secure the savings of the farmers, yet when we come to the textile industries we are told that they must be kept in operation no matter what the cost.

I know it is useless to argue the point; all we can do is protest against this preferential treatment that is accorded one particular class of industry in Canada.

Mr. COOTE: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister in regard to this item. This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the textile manufacturers in Great Britain would have the power to appeal to the tariff board to reduce these tariff rates if they were found excessive. I should like to ask the minister if the tariff board are to have the power to fix tariff rates, or whether that will be done by the government on a report from the tariff board.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend knows the tariff act; I can get it and read it to him if necessary. He will recall, I think, that the matter of fixing the tariff is to remain the prerogative of parliament. There is no question of that. If my hon. friend will turn to what I read this afternoon—

Mr. COOTE: No; I am quite willing to take the word of the minister for that. I just wanted to be sure. Then there is another question I should like to put to the minister. If the difference in the wage costs of the two countries really is the basis for the tariff in Canada, why should we have a specific tariff of so much a pound on these different classes of goods? I am sure that does not work out at all in relation to wage costs. Some of the heavier fabrics bear twice the protection, under a specific tariff, that is given some of the lighter goods, so I cannot see that it has any relation to wage costs at all. I should like to know whether that was given any consideration when this tariff was fixed.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will recall that this afternoon I pointed out that the abnormal conditions with which industry generally was confronted when we came into office made necessary emergency treatment, and the treatment we gave this section of the tariff was the result of this emergent condition. I also pointed out to my hon. friend that we did not look upon this as a permanent condition of the tariff; we felt that it was necessary to take extraordinary methods to prevent the closing down of these important industries, and we achieved that end. As I pointed out this afternoon, we were confronted with two alternatives; one was to let the industry in Canada go, and the other was to take some steps that would adequately protect it against the dumping of goods from abroad, bankrupt stocks, distress sales and so on. That is the long and the short of it.

Mr. COOTE: Then it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we should suggest to the government that two years have elapsed since this emergent measure was taken, and that it is about time the tariff was put on a more equitable basis than exists at the present time. I understand that we are now guaranteeing the differential in regard to these specific tariffs. I do not see how we are going to get rid of them unless it is by agreement with the old land. I think that is a great oversight on the part of the government. It never should have been allowed at all.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not an oversight.

Mr. COOTE: Then it is a very bad piece of business so far as the people of this country are concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: These items now under consideration we are putting on the free list from Britain. That is absolute treatment, so far as that item goes.

Mr. HEAPS: What item has the minister in mind?

Mr. RHODES: 523a and 523b.

Mr. COOTE: The remarks I have made apply to a great many of the items we have been considering. Shortly before coming to Ottawa I was told by the retail merchants that the price of overalls had been advanced by the wholesalers, the manufacturers of overalls claiming that the cost of their material which they must obtain from the textile companies of Canada having been advanced by those companies. The farmer never had so little to buy overalls with as he has had this fall, and I certainly think it is the duty of the government to see that the textile people of Canada are compelled, if necessary by the lowering of the tariff, to sell their goods cheaper than they are doing at the present time. Overalls are about the cheapest clothing the farmer can buy and in some instances the only clothing, and it is nothing but a shame to have these goods advanced in price at such a time as this.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the price of overalls today?

Mr. COOTE: It would take what we call a butcher hog to buy a pair of overalls in Alberta, and it takes six months to produce that hog, which requires a good deal of feed during that period. There is one other question I want to ask. Considering the amount of tariff protection that is to be allowed the Canadian textile manufacturers, based on the difference in the cost of production in the two countries, is it the intention of the government that allowance should be made in the returns of capital stock of the textile companies now operating in Canada, or will action be taken to squeeze out some of the water in these stocks, similar to the action which the minister told us was taken in England in regard to one of the large cotton concerns there. There is absolutely no doubt, with regard to some of our cotton companies, that a great deal of this stock was nothing but water, and considering the price I do not think that provision should be made for the payment of dividends on that watered stock.

Mr. STEVENS: The way my hon. friend puts the question makes it impossible to give an answer directly. Let me say to him very frankly—and I make this statement not only now, for I have said the same thing publicly and to manufacturers' gatherings—that I have absolutely no sympathy with the practice that has grown up on this continent, not only in Canada but elsewhere, and in the world at large as well, of unduly watering stock, using the term in a general sense. Speaking for myself, and from an actuarial standpoint or from the point of view of ordinary economics, I do not think that should seriously enter into consideration with respect to the justifiable returns of any company.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that that principle will be applied by the government?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is putting to me questions of a character that could not possibly be answered in the terms which the questions indicate he desires. I am stating my own opinions and I have no hesitancy in doing so. I was going to direct his attention to section 4 of the Tariff Board Act:

> In respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada the Board shall, at the request of the minister, make inquiry as to—
> (a) the price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption;
> (b) the cost of efficient production in Canada and elsewhere, and what increases or decreases in rates of duty are required to equalize differences in the cost of efficient production;
> (c) the cost, efficiency and conditions of labour, including health of employees, in Canada and elsewhere;
>
> (d) the prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;
> (e) all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada;
> (f) generally, all the conditions affecting production, manufacture, cost and price in Canada as compared with other countries;
> And so on.

In other words, the board will consider the well-recognized principles and factors that enter into the cost of production. So far as I am concerned, and I again make it clear that I am stating my own views, just as my hon. friends have done, I do not think that approval should be given to what is known as the watering of stock. I think that is a practice which is bound to bring disaster and should be frowned upon.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister had any protests in the past two years against the actions of the textile companies in this country?

Mr. STEVENS: Protests?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Have the secondary manufacturers, who are compelled to use the products of the textile companies, at any time protested to the government against the action of the textile companies, the arbitrary manner in which they deal with those secondary concerns?

Mr. STEVENS: So far as my department is concerned, I am not aware of any protests.

Mr. HEAPS: I ask that question because I have had protests made to me by certain manufacturers against the actions of the textile companies here and the way in which they were dealing with the secondary manufacturers. I know customers of the textile companies who have suffered in this regard. The moment the changes came about in these schedules, or rather when they were about to be introduced, the textile companies refused to supply Canadian manufacturers with their goods on invoice. They refused to quote prices until they knew what the tariff would be, and they knew it would go up. The result was that these manufacturers found themselves in difficulties; they did not know what to do. They had no way of supplying their own customers with textile products and in some instances they practically had to allow their factories to remain idle, because of the arbitrary action of those who received this tremendously high protection from the government. In other cases, I am safe in saying, manufacturers have been compelled to go out of business because it was impossible for these concerns to be supplied with the goods they wanted. The question of denim has been raised by my hon. friend from Macleod. In connection with this item, if the facts were gone into carefully by the minister he would find that the price has fluctuated almost in exactly the same degree as the tariff in this country. The result is that the second manufacturer has been placed in a most awkward position and his business has been reduced to very small proportions.

Mr. RHODES: I do not quite understand why this discussion has taken the turn it has with regard to this particular group of items. Let us deal with the commodity to which my hon. friend refers, denim. We have removed substantially the duties which have obained for years in connection with the British preferential tariff and have placed all these commodities on the free list, so that the condition of which my hon. friend complains cannot reasonably be expected to continue. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the hon. member's statement is correct, the secondary manufacturer has not now to depend wholly upon the Canadian market; he has open to him, the whole range of British goods. The condition of which the hon. member complains is, I think, likely to be entirely eradicated by reason of the provisions of this tariff.

Mr. HEAPS: I may add that any remarks I make on any particular item will not be repeated on others, so I will not waste time in that respect. Could the minister tell me how much denim was imported from the old country?

Mr. RHODES: That information is not immediately at hand. If it can be obtained before the committee rises, I shall give it to my hon. friend. Denim is now upon the free list from Great Britain.

Mr. DONNELLY: As I understand it, these items 523, 523a, and 523b have been taken out of the regular schedule. I do not suppose the minister is able to give us any figures showing how much of these goods have come into the country during the past year nor is he able to tell us the Canadian production. If one considers these items for a moment he will realize that there is a nigger in the woodpile. The finer varieties of cotton goods which are not made in Canada have been put upon the free list so that the rich man can obtain these goods from England without paying a duty. The poorer and coarser varieties of cotton goods out of which overalls, workmen's shirts and things of that kind are made, must pay a duty. The government is running true to form in helping to make the rich man richer and the poor man poorer.

Mr. YOUNG: The discussion on these three items has covered practically the entire cotton textile industry. This afternoon the minister stated that the total production in Canada was valued at $58,000,000. Great Britain went off the gold standard in September, 1931, and I was wondering if the minister could give us the total importation of cotton goods from that date.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be very difficult, because September is precisely in the middle of the fiscal year and all statistics are compiled for the fiscal year. The only way we could get that information would be to put a staff on to segregate these items month by month and invoice by invoice. It could not be obtained except with considerable difficulty.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand the minister's difficulty, but I should like to have this information in order to discover the effect upon our importations of the exchange adjustment duty, as the minister likes to call it, which was imposed after Great Britain went off the gold standard. It is very difficult to arrive at the exact rates, but as nearly as we can figure them, the total duty will average something over fifty per cent. The total production of Canada is valued at $58,000,000, and fifty per cent of this amount would represent the increase in price made by the domestic manufacturers. This will give some idea of what this industry is costing Canada. We are told that it pays $14,500,000 in wages. That is so much to the good; that is something to be put to the credit of the industry, but, on the other hand, we want to know what this industry is costing us. If they are charging fifty per cent more than the goods are worth, then I would say that this industry which pays $14,500,000 in wages is costing us between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 in increased prices.

It is about time that we began to take stock of our industries in order to find out which ones are profitable and which ones are not. Any industry which is not self-supporting and which cannot compete with the world, any industry which has to come to the government and ask permission to charge an extra price for its goods, is not worth while, even in these hard times. It is a parasite living upon the rest of the community. It is said that we must take care of these industries, that we must take care of the widows and orphans who have invested their money therein, but I am more concerned with the widows and orphans who have no money to invest in any industry, who have no clothing to wear and who cannot buy even the cheapest cotton goods. Last June the Minister of National Revenue told us how he would not let an importer bring in ten thousand dozen cheap ladies' dresses to be sold in Canada at three for a dollar, but today there are many of our people who cannot afford to pay even this low price.

I should like to deal for a moment with the quality of goods now being put upon the market. When you shut out foreign and British competition, and it has been shut out, and deliver the market into the hands of a Canadian monopoly, that monopoly is more than likely to deteriorate the quality of their goods as well as to increase the price. Canadian women have been accustomed to buying cheap house dresses which they wear for a day or two and then wash. I am told that the dress on the market today is so poorly dyed that the colours run as soon as they are put into water. I have been told by women that they actually have to soak such dresses in brine before they can wash them, and even then they have to be careful or the colours will run. I have been told also by women who have lived in the old country that they would never think of doing such a thing over there, they could wash the print dresses they bought and the colours would not run. Once the British goods are shut out—

Mr. STEVENS: British goods are not shut out; last year $1,500,000 worth of denim came in from Great Britain.

Mr. YOUNG: The duty on British goods has been made so high that it is difficult for them to come in. However, the very fact that they are still coming in in spite of the high duty is proof positive that our Canadian manufacturers are taking full advantage of the duty. If they were not taking full advantage of the duty to advance their prices, they would undersell the British product on the market and would be able to hold the market for themselves. One of the most prominent and perhaps one of the ablest protectionists in Canada has stated that when you put a protective duty upon an article, if the article does not stop coming into the country the duty should be taken off. That man is a manufacturer himself and he states that the manufacturers are taking full advantage of the situation. When the minister states that British goods are still coming in I accept that as proof that our manufacturers are taking advantage of this situation to raise prices.

Something has been said about the large profits of the companies engaged in this business. Personally I do not begrudge anyone any profit. I do not begrudge anyone anything he can make by his own effort, by his own energy, by his own enterprise and by his own application to business. But when anyone comes to the government and says: In order that we may make a profit we want you to pass legislation which will deliver the people of this country into our hands so that we can make them buy our products at our price without considering conditions prevailing throughout the world, then I say that the business of that company becomes a matter of concern to us. We in this house have a right to know what that company is doing, what it is paying out in wages, what this industry is costing this country, whether it is an industry worth maintaining or not.

For the past several days I have been endeavouring to get from the minister the actual applied rate on goods coming in from Great Britain, all factors considered. He hesitated a considerable time about giving it because he said it would be hard to estimate accurately, and he did not want to risk the reputation of the experts of the department by having them quote figures that might not be accurate. But yesterday the Minister of National Revenue came into the house with an estimate of the actual applied rate which was a little higher than I had figured. I had figured that on the particular item under discussion the total duty would be about 47 per cent, but the minister in his calculation made it over 50 per cent. I think he was a little over generous, that he made out a worse case for the government than was really necessary. What he did was to add all of the six per cent sales tax to the duty. That is not quite fair, because the six per cent sales tax applies to the domestic product as well. All I wanted to get was the handicap under which the imported article comes into the country, and consequently only that portion of the sales tax which is levied on the artificial value of the pound should be charged. The six per cent sales tax would be levied on the Canadian product, but on the imported article it would be levied on the $4.86 which is the value of the pound for duty purposes, while the real value is only $3.73. I say it would not be fair to charge all that against the duty. It is only fair to charge the six per cent on the difference between $3.73 and $4.86, or approximately 1½ per cent.

In view of the fact that the minister himself with his experts has failed, after two or three days work on it, to make an accurate estimate I might be pardoned for offering to the house a little assistance in arriving at what the actual applied rates will be. I have prepared a table—we might call it "A Key to the Canadian tariff"—which in one column gives the quoted rate under the British preference and in the next column what the actual applied rate will be. Here is the table:

[Mr. Young.]

| Quoted rate under the British preference Per cent | Actual applied rate Per cent |
|---|---|
| Free | 23 |
| 5 | 28·3 |
| 7½ | 31·8 |
| 10 | 35 |
| 12½ | 38·1 |
| 15 | 40·9 |
| 17½ | 44·1 |
| 20 | 47·2 |
| 22½ | 50 |
| 25 | 53·2 |
| 27½ | 56·2 |

I think that will help us considerably in finding out what the rate will be on items in the schedules so far as we have gone through them. But when we enter upon the textile schedules there is another factor to be taken into account, because, in addition to the ad valorem and all the other duties, there is a specific duty of so much a yard or so much a pound or so much a dozen. That is a further complication. When I see how this tariff is built up of all these varying factors I am reminded of a story of a number of college students who wished to play a joke on their professor. They took the body of one insect, the legs of another, the head of a third, and the wings of a fourth, glued them all together and submitted the result to the professor for identification. He looked at the insect, adjusted his glasses, frowned, and then, "Ah", he said, "I see it is a humbug". I think, Mr. Chairman, this tariff, made up as it is of ad valorem duties, specific duties, exchange dumping duties, the excise tax, the sales tax and as many other things as the commissioner of customs and his assistants can think of, might well be described as a humbug.

The minister said a moment ago that they had actually reduced the duty on the item we are discussing. Reduced the duty from what? From what it was when they were through with it last year. Take item 523b. Here are the rates as they have been and as they are to-day. In 1895 the preferential rate on this item was 23⅓ per cent; in 1907, 25 per cent; 1923, 18 per cent; September, 1930, after the short session, 22½ per cent, and an additional three cents a yard, which made it approximately 27 per cent. In the fall of 1931, after Great Britain had gone off the gold standard, the rate suddenly jumped to 61 per cent. And now, after the imperial conference, in order to encourage interimperial trade, we have lowered the duty from 61 to 58.5 per cent, and the minister tells us that he has lowered the duties from where we left them! We left them at 18 per cent. The government opposite have twice since then increased them, last year to 61 per cent. Now they have reduced that rate to 58 per cent, and the minister says it is done to encourage British trade!

As I said a moment ago, it is going to be very difficult to figure out what the actual rates will be on these textile items because there are the specific duties to be added to all the other duties, and the specific duty being so much per pound, per yard or per dozen, it is necessary to know either the weight of the article or how many ounces there are in the yard and the value in order to reduce the duties to a comparable basis. We did secure the services of an expert to figure out what the rate would be on this one item, 523b. He took a shipment of ten yards at 6¼ pence per yard, with the pound sterling at $3.66. The ad valorem rate would be 28 cents on that shipment; the weight duty would be 4.5 cents; the excise tax on the duty paid value, 5 cents; the dumping duty 21 cents; making a total of 58.5 cents on a one dollar shipment, or a duty of 58.5 per cent. Even in this calculation I think one factor has been overlooked, and that is that a larger portion of the six per cent sales tax has been charged than is actually justifiable, so we should have to add 1½ per cent to that, making the total duty 60 per cent. So that 60 per cent is the duty we are paying on this commodity. As I said before, the very fact that in spite of the tariff these goods are still coming in from Great Britain, is proof positive that our Canadian manufacturers are taking advantage of the situation to increase their price almost, if not completely, up to the level of the sixty per cent plus the regular price. Once more I ask: What is this industry giving in exchange for that? Sixty per cent added to the $58,000,000 worth of goods produced in Canada, and $14,000,000 paid in wages? Mr. Chairman, this industry is a luxury we cannot afford; we cannot afford to continue it.

I should like to draw attention to a statement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago. Speaking of the conference he said his aim was to shut out foreigners. His statement was, "That is the one thing we have done." The Prime Minister has told us that the only thing he has done since he came into power is to shut out the foreigner, but I say he has done more than that: he has shut out the Britisher as well. Since the imposition of this special dumping duty our importations from Great Britain have enormously declined. The following table will give a comparison of imports from the United Kingdom during the fiscal years 1931 and 1932:

|---|---|---|
| Fabrics, bleached | $ 654,943 | $563,139 |
| Fabrics, unbleached | 416,392 | 264,711 |
| Fabrics, printed | 1,215,888 | 979,121 |
| Socks and stockings (cotton) | 27,269 | 9,099 |
| Carpets and rugs | 561,403 | 144,918 |
| Overcoating | 538,064 | 196,782 |
| Tweeds | 1,071,060 | 505,817 |
| Socks and stockings (wool) | 1,272,817 | 597,354 |

Hon. members will note the effect of the increased dumping duty levied upon British goods. It has cut British trade to less than half its former quantity. The Prime Minister states the only thing he has done is to shut out the foreigner, but I submit I have proved his statement is not so because he has shut out Great Britain also. The Briton is our best customer for wheat, for dairy products, for hog products, for cattle products, for nickel, zinc, copper and lead. Despite that fact the Prime Minister has shut him out of our market, and then wonders why we cannot sell our wheat.

What is he doing for the Canadian textile industry? He is permitting them to charge us an extra sixty per cent for our cotton goods and permitting the woollen interests to charge an extra price for their goods. He is permitting every other manufacturing industry to add to the price we have to pay for goods they have to sell. He says he does that in order to keep people in employment and in order that manufacturers may make profits, because we must remember that out of every $8 profit they make they must give him $1 for the treasury. In my view that is a strange way of doing things, but that is what he is doing for industries.

When we ask him what he is going to do for the farmers, the people who are to buy the products of other industries with which he is so much concerned, what does he say? "I am afraid," he says, "I cannot do anything, because the money I might have used to help the farmers has been lost in the wheat market." It is a pretty serious situation, Mr. Chairman, when the basic industry of Canada, an industry suffering more than any other, day after day, is having new burdens placed upon its back in order to sustain these secondary interests which, after all, are not employing as many men now as they were when this government took office. When the present government started in to bring prosperity to Canada there were many more employed in our factories than there are to-day.

Mr. PRICE: In what industries?

Mr. YOUNG: In all industries.

Mr. PRICE: To what industries is the hon. member referring? He has stated that in industries throughout Canada many less men are being employed. I ask him to tell me of what companies he is speaking. A moment ago he made reference to the woollen industry. I say to him that under the administration he supported industry had gone practically out of business. In the constituency I have the honour to represent it had fallen down to such an extent there was an absolute minimum of employment, and the manufacturers themselves were operating at a loss. Yet he stands up in this committee and not only once but, from actual count, four hundred and forty-nine times he states conditions are worse than they were previously.

Mr. YOUNG: Four hundred and forty-nine and a half.

Mr. PRICE: The hon. member always has some complaint. Hon. members on this side are beginning to wonder if out in Weyburn they have a zoological garden from which something has escaped. Let me tell him that the woollen industry in Canada is going ahead today, paying wages and employing more men than it did previously. It is producing goods for which there is a ready market. The hon. member has always been in favour of foreign countries, and particularly the country to the south of us. He could see no harm in dumping goods into Canada from foreign countries. Under the late administration he could see no harm in bringing prison made goods from the United States, but today when the government is giving assistance to Canadian industries, putting them on their feet and employing thousands of Canadian citizens, he objects. He says, "Oh, there is too much charged here and too much there." He is absolutely and unalterably opposed to the employment in Canada of Canadian citizens.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Westmorland is curious to know if we have a zoological garden in Weyburn. No, we have not; but I can tell him that if he will come out to Weyburn we have an institution which will take care of him.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why did it not take care of you?

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Westmorland has referred to the wool industry, which he says is thriving.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members must confine their remarks to the item.

[Mr. Price.]

Mr. YOUNG: Very well, we shall deal with woollens when we come to them.

Mr. PRICE: This is a wonderful hold up.

Mr. YOUNG: As I said a moment ago, we had to learn the actual invoice price of goods coming from abroad so as to figure out the actual applied rate on a shipment of goods coming in under item 523b. When we had that information it figured out to sixty per cent. I want to know if the minister cannot find some way of giving us what the actual applied rate will be on all these items that carry an ad valorem and specific duty in addition to all the others.

Mr. STEVENS: Did my hon. friend ask a question? We have heard his story so often that I confess to him with apologies that I was not following him this time. Was it something in connection with the exchange adjustment duty?

Mr. YOUNG: I asked my hon. friend if he could not devise some way, as we go through these textile items on which there are both specific and ad valorem duties, of figuring what the actual rate will be.

Mr. STEVENS: I explained this afternoon, at more length than I thought it justifiable to take time for, the conditions under which these duties were imposed, the reasons for them, the fact that we have reduced them under the British preference,—all have been reduced, some substantially and some just one cent a pound—and that the British manufacturers would have access to the tariff board where the matter of the weight of these duties might be fully considered. If we sat and talked here from now until next spring it would not alter the situation. I can assure my hon. friend that the government is quite sincere in its proposals. I do not know what I can say more.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister was busy when I was talking and did not follow what I said. I said we had gone to an importer and secured an invoice of a shipment under 523b. From that and the figures here given we were able to figure out what the actual applied rate was on that shipment. The duty had been increased by my hon. friends opposite during the past two years to as high as 61 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I heard all that.

Mr. YOUNG: Now it has been reduced to 60 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: That is my hon. friend's deduction. I heard that.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, that is the deduction I make, and if I am wrong I wish the minister would set me right. If anyone on the other side of the house is capable of making a deduction more favourable to the government I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already pointed out time after time that my hon. friend includes in his rate of duty the exchange adjustment duty, which is an entirely different thing from the customs duty. He differs from us in that, and there is no use in our discussing it further. I have gone over that again and again.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend seems to have the idea that we should not include the exchange adjustment duty, but I have pointed out in the figures I quoted on importations from Great Britain that the addition of that exchange adjustment duty a year ago this fall had the effect in the first six months of cutting our importations from Great Britain in half. I think, therefore, we are justified in taking into consideration that exchange adjustment duty. It is having the effect of shutting these goods out of this country, of putting our own manufacturers in a position to raise their prices by that amount. He can call it anything he likes, but it is a duty, and it is collectable. He says: "We have made reductions." We want to know what reductions. In this case they say there has been a reduction of one per cent. When they came into office it was 18 to 20 per cent; they raised it to 61 per cent; now they reduce it to 60 per cent. If there is anything wrong in my figures there are a hundred men on the other side of the house who ought to be able to figure it out, and if not they have the experts of the department at their elbow to do it. All we ask, and all we have been asking all this week, is that they tell us what the actual rate is. They ask us to put certain rates into effect, and when we ask what the rates are, they cannot tell us.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know whether it is worth while, Mr. Chairman, but I direct your attention to the fact that the item my hon. friend is discussing just now was passed early this afternoon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the ministers have no better defence to make to their outrageous tariff we will have to accept the figures of the hon. member for Weyburn as correct. I am prepared to take them as correct, because there has been no defence made.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the special schedule was prepared there must have been some information in the hands of the department as to how much of these goods were made in Canada. Can the minister tell me how much of the goods coming under 523, 523a and 523b are made in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: We gave that all this afternoon.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523e. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton with cut pile, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 32½ per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523f. Woven fabrics of cotton, not coloured, when imported by manufacturers of typewriter ribbon for use exclusively in the manufacture of such ribbon in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general, tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—524. Seamless cotton duck in circular form, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in the manufacture of hose pipe: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: What are the importations?

Mr. RHODES: Last year the imports were $108,000, of which $105,000 came from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: And the other $3,000?

Mr. RHODES: It is not indicated.

Mr. YOUNG: Not much chance of Great Britain getting into that market.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—528. White cotton bobinet, plain, in the web: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: What is that?

Mr. RHODES: It is a knitted fabric, and the importation is comparatively limited. Last year the total imports amounted to only $6,000.

Mr. YOUNG: I would like to ask the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) if that is the kind of cotton they use in their organization.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Anyhow we have an organization that is not all mouth.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—529. Embroideries, lace, nets, nettings, bobinet, n.o.p., fringes and tassels, wholly of cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent and 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent and 3½ cents per pound; general tariff, 30 per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister any idea of the average or approximate value per pound of these goods? I might point out that in this item, as in many others, there are two kinds of duties, the ad valorem and the specific. If we are to make even an estimate as to the real percentage of duty it will be necessary to have some idea of the value per pound.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that an average figure would be practically valueless, since this covers a hundred different varieties of commodities.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what I rather suspected, and I wondered on what basis those specific duties were made up. There is an unfortunate anomaly here. Referring to items 523b and item 529, we see that each has the same specific duty of 2 cents, 3½ cents and 4 cents in the one case, and 2 cents, 3½ cents and 4 cents in the other. The first item covers woven fabrics of cotton, while the second item covers embroideries, lace, nets and so on. The first item covers ordinary cotton goods of various kinds, which I imagine would be a good deal heavier than the laces and embroideries which are included in the second item. I was merely going to point out the unfortunate anomaly which exists here; under a specific duty, which bears no relation to the value at all, that duty must always rest more heavily on the cheaper, commoner and coarser goods than on the lighter, finer materials. Up to a certain point it is always heavier on ordinary cloth, while the fact is that the heavier, coarser yarns are the less valuable. This establishes the thoroughly wrong principle that the cheaper and coarser goods carry a heavier rate of duty than the lighter and more valuable fabrics.

Mr. TOTZKE: I presume this is one of the items in connection with which the British preference has been reduced?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. TOTZKE: Will the minister tell us what the tariff was before 1930?

Mr. RHODES: It was 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent.

Mr. TOTZKE: There was no specific duty?

Mr. RHODES: No.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Mr. TOTZKE: So there is no real reduction?

Mr. RHODES: It is only a reduction from the specific rate existing at the moment. Of course my hon. friend realizes that this rate was put on for a specific purpose, to meet an emergent condition. It was never intended to remain permanently.

Mr. TOTZKE: It is not intended that the high tariff shall remain there?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. TOTZKE: But under this agreement it will remain for five years.

Mr. RHODES: No, we can reduce it.

Mr. TOTZKE: With the consent of Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; we can reduce, but we cannot increase.

Mr. TOTZKE: You can reduce any item under this agreement?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, where we reduce the preference rate. They would be very glad to have us do so.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—532. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured composed wholly of cotton, n.o.p.; fabrics wholly of cotton, coated or impregnated, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent; and British preferential tariff, 2 cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 3½ cents per pound: general tariff, 4 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537b. Linen thread for hand or machine sewing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. REID: Would the minister give me the figures on this item, and tell me where the thread comes from?

Mr. RHODES: The total imports last year amounted to $232,000, of which $224,000 came from the United Kingdom.

Mr. REID: How much was manufactured in Canada?

Mr. SPENCER: Was there any tariff against Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: The old rates were 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. It is now made free, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. REID: Could the minister tell me how much is manufactured in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Practically none.

Mr. YOUNG: Some days ago, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think, was speaking on the agreement in general, he said that we had delivered over the whole Canadian linen industry to the British manufacturer. I wonder if he could give us the statistics of the industry, what they produce, what establishments we have, the number of employees and so on.

Mr. STEVENS: We shall be very glad to give the information as we proceed with the following items.

Mr. REID: I think this is one of those items which will be of more benefit to the importer of the linen thread than it will be to the industry, because it is well known that the Coats firm of Paisley, of which I know a little, practically controls the thread world. So the market is practically given over to the Coats people. The rate has been made free to Great Britain, but it is kept the same in the intermediate and general tariffs, which means that the Coats firm will have the entire consuming public of Canada to deal with. Heaven knows those people are rich enough without giving them any further advantages.

Mr. STEVENS: I must correct what I said a moment ago to the hon. member for Weyburn. There is virtually only one producer in Canada, and according to the practice of the bureau of statistics the production of anything less than three firms is not given out, so I am afraid I shall not be in a position to give the information requested.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell us the lines that are produced here?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; crash, union, towels and towelling, table cloths, table napkins and things of that kind. Before we proceed with these items let me indicate the situation to the hon. member for New Westminster. We discussed this matter with the British delegation, and there had been quite a duty on this article, as one can see by reference to the previous schedule. There is no Canadian industry to benefit at all; there is only the one industry we have mentioned, making crash towelling, which we are not disturbing. With that exception all these linens, covering a very wide range and a very valuable list, now will come free from the British manufacturer. There is no danger in the world of any holding up of the Canadian producer for a high price, if that was in the mind of my hon. friend. I will say frankly, however, that we do expect that perhaps our American tourist friends coming over here will buy quantities of these linens, and we hope to build up a very handsome business in that way.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister could give us some idea of the revenue we have been deriving from these different items in the linen schedules, and what we may expect to lose.

Mr. RHODES: If we are going on to deal with items 540, 540a and so on, perhaps we might pass this thread item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—540, 540a, 540b, 540c. From the four existing linen items marginally named it is proposed to draft a new linen schedule which will accord to the United Kingdom free entry on a very wide range of fabrics and articles, administration of the new legislation to be on the basis suggested by the following tentative proposals:

(a) woven fabrics, in the web, wholly of flax or hemp, not to include towelling and glass cloth of crash or huck, with or without lettering or monograms woven in, nor table cloths and napkins of crash with coloured borders.

(b) articles wholly of flax or hemp, such as sheets, pillow cases, table cloths and napkins, towels and handkerchiefs, but not to include towels or glass cloths of crash or huck, with or without lettering or monograms woven in, nor table cloths and napkins of crash with coloured borders: Proposed rates, free, 25 per cent, 27½ per cent; free, 30 per cent, 32½ per cent; free, 30 per cent and 3½ cents, 32½ per cent and 4 cents; free, 30 per cent and 3½ cents, 35 per cent and 4 cents.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry to say I have not the figures before me, but I can give the imports under the four existing items last year. Under item 540 the imports amounted to $170,000, of which $154,000 came from the United Kingdom. Under item 504a the imports totalled $348,000, of which $321,000 came from the United Kingdom. Under item 540b the imports were $401,000, of which $368,000 came from the United Kingdom, and under item 540c imports totalled $978,000, of which $616,000 came from the United Kingdom and $350,000 from other countries.

Mr. COOTE: I was anxious to know whether the minister could tell us the revenue we are likely to lose by putting these different items on the free list.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry to say I cannot give that information now, but I can get it approximately, later on.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—541a. Woven fabrics, wholly of jute, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551. Yarns, composed wholly or in part of wool or hair, but not containing silk or artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 11¼ cents; intermediate tariff, 20 cents; general tariff, 22½ cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551a. Yarns and warps composed wholly of hair, imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, ....; intermediate tariff, 15 cents; general tariff, 17½ cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551a. Yarns and warps composed wholly or in part of wool or hair, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 7½ cents, intermediate tariff, 15 cents; general tariff, 17½ cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—552. Felt, pressed, of all kinds in the web, not consisting of or in combination with any woven, knitted or other fabric or material: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 7½ cents; intermediate tariff, 17½ cents; general tariff, 20 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—553. Blankets of any material, not to include automobile rugs, steamer rugs or similar articles: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 10 cents; intermediate tariff, 25 cents; general tariff, 30 cents.

Mr. COOTE: What were the importations under this item?

Mr. RHODES: This item covers both woollen and cotton blankets. Of cotton blankets we imported last year $5,500 worth of which $3,500 came from the United States, and of woollen blankets $158,000 of which $150,000 came from the United Kingdom.

Mr. SPENCER: What were the tariffs under the old schedule?

Mr. RHODES: The old rates were: 22½ per cent; 30 per cent and 35 per cent ad valorem, and 20 cents, 25 cents and 30 cents. What we have done in this instance is to cut the specific duty in two in respect to the preference; instead of 20 cents it is 10 cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is one instance where there is very little imported.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: I have just given the figures. The importation has not been large.

Mr. SPENCER: I think the British preference might have been cut out entirely. Blankets are used by the poorest families and if we can make goods free under other items this might have been included in that list.

Mr. RHODES: On the other hand, it must be remembered that the Canadian industry is working entirely with Canadian wool.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Canadian wool?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: And not paying much for it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister's statement is surprising. Canadian wool was never as cheap as it is at the present time. The clip in western Canada is practically all in the hands of the producers because they cannot sell it at any price nor can they give it away. Here we are giving the whole market to the Canadian manufacturers. I shall have something to say on Canadian wool under another item.

Mr. COOTE: The thing to do would be to increase the purchasing power of the Canadian people so as to allow them to buy blankets, which in turn would enable the manufacturers to buy more wool from the farmers.

Mr. RHODES: We are all agreed on that.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I was very much struck, in reference to this matter, by certain figures I saw in the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for March, 1932. There a comparison is given of prices paid for wool. The prices were, for the years from 1922 on, as follows:

| | Cents per pound |
|---|---|
| 1922 | 17½ |
| 1923 | 20 |
| 1924 | 25 |
| 1925 | 25 |
| 1926 | 23 |
| 1927 | 22 |
| 1928 | 26 |
| 1929 | 22 |

Then it falls to 11 and 8 and now it is about 4 or 5 cents per pound. I am always struck by something which appears to me to be incongruous in the tariff I am not here to advocate a high tariff on wool or on anything else, but I must remind hon. gentlemen opposite that this government promised the farmers to make tariffs fight for them; yet this is the most iniquitous tariff one could imagine. In the United States the tariff on wool is very high. I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that the specific tariff was adopted in the United States for the purpose of carrying out the tariff which was given to the farmers on wool. In Canada our specific tariff is nearly as high as the specific tariff which was put into force in the United States to take care of the tariff imposed there on wool, but we have no tariff at all on wool. This is the most iniquitous provision that has ever been made in our tariff. No consideration whatever is given the farmer. One would expect that the woollen manufacturers of Canada would at least use Canadian wool. We produce about one quarter of the wool that is used in Canada. Now, when our tariff was increased to the extreme limit, skyhigh, with the specific duty and everything else afforded the manufacturer, no consideration whatever was given the farmer except talk. On July 14, 1931, I drew the attention of the Prime Minister to this very fact. Later on, during the course of last session, the Minister of Finance himself stood up and said that some consideration should be shown the wool growers. I have read many letters in this house from cooperative organizations like the Wool Growers' Association, which is a very influential body in this dominion, and the sheepbreeders in convention in Toronto have passed resolutions and forwarded letters to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, all with reference to this subject. The Prime Minister, in answer to my poor utterances, said, "Give us time." He gave us some hope, but we have been given hope so many times that now we should like to see something practical done. If the manufacturers had a little heart they would take at least one-quarter of their wool supplies from the wool producers in Canada. We produce about 20,000,000 pounds of wool, using round figures, and the consumption in Canada is about 80,000,000 pounds. In the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for March, 1932, I read the following:

> Wool prices were again below the previous year by at least 25 per cent. Although the woolen manufacturers are expanding their business in Canada, there has apparently been little, if any, increase in the use of Canadian wools by Canadian manufacturers. During the year 4,769,574 pounds were exported to Britain. The wools which are being exported are among Canada's best and very favourable comments are being received in regard to the quality of the product as represented in Canada's officially graded wools.

And quoting again from the same bulletin:

> The wool clip in 1931 was of good quality. The expansion of the use of purebred rams was reflected in a further refinement within the official grades. There was very little local buying of wool and prices for ungraded wools ranged from five to eight cents per pound.

And again:

> Canadian mills continue to use a limited volume of home-grown wool.

I do not want to press this matter too strongly at the moment, but when the question comes up again I hope to take part in the discussion. This government has pledged itself to do something for the farmer. Take fertilizer, for instance. We soon realize the advantages which are given to the manufacturer. The same thing applies to wool; the farmer receives no consideration from the government or from the manufacturer. He receives only four to five cents per pound for his product, while the manufacturer benefits by a specific and ad valorem duty. If I am not in error, I understand that in the United States a specific duty alone is considered all that is necessary in the way of a tariff on wool. It is considered that about two and a half to three pounds of virgin wool is required to make one pound of manufactured cloth, so that the tariff on wool is about one-third of the specific tariff on cloth. I wish the minister would give us some hope of possible relief to our farmers.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will appreciate that it is not given to me to have the same freedom of utterance with respect to my views as it is to him. However, I commend the utterances of my hon. friend. I have great sympathy with the views he has expressed, but he will appreciate that this is not a matter which should be dealt with at this time; it is a matter for tariff revision at the time of the regular budget. I can assure my hon. friend that the point he raises is under advisement and I hope I shall be able to discuss it with him sympathetically when the proper time comes.

Mr. YOUNG: This is one of the items upon which we have been able to figure out what the rate will be. The actual rate on goods under this item coming from Great Britain will be 53.6 per cent. A moment ago the minister told us that the Canadian factories were working almost entirely with Canadian wool, but I have before me the report of the woollen and textile industry in Canada for the year 1931, published by the bureau of statistics, which gives the following figures:

Domestic wool used, 2,479,000 pounds valued at $551,000.
Foreign wool used, 3,806,000 pounds valued at $1,429,000.

That does not look as though our woollen manufacturers were confining themselves entirely to Canadian wool. The consumption of foreign wool is fifty per cent higher than that of domestic wool, while the value was nearly three times as much. Last year the Canadian woollen manufacturers put on an exhibition in the Chateau Laurier. They had some very fine woollen cloths displayed and the men in charge understood their business. They explained to us that they could not use Canadian wool in the manufacture of these fabrics; that they had to use foreign wool. What good is this tariff doing the Canadian wool grower? I have a neighbour who produced 3,000 pounds of wool last year. When he had paid for the clipping and the freight to Regina he did not have enough left to buy himself a suit of underwear. With a duty of 53.6 per cent against wool coming from foreign countries, is there any chance of the consumption of wool increasing in Canada? The Canadian farmer will receive no benefit because, as the hon. member for West Edmonton has said, he cannot sell his wool. I want to know who is to benefit under these high duties.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The manufacturer, of course.

Mr. YOUNG: How many men are employed and what wages do they receive?

Mr. SPENCER: A few moments ago I asked the Minister of Finance, who is not now present, if he would not consider letting these goods come in free from Great Britain. He told me that the manufacturers were using Canadian wool entirely.

Mr. STEVENS: No. In regard to blankets a large proportion of Canadian wool is used.

Mr. SPENCER: I was going to ask the minister if in view of the figures given by hon. members he would still hold to his statement that Canadian wool was being used entirely.

Mr. STEVENS: I looked into this matter myself three or four months ago. I was in touch with two or three manufacturers of blankets, and one man told me that he was using one hundred per cent Canadian wool, while one or two others stated they were using a large percentage.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the manufacture of a small range of products.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. I think it should be recognized that Canadian blanket manufacturing is really one of the most efficient industries in the country. A marvellously fine article is turned out, I think at a reasonable price.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We will agree with what the minister says in that regard, but it is only in the manufacture of very rough fabrics that one hundred per cent Canadian wool is used. The finer blankets are made from Australian wool.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is true.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is our complaint. Why do they need a tariff of 53 per cent on a raw product when they use the smallest possible amount of the home grown raw material?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in chief part by weight, of yarns of wool or hair, not exceeding in weight six ounces to the square yard, n.o.p., when imported in the gray or unfinished condition, for the purpose of being dyed or finished in Canada: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent and 9¼ cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent and 17½ cents per pound; general tariff, 30 per cent and 20 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554a. Woven fabrics, consisting of cotton warps with wefts of lustre wool, mohair or alpaca, generally known as lustres or Italian linings, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What are the imports?

Mr. RHODES: The imports last year were $7,780,000, of which $5,830,000 came from the United Kingdom, $189,000 from the United States, $95,000 from France, $61,000 from Italy and $48,000 from Germany.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554b. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent and 18¾ cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent and 30 cents per pound; general tariff 40 per cent and 35 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554b. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, weighing not less than 18 ounces per square yard: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent and 20 cents per pound; intermediate tariff 35 per cent and 30 cents per pound; general tariff 40 per cent and 35 cents per pound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the difference with regard to content between this item and the preceding one?

Mr. RHODES: The first is the very heavy cloth.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554b. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, commonly known as billiard cloth: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent and 30 cents per pound; general tariff, 40 per cent and 35 cents per pound.

Mr. COOTE: We are not sure what item we are discussing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: This is item ex 554b at the top of page 21 of the bill. There are two items numbered ex 554b. It is the second one we are now discussing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the importation?

Mr. RHODES: This is an entirely new item and the importations have not been segregated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do we make billiard cloth in Canada at all?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this going to make it more expensive to get billiard cloth?

Mr. RHODES: No, we are making it free.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a vast difference between this item and the other one so far as the British preference is concerned. The imports would be small in any case, and I suppose they could not get any reduction in the other item.

Mr. STEVENS: Thankful for small mercies.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent and 18¾ cents per pound; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent and 32½ cents per pound; general tariff, 40 per cent and 35 cents per pound.

Mr. COOTE: What are the importations under this item?

Mr. RHODES: The importations last year were $1,091,000, of which $714,000 came from the United Kingdom, $268,000 from the United States, $51,000 from France and $25,000 from Czechoslovakia.

Mr. COOTE: I have not asked the minister to work out any of these specific tariffs on a percentage basis but I think that the tariff charged against Great Britain under this item is so high as to be absolutely indefensible. In this item, comprising clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, the duty under the British preference is 30 per cent and 18¾ cents per pound. This is an item of very great importance to the public, and it is very much to be deplored that such extremely high tariff rates are maintained on this item, while billiard cloth and women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length, come in free. This clothing, which is worn by a great body of our people, is taxed thirty per cent plus 18¾ cents per pound. I have no idea what the specific rate would work out as expressed in percentages, but I would appreciate it if the minister would let the committee know what it is.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend has any particular commodity in mind I will endeavour to have the computation made. This item is very wide in its range, covering a thousand different articles.

Mr. COOTE: I suggest that the computation be made on a man's winter overcoat.

Mr. RHODES: I will have the computation made and endeavour to give it to the committee at the next sitting.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend from Macleod will find that the duty works out at about 91 per cent, and taking the schedule as a whole he will find that the duties work out at something over 60 per cent. It is a beautiful example of tariff-fixing gone mad. I do not know any country in christendom that requires overcoats more than we do in Canada. There is a slight reduction from the heights to which hon. gentlemen opposite put this tariff previously, but if anyone can tell me that there is any possibility of the Canadian manufacturer being disturbed by the tariff granted here I should like to know it. The government is going to ridiculous extremes in the tariff on textiles in a country like this which needs both cotton and wool fabrics for every member of our population, and these duties are to give the Canadian manufacturer the market in Canada. I happen to know that two of the principal manufacturers in Canada would have been quite well satisfied with a very moderate tariff, for they so informed us when we were in office. They did not get what they asked from us, and now they are getting three times as much from the present government. They are using very little Canadian wool. They are buying the imported material and in a protected market such as they now enjoy in this country they are in a position to soak the Canadian consumer to the limit. That the Canadian manufacturer is taking full advantage of the tariff is proved by the fact that we still have a small amount of imports of this article. Otherwise there would be no imports. No more glaring example could be found of the extraordinary lengths to which the government have gone in soaking the Canadian consumer of wearing apparel, something that we need and must have in Canada, and which the government know we must have. And then they tell us that this is done in order to preserve the industry! Why, Mr. Chairman, if you counted every man who is engaged in this industry in Canada today you would not get a total more than 40,000, and I venture to say that in a generous estimate. We have 700,000 people out of work, and the government is asking them to pay this exorbitant price for wearing apparel which they must have in a climate like ours. It is tariff-making gone mad. The excuse which the government give that woollen mills in this country have been revived by the tariff does not hold water. We cannot get a reasonable price for our wool; for these mills are not using Canadian wood. Wool is in just the same predicament as butter and eggs, which this government undertook to increase in price to the producer. In every instance the Canadian consumer is the loser. In connection with secondary industries we find that tariffs are clamped on which force him to pay exorbitant prices for the goods he must use. With the single exception of the small woollen manufacturer I would say that the textile industry was getting along pretty well on the protection they enjoyed during the ten years the previous government held office. They were making splendid progress and did not need this extra assistance. No one can convince me there is any necessity for the exorbitant tariffs on textiles provided by this government.

I hope the government will appoint a tariff board; I hope the textile industries will be investigated before that board, and that it will have some conception of what is reasonable, just and fair as between producer and consumer. Of all the increases hon. members opposite have made this is the worst. The government has not given the British manufacturer the slightest chance to get into the Canadian market; he is being offered no greater advantage than he possessed under the tariffs of 1930 and 1931. The small reductions on cotton textiles, as they appear in the schedule, mean very little, and will be of no benefit to the British manufacturer. I say here and now that Great Britain has been one of the best customers for Canadian natural products. Here is one set of items in the schedule from which Great Britain could have received some benefit; we would have been giving something back, but hon. gentlemen have chosen to ignore any such arrangement. The marvel to me is that the British delegation treated us so generously at the recent conference. I cannot understand it. In connection with articles which they can manufacture, and with which they can enter into competition on the world market, they are not given a chance to compete in the Canadian market. In commodities the trade in which amounts to little or nothing, and on certain raw products, some chance is given to Great Britain, but very little. I am interested in the consumers of Canada, those men and women who will have to pay and pay dearly as they have done on every occasion that a policy of extreme protection has been put into effect. Particularly is that true in connection with articles of clothing.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member seems to overlook entirely the fact we are passing through a period the like of which has never been known before in the history of the world.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know all about it; I am living on a farm.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; and he overlooks entirely the statement which has been made so frequently by hon. members on this side of the house, to the effect that we are treating emergent conditions by emergent methods.

Mr. YOUNG: At whose expense?

Mr. RHODES: We are not suggesting for one moment that the tariff as it now stands in respect to textiles or other articles is there for all time. The tariff changes are being made to meet a specific condition obtaining in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We will change it next year.

Mr. RHODES: Nobody will be more delighted than myself when the time arrives that we may deal with normal conditions in a normal way. It must be borne in mind that the textile industry in Canada is extensive. It spreads from coast to coast, and affords the very backbone of the livelihood of many Canadian communities. Despite the condition about which the hon. member for West Edmonton complains, the fact is that in the history of Canada clothing has never been as cheap as it is today. He must not overlook that fact, and he is not doing justice to the situation when he compares tariff legislation under existing conditions with legislation designed to meet ordinary conditions of normal times.

Mr. COOTE: How far back is the minister going in his statement that clothing never has been as cheap in Canada as it is today?

Mr. RHODES: Well, so far as I can ascertain it has not been as cheap in the last half century.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: You are misinformed.

Mr. MALONEY: Before the minister addressed the committee I had intended to express my surprise that the hon. member for West Edmonton, with his long and honourable public career and wide experience in public matters, could deliberately stand in committee and make such statements concerning conditions in the textile plants of this country. He knows as well as we do that today clothing is selling for less than half what it sold for two years ago.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not. We do not know that at all.

Mr. MALONEY: He knows well that a little over two years ago the textile industry of Canada was on its back. The plants which were locked up tightly two years ago are now running wide open and giving employment to hundreds and hundreds of men throughout Canada. The argument of the hon. member is not one we might expect from a man of his experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe the hon. member for Battle River asked a question concerning overcoating. Turning to the figures I find that in 1931 the total imports of overcoating were valued at $803,000, and that in 1932 they had decreased to $276,000.

Mr. SPOTTON: Is this a new minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From the United Kingdom the imports in 1931 were valued at $538,000 and in 1932 at $196,000. The idea behind this tariff is the entire prohibition of imports. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has stated that the present prices in Canada are low. I direct his attention to the fact that that condition is not peculiar to Canada but obtains throughout the world, and applies to all commodities. Under the guise of a British preference, and with an imperial agreement before us, we are locking the door more securely than ever against Great Britain in connection with textiles. We are locking the door against imports from Great Britain; the Minister of Finance and Minister of Trade and Commerce know it. Nothing in this agreement has caused so much vexation and irritation in the old country as the fact that we have refused to give them a decent chance to sell their textiles. I agree with my hon. friend when he states that we should do anything we can to provide labour and promote industry in Canada. But the price is too high. For the last two years, for reasons not difficult to analyze, this government has shown special favouritism to the textile industry of Canada. If hon. members wish I shall analyze that favouritism.

Mr. MORAND: Go ahead.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Dominion Textile Company have received more favours from this government in the last two years than any other single industry in Canada.

Mr. MALONEY: Has it cost you anything?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, and every consumer in the Dominion of Canada. I will tell my hon. friend that the tariff schedule as applied to the textile industry in Canada is not justified by any law of economics, fair play or common sense, and the consumer of Canada is paying for it. If you look at your importations of textiles from the old country during the last three or four years you will see that the door has been gradually closed on textiles from the old country, building up a monopoly in Canada. When you create a monopoly for an industry in Canada you are imposing a burden on the consumer. I want to tell my hon. friends that the big problem today in Canada, far bigger than any item in this agreement, is that of trying to look after the hundreds of thousands—800,000 we were told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) the other day —who are under or in need of relief; yet the poor man who wants to buy an overcoat or any textile fabric is penalized by these tariffs. Why is this in the imperial conference agreement? Is it to promote imperial trade? Will any hon. member on the other side will dare to say that this is promoting British trade? Look at the figures for the last three or four years, and you will see, whether you will approve, as do hon. members on that side of the house, or disapprove, as we do, that year by year you are closing the door against the importation of British textile fabrics into Canada. Under the guise of promoting British trade, promoting imperial preference, we have here some twenty items, in respect to every one of which the monopoly of Dominion Textiles is being buttressed very visibly and very emphatically. It should not be in this agreement at all. If my hon. friends want to carry out any promises or bargains they made in 1930, they should do it in the budget to be presented to this house next February or March. This is not promoting British trade; it is monopoly, it is high protection for Dominion Textiles at the expense of the consumers throughout Canada.

Mr. RHODES: Just for the purpose of accuracy—my hon. friend from Vancouver has quite inadvertently slipped into error—this item has no bearing upon or reference to or association with Dominion Textiles in any way, shape or form. This is a woollen item, and they manufacture only cottons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was discussing the entire textile fabrics, because I was not in the house—

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; I only want to make it clear that this item has no reference whatever to Dominion Textiles, nor has it anything to do with monopoly. It has to do with some 74 different industries scattered throughout this country which today are keeping alive many communities; and I may add that but for the tariff action taken by this administration many thousands more would be added to the ranks of the unemployed and would be on relief in Canada at this time. I say that just as a matter of simple justice to my hon. friend.

One thing more; my hon. friend is very strong in his assertion that by this tariff provision we are excluding the British from an opportunity to enter this market. May I say to him that surely the British ought to be the best judges of that circumstance, and they have signed the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were not satisfied.

Mr. RHODES: That may be so, but the British are pretty shrewd traders. I do not know that my hon. friend has said so, but many of those who surround him have been at pains to indicate that we have been "taken into camp" by them, the only comment in that regard is that he should be perfectly satisfied if those who are directly concerned, through their representatives on the British delegation, were satisfied.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to the statement that the tariff policy of this government has given employment to several thousand—or hundreds of thousands, did the minister say?

Mr. RHODES: I said thousands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I allege without the slightest fear of successful contradiction that the tariff policy of this government has driven out of employment thousands upon thousands of people throughout Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us how.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee as to the total amount of production in Canada that this item covers?

Mr. RHODES: I will not attempt to give all the items covered. It would take pages—

Mr. HEAPS: This one item.

Mr. RHODES: —but I will give some, I will give round figures:

|---|---|
| Clothing, men's | $ 340,000 |
| Clothing, women's | 83,000 |
| Other clothing | 398,000 |
| Boys overcoats and reefers | 1,391,000 |
| Men's topcoats and overcoats | 8,439,000 |
| Women's coats and cloaks | 17,000,000 |
| Blazers | 136,000 |
| Mackinaws | 526,000 |
| Washable coats | 140,000 |
| Coats, waterproof and rain | 618,000 |
| Windbreakers | 297,000 |
| Coats, not specified | 139,000 |
| Dresses | 26,901,000 |
| Dressing gowns, negligees, bathrobes, etc | 1,799,000 |
| Gaiters, spats and leggings | 237,000 |
| Jerseys | 183,000 |
| Uniforms, military and athletic | 236,000 |
| Suits and pants for boys | 3,620,000 |
| Men's suits | 22,428,000 |
| Women's suits | 3,000,000 |

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister in the same rough way give the importations under the same headings?

Mr. RHODES: I gave that previously—$1,091,000.

Mr. YOUNG: I have been trying to do a little figuring from the report of the bureau in regard to the woollen industry. I find that it employs 8,208 persons; that it pays in salaries and wages $7,425,000. The total value of the product last year was $25,500,000. The imports last year were $20,000,000 as against $39,000,000 the year before. If we add to the imports the value of the product last year we get $45,500,000 as the total woollen goods consumed in Canada. Taking the year before, our production was $27,000,000 and imports $39,000,000, a total of $66,000,000 worth consumed in Canada. So that the net result of the policy of the government has been to decrease the consumption of woollen goods in Canada by about one third, making them so dear that in a country with a climate like this the people cannot use them—all to give employment to 8,000 people who draw $7,500,000 in wages, although with an average duty of 60 per cent and a total production and importation of $45,000,000, the industry is costing us approximately $27,000,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568a. Socks and stockings of all kinds: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent and 75 cents per each dozen pairs; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent and $1.35 per each dozen pairs; general tariff, 35 per cent and $1.50 per each dozen pairs.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the applied rate on this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wonder if the minister could tell us how much the importation has decreased in the last two years, if at all.

Mr. RHODES: We are exporting a lot now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, I know—but the importations from Great Britain.

Mr. RHODES: I have only the figures for last year. We imported goods last year to the value of $856,000, and our exports totalled $766,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The tendency has been to cut down on the importation of socks and stockings under this item?

Mr. RHODES: We imported $17,000 worth of cotton socks from the United Kingdom, $8,000 of silk, $14,000 of artificial silk and $736,000 of wool.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could the minister say how that compares with the preceding year, in a general way?

Mr. RHODES: No doubt there would be a reduction because of the lower unit cost. The year before our importations totalled $1,823,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What were our exports, and to what countries did they go?

Mr. RHODES: We exported $285,000 worth to New Zealand, $266,000 worth to South Africa and $88,000 worth to the United Kingdom.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do we enter free now?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, I think so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then I want to congratulate the minister on that deal, which should be a pretty good one for Canada with the duty we have against importations. I honestly wish to congratulate the government on a very splendid deal of this kind. The amazing thing is how they put it over. I have much more admiration for the government now than I ever had.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to say just one word in regard to socks and stockings. I discussed this matter with a woollen importer, who told me he was going out of the business of importing woollen socks because he could not handle them with the duties now imposed against them. I asked what difference these duties would make to the price. He said the duties would not make any difference to the price, but that they had made a tremendous difference in the quality. So now we must wear inferior socks because of these duties.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568b. Women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 45 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister who made representations to the government in regard to this item?

Mr. RHODES: I have observed some criticism of this item on the ground that it is a luxury and therefore should have been taxed. The feeling we had, however, was that it was a commodity which could be imported in large quantities and sold to the tourist trade with very marked advantage, and that what we might lose in customs imposts would be more than made up in the indirect way. For that reason we felt that this was a concession which we could make to the glove trade of the United Kingdom, because this commodity is not made in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are all imported from the United Kingdom?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: My information is that they are not made in the United Kingdom at all.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; according to our information this is a big item.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell me the imports from the United Kingdom?

Mr. RHODES: This is an entirely new item, so I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information. The imports have not been segregated.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to delay the item, but I thought I had very good information indeed to the effect that all these gloves were made in France or on the continent and that no such gloves were made in England.

Mr. RHODES: I can assure my hon. friend that this was checked up with the British delegates, and we are satisfied beyond question that they are manufactured in quantities in Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—572. Turkish or imitation Turkish or other floor rugs or carpets, and carpets n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent and 5 cents per square foot; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent and 15 cents per square foot; general tariff, 40 per cent and 20 cents per square foot.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister tell us what percentage of empire content there will be in a Turkish rug?

Mr. RHODES: This is not a rewritten item, Mr. Chairman; this is the old item with the rates changed. I do not say that the words I am about to speak are absolutely authoritative, but I believe I am correct when I say that the words "Turkish" or "imitation Turkish" do not imply that of necessity the rug comes from Turkey.

Mr. YOUNG: They will be oriental rugs.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, or they may be of oriental design, manufactured in Great Britain. On that point my hon. friend will recall that we have the safeguard of the empire content provision, which I think would ensure that these were British rather than foreign goods.

Mr. YOUNG: Surely the minister does not mean that if we go down and buy a Turkish rug it might be only of Turkish design?

Mr. RHODES: I will say this, that if we buy an imitation Turkish rug certainly that is not a Turkish rug, which, so far as I can ascertain, may be a trade name. It does not necessarily mean that the rug comes from Turkey, but whether or not that be so, the empire content provision would preclude a Turkish rug coming from Turkey taking advantage of the British preference.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Customs tariff—586. Coal, anthracite, n.o.p., per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 50 cents; general tariff, 50 cents.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to make just one observation on the question of coal; it has no reference to the duty, but it has regard to the coal production and the coal business particularly in the eastern provinces. I want to urge upon the government and particularly upon my friend the Minister of Finance, in the strongest possible way, some revision whereby advantage may be taken in a larger way by the Canadian National Railways of the subvention in order to induce the company to use more eastern coal. My hon. friend will remember that last year a change was made in the subvention, but it was made applicable only to the additional tonnage which the Canadian National might use. As a matter of fact I understand that this year the Canadian National has used less coal than previously, and therefore the benefit of that subvention has not been felt. I know that this is about the time the government will be revising or considering the renewal of these subventions, and I want to urge as strongly as I can that they be so adjusted that the Canadian National Railways may be induced to use more eastern coal.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure my hon. friend would not expect me to enter into a lengthy discussion of the coal subventions in connection with an item concerning coal which appears in these trade agreements. I can assure him, however, that I am equally anxious that everything possible should be done to assist the coal industry both in the east and in the west. When we are discussing this matter at a later stage in the session I shall be very glad indeed to go into the matter with my hon. friend more fully. In the meantime I can assure him that anything in addition we can do or think should be done for the industry will not be lost sight of.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister before him the figures in regard to the importation of British or Welsh anthracite in the last two years, and does he consider that the additional tariff protection of 10 cents will be of material advantage in connection with the importation of Welsh anthracite into Canada?

Mr. RHODES: The importations of United Kingdom coal this year already are over one million tons. I have the figures beginning with April and running up to the end of September and they indicate that we have imported in this current year during a period of six months 945,217 tons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it increasing month by month?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. Last year our imports of British anthracite represented 23 per cent of the total anthracite importations, whereas for the six months' period I quoted that percentage had gone up to 55 per cent, indicating a marked increase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There must be some mistake about the 23 per cent. Needless to say, I am delighted to know that there is an ever-growing importation of British anthracite. We did run up to about 800,000 tons, but we import only 3,000,000 tons all told now.

Mr. RHODES: Twenty-three per cent of our importations for 1931-32 came from the United Kingdom. These are official figures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The importation last year was about 800,000 tons.

Mr. RHODES: More than that.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 598. Brass band instruments, of a class or kind not made in Canada; bagpipes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I object to the way in which this item is drawn up. It provides for, "brass band instruments of a class or kind not made in Canada; bagpipes." With all deference to the minister, I suggest that bagpipes are worthy of an item by themselves. I think it is an insult to a great and glorious race and to a wonderful section of the Canadian community to have bagpipes classified as a secondary article. The hon. member for New Westminster and myself would like the Minister of Finance to have bagpipes inserted as a special item in the Canadian tariff.

Mr. REID: Naturally it is not to be expected that I rise to oppose this item; far be it from me to do so. Of course, it does not affect me personally because I have a set which probably will last me all my days.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do you want parts?

Mr. REID: One thing that pleases me particularly is the fact that it is now settled that bagpipes are a musical instrument. There are probably between fifty and sixty bands in Canada and there are well over a thousand pipers, and the number is increasing year by year, but in connection with this item there is great difficulty with the customs board so far as parts are concerned. The customs officers are inclined to view parts as separate, and they interpret bagpipes to mean the complete instrument. I would ask the minister in all seriousness to have this item amended. Parts are brought in and they are necessary for repairs, and as there are men in Canada who are building up an industry by importing parts for sale, I think the suggested change should be made. I have received protests from various sources with regard to this matter and I would ask that all parts used in connection with bagpipes be entered free as well as the bagpipes themselves.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since my office is on the sixth floor, I protest against any more bagpipes coming in.

Mr. REID: I naturally look for a protest from the hon. gentleman. No lover of good music would protest.

An hon. MEMBER: Who asked for this?

Mr. RHODES: It has been suggested to me that these are Reid instruments. I take it that my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre will not press so seriously his complaint that the item was not inserted by itself, in view of the fact that the hon. member for New Westminster is so delighted that at last the bagpipes has been acknowledged to be a musical instrument, and is therefore included with brass band instruments and other instruments that make music. I may tell him seriously, however, that I will take into careful consideration his suggestion with respect to parts and if it can be acceded to we can deal with the suggestion in ways and means.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—604. Belting leather in butts or bends; sole leather, and all leather further finished than tanned, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—604. Genuine pig leathers and genuine Morocco leathers; so-called roller-leathers: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—605. Leather produced from East India tanned kip, uncoloured or coloured other than black, when imported for use exclusively in lining boots and shoes; genuine reptile leathers: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—607a. Leather, not further finished than tanned, in whole hides, in grains or splits, when imported by manufacturers of upholstering leathers for use exclusively in the manufacture of upholstering leathers, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Provided, that the governor in council may, when satisfied that the leather specified in this item is being produced in Canada, in quantity and quality sufficient for Canadian requirements, by order in council direct that this tariff item be repealed.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—610. Belting of camel's hair, for machinery: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—617. India-rubber boots and shoes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—625. Caps, hats, muffs, tippets, capes, coats and cloaks of fur and other manufactures of fur, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—663. Fertilizers, compounded or manufactured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. REID: Will the minister make a statement regarding the question I have raised in connection with this item?

Mr. RHODES: As soon as we get through the list we will refer to that.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—684. Rubber thread, not covered: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—711. Barytes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—711. Charcoal, animal, for use in the refining of sugar: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—711. Mineral wool: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Customs tariff—711. A new item (not finally drafted) to provide that all chemicals and drugs which were dutiable at the date of the conference, under item 711 at: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent; shall be in future, when of a kind not produced in Canada, dutiable at: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister explain this?

Mr. RHODES: I think I could explain that better in committee of ways and means. The item is a new one and is all-embracing. It includes a very large list of every drug that is used in Canada, not manufactured here, and it is a very heavy item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—728. Hyposulphite of soda, when imported by tanners for use in their own factories in the tanning of leather: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This was free all across the board before the present tariff.

Mr. RHODES: This was one item which the British representatives laid special stress upon; it was included in their special list.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—783. Gasoline and steam engines, transmission assemblies and parts thereof, magnetos, starting motors, electric generators, propeller shafts, steel chassis frames, brakes, clutches, brake and clutch controls, steel road wheels, steel rims for pneumatic tires, larger than thirty inches by five inches, steering gears and front and rear axles, all of a class or kind not made in Canada when imported by manufacturers of motor trucks (not for railways or tramways) for carrying goods only, for use only in the manufacture of such motor trucks: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—785. Cocoanut oil, not edible, when imported for use in the manufacture of refined cocoanut oil: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: It will be recalled that considerable discussion took place previously with respect to the use of nitrate of soda as a fertilizer. I made the statement that this article could be imported free by agricultural interests provided it was mixed with some other commodity, even with sand. I find that in actual practice the Department of National Revenue has never attempted to police or follow up the use of nitrate of soda when purchased by those in the agricultural industry, the simple statement that it was to be used for fertilizer having been accepted as sufficient. However, in order to make that quite clear I propose an amendment in the form of a new item 210e.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that the following be substituted as item 210e:

210e. Nitrate of soda or cubic nitre, when imported for use as a fertilizer, or when imported by manufacturers of explosives for use exclusively in their own factories in the manufacture of explosives: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. minister consider moving a similar amendment in connection with barbed wire and cream separators?

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

On schedule F.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think article 19 should be considered in connection with this schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the Chairman will be good enough to read article 19.

The CHAIRMAN: Article 19 reads:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake to accord to those non-self-governing colonies, protectorates and the mandated territories to which the benefits of the British preferential rates are at present accorded and also to Zanzibar the preferences on the commodities and at the rates shown in schedule F and also any preferences for the time being accorded to the United Kingdom. Provided that His Majesty's government in Canada shall not be bound to continue to accord any preferences to any colony or protectorate which, not being precluded by international obligations from according preferences, either (i) accords to Canada no preferences or (ii) accords to some other part of the empire (in the case of Northern Rhodesia, excepting the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the territories of the South African High Commission) preferences not accorded to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask the minister one or two questions in connection with article 19. Which of the non-self-governing colonies do not accord preferences to Canada, and is the special preferential arrangement with Northern Rhodesia better than the general arrangement arrived at in this agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: Regarding that exception, "in the case of Northern Rhodesia, excepting the Union of South Africa," that appears all through the agreement. That is a local arrangement between the different colonies in the Union of South Africa.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it under a treaty?

Mr. STEVENS: It is an agreement between themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are the preferences accorded under that arrangement more extensive than those under the agreement we are now considering?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not checked them, but I imagine possibly they are. It is something like the Canada-West Indies agreement.

Mr. RALSTON: Are any of these non-self-governing colonies precluded by international obligation from granting preferences?

Mr. STEVENS: There is an agreement affecting the British West African colonies, known as the Nigerian agreement. It is an old Anglo-French treaty which goes back many years. I believe the whole matter is under consideration at the present moment, but I do not think it is desirable to stir up anything. I do not think the business available warrants this action, nor do I think it would be desirable in any case.

Mr. RALSTON: The apparent binding effect of international obligations gives a point to the argument which has been repeatedly made from this side, that what we are doing here will preclude us from making arrangements with other countries.

The CHAIRMAN: The first item in schedule F reads:

Customs tariff—39a. Sago and tapioca flour: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, ½ cent per pound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister the import figures for last year?

Mr. STEVENS: The imports last year in rice flour and cassava and rice meal were valued at $7,776, of which $4,186, came from the United Kingdom and $1,530 from the United States. The importations of sago and tapioca flour were valued at $22,313, of which $10,550 came from the United Kingdom, $9,300 from the United States and $431 from the Straits Settlements.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister the previous rates?

Mr. STEVENS: The previous rates were three-quarters of a cent, one cent and one cent. The rates now are three-quarters of a cent, one and a quarter, and one and a quarter cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—77. Vanilla beans: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I have the same information with regard to this item?

Mr. STEVENS: The imports under the old item were $74,000, of which $1,000 came from the United Kingdom, $62,000 from the United States, and $8,000 from France. Vanilla beans are a British Empire product and are not produced in the United States at all, but it just happens that we have been buying them largely through the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87n. Tomatoes: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 2 cents per pound throughout the year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—143. Cigars: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 50 cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 254. Gums, viz.: Arabic, copal, damar, gum chicle or sappato gum, crude: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—264. Essential oils, n.o.p., including bay oil, otto of limes and peppermint oil: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—267b. as revised. Crude petroleum not in its natural state ·7250 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, one cent per gallon.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is not this a combination of two items in the old tariff, 267b and 272b?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is just about right in that observation.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would the minister state the reason for combining these two items?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a considerable production of this class of oil in Trinidad, and this item has been framed to give Trinidad a chance in the Canadian market.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: What were the importations from the different countries under these two items?

Mr. STEVENS: It is impossible to segregate them because the figures we have cover the importations under a number of different items.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Surely the importations should be segregated, because they come in under different rates of duty. Under one item the product comes in free, and under the other item it comes in at three-tenths of a cent, four-tenths of a cent, and half a cent a gallon. We should have the figures under 267B.

Mr. STEVENS: I will do the best I can, but I cannot precisely meet my hon. friend's request. The imports under the existing item have not been heavy, having amounted in 1932 to $96,000, of which $53,000 came from Peru and $42,000 from the United States. The other item to which my hon. friend refers expired in July 1931.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): "Crude petroleum not in its natural state" seems a rather curious definition. It must be partly refined, I should think, because our duty on crude is very low, and the margin of preference granted here over the intermediate is one cent per gallon.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the same description as appears in the tariff so far as the words "crude petroleum not in its natural state" are concerned. Some describe it as skinned. It has been put through some slight process.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the minister think that one cent per gallon is enough protection to meet the competition from Soviet Russia?

Mr. STEVENS: This is what they asked for.

Mr. RALSTON: I notice that at the top of the column it says "margin of preference over intermediate tariff" and under item 267b in the present tariff this crude petroleum comes in under four-tenths of a cent intermediate. A margin of preference of one cent per gallon would mean a reduction below that, would it not?

Mr. STEVENS: This is simply meant to give a preference of one cent a gallon. If my hon. friend will look at the statutory provision in the votes and proceedings he will find there that the rate is a half a cent, and then a cent and a half.

Mr. RALSTON: Under 267B?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. It carries out the understanding set forth in schedule F.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is this particular item aimed at Russian and Roumanian oil which has been imported into this country?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not aimed at anything except to give Trinidad access to our market, and this is the manner in which they have asked that it should be done.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—277. Palm and palm kernel oil, unbleached or bleached, non-edible; shea butter: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—278. Oils, viz.: cocoanut, palm and palm kernel, not edible, for manufacturing soap; carbolic or heavy oil; olive oil for manufacturing soap or tobacco, or for canning fish: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—584. Asphalt or asphaltum, solid: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What are the imports of asphalt? This is for Trinidad, of course?

Mr. STEVENS: The total imports last year were $480,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no considerable quantity coming in from any other source but Trinidad?

Mr. STEVENS: A good deal of that is coming in through United States ports. Now it will come direct. That is really the object.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—616. Gutta percha: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—616a. Balata, crude, unmanufactured: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—785. Cocoanut oil, not edible, when imported for use in the manufacture of refined cocoanut oil: margin of preference over intermediate tariff, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does cocoanut oil come to Canada from other sources than the colonies? Is this merely a matter of revenue?

Mr. STEVENS: This is an item which was requested by the British particularly on behalf of the colonies. Formerly the rates were free across the board. Cocoanut oil is produced very largely in the different colonies, and it is a product in which they feel they can do a very large business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there any competition in this article from extra-empire territories?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the United States imports a lot of oil from various places, part of which filters into Canada from United States points.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unless it be for revenue purposes, I cannot see why a duty was placed on it at all.

Mr. RHODES: As a matter of fact this item has been passed already in schedule E.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not catch the significance of it when it was discussed in schedule E, but if it is going to come from empire countries—and I believe there is no hope of producing it in Canada—I cannot see why there should be a duty at all. This commodity is growing in use. Unless the minister desires revenue I can see no reason why it should not be free.

Mr. RHODES: It is free from the empire, but there is a ten per cent duty in the general and intermediate rates.

Item agreed to.

Article 19 agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I believe item 106b of schedule E has yet to be passed. It appears below schedule F.

Customs tariff—106b. Fruits, prepared, pineapples: British preferential rate to be reduced to one cent per pound, subject to the agreement of His Majesty's government in the Commonwealth of Australia.

Mr. RALSTON: What is meant by the expression "subject to the agreement of His Majesty's government in the Commonwealth of Australia"? Is there some provision in the agreement in regard to pineapples?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; the arrangements in connection with this item were not quite concluded at the close of the conference. The Australian representatives were to agree, or otherwise, to it. Since the close of the conference they have agreed, and we are now giving effect to it.

Mr. RALSTON: Do they get the British preferential rate?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Item agreed to.

On article 9:

His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule, provided that nothing in this article shall preclude His Majesty's government in Canada from reducing the duties specified in the said schedule so long as the margin of British preference shown in that schedule is preserved or from increasing the rates under the intermediate or general tariff set out in the said schedule.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understood the Minister of Finance to say he had two or three amendments to move.

Mr. RHODES: It is not necessary to move them until we reach committee of ways and means.

Article 9 agreed to.

On article 10:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that protection by tariffs shall be afforded against United Kingdom products only to those industries which are reasonably assured of sound opportunities for success.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce to explain to the committee the significance of the following phrase:

Only to those industries which are reasonably assured of sound opportunities for success.

What will be the guiding maxim for determining the opportunities for success or prospects of success in each case?

Mr. STEVENS: This afternoon a discussion which took place on one of the items was very much along the same line. I read to the committee part of the Tariff Board Act indicating the principle upon which the tariff board would proceed. This is simply an assurance to the British government that in arriving at the tariffs to be imposed in this country protection shall not be put into effect beyond the point indicated herein, namely, that point where the industry has a reasonable opportunity of success. The language in the article is as clear as it could be made.

Article 10 agreed to.

On article 11:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that during the currency of this agreement the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production, provided that in the application of such principle special consideration shall be given to the case of industries not fully established.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with article 11 I should like to have a declaration of policy from one of the ministers in regard to the significance of the following proviso:

. . . provided that in the application of such principle special consideration shall be given to the case of industries not fully established.

And in regard to the preceding expression:

. . . full opportunity of reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Ontario and other hon. members at an earlier stage in the debate, this is an antiquated provision which has been in the United States tariff for years. I should like to refer to an analysis of this provision which appears in the Ottawa supplement of The Economist for Saturday, October 22, 1932. Article 11 is quoted, and then the following comment appears:

This statement of principle, which is, of course, by no means new, looks at first sight to be very fair and just. But, on further examination, it will be found to be not only misleading but vicious; for while it appears to be a limiting principle, it is not a limitation either in theory or in practice; for if carried out strictly it would put an end to all foreign trade. Clearly, if a duty is put on equal to this difference, there will be no benefit from foreign trade, which is only advantageous because you can buy abroad cheaper than you can produce at home, and vice versa as regards exports. Practice confirms this theoretical conclusion. The doctrine was embodied by congress in the American Tariff Acts many years ago as an instruction to the American Tariff Commission. One of the earliest members of that commission, charged with the duty of carrying out this policy, wrote a book on "Making the Tariff in the United States" in which he pointed out the practical difficulty of carrying out this doctrine. Here are some of his conclusions:—

"The application of the difference between costs as a measure of duties is usually impossible owing to the difficulty of finding what the difference amounts to. Even if cost data were reliable the fact would remain that there is in every country more than one cost at which any commodity is produced in commercial quantities. The difficulties in obtaining and verifying costs of production are infinitely greater in foreign countries than they are in the United States. The conclusion cannot be escaped that it is rarely possible to ascertain accurately the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. To use as the basis of a general tariff act a thing so fleeting, evasive, and shadowy would be neither right nor possible."

The result was precisely what might have been expected, for, under the operation of this famous clause, practically every change has been upward; the only exceptions being of such small importance as to be derisory. The principle has for many years past been used as a justification for the highest tariffs in the world. When the French delegates attempted to introduce it at the World conference of 1927 as a basis for rationalizing tariffs, it was rejected out of hand.

In practice no country has ever been able to carry out this so-called "scientific principle" in tariff making, but has used its discretion as to the extent to which it will allow goods to come in subject to the penalty of a protective duty, and how far it will go towards excluding them altogether.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From your point of view, Mr. Chairman, it may be out of order, but from our point of view these comments are relevant to the article under consideration.

Mr. YOUNG: It is instructive.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The article in The Economist is instructive; it is logical, it is rational, it is moderate in tone. It points out that this antiquated provision embodied in the tariff structure of the United States is condemned by those who are most familiar with its terms and provisions. The article which I have read goes on to say that it is entirely impossible as a matter of determination of the principle of a scientific tariff to operate as provided in this clause. I should like to ask either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce if they will be good enough in the first place to explain to the committee their conception of the significance of this provision, and in the second place to give their view as to the possibility of working it out in practice.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can answer my hon. friend very clearly. I will give him an illustration that we have just dealt with in this schedule, namely, the linen industry. It was concluded that the linen industry, as regards all branches except the one we mentioned a short time ago, the production of crash towels and so on, was one which, while there were two or three factories struggling along, was not likely to become established in Canada. So we put linen on the free list and abandoned the attempt to establish that industry. There is an illustration of our interpretation of that very principle.

Mr. RALSTON: But my hon. friend is dealing with the other section. The section to which my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has referred contains another principle altogether.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite aware of what he referred to.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend did not answer the question. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was pointing out that it was difficult to find out what the cost of production was in other countries, and he was asking how the government proposed to ascertain what the relative cost of economical and efficient production was in England as compared with Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and I understand each other quite well. My hon. friend asked me how I would explain the phrase:

> . . . provided that in the application of such principle special consideration shall be given to the case of industries not fully established.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was the first point.

Mr. STEVENS: The answer is that we found no difficulty in deciding that a given industry which had been trying to establish itself here for some time had not succeeded in doing so, and in the schedules passed tonight we dealt with it by placing it on the free list. That is an illustration of how the government views the application of that principle. My hon. friend referred to economical and efficient production. I have already intimated that in the Tariff Board Act we have set forth the principles there applicable; before my hon. friend came in I had read the relevant provision from the act. Certain principles set forth for the guidance of the board covering labour conditions, cost of material, inquiry into the efficiency of management, and so on, and these will be the guiding principles by which we shall determine what is an economically and efficiently managed industry.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend, I am afraid, has just reversed the real situation as it appears in this section. The proviso at the end of the section is that even though the cost of economical and efficient production is greater in Canada than in England, the government reserves to itself the right to continue the protection given to the industries concerned. My hon. friend gives the example of an industry not fully established, and points out that in such a case the duty was taken off. We are more interested in the industries to which special consideration is being given because of the fact that they are not fully established. How does my hon. friend propose to find out whether an industry qualifies under this proviso?

Mr. STEVENS: I have already intimated that the test will be applied by the tariff board under the principles clearly set forth in the Tariff Board Act.

Item agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

ST-TITE-DES-CAPS, QUE., DEMONSTRATION FARM

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the demonstration farm at St-Tite-des-Caps in the county of Montmorency, been removed since 1930 from the property of one Renaud who was in charge of the same?

2. If so, why?

3. Were any complaints made against the said Renaud?

4. If so, what was the nature of the said complaints?

5. By whom were they made?

6. Who has been placed in charge of said demonstration farm?

Mr. MURPHY (For Mr. Weir, Melfort):

1. The Illustration Station at St-Tite-des-Caps was closed on June 30, 1931.

2. The operator left his farm to become foreman on Seminary Farm at St. Joachim.

3. No complaints.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 3.

6. Mr. Renaud has not been replaced.

MONTREAL HARBOUR BRIDGE, TOLLS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Have any representations been made, directly or indirectly, to the government by the south shore residents to decrease the tolls on the new Montreal harbour bridge?

2. What was the last annual deficit on the bridge in question after all operating charges were paid, and provision was made for interest and maintenance charges?

3. Is the Dominion government extending financial aid to the proposed Caughnawaga bridge, which would be situated eight miles west of the new Montreal harbour bridge?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

Insofar as the Department of Marine is concerned:—

1. Yes.

Note.—The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal have received representations from representatives of south shore municipalities and from the Montreal Tramways Company for reduced fares on the Montreal harbour bridge.

2. The following information has been furnished by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal:

ST. JUSTINE STATION, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. THAUVETTE:

1. Under what government and on what date was Mr. Adelard Menard appointed postmaster at St. Justine Station, Quebec?
2. During how many years did he perform the duties of this office uninterruptedly?
3. Was he dismissed?
4. If so, on what date, and by whom?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. (a) Sir John A. Macdonald's.
(b) 1st May, 1889.
2. From 1st May, 1889 to the 8th May, 1931.
3. Yes. Reasons for dismissal were contained in a return tabled in the house on the 8th July, 1931.
4. 8th May, 1931. Postmaster General.

BONAVENTURE COUNTY, CENSUS COMMISSIONER

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Who was census commissioner for the county of Bonaventure for the last census, and how much was he paid for his services?
2. What amount was paid to the commissioner for the census of 1921?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Mr. George M. Kempffer, $1,141.42.
2. $640, for part of work.

RESTIGOUCHE, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has Jos. Olscamp, the postmaster of Restigouche, Quebec, been dismissed?
2. If so, who has been appointed to this office, and is the appointment permanent or temporary?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.
2. François Charles Roy has been appointed permanently.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

EMPRESS OF BRITAIN

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it to the knowledge of the government that the Empress of Britain collided with another vessel in the St. Lawrence river, in the middle of July last, near the entrance of the Saguenay river?
2. If so, was there any investigation held by the Dominion Wreck Commissioner?
3. If not, why?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. In the opinion of the Department of Marine an investigation was not necessary.

GRANTS OF FEDERAL CHARTERS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. How many federal charters were granted by the companies branch during the fiscal year 1930-31?
2. What was the revenue of the companies branch during that same year?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. Letters Patent, 898; Supplementary Letters Patent, 301.
2. Revenue, $389,296.

STEAMER NORTH VOYAGEUR

Mr. DUFF:

1. Is it to the knowledge of the government that the steamer North Voyageur was grounded on Red Island, in the St. Lawrence river, near the entrance of the Saguenay river, in the month of August last?
2. If so was there any investigation held by the Dominion Wreck Commissioner?
3. If not, why?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. In the opinion of the Department of Marine an investigation was not necessary.

*CANADIAN NAVY, SUPERIOR OFFICERS

Mr. LAVERGNE:

How many superior officers in the Canadian navy are Canadian citizens or native Canadians, and how many were born in foreign countries or in Great Britain?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think that question will have to be made more explicit as to just what officers are meant.

Question stands.

RAW LEAF TOBACCO IN BOND

Mr. GOTT:

1. How much raw leaf tobacco (pounds) was there in bond in Canada on November 15, 1932?
2. Can the government give a reasonable estimate as to how much tobacco, raw leaf, was held in storage in bond as of the above date?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1 and 2. Data as of November 15, 1932, not available, and figures are of November 1, 1932:

| | Pounds |
|---|---|
| Foreign unstemmed tobacco | 7,705,144 |
| Foreign stemmed tobacco | 482,496 |
| Canadian leaf tobacco | 7,426,974 |

Note.—Under tariff item 142, imported raw leaf tobacco entered free and transferred to excise bond under conditions of Excise Act, and when taken for manufacture is subject to duty of forty cents per pound on unstemmed and sixty cents per pound on stemmed.

REBATE ON UNITED STATES TOBACCO

Mr. GOTT:

1. Is the United States tobacco used for blending or other purposes with Canadian tobacco for export allowed a rebate?
2. If so, how much?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1 and 2. Rebate of forty cents per pound allowed on the quantity of foreign leaf (less ten per cent deducted for moisture) contained in manufactured tobacco exported.

FLOUR PRICES

Mr. LUCHKOVICH:

What was the price of flour per barrel at Halifax, Montreal, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver, on September 1, of the years 1931 and 1932?

Mr. STEVENS:

Canadian Wholesale Flour Prices, September, 1931-September, 1932

| | Winnipeg Fancy patent per barrel | Montreal First patent per barrel |
|---|---|---|
| | $ | $ |
| September, 1931 | 4 35 | 5 00 |
| September, 1932 | 3 60 | 4 60 |

Comparative wholesale prices for Vancouver, Edmonton and Halifax not available.

Average Retail Flour Prices, September, 1931-September, 1932

| | Price per pound September, 1931 | Price per pound September, 1932 |
|---|---|---|
| | cents | cents |
| Halifax | 3·4 | 3·5 |
| Montreal | 3·7 | 3·4 |
| Winnipeg | 3·0 | 2·7 |
| Edmonton | 3·0 | 2·8 |
| Vancouver | 3·5 | 3·1 |

ST. LAWRENCE NAVIGATION COMPANY, SUBSIDIES

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Did the Lower St. Lawrence Navigation Company obtain subsidies from the government during the past ten years?
2. If so, what were the amounts of such subsidies, and for what purposes were they granted?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Yes.

2. Under contract signed April 11, 1930, the following payments have been made:

| Fiscal Year | Subsidy Paid |
|---|---|
| 1930-31 | $49,990 |
| 1931-32 | 50,000 |
| 1932-33 (to September 30) | 28,125 |

The above subsidies were paid for the performance of the following services:

(a) Rimouski and Pointe-aux-Outardes Service.—Three round trips a week during the season of navigation, from Rimouski to Bersimis, Ile-aux-Outardes and Pointe-aux-Outardes.

(b) Rimouski, Comeau Bay and Trinity Bay Service.—Three round trips each week during the season of navigation between Rimouski and Comeau Bay; two trips each week being extended to Franklin, Bay St. Nicholas, Godbout and Trinity Bay.

(c) Matane, Trinity Bay and Seven Islands Service.—Two round trips each week during the season of navigation from Matane to Seven Islands, calling each way at Trinity Bay, Pentecost, Egg Island, Shelter Bay, Clarke City and Seven Islands.

During 1932-33 the amount previously voted having been reduced by 25 per cent to $37,500, certain reductions were made in the service. The Rimouski and Pointe-aux-Outardes Service has been reduced to two trips a week, with one call each week at Pointe Lebel. On the Rimouski and Trinity Bay Service, calls at Comeau Bay have been discontinued, operations at this port having been closed down. Two trips a week have been made from Rimouski to Trinity Bay, extending one trip to Seven Islands, calling at way ports.

COUNTY OF BONAVENTURE, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Have any works been authorized by the Department of Public Works in the county of Bonaventure, since the first of October last?
2. If so, what are they and what amount has been authorized?
3. Have any such works been authorized in the parish of St. Simeon de Bonaventure, what are they and what amount has been authorized?

POST OFFICE REVENUES

Mr. POULIOT:

What is the last total annual revenue and the last total net annual revenue, after deducting salaries of postmasters, allowances and mail carriage costs, of post offices whose incumbents were subjected to inquiries for political partisanship since the month of August, 1930?

Mr. SPEAKER: This order is now tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER, TWELVE MILE LIMIT

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all orders in council regarding the twelve mile limit in the St. Lawrence river passed during the last ten years.

ADDINGTON FORKS, ANTIGONISH COUNTY, POST OFFICE

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all correspondence including letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the Postmaster General and any of his officials and any person or persons in the province of Nova Scotia, regarding the removal of the post office from Addington Forks, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, where it was for over 100 years, to the other end of the district, near Beaver Meadows.

Mr. SPEAKER: This order will have to stand for amendment, because it is not in proper form.

BRIGHT FAN INQUIRY

Mr. McINTOSH:

For a copy of the evidence adduced at the investigation instituted to inquire into the sinking of the British freighter Bright Fan in Hudson strait, as well as any letters, telegrams, radiograms and other documents made use of during the investigation but not included in the evidence.

MINISTER OF MARINE

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the back benchers of the opposition I wish to welcome the hon. Minister of Marine, and Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau).

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I thank the hon. member.

RELIEF TO PENSIONERS

INQUIRY CONCERNING READJUSTMENT OF WINTER AND SUMMER ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand that last April the scale of relief for pensioners was cut down on the ground that the expenses during the summer months were not as heavy as they had been in the previous winter. Winter is upon us again. I have before me a communication from Deer Lodge indicating that pensioners on relief are very anxious to have the scale restored to where it was, and also some allowance for clothing. Ordinary work is entirely non-existent, and they cannot possibly subsist under conditions as they now obtain. May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health whether action will be taken by the government along this line?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, from what I heard of the hon. member's question I am inclined to believe that his statement is somewhat inaccurate. I understand that he has inquired as to what the allowance is at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I shall repeat my question. I understand that the relief granted to pensioners was cut down last April on the ground that expenses for the summer would not be as great as they had been the previous winter. I have now before me a communication from pensioners at Deer Lodge St. James, Manitoba, in which they urge that the scale be restored to the original rate, and that there should be an allowance for clothing. Will the government take action in the matter?

Mr. MacLAREN: As I stated before, I think the hon. member is inaccurate when he states that the allowance has been cut down. That is hardly a correct way of putting it, because relief has been given during the summer months along lines similar to those adopted in the previous summers. At the present time the rate upon which pensioners receive unemployment relief is figured on the basis of the amount of relief granted by the various municipalities. The amount of pension, plus the amount of relief to pensioners who are in conditions requiring relief amounts to not less than the amount granted by municipalities. That is the principle upon which unemployment relief is now given, and it is proposed that this amount of relief be continued through the winter months.

WHEAT MARKETING

GUARANTEES TO CHARTERED BANKS FOR ADVANCES TO SELLING AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. On Tuesday last orders in council were laid upon the table in regard to guarantees to chartered banks for advances made to certain wheat marketing agencies. Upon referring to order in council No. 2077 of September 20 I find that there is provision for the guarantee of certain advances within the limit laid down in the order in council. Then, at the end of the document there is a further provision for the guarantee of an additional advance without limits, so far as I can see. There is the provision that the additional advance will be authorized by order in council. I ask whether any such additional advances have been made, and if so whether they have been guaranteed? In the event of such guarantees will the government lay the order in council on the table?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my memory is that no additional orders in council were passed, but if such have been passed they will be laid on the table tomorrow—that is, if there are any.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

REPORT OF DELEGATES REPRESENTING CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AT GENEVA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil) (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the leader of the opposition asked a question regarding the report of the delegates to the Disarmament conference which I, along with two colleagues and a staff, had the privilege of attending. I have before me two copies of the report in English, with annexes attached. Also I have copies of the covering letter which I sent to the Prime Minister with the report. Further, I have two copies of the report itself in French, along with the covering letter.

The report is rather lengthy. As this can be only an interim report, and as the matter is still very much under discussion it is not proposed at the present time to print it. In the letter which I sent to the Prime Minister I explained to him in a brief way the situation as I understood it, and with your permission I would like to read this letter for the information of the house, as it gives the main points:

Ottawa, November 1, 1932.

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, M.P., Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,

I have the honour, as chairman of the Canadian delegation to the Geneva Disarmament conference, to submit the enclosed report on the work of that conference from its opening on February 2, to the adjournment of the first session, July 23, 1932. The work of the first session cannot be considered an unqualified success, and yet it is not fair to say that nothing was accomplished. The complexities of the disarmament movement are familiar to every student of the subject. These complexities, which would have made the problem before the conference a difficult one in any case, were increased by several special events, which held back the work of the first session, and which were concerned partly with the situation in the far East, and partly with the exigencies of politics in certain European countries. As a result not as much was accomplished as had been hoped for. An analysis of these accomplishments is given in the concluding section of the enclosed report.

May I outline here, briefly, the progress of events at the first session. The conference opened on February 2, with a general debate in which the representatives of some forty states participated. This occupied almost a month. After the conclusion of the general debate the conference concerned itself with mapping out a plan of procedure for the work before it, not a simple task, and in setting up committees on land, naval, and air armaments, political questions and national defence expenditure. These committees had begun their work before the Easter recess, which lasted until April 11. After this recess the conference concerned itself for some weeks with the question of qualitative disarmament, that is the abolition of certain weapons chosen more particularly because of their aggressive nature, their efficacy against national defence, or their cruelty to the civil population. After a vigorous debate the principle of qualitative disarmament was accepted, and the technical land, naval, and air committees were instructed to examine what armaments might be dealt with under it. This constituted a new and important approach to the problem of disarmament. It was meant to be a supplement to, not a substitute for, quantitative disarmament. It was rightly considered that at this time quantitative disarmament could not be achieved without the prior solution of certain political difficulties. While the representatives of the larger powers were attempting to settle some of these political difficulties, by informal conversations, the consideration of qualitative disarmament went on in the technical committees, but it was not particularly successful. The problem was as political as it was technical, and committees of experts found a technical solution difficult indeed. The result is that the reports on qualitative disarmament finally submitted by the committees to the general commission of the conference are little more than records of their proceedings.

From June 10, when these reports were presented, to June 22, there were important private conversations among the representatives of the great powers in a further effort to find some solution of the more serious political difficulties which stood in the way of progress. It may be said here that these were concerned largely with the German demand for "equality" (that is, the removal of special treaty restrictions) and the French demand for "security." It had become only too apparent that the fate of the conference was contingent to a large extent on the satisfactory settlement of these two questions. While this solution was being sought, a new direction was given to the work of the conference on June 22, by the presentation of what came to be known as the Hoover proposals, which advocated generally a one-third reduction in armaments. These proposals were debated until July 5, and while there was general acceptance of the principle behind them, it was felt that further time was needed for a consideration of their details. It was decided, therefore, that the conference should adjourn to give time for this consideration. A resolution including all the points on which the governments had been able to reach agreement during the first phase of the conference was then drawn up and submitted for acceptance. This resolution, which is analysed in the penultimate section of the enclosed report, was accepted on July 23 by 41-2, with eight abstentions. Germany and Russia voted against it. The conference then adjourned while making provision for the continuation of the work of the bureau during the adjournment. The bureau, which consists of the president and vice-presidents of the conference, the officers of the general commission, and the chairmen of the important committees, continued its duties during the summer. It supervised the work of a committee on effectives, requested certain of its members to submit reports on various questions raised by the closing resolution, and set up a committee to deal with the question of the trade in and manufacture of arms, a subject which was of special interest to the Canadian delegation, but which had not been reached in the deliberations of the first session of the conference. The main activity of the bureau, however, during the adjournment, has been its efforts to get Germany back into the conference. The German delegate had announced, in voting against the closing resolution, that his government would take no further part in the disarmament conference until the question of "equality" had been settled. The bureau has been making every effort to persuade the German government to reconsider this position. At the same time the United Kingdom government has been also attempting to find a way out of this impasse. It is becoming increasingly clear that unless such a way out is found, the next session of the conference will have small chance of making that further progress which is essential and which the public opinion of the world demands.

The bureau is to meet this week and it will then be decided on what date the next session of the general commission of the conference will be called, when subjects of great importance will be discussed. In addition to the German claim for equality it is probable that the French delegation will submit a scheme guaranteeing that political security on which, in their view, disarmament must depend. The Hoover proposals will also be considered, while the further reduction of naval armaments will also probably be examined. There is reason to believe that, if the views of France and Germany can be reconciled, decisions of far-reaching importance may be taken at the forthcoming session.

The attitude of the Canadian delegation at the first session of the conference may be summed up in the following words: We gave whole-hearted support to any and every constructive proposal for the limitation and reduction of armaments which was laid before the conference. We were at times somewhat impatient at the slowness of the progress which was being made, but at the same time we realized the difficulties that had to be faced and the problems that had to be solved. Those difficulties and those problems were primarily neither of our making nor for our solution, but it was our duty to do everything we could to assist in the efforts that were being made to bring about some effective limitation and reduction of armaments, as a step in the direction of ensuring world peace.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
George H. Perley.

May I say that there is a French translation of this letter that I am putting on the table.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that explains the position as it existed on the first of this month. Since then, as hon. members of the house have seen in the press, both France and the United Kingdom have put forward somewhat modified suggestions or proposals. They are before the bureau now in session at Geneva, and will receive most careful consideration. And may I explain to the house that the bureau is similar to an executive committee, or committee on arrangements. It has no power to make decisions on questions of policy or principle, without reference to the general commission of the conference, but its reports and recommendations always carry great weight.

While I am on my feet I would like to be allowed to take advantage of this opportunity to pay tribute to the splendid spirit of co-operation which existed among the Canadian delegates and our advisers at the Disarmament conference. My colleague, Mr. Dupré, Solicitor General, made a definite place for himself among those who were directing the activities of the conference, which was shown in a special manner by his election to the important post of vice-president of the Naval committee.

The other official delegate was Miss Winnifred Kydd, president of the National Council of Women. There were only two ladies who were full delegates to the Disarmament conference, and we are proud of the fact that one of them was a Canadian. In this way the dominion recognized the fact that the women of Canada have a very direct interest in the question of disarmament. You will not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, to be told that Miss Kydd was a happy and fortunate selection for this place. Her energy and ability are well known, and she was very helpful in every way As for the staff and our advisers, I do not intend to mention them by name but I cannot speak too highly of their capable assistance and of the faithful and efficient service which was given us by them. I can assure the house that we all sincerely appreciated their loyal work. I see by the press of Saturday that our advisory officer at Geneva, Doctor W. A. Riddell, who has represented the government there for a number of years, was chosen the other day as dean of the diplomatic corps. That is a worthy honour for Doctor Riddell, which reflects credit on the dominion as well.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add that all of us in Canada are very much alive to the necessity for disarmament as the best way of preventing future wars. We must not be discouraged if this is not accomplished as quickly as we might wish, and we must continue to do everything possible to bring it about.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether a date has been agreed upon or even suggested for the reconvening of the Disarmament conference.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I said before, the bureau is now in session in Geneva. At one time it was suggested that the general commission—not the conference itself, which will not meet until the parties have agreed on a date—which is a committee of the conference, just as we have a committee of the whole house, perhaps would meet on the 21st of this month. Then we heard last week that perhaps it might meet on the 28th of this month. No date has been fixed, and we have as yet no definite advice as to when the general commission will meet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: While my right hon. friend was in Geneva, with the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), and Miss Kydd, a special meeting of the assembly of the League of Nation was called for the purpose of considering the Manchurian question. The right hon. gentleman and the Solicitor General were appointed to represent Canada at that meeting. I do not know why Miss Kydd—as to whose qualifications I entirely agree with my right hon. friend—was not made a member of that delegation as well. I cannot discuss that question at the moment, but I should like to know if my right hon. friend will submit to the house also a report of the proceedings of that meeting of the assembly of the League of Nations.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All I can say in reply to my hon. friend is that if this had been a regular session of the house I fancy there would have been a report presented in regard to the meeting of the assembly, but I have no such report with me at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly the house is entitled to that report.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): May I add to what my right hon. friend has said. The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), well knows that at the special meeting of the assembly of the League of Nations the government of Canada was represented by two of its members.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But why two of its members?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it was advisable to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I protested at the time, and I still protest against the government not appointing the three members of the delegation to represent Canada at that meeting. Miss Kydd was there.

Mr. BENNETT: That is slightly childish.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The attitude of the government is childish.

Mr. BENNETT: The repetition of a remark does not add to its strength.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I had to repeat it.

SOCKEYE SALMON TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): On Wednesday last the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked whether the government were considering making representations to the government of the United States with respect to the ratification of the sockeye salmon treaty. I can only say that the government are in close touch with the situation but obviously, having regard to the political changes which have taken place in the United States during the last few weeks, it is not desirable to enter into any discussion here with regard to a matter of that kind.

CANADIAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): On Friday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked a question with respect to the eastern situation, his question being in the following terms:

What, if any, is the policy of His Majesty's government in Canada in regard to the situation in the far east and to the Lytton report?

Perhaps I can best serve what I conceive to be the public interest by indicating that it is not thought desirable to enter into a discussion at this time with respect to a matter of this kind, for it not only cannot serve the public interest but would be anticipating action that might be taken, and therefore is to be deprecated. In that regard I have the support of the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Right Hon. Sir John Simon, who in dealing with the same matter on the 10th of this month used these words:

It is the greatest possible mistake to suppose that good is done by individual preliminary declarations.

I think that clearly indicates the position of His Majesty's government in Canada, but in view of the fact that many members of the house are greatly interested in this matter and have been asking questions of members of the government, though not in the house, I think it well to direct attention to a few matters that I trust will make the situation somewhat clearer than it is at the moment to some of them.

First, on December 10, 1931, by a resolution of the council of the League of Nations a committee or commission was set up under the chairmanship of the Earl of Lytton, to study on the spot and to report to the council on any circumstance which, affecting international relations, threatened to disturb peace between China and Japan or the good understanding between them upon which peace depended. Secondly, it will be recalled that a special assembly of the League of Nations was called to consider this matter, and at that session a special committee of nineteen members was set up, much like a committee of this house, to consider the report that would be made. Canada is not a member of the council; Canada is not one of the nineteen countries represented on that special committee.

I next observe that the Lytton report was signed in Pekin on September 4 of this year, and submitted to the council of the League of Nations on the first day of October last. Today the council meets to consider the report. It was originally intended that it should sit at an earlier date, but the Japanese government requested that time be given to enable it to file a memorandum with regard to its attitude towards the report. That memorandum has been filed, and a summary of it was delivered to His Majesty's government in Canada today. There are now two courses open: (a) the council of the League of Nations may proceed to consider the Lytton report, or (b) the special committee of nineteen may proceed to consider the report. In any event ultimately the matter will reach the assembly, of which Canada is a member, which presumably will not meet this year.

That is the situation at the present moment. If I were to answer the question as to what is the policy of the government with respect to the Lytton report I would be anticipating what will be the attitude of the government after the assembly meets to consider it and gives this important question careful consideration. And as Sir John Simon pointed out, preliminary declarations prior to discussion, or prior to opportunity being afforded to listen to what is being said by others, if carried to its logical end would of course render the meeting of the assembly wholly unnecessary, because every member would then be confronted with a prior declaration —and the whole purpose of the gathering is to afford opportunities for discussion, for conference, for understanding in order that some way out may be found that will result in a permanent peace in that territory.

May I further, just for one moment, direct the attention of the house to the language of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when speaking on November 10, making the address he did from which I have extracted the section to which I have referred. He said, in addition to what I have already read:

We shall continue to act, as we have acted throughout, in loyal cooperation with the League of Nations on the whole matter. It is the greatest possible mistake to suppose that good is done by individual preliminary declarations. We shall hope to act, we mean to act, with the League of Nations as a whole, and we have a further ground for satisfaction in knowing that, anxious as this situation is, unsatisfactory as it is in many respects, we have in this matter been able to act not only side by side with other members of the League of Nations but in the closest cooperation and good faith with the United States of America.

And, as is known, the United States is not a member of the League of Nations. I think that fairly represents in general terms the attitude of His Majesty's government in Canada. But with respect to the whole Manchurian situation, in view of the inquiry, I desire to point out that copies of the report are in the library—I speak from memory, but I think there are four copies—and I believe that additional copies can be secured at the office of the League of Nations in this city. There are, however, a few words at the end of that report, the concluding paragraphs in fact, which I think indicate clearly the magnitude of the problems that are involved:

Manchuria, for a year past, has been given over to strife and turmoil. The population of a large, fertile and rich country has been subjected to conditions of distress such as it has probably never experienced before. The relations between China and Japan are those of war in disguise, and the future is full of anxiety. We have reported the circumstances which have created these conditions. Everyone is fully aware of the gravity of the problem which confronts the League of Nations and of the difficulties of the solution. At the moment of concluding our report, we read in the press two statements by the foreign ministers of China and Japan, from each of which we would extract one point of the utmost importance.

On August 28, Mr. Lo Wen Kan declared at Nanking:

"China is confident that any reasonable proposal for the settlement of the present situation will necessarily be compatible with the letter and spirit of the covenant of the League of Nations and the anti-war pact, and the nine-power treaty, as well as with China's sovereign power, and will also effectively secure a durable peace in the far east."

On August 30, Count Uchida is reported to have declared at Tokyo:

"The government considers the question of Sino-Japanese relations as more important than the question of Manchuria and Mongolia."

The concluding paragraph of the Lytton report reads:

We cannot close our report more appropriately than by reproducing here the thought underlying these two statements: as exactly does it correspond with the evidence we have collected, with our own study of the problem, and consequently with our own convictions, so confident are we that the policy indicated by these declarations, if promptly and effectively applied, could not fail to lead to a satisfactory solution of the Manchurian question in the best interests of the two great countries of the far east and of humanity in general.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The other day the Prime Minister said that this matter had not been discussed because it was sub judice. Do I understand that there cannot be a discussion in this parliament until the matter is decided by the council of the League of Nations? I confess I am a little mystified in regard to the relationship that exists.

Mr. BENNETT: Our relations to this matter arise primarily from the fact that we are a member of the League of Nations and we must sit on that report and determine what action shall be taken to give effect or otherwise to the recommendations therein contained. It is an elementary rule that those who sit upon matters in a judicial or deliberative sense should not prejudge the case by antecedent public declarations. They may for the purpose of discussion, talk with one another or negotiate a point of view for the purpose of hearing it controverted by someone else; but the broad general rule is that a matter that is sub judice, that is to say, a matter that is being considered by a body charged with authority as is the League of Nations—the assembly—with quasi-judicial powers, if one examines the covenant carefully, should not be the subject of expressions of opinion publicly which would preclude the possibility of that body being able to treat the whole matter with an open mind, not bound by previous declarations.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): How can members of the parliament of Canada express their views if that is the right doctrine?

Mr. BENNETT: They can always express their views in opposition to the view taken by the government and deprive the government of power.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it would be too late.

Mr. BENNETT: But as Sir John Simon has pointed out, if you set up any body—for instance, a board of arbitration—to consider a delicate problem in this country, would it be regarded as sound for the house to discuss the problem in all its bearings before the arbitration was held, and to express opinions, one member after another, as to what the arbitrators should decide? That, I submit, is not the true rule, and once we have attorned to the jurisdiction of the League of Nations it must be taken that we have accepted the principle that that body is the body to determine and pass upon questions that involve international relations as between Canada and other countries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I quite agree with my right hon. friend that this parliament should not take a definite stand on a matter of this kind. But surely the representatives of Canada, at the League of Nations or at any conference which is going to deal with the matter, are entitled to know what the opinions and views are as a result of discussion in the House of Commons, or otherwise. That is quite different from this house taking, by resolution or otherwise, a definite attitude on the question before it is debated and considered by the League of Nations. The members of this Canadian House of Commons, I submit, are certainly entitled to express what in their opinion their representatives there should bring forward as the views of the Canadian pepole.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, even at the risk of asking your indulgence for one moment, I would not suggest at all that the members of the House of Commons might not express any opinion they pleased, but I do say that it is not expedient that it should be done. I say further, beyond all peradventure of doubt, that the government should not make a declaration of policy, when the policy must needs be to some extent governed by considerations that will arise through discussions that will take place by the tribunal which ultimately has to decide the matter. It is one of the great difficulties we have, and all nations have, that being so far away from Geneva, although it is true we can now use the telephone, we are unable to know exactly what transpires from hour to hour, having regard to differences of time—and it is sometimes of the utmost importance that we should. Were I to declare to-day an attitude which is in my mind with respect to some of these matters, it might not only become embarrassing but might render the influence of this dominion absolutely useless so far as the problem itself is concerned, for my antecedent judgment would be upon facts which might be varied by reason of concessions made between powers, or by a new attitude being taken with respect to them. Like all other problems of this kind which are dealt with by tribunals other than the parliament of Canada, the representatives of the countries affected always must accept great responsibilities where they cannot get the fullest possible instructions from their governments. All that can be said is that from the fact that they represent the government, they will, to the extent that it is possible, obtain from the government of the day a clear appreciation of their understanding of the problem and of such modification as may arise by reasons which exist when the problem has to be finally dealt with and which involve, as I have said, negotiations, discussions and sometimes concessions which have to be made by one of the parties to the dispute. Almost any problem is capable of being entirely altered by reason of a changed attitude on the part of those primarily responsible for its solution.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, since we are discussing international matters I should like to take this opportunity to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) whether or not he has any information to give as to when and where the international conference will be held. A rumor has appeared in the press that the conference will not be held at all unless and until Great Britain agrees to return to the gold standard.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have no official advices beyond those which I indicated to the house the other day. So far as I know the conference will be held but it may be that there will be delays consequent upon political appeals. As to the date of meeting, I was not then in position to give the house any idea as to what month it would be, and I cannot do so today.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

OFFICIAL STATUS OF DR. RIDDELL, CANADIAN ADVISORY OFFICER

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an inquiry of the Acting Secretary of State (Sir George Perley) in connection with the recognization which has been accorded to Dr. Riddell at Geneva as the so-called dean of the diplomatic corps. May I say first of all that I would be among the very first to appreciate any recognition given to Dr. Riddell because I believe him to be an excellent officer but I should like to know whether or not the government regards the post which Dr. Riddell holds at Geneva as a diplomatic post. As I understand it, a diplomatic post as considered in international affairs is a post held by one who represents his sovereign and who is accredited by his sovereign to the executive head of some other country. Dr. Riddell's position is that of Canadian advisory officer at the League of Nations; as such it undoubtedly has quasi-diplomatic functions but I question very much whether the government's intention is to consider this position as being of a diplomatic character in the sense in which that term is used as, for example, in the case of ministers and ambassadors who are now resident at Geneva and who are members of the diplomatic corps in the strict meaning of that term.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman knows of course that there has been no change in the position of Dr. Riddell and the observations which he has made are absolutely correct. He is not accredited by one sovereign to another as are several representatives in Geneva, he occupies exactly the position which the right hon. gentleman has indicated, namely Canadian advisory officer. In that sense, he is not a diplomatic agent at all.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

On the orders of the day.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) based on a persistent rumour which has been circulating throughout the country especially among returned men and members of the Canadian Legion. This rumour is that the members of the permanent force who paraded in Ottawa and other cities on Remembrance Day carried rifles and had been issued ammunition and side arms. I should like to know if such an order was given by the minister or his department, and, if so, why was the order given?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I shall consider this as a notice of question by my hon. friend.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have another question to direct to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), whose department, I understand, has charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is reported that on Remembrance Day the Royal Canadian Mounted Police paraded to the services held in Ottawa and other cities armed with rifles or revolvers and supplied with ammunition. I should like to know if this rumour is correct and, if so, why was the order issued?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I shall have to make inquiry before I answer the question. I presume these men appeared in the correct uniforms and accoutrements for such an occasion.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was not referring to the uniform, I was referring to the arms.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall ascertain definitely in connection with the arms and give an answer to the question.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

The house resumed from Friday, November 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom —Mr. Bennett.—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

On article 12.

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake forthwith to constitute the tariff board for which provision is made in the Tariff Board Act, 1931.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the government just when it is intended to appoint this board and if it is possible to indicate the probable personnel?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman would be the first to say that it would be quite impossible to indicate who the probable appointees will be. Last summer when it became apparent that we would have to consider matters of the character contained in these agreements, the government concluded that it was undesirable to appoint this tariff board until after the economic conference. I can assure the committee that we are endeavouring to obtain the services of men whom we consider will be qualified in every sense to discharge what we conceive to be a very difficult task.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the Prime Minister will not mind my pointing out to him the fact that since his administration came into office the tariff has been revised several times and is now at a point where I imagine it would not be possible to do very much more by way of an increase. Any real purpose which the tariff board might have served has, I believe, gone by, but I should like to know whether or not the Prime Minister will undertake to say that before further increases are recommended the tariff board will be given an opportunity to consider and report upon such increases.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid one could hardly make that promise, for reasons which I am quite certain the right hon. gentleman understands more thoroughly than most. A situation might arise which would require action, as has happened in the past. The right hon. gentleman probably will say that we will still have section 43, but I do not think it is quite apt to suggest that we give an undertaking of this character.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the constitution of this board will the Prime Minister be prepared to see that different political views are represented in the personnel? As my right hon. friend is aware, on the board constituted by the United States government to deal with such matters the different political parties are represented. If this board is to be appointed for a term of years it would seem only reasonable that some representation should be given to the different political points of view. I would ask my right hon. friend if he is prepared to consider granting or will grant that form of recognition.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman will remember that when the Tariff Board Act was under consideration as a bill, the point to which he now directs attention was referred to by him and other hon. members on that as well as on this side of the house. The United States tariff board is, of course, a much larger one than ours. At the moment our board is composed of three, the chairman and two members. Having regard to the size of this country, as I pointed out when we were dealing with the bill, I am sure it will be desirable to endeavour to secure representation from other than one part of the country, and if it is at all possible, having regard to conditions, to ensure that other than one school of thought, for instance, is represented on the board, we shall do so, but I shall try to avoid purely political considerations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might draw my right hon. friend's attention to the further fact that under this agreement the character of the tariff board is being altered in one material factor. It is being given a judicial function such as has not hitherto been contemplated. That affords a still further reason why care should be taken in the appointment of the personnel to see that whoever may be selected are at least persons not too biased in their political opinions.

Mr. BENNETT: I have great hopes that I may be able to secure encomiums from hon. gentlemen opposite on the appointments which will be made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope my right hon. friend will have better success than was the case in the appointment of the radio board.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought my hon. friend would say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend knew I had to say it. That is the result of a guilty conscience, I am afraid. Leaving that aside, may I ask whether there will be any necessity of amending the law creating the tariff board for the purpose of meeting the requirements of this agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: It is thought and, I believe, correctly, that with this agreement ratified in the form in which it is, the only change that may have to be made in the tariff board will be to provide more ample compensation to whoever may become members of it. That is the real difficulty. May I say this with respect to the radio board: the chairman of that board certainly cannot be charged with being a politician.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not speaking about that point.

Mr. BENNETT: The civil servant who was selected for the position is a gentleman who, if he votes at all, has, so far as I know no politics; at least he has not manifested any. The appointment to which the hon. member takes great exception was made from Quebec. It is true the gentleman was interested in political matters but his life has not been lived in a political atmosphere. He was a professional man of, I think one might say, very high reputation. He was engaged by the present Liberal administration for forestry work. He has had a fine training and career so far as that work is concerned. He has lived much outdoors. He has an excellent education and he is at any rate regarded as a fair-minded man. The fact that at one time he was mixed up in an election by being a candidate and assisting his party to organize is of course a factor that gives my hon. friend an opportunity to criticize. I am not complaining of my hon. friend's criticism, but I think he will find that this gentleman, in the discharge of his duties, will be eminently fair, because in the long career he had in administering a very difficult act in connection with forestry operations in Quebec, he did work for the government headed by Mr. Taschereau, was paid large sums of money per annum for doing it and had to adjust very delicate differences.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not a cheap man in any sense. He had a fine professional reputation and he was paid large sums of money for the service he rendered. He adjusted delicate differences between lease holders and crown holders, I think to the satisfaction of the persons concerned, and the government. He was highly spoken of by those best able to express an opinion. The fact that he was interested in one election—

Mr. LAPOINTE: More than one.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, let us say several elections—should not debar him from a public position, because I think he realizes that if he can in any respect be charged with political activities, he would forfeit the position he holds.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say a word on this matter, Mr. Chairman? I realize this has not much to do with the clause at present under discussion, but still I cannot let it go without a word. I have nothing personally against the gentleman. He had contracts from the Quebec government no doubt, and as my right hon. friend says, earned large sums of money; but he quarrelled with them and became the organizer of the Conservative party. Not only was he a candidate but he was chief organizer of the Conservative party for the Quebec district during many election campaigns. I have no quarrel with the government giving him a position of some kind, but as regards the radio board last year we agreed unanimously that political considerations should be eliminated altogether. He is there to represent an important section of the community, a section which is a little apart as regards certain functions of radio broadcasting, and we certainly hoped that the man who would be appointed would carry the confidence of the whole community. I am sorry that the government has appointed a man, who, however honourable he may be, has been so closely identified with one political party in Canada. That is all.

Mr. BENNETT: I should just like to mention to my hon. friend, because it is a fact known to Mr. Maher himself, that a certain well known professional gentleman in Quebec was not able to accept the position, because the salary was wholly inadequate as compared with what he is now securing.

Item agreed to.

On article 13:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that on the request of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom they will cause a review to be made by the tariff board as soon as practicable of the duties charged on any commodities specified in such request in accordance with the principles laid down in article 11 hereof and that after the receipt of the report of the tariff board thereon such report shall be laid before parliament and parliament shall be invited to vary wherever necessary the tariff on such commodities of United Kingdom origin in such manner as to give effect to such principles.

Mr. POULIOT: With regard to references to the tariff board, may I direct attention to Hansard of November 15, 1932, at page 1169 with regard to cocoa butter. I have received a letter of protest from a Toronto manufacturer, Mr. J. Wardropper, managing director of Rowntree Company, Limited. This letter, which is dated Toronto 3, November 17, 1932, reads:

I have just received a copy of the record of the House of Commons debate for Tuesday, November 15, 1932, and note from page 1242 of the records that you seized the opportunity to poke fun deservedly at the Prime Minister's suggested ways and means by which he could increase his already large interest in the manufacturing industries of Hull.

I notice that you also took considerable time of the house to explain the movements of international trade in cocoa butter. It is rather galling to me, a manufacturer, to find that a member of the House of Commons can get on his feet and inform the house that cocoa butter is derived from the cocoanut.

How can we get intelligent action upon affairs concerning our industry when such misstatements are made apparently in all seriousness.

May I teach something to the manufacturer of that commodity. There is no "cocoa butter"; there is cacao butter. If I said "cocoa butter" it was just to see if one of the hecklers on the other side of the house would correct me. As they did not, I will tell them and Mr. Wardropper that they are cocoanuts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that in this article the word "invited" is used, and it is used several times elsewhere throughout the agreement. In the other articles where it has been stated that the government would be invited to do so and so, the interpretation placed upon the phrase has been that the government would do so and so; in other words that it was part of the agreement and that the phrase meant they shall do so and so. I ask if that is the construction to be placed upon the expression, "shall be invited to vary wherever necessary" and whether those words are applicable to whatever the tariff board may recommend to parliament under this particular article.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is perhaps more fully aware than I am that it is always difficult to choose words which will not indicate that the body to which they are directed is in any sense being coerced, although sometimes it has been suggested that that was so in this case. What happened was that the word "invited" was said by the leading legal member of the British delegation to be the appropriate term to use in a case of this character. I looked it up very hurriedly and was quite satisfied that the word used expressed the proper shade of meaning, when you indicate that a power is conferred to enable a function to be discharged. I think that is as far as I can usefully go in an endeavour to define the term, because the context more or less determines the exact shade of meaning to be given to the word as used. For instance, it might be given a different meaning in one paragraph than it has in another, by reason of surrounding context. In a general way, however, it indicates that power is conferred for the purpose of enabling a function delegated or imposed upon a body to be discharged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the Prime Minister has given us an interpretation, because the leading legal member of the British delegation to whom he referred, would as I understand it, be the Right Hon. Lord Hailsham. I read the remarks of Lord Hailsham delivered at Calgary, and it seemed to me they went much farther with respect to the authority which this tariff board will have than the right hon. gentleman is prepared to go at the moment. If I understood them correctly Lord Hailsham's remarks were to the effect that the tariff board would be a judicial body, that its decisions would be more or less binding upon the government of the day and that it would be the duty of the government to see that whatever decision the tariff board gave should be implemented by parliament. I submit any view of that kind is wholly subversive of the rights of parliament, as we understand them, and as we would wish to maintain them. Certainly those of us on this side of the house would not countenance them for one minute.

As hon. members know there has been an effort time and again, more particularly in the House of Commons, to substitute for parliament in the right of framing a tariff some board which would have judicial or quasi judicial functions. That attitude has been persistently and consistently resisted by the Liberal party whenever it has been proposed in the past. It will be opposed with equal persistence and consistency in the future. We cannot for one moment agree that any tribunal of any character can be established with authority in any way to determine what is to be the tariff of the country, any more than any such tribunal would be permitted to have authority to determine any other tax which should be imposed upon the people of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to state clearly that so far as the Liberal party is concerned, it is not prepared to place upon this section the interpretation which, if I have read his remarks correctly, Lord Hailsham has placed upon it. I am not in agreement with his view of the obligations imposed upon the government of the day as a result of powers given to the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, if the right hon. gentleman will be good enough to re-read the paragraph, coupled with the statement of the powers of the tariff board, he will have no difficulty whatever. The tariff board is a fact finding body. I think there was a general agreement in this house and, for that matter, at the conference that we could not substitute for parliament and its powers another body created by it. I can recall very clearly asking that the Tariff Board Act be carefully read by those who were concerned in its operation, and who were representing the United Kingdom. The Australian act, in a particular and general way will be, if it is not at the moment, clothed with practically similar powers. That may be said with respect to others as well. There is no intention to substitute for the powers of parliament those of a tariff board, it being a fact finding body only. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman may recall that from the discussion which took place in this house I heard Lord Hailsham's speech in Calgary and certainly I did not conclude from it that he had made any statement such as the right hon. gentleman has outlined. Perhaps the ex-Minister of Justice, who was also there, will bear me out in my statement. I did not conclude that Lord Hailsham was suggesting that the tariff board was to be substituted for parliament.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the facts as found by that tariff board be presented to parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: It would appear that the hon. member has not bothered to read the paragraph, because it states that they shall make a report to parliament. It was felt that that was essential so that public opinion might crystallize, if it is thought desirable, in one way or another. Therefore the report is to be laid before parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can tell the house whether or not the proposed tariff board will determine the exact percentage of protection which may be granted to any given industry?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a question which I am afraid I cannot answer. That is not the purpose of the tariff board. Its powers are mentioned in the statute, and there is added to it this additional provision, "that such report shall be laid before parliament and parliament shall be invited" to do so and so.

Mr. HEAPS: Article 13 states:

> Such report shall be laid before parliament and parliament shall be invited to vary wherever necessary the tariff on such commodities.

And so on. In other words, the board will determine whether a tariff should be varied or not. I was wondering whether they could say a percentage would be 10, 15 or 20 as the case might be?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of recommendation. They do not recommend to parliament; they make findings of fact.

Mr. HEAPS: They will say whether a tariff is too high or too low?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must not place in my mouth words I did not use. I did not say that, and that is not what the act says. The tariff board shall ascertain the facts, as they must be found under the provisions of the Tariff Board Act, and upon that parliament will be invited to take such action as the section indicates.

Mr. HEAPS: Then if I may go a little further, its function will be somewhat similar to that of the old tariff board that was in existence until about a year ago?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Article 13 says that the government of Canada as soon as practicable will cause a review to be made of the duties charged on any commodities specified in such request in accordance with the principles laid down in article 11. Article 11 says:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that during the currency of this agreement the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition . . .

The question I want to ask is, suppose the tariff board arrives at a conclusion as to what is a proper tariff to give the United Kingdom producer full opportunity of reasonable competition in Canada, is the government in duty bound to put that recommendation into effect?

Mr. BENNETT: The section says that they will be invited to take such action as may be appropriate. The government of the day is not bound by the report, except as to the finding of facts. It will have the report of the board; the extent to which it will be necessary to vary the tariff to effect the purpose is a matter entirely within the discretion of the government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does not that bind the government?

Mr. BENNETT: It binds it for one purpose, as I said the other evening, on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed what will give a fair opportunity to the United Kingdom producer to compete with the Canadian producer. Fair opportunity is the basis.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Who is to be the judge of the United Kingdom producer being given a fair opportunity?

Mr. BENNETT: The government of the day must assume that responsibility, based upon the finding of facts by the tariff board. I tried to make that abundantly clear; the tariff board is a fact finding body. It reports on facts. Then the government has said that on the statement of facts so found it will apply the protective principle only to the extent of giving reasonable opportunity of fair competition.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is the tariff board expected to make some recommendation as to whether or not the duties exceed such a level as will give reasonable opportunity for fair competition?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not my understanding of what the tariff board is to find. It will find facts and facts only, and on those facts the government has pledged itself that it will act in a given way.

Mr. EULER: I do not desire to criticize the Prime Minister with regard to his interpretation of the duties of the tariff board, but I think he will admit that from the very circumstances of the case the tariff board is almost obliged to recommend certain action based upon the facts which they have ascertained. Because they will be the only ones who will have the knowledge and information upon which the government can act. The Prime Minister says that the tariff board is only intended to ascertain facts; quite right. But having those facts, who but the board itself can judge what action should be taken? I do not see how the Minister of Finance or the government, after certain facts have been ascertained by this board, can do other than take them as indicative of a certain rate of tariff. Take for example woollens; in order to give the British producer a fair opportunity in the Canadian market, the board make certain investigations, they must of necessity decide whether 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 per cent protection is sufficient to protect the Canadian industry. I do not see how the board could present those facts to the government in any other form than some sort of, call it recommendation if you like, some sort of suggestion at least as to whether the present or a different rate of duty on these goods is correct. I rather think that the Prime Minister is not quite fair to himself nor to the intention of the government when he says that there will be nothing by way of recommendation by the board. I quite admit that in the final analysis the government and parliament itself will have to come to the decision upon the matter. But I fancy that if this thing is going to be practicable the tariff board, as the only body which can have the necessary information, will make some pretty definite recommendations —you might as well use that word—as to what the rate should be.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what they should not do.

Mr. EULER: How are you going to get out of it?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly as the law provides. Section 4, subsection 6, reads:

Inquiries under this section shall be conducted in a summary manner in public, except as otherwise expressly provided in this or any other act of the parliament of Canada, and the respective reports to be made pursuant to its provisions shall succinctly state the facts so ascertained; and each report shall be accompanied by a copy of the evidence, if any, taken, and by a copy of all information obtained in connection with the inquiry.

Mr. EULER: What would be the nature of these facts?

Mr. BENNETT: The facts brought to the attention of the board by those who ask for change in the existing tariff. Let us be practical about it.

Mr. EULER: Let us imagine a concrete case. Take the British manufacturers of woollens coming to Canada and making certain requests for reductions; I would like to know just what the tariff board would say to the government. What could they say other than that the tariff is too high or too low, by so much? I do not see how any other intelligent use could be made of the board. If the government does not agree with the board that the tariff should be increased or reduced by so much per cent they will simply not accept its recommendation. But, to be practical about it, I believe that the government is pretty nearly in the position of being obliged to ask that board what the decrease or increase should be. Call it recommendation if you like, I think that is what it amounts to, if you are going to make it work and have any teeth at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The last sentence of the hon. gentleman contains an expression used so often by hon. members without any regard to what it means.

Mr. EULER: Which is that?

Mr. BENNETT: "Teeth". This is a fact finding body. We are not now considering the tariff act; it was passed last year, after long discussion. But I will deal with the case put by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), the case of a certain type of woollen goods; it is contended by the applicants that the duty is excessive. They then proceed to lay their case before the tariff board, to produce evidence and show what costs of production are, and that the tariff affords more than ample protection to enable their competitors in Canada to maintain efficient production.

Mr. EULER: Will the board not say, how much more?

Mr. BENNETT: Wait a minute. The Canadian producer proceeds to show his costs of production under efficient management and with efficient machinery. Then it is for the board to report those facts. It is only a matter of arithmetic for the government to determine what will give equality of opportunity and fair competition. But it is not the board's function to recommend that a certain duty be imposed.

I can however, conceive of a case arising in which they would have to find as a fact what the hon. gentleman suggests. If for instance, the applicant asked that the duty be reduced from 35 to 25 per cent and laid his case on the basis of 25 per cent being ample, the board has then to find whether or not a duty of 25 per cent was ample to meet the requirements of the statute, and if it found as a fact that it was, it would have no right to make a recommendation that the government should reduce the duty; that discretion rests with the administration of the day. But the board finds the facts, and it might in the case which I have just given find as a fact that a given rate of duty was sufficient for the purpose. It will be recalled that when we had the statute itself under consideration I produced half a dozen cases from the files of the American court and showed how they had prepared and laid their cases, and where the application had been to reduce the duty to a given figure how they had found as a fact that that would be sufficient to effect the purpose they had in mind.

Mr. EULER: I do not want to carry the matter further, but I think there is a distinction without a difference. If the board finds that a rate of 25 per cent is sufficient for the purpose required, I imagine that if the government acted upon that finding they would have taken it as a recommendation, whether or not you call it that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to ask just how the board are to determine the facts. Supposing two contrary arguments are presented before the board, one by a British cotton manufacturer and the other by a Canadian cotton manufacturer. In order to determine whether the arguments are facts will the board have authority to send men perhaps to England to determine the factors entering into the question?

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that the tariff board is to be used as indicated in this agreement does not in any sense add to or detract from its powers. The questions that now are being asked are questions that were asked last year when the bill was under consideration. This is not a discussion as to the merits or demerits of the Tariff Board Act. The hon. gentleman must realize that when judges decide questions they do so on the evidence submitted, and that evidence is given under oath. This board is a judicial body charged with the responsibility of determining facts on the evidence submitted by the applicant or, it may be, submitted on the part of others, and the finding of facts, of course, must be predicated upon the evidence which it is the duty of those who use the tribunal to submit to it. That was all discussed when the statute itself was under consideration. This agreement is merely an indication that this body, now existent, is to be used for the purposes indicated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If it is found by the tariff board that the duties do exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition, will the government introduce and submit to parliament legislation giving effect to that finding?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter which the government must consider.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The tariff board may find as a fact that duties do exceed such a level as will permit United Kingdom producers full opportunity of competition and, if they feel so disposed, the government may pay no attention to that finding of fact at all. Is that what I understand from the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. BENNETT: No, neither is that a correct statement. If the fact sought to be established by the applicant is that a given rate of duty is higher than is necessary to provide for fair competition and equal opportunity, then conceivably the board might find that fact. That is the fact which is reported to the government and to parliament, and the government then undertake to invite parliament to take such action as may be necessary to give effect to the principles mentioned by the hon. member for Provencher in connection with the preceding article.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the hon. member for North Waterloo is quite right in his submission that in effect there is a finding by the tariff board of the rate of duty which should be charged. It may not be a recommendation; it is not a recommendation according to the statute. It is a conclusion, but in reading article 11 it seems plain that this article must have been worded in conformity with the Tariff Board Act. Article 11, taken with article 13, provides in effect that the investigation shall be made as to the relative cost of economical and efficient production. According to section 4 (b), the Tariff Board Act empowers the board to make inquiry as to:

—the cost of efficient production in Canada and elsewhere, and what increases or decreases in rates of duty are required to equalize differences in the cost of efficient production.

I submit that what the board does, as the right hon. Prime Minister suggests, is find as a matter of fact what actual duties are necessary to equalize that cost of production. Having done that it seems to me there is not very much left for the government to do but at least bring in the legislation based upon that finding, containing those very figures. So in the end the result is that the tariff board does make a finding at least, if not a recommendation, on which action is taken under article 13; really therefore, it is the tariff board which determines what action shall be taken under that article.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It does seem to me that, without repeating the definition given by the hon. member for North Waterloo, the actual result must be as he has said. What will be the main fact to be ascertained by this tribunal? It must ascertain the percentage of difference which exists between the cost of production in Britain on the one hand and in Canada on the other, and that percentage will be the amount of tariff necessary to equalize the opportunities of both. It does seem to me that the basic and essential fact the board will be called upon to ascertain and determine will be that percentage of difference, which in effect is the rate of tariff necessary to equalize the opportunities of competition. If the government disagrees with that report and says those percentages are not correct, or if it declines to act upon the recommendation even though the percentages are correct, then it seems to me the government must take responsibility for its refusal. So far as action itself is concerned, however, it does seem to me that the fact to be ascertained will be the actual rate of duty which must be put into effect.

Mr. BENNETT: The section of the act to which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth referred, and which is being discussed by the hon. member for Red Deer, must be considered in relation to subsection (2) of section 4.

Mr. RALSTON: I referred to subsection (b) of section 4.

Mr. BENNETT: That has relation to the cost of efficient production in Canada and elsewhere, and what rates of duty are required to equalize those costs. That is one of many factors. Subsection (2) reads:

The board shall make inquiry into any other matter, upon which the minister desires information, in relation to any goods which, if brought into Canada or produced in Canada, are subject to or exempt from duties of customs or excise, and shall report to the minister, and the inquiry into any such matter may include inquiry as to the effect which an increase or decrease of the existing rate of duty upon a given commodity might have upon industry or trade, and the extent to which the consumer is protected from exploitation.

That is also part of the same section. I think it is fair to say that if the hon. member for North Waterloo merely means that the tariff board is seized with jurisdiction and power to find as a fact that a 10 per cent increase in duty would effect a certain purpose, or that the application to reduce the duty from 35 per cent to 25 per cent would bring about the result at which the statute aims, that jurisdiction and power clearly are there. I do not think there is any doubt as to that, but I was endeavouring to make clear that this board does not make a recommendation. The hon. member for North Waterloo says it is a distinction without a difference, but I will tell him why that distinction was observed both here and in the United States. It was for the very reason mentioned by the right hon. leader of the opposition, namely so as to not place within the power of this body jurisdiction to recommend a given rate of tariff or duty. They find as a fact that a 20 per cent duty would do so and so, or that a 30 per cent duty would do so and so. Then it is for the government to act upon it, as the hon. gentleman has said; and we do know that as a matter of fact, in half a dozen cases in the United States, no action was taken.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is absolutely correct; but it appears to me that article 11 of the agreement does somewhat affect the terms of the general act itself, because it limits the circumference of the work of the board, so to speak, to one point. It is focussed on one point in article 11, and in that it is differentiated from the general act under which the tariff board will be appointed. That one point is the percentage of duty which is intended to do one certain thing and nothing else, namely, to equalize the costs as between the two countries, and it eliminates from review, in dealing with these articles, all other considerations which are found in the Tariff Board Act.

[Mr. Ralston.]

It focusses attention upon and confines the duty of the board to the one point, the percentage of difference which may exist between actual costs of production in one country and actual costs in the other, and upon the actual percentage which will equalize these conditions and make for reasonable competition. It does modify the Tariff Board Act itself inasmuch as it eliminates from review all other considerations, and does focus the attention of the tribunal, in this regard, on that one point alone.

Mr. BENNETT: Percentage is not mentioned in article 11.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to refer again to a question I brought up the other night in regard to the latter part of the last clause of article 11, which is incorporated as one of the principles referred to in article 13. It is set out in article 11 that, although His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give United Kingdom producers full opportunity of reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production, the following proviso shall be operative:

Provided that in the application of such principle special consideration may be given to the case of industries not fully established.

On Friday night I asked the principles on which that special consideration would be given, and although I did not ask by whom, I was given the answer. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said, in reply to my question:

I have already intimated that the test will be applied by the tariff board under the principles clearly set forth in the Tariff Board Act.

Having looked at the Tariff Board Act, and having read article 13, I doubt whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce was correct; I am inclined to think that he was misinformed or misapprehended my question. Is not the special consideration, which is to be given there, special consideration by the government, having regard to the facts found by the tariff board, rather than special consideration by the tariff board itself?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will observe that the principle on which that article is applied is reasonable competition on the basis of the relative cost of economical and efficient production. It will be applied by the board. I should not think it would make much difference in actual practice because it would have to be presented to the board in any event whether the industry was firmly established or only a newly established industry. I should think it would not be a very important matter, in a broad and general way, speaking of conditions as they are, but it was put there to protect this situation. I could tell the hon. gentleman of industries —I have not a list of them at the moment— that have come into this country during the last ten years on the tariff as it was.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The silk industry.

Mr. BENNETT: Silk is one of them, as my hon. friend from Lincoln reminds me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You don't suggest it needs more protection?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but it came into the country on the basis of the tariff and was so established. At the time we had a very small investment and now we have millions of dollars, and that proviso was added to the article in question so as to preclude the possibility of bad faith being imputed to parliament when, by reason of the existing tariff arrangement, an industry was established in which millions of dollars have been invested. An application to lower duties would be successfully met by the application of the principle that special consideration may be given the case of industries not fully established. The finding of fact would be that this industry had not been fully established and special consideration would therefore be given to it. The government would deal with the facts as found.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the special consideration is really given by the government rather than by the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of law, it would be open to both interpretations.

Mr. RALSTON: But in practice.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, in practice, in the first instance, it would be applied by the board and secondly by the government. Both must exercise that power, because the finding of fact would be that this was a new industry and was therefore entitled to special consideration.

Mr. CHAPLIN: May I point out that the silk industry was established in Canada quite recently, during the period that the late government was in office. They were the ones that imposed the tariff on artificial silk; they are the people that built up the industry. I just want to call that to the attention of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the Prime Minister tell us when an industry may be said to be fully established?

Mr. BENNETT: That question was discussed the other evening and I do not intend to traverse it again; there are rules of the house which would forbid my doing so. It was fully discussed. The hon. gentleman is a great reader, and I might refer him to what John Stuart Mill said on that subject. He would find it much more interesting than any observations I might make and, moreover, he would regard it as much more authoritative.

Mr. YOUNG: Would it not be possible for any industry which the tariff board might find to be inefficient to make the plea that it was not fully established?

Mr. BENNETT: It would be possible for the hon. gentleman to contend that he was a strong protectionist. It is always possible to make any contention. Those of us who have listened to the hon. member realize how fully and amply he can develop any suggestion and with what strength of conviction he can express his views.

Mr. YOUNG: But I would not have as much influence with the government as some of these industries have.

Mr. BENNETT: I should hope not, for in one instance we are endeavouring to build up the country, whereas in the other the endeavour is to destroy it.

Mr. YOUNG: Not at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit; it is a matter of fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government will give to Canadian interests the same undertaking that has been given the British government with respect to the right to appear before the tariff board. Article 13 reads in part:

> His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that on the request of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom they will cause a review to be made by the tariff board . . .

As I recollect the provisions of the Tariff Board Act, and what was said at the time that measure was under discussion, the effect was that no matter would be referred to the board, so far as Canada was concerned, except at the instance of the Minister of Finance; in other words, the discretion rested with the Minister of Finance as to whether an application for review would be passed on to the tariff board. That is quite different from what is being done in relation to British industries. With respect to British industries, this provision makes it mandatory upon the board to have a review of any matters which the British government may request to have reviewed. If I am wrong in that I should like to be so advised.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman realizes, I think that so far as we are concerned we entered into an agreement. It has already been said that duties are highly protective—too high according to the hon. member for Weyburn and others. We say we have made changes in these tariffs ourselves and reduced them, but will leave the matter to be settled by the board; and the government of the country affected, namely, the United Kingdom, will make a request of us. We will honour that request because we have every confidence that it will be made on the sound business principles which govern the requests from one government to another country. It will be recalled that last year when we were discussing this matter the question arose as to the right of audience of those who might desire to be present merely for irritation purposes. This section contemplates information, not irritation and a distinction is made between the requests of a government and the requests of irresponsible parties. I think the right hon. gentleman will realize that when you are dealing with governments you are dealing with bodies which will not needlessly take up time or cause expense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the Prime Minister has just said might have come more appropriately from someone who has not so definitely and strongly advocated a Canada first doctrine. I cannot see why Canadian interests should not have equal rights with British interests before the tariff board, whether or not those rights have to be exercised via the British government or by any other route. This section clearly gives to British industries a right which may be denied to Canadian industries or to different classes vitally interested in Canada. For example, should an organization representing the agricultural interests of Canada wish to make application to have certain customs duties reviewed there is no undertaking whatever by the government that its request would ever reach the board. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada might ask that certain duties should be reviewed—there is no undertaking on the part of the government that the matter so requested would be referred to the board for investigation and report. Such an undertaking is however, given in connection with requests received from British industries through the British government. This is an unfair discrimination in favour of industries in Great Britain as against our own and in favour of interests in Great Britain as against the interests of the Canadian public and the Canadian consumer.

Might I direct attention to another objection which I have to this section. The article states that when any matter is investigated by the board, they shall deal with it in accordance with the principles laid down in article 11. The study of article 11 makes it pretty clear that the business of the board is to keep the protective principle in the tariff. Article 11 reads:

> His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that during the currency of this agreement the tariff shall be based on the principle that protective duties shall not exceed such a level as will give . . .

And so on.

I venture to say that any duty which is not absolutely prohibitive will be regarded by parties who so wish to regard it as being in the nature of a competitive duty. If there is a very thin margin between what is completely prohibitive and what is not, that would be considered as permitting competition and thus as bringing the situation within the principle which this board is to maintain with respect to the tariff. The purpose of this article is to give rigidity and fixity to high tariffs, and as such I am strongly opposed to its provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: The British government makes application to the government of Canada that the board shall deal with an application on behalf of, we will say the woollen industry, to reduce the tariff from one rate to another. The consumer in Canada applies to the Minister of Finance to ask that the board shall consider a certain matter. There is an undertaking in this agreement on the part of the Canadian government that it will refer to the board a request received, not from a British manufacturer, but from the British government. It does not follow that because a British manufacturer asks the British government to do this, the government will. That matter was clearly discussed. The British government has some idea of what is involved in the way of expense and of the serious character of these hearings and the effect they will have upon industry. As far as Canadian applications are concerned, very often they are purely for the purpose of irritation. I use that word deliberately because I happen to know of some of the applications made to the Minister of Finance under my right hon.

friend's administration. Some of those applications were made purely for the purpose of causing annoyance. The Minister of Finance must take his chance in this house of refusing or granting an application. The Canada first doctrine applies here if it ever applied anywhere. A Canadian makes his application to his Minister of Finance who is asked in the house, "Did you receive such an application?" He replies, "I did", and he is then asked, "Did you grant it?" He says, "No", and he is then at the bar of public opinion as far as deciding whether or not this government was sound in the position which it took. So far as concerns the procedure in dealing with a government which has made the concession of free entry of the entire products and commodities of this country, manufactured or otherwise, the British government will, first of all, determine whether or not it shall accept the responsibility of sending forward a request from a manufacturer. If it thinks well of that request and makes it with all the responsibilities which are involved, this government will afford an opportunity of a hearing before the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask one further question in connection with the effect which in practice it will really be possible for the tariff board to give the provisions of this article, having regard to the business generally of a tariff board. The Prime Minister has some knowledge of the length of time it takes to investigate technical matters, particularly where those matters refer to conditions which exist in other parts of the world as well as in Canada. Will it be humanly possible for any tariff board which is appointed to do more than review a very few items in the tariff in the course of a year? Unless it is, this provision becomes largely meaningless as rendering any kind of advantage to those who may seek to have these applications placed before the board for review. There was some discussion recently in connection with what had taken place in the United States under a similar provision in the act governing the tariff board of that country, and a statement was made of an authoritative character to the effect that during the two years the United States tariff commission had been investigating commodities, only seventy-three out of thousands had been investigated. The commission had been working morning, noon and night and that was the sum total of their efforts during two years. Among the articles investigated were pipe-organs, peppers, egg plants and bicycle bells. A careful estimate had shown that if the tariff commission of the United States undertook to complete its examination of the schedule, it would take until the year 2005. I shall drop the five but, shall venture to say that it will take to the year 2000 for any tariff board to go through our tariff schedule and investigate its items one by one. I believe this clause will be largely meaningless or fruitless in practice.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the right hon. gentleman knows that it is not contemplated that the items in the tariff shall be taken up and investigated one by one. That is the reason why this agreement provides that the request for a hearing shall come from the British government. It is obvious that the British government with its sense of responsibility will limit the requests to matters which it believes to be of such importance as to warrant action being taken. That is the reason why I explained to the house last year that we were limiting applications to those upon which the Minister of Finance would pass. That was provided in the measure under consideration last year, it was provided that it should be a summary application. I venture to suggest that in a single week many, many cases will be disposed of. Once notice is given and application had of the matter to be reviewed, the summary disposal of the matter will narrow things down. If it is so desired, these matters can be dealt with great rapidity. I am bound to say that I do not contemplate the kind of hearing which took place under the former tariff board; I may be wrong, but that is not the sort of thing I contemplate will happen. In any event all this discussion might, I think, properly be said to have been anticipated last year when we were dealing with the tariff board itself, and I have still sufficient confidence to believe that the people who are responsible for making applications will not make them needlessly. The British government will make them carefully and after much consideration and they will be disposed of with great rapidity in a summary manner.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not see very much difficulty about articles 11 and 13. I think the cast iron provisions that are contained in the tariff legislation will prevent any board of any kind from at least reducing the tariff very materially. As for the British manufacturer who goes to the British government and convinces them that he has a case against the Canadian industry whereupon they in turn consult with the Canadian government and get the latter to believe they have a case, ths manufacturer will be dead and buried about ten years before there are any results.

Mr. BENNETT: O, ye of little faith!

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think the article will do any harm to anybody; we can depend upon it that it will certainly do no harm to the Canadian manufacturer. He will enjoy for at least five years the duties fixed in the schedule now in force under the agreement. There seems to be a great deal of care taken to protect Canadian manufacturers; they are one group of gentlemen in Canada who to the fullest extent enjoy special privilege by legislation, and every means that can be devised to protect them, whereas those who are not so fortunate as to be engaged in those industries must take their chances. I suppose this will always continue to be so.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot conceive of anybody going to the expense and trouble of carrying a case to the tariff board merely for the sake of irritating the Minister of Finance. I think the Prime Minister's statement that such was the case deserves a little explanation.

Mr. BENNETT: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: We want to know who did that.

Mr. BENNETT: Conscience makes cowards of us all.

Mr. YOUNG: Conscience does not make cowards of us all. We want to know who is meant.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say the Minister of Finance; I said for the purpose of irritation.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister also said: "Conscience makes cowards of us all." I should like to know who are the cowards. He will not tell us.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to make an observation in connection with the composition of the tariff board. In the House of Commons in Great Britain when this question was being discussed, Mr. J. H. Thomas, Secretary for the Dominions, said that the tariff would be on the basis of raw material, social service, wages, standard of living, capital expenditure and overhead. On Friday we had a great deal of discussion about textiles; much loose talk and suppositious facts and figures were bandied around with respect to wages and working conditions in Great Britain as well as in Canada. In this country we have probably reached a far higher degree of mass production than they have in the old country and when wages in this dominion are being discussed, that fact should be taken into consideration. The thought passes through my mind that this is possibly the first time—and I stand subject to correction—that wages and standards of living will enter into discussions before the tariff board. Therefore I would suggest to the government that in the composition of this board, the vital factors in the life of this country be considered, such as agriculture, labour. I do not know of any other two great forces in this country more interested in the proper composition of the tariff board unless possibly the consumer and the manufacturer. If this board is going to do the work planned for it, these vital factors should be represented in its personnel.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under protest.

On article 14:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that no existing duty shall be increased on United Kingdom goods except after an inquiry and the receipt of a report from the tariff board, and in accordance with the facts as found by that body.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is asking us to countenance a principle to which, unless the House of Commons is prepared to surrender wholly its control over fiscal policy, it will not submit for a moment. It is quite true the article has been drafted in this case so as to apply to any increase of tariffs, but once the House of Commons has approved the principle of acting only at the instance of a tariff board and in accordance with its recommendations, we shall find that on some other convenient occasion a clause similarly worded will be introduced into the house, and the only difference between it and this article will be that instead of the word "increase" there will be the word "decrease," so we shall then discover we are committed on principle not to decrease any duty of any kind unless first of all the item has been referred to a tariff board and the board has reported upon it. Then we shall be asked to act in accordance with the facts as found by that body. That is a principle with which I do not believe anyone on this side of the house would agree for a moment, and I should be very much amazed if hon. gentlemen opposite would agree to it because it is a thoroughly unsound and untenable position to seek to maintain.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think my right hon. friend is too serious about that. Let us look at the matter for a moment. My right hon. friend and the hon. member for Weyburn say that they are opposed to these agreements because they have increased the tariff; they say that tariffs in Canada are so high that even to think of increasing them is impossible. We are saying now that we shall not increase them against Great Britain unless the tariff board finds facts that warrant such action being taken. In other words, we have met the views of hon. gentlemen opposite to the extent of agreeing not to increase tariffs unless an independent tribunal finds facts that warrant such action being taken. The right hon. gentleman is difficult to please. We have endeavoured to please him. Let us not talk about decreases until we have to meet them; we are talking about increases. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. It is very nice to stand up straw men in order to have them knocked down, but they do not serve any purpose in dealing with this agreement. We are dealing with an increase which we say this government will not ask the house to make unless a body created by parliament has found facts that warrant such increase. I am sure, on consideration, the hon. gentlemen will welcome this. It prevents an increase in tariffs without a finding of fact by this tribunal. Everybody, especially on the other side of the house, should welcome it and rejoice and be exceedingly glad that there is to be no increase in the tariff except after an independent body has found facts to warrant it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While, as my right hon. friend knows, I am not opposed to anything that will help to reduce duties where they should be reduced, I am strongly opposed to the principle of having a tariff regulated by a tariff board, and that is what is at stake in this article. Its application extends away beyond even the various items that are mentioned in schedule E. It applies to all commodities that come from Great Britain to Canada. I can conceive quite readily of an instance where next year, or the year after, for reasons arising out of some change in conditions in this country or to meet some existing need of expense or otherwise we might wish to increase certain duties, even against Great Britain. If we should desire so to do this House of Commons should be perfectly free to act. We should not in any way fetter our rights to deal with the tariff as we think best, in the light of Canadian needs and conditions. The fact that at this moment the article is worded so as to relate only to an increase of duty does not affect the underlying principle one iota. But even if it stood only in relation to an increase, without the possibility of later on being cited as a precedent governing the method of regulating tariffs, I should be opposed to it on the score that, having regard to the changing conditions throughout the world in industry and trade, it is impossible to say whether, two, three or four years hence it might not be desirable to place some duty for purposes of revenue or otherwise against some particular articles, and even against goods coming from Great Britain. It might be desirable to raise duties in one direction and lower them still more in another. It is perfectly clear that only on the basis of having absolute freedom to deal with the tariff as this House of Commons deems best, and getting as far as possible away from the idea of having tariffs made by some external authority can the house preserve its control over taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure every hon. member in this committee must be greatly obliged to the right hon. gentleman opposite. He now has established the thesis upon which this government has been operating for two years. He has said conditions may arise in the next year or two, in these days of stress and strain, when it may be necessary to increase duties on goods coming to this country even from Great Britain. It is a most, shall I say, flattering compliment which has been received by the government. I note the loud applause with which the statement is received by the hon. member for Weyburn, and we are all happy to think that there is unanimity in understanding that it might be necessary to increase duties against Great Britain. The only difference between us is this, that in the one instance it would be log rolled, and in the other instance the board finds the facts upon which action is taken. We make it a condition precedent to any action being taken, before raising a tariff against Great Britain, that the facts shall be found by the tariff board. But the right hon. gentleman opposite says that is not the way to do it, that conditions in this country may be such that we may want to raise duties against Great Britain without finding facts at all by a tariff board or anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister may interpret my remarks in any way he wishes. The text will speak for itself. The difference is between fiscal freedom and the denial of fiscal freedom.

Mr. NEILL: This section prevents the government increasing any existing duty, but apparently it does not apply to any condition where no duty exists. Therefore a duty could be introduced where one does not now exist. Should it not read that "no duty shall be imposed or increased"?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the British government and British people will be greatly obliged to the hon. member for advocating their rights in this connection.

Mr. YOUNG: And our rights.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not so much our rights, in that regard. They were content with the provision as it reads, and we are asking parliament to accept their view of it.

Mr. NEILL: It is sloppily drawn.

Mr. RALSTON: There is another point to consider. We will suppose the government desires to impose a duty and refers it to the tariff board. Under section 4 (b) of the Tariff Board Act the board brings in a report in which they say, "We believe the duty should be increased by so much." Hon. members on this side of the house oppose the increase, and suggest that the tariff board are wrong in their finding of fact. The government will have the right to say, and will be in the position where they will have to say to the opposition and to the country, "We are sorry; we may agree with you that the tariff should not be increased so greatly, but we are bound by our agreement with the people in the United Kingdom to increase this tariff in accordance with the finding of the tariff board."

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is not according to the facts at all.

Mr. RALSTON: The facts found are:

What increase or decreases in rates of duty are required to equalize differences in the cost of efficient production.

Mr. BENNETT: That is only one of several.

Mr. RALSTON: That is one which will be found. If the tariff board finds what increases or decreases in rates of duty are required to equalize differences in the cost of efficient production, then I say, by reason of the agreement with our friends in the United Kingdom, we are bound hand and foot to the findings of the tariff board, and we simply must act as a rubber stamp.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I suggest my criticism of the government is the very opposite from that attributed by the Prime Minister to the leader of the opposition. I put it in a very safe and careful manner. My criticism would be not that in the future they were going to refrain from raising duties without first ascertaining the facts, but that in the past they have raised the tariff so frequently and substantially on the basis of no facts at all, or that they have raised the tariff and taken drastic action without ascertaining the facts.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the article carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under protest.

Article agreed to.

[Mr. Young.]

On article 15:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that United Kingdom producers shall be entitled to full rights of audience before the tariff board when it has under consideration matters arising under articles 13 and 14 hereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to point out that privileges and rights are accorded to producers in the United Kingdom that have been, are and will be denied to producers in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes. The article is as follows:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that United Kingdom producers shall be entitled to full rights of audience before the tariff board when it has under consideration matters arising under articles 13 and 14 hereof.

Articles 13 and 14 deal with the tariff schedules, and commodities coming in from Great Britain. I ask the Prime Minister this question: Will he undertake to give to the Canadian producers the right to appear before the tariff board and be heard on any matter affecting tariffs between Great Britain and Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman apparently confuses the agreement and the statute. By agreement we have undertaken that the British producer shall have the opportunity to be heard before the tariff board. As it stands now the Canadian producer, without agreement, has that right by statute and by practice of the court.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has the right?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only if the minister refers the matter to the board in the first instance.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the way it gets there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister does not permit reference the producer has no right or power whatever.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another matter. He must take his chance in referring it, but once it is referred the provision is:

The board shall give reasonable opportunity to persons who may not have been summoned, to appear before them and give evidence upon oath or solemn affirmation as aforesaid, on any matter relevant to an inquiry then being held by the board.

I shall not discuss the matter at length, but I remember that last year the hon. member for Weyburn asked whether or not any one would be permitted to appear. We pointed out there must be some restriction. Producers affected have the right to be heard, and are parties to the application.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the Prime Minister explain to the committee the distinction which he makes between the principle laid down in article 15 and that which he so vehemently asserted in 1928? His position was referred to a few days ago by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. The words of the Prime Minister, quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, are to be found in Hansard of March 13, 1928, as follows:

> Do you realize, sir, that for the first time in the history of Canada, people outside of this country have assisted in determining what our tariff shall be? I have under my hand the briefs that were filed with the tariff board. By whom are they filed? The first brief on the woollen tariff schedule was filed by representatives of the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers and there were also filed observations on the brief presented by the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers, by the wool textile delegation of England on behalf of the federations and associations who are its constituent members.
> Mr. Young (Saskatoon): Does the hon. member object to that?
> Mr. Bennett: I certainly do. I object to any man who is not a Canadian having anything to do with fixing our tariff.

Then he goes on on page 1258:

> Do you suppose, sir, for a single moment that the great republic of France, in fixing its tariff, would have Canadians tell them how they should deal with it? Do you suppose, under the Safeguarding of Industries Act, the government of Great Britain would rely upon the attitude taken by Canadians as to how they should shape and form their tariff?

Then he continues:

> That is his story, but now he approves of these men not bringing factories to Canada but endeavouring to influence the members of the tariff advisory board as to what protection our industries should have.

I want to commend that to my right hon. friend, and ask him what makes the difference between the principle enunciated by him then and his position as taken today and his expression in article 15.

Mr. BENNETT: I fancy from the looks on the faces of some of the hon. gentlemen's colleagues that they have anticipated the answer. In the one instance we got something for it, in the other they had no right there. They have a right there now because they have given to us the right of free entry into their markets for everything we produce, as against the foreigner who has to pay from 10 to 33⅓ per cent. In addition there are certain other concessions granted to us that I will not refer to. And as one quid pro quo, amongst others, we said that inasmuch as you think our tariffs are high, they are to be considered by the board which we have set up, and you may have the opportunity to be heard there; because the basis upon which you are giving us what you do give us is that we say we will let you come here on terms of equality of opportunity and fair competition. But we say that a government is not the best institution in the world to arrive at that, therefore last year we set up a body to do it, and having set up that body we will permit you, being directly concerned and affected by contract in the matter, to present your position before that board in any way you please.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me tell my right hon. friend that there is no contract in regard to about 800 items in our tariff schedules; there is in regard to 223 only. But my right hon. friend provides here that if we raise duties in regard to any one of the 1,100 items the producers of those goods have the right to come here and protest.

Mr. BENNETT: That is also part of the bargain.

Mr. RALSTON: I find nothing in the contract by which we undertook to give a preference to Great Britain in regard to more than 223 articles. I shall be much interested to know of it, because it seems to me we have done enough in the way of binding ourselves in the tariff as it stands.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said. The hon. gentleman must not look upon this in the way in which a distinguished counsel, Baron Parke, once treated a special demurrer, as a question of the way you dotted your "i's" or crossed your "t's." What we say is that as part of the bargain, the contract, the agreement set out here, we have made these arrangements, and we think the consideration we have received for doing so is ample.

Mr. MALCOLM: I find the Prime Minister's remarks on this item more or less at variance with his remarks a few minutes ago on a previous item. I was glad to have the Prime Minister point out that so far as the tariff board was concerned it was after all only a fact-finding body, and that questions of policy must be decided by the government. However, I judge from his remarks now that if the United Kingdom manufacturers should succeed in establishing before the tariff board that they are entitled to a lower rate of duty the government by this clause more or less commits itself to act upon the finding of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is only giving the right to appear before it. I think you are dealing with another article.

Mr. MALCOLM: I took it that the Prime Minister's last remarks were to the effect that, as part of the bargain, under the agreement which we are discussing, in consideration of the free entry into Great Britain of certain Canadian commodities on which a duty has been established as against foreign countries, the Canadian government in effect said to the British producers: If you think that the duties against your commodities coming into Canada are too high, we will give you the right to appear at any time before the tariff board and establish that fact, on any commodity whatever, regardless of whether or not the commodity was dealt with in the agreement. I take it from what the Prime Minister says now that if the fact is so established by the British producer, the government will act on the facts as found by the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: No; if I may say so I think the hon. gentleman is confusing two things. We are now dealing with the right of audience, article 15.

Mr. MALCOLM: I was dealing with my right hon. friend's statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Article 15 is the article giving the right of audience before the board. We say: You have given us certain things, for which we will concede to you the right of being represented, if you so desire, before the tariff board. The hon. gentleman has forgotten what I said before, that the agreement provides, not that the producer shall come to the board in the first instance; it is the British government which makes application. When the British government has made the application, after considering whether it should or not, then the Minister of Finance sends it to the board, and the board accords right of audience to that producer, that is all. With respect to some of these items it is clear there is no likelihood of appeal. On others there might be. That is a matter for the government to decide in the first instance, and then the producer has the right of audience.

Mr. MALCOLM: What value is the right of audience to the British producer if when he has had his audience and established his case the facts as found are not to be acted on by the government?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly the same right as the cement producers had before the late tariff board. That I think will be a conclusive answer. It does not follow that because you are represented in court by a counsel you win your case. It may follow that the plaintiff wins, who has a very poor lawyer, and the defendant, who has a good lawyer, loses. The right of audience is the right to present your case just as you please. The judgment of the court will depend upon its appreciation of the evidence. The action of the government will be governed by two factors; first the government's general policy, and second, public opinion. By reason of the laying on this table of the proceedings, and findings of fact by the board it will be influenced by public opinion outside the house and public opinion within.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am much obliged to the Prime Minister for his last few words. After all it comes down to this that the government does not bind itself in any way to grant the request of the British producer, but only to grant him audience. Even though he makes a fairly good case, even though the tariff board as a judicial body finds his facts are well-established, even then the general policy of the country may direct the actions of the ministry in another course.

Mr. EULER: Would that be keeping faith?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not exactly what was said. If it had not been for the remark of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) I should not have risen, but this desire to try in every way possible to make it appear that someone is going to break faith—

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, before the hon. gentleman who was speaking had sat down the hon. member for North Waterloo said "Would that be keeping faith?" He is looking for some breach of faith on the part of someone with respect to an agreement that they say has no value. One day it has no value; it is very valuable the next. If you do not do exactly as hon. gentlemen desire, it is a breach of faith. Why do we not get beyond that? I say that very frankly. The principles that govern are set out in this agreement; the British people, who were well represented and capable of taking care of themselves, thought this ample for their purposes. We have endeavoured to protect the interests of Canada to the best of our ability, as they expected we would do, as we believe we have succeeded fairly well in doing, and as they believe they succeeded fairly well in doing for their country.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am glad the Prime Minister has established so firmly in the minds of everyone who is listening the fact that after all the question of tariffs cannot be settled by the tariff board; that there can be no machinery provided that will take away the right of the House of Commons finally to fix tariffs. I am very glad of that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have always agreed on that.

Mr. MALCOLM: So long as my hon. friend and I are in agreement I do not think there can be any difficulty about it. I do feel, however, in connection with this right of audience which the Prime Minister grants the British manufacturer, that if it is a part of a bargain and he does establish facts, it really has not a very great deal of value if the general policy of the government is not in accordance with the facts so determined. I think it might as well be taken out.

Mr. BENNETT: Why contemplate a situation that has not arisen? Why assume that someone will act differently from the way the hon. gentleman himself would act if he were a member of the government? Why assume that someone desires to do a dishonourable thing, to quote the language of the hon. member for North Waterloo? Why not assume that the government would act as decently in regard to this matter as any other government would act?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is not a matter of decency; it is a matter of policy.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend asks what is the sense of doing this if the government is going to do so and so. Why talk about contingencies that may never happen, and events that may never take place?

Mr. EULER: The Prime Minister has given a perfect example, I think, of how remarks may be misinterpreted merely by the inflection of the voice. When I asked whether that would be keeping faith I was voicing exactly the argument set forth by the Prime Minister early in the discussion of this agreement. There were certain points which perhaps were not clearly set out in the agreement, and the right hon. Prime Minister made something of a fuss, if I may use the word, in stating that the government had conducted these negotiations with the British government in good faith, and that if everything was not absolutely covered he knew the British government would keep faith, just as this government would. Now when we talk about the ascertaining of facts—and the discussion had turned pretty much on that phrase—I will say this: While parliament must keep absolutely within its own control the changing of tariffs, whether up or down, I do say that unless there is some very special reason why they should not do so, the government should act according to the suggestion or recommendations, if you like, of the tariff board which has ascertained those facts. If, except for some very good reason, the government do not act upon those facts so ascertained, they will not be keeping faith no matter what the Prime Minister says. He referred to those words and gave a peculiar intonation to a more or less impromptu remark of my own. I do not want to have those words construed by my right hon. friend or anyone else as suggesting for one moment that there is any breach of faith on the part of the government.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the Prime Minister will agree that with regard to articles 13, 14 and 15 the agreement is perhaps a little obscure. That is what has led to some of the differences with regard to the right of audience. I think I have the meaning; I think article 13 refers to cases in which the British government itself may initiate a review of the duties on commodities which they may specify. They may ask for a review to find out whether or not the principle set out in article 11, that is, that there shall be an equality of opportunity, is being lived up to. The next section is entirely different. As I understand it, the British government do not institute the hearing before the tariff board. That is instituted by the Canadian government itself or by someone applying for a change in the duty. Then there is a provision to the effect that the British producers who are interested may appear before the board.

Mr. BENNETT: That applies to both sections.

Mr. RALSTON: I am referring only to the initiation of the hearing. Under article 13 the British government initiates the review, and I take it that only through the instrumentality of the British government would a producer have the right to appear. Under article 14 the Canadian government, or someone in Canada, initiates the review and asks for a change in the duty, in which case there is no intervention whatever by the British government, so far as I can see. Under section 15, however, the British producer is entitled to an audience.

Coming back to the words of the Prime Minister a little while ago I submit that this is an infraction of the principle he has laid down. He says the reason for it is that the British have paid for this right of audience by giving us what has been given in the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: And they have a direct interest in it.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot conceive how their interest would be more direct now than it was before. Just as it was before, the duty is still being imposed against those goods. However, the Prime Minister says they have purchased that right of audience, and I take his word and leave him to be judged as to that distinction. But this does give the right of audience direct to the British producer, without regard to the intervention of the British government. The moment the British producer learns that an application is being made before the tariff board he may exercise his right to be heard.

Mr. BENNETT: My memory of the discussion with regard to that article is this: Obviously the British government could not be represented before the tariff board as such, but the producers, being the people affected, would be able to be represented. The provision is to remove all doubt as to their right to be there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me that the really important point in connection with this article is what it is expected to secure to the British interests which are to have the right to appear. Perhaps at this point more appropriately than at any other I can refer more specifically to what Lord Hailsham said in Calgary. I did not have the opportunity to hear Lord Hailsham, as my right hon. friend and the ex-Minister of Justice did, but his address was published in full in the Fortnightly Law Journal of September 15, 1932. At page 67 of that journal I find the following paragraph, which deals with Lord Hailsham's conception of the powers of this tariff board and the obligations which it places on the government and the parliament of Canada:

> . . . in the dominions a tariff tribunal shall determine what is necessary to afford protection in accordance with these principles, and the government undertakes to take the necessary steps to give effect to its findings of fact. I think a lawyer above all ought to be able to appreciate the importance of ensuring that there shall be an impartial investigation and a decision on facts, and I think the politician ought to be able to appreciate the importance of taking the tariff as far as possible out of politics. It may be said that these provisions leave the whole efficiency of our principles to the mercy of a tribunal, and that is true. It is no good having good laws unless you have an efficient and reliable tribunal to administer them, but ladies and gentlemen, I believe it to be true that one of the greatest assets of the British commonwealth of nations is the impartiality and high standing of the tribunals, and I believe that there is nothing which has helped more to establish the reputation of British justice and British freedom throughout the world than the confidence which every man feels in the fairness of the tribunals and the fairness of the decisions which they render, and I can imagine nothing which is better calculated to ensure the success of the principles which I have enunciated than the knowledge that a Canadian tribunal in Canada is impartially to investigate the facts and a Canadian government is going to be the government which is going to give effect to the findings of fact.

That, Mr. Chairman, is simply a statement that so far as this tariff board is concerned, to all intents and purposes it is to be a judicial body, similar to the supreme court or any court in the land. It is to give decisions based on the facts, and the government are obligated to carry out those decisions. What ever we may say with regard to the duties of the courts in deciding matters which come before them, whether they be matters of civil right or criminal matters we must admit that the field of the judiciary in relation to the administration of the law is one thing, while the field of parliament in relation to the making of laws is quite another and fundamentally different one. Any interpretation which involves a surrender, as this interpretation does, of the rights of parliament to a board which is to be a judicial body, and which is to say what customs duties shall or shall not be imposed, runs wholly counter to the fundamental principles governing the imposition of customs duties and other forms of taxation as stated this afternoon by the Prime Minister as well as by those on this side of the house. So long as we are in agreement that this parliament is perfectly free to do as it pleases with duties where they refer to matters that have been submitted to the board and is not, as Lord Hailsham says, obligated to carry out any decisions of the board, I have nothing further to say; but I think it is very important that the people in Great Britain as well as in this country should realize that one interpretation is being placed upon this section by Lord Hailsham in England while another and quite different interpretation is being given it by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. SANDERSON: A few moment ago the Prime Minister said, "We have formed this body," meaning the tariff board. I would point out that the board has not yet been formed. About the first act that this government did after coming into power was to scrap the tariff board which had functioned under the late administration, and hon. gentlemen opposite said that they were going to institute a new tariff board that would be a tariff board, in the words of the Prime Minister. Yet they have waited, from 1930 up to the present time, without forming the board, and now at this late date the Prime Minister stands up in this house and says, "We have formed this body". I repeat, they have not formed it yet. May I ask the Prime Minister now a question which I put to the Minister of Trade and Commerce last Friday when one of the tariff items was under consideration: Why has the government waited all this time without forming the tariff board? Why did they not form it so that it might review all these questions of the tariff, as between Canada and the United Kingdom, prior to the conference? It is only camouflage, and they are prolonging matters to help their friends who are in favour of high tariffs. I would ask the Prime Minister in all seriousness: Why has he delayed forming this tariff board, or advisory tariff board, or whatever he calls it, until this late date?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member was not in the house this afternoon or he would have heard the whole story at length. I do not think it is necessary to repeat it beyond saying that the tariff advisory board under the late administration was formed by order in council for which there was no sanction by statute, and the chairman of the board having resigned and having been elected to parliament, that terminated it. In order to make it perfectly clear, however, steps were taken by order in council to rescind the order in council under which the body had functioned. We said that it should be by statute and we passed a statute in 1931. The appointments have not been made. The reasons why the tariff was dealt with as it was in 1930 and 1931 have been given so frequently that it is not desirable to take up the time of the committee today going over them again. But I would put this question to the committee. What would be the sense of endeavouring to answer a question when the hon. gentleman who puts the question answers it himself by saying, "This is camouflage to protect the manufacturers of the country"? When you ask a question and answer it yourself what is the purpose of asking someone else to answer it? It shows perfectly clearly that there is no intention to accept any answer as relevant to the question asked. This is camouflage to protect your friends, says the hon. gentleman. Well, since he makes that statement in answer to his own question, I do not see that any further observations are necessary.

Mr. SANDERSON: With all due deference to the Prime Minister, I submit that he has not answered my question at all. I would say that the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman in the last two or three minutes were camouflage pure and simple.

Article agreed to.

On article 16:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that customs administration in Canada shall be governed by such general principles as will ensure: (a) the avoidance, so far as reasonably possible, of uncertainty as to the amount of customs duties and other fiscal imposts payable on the arrival of goods in Canada; (b) the reduction of delay and friction to a minimum; and (c) the provision of machinery for the prompt and impartial settlement of disputes in matters appertaining to the application of tariffs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This agreement was signed on August 20. Can the Prime Minister tell us what if anything has been done since the agreement was signed to carry out the undertaking of this article?

Mr. BENNETT: On October 6 the House of Commons was called together. On the 12th the agreements were submitted to the House of Commons. It is now the 21st day of November and the agreements have not yet been passed. In Great Britain they have been passed, and in Australia the same action has been taken. We have done all we could to enable this to become law, but up to the moment it is not. The only thing that is law is the schedules, because under our practice they become effective. But our efforts to get the agreement through have not been crowned with success, judging by Hansard. "So far as reasonably possible, of uncertainty as to the amount of customs duties and other fiscal imposts payable on the arrival of goods in Canada": that is a matter of administration. Complaints were made by British importers that there were difficulties which they experienced and which should be overcome. I think it is only fair to say that from the day the agreement was signed, and prior to its being signed, all the officials of the customs department have been endeavouring by every means in their power to make easier and simpler, and less subject to criticism, the passing of entries through customs. We all admit that conditions have made them extremely difficult. When I explained our difficulties to the British delegation and their permanent officials, I am bound to say that they took a much more reasonable view of the matter than previously. Here we are on the northern half of a continent beside 122 millions of people. We are endeavouring to maintain our integrity, financial, industrial and otherwise, and it is a task that tries men as perhaps few tasks have tried them. In administration there are difficulties by reason of exchange. That is the primary difficulty. There are difficulties between the United States and Canada because of exchange differences, and they are very acute because they vary from day to day. To formulate rules that would govern is not easy. Then there are difficulties of exchange with every other country with which we do business, and that has added greatly to our burden. What we have been endeavouring to do, what the minister and all his officials have been doing, is to avoid, so far as reasonably possible, uncertainty as to the amount of customs duties and other fiscal imposts payable on the arrival of goods in Canada. It was contended, quite improperly—at any rate investigations which I have personally made would seem to indicate that the contention was not warranted —that one did not know what duty would be paid on goods because we fixed a value for duty on goods that might be imported from Great Britain. It will be observed that we have already passed a statute that gives effect to the contention, which we conceded, that we should remove that clause so far as it affects British goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think it is passed.

Mr. BENNETT: It stands for third reading; it is still before the house. We have passed it through committee and it now stands for third reading. That statute, we believe, will meet that difficulty. "The reduction of delay and friction to a minimum": The causes of delay in connection with the passing of entries are not always attributable to governments, but an effort is being made to overcome that difficulty by instructions from the Commissioner of Customs. Since the conference, I have asked for suggestions from those who have had great concern in the conduct of our customs, and the department has been endeavouring to meet the situation. The minister can speak more freely of that than I can. "The provision of machinery for the prompt and impartial settlement of disputes in matters appertaining to the application of tariffs": We believe that the provision made last year in the tariff act, to which attention may be directed, in part 2 of chapter 55, will meet the situation:

> From and after a date to be fixed by the governor in council, all the powers, functions and duties of the board of customs shall be assigned to and be transacted by the tariff board constituted by this act.

Before this government or its predecessor came into office it had been the practice to have practically the same body pass in review on appeal upon the facts which it had determined in the first instance. I dare say the right hon. gentleman recalls that protests were made from time to time. The board of customs was dominated to a large extent, not necessarily by numbers, by those from whose decisions appeals were made. The committee will recall that last year I made the suggestions which are now embodied in the Tariff Board Act with a view to getting a tribunal which could not in any sense be connected with government as the court of appeal in connection with administration.

I have been told, and I am only passing on what I have received by way of information, that the Customs Act is the most difficult act we have to administer. Everyone knows the difficulties in connection with putting through entries. There is the question of checking up invoices and other matters. Since this agreement was signed the commissioner has endeavoured to meet the situation by ascertaining the date of arrival of large shipments and advising consignees that they should be prepared to furnish evidence as to the exact cost in the country of origin. I recall the other day that I had to pass a customs entry when coming in from the United States. I had purchased a piece of antique silver and the difficulty I experienced in passing this article was considerable. There was the question of establishing the value in the country of origin; the question of the value of the money of the country of origin converted into our money; the question of the surcharge of three per cent; the question of our sales tax, which is a domestic tax, and the question of the ordinary customs tariff. When you combine all these they look quite formidable. The department has settled upon a form of invoice to be used by those who ship into this country, and every effort is being made and will be made to reduce the friction which arises because of abnormal conditions. We are now endeavouring to provide in this tariff board a tribunal to which appeals can be taken summarily and disposed of quickly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not believe anyone will take exception to this article; in fact, I commend the government for including it in the agreement. The only criticism I have to make is that all these things which are of any assistance or value to the country generally seem to come only at the instance of requests made by Great Britain or parties there instead of in response to the demands of our own people. If there is one matter above another about which Canadian importers have been complaining ever since the present administration came into office, it is the manner in which the tariff is being administered. Notwithstanding what the duties may be, the rulings, valuations and technicalities of one kind or another are such as to make it almost impossible to bring into this country articles from any other part of the world. If these principles are sound with regard to commodities coming from Great Britain, they are equally sound with regard to commodities coming from other parts of the world. I hope the government is ready to tell us that it is prepared to carry out the same principles in administering the tariff with respect to commodities coming into Canada, irrespective of the country from which they come. If these principles are sound, they should be applied generally; if they are not sound, they should not be invoked.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations of the right hon. gentleman are perfectly fair and his criticism is not unwarranted. There has been great difficulty in administering the Customs Act and the tariff because of the conditions to which I have referred. The fact that this article is in this agreement might be open to objection; when it was put there I quite appreciated that it would be said that this should not be necessary. As a matter of fact, it is not necessary that it should be there at all. I should like to demonstrate to hon. members the difficulties which this country is experiencing in connection with the administration of a statute like the Customs Act under the present abnormal conditions. I have seen importers on more than one occasion. Shortly after England went off the gold standard the question of the value of the pound sterling became important and I should like to give an illustration of how this worked out. Our tariff is based on the pound sterling being worth $4.86. Let us take an item valued at a pound and bearing a duty of twenty-five per cent. The duty would amount to about $1.22, disregarding the fraction. That amount added to $4.86 makes $6.08 as the total value of the article and the duty. The pound sinks to $3.80, twenty-five per cent of that would be 95 cents, which gives a total of $4.75 or 11 cents less than the face value of the pound upon which our duty rate has been predicated. not only by this government but by all governments since confederation. These importers interviewed me and I told them that the following two weeks should demonstrate the effect of England's going off the gold standard upon the value of commodities. It was expected that wages and commodity values would rise. I told them to come back in about two weeks, that in the interval I would watch the operations of trade and commerce and they could do the same. They came back and they told me that the prices of commodities had not risen as rapidly as was expected, nor had wages increased. It is a singular thing, but the fact is that the expectations in Great Britain in that regard were not met. Trade figures which were produced at the time of the conference showed that the increase in the prices of commodities was about 8.8 per cent. I then suggested to these gentlemen that we should fix the value of the pound for our purposes at $4.40 or substantially 10 per cent less than the par value upon which our tariff had been ranged. Instead of $4.86, we made it $4.40, which made a reduction in value for our purposes of 46 cents. We did not make this law in its entirety, we found it on the statute books.

When it came to dealing with what has been called the dump duty, mentioned in the next article in this agreement, I explained to the members of the delegation from the United Kingdom and elsewhere that we were confronted with this situation: if we left the pound at $4.40 instead of $4.86, its value would be reduced by ten per cent compared with the original value; it was then suggested that we would establish a fifteen day average for the real value, and the difference between the real value, which might be $3.80, and $4.40 would represent what has been incorrectly termed a currency dump duty. That is one of the problems with which this government had to deal. It is an administration problem but it makes for friction and difficulty. If you have a pound fluctuating from day to day it becomes almost impossible to carry on. As I have said, what we did was to establish a fifteen day average value, in other words, we arrived at a value twice a month. We made $4.40 instead of $4.86 the par value of the pound for the purposes of these computations. The effect of this upon my illustration would be that you would have $4.40 with a twenty-five per cent duty of $1.10. That would make the value of the commodity plus the duty, $5.50 as against $6.08, which was the figure parliament had in mind when it imposed the duty. Many of those duties were imposed by parliament when Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance. I point out these matters because they were in the minds of the British delegates; their merchants were complaining. I discussed the matter with them at some length. The Minister of National Revenue was on a committee with them; they brought in a large number of recommendations and we explained to them our difficulty. Finally we said: We are quite content to put in this document an article whereby we shall do our very best to meet the situation. It is of some value to British producers because we are doing our best in respect to them. As the right hon. gentleman has suggested, if it accrues to the benefit of Great Britain, it of course accrues to the benefit of all, because the Customs Act cannot be administered in one way in respect of one set of importers and in a different way in respect to another. That is the whole position and is the reason for this article being in this agreement.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my right hon. friend quite right with regard to the practice or the law as to the exchange value on which the duty is computed? I understand the duty is computed ordinarily on the value of the currency of the country of origin as compared with the Canadian dollar at the current rate of exchange. I do not think there is any such thing as a standard value of $4.86\frac{2}{3}$ for duty purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but when our British preferential tariffs were being made, they were based upon the par value of the pound. I think the hon. gentleman will have no difficulty in verifying that from those who were nearest to Mr. Fielding in the preparation of those tariffs.

Mr. RALSTON: My point is that it is only this government—perhaps I am wrong and when the committee resumes, we shall know for sure—that has ever adopted the principle of giving a fixed or arbitrary value to the pound. That is to say, we have accepted, generally speaking, the current exchange value of the currency of the country of origin and have charged our duty at so much per cent based on the number of Canadian dollars represented by that currency.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is this, that after we had discussed this matter pro and con, the representative here of the British authorities stated, not privately, that we had done what he conceived to be a very fair thing under the circumstances, because we could have operated in a way that would have been vastly more difficult from the standpoint of those concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: My point is that it is not a representative of the British government about whom we are talking. We are talking about what I think is an arbitrary increase in the cost of goods to the people of this country, brought about by a value of $4.86\frac{2}{3}$ being given to the pound when it was only $4.40 or say $4.40 and the government not only figuring on a basis of $4.86\frac{2}{3}$ but adding to that the difference between the pound at an arbitrary value of $4.40 and the current rate. That is something with which it seems to me the representative of the British government would not have very much to do, but it essentially affects not only the Canadian consumer but the Canadian importer. Nothing has been more marked in the last two years than the uncertainty suffered by business, which uncertainty has been caused by this variable rating of the pound from time to time. That is the thing of which importers and consumers complain, and it is in regard to that that I, for one, welcome the insertion in this agreement of the particular provision which appears. As my right hon. leader has intimated, it is I think humiliating to Canada to find that this is brought about by the intervention of the British government and of British representatives when for two years there has been an outcry in this country and in this house with regard to the uncertainty which exists respecting importations and the very arbitrary amounts which are being imposed on importations of goods particularly from Great Britain.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on article 16.

Article 16 agreed to.

On article 17:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that all existing surcharges on imports from the United Kingdom shall be completely abolished as soon as the finances of Canada will allow. They further undertake to give sympathetic consideration to the possibility of reducing and ultimately abolishing the exchange dumping duty in so far as it applies to imports from the United Kingdom.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, or the minister in charge, concerning existing surcharges. Does this article refer particularly to the three per cent excise tax and is that the surcharge to which the provision refers?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I am aware that is all to which it refers. That is the only one I had in mind at the time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In my view the expression "shall be completely abolished as soon as the finances of Canada will allow" is rather indefinite. I suppose the government of Canada will be the judge.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not very hopeful for just a little while?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the Prime Minister tell us anything more than is indicated by the article with regard to the prospect of "sympathetic consideration," so far as the abolition of the exchange dumping duty is concerned?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member does not desire to prolong this discussion beyond what may be useful. Everything that can be has been said with respect to the point he raises. The world economic conference, if it comes into being, may be able to solve the problem. As it stands, the hon. member is fully aware of the circumstances, and I have nothing to add to what I have said.

Mr. RALSTON: I was speaking only of the exchange dumping duty.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the right hon. gentleman consider the world economic conference will have any effect on that?

Mr. BENNETT: I say it is a very important factor in determining what shall be done about it. As matters stand to-day, with prices and exchange as they are, it is unnecessary to remind hon. gentlemen that the fluctuations make the transaction of business extremely difficult and that some stabilized form of exchange is very desirable, and will doubtless be accomplished in time.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister is right when he states that we do not wish to prolong this discussion. I would point out however that the United States is in exactly the same position as we are, so far as fluctuation is concerned, and as I understand it the exchange dumping duty is not in operation there. It seems to me therefore that in view of the undertaking given in this article, the Prime Minister might well consider the abolition of the exchange dumping duty without waiting for the world economic conference.

Mr. BENNETT: If, with safety to the body politic, it could have been done, it would have been done. In our opinion it could not be done, and it will not be done until it is considered safe for Canada to do it.

Mr. YOUNG: What does the Prime Minister mean by "safe"?

Mr. BENNETT: So as not to destroy the country by creating a chaotic condition.

Mr. YOUNG: Doesn't the Prime Minister think the finances of the country would be improved if the government were to allow the goods to come in, and collect duty on them? No answer.

Article 17 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Articles 18 and 19 have already been agreed to. We now turn to article 20.

On article 20:

Nothing in this agreement shall prejudice or diminish any of the benefits enjoyed by any of the parties thereto under the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement dated the 6th of July, 1925.

Article agreed to.

On article 21:

This agreement is made on the express condition that, if either government is satisfied that any preferences hereby granted in respect of any particular class of commodities are likely to be frustrated in whole or in part by reason of the creation or maintenance directly or indirectly of prices for such class of commodities through State action on the part of any foreign country, that government hereby declares that it will exercise the powers which it now has or will hereafter take to prohibit the entry from such foreign country directly or indirectly of such commodities into its country for such time as may be necessary to make effective and to maintain the preferences hereby granted by it.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister state, having regard to this article, the significance of the renunciation or breaking off of the trade agreement between Russia and Great Britain?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will recall that a commercial treaty was being negotiated between Great Britain and Russia by Mr. Arthur Henderson and soviet authorities. Difficulties were experienced in completing the treaty along the lines suggested, and a protocol was signed which had the effect of a temporary treaty. It was provided in the protocol that it might be terminated on six months' notice, and inasmuch as the terms of the treaty would be to prevent this section becoming operative, as by its terms provided, the British delegation undertook to give notice within the terms of the protocol. Such notice was given and is now running. The effect of course is that they are then free, beyond question, to give effect to this article of the agreement. Without renunciation of the agreement it is a matter of extreme doubt whether or not there would be any power on the part of the government of the United Kingdom to give effect to the conditions of the article, in the event of its being necessary to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: The right hon. gentleman has not before him the term of the treaty which might nullify the effect of article 21?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think it necessary to bring it, but if I remember correctly the protocol did not specify the term, because it provided for the negotiation of a treaty at an early date. The express provision was that it should remain in effect until the expiration of six months' notice by either party. If the hon. member is particularly interested I shall have the information for him tomorrow.

Mr. RALSTON: No. I wanted to know the effect of whatever term there may have been in the treaty which would nullify article 21. There might quite possibly be a treaty and still nothing in it—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I understand the hon. member now. The most favoured nation clause was in the treaty.

Mr. MALCOLM: Was given to Russia?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, was in the protocol.

Mr. MALCOLM: So that if the protocol had stayed in existence Russia would have had the same terms as Canada, so far as lumber is concerned?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The six months' delay is running now, and article 21 really does not come into effect until the termination of that delay.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend suggests that it does not come into effect, I reply that it comes into effect in so far as it is possible to make it effective, because it has been approved and assented to by the British parliament. But so far as the ability to operate every section of it is concerned, it would be necessary, as I have said, that the six months should have run before it could operate in its entirety.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister indicate to us a little more clearly and definitely what class of action taken by a foreign state would come under that part of the section which reads:

> . . . the creation or maintenance directly or indirectly of prices for such class of commodities through state action . . .

Recently our own government guaranteed the Canadian banks against loss in connection with the transactions of the selling agency for our wheat, which is being sent abroad at less than the cost of production. In that sense we are dumping wheat, the state itself entering into the dumping process. Would action of that kind on the part of a foreign country come under this clause?

Mr. BENNETT: No statement could be further from the fact than the one just made. Why it should have been made I know not. To suggest that the government is engaged in the wheat business is as far from the fact as it is possible for any statement to be, and I should think the hon. gentleman would know that. Why did he make that statement? Does anyone know? This aims at a condition under which there is state control of the product of industry or agriculture, where the state itself is the moving power with respect to the production and marketing of it. Where the state intervenes in that manner, so as to frustrate the operation of the preference thus granted by Great Britain to Canada, Great Britain has said that if attention is drawn to it, such action will be taken as will ensure that the state thus offending shall not be able to sell its product in that market. That is what it means. Either government, of course, has the right to call into operation the provisions of the section. Could anything be further from the fact than to assert that there is any relation between that and the guaranteeing of the financial position of an agency that buys and sells wheat without reference to the government? I cannot understand what purpose is served by making that observation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not necessary that I should explain the purpose I have in view in making an observation. But the Prime Minister has not answered the question. My question was this: If the government of a foreign country should take action similar to that recently taken by our government in guaranteeing the banks against loss when they are advancing money for the sale of wheat, would it come under this clause? That, I take it, is indirect action on the part of the state, if it is not direct action. And I take it further that that is virtually a dumping of grain, because it is selling it at less than the cost of production in the country of origin. Whether or not the Prime Minister agrees with that interpretation of the action of this government I am not immediately concerned, but I ask, if some other state, Germany if you like, in subsidizing its grain, should take action along that line would this clause apply against Germany?

An hon. MEMBER: Russia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, or Russia. I have no objection to taking Russia as my illustration, but some people here do not like the mention of Russia, so I took Germany instead. Or take Italy if you like; there are a great many people not so frightened about Italy. In Saturday's Ottawa Journal, an eminently respectable paper, and rather inclined to be Conservative, there appeared a report of a recent statement by Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland, who, I believe, was Minister of Labour in the last Conservative government in Britain and has just returned from a trip to Russia. He said:

> I want Britain to trade with Russia because of the great and growing burden of unemployment. . . .
> Our export trade to Russia last year amounted to $35,000,000 at par. It can easily be trebled. It might well be multiplied manifold.

I ask the Prime Minister the definite question whether, if another state takes action along lines similar to that which we have taken in Canada, this clause will apply against that state?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the language of the article is:

> This agreement is made on the express condition that, if either government is satisfied that any preferences hereby granted in respect of any particular class of commodities are likely to be frustrated in whole or in part by reason of the creation or maintenance directly or indirectly of prices for such class of commodities through state action on the part of any foreign country, that government hereby declares that it will exercise the powers which it now has or will hereafter take to prohibit the entry from such foreign country directly or indirectly of such commodities into its country for such time as may be necessary to make effective and to maintain the preferences hereby granted by us.

The hypothetical case suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) does not come within those provisions.

Mr. RALSTON: As far as I am concerned I do not want to have the discussion led off into a question of what action this government has taken in regard to wheat. But I do not think the Prime Minister should be too dogmatic about the effect of this government's intervention. I have before me the order in council authorizing the action referred to by the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth). The recital is that there has been marked variation in grain prices in the immediate past; it refers to the uncertainty as to future prices of wheat, and goes on to provide for guarantees in order that the wheat may be sold for cash at present prices. That is not very far from what this paragraph refers to, namely, the maintenance of prices directly or indirectly through state action, not on the part of any foreign country but on the part of this country. I should think, therefore, there might be some doubt whether if this sort of action were taken by foreign countries to maintain prices it might not be quite possible that this clause would be invoked by us, and we might present to Great Britain that situation and ask them for redress. I think the Prime Minister is perhaps unduly restricting the possibilities of this section when he declines to agree that the maintenance of prices in this way, or the assistance in the maintenance of prices, might not come within this section.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if there is any understanding as to the procedure to be adopted in connection with this section. That is, how are representations to be made, or what has to be shown in order that the section may be invoked by, let us say, this government, through a request to Great Britain in respect of action on the part of some foreign government?

Mr. BENNETT: The only question of procedure that was discussed with the British authorities was that of first giving notice under the provisions of the protocol. Then if occasion necessitated, and the effect of the offering of state controlled products or commodities at a price that bore no relation to the market was to frustrate the preference, this government could give such notice as might be necessary and, on the facts being verified, the British government would take the necessary action to prevent the importation into that country of the commodity so affected.

Mr. RALSTON: But I was getting at whether the burden is on the Canadian authorities to satisfy the British government with regard to any infraction of this article.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, as the matter has not yet arisen in practice, I can only say this is one more illustration of the intention of the governments, in making a bargain of this kind, to act in the utmost good faith. I can only repeat that if the facts were brought within the four corners of the article, and the attention of the British government were directed to them, they would make such inquiries as might be necessary to satisfy themselves as to the correctness of the position which, the Canadian government asserted, necessitated their taking appropriate action to accomplish the end in view, namely, the prevention of the frustration of the value of the preference to the exporter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister objects to the citation of hypothetical cases. I mentioned one which was not hypothetical, that of Germany, which bonuses its exports. I believe South Africa does the same thing. Certainly that is direct action on the part of the state which may affect prices. I would ask whether action of that kind on the part of a state would bring it within the terms of this clause.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that if that case ever arises it will be considered. It has not been considered yet by the two governments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Apparently I am entirely in error with regard to this whole matter. I thought we were entering into a treaty. If we are doing so it seems to me that this document should set forth certain definite principles which must guide the contracting parties in whatever particular circumstances they may find themselves. If the Prime Minister means that there is a particular country or a particular condition against which this article provides and that it does not have general application, that is a new phase of the matter altogether of which the house knows nothing. We have before us a distinct clause. I have not a great knowledge of law, but from what little knowledge I have I would say we have to deal with the meaning of this article which is before us. I think I am putting a perfectly proper question when I ask the Prime Minister if the action of Germany, or of South Africa, or of any other country which bonuses its exports, brings it within the terms of this particular clause. It is not a question of whether the matter has been considered; it is a question of whether such action would come under this clause.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has read the clause, as I have; I have read it to the committee. This is a treaty between Great Britain and Canada, not between Great Britain and Germany or South Africa.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a treaty that applies to foreign countries.

Mr. BENNETT: Just permit me to finish. This treaty is between Great Britain and Canada, and it makes certain provisions. If the conditions which are mentioned in this article obtained, suitable action would be taken by Great Britain or by Canada, if it were the converse of the case I have mentioned, for the purpose of prohibiting importations into the country of the commodities so affected. That is all. I decline to give antecedent interpretations; that is an unwise and a wrong thing to do, as no one knows better than the hon. gentleman. We are dealing with actualities and with those I shall continue to deal. I do not propose to give my interpretation on hypothetical questions which, when they become actual cases, in view of surrounding circumstances and facts, may necessitate action being taken along some line different from an interpretation which I might suggest. That brings the whole matter exactly within what was said a few days ago by the foreign secretary in Great Britain; to undertake to deal with cases that do not exist and to place an interpretation upon a bargain made between the United Kingdom and Canada is not my purpose. I do not think it is fair criticism or fair comment or fair inquiry to make at this time with respect to this bargain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sorry the Prime Minister does not think it is fair, but we are discussing this article of the agreement and this is our only opportunity of arriving at what the clause really means. If I understand anything at all about the drawing up of agreements, there were certain definite matters under consideration when this article was drafted. If the Prime Minister is not in a position to interpret the meaning of the article I do not know who would be in that position, because presumably he was there at the time. I think it is a fair matter of legal interpretation that the men who had something to do with the drafting of a section should be asked to interpret its meaning. I repeat I am not giving a hypothetical case; I have asked with regard to a specific condition existing at the present time. I referred to the action which Germany now is taking, and asked whether or not that would bring that country within the terms of this section. If the Prime Minister refuses to answer of course that is his option, I suppose, although it does not seem very fair that when we are considering the article the Prime Minister will not state whether or not Germany comes under this article at the present time.

I would give another illustration. Suppose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States undertook some direct or indirect action which might encourage the exportation of goods from that country. I should like to know whether or not, in that case, the United States would come under this article. Perhaps that is a hypothetical case; so far as I know that has not been done as yet, but such action might be taken by the United States. I do not think we should be asked simply to subscribe to this clause in a blind way without having any definite knowledge as to what it really means or in what it may involve this country. I still think my question with regard to Germany is perfectly proper. It is not hypothetical by any stretch of the imagination.

Mr. MALCOLM: Certainly I do not want to delay the proceedings of the committee, but I think the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in relation to foreign countries might well be applied to empire countries. I quite understand and quite agree with what was sought in the drafting of this clause. When a country operates a business such as state operated lumber camps, the state pays no royalties and no timber dues. When camps are operated in a capitalistic country such as Canada the state takes certain severe tolls in the way of dues from the private operators, and certainly it is not fair competition for a private lumber company in the Dominion of Canada to have to compete with a state operated lumber company, when that private company is paying to the state substantial taxation on the lumber which it cuts off state owned limits. It is quite possible that in the particular case of Russia, commodities have been placed upon world markets by the government simply for the purpose of securing foreign exchange. When such competition as this exists it is unfair to the normal operation of a business within the British Empire, and I can quite see the object of having an opportunity to enter a complaint against that sort of business.

The question, however, goes much further than that, Mr. Chairman. We in Canada have given state aid to agriculture by paying a bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat. We are operating in the British market in competition with Australia, but Australia has an export bonus scheme with regard to butter. The whole principle of bonusing exports of any commodity at all is in my opinion extremely vicious and wrong. Personally I have never subscribed to it, and I do not subscribe to it now. Bolstering up one particular industry at the expense of other industries by means of a bonus may lead to extreme state expenditure which, in the end, may not result in any definite benefit to the state.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): What is the difference between a bonus and a tariff?

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is entering into a controversy on a point which I should be very glad to discuss with him at another time, but that is not the question here. We also have another situation in Canada. We do a good deal of talking about Russia, but in this dominion we operate provincially-owned power enterprises which pay absolutely no taxation to the state, whereas the privately-owned power companies pay substantial revenues to the provinces for the use of water and very heavy taxation to the state and the municipalities in the conduct of their business, both as to percentage of profits and in the form of municipal taxation. Now, if the principle is to be adopted in this legislation we must remember that we have done and may again be doing a considerable export business in electrical energy with the United States, which will be coming into competition with electrical energy generated by the private capital paying taxes in the country in which it is generated. I say therefore that while the purpose of this legislation is to eliminate unfair competition in our trading with Britain on certain commodities, it opens up a very serious field of discussion. As regards the very commodity in which we are at the present time most interested, and in which the Prime Minister no doubt would argue that he is trying to support us, namely, wheat, I think it is pretty generally understood that the North American continent sold a great many million bushels of wheat to Russia. I believe it is also well known that a great deal of Russian wheat has been sold on the Cardiff market.

Mr. BENNETT: This year?

Mr. MALCOLM: Past years.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, past years.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think it was understood that a great deal of wheat came out of northern Russia, which was exchanged for Welsh coal that went back into northern Russia, and that a good deal of coal came out of the sea of Azov and was sold in competition with coal in England, wheat from America being taken back into southern Russia. The reason for this was the difficulty in the transportation system as between north and south in the Soviet Union. The fact remains that the possibilities of trade with Russia are not all one way. I admit that there are certain dangers, but while in principle I subscribe to the purpose of the clause, if and when it becomes necessary for the government to give notice, I do also submit that the references by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are not so far out of line as the Prime Minister would have us believe, because I think it might be held that his action in connection with supporting the wheat market by giving guarantees to the banks might be interpreted as state aid in the principal industry in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Bonuses are given to increase the price of wheat.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: This aims at a case in which unfair competition destroys the price.

Mr. RALSTON: This is the maintenance of price.

Mr. BENNETT: The words are these:

. . . are likely to be frustrated in whole or in part by reason of the creation or maintenance directly or indirectly of prices . . .

The word "creation" is there to meet a situation where, as pointed out the other day, one country had through its selling agency given a statement that whatever price was quoted it would quote a lower price. My personal view is that it has no relation whatever, by any stretch of the imagination, to the bonusing of wheat as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Certainly that was not in anyone's mind when the matter was done. But may I point out that this is an agreement between two countries; there is not a third country. It has to be worked out by the two of them and not by somebody else, and the very provisions in the agreement that look towards the maintenance of good faith and mutual discussion and negotiations for the purpose of giving effect to it, preclude the possibility of anyone giving any hard and fast interpretation as to what might or might not follow if this were something of universal application. It is not. This is a contract between two parties, and one of the terms of the contract is contained in article 21. It aims at securing fair competition against unfair state competition; that is all.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since the Prime Minister has admitted that this is aimed primarily at what he calls unfair state competition, I think it is proper that one should object to this parliament pursuing a policy of this kind. I am firmly convinced that in the years to come, indeed in the very near future, the state will more and more be driven to take action which will directly or indirectly affect business. We have, in fact, been doing it for a great many years in a small way and we are being forced now to do it on a larger scale. The only country which apparently has done it on a national scale is Russia. The Prime Minister says that, with regard to other countries, they were not in the minds of the parties who drew the agreement. I presume that everyone will realize from that statement that Russia was very definitely in the minds of those who drew the agreement, and Russia is the only country that has any form of state capitalism. I think we should consider carefully the results of this action. In the first place, we might very easily antagonize a great country that might be one of our best customers. I have again and again urged that we should trade with Russia. That was the policy of the late government in Great Britain. As I read the papers it is only a question of time until a new agreement will be drawn between Great Britain and Russia, so that trade with Russia is not a matter that can simply be regarded as a vague dream or fad of a few people in this country. We missed a great opportunity a year or two ago when we might have taken Russian coal in exchange for some of our agricultural implements. Now it would appear that we may sacrifice any chance of dealing with this great country which has been the first to go into state enterprise on a large scale.

I might take this opportunity to call the attention of the house to an article in the November number of Current History by Sidney Webb, now Lord Passfield. He points out some of the conditions which now prevail in Russia and which I think should afford ground for careful consideration of the whole situation.

The CHAIRMAN: Is that relevant to the question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is relevant. He said:

In Soviet Russia the aggregate volume of production is increasing year by year.

That is something we have to consider—whether we regard Russia as a customer of ours or as a rival; because if we fail to enter into arrangements with Russia at the present time we may easily find her our competitor, and if it should prove that state enterprise is more economical than private enterprise, as I believe the hon. member for North Bruce suggested, we might encounter great difficulties in our wheat-producing industry in the near future. To continue:

Soviet Russia has been able, without popular outcry, for the past two years entirely to suspend its unemployment benefit simply because the government can and does find places at trade union rates of wages, either in productive work or in technical training, for every applicant.

There again the question is raised whether that would be unfair competition. We have in this country some 800,000 persons now under relief.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the 800,000 are men, women and children.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and I suppose there are some 750,000 altogether who are unemployed.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, 750,000 unemployed. Take the figures shown by the census returns, add the proportion which have come in since the figures were compiled, take into consideration the fact that nearly 200,000 young people have entered the labour market since that time, of whom only a very small proportion have been absorbed; take into account the fact that the census figures do not include the young people who had not yet had jobs and so were not out of a job or, on the other hand, those who have been working for themselves but whose business had gone down—I think if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to make a careful estimate they will find that my figure of 750,000 is conservative. If we have 750,000 unemployed and should choose to put them at productive work, paying them out of the state treasury, we might then be in a position to export more goods. If so, some will say that that would be guilty of unfair competition. It might be unfair in one sense, but unfair only from the standpoint of those who believe firmly in private enterprise. It certainly would not be unfair to the state or to the people who are unemployed. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) suggests that it would not be unfair to those people who have to pay the taxes. Sidney Webb goes on to say:

Perhaps this may not be unconnected with the curious fact that the Soviet government (central and local) is this year spending on the education of its far-flung population of 160,000,000 actually a larger sum per head than the British government is spending on its 45,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think this is relevant.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The state of unemployment in Russia does not interest this committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to show that there is great difficulty in deciding what is fair and what is unfair competition. I have been pointing out that under state enterprise huge sums may be spent upon education, upon cultural opportunities for the masses and upon a great variety of other things, but when it comes to one particular item which may be produced at a lower cost than under private competition, the sale of that article when exported is considered to be unfair competition. In order to deal intelligently with the whole question you have to consider all the surroundings.

The CHAIRMAN: The statistics concerning unemployment in Russia and Great Britain would not seem to cast any light upon this article or be relevant to the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think that they do. I should like to read another paragraph from Sidney Webb as follows:

The essential novelty in economic organization which Soviet Russia, alone among nations, has adopted, is that, from one end of industry to the other, no profitmaker puts a finger in the pie, and no rentier levies his tribute in return for allowing the land and capital to be used.

If we must produce at such great cost because of the heavy tribute which private industry levies upon our production, then I submit that there is no great unfairness in a country cutting out the middleman, cutting out the tribute and producing as nearly as possible at cost. Sidney Webb continues:

The object and purpose of Soviet industry is never pecuniary profit for the proprietor, but always to supply the nation with the largest possible output, of the best possible quality. This is the first great difference in industry between Soviet Russia and the rest of the world. The second is that production and distribution is not left to be decided by the whim or caprice of landlords; or by the calculation as to the likelihood of profit by hundreds of thousands of separate capitalists, or by their managers or their bankers; or even by the 10,000 official factory managers on behalf of the state, but is made the subject of a deliberate, nation-wide planning as to what is best, not for any particular citizen or section of citizens but for the whole community, present and future.

If that is a fair statement of the situation in Russia it does not seem to me to be possible to say that the goods there produced are produced under unfair conditions. It has been claimed that Russia is dumping these goods at below cost and for that reason is not able to build up her reserves—forced sales, as it were. My last quotation from Sidney Webb is as follows:

Soviet Russia is year by year diverting from consumption by the present generation of consumers, at least a quarter of what its workers are producing, in order that the consumers in future years may reap the benefit in an assured higher standard of life.

That is a much larger proportion given to capital expenditure than prevails in any other country. Russia is putting aside those reserves, she is adding that much to capital, and any country adding to capital at that rate surely cannot be said to be producing its goods under unfair conditions.

It seems to me that we ought not to take action here which would place us in the position of advocating the perpetuation of our system of private competition, under which we are suffering from such tremendous depression at the present time and under which so many of our people are on the verge of starvation, when there is another system being tried out and from which we could derive some knowledge as to how conditions might be improved in this country. I do not defend everything that is being done in Russia, but I do say that an experiment is being worked out there which is worthy of our consideration. We might very well place ourselves in such relationship to Russia that she might send us some of her surplus goods which we need, and that we might in return export some of our capital goods which she needs at the present time. I think such a transaction would be beneficial to both of us. As it is to-day, we are deliberately setting out to make trade war upon any country that proposes to carry on state enterprises to a greater extent than we ourselves, at the present moment, are prepared to undertake.

Article 21 agreed to.

On article 22:

This agreement between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada is to be regarded as coming into effect as from the date hereof (subject to the necessary legislative or other action being taken as soon as may be practicable hereafter). It shall remain in force for a period of five years, and if not denounced six months before the end of that period shall continue in force thereafter until a date six months after notice of denuniciation has been given by either party.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is important to repeat what has been said with respect to the effect of this particular article. It differs from most of the articles that usually appear in agreements in that it seeks not only to impose additional taxation but to fix that taxation at a certain level over a period of five years. That, as has frequently been said, is a violation of fundamental principle of the control of the commons over taxation. My right hon. friend has been fond of quoting from time to time the Procedure of the House of Commons by Redlich, and I should like to quote for his benefit as well as that of the committee what Redlich has to say on page 126 of volume 3 of that work under the title of "Fundamental principles":

With a view to maintaining parliamentary control over taxation from year to year, a constitutional practice has been established whereby at least one important customs duty and at least one important direct tax are made subject to annual renewal. Accordingly, whether the financial arrangements of any given year require the imposition of additional taxation or not, an act must be passed every year to continue these expiring imposts; and when the Finance bill, in which such renewal is proposed, is before the house it is competent for any member to raise the question, not only of the renewal of the particular imposts in question, but of the continuance of any other duty or tax, whatever may be the statutory time limit, if any, prescribed for it.

He goes on to say:

For many years the tea duty and the income tax have for this purpose been imposed year by year for one year only.

And elsewhere he says:

Apart, therefore, from the special cases of the tea duty and the income tax, it may be said that the presence or absence of a specific time limit in the act imposing a duty or tax has little practical importance, except as affording an indication of the intention of parliament at the time it was imposed.

I do not imagine my right hon. friend will take exception to that statement of the position by Redlich. It serves to emphasize how careful the British parliament has been to see that even with respect to duties which it is proposed to have maintained for a period of years, that the commons should assert its right to revise the entire schedule at any time that parliament might desire so to do by bringing up at least one item for discussion every session. Undoubtedly the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite is to have these duties continue for a period of five years. The intention, so far as this side of the house is concerned, is to preserve fiscal freedom in the matter of imposition of taxation, whether that be in the form of customs duties or in any other form, and to resist as strongly as we can anything that will seek to make permanent any rate of customs duty or to give rigidity or fixity to the customs schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the right hon. gentleman is not serious in what he has been saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why does my right hon. friend say that?

Mr. BENNETT: I have a high regard for my right hon. friend's intelligence, wide experience and great knowledge, but when he stands in this committee and makes a statement such as he has just made with respect to taxation, I wonder whether he thinks the house has no memory. I wonder whether my right hon. friend realizes, for instance, that the Czechoslovakian treaty is for four years, and it touched every item of imports from that country. The treaty which Cobden made with France was for ten years. Our treaty with the West Indies was for twelve years. Our treaty with France, lasted nine. Similar consideration applied to treaties with Belgium and Italy.

These are the fundamental principles which I think we must remember: First, we have negotiated an agreement with the United Kingdom; second, the agreement is based upon the application of the principle of tariff preferences, free entry being accorded to the British Empire and a tariff being imposed against those who are not within the empire. The preference is the difference between free entry and the duties which run as high as 33⅓ per cent. Then comes the question as to how long this agreement shall endure. A channel of trade thus created can be developed only within a reasonable time, and I suggest to my right hon. friend that he convert his former Minister of Justice before he tries to convert the rest of Canada and the house; for that hon. gentleman made it quite clear the other day that he realized there must be time with respect to the development of a channel of trade and that time is all important. The question how long might well be the subject of differences of opinion, but that there must be a reasonable time is clear. We have fixed it at five years. This is not taxation in the sense in which Redlich is using the term in the citation my right hon. friend made from him, but it is an effort by tariffs to provide for preference to Great Britain and the dominions.

Just one word more need be said, and that is all I shall have to say about the matter. We believe these principles upon which we are proceeding are sound, and until this debate was precipitated I thought that all parties were desirous of granting these preferences. My right hon. friend says: We do not believe in a certain fixed tenure. If you apply the principle of landlord and tenant, he does not believe in a fixed rent for a certain period. I say that his government did the same thing. This very day I had to consider, because my attention had been directed to it, the Czechoslovakian treaty, its date of expiry, four years from the day it was made, and what our rights were under it. What is the difference between the right hon. gentleman making a bargain with Czechoslovakia for four years and our making one with our kinsmen for five? That is the real point. I do not desire to be captious, but I do not think any principle is involved. This house was asked to agree and did agree to the right hon. gentleman's suggestion to adopt that treaty with Czechoslovakia and I am merely suggesting a period of five years with Great Britain is not different in principle from a period of four years with Czechoslovakia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one knows better than my right hon. friend that there are agreements and agreements, and that the scope, the terms and provisions of an agreement have everything to do with its general acceptability. The intention of parliament is usually made clear during a discussion of these matters. My right hon. friend talks about an agreement with Czechoslovakia, I venture to say that when that agreement was put through, the point that that agreement should not extend for the term of years it was stated it would extend was not so much as raised by the opposition of the day, the simple reason being that the agreement did not attempt to impose additional burdens of taxation on Canada over a period of years. What I wish to make clear at the moment is this: While the government may have one intention in this matter of the customs duties being fixed by this agreement, certainly, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, it has quite an opposite intention with respect to making permanent any increase in customs tariff at this time. It is just as well that should be made quite clear. There is a great difference again between agreements that are made for a period of years but which can be ended at any time upon so many months' notice, or agreements that affect a very small number of items in a customs tariff, and agreements such as the present one which under the guise of an agreement is in reality an upward tariff revision on a large scale. Our opposition to this agreement is that while it purports to be an agreement to further trade between Canada and Great Britain, it is in reality a means of increasing the Canadian customs tariff by a subterfuge, and one which we do not propose to countenance for one minute. It is an attempt to do something in the nature of an innovation in tariff matters which is being very strongly resisted in other free parliaments at the present time and which we intend to resist as long as we can in this, namely, an endeavour to institute permanent or fixed tariffs and that on a very high level.

May I point this out, that never before, so far as I can recall, in the history of this parliament, has an effort been made to do away with the benefits of an intermediate tariff. The tariff policy of Canada has for years contemplated three distinct tariffs, namely, the British preferential tariff at one level, the intermediate at another, and the general at another. The idea has been that through the intermediate tariff Canada would have an opportunity to make agreements with other countries, giving them certain favourable opportunities in our markets when they were prepared to give us like opportunities in theirs. That is now being destroyed by the way in which the present tariff, under schedule E, has been framed. As has been pointed out over and over again in committee, the agreement raises the intermediate tariff to the level of the general tariff, thereby doing away for the next five years with any advantage which might have been offered to a foreign country prepared to make an agreement with Canada. Hon. members on this side of the house are ready and anxious to trade with Great Britain as far as possible. We also desire, however, to trade with the rest of the world. The mere diversion of trade will not help to bring Canada out of a period of depression such as that from which she is now suffering. There will have to be an increase in the volume of trade, and that increase will have to be obtained not only through trade with Great Britain but through trade with the rest of the world as well.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to take up the time of the committee further than to repeat a view expressed by Mr. Runciman in the English House of Commons. The right hon. gentleman opposite says: "We desire to trade with Great Britain." If by that he means we desire to have a trade treaty with Great Britain, then he must mean a contract. Every contract with respect to trade imposes some restriction upon the freedom of action of both parties concerned. As Mr. Runciman pointed out, there cannot be a contract between parties which does not involve some restriction on our free will and general actions. If it is a contract for service, one must carry it out. If it is a contract to sell goods, one cannot sell them to someone else. Restrictions are clear and implied. But this is the point I wish to make: Is a contract for five years bad when one for four years is good? The right hon. gentleman suggests the answer is that the present agreement involves heavy taxation upon the Canadian people. What about the West Indies treaty? That treaty was for twelve years, not five, and imposed a taxation upon the Canadian people of $5,000,000 a year. We cannot relieve ourselves of that treaty, because it is there and we are not free. Why does the right hon. gentleman opposite condemn the treaty now before us when it is only for five years, when as the leader of a former administration he was the author of a treaty with the West Indies for twelve years which cost Canada $5,000,000 a year? The Czechoslovakian treaty, which is set out at page 234 of the consolidated copy of the Customs Tariff and Amendments was made for the purpose of securing certain benefits for Canada which, I am sorry to say, probably through no fault of the government, did not eventuate. Article 6 of the Czechoslovakian agreement states in part, as follows:

> It shall come into force fifteen days after the exchange of ratifications and shall be binding upon the contracting parties during four years from the date of its coming into force.

Those are the provisions, and it seems to me under the present circumstances we are not asking too much, having at one time given assent to a treaty with our neighbours in the West Indies for a period of twelve years which involves us, in connection with the commodity of sugar, in taxation to the extent of about $5,000,000 a year, and having at another time entered into an agreement with Czechoslovakia for a treaty for four years—in the light of these facts it does not seem to me that we are asking too much when we ask for concurrence in a contract for five years with our kinsmen across the sea, comprising some 40,000,000 people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is true an agreement was made, as the Prime Minister has said, with our kinsmen in the West Indies. My recollection however is that no exception was taken by him or other hon. gentlemen opposite at the time to the provisions of the agreements and in particular to the time for which it was to run.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not here at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All parties in the house were in agreement. That is a very different matter from an effort to bind subsequent parliaments on a matter in connection with which there are between the political parties fundamental differences of opinion.

Mr. STEVENS: A few minutes ago the right hon. gentleman opposite said that he objected as a matter of principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There can be no question as to carrying out anything for a term of years where all are in agreement. But, in this House of Commons at the present time there is a very distinct difference of view as to the merits of the agreement. Hon. members opposite think they have done something which is very much in the interests of Canada. Hon. members on this side feel that the agreement they have made will be detrimental to Canada. I believe we shall find that before it has been in force very long conditions which are now very bad will be intensified in virtue of the additional restrictions being placed upon trade by the agreement now before us.

I do not know that there is anything further to add; I think the position of hon. members on this side of the house has been made clear. The Prime Minister spoke about an agreement made by Great Britain with France. As he well knows, that was a treaty to increase freedom of trade not only between France and Great Britain but between all the countries of the world and Great Britain. In that treaty the same opportunities were given to other countries as were given to Great Britain. The agreement now before us seeks to deny to the world at large opportunities of trade and, as the Prime Minister himself has said, to make it necessary for every foreign country to pay tribute to any part of the British empire it wishes to trade with. He has said this is an agreement framed for the purpose of shutting out the foreigner. Certainly that is what it is for, as the text of it well discloses. Hon. members on this side of the house are certainly not going to become parties to an agreement which places on Canada an obligation to shut out other nations from trading with her.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall take only a moment to reply to the right hon. leader of the opposition. I wish to be sure that the house and country clearly understands the principle upheld by him. A treaty for four years between a foreign country and Canada is submitted to this house, a treaty signed, as I observe, by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce. A treaty between the West Indies and the Dominion of Canada, part of the British Empire, is made for a period of twelve years by gentlemen who are now in the opposition, and approved by the then opposition, now the government. But when the government now in power submits a treaty with the motherland for five years rather than twelve or four, the present opposition, then the government, must oppose it as being bad in principle. We are asked to believe that position is sound. Hon. members opposite suggest that having supported a four year and a twelve year treaty they cannot now support a five year treaty, because we are led to believe that the right hon. gentleman opposite who asked the house to accept the four year and twelve year treaties was wrong, and that therefore this treaty is wrong. You cannot trust an opposition very far, if it is an opposition of that kind, can you?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not going to allow the Prime Minister to place any such interpretation upon my words. Any one who will read the text of my remarks will see that he has placed an entirely wrong construction upon them. I am quite prepared to leave it at that. As the right hon. gentleman well knows my objection to the length of time for which the government is seeking to bind this country has been in respect to something which, fundamentally, is entirely wrong, namely, a further increase of duties at this time in addition to all the duties which have already been imposed and further an attempt in large part to rivet these higher rates upon the country for the next five years.

Mr. RALSTON: The treaties to which my right hon. friend has referred were treaties which provided generous and assured preferences, and as such they were agreed to. I want for a moment, in connection with this article, to point out to the committee just what we have and what we have not in the way of assurance of preferences under this treaty. To what does this five years apply? What preferences do we get, and how many of these are unequivocally and unconditionally guaranteed for five years? First my right hon. friend says that we get free entry of our goods into the British market for five years. Well and good. There is nothing to say that every other country in the world does not get free entry also, except as to the few items to which I will refer. So I think we can leave the free entry out. I do not think my right hon. friend would argue that we have received a great concession on account of getting free entry, in view of the privilege of every other country to get free entry as well.

What else do we get? We get schedule C. Therein are listed six items on which there is a guarantee of unconditional, unequivocal preference for five years. That is to say, Great Britain undertakes that the duties on those six articles shall not be reduced without the consent of the Canadian government. What are those articles? Timber, fish, fresh, sea; salmon, canned; other fish, canned; asbestos; zinc; and lead. Putting them together, what they amount to is, timber, fish, fresh and canned, asbestos, zinc and lead. Now there are five articles. Let us look at these articles for a moment. Zinc and lead must be delivered at world prices before we get the preference—that leaves only timber; fish, fresh and canned; and asbestos, as the three items in this whole treaty as to which we are unconditionally guaranteed a five year preference at a certain rate, and the rate is ten per cent.

My right hon. friend will say: You are forgetting schedule B—

An hon. MEMBER: What about apples?

Mr. RALSTON: We will deal with that in a moment. Remember this schedule C, which is the only one as to which there is a guarantee that the duties will be kept up, deals only with timber, fish and asbestos, unconditionally; zinc and lead must be delivered to Great Britain at world prices or else the preference will not be allowed. Now what about schedule B? The provision of article 2 is that the government of Great Britain will invite the parliament of Great Britain to impose the duties set out in schedule B. I point out, as has been pointed out before, that there is no provision in this treaty which says that those duties having been imposed will be maintained for five years. On the contrary the provision which purports to fix the duration of duties follows after article 2; it is article 3, and it provides only that the duties in respect of schedule C are to be maintained for five years and says nothing about schedule B. Now what are the articles in schedule B? They are apples, raw and canned, pears, and dried fruits. It is provided that parliament will be invited to impose the duties mentioned in schedule B on these articles. But there are other articles, they are wheat and copper. Are they unconditional? Not a bit. You find that as to wheat and copper, the duties may be removed if they are not delivered at world prices on first sale. What other articles in schedule B? The right hon. Prime Minister will say dairy products. Let us look and see what the provisions of the agreement are as to those. Butter, cheese, eggs in shell, and condensed milk; he will say the five years applies to those articles. But he forgets schedule A. Schedule A says that those articles, butter, cheese, eggs in shell and condensed milk, need only be admitted free for three years, and that after three years Great Britain may impose duties on those articles so long as she maintains preferential margins; and they are very careful to say, not "existing" or "the" preferential margin, but just "preferential margins." The Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other night that he understood that to mean that Britain would maintain the existing preferential margins. If so it is remarkable that they did not say so. You find "existing" margin expressly mentioned in article 7, but not here. As far as the letter of this agreement is concerned—I am going to deal with the spirit in a moment—there is no provision whatever that the British duties on apples, pears and dried fruits shall be maintained against the rest of the world for five years. Secondly there is no provision that British duties on butter, cheese, eggs in shell and condensed milk shall not be imposed against Canada so as practically to wipe out any preference to Canada.

That is the situation. I have dealt with every article there is in that schedule. Now what is the result of it all? After we have got through we find, coming back to what I said first, that there are just three items in this whole schedule, timber, fish and asbestos as to which this five years unconditionally and expressly applies and on which a definite preference, a definite margin of ten per cent for five years is given. And the only three items to which that five years might apply without any condition are apples, raw and canned, pears and dried fruit. Wheat and copper have the condition that they must be sold at world prices. The same with zinc and lead. And butter, cheese, eggs in shell and condensed milk, that is dairy products, all have the provision that at the end of three years the free entry may cease and we may have a duty imposed against us, so that there will be practically no preference at all. That is all there is in this treaty as far as assured preferences are concerned, and that is all to which this five years applies.

But the Prime Minister will suggest that there is something in regard to tobacco, bacon and cattle. As to tobacco, the provision is that Great Britain will maintain a preference on our tobacco as long as she maintains a duty, but she may take the duty off at any time. In regard to bacon we know what the arrangement is: if Great Britain puts its house in order, if after the report of the pig commission an arrangement is made in regard to domestic production, if regulations are made then Canada will have 2,500,000 hundredweight of bacon admitted free to Britain. But it is "as, if and when." With regard to cattle the provision says that the arrangement which has already been made—not an arrangement made by this agreement—will be carried out. That is what we get from Great Britain; those are the things for which we make certain concessions.

What are the concessions? I am only going into that for just a moment. We give a fixed preferential margin on 223 tariff items. On 159 of those items we agree that the duty will remain at least as high as it is today for the next five years, because we are giving Great Britain free entry and we are agreeing to maintain the preferential margin, which means we have to keep the duty where it stands or put it higher. On 139 of these items the duty has been increased in order to get the concessions, as my right hon. friend would call them, in connection with this treaty, namely a fixed ten per cent duty on the items to which I have referred, plus the additional concessions which I have enumerated.

My right hon. friend will say we are attempting to cross "t's" and dot "i's," and that it is too strict a construction of this agreement. There has been a good deal of talk during these debates about good faith and about the spirit of the agreement. My right hon. friend used the words "warp and woof"; he said that we would find in the warp and woof of the agreement thus and so. I say to my right hon. friend that the British businessman's word is just as good as his bond; everyone admits that, but when you have required the bond from him, when you have got him to sign the bond, then he proposes to be bound by what the bond says and the bond is here. So far my right hon. friend has failed to produce a single sentence spoken by any statesman of Great Britain which changes or alters the construction which has been put upon this agreement from this side of the house. So far as we can learn everyone over in Great Britain believes that their tariff can be changed as to our goods going into Great Britain except the few I have mentioned. They believe that they can change the duties on these goods from time to time, if they so desire, and as a matter of fact they propose to change them. Even this tariff with regard to apples, pears and dried fruits can be changed; a newspaper article which was read the other night indicated that Great Britain considers that she does not have to maintain these duties for five years.

That is the situation, and when we talk about good faith we must remember that the gentlemen who came over here are skilled draftsmen; they met our representatives who are skilled draftsmen also, and together they drafted the agreement. It is not just a friendly letter from one to the other; it is a real, definite, binding document intended to be such, and I have no doubt that many hours were spent over the phrasing of this document. I do not expect that it will lie either in their mouths or in ours to say, "Well, true the agreement says that, but we meant something else." Least of all will it lie in our mouths to say that Great Britain is bound to maintain tariffs against the world in our favour on a general list of goods when the only provision we have required with regard to their maintaining tariffs is contained in clause 3, which has reference only to these six items included in schedule C. On the other hand Great Britain has been just as careful; in article 9 it is definitely provided, in effect, that we cannot reduce the preferential margins given on the goods set out in schedule E, which comprise 223 items. There you have the bargain which we are considering tonight.

I had a good deal of sympathy with the Prime Minister when he suggested that it was hardly fair that he should be asked to interpret this agreement. Why? Because he knows it will be interpreted in accordance with the letter of the agreement; because he knows there will be differences in connection with the interpretation. If it were simply a friendly letter, a memorandum in general terms, then he could have dealt with the spirit of it, but this is the agreement itself. He said to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, "I have read it and you have read it; see what you make out of it." He did not attempt to suggest that there was something else in the atmosphere of the agreement which would assist in its interpretation. The agreement is there, and I think I have put on the record fairly and exactly the effect of that agreement in accordance with the way it is written. So I do not think we should say that we expect the British to live up to this agreement in "good faith" as if there were some understanding outside the agreement itself. They will live up to it in good faith; they will live up to what they have signed, and they will say that what they have signed is this agreement, and no one can blame them for doing so.

Having received these things and having given these other things, what is the result? The result is that during these five years Great Britain can go to Switzerland, if you like, and say, "We want to buy clocks from you." She can go to the United States and say, "We want to buy some of your electrical manufactures, and we will bring down our tariff in order to do so." They may ask, "Yes, but have you not made an agreement with Canada?" Great Britain can reply, "Yes, but we did not agree to maintain a duty against you; we can let in clocks and electrical goods from Switzerland and the United States just as we let them in from Canada." They can deal with Germany in regard to cutlery and with Belgium in regard to glass and glass bottles, to take a few of the items mentioned by the Prime Minister. They can deal with Austria in regard to optical instruments and with the Orient in regard to carpets. They can deal with France in regard to toilet articles, and so on. Their hands are absolutely free; they can go to the world economic conference and say to any country, "We will take your goods free," or "we will impose a tariff of five per cent or ten per cent," as the case may be.

What is our position? With regard to 223 items our position is that we can make no bargain whatever with any other countries which will interfere with the margin of preference to Britain. This is the difference between the agreement now before us and other trade treaties, to which my right hon. leader has referred. We must say to any other country, "We cannot make any agreement with regard to these items; our tariff is fixed for the next five years. Britain is free; our hands are tied. Let us take our lumbermen when they go to sell their products. The other night my right hon. friend the Prime Minister intimated that this ten per cent preference would help the lumber business of Canada. I wish it would, but I am afraid that as against Finnish lumber, because of the exchange situation, our lumber will not get into the British market. Why are we looking for a market in Great Britain? The Prime Minister told us that formerly we sent 1,446,000,000 feet of lumber to the United States, and what did he say about our market in that country? He said that because of the United States import tax of $3 per thousand that market was practically closed to Canada. Why is it closed? Because of the tariff which my right hon. friend put on in 1930 and 1931, the red-blooded tariff which was talked about by the Minister of Railways. That led to the United States putting a duty of $3 per thousand and another duty of $1 per thousand against our lumber. The result is that we are frantically scurrying around looking for a market in which we can sell our lumber.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CANTLEY: There is nothing to that at all.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I suppose there is no relation between the two circumstances except that they happened to about synchronize. We put on the duty against the United States, and immediately the United States came back at us with a duty of $3 and $1 per thousand feet, and as a result we are looking for a market for 1,446,000,000 feet of lumber. Does my right hon. friend believe a ten per cent preference is going to find a market for that amount of lumber? According to the figures he gave us the most we ever sold to Great Britain under normal conditions was 186,000,000 feet, yet he expects that we are going to be able to market this vast quantity of Canadian lumber under a ten per cent preference. The same thing applies to fish. The Prime Minister said the United States market was closed to us; he said, "The United States high tariff makes wider markets elsewhere imperative". That United States high tariff is due in no small part to the tariff attitude of this government taken in 1930 and 1931. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance knows that the United States has been seriously considering imposing a duty on our live lobsters because of the attitude we take towards that country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, I know my hon. friends do not want to be responsible for their acts at all. They want to be able to shut out the foreigner; they want to close the door against the world and still be able to sell our goods everywhere. I say that cannot be done, and that is all there is to it.

That is the situation, Mr. Chairman, and that brings out the real difficulty facing us. We have tied our hands. We have lost the goodwill of good customers all over this globe, We are going to find it difficult to sell our wheat in competition with the man from the Argentine. He can go to the man in Europe and say, "Are you going to buy wheat from Canada? That is the country where they are shutting out the foreigner. We will give you a run for your money, but you cannot get Canada to take any commodities in exchange for their wheat. They are shutting out foreign products." With regard to our paper and wood products we must face competition in the United States market from Scandinavia. They will be able to tell their customers that we are the people who want to shut out foreign products. The same thing applies to cattle, to furs and to minerals. Here are two important objections to this agreement. In the first place it ties our hands completely in regard to any arrangements we might wish to make in order to sell our goods. In the second place it leaves a bad taste in the mouths of our customers and loses to us their goodwill.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the analysis I have made of the schedules contained in this treaty indicates that this five year provision means that we do all the giving for five years and get very little in the way of benefits. As my right hon. leader has said, we have used the United Kingdom agreement in order to tie ourselves definitely to a tariff higher than we ever had before, at the same time closing the markets of the world to us because we insist on closing our markets to the products of other countries.

On article 23:

In the event of circumstances arising which, in the judgment of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom or of His Majesty's government in Canada, as the case may be, necessitate a variation in the terms of the agreement, the proposal to vary those terms shall form the subject of consultation between the two governments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister whether this article really concedes anything more than would be conceded if it did not appear in the agreement at all?

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that the British advisers were of the opinion that, having regard to their experience, some such clause as this would serve a very useful purpose. The general legal principle is that where two parties to a contract agree to any variation or change, that variation or change may be made by reason of that agreement. This merely crystallizes in the form of an article in the agreement what would be an ordinary principle of law.

WAYS AND MEANS—UNEMPLOYMENT

PROPOSED COMMITTEE OR COMMISSION TO CONSIDER ECONOMIC SITUATION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire as a member of this house to direct attention to certain grievances and to ask redress from the government. We have now been in session about seven weeks, discussing important matters arising out of the Imperial economic conference. It is not my wish in any way to belittle the importance of that conference or to dispute the value of the agreements that have been arrived at and the discussion that has taken place thereon, but I do believe that there is at the present time something that is of far greater importance to this country, something that is agitating the minds of the people of Canada to a greater degree now than even these agreements which have been under consideration from the 6th day of October to the present moment.

We are going through a very severe economic crisis, the effects of which are being felt by all sections of the community, and in my opinion the house would better serve the interests of the people by discussing the economic conditions that prevail in this country than by engaging in such discussions as we have had during the past few weeks. In the course of the debate this evening the question of unemployment arose and figures were submitted to the house by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who made the statement that in Canada at this moment there are about three-quarters of a million persons out of work. From that statement there was a certain amount of dissent. I have attempted to analyse the figures given to the house recently by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) from the census returns and by every ordinary mathematical calculation I have made to arrive at the number of persons unemployed in Canada today, I have reached approximately the same figure as stated by my colleague. In view of the fact that some hon. members seem to dispute the figures given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, perhaps it might be well for me to suggest the method I have followed in my computation.

It is stated in the census returns that as at June 1, 1931, there were 392,809 persons unemployed in Canada. That was the total number. In addition to that, there was a temporary army of unemployed of 42,443, making a grand total of 435,252. Now, if that was the total as at June 1, 1931, how are we to arrive at the unemployment figure today? This is the way in which I arrived at the present figure. If I take the employment index figure as at September 1, 1929, which was the peak of employment in Canada, I find that it was 126·8, and on June 1, 1931, the index figure was down to 103·6. That meant, by percentages, that there was a reduction in employment in that period of approximately 18 per cent. If 18 per cent represents the difference between the index figures on September 1, 1929, and June 1, 1931, the question is, how shall we arrive at the figure at the present time? About September 1, 1929, there may have been out of work in Canada approximately 35,252 persons, and if at that time there were that number out of work, then there has been an increase of 400,000 between that date in 1929 and June 1, 1931. Now, between June 1, 1931, and October 1, 1932, the index figure of employment has dropped to 86·7, which means a further reduction of 16 per cent. If 18 per cent represents 400,000 unemployed, then an additional reduction of 16 per cent would bring the total number of unemployed to approximately 750,000.

I am not stating these figures in order to make capital out of them but simply in order that we may have the facts clearly before us; it will then be easier for us to adopt a more intelligent attitude towards this question than has been adopted for a number of years past.

I hope the party flavour will not be permitted to enter into this discussion. When party passions rise we are apt to lose sight of the importance of the matter under consideration, and at times we indulge in the sport of one party getting after the other. This is probably the most serious unemployment situation ever faced by this country, and I hope hon. gentlemen will not forget the vast number of unemployed and those who are dependent upon them.

As I have stated, the unemployed number about 750,000. The census figures show an employable total of 2,500,000, so it would appear that more than twenty-five per cent of our total employable population is without employment. If we discuss the past, I hope we will discuss it in such a way as to be a guide to our future actions. If we learn from experience, we should be better equipped to guide ourselves in what we may do for the future. There have been many discussions in this house in the past upon unemployment. Going back to 1925, when I was first elected to this house, I cannot remember a session when I did not raise this problem in one way or another. Therefore, I do not feel that I need to apologize, especially under present conditions, for raising this question and asking redress from the government.

It has been stated in some quarters that this problem is of a temporary character. But it has been confronting us ever since the crash and debacle of 1929; from that time onward things have been going from bad to worse until today we have reached a situation where no one can predict what will happen in the immediate future. When a condition such as this has prevailed for about three years, I do not think anyone will be bold enough to say it is temporary in character. Prosperity has been promised to us for many years, but it seems to be as far away as ever. We have been told it is "just around the corner," that we have "reached the bottom," that there are "signs of a revival," but I do not think these statements are taken seriously now by many people in the dominion.

The government has attempted to deal with this problem; only the other day the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), informed the house that there were 800,000 souls being fed by the government. That is a stupendous number, about eight per cent of our total population, yet it does not take into consideration those who are being looked after through other sources. The old manner of dealing with the unemployment problem apparently has proved to be inadequate. We have failed to find a solution of the problem; we have failed to improve conditions, and I think it is about time we looked in other directions for relief. As one branch of parliament we have great responsibilities which cannot be overlooked, even though some would like to overlook them. The people of this country are looking to parliament for redress; they have elected us as members of the House of Commons in the hope that we may be able to improve conditions. I have no doubt that every hon. member of this house said something about unemployment when he stood for election a little over two years ago. He promised he would try to bring about better and improved conditions for those whom he hoped to represent in this house. If the unemployed of this country cannot look to parliament for redress, I wonder in which direction they will look? In my humble opinion this parliament is the only place where the vast masses of our people can look to for redress at the present time. We were sent to this house by the votes of human beings, we are here to represent human beings more than we are here to represent property rights or property interests. When we deal with questions so important as unemployment, the human element should receive our first consideration.

As a nation I believe we are today wealthier than ever before in our history, yet, paradoxical as it may seem, in this year 1932, the more bread we have, the more breadlines there are; the more shoes we produce, the more shoeless there are; the more clothes we manufacture, the more there are without clothes; the more homes we build, the more there are looking for shelter; the more wealth we produce, the greater is the poverty. If such conditions exist, then it is up to parliament to study these problems, perhaps from a different angle than that from which they have been studied in the past, and discuss them in the light of newer methods than have been adopted in the past in Canada and other parts of the world.

I think the people of this generation have more understanding. They have a little more education than our fathers or those who have gone before us, and they see the things to which I have just referred. They see this tremendous abundance accompanied by great poverty. This unemployment problem is one which this parliament ought not to attempt to shelve; it is a problem which should be dealt with and this parliament should not adjourn until it has been dealt with.

Even with this tremendous accumulation of wealth and commodities, because of the lack of opportunity to the average person in this country to have access to this consumable wealth, our workshops are more or less at a standstill and men and women in large numbers are out of employment. Not only are there large numbers out of employment but there are hundreds of thousands of people who are today working short time and earning hardly sufficient to keep body and soul together. We have idle men, idle women and idle factories as well as a tremendous amount of consumable goods lying idle in our warehouses. It would appear that industry and finance under their private ownership have failed completely to function and have been responsible for bringing about the present crisis. I think it is the duty of parliament to attempt at least to find a way out of the difficulties which confront us. The financial debacle of recent years has not affected our wealth one iota. It is quite true that paper fortunes have disappeared; that people who a few years ago thought they were wealthy find today that they may not be as wealthy as they thought they were; but that does not mean that the real wealth of the country has disappeared from our midst. The real wealth of the country lies in our factories, workshops, warehouses and natural resources. It is only when those natural resources have applied to them the labour power of the people that real wealth is produced, and today we have that in abundance. We have more up-to-date equipment in our factories than we have ever had before in our history, but at the present time, as a result of the chaotic conditions through which we are passing, we are not producing anything for the benefit of the great masses of the people.

I might cite as an example of what I have just stated to the house a case which occurs to my mind. I refer to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am citing that, not because I have anything in particular against that institution. but because it comes to my mind at the moment. A few years ago the shares of that company reached a value of something like $250 each, and at that time the people who owned them thought they possessed a great deal of wealth. Those shares have dropped to about $60—I am speaking approximately—and those who thought they were wealthy found the largest part of their wealth had disappeared; what they thought was worth $250 is worth today only about $60. No real wealth however has disappeared; the only thing that disappeared was the value of those shares, and it did so because the railway was not utilized to the same extent as it was in previous years and is not able to pay the dividends it formerly did. But in spite of the fact that the shares may be only a quarter of what they were previously, the whole of the rolling stock, equipment, roadbed, hotels, steamships, are here today exactly as they were a few years ago. What applies to the Canadian Pacific applies to practically every other industrial concern in the dominion. What has disappeared, to a very large extent, is values, but the wealth of the country is present today—in probably greater abundance —than it has ever been before in our history.

If our industries are not functioning—and we know they are not—one of the duties of parliament should be at least to attempt to see that they function and that the men who were formerly employed in them are again employed and given an opportunity of earning a decent livelihood. For many years all these industries which have been under private ownership and control have to a certain degree been able to accumulate profits; they have continued to operate as long as profits were in sight, but the moment profits are not available, those industries naturally cease to function. Then the question immediately occurs to my mind: What should be the purpose of industry? In my opinion the purpose of industry should be primarily to satisfy the wants of the human beings within the community. But such is not the case. Today the primary purpose of industry is not to supply the needs of the human beings in the community, but to see that those who own the industries reap their rewards and profit from them.

There is no doubt that at the present time we are facing an acute economic crisis. This is not the first time in the history of Canada that we have faced a crisis. My mind goes back to the time of the war when we were facing a very severe external crisis, and when the government of the day mobilized, so far as it could, the man power of the country and found that under the circumstances it had the right to call upon human beings to give their lives, if need be, in coming to the rescue of the state. If in a time of crisis the life of a human being is not too sacred for the government to lay hands upon, I think we can at least afford to take courageous action in the present circumstances, and even if we go to the extent of doing something which might impair property rights, we would be quite justified in taking such steps. I believe the present emergency is in many respects even greater than that of 1914. We have today not an external crisis, but an internal one where three-quarters of a million people find themselves without employment and, what is even worse, without any prospect in the immediate future of their being absorbed into any kind of industry. I want the house for a moment to attempt to realize what that means—three-quarters of a million people, men and women, tramping the streets day in and day out, week in and week out, looking for a job when there is no job, and then perhaps after a time, against their will, being compelled to seek public assistance in order to keep body and soul together! I know many of those men who are out of work; I know the difficulty and the tremendous ordeal it must be for them, probably for the first time in their lives, to be compelled to go to a public body and ask for assistance. The first time it is done with extreme reluctance; the second time is not so hard as the first; the third is not so hard as the second and the fourth is even easier than the third. Finally they reach a stage where we ourselves, as a result of our inaction in this internal crisis, have demoralized perhaps hundreds of thousands of our own people. I should like to impress upon the house the seriousness of that aspect of the situation—hundreds of thousands of people in this dominion, so rich in its resources and wealth, with no hope or prospect of being able to accomplish anything in the immediate future in the way of earning their own livelihood.

We have been told many a time in this house about the courage and fortitude of our Canadian people. I wish a little courage could be shown in this house and that we would take courageous action in order to meet the existing crisis. Parliament has a duty; it also has certain functions. I believe the first function of parliament is to govern, and the second is to see that our people are fed, clothed and sheltered. I am not going to say how the latter function is to be fulfilled, but I believe these are two of the main functions of government. The state is supposed to be the guardian of public rights and public well-being. If we at this juncture in our history admit our impotence to deal with the present economic situation, then this is an admission of our total unfitness and inability to govern. Parliament in its supremacy has allowed institutions to grow up that are more powerful than parliament itself. It is high time that parliament, having over a period of years allowed those institutions to grow up and become as powerful as they are today, should re-assert its supremacy and be what it ought to be, the sovereign body in the land.

During the past fifteen or twenty years production in Canada as well as in other parts of the world has increased by leaps and bounds. One would have thought that with the enormous increase in production during the last fifteen or twenty years there would have been increased happiness and increased contentment among the great masses of people. Untortunately that has not been so. Increased production has merely meant an increased spread between wages and production, and the benefit of it has gone to comparatively few people in Canada.

For a few moments I should like to direct my remarks to production, consumption and wages. Statistics show that during the past few years the average production of a person in employment has increased approximately 50 per cent; in other words every person working in industries over a period of fifteen years has shown an increase in his productive capacity or efficiency of approximately fifty per cent. During that same period wages have increased comparatively little, and the whole advantage from increased productivity has gone to comparatively few people. It has also been shown that wages today in relation to production are only about twenty-five per cent; in other words, I think our statistics show that a person receiving $1,000 per year in wages is producing $4,000 worth of commodities. I claim therefore that unless that spread between wages and production is narrowed down, made much smaller than it is, there is no hope of solving the problem of unemployment, because the money received by a person in wages represents his purchasing power. If he can buy back only one-quarter of that which he produces there is bound to be an accumulation of commodities which will not be consumed, and the greater the accumulation the greater ultimately is the problem of unemployment.

When I refer to production and wages, and say that I want to narrow down the spread, I do not wish hon. members to think that I would narrow it down by reducing production. First of all, I wish to see real wages increased. Secondly, I wish to see production kept at a high level, because I still believe the more capital goods we can produce, the more consumable goods we can produce, the better it should be for all concerned. I do say, however, that there ought to be a reasonable level between production and consumption, otherwise we shall continue to be faced with problems with which we are confronted today. I do not wish to cut down production; far from it. I want to increase consumption. Some people in recent months have advocated cutting down production. I am opposed to cutting down in any way our productive capacity; on the contrary I should prefer to begin at the other end of the problem and make an effort to increase the consumptive opportunities of the Canadian people. Therefore when I speak of balanced production, or reasonably balanced production and consumption, I imply an opportunity to increase our consumption to an extent much greater than obtains at the present time.

At this point I am pleased to observe that in recent weeks the Prime Minister himself has been discussing the matter from a very different angle than usual. It would seem that recently his views are changed from those he held in past years. I note that on November 4 the right hon. gentleman spoke in the city of Montreal and discussed briefly the problem of unemployment. The heading in the Montread Star is as follows:

Accusations answered in fighting speech here.

Then follow the Prime Minister's remarks:

The cataclysm that has struck our civilization is a catastrophe of a universal scale, it has touched every country in the world and the hundreds of thousands and millions of unemployed that we find in every part of the world are the direct result of overproduction, underdistribution and buying, the lessening of purchasing power and the development of all those tendencies that are attributable to the Great war and its after effects.

I must congratulate the Prime Minister on the great advance he has made, and I hope he will continue to show the same progress in the future as is reflected in his speech delivered in Montreal. However there are some further comments attributed to him about which I am not so enthusiastic. He said:

When that was once realized, we then understood clearly that no action of Canada with its 10,000,000 souls could make any perceptible dint on this terrible catastrophe.

That was also part of the Prime Minister's statement concerning the problem of unemployment, but with this latter assertion I cannot agree. True, we are suffering from a world condition; true, again, people in Canada are no doubt suffering in part, from conditions prevailing in other parts of the world. But if we have in Canada hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat, and if the people in China, Japan or other parts of the world cannot buy our wheat, that is no excuse for people within our own borders being without bread. If we have a surplus of all commodities and people in other parts of the world are unable to consume those commodities, that is no reason why our Canadian people should do without the things produced within the dominion. If other countries cannot buy our goods, at least we should put that purchasing power into the hands of our own people and give them the opportunity to buy the things which we are producing in superabundance.

The crisis through which we are passing has not been visited upon us by some supernatural force. This is a man-made crisis, and if it is man-made, if we are in some degree responsible, I think there should be, and I have no doubt there is, sufficient intelligence among our own people to enable us to get out of it. This government and other governments have made efforts to deal with the unemployment problem. A good many remedies have been tried. The present government has put into effect a great deal of legislation designed to meet an emergent situation. I state frankly that the government has done a great deal by way of direct relief and creating relief works but relief and relief works are not a cure for unemployment.

I do not wish to take up too much time of the house, but I should like to deal with one or two aspects of the question of unemployment. First, there are the men, women and children who are without any visible means of subsistence at the present time, and to whom immediate attention must be given. In connection with them there is a necessity for direct relief pure and simple. For their comfort the government have done a great deal, but its activities have been purely administrative. If the amount of relief is not sufficient—and many people say it is not—then we are faced with a question of administrative action to raise the amount of relief sufficient to meet the needs of the unemployed. At the moment, however, I am more deeply concerned with the problem of unemployment than in the relief of the unemployed. I think I am not limited, Mr. Speaker, to forty minutes on this occasion, as I intend to move an amendment which will perhaps give me the extra time that I desire. A few moments ago I said I wanted the house to take courageous action on this question of unemployment. I know the amendment I am about to move will not at first sight look so very courageous, but I think that before we take action we should at least have more information before us, and under the circumstances I would hardly expect the whole house to sit and discuss in detail this very important question. Therefore I think it desirable to have a committee or commission go into this question of unemployment in the most thorough way possible, and my amendment will deal with the question of the appointment of such a committee or commission. Then I will deal with what I should like to be the terms of reference to such body. I therefore move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

That in the opinion of this house it is desirable that a committee or commission be appointed to consider the economic situation in the dominion with special reference to unemployment and to report back during the present session of parliament.

I have said that in dealing with this unemployment question we have tried the method of relief, we have tried public works, and neither of these has been found to be a remedy for the situation. We have tried tariffs, and tariffs have not solved the problem. We have tried reductions in wages, and that has only accentuated the problem. We have tried dismissing men and women from employment, and our lead was followed by a great many other people, but that again has only aggravated the problem and in no way tended towards a solution. In Great Britain, where they are faced with a somewhat similar situation, they thought a year or so ago that their solution lay in remaining on the gold standard. Then when they went off the gold standard they thought that by doing so their problem would be solved. But neither remaining on nor going off the gold standard has proved to be a solution. In view of all the efforts made in this parliament and in other countries, I think it is obvious that there is something radically wrong with the whole of our economic structure, that the conditions which have existed for three years will not yield to the methods which have been adopted by this and other governments. Therefore I claim that it is the duty of this parliament to attempt to find a way out of the difficulty. Many men and women today are expressing keen dissatisfaction with the existing order of things. They feel that perhaps we have to look for a new social order to provide the way out. For these reasons I ask that this matter be referred to a committee or commission for investigation.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What is your suggestion for the cure of unemployment?

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend has heard me speak in this house on many occasions and I have put forward many a time my own method of dealing with this question. If I had not moved this amendment I would have been very happy to deal more exhaustively with what I would suggest as a way out. In putting my amendment, which is seconded by my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I would like to refer to that committee or commission eight items which I suggest should be the terms of reference.

First, I would like it to consider ways and means of eliminating unemployment—a rather tall order, I admit. Second, I would like it to consider the question of jurisdiction as between federal and provincial governments; third, seasonal unemployment; fourth, technological unemployment; fifth, reduction of hours of labour; sixth, increase of real wages; seventh, annual productive capacity and consumption in relation thereto, and also the potential productive capacity of the Dominion of Canada; and eighth, the spread between wages and production.

I do not know whether at any previous time this House of Commons has ever appointed a committee or commission to consider questions of the kind to which I have just referred. I know that in 1919 a commission was appointed by this parliament that dealt with the internal unrest. They made an exhaustive investigation, lasting approximately two months. From the time the order in council was passed until that commission reported back to parliament less than three months' time was consumed. In their report they said that the chief causes of unrest were, first, unemployment and the fear of unemployment. That was away back in 1919. Later in the report they recommended an immediate inquiry into the question of state insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. During all the intervening period of about thirteen and a half years this parliament outside of the couple of years that we inquired into the question of unemployment insurance, and the promise which the right hon. Prime Minister made to introduce legislation during the life of this parliament dealing with the question—and I hope that promise will be carried out in the near future—except for that we have done nothing fundamental with the unemployment problem, and today we are faced with the most serious problem that we have ever been faced with in the history of Canada. Therefore I think it is time this parliament took action.

I know it may be said by some that this is a provincial question. But I do not think so, because already this parliament has footed a very large part of the unemployment costs. I know that in the election of 1930, as well as on previous occasions, unemployment was the chief issue, and it was that on which the people of this country voted as they did in 1930. Now we have to go back to our consituencies when this parliament adjourns in the next week or so, and face our constituents. We have got to face people who are out of work. I know that when I go back to my own constituency, or almost any constituency in Canada, and address the people on questions of the hour, the first question that is always put to me is: What is parliament doing about economic conditions? What is parliament doing about the unemployment situation? So far this session what could I tell them? We have done practically nothing. We have been in session six or seven weeks and up to now have not discussed in any fundamental or even ordinary way the question of unemployment. Therefore I would ask the house to give to my amendment that consideration which I believe it deserves. I have not put it before the house with the idea of attempting to shelve the question of unemployment, I would like the government to understand that. I have asked that the committee or commission deal with this question immediately and in a fundamental way, because I believe that if they do that, they would be bound to come back with some fundamental suggestions to deal with the problem, which so far we have not faced in the way it ought to be faced.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country together with the people in other parts of the world are going through a very difficult period. In other countries we see governments tottering, we see upheavals, we see men and women hungry and appealing in one way or another for the chance to earn a decent, honest livelihood. For many years the great masses of the people in this country, as well as those in other parts of the world, put up a stern fight for what we might term a political democracy, for the right to vote and have their own representatives in parliament to express their opinions. That fight has been won; it is almost history today. Now there is another fight to be won; we are entering upon another phase of civilization. Today it is a question not of a political democracy but of an industrial democracy in which the great masses of the people of this country will have the opportunity to enjoy the fruits of their labour, to work and help build up a state worth while, a state in which every able-bodied man and woman can do something, in his or her own way, for the good of the country, which will look upon the individual as a part of the state and give to him an opportunity of working and living in decency, comfort and happiness. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will accept the suggestions I have made and start to deal with this very important question in a fundamental way.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I rise merely to direct attention to a rule that has been observed in this parliament since we have had a parliament. I refer to the rule that a matter debated and disposed of should not be raised again during the same session. Rightly or wrongly the matter was presented in an amendment to the address, moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition, in these words:

> Whilst reserving any expression of view upon the merits of the agreements concluded at the recent Imperial economic conference, this house is of the opinion that the tariff policies of the present administration have seriously injured the trade of Canada . . .

Then later:

> The house regrets that, except the dole, the government has no policy with respect to the relief of unemployment.

That will be found at pages 80 and 81 of the votes and proceedings. Then a subamendment was moved in which the currency question was under consideration, and it was alleged that the effect of the changes recommended by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), would be to provide employment for our people. That was the substance of the subamendment. On those motions the house divided; on the subamendment the vote was 18 to 66, and on the amendment 30 to 60.

There is no more salutary rule than that once the debate is concluded and the vote taken, the same question shall not be again raised during the same session. The matter was debated at very considerable length on the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and it was competent to those who now have moved this amendment to have moved a subamendment, because in either event the motion is one of want of confidence. May also lays down the rule that inasmuch as in the estimates there is an amount of $975,000 in this connection, the motion is out of order.

But whether you invoke the first or the second rule, the one thing clear is that opportunity for discussion has been offered. That opportunity was availed of, with the result that the amendment and the subamendment to which I have referred were negatived. The government has no objection to the fullest possible discussion of any question, within the rules, on going into committee of ways and means or supply, but it is another thing altogether when a motion of want of confidence is raised in this manner. Therefore I regard it as my duty to direct attention to the fact that the rules of the house do not contemplate more than one debate on the same matter during the same session, involving in either case a motion of want of confidence in the administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would you please read, Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps)? I did not hear it very distinctly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member moved:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

That in the opinion of this house it is desirable that a committee or commission be appointed to consider the economic situation in the dominion with special reference to unemployment and to report back during the present session of parliament.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can say that the subamendment dealt with the question of unemployment except incidentally. The word unemployment was mentioned; the fact that we had unemployment, depression and a number of other things was set out in the preamble of that subamendment, but it would require a long stretch of the imagination indeed to rule that the question of unemployment in Canada was threshed out in connection with the subamendment. I submit that the rule invoked by the Prime Minister does not apply to the subamendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that; I said it might have been discussed. I did not say it was fully discussed. I said it was debated and that it could have been discussed to the fullest possible extent under the amendment and subamendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But unless it was discussed and voted upon the rule would not apply.

Mr. BENNETT: It was discussed on the amendment.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, my submission is that the motion made by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) is entirely different from the substance of either the amendment moved by my right hon. leader on November 4, or the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod. Both the amendment and the subamendment dealt with the failure of government policy in regard to the unemployment situation, but as I understand the amendment now being moved it is an entirely new matter. It asks that a committee or commission be set up to investigate the economic situation in regard to unemployment and has nothing whatever to say in regard to government policy or lack of policy. It is an entirely new matter that has not been discussed in the house this session, and therefore is entirely in order.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will not repeat what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has just said, but I wanted to raise the same argument. I refer your honour to page 330 of Bourinot, to show that even if the present amendment were part of a former motion it would be in order. On the question of the renewal of a question during a session Bourinot says:

If a motion has been negatived, it cannot be afterwards proposed in the shape of an amendment. In case a motion has been withdrawn it may be again proposed, as the house has not previously determined the question, and it is only in the latter event that the same question may not be revived. If an amendment has been negatived, a similar amendment cannot be proposed on a future day. It has been decided, however, in the Canadian Commons, that an amendment is in order when it comprises only a part and not the whole of a resolution previously voted on by the house.

This is not even a part of the amendment moved to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): There is one aspect of the objection which has been raised by the Prime Minister which should not be disregarded. The Prime Minister says in effect that this is a motion of want of confidence. Not having May or Bourinot at hand I must rely on my memory, which I think is pretty good. It will be seen, both in May and Bourinot, that a motion in amendment to a motion to go into supply or into committee of ways and means is not of necessity a motion of want of confidence. More than that, I was a witness myself to the government accepting an amendment to that effect, if the wording of the amendment and the spirit of it were not in condemnation of the government's policy.

Now, the basic difference between the motion made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg and that part of the motion made by the leader of the opposition in the debate on the address is this. Reference to unemployment in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition was a condemnation of the government for their neglect; this is a suggestion which bears no signification of blame whatever. Therefore the government is at liberty either to accept or to reject it. Suppose the government in their wisdom found that the working of such a commission would help them; by accepting this suggestion they would be doing what Mr. Fielding did on one occasion which I related to this house a few weeks ago, the occasion upon which a friend of the government, Mr. Russell, the member for Halifax, offered a suggestion the effect of which was to induce the government to change their policy.

Mr. BENNETT: That happened in connection with the Australian treaty.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes. I remember also another occasion when Mr. Costigan—I think it was he—made a motion which came very near condemning the government; nevertheless it was accepted by Sir John Macdonald because the government found in it some suggestion which they thought might be useful to them.

I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister that the basic difference between the present motion and the motion which was made by the leader of the opposition lies in the fact that this suggestion is not by way of condemnation of the government, but is rather advice to parliament to adopt a certain measure. I think that for the future, as well as in this instance, the Prime Minister would be well advised to withdraw at least that part of his objection to the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I mention to the Prime Minister that when the government of the day was considering the reciprocity agreement with the United States, or to proposed changes of the tariff in relation thereto, the house was about to be moved into committee of ways and means, and the Hon. Mr. Monk at the time introduced an amendment which was accepted by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. And that was an amendment not altogether different in spirit from the one which has just been made; is was declaratory of certain rights of the commons in one or two particulars, and it was accepted by the government of the day. The government was about to consider tariff items, just as we are at this very moment, and I think that precedent is a complete answer to what my right hon. friend has said.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I hardly think a government could accept the present motion as anything but a motion of want of confidence. The motion is a tacit condemnation of the government. It calls for a committee to do something which the government has not seen fit to do and therefore, as I say, it is a tacit condemnation of the policy of the government, and as such is a vote of want of confidence which must be resisted. Now, the question of unemployment has actually been discussed and voted upon during the present session. That is the main thing to consider. The subject has been under discussion and a vote of this chamber has been taken in regard to it. That, Mr. Speaker, rules further discussion, either by way of this amendment or by any other motion, out of order during the present session. The other point raised by the Prime Minister is one which is worth considering too. This whole matter will be under discussion on the estimates; there is an item for unemployment in the estimates. Surely there is some termination to discussions in this parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister before he sits down whether that item in the estimates does not relate to one particular class of the unemployed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is called to my attention that it is a vote for unemployment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has reference only to pensioners.

Mr. GUTHRIE: However, I am not going to dwell on that point. I merely emphasize the main point, namely, that the matter has already been discussed and decided during the present session and cannot be discussed again.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it would be quite possible, under the interpretation which the Prime Minister has attempted to give to the rules of procedure, and in accordance with what the Minister of Justice has said, to shut off discussion of this very item at any time during this session. It would make the speech from the throne comprehensive enough to embrace every question, and the speech having been voted upon no question discussed thereunder might be brought up again. There is no one in this house, may I say, who has availed himself more freely in the past of this very opportunity which I am now seeking than the Prime Minister. I have in my hand Hansard 1930—

Mr. BENNETT: The question now before the house, Mr. Speaker, is a question of order.

Mr. HEAPS: I am dealing with the question of order. In 1930, I remember, a similar motion was made and was discussed, and there was no question as to the propriety of the motion, after the speech from the throne had been voted upon and an amendment somewhat similar to the one now before us had been discussed. On the motion to go into supply an amendment was moved dealing with unemployment. I will read the amendment to show the difference between the motion made two years ago and the motion now before the house. That motion read:

That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following be substituted:

"in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment."

I was glad to observe on March 31, 1930, that the present Prime Minister voted for that amendment. I submit that if the interpretation which the right hon. gentleman now endeavours to put upon the rules of procedure is accepted it will narrow discussion to the point where private members will have practically no redress whatever.

The Minister of Justice has referred to the item in the estimates dealing with unemployment. May I read the item, which appears under administration of justice. There are the following headings: penitentiaries, legislation, agriculture, pensions, mail subsidies and steamship subventions, miscellaneous. Then:

Pensions and National Health—unemployment relief—further amount required, $975,000.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

It is for unemployment relief only so far as pensioners are concerned, and when we are in committee on that item the Chairman may quite possibly confine the discussion to that one particular aspect of the unemployment situation. We have not yet reached that item in the estimates, but if the interpretation which the Minister of Justice puts upon the rule is sustained, when the general estimates come before the house it will be impossible to raise any question that is not strictly relevant to that particular item. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that on this occasion, as custodian of the rights of private members, you will come to our assistance and rule the amendment in order.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I would remind the Minister of Justice that when a similar amendment was before the house in 1930 he took a view diametrically opposite to that which he has expressed to night, because I recall his words, wherein he stated that the government need not accept as a motion of want of confidence, the amendment then proposed. I just wish to remind him of that fact.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It all depends on the motion.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Anything was good enough to get into power in those days.

Mr. SPEAKER: As this is a very important question affecting the interpretation of the rules of the house, I will reserve my decision until three o'clock tomorrow. Only twenty minutes remain of this evening's session and I shall compare the amendment moved earlier in the session with the amendment now before the house before deciding upon the question.

Mr. BENNETT: In the meantime, the discussion can proceed on the motion to go into ways and means. It is only the question of the amendment that I am directing attention to, but there is no reason why the discussion should not proceed for the next twenty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no reason why the debate on the motion to go into committee should not be continued regardless of whether or not the amendment is found to be in order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under the circumstances, would your honour call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Labour wanted to speak.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have I a right to speak?

An hon. MEMBER: The minister has the floor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have I a right to speak now?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is in order in speaking.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): My colleague has discussed the extent to which unemployment has grown in this country. I do not think anyone can doubt the seriousness of the situation. The census figures as at June 1, 1931, show 471,668 unemployed, but this figure may have included some who were unemployed through sickness. However, I submit that it does not include those who were working for themselves or those who never had jobs. There must also be added the large numbers of young people who have not as yet been absorbed into industry. I submit that there is no prospect of improvement in the immediate future. The indices of business conditions are not favourable. It is true the Prime Minister as a professional optimist, along with Mr. Hoover, another professional optimist, may tell us that everything is on the mend, but that viewpoint is not borne out by a careful study of business indices. I think we are safe in assuming that there is no sign of relief upon the horizon; indeed the primary causes of unemployment would seem to be permanent. I should like to call the attention of the house to a very suggestive article which appears in the New Outlook of November, 1932. This is an article by Wayne W. Parrish and is entitled "What is Technocracy?" Since there are certain hon. members who do not read these articles upon the economic situation, I propose to read a few extracts. The first is:

> The ancient miller of Athens or Rome ground out in a day, between his two crude milling stones, a barrel to a barrel and a half of indifferent flour. A modern flour mill in Minneapolis produces 30,000 barrels a day per man with a much shorter day and a much better flour. But for whom?
> A shoemaker of ancient Rome took five and a half days to make a pair of shoes. The 7,200 shoemakers in the shoemakers' guild of Roman days would make only 7,200 pairs of shoes in five and a half days. The same number of employees in a modern shoe plant in five and a half days would produce 595,000 pairs of shoes. But for whom?
> The brickmakers for over five thousand years never attained on the average more than 450 bricks a day per man,—a day being over ten hours. A modern straightline continuous brick plant will produce over 400,000 bricks a day per man. . . .
> A photograph of a modern steel rolling mill in full operation will show a large plant without a human being on the floor. . . . Machines were recently installed which produce 2,500 to 2,600 cigarettes a minute, compared with the previous maximum of 500 to 600 cigarettes a minute. . . . A still more fantastic illustration is in incandescent lamp manufacture, where one man is doing today in one hour as much as it took him 9,000 hours to do only so short a time past as 1914. It required only a force of thirty-seven men six weeks to build this high-speed machine. . . . In pig iron production one man working one hour can do what it took him 650 hours to accomplish fifty years ago. In agriculture one man can do in one hour what it required 3,000 hours for him to accomplish in 1840. A still more striking example is a Milwaukee plant with its daily output capacity of 10,000 automobile chassis frames and 34 miles of pipe line with a total of 208 men in the plant. . . . Technocracy tells us that with what is known now about the application of technology, the adult population of this nation would have to work only four hours a day for four days a week to supply us with all our material needs.

If the statement of these technicians is at all correct, it is manifest that our present way of dealing with unemployment is nonsensical and that we must find some fundamental solution of this problem. I quote again:

> The steam engine was introduced, electric power came into being, and within one hundred years we have multiplied the original output rate of the first, or human, engine by 9,000,000, as expressed in a modern energy transversion unit! But most significant of all is the astounding fact that most of this advance, or 8,766,000 of the 9,000,000 increase, has come within the last thirty years. Is it any wonder that our ancient political system is hopelessly incompetent to furnish the rigorous and exacting technical control necessary to save our highly powered industrial system from collapse?. . . It is after sober, scientific review of such facts that our engineers report that we are faced with the threat of national bankruptcy and perhaps general chaos within eighteen months. . . . We have been attempting to operate the delicate controls of a high-powered energy civilization with methods that were crude enough in the ox-cart days when almost every home was self-sufficient and independent. . . . We are faced with the problem of having to desert a system that has become obsolete and at the same time of designing a system to take its place.

I submit that the present relief policy is wholly inadequate, resulting as it does in hardship and demoralization. Indeed, I do not know that it can be said that the government has a policy on relief matters. It had when it came into office, and I think that policy can be summed up in three sentences uttered by the Prime Minister, as appear in Hansard of September 10, 1930. At that time he said:

> Many of us who sit on this side of the chamber believe that the policies of a government in a new country with practically untouched resources are responsible for unemployment.

That is what the Prime Minister believed in 1930; now he says the policies of the government are not responsible for unemployment. He has completely reversed his position. He continued:

> But a problem, local and provincial in its nature, may become a national problem, and this particular problem has become a national one.

That was said when we had only half the unemployed we have to-day. Again he has reversed his position; he says now the problem is primarily one for the provinces and the municipalities. He continued:

> The basis of these measures is work, not charity. It is to provide employment for wages, and not for doles.

Yet a few days ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) rose in his place and told us that 800,000 people were on the dole. As yet the government has not stated even a general relief policy. I noticed the other day that representatives of the western provinces were down here and had asked the government to give forty cents per man per day, but the government has apparently not decided to give even that. This is the situation at which we have arrived after these months and years of control by the present administration. The best we can hope to get is perhaps forty cents per day per man, and that is to be charity, a dole.

Mr. ROBINSON: And food and clothing, don't forget that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Men to be given this without doing any work at all. They are to be fed and clothed for forty cents a day. I mean they are given forty cents a day.

Mr. MALONEY: With board.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, without board.

Mr. MALONEY: Terrible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman is facetious. I wonder whether he knows what it means to try to live on forty cents a day. I hope he will return to his constituents and endeavour to tell them he expects them to live on forty cents a day when even members of parliament get considerably more than that, when high officials in this country get a great deal more, when great industrial magnates receive thousands of dollars a day.

Mr. MALONEY: That is some argument.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wonder whether any man can live on forty cents a day; and I believe the government is not willing to provide even that.

An hon. MEMBER: More raving.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I understood a few minutes ago I was given the floor. If I am to be constantly interrupted in this way I shall have to ask your intervention. At least if I am to be interrupted I must ask your honour to allow me a reasonable time for interruptions. Am I to be given an opportunity to present my case before the house without interruption?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not heard any interruption that seriously prevents the hon. member from continuing his address. I have called for order several times when interjections have been offered, and I hope no more will be made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thank you. The question is: What can be done? I should like to enumerate briefly some things that can be done. First, the Canadian people can be decently fed, clothed and housed, and no government has any claim upon the loyalty of the people that does not provide at least that for them. Second, I would say that socially necessary work may be provided. The Prime Minister should come back to his original idea and provide for people work at which they can earn wages and thus be enabled to live. Third, the hours can be reduced without reducing wages. That may cause laughter in some quarters. Unless wages are maintained at the old scale, it would be useless from an economic standpoint to reduce the hours; it would simply mean a few more people would be put to work and the economic situation would not be helped. But I submit that if 750,000 people, or practically a quarter of the people engaged in gainful occupations in this country, are out of work, the work should be spread around. I know some will say that industry cannot stand this and I am quite willing to admit that industry as now constituted cannot stand it. Then I would say that industry must be put upon another basis. I am quite convinced that industry today cannot at the same time provide dividends and also decent living wages, and under those conditions we must consider the possibility of the reorganization of industry.

The next question may readily come: How finance any such arrangement as I have suggested? I admit that that is a difficult thing for any government, because I believe again we have arrived at the position where we cannot at the same time pay the interest on our debts and give services. That is the dilemma which faces almost every government today. We cannot at the same time pay interest on our indebtedness and give the services needed by the people. This government seems determined that whatever else happens we must pay interest on our bonded indebtedness. I would point out that in England they are adopting a process of conversion under which they are securing money in some cases for less than three per cent. The interest on our national debt is somewhere about $125,000,000 and the interest on the Canadian National debt is $57,000,000, or a total of about $182,000,000. If this were cut in two, it would give us some $90,000,000, and why should it not be cut in two? If the wages of the people are having to be cut; if large numbers are going without work at all; if very large numbers even of our business men have their incomes more than cut in two, I cannot see why those who have accumulated large fortunes ought not to have their incomes cut down by reducing the interest which they receive on their bonds. My colleague spoke of the conscription of men at the time of a national crisis. I cannot see why at the time of this national crisis we should not conscript wealth.

I am not very keen, I may confess, on the amendment as offered by my colleague. I think it has certain advantages in that it would call public attention to this problem not merely during the time of one sitting of parliament but during the whole of the sittings of the commission, and for that reason I was willing to second it. But, after all, what we want at the present time is not so much further investigation, further consideration, as action. We have had consideration for years and years. The Prime Minister told us at the time of the taking of the last census he would have to wait until the results of the census were published before he could bring down an employment scheme. The results of the census are now made public and there is no reason why we cannot act upon those at this session of parliament. I recognize there is a good deal of truth in what my colleague said, that we should have a full investigation of the whole situation, but no investigation can be final in a condition such as that in which we find ourselves today. The world has never before faced such a crisis as is upon us; and I believe all the economists, technicians and financial experts might be brought before that commission and yet at the end of the investigation we would not be very much further ahead than we were at the start. That is my only objection to the setting up of a commission, but anything that will bring the matter before the public I favour. I would have thought the government would be well advised to adopt this resolution; it would have been advisable politically to do so, because this would have given them a chance to place a certain responsibility upon the commission. But they have turned it down; they have even tried to prevent us from discussing the matter at this time. Under these circumstances the only thing for us to do is to hold the government responsible for immediate action.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—UNEMPLOYMENT

RULING OF MR. SPEAKER ON AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS

Mr. SPEAKER: Last evening shortly before adjournment a question of order was raised on which I reserved my decision, and said I would give it today at three o'clock.

The motion is that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. To this an amendment is moved by Mr. Heaps as follows:

> In the opinion of this house it is desirable that a committee or commission be appointed to consider the economic situation in the dominion with special reference to unemployment and to report back during the present session of parliament.

A point of order has been raised that the amendment is out of order on the ground that it again introduces a matter that was debated and disposed of when the right hon. the leader of the opposition moved as part of an amendment to the address:

> The house regrets that, except the dole, the government has no policy with respect to the relief of unemployment.

I have carefully considered the arguments presented on the question of order, examined the authorities and precedents of both the British and Canadian houses of parliament. In the debate on the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition to the address I find that he suggested that a committee or commission be appointed and given charge of the whole question of unemployment relief, which shows that the subject matter of the proposed amendment was then open to discussion and actually debated. If this amendment is allowed it inevitably follows that there will be a repetition of the debate on unemployment.

The ordinary rules of debate are applicable on this occasion; for instance, a matter already decided by the house cannot be discussed. See Bourinot at page 420.

This amendment is offered on the motion to go into committee of ways and means, and not being accepted by the government is a motion of want of confidence, and the fact that it provides for the appointment of a commission or committee with special reference to unemployment is in effect a condemnation of the government's policy on that question.

The house has refused to condemn the government's policy on unemployment by rejecting the amendment moved to the address by the leader of the opposition. In view of that decision by the house I cannot find that this amendment, being a motion of want of confidence dealing also with unemployment, is in order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With all due deference, lest we should be considered as accepting this ruling, I respectfully beg to appeal from it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker having decided that the amendment offered by Mr. Heaps to the motion: That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, is not in order, Mr. Lapointe appeals from that decision. Is it the pleasure of the house that the Speaker's decision be sustained?

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

(Owing to the impossibility of recording pairs simultaneously declared, this list is incomplete.)

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with an absurd newspaper item published on the front page of l'Action Catholique of Thursday, November 17, 1932. The heading reads as follows: "J. F. Pouliot endorses the tariff changes—statement made by the hon. member for Témiscouata, yesterday, in the House of is Commons." What has actually happened is that this newspaper attributes to me a speech delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). You are, sir, better aware, than any one that I have never lost an opportunity to strenuously and energetically protest against these evil omen agreements.

RELIEF TO PENSIONERS

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to present a petition to parliament on behalf of the disabled war veterans of Ottawa. The petition sets out that the relief afforded these veterans has been cut down and in many cases cut off entirely. The petition reads—

Mr. SPEAKER: The practice is to hand the petition to the clerk. If it is to be read, the clerk will read it.

Mr. HEENAN: I should like to have this petition, which I have been asked to present to parliament, read by the clerk of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The petition will be referred to the clerk of petitions. It will be reported on and dealt with in due course.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house a number of orders in council passed pursuant to the relief measures.

QUESTIONS

UNCLAIMED BALANCES IN BANKS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the amount in the aggregate of unclaimed balances in the chartered banks of the Dominion of Canada as at the 30th of June, 1932?

2. What was the disposition of these funds?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Unclaimed amounts reported under section 114 of the Bank Act, and section 59 of the Quebec Savings Bank Act, as at December 31, 1931, totalled $3,200,954.83. (The figures as at 30th June, 1932, are not of government record as under the acts the returns are required to be made only at the end of the calendar year).

2. Unclaimed amounts are liabilities of the banks and await claimants.

SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. DUFF:

1. At what date did the vacancy which now exists in the bench of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia occur?

2. In view of the sittings of the appeal court beginning this week and of the large docket of appeals to be heard, will an appointment to fill the vacancy be made at an early date?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. May 17, 1932.

2. Yes.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MOUNT-MURRAY, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all letters, requests, correspondence, petitions, and other documents, exchanged between the Post Office Department at Ottawa and the Post Office Department at Quebec, with respect to the dismissal of the postmaster at Mount-Murray in the county of Charlevoix. Also a copy of all sworn or other statements dealing with the resignation of said postmaster, in the possession of the Post Office Department.

ADDINGTON FORKS, N.S., POST OFFICE

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all correspondence including letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the Postmaster General and any of his officials and any person or persons in the province of Nova Scotia, regarding the removal of the post office from Addington Forks, Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, where it was for over 100 years, to the other end of the district, near Beaver Meadows.

Mr. SPEAKER: The words in the motion "where it was for over 100 years" are not in order.

Mr. DUFF: I would move to delete those words.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion as amended agreed to.

EMPLOYEES OF SENATE AND HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I wish to ask when I may expect an answer to question No. 2 on the order paper. It has been on the order paper for some days and no attempt has been made to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the question referred to by the hon. member, No. 2 on today's order paper, such information as relates to the House of Commons has been ready for some time. As yet, the information has not been received from the Senate.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) asked a question with regard to the participation of the permanent force troops in the Armistice day ceremonies. Orders were given that the permanent force troops should turn out that day in full dress, field service order. This order of dress includes rifles and sidearms, but does not include the carrying of ammunition, and ammunition was not carried. This is the usual dress on a formal occasion of this kind, and one which the department deemed most fitting for the occasion.

ANGUS SHOPS, MONTREAL

ADVANCES BY GOVERNMENT TO CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance based upon an article in this morning's Citizen, dated from Montreal:

Number of days per month which Canadian Pacific shops will work—

Mr. SPEAKER: Could not the hon. member address his question to the minister without reading the article?

Mr. EULER: I will dispense with the reading of the article and will put the question to the government briefly.

An hon. MEMBER: I can't hear you.

Mr. EULER: I am quite willing to take my time. I would ask the government whether, in addition to the $2,000,000 which it was stated had been loaned or advanced by the government to the Canadian Pacific Railway, any further amount has been advanced; and further, and perhaps more particularly, whether any advances or loans have been made to any other industry or industries.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the article in question—

Mr. EULER: I was not permitted to read it.

Mr. RHODES: —but the question as submitted by my hon. friend goes further than a mere reply with respect to the opening of Canadian Pacific Railway shops, and it is of such an important character that I should not care to answer it offhand. I had no notice that it was going to be asked, although I am not complaining of that. However, I will take it as a notice of question and answer it tomorrow.

Mr. EULER: Could the minister give me a reply to my second question, as to whether any advances have been made to other industries.

Mr. RHODES: That is the portion of the question which I would not wish to answer offhand; I would wish to verify it before answering.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The Canadian Press has a dispatch this morning with reference to the Angus shops. Mr. Frank McKenna, general manager of Federal Shops Trades, says that the length of time during which the Angus shops will remain open must depend upon the nature of the arrangements between the Ottawa government and the company. Will the Minister of Finance, when replying tomorrow to my hon. friend, also give an answer to that statement which appears in the press.

Mr. RHODES: I will take the notice of question as I read it in Hansard tomorrow, but as I understand the first portion of the question, it is not one that can be answered here; it would have to be answered by the railway company.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The dispatch states that it depends on the nature of the arrangements between the Ottawa government and the company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

SHIPMENT OF CANADIAN FRUIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether about one-third of a cargo of canned fruit loaded at St. Catharines on a Norwegian tramp was shipped from Medina, New York, and labelled with Canadian Canners labels, to be conveyed by that steamer to the British market.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That is not a question but a statement, and one which cannot be dealt with now under the circumstances. If the hon. member will address a question to me for information I will endeavour to get it.

BRIGHT FAN INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman when he is going to give permission to the hon. member for Nelson to make good his statement that the British freighter the Bright Fan was deliberately sunk in Hudson Strait.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that the question is out of order. He should not so continually infringe upon the rules of debate.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where have I infringed on the rules of debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is improper and is out of order.

Mr. McINTOSH: I cannot see that it is an improper question.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether a decision has been reached in connection with the request of civil servants who had prior service with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to have the duration of that service added to their time in the civil service in relation to superannuation.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Requests have been received in connection with this matter from various parts of western Canada. The matter is still under consideration, no decision having yet been reached.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND SOUTHERN RHODESIA

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 5, respecting a certain trade agreement between the Dominion of Canada and Southern Rhodesia.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we will take a division on this motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Bennett) which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion (Mr. Bennett) agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE IRISH FREE STATE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 4, respecting a certain trade agreement between the Dominion of Canada and the Irish Free State.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that when this bill was before us in its previous stages, the government conceded that it did not involve any increase in duties; that as a matter of fact it secured to Canadian merchandise in the Irish market as favourable treatment as would be accorded to that of any other country and vice versa. We have been contending all along that any agreement that was made should not in any particular deprive our country of extending, if we so desired, favourable treatment to any other country that wished to trade with us, and as the legislation in this respect is along the lines that we have been advocating I imagine that most on this side will be prepared to support it.

It has another feature which entirely distinguishes it from the agreement arrived at with South Africa or the proposed agreement with the United Kingdom, namely, that it does not involve any increase of duty nor has it that most objectionable of all features, the fixing of a margin of preference for a period of years, thereby depriving this country of the opportunity of according to any other countries that may wish to trade with us as favourable treatment as we are according in this case. There is a great distinction, Mr. Speaker, between certain of these agreements and the agreement which is proposed with South Africa and the agreement which is proposed with the United Kingdom. These differences were pointed out at the time the agreement with Rhodesia and the agreement with Ireland were before the house, and as hon. members will recall, there was for that reason no opposition to either the agreement with Rhodesia or the agreement with Ireland at the time these measures were discussed on the first and second readings and in committee.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition to pass without drawing to the attention of the house one or two very important facts and, I make bold to say, errors in the statement which he has just made. He states that this agreement is very much different from all the others.

Mr. McINTOSH: So it is.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the last word, I presume, Mr. Speaker, coming from the hon. gentleman.

The house will recall that week after week and day after day for the last six or seven weeks the right hon. leader of the opposition has been reiterating to the point of becoming tedious his objection to the five-year provision. Now he acquiesces in this. This is quite all right, he says, and we are all going to vote for it. He virtually invites no division, and instructs his followers to line up behind this bill, after he has kept the house for about six weeks arguing on the question. He says that this is a marked advance upon the British agreement.

Now this bill gives to Ireland, so far as entry into this market is concerned, precisely what we give to Great Britain. To give to Great Britain certain concessions in this, that and the other sort of article is a vicious principle in the way we have done it; but to give it to Ireland, the right hon. gentleman says, is perfectly all right and all my followers should vote for it. What does article 2 of this trade agreement say? It says:

> Goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, imported into Canada, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

This whole bill is based upon, allied to, intertwined and amalgamated with, or any other similar term you like to use, the British agreement. Every jot and tittle, every crossed t and every dotted i, of the British agreement is in this, and yet the right hon. gentleman tells us that it is an act of virtue on his part to vote for this agreement, but that the government and all its supporters are doing this country irreparable injury by voting for the British bill. Surely the right hon. gentleman now realizes the spectacle that he has been making before this house and the country for the last six weeks in his protestations and flimsy pretext regarding the five-year period and other provisions of the British bill. This is the British bill simplified into one little clause. All we have done for the British we are doing for the Irish, and all we have done against the British we are doing against the Irish. Any concessions we have given to the British we give to the Irish. The Irish asked for them and got them.

It is not necessary to add anything further. Those are the facts, and we now have the measure of the sincerity of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have not the right to debate this matter, but if the house will give me permission I should like to state my position.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot speak again having moved the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I shall ask my colleague the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to explain why the Minister of Trade and Commerce by what he has just said convinced me that I should vote not for but against this bill. He now puts an entirely different construction on this bill than was put upon the provisions when it was previously considered.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am pleased to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am going to vote against the third reading of this bill. It is not at all the same as the Rhodesia bill to which we have just given third reading. In this bill we are granting to the Irish Free State the same terms that are being granted to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. We on this side have been complaining that the tariff has been raised against other countries in order to give a preference on articles coming from Great Britain. The same thing applies to the Irish Free State under section 3 of this bill. There is nothing similar in the treaty with Rhodesia, which was merely a trade agreement in the nature of other trade agreements, and which we accepted as a matter of course.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry if that is beyond the understanding of some hon. gentlemen opposite, but I cannot help that. I am simply giving my own views, and only by looking at the two bills will hon. gentlemen opposite appreciate what the vital distinction is between the two. I am voting against the third reading of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Before this vote is taken, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I intended, even before the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke, to vote against this bill. My reason for doing so is this: When I read that an Imperial economic conference would be held in Ottawa I presumed from the word "imperial" itself, that it would be a meeting between loyal brethren of the British Empire, but to my surprise I found that the delegates from the Irish Free State who came over to this conference refused to take the oath of allegiance to the King when the government of the Irish Free State was elected. They also refused to pay to the British government a large sum of money due on land annuities which the British government had advanced to the people of Ireland, thereby putting themselves outside the pale of any imperial conference. I therefore say that in my opinion none of the gentlemen representing the Irish Free State had any right to sit either in this chamber or around the economic conference table, nor did Canada have the right to make an agreement with them at an imperial conference. So I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): It seems somewhat peculiar that I should reach the same conclusion as my deskmate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), but it is for altogether different reasons. It appears to me that it is very much of a farce—

An hon. MEMBER: It certainly is!

Mr. POWER: —for the parliament of Canada to approve a favoured-nation treaty with the Irish Free State when both this parliament and the foremost proponents of the treaty base their hopes of success of the United Kingdom-Canada treaty largely on the fact that through that treaty they will be able to take away trade from Ireland, which is now being given favoured-nation treatment. To my mind such an arrangement, whereby one of the sister nations of the commonwealth is hoping to profit in its trade with the United Kingdom in products of the farm, cattle and so on at the expense of the Irish Free State, and at the same time asking the people of Canada to favour the Irish Free State, is a farce, and I cannot vote for it.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I have been a member of the Sinn Fein league for twenty years; Ireland cannot renounce allegiance to the King, be in the empire and out of it at the same time, but she is free to renounce her allegiance if she chooses. I agree with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and I will vote against the agreement.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): I had not thought of speaking on this measure; but in view of the extraordinary spectacle that we have witnessed, and the still more extraordinary spectacle that we shall witness in a moment, I wish once more to declare myself emphatically and unreservedly opposed to these treaties, without regard to what they contain, because of the principle underlying them; because of the straightforward declaration made by the Prime Minister that all these treaties are based on the principle of imperial unity, to which I am opposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, I am, I have always been opposed to the principle of imperial unity, for reasons frequently given, in forty years of public life, and of which I am not ashamed; reasons which have received the warmest approval of some of the foremost statesmen and leaders of public thought in Great Britain. Opposed to imperial unity, I stand with equal frankness for friendly cooperation between Great Britain and her sister nations. In other words, I oppose imperial unity, so called, because it does not tend to keep the relations between these various communities on the only footing which can preserve them.

With regard to Ireland, Mr. Speaker, my sentiments are well known. I have always been a friend of Ireland, and I have proven it before the war, during the war, and after the war. In days when not one single Irish-Canadian, at least not one that I know in this chamber, would dare to stand by the leaders and principles of Sinn Fein, I did it in public. To trade relations with Ireland I have no objection. To better trade relations with England I have no objection. To better trade relations with South Africa, or any other of the British dominions, I have no objection. But I have objection to all these agreements, because, I repeat, they are based on a principle of policy against which I have fought all my life, and which the greatest leader that the Conservative party has known, Sir John A. Macdonald, opposed all his life.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, he did, in word and in deed. When the so-called loyalist people of this country accused him of endangering the British connection because he claimed for the people of Canada the right to the full and unhampered exercise of their economic autonomy, Sir John replied coolly: "so much the worse for British connection." Not that he wanted to break the tie; but he wanted to assert on the part of Canada the same right to exercise her full rights as a nation, as a government and as a parliament in matters of trade and in matters of taxation as she had won in matters of political management. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this particular treaty; but not for the reason given by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I heard my good friend say that we should not vote for this treaty because of the refusal of Irish members to take the oath of allegiance. That has nothing to do with the matter of this treaty. I will go further. The refusal of the Irish who do not believe in the right of England to rule their country to take the oath of allegiance is a proof of their moral honesty. But I am opposed to this treaty, I am opposed to the preceding treaty, I am opposed to the following treaty, and I will vote against all of them, as I said a few weeks ago, with any group or any party, with any member or members of this house, not through any friendship for or antagonism to any country, but in the interests of Canada; because I believe that in the interest of our relations with Great Britain and the other nations we should come back to the sound policy of absolute freedom in matters of trade, and negotiate such treaties as we may choose with any of these countries, whether Great Britain or Ireland or Australia, on the economic merits of the treaties and the trade that can be developed, entirely apart from the principle which governs these agreements, that is, that we must have a series of treaties because we belong to the same empire. No, no; as far as that is concerned I remain faithful to the policy which was propounded, upheld and applied by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper for twenty years.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you agree with yourself?

Mr. BOURASSA: Read your history and you will learn about it.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 8, respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) introduced a resolution to approve the trade agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada I took very strong exception to the house proceeding in the manner in which the Prime Minister said it must proceed. I stated at that time that I believed the correct procedure was that the house, before being asked to give its approval to the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, should go into committee of ways and means to consider as a whole and in detail the changes in our tariff which would be necessary in order to give effect to the agreement, and the full significance of these changes. I protested as strongly as I could at the time against our being obliged to proceed with the approval of that particular agreement or any agreement until we had discussed in committee of ways and means the whole of the tariff changes which it involved. I did this on the resolution and I did it again on each of the several stages of the bill up to the present time. We have not had an opportunity of discussing in committee of ways and means the various proposed changes in the tariff, and I wish now to protest again against our being called upon to pass the third reading of a measure, which gives approval to the agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada before we have had opportunity to consider in committee of ways and means the tariff changes involved.

In doing this I wish to support my protest and appeal by bringing to the attention of the house the procedure adopted in the British parliament with respect to these agreements and show wherein the procedure adopted in this House of Commons has been entirely at variance with the British procedure. It has been not only at variance with the British procedure but, according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it has been a procedure which cannot be justified under the British method of proceeding in these matters. Need I say, in this connection, that had the house proceeded in the regular manner some of the misunderstandings which have arisen with respect to these agreements would never have arisen. I now direct attention to what took place in the British parliament with respect to the introduction of these agreements and their consideration. The British parliament considered the agreements first of all on October 18. On that date the house was moved into committee of ways and means to consider the resolutions with respect to imperial preferences, and the discussion occupied October 18, 19 and 20. The resolutions were reported and discussed separately on October 21, 24 and 25. On October 25 a bill with respect to the approval of the agreement for the first time was introduced and given its first reading. It was discussed and given its second reading on October 26 and 27, discussed in committee October 28 and 31, November 1, 2 and 3, and given its third reading on November 3.

I wish to invite the attention of the house particularly to the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time of moving the house into committee of ways and means in order to consider the resolutions. The house will find the record in Parliamentary Debates of the House of Commons of Great Britain for October 18, 1932. I read from page 37: Orders of the day; ways and means, considered in committee:

> Motion made, and question proposed,
> "That it is expedient—
> (a) to make provision, more especially in connection with the agreements made at the Imperial economic conference held at Ottawa and an announcement made at that conference on behalf of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, for imperial preferences, whether as respects the whole or any part of the British Empire, and whether in respect of duties charged under any resolutions of this house having for their object the fulfilment of the agreements aforesaid or duties under the Import Duties Act, 1932, or any other duties—"

There are other provisions:

> "(b) to empower the Board of Trade, in the circumstances contemplated in the agreement made between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada, by order to prohibit the importation of goods of a class or description grown, produced or manufactured in a foreign country;

Paragraph (c) refers to Australia and New Zealand.

> "(d) for the purpose of giving effect to certain of the provisions of the agreement made between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada to amend the law with respect to the importation of Canadian cattle;
> "(e) to make such other provision as may appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of giving effect to any of the agreements aforesaid."

53719—91

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Chamberlain, then spoke as follows:

> I hope that, after all the numerous questions and answers on the subject, there is now no doubt in the minds of the committee as to the procedure which is to be followed. We cannot introduce the bill which is to implement the agreements arrived at at Ottawa until we have obtained from the committee of ways and means the series of resolutions which are on the order paper today.

Nothing could be more specific than that. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said to the British House of Commons that under its procedure—let me quote his exact words:

> We cannot introduce the bill which is to implement the agreements arrived at at Ottawa until we have obtained from the committee of ways and means the series of resolutions which are on the order paper today.

Here, in this House of Commons of Canada, we have had laid on the table resolutions with respect to ways and means intended to provide what is necessary in the way of implementing the agreements, but we have not yet discussed these in detail; we have not had any opportunity to go into committee of ways and means; in fact this house has not even yet adopted a motion to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. Nevertheless we are being asked now to give approval to the third reading of the bill implementing the agreement. Mr. Chamberlain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has made it plain that under the procedure of the British parliament it is impossible for the House of Commons to consider the bill before the ways and means committee has taken up the discussion with respect to the tariff changes involved.

Mr. BENNETT: As I have no right to speak, I should like to ask a question. Does my right hon. friend realize that the French treaty was treated in exactly the same way as we have done in this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am laying down at this time the British method of procedure—

Mr. BENNETT: We are in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and no one knows better than the Prime Minister himself that under the British North America Act, our own constitution, hon. members of this parliament have no rights or powers greater than those which are accorded members of the House of Commons in Great Britain with respect to any matter. In taking the course which he has taken, he has gone diametrically opposite to British procedure, and from what I have learned this afternoon I begin to discover the design that was back of his motive in so doing. If we had had a committee of ways and means to discuss in detail all the tariff changes that were necessary and had we seen as a result of that discussion, the significance of what was being proposed, some of us, particularly myself, would not have been as confused or misled as apparently we have been with respect to the exact meaning of some of the provisions of some of these bills.

Let me complete what Mr. Chamberlain said. He continued:

When I sit down I propose to move the first of those resolutions, and I daresay you, Sir Dennis—

That is Sir Dennis Herbert, who was the chairman of the committee:

—will then think it appropriate to give some ruling as to whether the debate should be allowed to range over the whole of the resolutions or whether each resolution should be taken separately.

A little later the chairman of the committee made a statement to the house as to procedure of the committee and as it was agreed upon by all parties in the British House of Commons. The chairman's remarks are reported at page 43 as follows:

The Chairman: I think, perhaps, before the discussion proceeds, that it may be useful if I can get the approval, or otherwise, of the committee to the course which I suggest with regard to the debate. I gather from what has taken place at question time that it will probably meet with the approval of the committee. It is that we should follow the same course as was adopted in the case of the resolutions dealing with the Import Duties Act in February last, that is, the course analagous to the budget debates. If the committee approve of that, it will mean that there will be a general discussion on the resolution which has been moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; that discussion will range over all the ways and means resolutions which are on the order paper. When the debate comes to an end, all the resolutions will be put one after the other without further debate, leaving the resolutions to be considered separately on the report stage. I hope that that will meet with the approval of the committee generally.

Elsewhere the chairman of the committee made special mention of the fact that hon. members would be free to move for the reduction of any duty that appeared in the resolutions which were placed before the house; that it would be entirely in order to move any amendment, and he took great care repeatedly to say that in so doing they had not before them the bill approving the agreement, but that they were free to discuss in the first instance the significance of all items and resolutions so that in the light of them and with full understanding of their significance they might take such action as they deemed best when asked to pass a bill approving the agreement.

That course has been entirely departed from in this house; it has been departed from knowingly on the part of the government and against the protests and appeals of hon. gentlemen on this side to have the matter correctly proceeded with. I submit that the whole proceeding has been irregular and that it is contrary to British parliamentary practice and also to our own constitution which governs the powers and procedure of this parliament.

Just to show how, as a result of our having proceeded in the manner in which the government has done, some of us have been led astray as to the significance of what was really in the mind of the government, may I draw attention to the sequence in which these measures have been placed before us and to a question which I asked the Prime Minister when we were discussing the trade agreement between Canada and Rhodesia? This is reported in Hansard at page 892, as follows:

Mr. Mackenzie King: May I ask the minister whether in his opinion the net result of the agreement is that as a result of the tariff changes tariffs will really be lowered as against Rhodesia?

Mr. Bennett: The answer is found in the fact that the goods come in free. I would think it would be difficult to say, but in my judgment the effect would be probably to lower the tariff.

Having consistently taken the view that whatever would help to lower tariffs as between different parts of the British Empire was desirable, I for one, when that measure was before the house, gave it support not only on the second reading, but again this afternoon on the third. When the Irish agreement was before us, may I point out that we had not then had before us the British agreement. We were presented with the bill with respect to the approval of the agreement between the Irish Free State and Canada immediately after the bill respecting Rhodesia and before the bills respecting South Africa and the United Kingdom, and in reading that bill I would challenge anyone to place upon it an interpretation other than the one which we placed upon it at the time and which I believe the text will bear out as the one reasonable interpretation to be placed upon it, namely, that whatever we might do for Britain we would do equally by way of favourable treatment to Ireland. In other words, while the present administration is in office, if it intends to deal with Britain along the lines of the present agreement, then it is committed to extending the same kind of treatment to Ireland. On the other hand, should there be a change of government and a Liberal administration come into office, which were to decide that it was not going to continue the British agreement and obtained the consent of the British government to changes in the agreement in any or many particulars, we would be obliged under the Irish-Canadian agreement to give the same treatment to Ireland as we gave to Britain. That is the view I have had all along as to the significance of the Irish agreement, and it is the only view, it seems to me, that one reading the bill by itself could take in the light of the phraseology of the measure itself. I know, of course, that the side notes and memoranda attached to bills by the government are not part of the bill itself, but they are all intended as guides to parliament. Looking at this trade agreement, which has only five sections, the first approves of the trade agreement, and anyone looking at the terms of the trade agreement will see nothing there that could be objectionable reading it in the light of what I have just said. Clause 3, which is the one to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just referred, has the following opposite it in the margin: "Extension of advantage to Irish Free State," that is, extension to the Irish Free State of the advantage of what would be given to Britain. That seems to me a perfectly fair and just attitude for Canada to take towards Ireland. But had I understood at the time or had I ever had the slightest idea that in being asked to extend to Ireland treatment equal to that which we are extending to Britain we were thereby obliging ourselves to raise and maintain duties against other countries, I certainly would not for one moment have countenanced that particular clause or the bill which contains it.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if it is the desire and design of the government in dealing with these imperial agreements to trick us into some adherence or agreement to a measure? Is there a motive in all of this so sinister that the administration itself is not perfectly frank with parliament in regard to the full meaning and significance of these measures? I say that if the government had been straightforward in this matter and had presented to parliament in the first instance, as the British government did, their resolutions to be considered in committee of ways and means, and after discussing the British agreement we had taken up these other agreements which the government now says are based on the British agreement, instead of taking up the other agreements first before we had even considered the significance of the British agreement, there would have been no danger of misunderstanding. Such misunderstanding as has arisen has arisen from that source. It bears out very strongly, I think, what I said on a previous occasion, and to which some exception was then taken, that it looks to me very much as if there was a conspiracy in this matter somewhere on the part of some of those who had to do with the making of these agreements. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken exception to the words "Tory conspiracy," but may I say that to my mind high protection and Toryism are synonymous, and I believe that there has been in the minds of the Prime Minister and others of his administration an effort, under the guise of these trade agreements, to appeal, on the one hand, to the patriotism of the people of the country and, on the other, by a subterfuge, to put across tariffs which will increase the already inordinately high tariffs of this country, and which will make a large part of our tariff schedules permanent for a number of years.

If it is the unity of the empire amongst other things that we are considering, I think it is most unfortunate indeed that in our own parliament we could not have complete frankness on the part of the administration as to the exact purport of agreements proposed and that we should not be accorded the same rights and privileges as are accorded to the members of the British House of Commons. I protest very strongly, Mr. Speaker, against Canadian members of parliament not being accorded the same rights and privileges as members of the British House of Commons. These rights and privileges have been denied to us, and I say again most emphatically that if that were the only ground upon which we could ask the members of the house to oppose the agreement at this stage it would be an amply sufficient ground.

I am not going to go over again the many reasons why we oppose the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, for they have already been amply stressed. But what has taken place this afternoon has brought out a new feature which makes those reasons stronger than ever, and I am very glad that it has, because it makes clearer than ever the reason why we should oppose not only the United Kingdom agreement but the other agreements as well. It has been made perfectly clear here this afternoon that what is intended is not what we were led to believe, a series of bilateral agreements between Canada and other parts of the empire, each of which stood on its own feet, and was to be read only in the light of what appeared on the face of it, but rather by means of clauses and schedules referring to what is part of some other bill, an effort so to entangle the whole tariff structure of the British Empire that hereafter it will become impossible for independent action to be taken on the part of the parliament of Canada with respect to most of its own tariff, an effort effectively to restrict its freedom in respect of fiscal matters all along the line. All this bears out what the Prime Minister said, that really what we are doing here is not to follow any national policy with respect to the tariff in Canada, but that we are in the midst of framing an imperial tariff policy which will so bind this country in the years to come that it will be impossible for our tariff as it stands to be modified in any particular, seeing that either as respect Africa or Rhodesia or Australia or New Zealand or Newfoundland or the Irish Free State or the United Kingdom itself something will be found in the agreements which will make it impossible to make changes which may be vastly in the public interest without violating in some way the unity of empire or bringing in question our loyalty to the empire, and all the rest of it.

I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the procedure is concerned, this House of Commons having been obliged to depart from British procedure, you yourself as Speaker should rule that the procedure up to the present has been wholly out of order and not in accordance with British parliamentary practice, and then permit us to reconsider these agreements in accordance with the full rights and privileges of a British parliament.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to intervene in this debate, and I should not do so were it not for some observations of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Inasmuch as I had not planned to intervene, I trust he will not take exception if I do not follow him at length. I hope also that he will not consider me discourteous if I state that I do not feel it essential that I should do so.

With respect to procedure, what my right hon. friend has succeeded in demonstrating is that the Dutch captured Holland. We have followed the same procedure in respect to this measure as has been followed in respect to other similar measures. Furthermore let me point out that in the Prime Minister's opening speech the distinction between our procedure here and the procedure in the British House of Commons was very clearly stated to the house. The reason we have proceeded as we have is a most logical one: If this agreement were not approved by this house we would not be called upon to make the corresponding tariff changes in ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The same applies to Great Britain. That is not true.

Mr. RHODES: If my right hon. friend will be patient, I say that our course is not only logical but is entirely in conformity with the procedure followed in this house since confederation. If my right hon. friend has discovered at this late date that the procedure of the British house is better, that may be open to argument; but let me say to my right hon. friend that he had the opportunity, not only during his own term of office but many years before that, of moving to have it changed. But now after almost a quarter of a century he has discovered that our procedure in this house is different from that followed in the British House of Commons.

My right hon. friend has also discovered that there has been some trickery here. May I say with all deference that my right hon. friend tricked himself. It did not arise from any action on the part of the government or of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. He made a most astounding statement a moment ago; he said that when the Irish bill was before the house—that is, the one that passed a few minutes ago—we had not then the British agreement before us. Why, Mr. Speaker, the British agreement was contained in a bill which has been before this house for weeks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I meant before it was discussed.

Mr. RHODES: And we sat in committee on that bill for almost a week. We discussed it for four days last week and one day this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows what I mean.

Mr. RHODES: Let me point out this: assuming his statements of fact were correct —I submit the records of the house show the contrary to be the case—the Irish bill, by section 3, very clearly states that:

> After the said agreement is brought into force, and so long as it remains in force, goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, which are imported into the Dominion of Canada, shall be admitted into the Dominion of Canada on the terms granted to similar articles, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

When my right hon. friend said today that he was going to support Bill No. 4 because it was different from the other agreements, he either had not read the Irish bill, or if he had he did not know what was in the United Kingdom bill. In either case the right hon. gentleman tricked himself.

Our procedure, I submit again, as the records of this house will disclose, is precisely in conformity with the procedure which my right hon. friend pursued during his tenure of office. Not only is that the case, but I repeat, it is the logical course in the circumstances, because if the agreement had not been approved by this house we would not be called upon to make the corresponding tariff changes in committee of ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask what did the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain mean when he said that "we could not introduce the bill until we have got it approved in ways and means"?

Mr. RHODES: That is the easiest question in the world to answer: because their rules are different from ours. That is the whole answer. Just here let me say that if I have heard my right hon. friend complain of one thing more than another in respect to Great Britain, it has been that we should not be dominated by Downing Street. Surely the right hon. gentleman is prepared to admit that we are capable in this house of formulating our own rules for the guidance of our own procedure, and that if there is anything wrong with our procedure it is a matter for us to deal with, not to go to Great Britain to find out how they conduct their procedure under their own rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask a question in regard to ways and means? Are there not some changes to be made by the Minister of Finance as announced by him when we were discussing the various schedules?

Mr. RHODES: I am glad my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has submitted that question. It leads me to say that one would gather from the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition that the opposition had been denied opportunity of discussing the question in committee of ways and means. The schedule to the British bill contained the identical changes which are to be dealt with in committee of ways and means. When my right hon. friend came to the discussion of those items he will recall that I expressed the pious hope that in discussing them we would not traverse the same ground again in committee of ways and means. My right hon. friend assented to that proposal, and we discussed the items in committee on the bill for four days.

Coming to the specific question of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, let me say that the changes which will arise in committee of ways and means are only consequential changes in the wording of items for the purpose of properly fitting the new items into the framework of our tariff—that and nothing more. We take a portion of a parent item and deal with it. We leave a residuum of the parent item that has to be dealt with in ways and means, and except for one or two minor amendments in the direction of enlarging or widening freedom of trade with the mother country, every amendment which will be made in the committee of ways and means will be an amendment in consequence of tariff changes which arise of necessity.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that the discussion of two or three items was deliberately deferred at the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance? In regard to books and periodicals for example, my hon. friend suggested that we would have full opportunity for the discussion of those items in committee of ways and means. Now we are passing on the bill without having the discussion.

Mr. RHODES: The discussion will be had in committee of ways and means. I recall the item in particular of which my hon. friend spoke; it had to do with drugs and chemicals.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And periodicals.

Mr. RHODES: That is the item upon which my friend raised a question, and I suggested to him that we should wait until we were in committee of ways and means, for the obvious reason that the description of the item in complete detail, and its relation to other items, appeared in the ways and means resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then I submit that that is the reason we should have the discussion in committee of ways and means before we have the third reading.

Mr. RHODES: Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are not in committee of the whole house—not that I object to the questions. But I do not know that I need proceed any further; I think the matter is abundantly clear. Certainly I challenge contradiction of the statement that we have not proceeded in conformity with the rules and procedure of this house. Having said as much I do no know that it is incumbent upon me to say anything more at this stage.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): I am not going to touch upon the question of procedure. The Minister of Finance, from his point of view, has made it quite clear that the procedure followed was according to the rules of our house, whether good or bad. In some respects we should follow closely what is done in England, because the English have a longer and wider experience of parliamentary procedure than we have. On the other hand I agree fully and unreservedly with the Minister of Finance when he says that if there is anything wrong in our rules, we should change them according to our needs.

But there is one point that I wish to bring up at this moment, before we pass on to the third reading. My objection to all these treaties—including the Southern Rhodesia treaty, against which I voted, as against all the others—is the objection which was so eloquently expressed by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and not eloquently but with conviction, so far as I am concerned, by myself: that these treaties put impediments in the way of our world trade. That is my main reason, and I stick to it. With regard to the English treaty, I did not take any part in the discussion in committee; I left it to better informed members of the house to take up the various items and argue pro and con. The debate was extremely interesting and illuminating, although somewhat protracted. But the point I want to make now is the same I made previously: impediments in our foreign trade; and I take as an example our possible relations with France.

During the debate in committee, one hon. member to my left pointed out that as regarded a certain item of the tariff, we were making it more difficult to trade with Holland. I now wish to point out that in this treaty we are making it more difficult, by various changes in the tariff and by the fixation of duty on certain articles for five years, to make a good treaty with France. I understand from press reports that my excellent personal friend—if I may call him so without compromising him in the eyes of some of the supporters of the government—the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), is now in Paris endeavouring to negotiate a treaty with the French government. No gentleman in this house and no member of the government is better qualified to carry on such negotiations; but without intending to embarrass the hon. gentleman I should like to point out some of the provisions of this treaty which will make it more difficult for him to conclude a bargain good for Canada as well as for France.

At the outset may I say that I discard entirely the sentimental aspect, so far as French Canada is concerned; though it would be just as legitimate for the French Canadians to desire to make trade arrangements with France on a basis of sentiment as it is legitimate for Canadians of English or Scotch origin to desire trade arrangements with British countries on that basis. I will endeavour to remain true to myself. When I first ran for the House of Commons, in 1896, a trade agreement had just been concluded between Canada and France. The negotiations were carried on by Sir George Foster, then Mr. Foster, a minister of the Conservative administration in Canada, and by M. Jules Siegfried, Minister of Commerce of France. The Conservative candidates in the province of Quebec boasted that the Conservative government having made the first trade arrangement with France, our former motherland, we therefore should vote for the Conservative party. I took the ground that all trade arrangements whether with France, England or any other country on earth, should be judged from the viewpoint of Canadian interests. That is still my position. Let me add, however, that though sentiment should not be the inspiration of a trade agreement; though business considerations and economic principles should be the two guiding thoughts in the minds of those representing any country negotiating with another country, it must be acknowledged, that even in trade arrangements, there are what Bismarck called imponderable considerations which must be taken into account.

Now let us face the facts as they really are. Whether or not some of us like it, the fact remains that one-fourth the population of Canada is French by origin and French in culture; that they read French books and magazines; that, as pointed out the other day by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset), their physicians go to Paris to finish their studies and come back with notions of French science; they are familiar with the French pharmacopoeia; they make use of French surgical instruments and recommend to their patients the use of French remedies, which are counted among the best, and which have the great advantage over our own that you can read upon the bottle or box what is contained in the medicine prescribed by your doctor. Now I take this treaty, and when I read through the items what do I find? Here is item 171, covering books. It carries a duty of "free" under the British preference, 10 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 10 per cent under the general tariff. Then item 206, covering serums; this is free under the British preference, 20 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 20 per cent under the general tariff. Item 229 deals with common or laundry soap, and the duty per one hundred pounds is 50 cents under the British preference and $1.50 under the intermediate and general tariffs. Then we come to castile soap, most of which is manufactured at Marseille. The duty per pound is free under the British preference and 2 cents under the intermediate and general tariffs. Then we have perfumery, a class of goods, as everyone admits, produced par excellence in France. The duty is 20 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 40 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs. I find manufactures of aluminum carrying a duty of 15 per cent under the British preference and 30 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs. Then we have kitchen or household utensils of aluminum. Here again anyone who has travelled has found that French-made utensils of this kind are by far the best, the most elegant, among the cheapest and at the same time the most enduring. Under the British preference the duty is 20 per cent, and under the intermediate and general tariffs it is 30 per cent. Then I come to surgical instruments, which were dealt with by the hon. member for Rimouski. These are free under the British preference, with a 10 per cent duty under the intermediate and general tariffs. I come to a very important item, that of chemicals and drugs. By excision from item 711 these are now free under the British preference, with a 25 per cent duty under the intermediate and general tariffs.

I have taken at random some of the items in connection with which France is predominant, some of the items our people are accustomed to purchase at the general store, at the chemist's and at the bookstore. These articles are imported from France; they form part of our everyday life, part of our culture. A few weeks ago I received a letter from a firm of large importers of French chemicals, in Montreal. Their trade is made up exclusively of importations from France, drugs and chemicals of the highest character and so on. They supply the hospitals of Quebec as well as certain institutions in New Brunswick and in northern and eastern Ontario. They also import perfumes and goods of that kind. By this treaty we are tying our hands; we are forbidding ourselves the right to offer terms of preferment to France in connection with the exportation of these goods to Canada. Not only are we offering to Great Britain a preference on articles in the manufacture of which the British are inferior to the French; but by reason of the fact that we have raised the intermediate tariff to the level of the general tariff, we are binding ourselves not to offer France a preference on any one of the items I have named as against the rest of the world. We are not able to offer France more favourable terms than we can offer Germany, Italy, Spain or any other country on earth in connection with books, serums, soaps, perfumery, manufactures of aluminum, surgical instruments, chemicals and drugs. I claim that this is unfair to us, not only to French Canada but to Canada generally.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we French Canadians have a first right in this regard. No one will dispute that it is the right of the French Canadian to purchase French books, to read those French books, to have those French books given his children for their education or their amusement on the same terms that our English speaking friends offer English books to their children. Surely there is not one father of a family in this house who would claim that it is as fair to tax the French father of a large family and make him pay a penalty because his children read French as it is to provide duty free English books for a classical Yankee-Ontario family consisting of father, mother and pet dog. We have families of five, six, eight and ten children, girls going to convent and boys going to college, some in commercial schools and others in classical colleges, all of whose text books are in French. A large proportion of the primers, of course, are printed and published in Canada; but from France we import all the great classics in the French language, a source of pride not only to all people who speak French in any part of the world, but also to all civilized beings—a source of intellectual pride and enjoyment to men and women everywhere, whether they be of English, Scottish or Irish origin.

After forty years of public life and travel through the various provinces in Canada, I have found, to my delight, in the last ten or fifteen years, a fast-growing knowledge of French in all the English-speaking sections of this country. If there is in my disloyal eyes one redeeming feature about our participation in the nefarious war of 1914-18, it is the growing interest which a large number of English-Canadians are now taking in French literature and affairs. I might name some of these people like my hon. friend from Toronto South (Mr. Geary), who was an officer in the Canadian army in France. That hon. gentleman learned French there and is now a reader of French books. Occasionally I go to Toronto or Winnipeg, where I find branches of L'Alliance Française, kept up by the enthusiasm and the intellectual interest of university men such as Professor Osborne of Winnipeg, a leading member of Manitoba university. They are consumers of French books and literature. Why do you tax them 10 per cent as against the average Canadian who prefers, as is his right, to read English books because he knows nothing else?

I will go further. From a point of view which I am sure will appeal to the Prime Minister as well as to the leader of the opposition, taking a much broader view than the simple aspect of trade, taking the basic conditions of our country and the necessity of using every means, political, economic, literary and social to build up a strong Canadian nationality, I claim that we must take all legitimate means to preserve this Canada of ours from the insidious and constant penetration of Yankee ideals and literature, and Yankee morals or immorality. I am not saying this against the American nation. There are in the United States plenty of cultured people, and good people, living a moral life. But I must say that the contact between Canada and the United States is made, as a rule, not through such people. Our country is being flooded with the cheapest and commonest American literature. The vast majority of our youth ignore entirely those splendid works of literature and history, of poetry and science, that have their birth in the United States, preferring to purchase the dime novel and that filthy literature that comes by the carload from across the border. We in Quebec are trying, for all we are worth, to preserve the French language in order to safeguard our youth from such contamination.

I appeal to the leaders in this parliament, to whatever party or race they belong: Do you not think that we are doing a service to the whole of Canada in preserving one-fourth of its population from penetration by the ideals of a foreign country? Let us leave aside questions of morality; let us discuss the matter from the national or even the imperial point of view. Does anyone think it makes for the greater loyalty of Canadian people towards England to allow them to Americanize themselves from day to day, from week to week, from year to year? No, sir. If you want a true Canadian, of whatever race or province or party or religion, to be a bulwark against Americanism, you must cultivate such a Canadian not by making him more British but more Canadian, whether he speaks English or French. As I have said frequently, whether we are of French or English descent, whether we worship in a Catholic or in a Protestant church, there is one and only one sentiment by means of which you can unite the people of Canada, and that is devotion, not to the empire, not to Great Britain, not to France, but to Canada.

Now, Canada is a confederacy of people of varied types; but I do not think it is any disparagement of foreign races such as are represented by some of the most worthy members of this house—Germans, Lithuanians, Hungarians and so forth—to say that after all the history and the mental composition of Canada have had their sources largely in the two races that founded this country—and again I am echoing the words of that man for whom I have cherished all through my political life the greatest admiration, Sir John Macdonald. It was through the free association of the best representatives of the British races and of British culture—whether English, Scottish, Irish or Welsh, it does not matter—and the representatives of French culture and French aspirations, whether of Norman or of Poitevin origin, as my own is, that we created a national soul, composite, dual in its language and diverse in its aspirations. That is the one original characteristic of Canada. It is not our political institutions, half British and half American. It is not our school system—even in Quebec I would not say it is our school system, and certainly it is not the school system throughout the English provinces which have largely adopted the American system of education. It is not our economic life alone, which is but a replica of American economic life. It is not the interchange of trade alone; because, in spite of treaties and tariffs, we still trade more with the United States than with the whole of the British Empire taken together. No. Do not rely only on trade, on dollars and cents, on labour organizations or on capitalistic institutions to preserve Canada; but draw upon the moral elements of the community and the ethnical aspirations; and even, as I have frequently said, do not disregard the prejudices of the various elements who compose the country. For my part, I have never begrudged the English-Canadian, whether of English or Scottish origin, his devotion to the empire although I dread a little the imperialism of the Irishman. In my youth I had a very good Irish friend, a dear one. He had lived in the United States, in Brazil and elsewhere; he could speak three or four languages, but he had preserved his Irish brogue and his Irish mind. One day, speaking with me about someone else, another Irishman, he said, "Never trust an Irishman who has touched the king's shilling." There is a good deal of truth in that because, as a rule, the Irishman who has touched the king's shilling has betrayed the country of his birth. Even the king cannot trust him. But in Canada all true Irishmen, all true Scotchmen, all true Englishmen and all French-Canadians, faithful to their origin—at least to the point where it is permissible to be faithful to a foreign country from which one's forefathers have come—agreed some seventy years ago to form a nation. Later on, under the leadership of that great Canadian statesman, Sir John Macdonald, they decided to free their common country from any restriction, legal, political or material, imposed by the British in connection with our fiscal laws. As I stated a moment ago, Sir John Macdonald declared: so much worse for British connection, if the maintenance of British connection means the maintenance of Canadian inferiority. One of his successors, I do not know whether it was Sir John Thompson or Sir Mackenzie Bowell, it does not matter which, entered into a treaty with France. In our trade relations with England we should not forget the necessity of trade with other countries, especially France. On the other hand, in our trade negotiations with France we should not forget the interests which we have at stake in British countries. In all our trading, whether with France, with Great Britain, with Ireland with Southern Rhodesia or any country, our first duty is to the people of Canada.

I appeal to the most generous and enlightened English speaking members of this house. I am sure if they thought seriously of this matter there would be no opposition to my proposal. I repeat, we French Canadians have the right to purchase French books as cheaply as English speaking Canadians can purchase English books; we have the right to purchase chemicals coming from France as cheaply as those which come from Germany or England, and we have the right to purchase aluminum utensils for our households produced in France as cheaply as articles produced in other countries. As far as we are concerned, we feel that this is a matter of right, but there is more than that. The house should consider the advantage to Canada as a whole in enlarging her trade relations, especially with countries with a similarity of tastes and education. This will make for closer and more constant economic relations; it is the sentiment which should be expressed in our economic relations.

One further observation and then I am through.

Mr. GOTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: Apparently the defender of the autonomy of the onion will be glad to see me sit down. But I am not speaking to onions or onion growers; I am appealing to men who have brains and know how to use them.

I come back to the sound argument made by one of my hon. friends in connection with Holland. He pointed out that our trade with Holland was favourable to us. At the time the French treaty was broken, it was alleged that our trade with France was adverse. Figures were given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to support this contention. Just in passing, I may say that he has submitted to the trying ordeal of the last week with a spirit and intelligence which warrants my highest compliment. It was stated that on the basis of figures supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce, our trade with France was adverse. In reply to this statement the French consul in Montreal, Mr. Marchal, published a letter in the Montreal Gazette, couched in the most polite and concise terms, showing that the trade returns as compiled by the French government gave an entirely different result than those published in Ottawa. He did not contend that the figures published here were false, not at all; he simply proved that there was a difference in the method of computation. This demonstrates once more that statistics do not always tell the truth. France figures her imports by tracing up the country of origin of goods coming into the country. Whether they come from Montreal, Quebec, Halifax or Saint John to Havre, Cherbourg or Bordeaux, or from Canada via other countries, they are all counted as Canadian goods. We figure our exports by the country of consignment; with the result that millions of dollars worth of Canadian goods are shipped to England to be reshipped to France as British goods. I do not begrudge prosperity to the British trader or broker; but I claim for Canada the right to sell its goods to France, to Japan, to China or any other country as its own goods and to reap the full benefit of trade and international comity by being able to demonstrate, as in the case of France, that we have shipped more goods than are shown by our figures. I hope this matter will be adjusted when the representatives of this and the French government meet in Paris; and that in the future the trade statistics will be presented in such a way that the Canadian producer, whether the farmer, the industrialist, the lumberman or the fisherman, will have the full benefit of accurate figures on exports to foreign countries.

I may not be in full accord with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King); he is worried so much about the poor Englishmen that he would probably be adverse to my suggestion. I think it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who stated that the English trader is quite capable of looking after himself, and I also think he is. His great success during the last three hundred years has demonstrated that he does not need the assistance of Canadian statistics in order to increase artificially the figures of his trade. The British trader should be content with the enormous profits he derives from trading in the produce of his own country, and allow to us Canadians the full benefits of what we produce and sell to foreign countries.

I do not think I need add anything more to my argument.

Mr. GOTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: Again the onion grows impatient; let the onion be quiet, because it means just five minutes more added to my speech. Let the hon. gentleman smell his onions and shed his tears.

With respect to one country, at least—and this is the object of my argument—one aspect of the case has apparently been disregarded. I would be the last man to blame the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), or the Minister of Finance—who in my opinion represents the most civilized province in Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, although I am not a Nova Scotian, I say that. May I illustrate my thought by a little story concerning an hon. gentleman whom the minister knows very well? This gentleman was asked by a very assertive Toronto or Montreal lawyer—it does not matter from which city, because it would have been the same—how it was that people from down there were so different to what other Canadians were. My friend responded, in his somewhat hoarse voice: I do not know, but perhaps it is because we are a thousand miles nearer than you are to civilization.

I am sure that the ministers never thought for one moment that they were imposing a special burden upon the province of Quebec and upon French Canadians generally. But, as a matter of fact, this trade agreement imposes a special taxation upon the readers of French books and upon the purchasers of those goods to which I have referred.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): All law books.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not think hon. members of the legal profession should object to paying a little more for their law books. That extra payment might represent a return of not always honestly earned money. It would constitute perhaps merely a form of restitution to the state.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Mr. BOURASSA: My remarks must not be taken as personal at all, and perhaps I can soften them by saying that I am sure my hon. friends read more works of literature, of philosophy and of history than they do dry law books. Therefore I plead with them, and for them, not as lawyers, but as intelligent, honest and cultured men, and similarly in the case of all the others. So, from the broad point of view, and, I am sure, without any intention of being offensive, I repeat that, not only to the French Canadian but to the fast growing number of Canadians who realize that French culture, French literature and even the use of French material objects which form part of French culture, are of use to Canada, it must be evident that the exclusion of Frenh goods, in order to give a little more advantage to British traders, is not good policy. I have no objection to my friends feeling delight at the idea of communing under these treaties with their yellow, black, greyish or bluish brothers of those scattered lands over which the Prime Minister occasionally throws a fatherly eye; but at the same time I claim for us, 3,000,000 French Canadians and, let us say, about half a million English Canadians who commune with us in French culture, the right to ornament our minds and to cure our bodies in a French fashion, which is just as legitimate as the right of my friends to take English drugs, absorb Irish or Scotch whisky and read English books. With all that I leave the matter in the care of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. The other day, the Minister of Finance very kindly said to the hon. member for Rimouski that he would call the attention of the British government to the item of surgical instruments—I may say that I have just as great an objection to being cut with a French as with an English instrument—but, selfishly speaking, not yet being called upon for an operation to be performed by the hon. member for Rimouski, I still go on reading French books and drinking French wine, which I consider far preferable to Irish or Scotch whisky—

Mr. NEILL: Oh, no.

Mr. BOURASSA: I did not say French brandy. I make more use of wine than either brandy or Scotch.

I think the government should bear in mind these observations in the representations they may make to the British government. I am quite sure Mr. Baldwin or Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will understand the situation immediately. They are civilized. They are not ashamed of being close neighbours to France. They were not ashamed during the war to have a vanguard of 2,000,000 Frenchmen die in order to preserve the English coasts. I am quite sure the English government would not object to our government changing somewhat the terms of this treaty in order to enable Canada to make better terms with the French government for trade, racial and cultural purposes.

Mr. GOTT: I regret very much the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) misinterpreted my applause. I may say that I did not utter a word while he was speaking, and if he thought I was applauding in appreciation of his remarks, he was very much mistaken; I was applauding because I thought he had completed his speech.

Mr. BOURASSA: I heartily apologize to the hon. member if I misunderstood him, and I am glad to tell him so.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has made a very eloquent appeal for certain racial and linguistic groups. I should like to make an appeal for certain economic groups. We in this labour group have had very little to say with regard to these treaties, because we did not feel that on the whole they affected very materially the people whom we represent. But the other day we did speak with regard to the textile industry, because we felt that the protection which was being offered to the textile manufacturers did not in any sense guarantee decent wages or conditions of living for those employed in that industry. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) suggested that there would be an inquiry into conditions in that industry. A correspondent of mine in Montreal has just written me his view of that situation. He has been an overseer of carding both in Lancashire and in Canada and he has made a computation based on the wages paid and the production in the card room department. He thinks this is sufficiently wide to repudiate the employers' claim that they need to be protected from low wage competitors. Without going into his computations, may I give his conclusions: The Lancashire spinners pay $12.24 for 5,760 pounds of production. The Canadian spinners pay $5.40 for 7,200 pounds of production. Let me put it in another way: the Lancashire spinners pay $1 for 470 pounds produced, and the Canadian spinners pay $1 for 1,333 pounds produced.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does that refer to cotton or woollen textiles?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He is dealing with the Valleyfield mills—cotton.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has not perhaps considered the difference in machinery.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Undoubtedly we have better machinery, but having better machinery we produce a great deal more and the wage cost per unit is not as great.

Not only are our people at a disadvantage from the point of view of wages paid, but as I said the other day there is a difference in general social conditions. Take, for example, the lack in Canada of any protection on the part of trade unions. I hold in my hand a card containing the agreement between the Shawinigan Cotton Company, Limited, and its employees, and I read:

> The undersigned hereby agrees with The Shawinigan Cotton Co., Limited, that in consideration of being engaged by the said company, the following conditions shall be a part of the contract and be binding upon the parties.
> 1. This said engagement shall be a fortnightly engagement, the wages shall be paid fortnightly and two weeks notice of cancellation shall be required on either side.
> 2. All employees being absent from their work for five hours without permission from their respective foreman, and unable to produce a doctor's certificate of illness too severe to admit their attendance at work are to be considered as having left the employ of the company.

I would draw special attention to the third clause:

> 3. All persons who become members of or associated or affiliated with any labour organization of any kind whatsoever shall thereby entitle the company on its becoming aware of the fact to immediately discharge them without notice and to hold as forfeited all wages due them by the company at the time of such discharge, notwithstanding anything in this agreement.
> 4. All persons having left the employ of the company without having given two weeks' notice and having worked for said two weeks in the employ of the company shall thereby forfeit all wages due them at the time of leaving.

5. The rules and regulations posted up in the mills of the company shall be and are part of the contract between the employees and the company and are binding upon the parties.

6. It is the right of the company when it closes its mill or part of it on account of a strike or when it closes its mill or part of it on account of repairs, to lay off any person at any time without notice and no action for so doing shall lie against the company notwithstanding anything in this agreement.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have signed.

The Shawinigan Cotton Co., Limited.

And a space is left for the signature of the employee. It seems to me that a contract of that kind indicates a condition nearly approaching that of slavery. The employee signs away practically all the rights that are guaranteed in most civilized countries. We ourselves, as I have frequently pointed out, in signing the Peace treaty, approved the labour provision of the treaty by which the right of labour to organize was recognized. Yet here we have a company, and not the only one by any means, paying miserably small wages, and not only preventing the employees from taking any steps whatever to better their conditions, but going beyond what most civilized countries would permit in causing the wages of their employees to be forfeited if they take action of this kind. Coupled with that is the fact that when there is a rush order they often have to work long hours of overtime. Very frequently the employees have to work, I am informed, from seven in the morning till ten at night, with only one hour's interval from 12 to 1 p.m.

I am not at all concerned with the question whether there are laws on the statute books of the province of Quebec governing such conditions. What I am concerned in at the moment is that we are giving to a company such as this, enormous so-called protection, enormous privileges, when the company is not maintaining any decent sort of living standard for its employees.

In the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday last I find some comparative tariff rates given by a man very well known here. I think this is the first time that I have quoted his statistics, although other hon. members have frequently done so. He gives an excellent list of comparative tariff rates under different administrations and compares them with the new conference rates. Mr. R. J. Deachman says:

Imagine the task of working out a simple item where instead of taking a definite ad valorem tariff rate and multiplying the invoice value of the goods by that rate, we must take the price which would be the invoice value if the pound stood at par, multiply that by the rate and then deduct ten per cent. Then add the weight duty and deduct ten per cent of the duty paid value and stick that on—this calculated as if the pound were at par, then work out the dump duty which represents 68 cents on the pound (current rate, and subject to constant modification), now divide the result by the actual value in Canadian funds of the goods imported, then you have the ad valorem rate. If you follow this complicated performance you will probably wonder why they did not multiply the whole thing by 100 and divide by Mr. Bennett's age.

Then follows the table:

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to add to what I said before recess. There are two economic groups; first, the consumers. One cannot look at a table such as that which I put on Hansard before six o'clock showing the degree of protection accorded the textile manufacturers, without realizing that very heavy tribute is being levied upon the people of Canada. Millions of dollars extra are being paid by the people for clothing, blankets, and other necessities of life by reason of tariff protection. It seems to me it is a very important consideration whether it is worth while for the people of this country to pay such a heavy tribute to a particular industry. Turning from the group of people whom we commonly call the consumers—I suppose we are all consumers—to the class engaged in the production of these commodities, it seems to me that we have to distinguish clearly between the manufacturers themselves, the owners of the factories, and their employees. We have been inclined to take it for granted that whatever was of advantage to the manufacturers would be of advantage to their employees. But this is true to only a very limited degree. It is quite possible that if very large profits were not permitted to the manufacturers they might close their doors, and temporarily a large number of employees might be thrown out of employment. On the other hand, as we tried to emphasize the other evening, it by no means follows that protection to the manufacturer is any guarantee of a decent standard of livelihood to the men engaged in the industry. Protection does not in any way guard against low standards or ensure that our own manufacturers shall not be guilty of what might truly be termed unfair competition.

I want for a moment to call attention to the article contained in the agreement which I read just before recess:

> All persons who become members of or associated or affiliated with any labour organization of any kind whatsoever shall thereby entitle the company on its becoming aware of the fact to immediately discharge them without notice and to hold as forfeited all wages due them by the company at the time of such discharge notwithstanding anything in this agreement.

That is very little less than a slave pact. I should think that if our Labour department were really active in the interests of labour they would immediately take steps to protect the worker in his right to organize. If this country were properly seized of the importance of the inherent rights of citizens it would not tolerate the use of an agreement of this kind by any company engaged in industry.

Mr. EULER: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quoting from an agreement which I cited before recess, between the Shawinigan Cotton Company, Limited, and its employees.

Mr. EULER: Is it still in force?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As far as I am aware. This was sent to me recently; it is a blank card and there are no dates on it, just a place for the date. I should think it would be a matter for investigation by our Labour department. I have not the facilities for investigating it; if I went on the premises of the company I presume I would be immediately ordered off because it might be considered that I was trying to organize the employees. It is an anomaly that we should be giving special privileges to these textile companies, yet refuse to assume any responsibility with regard to the conditions which prevail in these factories. As I showed a few evenings ago, very low wages are paid; the Canada Year Book demonstrates that. So we come back to this position, that we ought to guarantee to the people engaged by these corporations the right of association, the right to decent wages and decent living conditions; and that companies failing to grant these should not be permitted to be the recipients of special privileges. That is a preeminently reasonable position. The government is in a position very readily to put such a principle into effect, notwithstanding any provisions of the British North America Act.

There is only one other matter that I should like to mention before this agreement passes. The arrangements which we are considering tend to stabilize tariffs at a very high level, and this is unsatisfactory both from the standpoint of the consumer in Canada, and from that of international relations. We, with other nations, are putting up tariff barriers that sooner or later will lead us into complications that may easily result in physical war. We are not justified in adopting such a policy, and for that reason I shall have to vote against the bill.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement before the vote is taken. I am voting against the treaties since in my opinion they stabilize the Canadian tariff at a high level, the highest it has ever reached. It is a manufacturer's tariff, in which the consumer was forgotten. I vote against the treaties since the monetary policy carried out by this government makes it impossible for the Canadian farmers to sell their goods in the British market, and in so far as they do sell any goods they lose around $1.10 on every British pound's worth of Canadian goods put upon the British market.

I will give you some quotations from actual exporters to prove the truth of that statement. The Country Guide, of November, 1932, a magazine printed in Winnipeg, carried interviews with several exporters. The initials of the interviewer are R.D.C. The first interview was with Mr. Bruce Burns, president of Burns Brothers, a firm which shipped 3,000 cattle to Great Britain this year. The interviewer asked Mr. Burns what would be the effect on cattle prices on the St. Boniface market if the pound were worth $4.86, and he answered:

If the pound were anywhere near par we could pay $20 more on the St. Boniface market for an export steer, if we were exporting. But the exchange situation has got so bad that we went out of the export business last August.

The interviewer then asked Mr. F. M. Baker, western representative of the Industrial and Development Council of Canadian Meat Packers, what he had to say in relation to bacon going on the British market.

Mr. Baker said:

The loss due to exchange alone is approximately $1.40 per 60 pounds of Wiltshire and since that amount of Wiltshire is made from 100 pounds of live hog the loss is $1.40 per 100 pounds on bacon hog.

And since a bacon hog will weigh 200 pounds, that means a loss of $2.80 on every bacon hog put on the British market, due to the monetary policy of the present government.

Then the interviewer interviewed Mr. T. J. Coyle, of T. J. Coyle and Company, dealers in butter and produce, and Mr. Coyle said at the end of quite a long paragraph:

When the pound dropped below $4.25 last August we quit exporting butter to the old country altogether.

The interviewer next saw Mr. W. A. Landreth, general manager of the Canadian Cooperative Poultry Producers, who said:

If the pound sterling was worth $4.86 and there were no loss on sterling the price parity to the producer would be not 13 cents—

As it was then on turkeys.

—but 20 cents.

[Miss Macphail.]

The same man, speaking of eggs, said:

With the pound worth $4.86 the loss on sterling is eliminated, and that much added to the producer price brings it up to 18½ cents.

Instead of 11 cents a dozen as they are at the moment. That is a very serious thing. There was a loss of $20 on an export animal, $2.80 on an export hog, the stopping of butter exports altogether, a loss of 7 cents a pound on turkeys and 7 cents a dozen on eggs when this interview was given.

I oppose the treaties because the present government does not provide for the free entry of any British goods into Canada. Even on goods called free, the exchange dumping duty of 18 per cent and the 3 per cent excise tax must be paid, making a protection of 21 per cent against so called free goods. Then if the Canadian farmer sells his produce in the British market at world prices and gets paid in the British pound, when he brings that pound back to Canada he gets only $3.78 for it. But if he buys British goods with that British pound this government charges him a duty based on the par value of the pound, plus the exchange dumping duty on the duty paid value plus 3 per cent excise tax. In other words, the government gets the farmer whether he brings back money or goods. Therefore, as a representative of the farmers in the House of Commons I could not possibly support such a treaty.

These treaties will adversely affect our trade with other countries against whom we have raised our intermediate tariff. In this I am giving my own opinion, but I think it is correct. There are possibly twenty of these countries, and I think in this connection we will lose much more than we will gain. Lastly, the treaties do not recognize the economic unity of the world and the right of trade to flow where it will. These treaties have set up another group of obstructions seeking to force trade into new channels. For all these reasons I must vote against the treaty now before the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Bennett) which was agreed to on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS—UNEMPLOYMENT

The house resumed, from Monday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the government has taken the full responsibility for conditions as they exist, and we are not to have any commission to consider the matter further, I presume that all that any of us can now do is to lay before the house the actual conditions that prevail across Canada today, with a view to having some policy adopted which will help at least in part to alleviate the situation. How do we actually deal with the large number of people who are today unemployed? May I point out that there is a certain class of them whom we are simply getting rid of. Out of a grand total of deportations for the past year and a half of some 15,368, there were 9,446 who were deported simply because they had become public charges. I am not holding the government altogether responsible for this action because I know that there has been a good deal of pressure on the part of municipalities to have these people deported; but it is not fair that when we have invited immigrants to come to this country, people who very often have broken up their homes and given up jobs in the old land, having torn themselves loose to come here, expecting to find the opportunities which were promised to them, we should, as soon as they find themselves unable to obtain work, simply send them back to the countries from which they came. I do not think it is at all fair. In this land of plenty we should have assumed our obligations to care for them.

May I call attention to another class, those who are commonly known as transients. They are the men who had a good deal to do with the construction of our railroads, the building-up of our cities, and pioneering in the west, single men for the most part who went wherever unskilled labour was needed. They were very often imported by contractors, being told that there would be opportunities for work in this country. Now they are regarded as the scum of the earth. No community will accept responsibility for them. I had a letter the other day from a friend of mine in Winnipeg. He writes:

Conditions here have become deplorable. The city seems to be filling up with destitute men. A man called at my house this afternoon and after feeding him I drove him down to the Water street hall for him to get a night's lodging. The place was full to the doors. I saw fully thirty men lying in their filth and rags within five feet of the doors—an abominable sight. We always provided for our cattle better. I took the fellow to a hotel and got him a bed and intend applying for his deportation tomorrow, as he is an Englishman with two years' residence in this country and told me he had six years' service in the imperial army.

It seems to me that that is not a fair way to deal with our English immigrants, and especially with those who have served their country during the war. I have had another communication from a gentleman connected with the unemployment conference in Winnipeg. He states that a large number of transients were stranded in Winnipeg as the result of the ban by the government upon freight train riding. He writes:

As many of them as can get into the old immigration hall in the industrial bureau are allowed to sleep on the floor there at nights without beds or blankets, and those who are unable to crowd into the sleeping quarters there are compelled to go to the police station.

In the morning these boys are given a bowl of porridge each, a cup of coffee, some dry bread and a little syrup. The only other meal they receive is in the evening, when they get a bowl of thin soup, more dry bread, and a cup of coffee.

I took this matter up with Alderman Andrews, chairman of the unemployed relief committee of Winnipeg, and he advised me the city would not assume responsibility for the feeding of these transients, but from a humanitarian basis the men are given the meagre food they now receive rather than let them starve.

And again:

It is frankly admitted by some of the Winnipeg aldermen that their purpose in giving the transients such meagre food and these horrible sleeping quarters is to force them to leave town and run the risk of being jailed in some other town for a violation of the government's order prohibiting riding on freight trains.

Mr. FAFARD: On one occasion when I was motoring I gave one of these transients a ride. After I had driven about thirty miles he put a revolver under my nose, but I punched him in the right place.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is possible that there are some of these transients who become outlaws but there are tens of thousands of them who up to very recently have been good workingmen. These men are being made into criminals, and the society which treats them in such a wretched manner is responsible. Some of this group of men of whom I spoke were assisted to come east to their homes, but protests were made by Toronto and Montreal against their coming back. They are kicked around from one place to another, no one will assume any responsibility for their welfare. I should like to quote another instance in connection with the homesteaders from the Peace River district. I received a communication with regard to this matter enclosing a letter which describes the situation and which reads in part:

—homesteaders from the Peace River district who are not allowed to return home as freight riders, the same manner as they were permitted to come to the harvest operations.

They were permitted to go in that manner and then were not allowed to return. The letter continued:

The people of Busby these days see many of the homesteaders making their homeward journey under different circumstances. A week ago fourteen men were stranded in Busby, some of whom had a club used on their hands to make them release their hold on the cars. That night some slept in the bush, some in the United church, others on the floor in the hotel. Next day four more weary and footsore arrived from Edmonton, and that night eighteen men were housed in the church. Sunday, the majority started northward by the tie route. Next day the others scattered, some homeward, others back to the city. Some of the group belonging to the district around Dawson creek, nearly five hundred miles from Edmonton. One man had seven dollars cash, two had less, etc.

And again:

The chief grievance of all these men is that they were allowed to come south freight riding and now denied that privilege to get home.

And again:

The order prohibiting freight riding is inexcusable under the existing circumstances. To say the least, the order is an act of crass stupidity.

Certain of these men have been arrested, some of them complain of having been roughly handled, and they state that at times money has been taken from them by the police without due process of law. I am not in position to investigate that accusation. These men are not to blame for the conditions which exist, they took the only means at hand to get to the places where they hoped to secure work.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been no change in the law; it has always been enforced persistently.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am well aware that riding on freight trains is against the law, but I know also that that law was not enforced, that the government lifted the ban for a while.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And allowed these people to ride.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The papers stated that the law was not being enforced, and the government gave notice that thirty days after a certain date the law would be enforced. Surely that is an implication that the law was not being enforced.

I should like to deal with the conditions which exist in the relief camps. I shall read first an extract from a despatch from Ottawa giving a description of these camps. It reads:

> In these camps, in which up-to-date sanitation has been installed and free medical attention will be given, food, shelter and clothing will be provided.

Opposed to that description, I have the following letter from a gentleman in Winnipeg which seems to indicate that conditions are not as described in the press:

> I have been asked by a committee of men, who are working at Riding Mountain park, to bring to your attention the utterly disgraceful situation which exists there. Picture to yourself a tar paper shack 79 feet x 24 with no windows, along each side there is a row of double deck bunks, these are spaced off with 8 x 1 board so that there is room for two men in each bunk. The bunks are filled with straw and you crawl into them from the foot end. Along the front of the lower bunk a narrow board is placed upon which the men may sit. The place is very meagrely lighted and ventilation by three skylights. There are two stoves in the shack in front one of which cordwood is piled up. So narrow is the passageway between the bunks that when the men are sitting on the bench there is scarcely room to pass between them. This shack 79 x 24 houses 88 men. There is a marked resemblance to a hog pen or a dog pound. At all times the place reeks of the foul smell and at night the air is simply fetid. The floor is dirty and the end of the shack, where there is a trough where the men wash, the floor is caked with black mud. I asked several old-timers their opinion of it and they state in fact that it is without any question the worst camp they have ever seen on the American continent. The toilet is thoroughly filthy, unsanitary, and far too small.

And again:

> The terrible thing about it is that many of the men who are congregated in this camp are teen aged Canadian boys forced into close association with mature men, who have tramped the streets and bummed their way through the country, with the result that the outlook of these boys stands a good chance of being completely warped and their characters so degraded and demoralized that their future is unquestionably seriously menaced.

The question may be asked: Why do men suffer such indignities, and four reasons are given in the letter, as follows:

1. Fourteen miles from the nearest railway.
2. Stool pigeons who report the least attempt at organization.
3. Intermittent surveillance by mounted police.
4. General breaking down of morale.

These men are said to be paid twenty cents a day and their board and are working on the completion of an eighteen hole golf course.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his statement. That camp is located in my constituency and I take exception to his remarks. That letter is absolutely wrong. Those men are taken in and used in the very best way. Their camp is far better than the one at Camp Hughes and the other camps in western Canada. Those men are well treated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope that what the hon. gentleman has said may be correct, but I say that the letter from which I have read from a man who I believe thinks he is telling me the truth, and this is another condition which ought to be investigated.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. gentleman knows that when I tell him it is wrong, it is wrong.

Mr. COTNAM: Has the hon. gentleman attempted to verify the statements he is making before giving them to the house and the country?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have under my hand a letter just received from Dominion, Nova Scotia, in which he may be interested as to conditions in that part of the country. The miners who sign their names to this document report the following survey of their district:

|---|---|
| Number of families visited | 286 |
| Number of people included in above families | 1,601 |
| Number of children under 16 years of age | 813 |
| Number of children eligible for school | 515 |
| Number of children under school age | 298 |
| Number of persons over 16 years never employed | 133 |
| Total income of entire number of families | $1,434 50 |
| Average income per head per week | 0 89 |
| Total number of women in delicate health needing nourishment and unable to get same due to lack of funds | 50 |
| Total number of children delicate, underfed, and underweight | 175 |

|---|---|
| Total number of people unable to work through old age, sickness and physical disability, and no income of any kind | 15 |
| Total number of families in dire need of clothes, bed clothes, etc. | 265 |
| Total number of families in arrears for rent | 165 |
| Evictions pending | 5 |

A note says:

We have retained the original sheets, signed by the parties visited, which are open for inspection to all concerned.

If I come to Montreal I find conditions not so very different. I have under my hand a long statement by Alderman J. Schubert. Among other things he says:

Thus $3.19 was the highest amount paid per person per month in the form of relief.

And again:

The average family in Montreal has never received more than $17 per month according to the figures of September, 1932.

Mr. FAFARD: They do not have that out in the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be. I am talking about Montreal.

Mr. BOURASSA: Is this a municipal councillor?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is Alderman J. Schubert of the city of Montreal. He says:

There were 32,898 people registered as unemployed on the fifteenth of October, 1932.

He says further that the following are not included in this:

Single men are not allowed to register unless they have dependents. Men who are not of six months' residence in the city are not allowed to register. Married men who are boarding, and whose families are elsewhere, are considered as single men. It is needless to add that women are not registered. Also, those unemployed who were once employed as office workers, clerks, typists, stenographers, salesmen, accountants, bookkeepers, machinists, printers, bookbinders, tailors, and highly skilled mechanics, are not registered.

So that there is an enormous volume of unemployed in Montreal. I do not think I need to go into a survey of Ontario. Mr. H. M. Cassidy of Toronto university a few months ago published a survey and report on unemployment and relief in Ontario.

In my own city the situation is very bad. The other day I received a letter from a minister of the United Church, who has a pastorate in one of the suburbs. He wrote me as follows:

The weather is still mild although there has been much snow and rain recently. We are glad because there is no money in our house but seventy-five cents in my purse. . . .

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

53719—92½

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the discussion that is now proceeding is on a motion that the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means. Yesterday evening I directed attention to the fact that I believed the amendment that was proposed was not in order. I did so, not because I had any desire to curtail the discussion, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) has suggested, but I used these words:

The government has no objection to the fullest possible discussion of any question, within the rules, on going into committee of ways and means or supply, but it is another thing altogether when a motion of want of confidence is raised in this manner. Therefore I regard it as my duty to direct attention to the fact that the rules of the house do not contemplate more than one debate on the same matter during the same session, involving in either case a motion of want of confidence in the administration.

Later I said:

In the meantime, the discussion can proceed on the motion to go into ways and means. It is only the question of the amendment that I am directing attention to, but there is no reason why the discussion should not proceed for the next twenty minutes.

Which meant that we reached the hour of eleven o'clock. I desire to make it abundantly clear, despite what the hon. gentleman has said, that the government has no desire in any sense to curb, lessen, restrict or restrain the discussion; on the contrary, we invite the fullest discussion with respect to the matter that has been brought to the attention of the house. The only reason I had for suggesting that the amendment was out of order was the one I have given, namely, that I am frequently reminded by hon. members that in the position I occupy I am responsible for the proper conduct of the business of the house. The rule is there and when I directed attention to the rule I did so in very moderate language, raising the question as clearly as I could; because I do not think it is conducive to the proper conduct of the business of the house that we should invite decisions upon the same matter more than once in the same session. The rule against that is clear, and only for that purpose did I direct attention to it, believing, as I did, that it was my duty to do so. I think on mature consideration the hon. gentleman will realize that there was no desire on my part to prevent discussion but rather that we should endeavour as far as possible to observe the rules that have been laid down for the conduct of the business of the house.

When by reason of the position which I occupy I am sometimes blamed for not seeing that the rules are observed, I can only add that at times I hesitate to direct attention to what I conceive it to be the duty of the Chair itself to recognize, namely, that there has or has not been a breach of the rules of the house. The Chair of its own motion takes cognizance of the fact that an amendment is or is not in order. In Great Britain that is the almost universal custom. It is, however, the duty of the leader of the house, whoever he may happen to be, to direct attention to the fact if in his judgment the course suggested is not in accordance with the rules. I mention that because I say again that the hon. gentleman suggested that this was an effort to prevent discussion. No such effort was made or contemplated. Yesterday evening I made it abundantly clear, as I do again now, that the fullest possible discussion may, so far as the government is concerned, be carried on. If there is any doubt upon that point, it can easily be settled by the action of the members themselves in that regard.

I would have preferred to make the statement I am about to make after the reassembling of the house on the 30th of January. It will be within the memory of most hon. members that on the 29th of April, 1931, I made a statement with respect to the question of unemployment. In the course of that statement I discussed at some length the question of unemployment or of social insurance that might become the subject matter of legislation to deal with the question of unemployment and allied problems. I pointed out why the government of Canada could not introduce legislation to deal with that matter. Roughly the reasons are two. One is purely a constitutional or legal reason; the other is an economic reason because of lack of information with respect to the subject matter then under discussion.

The first reason has been so fully stated to this house on so many occasions that I shall not do more than refer to it very briefly. The right hon. leader of the opposition, as long ago as 1922, his views being concurred in by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, then leading the opposition, said, and in my judgment said truly, that questions of relief arising from any cause, whether from unemployment or from other causes that have brought about the necessity for relief in every province of Canada during the entire life of those provinces, rests primarily with the municipalities, and then with the provinces; but that if extraordinary conditions prevail, as did in 1922, and as did again in 1930, then the national character of those conditions may necessitate recourse being had to the federal authority by the provincial authorities to enable the matter to be dealt with.

In 1931, on April 29, as I have said, I directed attention to that matter in some detail. I pointed out what I think is common ground taken by all who have studied the question, that there is a clear distinction between an extraordinary national condition and what is called, in the language of the law books, a national emergency. Unemployment is not a national emergency. It may be a national condition involving the necessity of federal assistance to the provinces; but the fact that the second largest province in the Dominion has made it abundantly clear that it would not tolerate interference on the part of the federal authorities indicates clearly that all that the federal parliament can do by way of legislation is to assist the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations. That course has been pursued by this government. It is the course that has been pursued by parliament on every occasion upon which a similar condition has prevailed. The magnitude of the disease of unemployment from which the body politic now suffers does not in any sense change or modify the character of the obligations resting upon the federal authority. I shall not do more than direct attention to the fact that the definition of the words "national emergency" has been so limited by judicial decision as to make it fairly clear that anything in the nature of national unemployment spreading over the country from one end to the other does not constitute such a national emergency. That is the judgment of the court of last resort so far as we are concerned.

The problem of jurisdiction therefore, to quote once more the language of the right hon. leader of the opposition, raises the question, on the one hand, of the conflict between property and civil rights, which are solely within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and, on the other hand, the national obligations of the dominion when it conceives a condition to prevail that warrants assistance to the provinces to enable them to discharge their duties. The question of jurisdiction therefore is at the bottom of all relief which is of a permanent character. Any legislation that may be enacted to deal, for instance with social insurance problems must have the support of the provincial authorities. I made that abundantly clear on more than one occasion here, and it was agreed to I think by every member of the house who had taken the trouble to consider the question. Now pressure has been brought to bear by various organizations throughout the dominion to ensure the passage of what is known as contributory unemployment insurance legislation. That legislation, to be effective in this country, with jurisdiction divided between the provincial legislatures and the federal parliament, could have validity only, if it had the sanction both of the legislatures and of parliament. That I think has been conceded. But that difficulty is one that can be overcome. It can be overcome rather readily if the provinces will agree to such an amendment to our constitution as will clothe parliament with the appropriate authority.

It has been the purpose of this government to call an interprovincial conference between now and the date of the reassembling of this house, to discuss with the representatives of the provinces of Canada this and other problems. I pointed out to the house with respect to another matter that we had hoped to have an interprovincial conference at an early date. Conditions made it impossible to hold that conference last fall. I need hardly point out to this chamber that the government had so much work to do, and the members of this administration were so pushed and driven by the responsibilities that rested upon them that there was not an adequate opportunity to discuss and consider many matters which an interprovincial conference should take under advisement. But we have been making arrangements for such a conference. I had hoped that we would be able to have the conference without making any statement to the house, and that we might be able to report the result of its deliberations after the house reassembled. I find it incumbent upon me now to make the statement which I have just made.

There are other questions to consider besides those affecting social insurance and social problems. There are problems with respect to taxation. There are problems with respect to the Companies Act. It has been found by many investors in this country that companies operating under a dominion charter have imposed upon them, and we had contemplated, in fact had drafted, legislation that as we conceived it would amply protect investors against what they have suffered in days gone by, and recently; but it was idle to enact such legislation, for every one of the nine provinces of Canada could grant corporate existence to the same gentlemen who sought to obtain it if they were refused it here. We should have a uniform Companies Act in Canada; that is the law that provides for the creation of an artificial entity. It is a privilege that is conferred, and that law, it seems to me, should, if possible, be uniform in every province throughout this dominion. But that is a most difficult problem. The commission on uniformity of legislation, which came into being largely through the efforts of the Canadian Bar Association, has endeavoured with respect to partnership law, with respect to wills, and with respect to other matters of that kind, to ensure that we shall have uniform provisions throughout the dominion, leaving out, of course, the provisions of the civil law in the province of Quebec. That provision, however, would not obtain with respect to companies.

With regard to the division of the field of taxation, there too is a problem of very great seriousness. I need hardly point out what every member of this house who has given any thought to it knows, that the imposition of a double income tax, sometimes three income taxes, on the same income does not invite the settlement in provinces, from the outside, of people with capital. We have now two income taxes in many provinces, one by the federal and one by the provincial authority; in some others we have no provincial income tax but a municipal income tax. This question has engaged the attention of the governments of the provinces as well as of the government of this dominion. One of the ministers of finance was of the opinion that the field as far as private and individual incomes were concerned should be left to the provinces, and perhaps corporation incomes should be the field to be taken by the dominion. This too is a matter which we hope we may be able to discuss at an interprovincial conference.

There remain many other questions, one for instance being in connection with insurance, about which we have been carrying on negotiations and discussions, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen representing the federal power, and the Premier of Quebec and the Attorney General of Ontario representing the provincial viewpoint. There are differing views there. Some of the western provinces feel that the burden cast upon them, if they undertook to regulate insurance business within the terms of the judgment of the court of last resort, would be too onerous and too expensive. That also must be considered.

There are many other matters which I will not dwell upon, but this is one which we have set down as being of tremendous importance to every part of this dominion. I take it that the judgment of the house, broadly speaking, was that any measure of social insurance should be contributory in its character, that it could not be otherwise. All the representations that have been made to me with respect to the matter lead to that conclusion.

I shall not tonight traverse again the ground covered in my address to this house on the 29th of April, 1931. I indicated there the factors that had to be considered. There was one factor to which I particularly directed attention; it was referred to last evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; that is that a measure of unemployment insurance, to have any value whatever, must be based upon actuarial understanding of the situation. I pointed out what I take it is within the memory of every member of this house, that the British unemployment insurance legislation was predicated upon actuarial computation. The difficulties arose because it was found in practice that the fund had to borrow to enable it to discharge its obligations, and the borrowings became so great that, in the language of the government of the day, it threatened the very solvency of the state itself. Hence the difficulties to which reference has been made on more than one occasion in this house. The actuarial computations with respect to this matter cannot be mere guesswork. I ventured to point out to the house in April, 1931, that if they were to have any value, if in the language of one hon. gentleman who has spoken in this discussion we are to derive any benefit from the knowledge of the past, it can only be because we can rely upon it to enable us to go forward with plans and proposals that will not be shipwrecked because they are based upon guesswork. I pointed out then that the census would be taken in 1931, and I further pointed out that when the census was completed we proposed to have the figures disclosed by the census so analyzed as to enable us to deal with the subject, assuming, as we did, that we might be able to make a satisfactory arrangement with the provinces. I therefore desire to make it perfectly clear that in pursuance of the statement which I then made, and which I shall now read, it is the purpose of this government to have a conference of the provinces to determine what action may be agreed upon with respect to this and other matters. In that regard these words were used by me on April 29, 1931, as found on page 1103 of Hansard:

> Under those circumstances, with a census about to be taken and the necessary figures to become available, with our actuarial force willing and ready to tackle the problem from the angles that I have suggested, does any hon. gentleman think that we would be doing justice to the Dominion of Canada or to ourselves if we now passed a resolution asking the government immediately to do something which it is not equipped to do? I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house. I have never had any illusions as to what is involved; I have none now. I have never had any desire other than that the legislation placed upon the statute book, whether by this government or by some other, shall be legislation based upon knowledge, and not upon mere guesswork.

And I further said in the concluding words of my observations with respect to a contributory form of insurance:

> I say once more that this country will not produce men of the character it has had until men and women begin to realize that life means responsibilities and that one of those responsibilities is to help themselves. That is the only method by which social legislation can effectively and efficiently be enacted. Of that I feel quite certain. Whatever my reading and inquiries may be worth, I have satisfied myself quite clearly that in whatever we do in this regard we must recognize and realize that insurance involves premiums and premiums should be paid by the joint action alike of the insurer and the insured themselves and with the assistance of the state. In that sense, if the hon. gentleman is prepared to accept the suggestions I make, I say to him on behalf of the administration that, at the earliest possible moment consistent with obtaining information that is essential to make any measure of social insurance worth while, we will use that information for the purpose of preparing and submitting to this house a measure embodying the views I have expressed.

That was my statement on the 29th of April, 1931. I merely rise at this moment to reiterate and restate it.

I was rather surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who, I judge from what he said, has made careful inquiry into the matter, was not aware of the fact that the census figures to which I referred, despite the utmost efforts of those charged with the responsibility to complete them, had been only partly prepared within the last month; it will not be until after the turn of the year that we shall have a complete set of figures which will enable us with certainty to present the matter to this house. That I am told by the chief statistician is the present condition. We have anxiously, and my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has persistently endeavoured, to expedite the making available of this information. But it is not easy to do it. If any hon. gentleman desires to visit the chief statistician's office and learn just what is involved, he will understand why we have not that information at the moment. It was because of these facts that, as I have said, I would have preferred to make this statement after the house has reassembled and we shall have accomplished what we had in mind, namely the completion of our discussions with the provincial authorities, and, availing ourselves of the analysis of the figures supplied by the census department, the submission to our draftsmen of the skeleton of what we conceived to be the necessary measure to meet the situation that exists.

I shall not traverse the ground with respect to what the government has done; the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) will deal with that phase of the question. I can only say this: I do not believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre advances his cause one whit when he reads letters from unknown sources that, to the knowledge of more than one member on this side of the house, contain statements that are incorrect. The minister charged with responsibility for the work that was carried on in Riding Mountain park visited that point for the purpose of observing just what were the facilities provided for the care of those working there, and the expressions of satisfaction on the part of those engaged in that work is, I conceive, the best answer that can be given to the complaints that have been made.

Nor shall I review in detail the statements that have been made as to the impoverished condition that exists in certain sections of this dominion. Sometimes I wonder if it is worth while reminding this chamber, or any body of men and women, that nineteen hundred years ago this statement was made: "For ye have the poor always with you". That has been the case for nineteen centuries. It is true that provision has been made by every province in Canada, I repeat, since it became a province, to care for its indigents, and I know of no municipality in western Canada that has not carried in its budget provision for the poor. I know of no legislature, that has not provided by a vote the means to care for those who are unable to provide for themselves. I do not refer to the sick; I refer to the indigent only.

This I should like to say, not to anticipate what will be said by the Minister of Labour at the appropriate time. Last spring the government called a meeting of representatives of the provinces, who concluded that it was not expedient to continue their efforts for relief along the lines that had prevailed theretofore. They decided they would have recourse to direct relief. The conference was very well attended; half a dozen of our ministers were there, and that conclusion having been arrived at, the action indicated was taken. With respect to homeless single men the minister will indicate just how the effort has been made to relieve the provinces of responsibility in that regard; because we have realized that an obligation rests upon the dominion in connection with the floating population of homeless, single men who may belong to one province but become a charge in another. The minister on more than one occasion has made it abundantly clear that as far as our effort is concerned—and we have no direct contact either with the municipality or with the individual, our business being with the provinces, the constituted authority in that regard—it is to see that no one should lack at least food, shelter and clothing. That has been the effort, and so far as we are advised that effort has succeeded. It would be easy to point out cases of apparent and perhaps real destitution, but parliament is not and cannot be the medium to care for that particular condition. It can act only through the constituted authorities, namely the provinces and the municipalities. In that regard I think our assistance at all times has been reasonably generous, and we have endeavoured to exercise such supervisions as might be reasonable without in any sense lessening the autonomy of the provinces or depriving them of their constitutional rights or jurisdiction.

I do not intend to deal further with this matter, Mr. Speaker, I shall only summarize the situation by saying that the government has in course of preparation what we believe will be an appropriate agenda to submit to an interprovincial conference. It is proposed to call that conference so that it may conclude its labours between now and January 30, when the house will reassemble. At that conference it is proposed to discuss all those matters that have engaged the attention of governments, both provincial and federal, with particular reference to the question referred to by myself on April 29, 1931, namely, the problem of unemployment and how it should be and may be dealt with under the divided jurisdiction which exists in Canada.

One further word I should add, and it is this: It is not competent for me to discuss the merits or demerits of commissions or committees of this house, but I should like to point out that parliament has no jurisdiction to appoint a federal relief commission. That is beyond our power; such a commission could not function for the very simple and obvious reason that more than one province has made it abundantly clear that they would not tolerate this interference in their business.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask how it functioned in 1919, when the federal parliament appointed a commission.

Mr. BENNETT: My answer to that question is one which I think the hon. gentleman himself will appreciate on reflection. The War Measures Act was then in force, and when I endeavoured to suggest that we should deal with the problem as one of peace, order and good government, which would bring it within the jurisdiction of this government, I was met with opposition such as will be within the memory of the house. We did succeed in securing the legislation for a limited time, but one does not like to face that sort of thing merely for the purpose of having the House of Commons sit for a month without obtaining results. With the aid of the provinces it would be competent for this parliament to enact appropriate legislation; that was done under the War Measures Act. That act now has ceased to have effect, and the condition to which the hon. gentleman has referred is a condition that no longer exists. I repeat that at the moment there is no authority on the part of this government or this parliament to appoint and clothe with appropriate powers a federal relief commission. We have done this: A representative of the Department of Labour has visited the four western provinces, and with them he has gone into this matter. They have appointed their own commissions, by means of which they are endeavouring to discharge their obligations, and the minister is giving them such assistance as may be necessary in the premises. We must realize that there are provinces in this confederation that will not tolerate the dominion interfering with or endeavouring to trench upon their jurisdiction; that they have made quite clear, and therefore any attempt on our part to create a federal unemployment or federal relief commission not only would be beyond our power but would be met at once with the resistance which any interference or trenching upon the jurisdiction of the provinces would involve.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking longer than I had expected in making this statement. I cannot promise that the legislation I mentioned in my speech of April 29, 1931, will be forthcoming, but I can promise that it will be no fault of ours if we do not meet with the provinces between now and January 30 next, and at least arrive at some conclusion with respect to those controversial matters which must be settled before any appropriate action can be taken by this parliament.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure the minds of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house will be greatly relieved at the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), made at the opening of his remarks, which was to the effect that he had no desire to curtail discussion on the all-important question of unemployment relief. My right hon. friend could hardly be surprised if not only those on this side of the house but the country generally gathered from what he said yesterday that such was the purpose of the administration in seeking to avoid discussion of the amendment which had been moved and which was before the house. May I say also that that impression was made doubly strong by the ruling of his honour the Speaker and by the arguments by which the ruling was supported. The impression certainly did exist very generally that this House of Commons was not to have an opportunity to discuss further or at any considerable length the question of unemployment or unemployment relief. I am not surprised that the Prime Minister came very quickly to recognize how serious would be the consequence of a step of the kind on the part of the administration. As I gather now from the Prime Minister's remarks, the house is free to discuss, on going into committee of ways and means, or on going into committee of supply, any grievance which it may wish to bring to the attention of the administration, and to do so in pursuance of the rights which we have all along assumed and claimed belonged to the House of Commons at any time the government was asking it to consider ways and means or supply.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am also pleased to find myself very largely in agreement with much that the right hon. the Prime Minister has said this evening, both as to the position of this parliament in dealing with the question of unemployment, and as to the government's intention with respect to certain legislation which I understand, it now hopes may be enacted by parliament at some subsequent session. But may I say to the Prime Minister that, if anyone is responsible for a wrong impression having been created as to the powers and duties of this parliament with respect to the relief of unemployment, that person is the right hon. gentleman himself. The position stated by the Prime Minister this evening in relation to the rights, duties and responsibilities of municipalities, provinces and the dominion with respect to unemployment relief, was the position which was taken by myself as leader of the government when we were in office. We took the position, which had been taken by a previous administration, namely, that unemployment relief was in the first instance, the responsibility of the municipality; that it became, next, the responsibility of the provinces; and that it was only when one or more of the provinces found themselves unable to cope with the problem of unemployment that it became a national emergency involving an obligation on the part of the federal government to assist the provinces in meeting the situation. That was the position which we took and maintained.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, know full well that, when they were sitting on this side of the house, in the two sessions immediately preceding the last general election, they consistently opposed that position, and no one more so than the present Prime Minister. He denounced us for taking an attitude of the kind, stating that it was an obligation of the federal administration. My right hon. friend not only adopted that attitude in parliament at the time, but, when an appeal was made to the country in a general election and the government of the day sought consistently to maintain in the country the position which it had taken in this house, he led an attack against the then administration on the ground that unemployment was a national obligation, and that the government in asserting the position it had taken, was seeking to evade its responsibility. May I here remind my right hon. friend how often in the course of that campaign, he said, "Mr. King promises you conferences; I promise to end unemployment."

We have heard a good deal from my right hon. friend this evening about conferences. This comes two years or more after the time at which a conference of the kind to which he refers tonight would have been held by a Liberal administration, had it been in office. No one was more emphatic throughout the last campaign than my right hon. friend in stating that the then existing condition constituted a national emergency. It was he who, over and over again in his speeches in different parts of the country, sought to arouse the people to a belief that the federal government was not doing its duty in not so regarding the situation. As my right hon. friend himself will remember, he made frequent references to the sufferings of the poor, the cries of the needy. Time and again he said that if I could not hear them, he at least could and that he would find means whereby those cries would be heard in parliament. That was the position he took at that time. It was not that the poor we have always with us. That was not what he said when appealing to the electorate. He told them in unmistakable terms that it was the duty of the federal government to see that every man who wished to work should have work. He repeatedly told the people that if he were returned to power, they would have work—work, not doles.

I have no desire at the present time to go back over the past. If the seriousness of the unemployment situation today has at least brought—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon. member who persists in perpetually interrupting please try to keep quiet when we are discussing so serious a matter as this, and when I am doing my best, in the grave circumstances at present existing to be as nearly in agreement with the Prime Minister as I can.

Mr. COTNAM: The right hon. gentleman himself interrupts as much as anyone in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. COTNAM: The right hon. gentleman interrupts himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been unable to hear what the hon. member who has just spoken has said, but, inasmuch as I did not mention any hon. gentleman in particular, he evidently takes the remark as applying to himself. When the Prime Minister comes forward, two years and a quarter after we asked him to take the step which he now says he is about to take, and I seek to agree with him, I hope that hon. members will at least give me a chance to show wherein, so far as it is possible so to do, this side of the house will endeavour to work in cooperation with the administration. This country is confronted at the present time with a situation more serious, so far as unemployment is concerned, than it has had to face in the whole of its history. I realize that the government has a very difficult situation confronting it, and that it is finding it extremely hard to cope with that situation. As I have said, I do not wish to go over the past, beyond making perfectly clear what our position has always been. In no particular have we changed our position.

I wish further to make clear wherein the present condition so far as it has to do with state aid has come to be what it is at the moment, namely, that of the great body of the people looking to the federal government for the solution of its problems. The Prime Minister himself, more than any one else, has encouraged the people in that point of view. He did so until the moment he came into office, and for the first and second session afterwards, and he must not be surprised if, at the present time, some of the people still continue to believe that he meant something at least of what he said. May I remind the house that at the special session of 1930, called to deal with the problem of unemployment, I advocated very strongly the immediate calling of a dominion-provincial conference to discuss the very questions referred to this evening by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I pointed out that there were many social services which were being undertaken by the provinces, some of which, I thought, could, to the advantage of Canada as a whole, be taken over by the federal administration and made a matter of federal concern. I pointed out also that there was need for consideration of the financial arrangements between the provinces and the dominion, and their revision, and I begged hon. gentlemen opposite not to continue without further consideration their grants in aid to the provinces for one purpose or another until this conference had been called.

I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) remembers that when, in the session of 1931, he brought in his measure to renew the period for a grant in aid to technical education, I said to him that I thought it would be wiser for the administration to hold that measure over until after a conference of this kind had taken place, and there was a more definite understanding as to what amounts the provinces were to receive from the federal treasury, and knowledge of the respective positions of the dominion and the provinces with regard to these matters. But my hon. friend the Minister of Justice persisted in putting through his measure, and hon. gentlemen opposite supported him. What has been the result? Although the measure is on the statute books, no contributions have as yet been made under its provisions. The government has violated its own act. As I understand, no contributions have been made to the provinces under this act notwithstanding the fact that the statute itself says that they should be made.

That is only one instance, but I cited many others where grants in aid were being made to the provinces from the federal treasury for different purposes, and advocated that, inasmuch as the situation was serious, as those who could see at all must have known, it was desirable to bring about such a conference forthwith.

I am gratified that the Prime Minister has tonight announced that it is at last the intention of the government to take such a step. May I add that I urged him to take that step, not only at the special session, but at the session of 1931, and again this spring at the session of 1932. It is gratifying to know that the government has come to see the wisdom of the course urged upon them from this side of the house over two years ago. It comes a little late, but it is better late than never, and I, for one, sincerely hope that, when the conference does take place, some of the aims which have been mentioned here tonight may in a large part be realized.

My right hon. friend has spoken of unemployment insurance and has touched upon the question of jurisdiction. Here again there is in more particulars than one no difference between the point of view presented tonight by the Prime Minister and that presented on previous occasions by those who sit on this side. We have always recognized that, if there was to be a national scheme of unemployment insurance, or a national scheme to deal with any phase of social insurance, it would have to be by agreement between the provinces and the dominion, or possibly by an amendment to the British North America Act which could be made as a result of such agreement. Taking that view, we advocated two years and more ago that the government should then and there appoint a commission to deal with the question of unemployment and kindred matters, so that once the necessary data had been secured as a guide to the measure to be drafted, whatever steps might be necessary in the way of an amendment to the British North America Act in order to permit a national scheme of insurance to go into effect could be taken at the earliest possible moment. One can only now say that more than two years have been lost, and that, after the lapse of that time, the government has come to the position which we of the opposition urged upon them from the time they came into office. I am glad, indeed, that the government has come around to our position. We shall I trust be able to work in harmony and cooperation with them. We commend them for their action, but at the same time, we cannot but regret that so long a period has gone by which might have been turned to good account in furthering and advancing such an all-important measure.

One of the reasons, I think, why so much time has elapsed is that my right hon. friend failed to appreciate the real significance of the depression which had come upon the world. In that again, his view at the outset was entirely different from the view entertained by those of us on this side of the house. During the campaign of 1930, I made, over and over again, the statement that unemployment was beginning to be what it was because of world conditions and that Canada was coming more and more under the shadow of that widening expanse of depression which had begun in Europe and the effects of which were beginning to be felt in all parts of the world. My right hon. friend, however, took the opposite view; he told the electors that the depression in Canada was due to a local condition, to the mistakes in policy of the government which had been in office for the eight or eight and a half years previous. Wherever he went he stressed with emphasis that the condition was local and temporary and would pass if he and his supporters came into office. I think they have discovered since they came into office that we had a more accurate view than they of the economic situation, that our vision was a great deal broader, clearer and truer with respect to the condition of the world elsewhere and its bearing upon conditions in Canada. I remember that at the end of the first or second session I said to my right hon. friend that he had better make up his mind as to what line he was going to pursue from then on, that he would have to decide whether he was going to continue to say that condition was a local one, or assert from then on that it was a world condition. I have noticed that ever since that time hon. gentlemen opposite have been sheltering themselves behind the statement that they are unable to cope with present conditions not because they are local, but because they are world-wide in character. If we are now agreed also on that point, so much more to the good. While I admit that there is a world condition, I wish to emphasize again that the condition so far as Canada is concerned has been intensified many times by the mistaken policies of hon. gentlemen opposite since they came into office.

In dealing with the problem of unemployment a distinction should be made between what is required to meet the present, immediate needs of those who lack food, shelter or clothing and what may be necessary in the way of legislation to meet conditions of unemployment, or rather to ensure against unemployment. It must be obvious to all that unemployment is a recurrent condition and one which under any industrial system, I would say, having regard to the causes, is apt to recur in greater or less measure, regardless of what governments or individuals may seek to do. For this reason, it is essential that the state should make some provision which will help to meet the situation with regard to the unemployed.

Before I speak on the insurance phase may I say a word or two with regard to actual existent unemployent and the necessity of providing immediate relief. The condition in Canada today is such that this federal government must assume, along with the municipalities and provinces, the obligation of helping to relieve unemployment. Apart from all else, we know more than we care to say about the financial condition of the municipalities and the provinces. The sooner all get together, municipalities, provinces and the dominion, and find out just how their finances stand and what they can afford, the better it will be for all concerned. But I say that the condition is such that this federal government must assume some share of the responsibility. I disagree with the Prime Minister when he says that the federal government cannot, under the law as it stands, appoint a commission to deal with federal relief. The federal government can do anything that it wishes to do with respect to grants which it may make, with respect to the expenditure of federal money, and I shall cite as my authority the Prime Minister himself who, time and again, has made that assertion. He has, on each occasion when the unemployment question has been discussed, harked back to some decision which was made by the late Lord Haldane and others in, I think it was, the Board of Commerce case, in respect to some fair prices measure, in which reference was made to what constituted a national emergency. I am not going to quarrel with my right hon. friend's assertion as to what may or may not be done under the constitution with respect to matters of emergency; what I say to him is that all he has stated in that connection is entirely beside the mark. When we on this side of the house have advocated the appointment of a nation-wide commission which would have to do with the administration of relief, in so far as that relief was being given through moneys taken from the federal treasury, we have been speaking entirely of a federal responsibility in regard to the expenditure of federal money, its distribution and supervision. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that, with the consent of the provinces, a federal commission could function in cooperation with the provinces in the administration of relief. That is entirely a matter of agreement. If there are provinces which do not wish anything in the way of federal assistance, they ought to be quite free to say so and if they so desire, to do without. But, in a situation such as exists in Canada today, there is not, I submit, a province that, if it were called into conference with the federal government and arrangements were made which it was believed would lead to greater care in the expenditure of public moneys which were necessary for the purpose of relief, would not welcome a chance to share jointly in some scheme which would be of service to all concerned.

So that there will be no mistake as to what our federal powers are, may I quote the words of my right hon. friend as given to this house as recently as October 10, just last month, when he was speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the spech from the throne. My right hon. friend, as reported on page 50 of Hansard, made this statement:

> While we have power to assist by grants of money; while we have power to impose conditions in those grants, as we have done, under our constitution the administration rests with the provincial authorities, and in all the statutes we have passed we have been careful to point out that while the danger and difficulty are national the administration rests with the provinces and the municipalities, and the duty of this dominion is to lend assistance in that direction.

Note these words:

> While we have power to assist by grants of money; while we have power to impose conditions in those grants.

Our conditions might well be the distribution and supervision of expenditure of federal moneys by and in accordance with recommendations of a federal commission. May I in this connection repeat a suggestion that I made when giving to the house the point of view of hon. gentlemen on this side with regard to the manner in which federal relief should be administered? Our position has been that the expenditure of federal moneys on relief should be entrusted to a commission, a non-partisan one preferably to be chosen by a representative conference of parties mostly interested or, even, as I think I stated when speaking on one occasion, a commission which the government itself would appoint, assuming responsibility for its appointees, even if they were all from one political party, but nevertheless a commission which would be charged with the supervision of federal relief and the expenditure of such moneys as came out of the federal treasury. I said that I believed if a step of the kind were taken the mere fact of there being a body of this character charged with supervising relief would go very far in bringing about uniformity in methods of administration throughout Canada, the avoidance of duplication and the effecting of great economies.

I made a concrete suggestion then, and I want to repeat it this evening. I would suggest it to the ministry as a step which even yet should be taken; should be taken this year with regard to federal moneys which are to be expended on unemployment relief for purposes other than the immediate direct relief of necessitous cases. The suggestion is this, that the federal government work in combination with the municipalities and the provinces, undertaking to grant its share of relief, but on the condition that all money which goes from the federal treasury for purposes of relief must go to the unemployed as wages in payment for the work which they will be given to perform; that no part of the federal money shall be paid to contractors or to those furnishing supplies or used for purposes of paying for superintendence of work, for equipment, the buying of tools and the like; that the federal government see to it that moneys voted by this parliament be placed in the hands of a body of trustees, so to speak—call them by whatever name you like—to be paid out in the manner I have indicated.

May I illustrate concretely what I mean? There has just been completed in the city of Ottawa a campaign for the raising of money for unemployment relief. The money raised in this city is to be supplemented by money from the province and also by money from the federal treasury. I believe it would lead to economy in the interests of the municipality, the province and the dominion, if the federal government said: With respect to such money as we grant, it must be used for payment of actual labour performed on relief work of one kind or another which may be undertaken by the municipality and the province. What then would happen? The provinces then, in the event of their doing provincial work, would provide supplies and the necessary superintendence. The municipalities would cooperate in the same way. They already have organization at hand for the purpose of carrying out important municipal work. It would be to their interest to keep down the expenditure or superintendence, cost of construction apart from labour cost, and cost of materials and the like. With federal money going simply to pay for the actual labour that was performed, we would be sure that every dollar that was voted by the federal government would go into the pockets of the needy, the unemployed, who were being given employment, instead of a large part of it going to pay contractors for their part of the job, to pay for the material needed to put up construction camps, buildings and the like and what is to be paid for services or superintendence and the like. A step of that kind is not only feasible but has been worked out elsewhere on this continent with very great success. It helps to bring about cooperation between different parties and interests and, as I have indicated, it serves the ends of economy as well.

That, I would say, should be the method of proceeding with regard to moneys voted from the federal treasury excepting such as must go to supply immediate needs in the matter of food, fuel and shelter and clothing for those who are without any one or more or all of those. There is a distinction between the immediate necessity of assisting the destitute and those who cannot work till they are fed, and the need, almost as immediate, of giving employment to those who are out of employment but who are capable of working. I believe, wherever it is possible to have work done or relief given in the form of actual work, it is altogether desirable and preferable that this should be done. After all, there is nothing that will more demoralize the manhood of our country than for men to become recipients of doles if it is all possible for them to avoid anything of the kind through getting work and being paid for the services which they are rendering. The government should take account of that aspect of the effect of some of its own endeavours to assist those who are in need. So much for the immediate situation.

May I point out, in coming to the question of unemployment insurance, another advantage we might have had today, had the government taken the step of appointing a commission or committee to supervise the expenditure of federal moneys, not at this time or at some time later on, but two or two and a quarter years ago. If a body of that kind had been appointed it would by now have collected a fund of information which would be at the disposal of the government and of parliament at this time. My right hon. friend is probably going to appoint some commission to study this whole question. I should like to know how any commission appointed now or at any subsequent time could possibly acquire information at all comparable to that which would have been acquired by a commission appointed two years ago to deal with the question of unemployment relief, and which by this time would have had full knowledge of conditions as they exist in the different industries and in all parts of this dominion. So I say that, there again, a couple of years have been lost in carrying out a policy which, apparently, the government at the moment is beginning favourably to consider.

As to the question of jurisdiction, I do not think there will be much trouble in overcoming that difficulty, provided the government is prepared to consider a national scheme. During the summer of 1930, the Prime Minister told the people of Canada in no uncertain terms that, so far as old age pensions, which are one form of social insurance, were concerned, they could just as readily be administered by the federal government as by the provinces, and that, if the federal government could contribute fifty per cent, it could just as well contribute 75 or 99 or 100 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt, but I did not say administer just as well. The administration is for the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept what my right hon. friend says. He says he does not wish to claim that the dominion could carry out the administration. After all, what is perhaps of more concern to the taxpayer than the question of administration is the cost of the contribution itself. If the federal government were about to contribute one hundred per cent of what is required to meet the cost of old age pensions and made an agreement with the provinces that it would do so only on the understanding that that one hundred per cent would be administered by the federal government instead of by the different provincial governments, I do not think the provincial governments would very long hesitate in allowing the dominion government all that was necessary in the way of latitude to secure an amendment to the British North America Act for that purpose. So I believe, Mr. Speaker, there should be little difficulty in surmounting the question of jurisdiction. I believe the day is rapidly coming when, so far as practically all forms of social insurance are concerned, it will be recognized as in the interests of the country in every way that whatever scheme there may be should be national in its scope. A national social insurance scheme, which would take care of matters of this kind on a nation-wide scale, would be much more in the interests of the country as a whole than a series of measures carried out in different ways by each of the nine provinces, to all of which the federal government would be contributing either in whole or in part. That, I believe, covers most of the points which have been referred to by my right hon. friend tonight.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in my remarks this evening I have shown at least a desire not to be combative and not to embarrass the administration. But I do feel that I have a right to say that the steps which are now being suggested by the government are steps which we on this side advocated two years and more ago, and have consistently ever since urged upon the administration. That much I think I am entitled to claim for this side. But having said that, may I say to my right hon. friend that, in carrying out the project which he has proposed, so far as unemployment relief and unemployment insurance are concerned, we on this side of the house will endeavour to cooperate with him to the utmost of our ability.

I hope that when he comes to speak, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), will indicate that the government is going to place in the hands of some body of trustees, or some committee, or some commission, call it by whatever name you please, some body of independent minded men who will give their whole time and thought to this problem, the distribution and supervision of such federal moneys as may be voted by this parliament for the purpose of unemployment relief. The Minister of Labour himself must be willing to admit that the task of dealing with unemployment relief is one which is really not of a departmental nature. It has come to be a task national in its proportions and quite beyond departmental routine. The Department of Labour was established to carry on certain services, all of which have been set forth in acts of parliament. It was never contemplated that any department of the government would deal, year in and year out, with a condition in the nature of a national emergency. It is not fair to the minister, or to his staff, or to the government, or to the country, that the minister and his departmental staff should continue to seek to cope with something which they must confess they have up to the present time been unable to deal with successfully. Having been unable successfully to meet the situation, I hope now that we are facing a winter which promises to present a problem even more difficult of solution than those of the past, the government will call to its assistance some body of experts which may be able to help it in this all-important matter of the distribution and supervision of unemployment relief from federal funds.

While I am dealing with unemployment relief, may I say to my right hon. friend and the house that there is one other question closely allied to it which I believe is a matter of equally grave concern, if not of even graver concern, to this country, and that is the condition of agriculture in Canada at the present time. Here again I do not wish to embarrass the Prime Minister or the administration. We realize that in dealing with the question of agricultural conditions in Canada the government is facing probably the largest and the most serious industrial problem which it or any other government in Canada has been called upon to face. I need not go into the reasons which make me feel that there are aspects of the situation which are too serious even to mention in this house at this stage of the debate, but what I would say to my right hon. friend is this, that while we have been here now for nearly two months and are about to adjourn possibly at the end of the present week, up to the present time there has been no opportunity given to the house to discuss this all-important question. Apart from that, the country has been looking forward to some declaration of policy on the part of the administration with respect to agricultural conditions. We have heard from the Prime Minister what was done last year and the year before; we have heard from him about the special moneys that were voted for the relief of western agriculture; we have heard since about what has been done in other directions; but what the country wants to know at the present time is what is going to be done this winter? What is going to be done between now and the time parliament reassembles? That is the question which I hope my right hon. friend will answer. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that at this time I am speaking on a motion to go into committee of ways and means, and that unless some amendment which is in order is moved I shall not have another opportunity to speak until that motion is disposed of. It has been my intention if necessary to move an amendment on going into committee of ways and means which would express the views of hon. gentlemen on this side as to what they believe as respects policy the country would like to know from the ministry, and the position which we on this side would be obliged to take should the ministry not find it possible to make some declaration. I am not going to move this amendment at the present time, but I am going to read what I have had in mind to the house, and shall say to my right hon. friend that, if he will make a statement to the effect that he himself will announce what the government's policy is and will be through this winter with respect to agricultural relief, and will give opportunity to hon. members on this side of the house to consider that policy, to discuss it so that the government may have the benefit of views from all sides, then this amendment will not be moved. Unless my right hon. friend is prepared to give some such undertaking, I feel it will be our duty at an appropriate time to make a motion on going into supply or committee of ways and means—

An hon. MEMBER: No bargaining.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if hon. gentlemen opposite would rather have me secure what I am seeking by an amendment to avoid placing the government in a position in which it would be obliged to be faced by an amendment which it would regard as one of want of confidence, I am quite prepared to meet their wishes in that regard. What I wish to make clear at the moment is this: I have no desire to have the government construe a wish on our part to secure a declaration of policy as any desire to promote a motion in the nature of one of want of confidence. But, if the government has no policy with respect to farm relief and agricultural distress, and is not prepared to make a statement to the house, then we cannot let this stage of the session go by without registering our position in reference thereto.

The amendment which, in that event, I would move at a subsequent stage, would be as follows:

Whereas parliament has been in session since October 6, of the present year, and is shortly to adjourn until January 30, 1933;

And whereas, since parliament assembled the government has not made any statement of policy with respect to the relief of existing agricultural conditions;

And whereas, the position of agriculture in Canada has become increasingly deplorable and, unless relieved, will bring about a condition of distress hitherto unparalleled;

This house is of the opinion that the government should immediately announce what policy, if any, it has with respect to the relief of agricultural distress, and permit full consideration of the same before parliament adjourns over the months of December and January.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, if that motion should happen to come into your hands, that it does not relate to the past; it does not relate to any discussions which have taken place; it relates entirely to the present and to the future, to what is to be done between now and the time parliament reassembles on January 30 next. As such I hope that, if it should be necessary to move it, the amendment will be found in order. But I hope, even more, that my right hon. friend will find it possible to accord to the house, with respect to a consideration of farm relief, the relief of agricultural distress, the same latitude which he now says will be accorded with respect to the discussion of unemployment relief, and that he will go one step farther and give to the house in that discussion a clear and definite statement as to the government's policy in this all-important matter.

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the house is desirous of hearing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), but I crave its indulgence for a few minutes, in view of the statement just made by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) with reference to those of us who sat to the left of the Speaker in 1930 and opposed what he alleges was his then policy for unemployment relief. I submit that in the statement made to the house this evening not only has the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to misrepresent the policy, as enunciated tonight by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), but he also misrepresents the position which those of us who sat to the left of the Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. To accuse another hon. member of misrepresentation is not parliamentary.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, I retract unreservedly the word "misrepresent." I will say that the words used by the right hon. gentleman would lead this house and the country to believe that the right hon. gentleman took in 1930 a certain position which he now takes. That I say is not the fact.

The right hon. gentleman this evening said that in 1930 he enunciated the principle that unemployment relief was primarily a municipal responsibility, then a provincial responsibility, and thirdly, under certain conditions, a federal responsibility. He also said that the right hon. Prime Minister tonight recognized that doctrine which he had propounded in 1930. So far I agree with the doctrine as stated by him. But tonight, sir, he goes a step further, and endeavours to have this house conclude that the Prime Minister said tonight that only when the provinces were unable to cope with the situation is there responsibility upon the dominion government. That, sir, is the position which he took in 1930. That is not the position which was taken by those of us who sat to your left at that time. At that time, Mr. Speaker, it was made abundantly clear by the then leader of the opposition that we then had in Canada a national condition. The Conservative members of the house then recognized, as we now recognize, that we had a national condition, and recognizing that fact, the Prime Minister immediately called a special session of parliament and voted large sums of money to assist the provinces and the municipalities in administering unemployment relief. If, sir, any proof were required of the position taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition in 1930 other than what I have already stated, surely one need only read his speech in this house, in which he positively and absolutely refused to contribute any sum whatever to any Tory province.

The right hon. gentleman tonight, with pious words and with great lamentation, regrets that this government has allowed two years to go by since it has been in power without bringing in an unemployment insurance measure. May I point out that the right hon. gentleman allowed nine years to go by while he was in power, although unemployment insurance was a plank in the Liberal platform of 1919. So far as I am concerned, sir, and those excellent labouring people whom I represent in this house, I do not propose to allow our position in 1930 or today to be understood from words used by the right hon. leader of the opposition to be other than what it is. So far as we are concerned, we recognized in 1930 and we recognize today that the conditions with which we were confronted were largely world conditions. But we also realized, as I stated during the election in 1930, and as I state here again tonight, that had it not been for the Liberal policies in this country for nine years preceding 1930, our local condition, to which the right hon. gentleman now refers, would be much better than it is today.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will avoid tonight, and at any future time if possible, getting into any discussion with the economists in this chamber. I do not think I could add anything to their knowledge, nor do I think the advancement of any of my views would be understood by them. Therefore in the observations I have to make I shall endeavour to confine myself to those matters of administration that for the moment are under my guidance in the Department of Labour.

I assume that I do not need to tell this house that so far as the federal end is concerned, if I may so describe it, of the relief afforded those in need in Canada, that portion has been administered through the Department of Labour, with such additional staff as has been found necessary in order that the efforts of those primarily responsible may be rendered more effective. I offer my thanks to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), for his kindly and magnanimous suggestion with respect to the setting up of a federal commission to follow the course of the moneys which the dominion government may subscribe to the provinces and through them to the municipalities, but I hazard the suggestion that if the right hon. gentleman will give a little more thought to the plan it will become more and more apparent that by the adoption of such a course the overlapping to which he has made reference will be accentuated rather than reduced. I have a good deal of faith in the municipal councils, the provincial administrations and the voluntary charitable organizations of this dominion. The men who comprise those bodies are elected to the positions they hold; they are just as good Canadians, probably, as the right hon. leader of the opposition and myself. I do not say this in any critical sense, but they understand their responsibilities very clearly. This dominion is so wide and offers so many complexities with respect to its domestic management, if I may so term it, that I am convinced we cannot do better than continue as we have carried on in the past and allow the intimate administration of the relief measures to be carried out under the supervision of those upon whom the primary responsibility falls, those who have to answer to their immediate communities for the success or failure of their efforts. There is, however, a measure of protection, perhaps of control and of the giving of sound advice exercised by the Department of Labour, by reason of the information at hand in the department which probably is not available to the municipalities and the provinces. That advice is being given constantly to those administering relief throughout the Dominion of Canada.

At this juncture, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make this observation: I always listen with a great deal of attention and interest to the speeches of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Someone says it is a waste of time and thought, but I do not so consider it. A review of the pages of Hansard, however, from the first year the hon. gentleman graced this chamber, will show that in every pronouncement he has made, the phraseology is nearly always the same, he voices almost the same fears, the same suspicions, the same lack of confidence in any other human being in the world but himself, and always with patient regularity he sets up something that never resolves itself into fact. In my view that sort of declamation does not advance his position one iota. Again, there is the persistent reading of such documents as hon. members heard this evening. I am almost convinced that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had taken the opportunity to go from coast to coast investigating camp conditions, he would have fought shy of ninety-five per cent or even ninety-nine per cent of the camps in order to pick out one where perhaps the administration was not what it should be, so that he might condemn the whole effort of every other Canadian interested in this matter, During the course of my efforts, such as they have been, in directing the expenditure of federal moneys and endeavouring to assist the provinces and municipalities in the careful expenditure of their moneys, I have made it my business on many occasions to visit these very camps, though I have not had very much time to spare. I did not see any evidence of the squalor or the disorganized effort to which reference has been made. On the contrary, I saw many hundreds of single men in those camps, happy indeed during this time of stress, which I hope will not be prolonged, to have an opportunity of working out the relief given them by the state, the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, which really means the relief granted to them by levying tribute upon their fellow Canadians who are engaged in some kind of productive work.

It is quite true that I should like to see, as every member in this chamber would like to see, men in all walks of life guaranteed happy, productive employment. That never has been the case if I read history correctly, and I doubt if it ever will come to pass; there is always a percentage that cannot realize that sort of thing. But I do say this, that under the arrangements now made and in operation throughout the provinces of Canada, there is no reason today why any person in the dominion should go without food, without clothing, without fuel and without shelter, because the municipalities are bearing their share of the burden and bearing it manfully. The province is assuming its proper place, and so far as this dominion is concerned, while I am just as sure as I am standing here that there will be no such demand made upon it, yet if it became necessary in the last analysis, every available dollar would be directed towards seeing that the distress was relieved.

Now let us see what has been done since the first relief measures were introduced and passed by this house—and I will ask the house to pardon me if I stay fairly closely to the notes I have here, because there are a great many figures in this. The Unemployment Relief Act of 1930, which came into effect in September of that year, covered expenditures for the carrying-out of public works and the giving to direct relief to relieve unemployment until August, 1931. Under the provisions of the 1930 act, the Dominion government contributed $14,396,956.79 to public works, and to direct relief, $3,556,928.47. The total cost of administration was $43,061.97. The total expenditures under the 1930 act by the Dominion government were $17,996,947.23. This expenditure resulted in public and other works being carried out to the exent of approximately $69,000,000, including the contributions of provinces and municipalities. The direct relief expenditures by the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities totalled about $11,000,000. The carrying out of the work under the provisions of the 1930 act afforded work to 337,633 individuals for varying periods, the amount of work thus afforded being 7,481,449 man-days. In August of the following year, 1931, the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 became effective, and contributions were made for the relief of unemployment under this act until the 1st day of March, 1932, and under the continuance act of 1932 operations under the 1931 act were continued until the first of May, 1932. Under the 1931 act the Dominion government agreed to contribute the sum of $35,739,312.19 towards the carrying on of works by the provinces, municipalities and the federal departments for the relief of unemployment, the total cost of such works being approximately $81,000,000. Some of this work was not finished at the expiration of the agreements on May 1, 1932. Extensions of time were arranged to different dates, extending to the fall of 1932, the gross cost of the works thus extended being approximately $14,778,000. For direct relief, the expenditures of the Dominion government, under the 1931 act, to date, amount to $11,536,789.73, which includes $5,250,000 to the Saskatchewan relief commission. Under the 1931 act the expenditures for public works gave employment to 579,024 individuals to the end of September, 1932, the total wages paid being $38,802,101.63, and a total of 13,152,384 man-days work being afforded.

After a survey of employment conditions in the shops of the Canadian National Railways, it was decided to maintain operations so as to permit of intermittent employment being given to a large number of employees. In the month of September, 1931 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was compelled, as you all know, to shut down its shops and the former workers of these shops were without employment, concerning whom applications were made to the government for assistance. The government arranged, as has been already stated in this house, with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to open its shops on November 17, 1931, and to keep them open until December 31, of the same year, the government paying the wages of the workers employed in the shops, the railway company, however, to reimburse the government for expenditures so made. The total number of railway shop employees thus given employment was 8,455, the wages involved being $1,447,222. The cost of administration under the 1931 legislation was $84,487.57.

In the spring of this year, 1932, it became apparent to the municipalities throughout the dominion, and to the provinces, that the projection of works by the municipalities and by the provinces themselves was rapidly becoming so great a burden that the municipalities and probably the provinces would soon be impoverished and unable to carry that burden further. Intimation of this condition was made to the government by various communications, and following the custom that had prevailed from the beginning of the tenure of office of this administration, no time was lost in inviting the premiers of the various provinces to come to Ottawa in order that they might sit in conference with this government to see what steps could be taken, or what other course could be adopted so that people should not suffer for lack of the necessities of life in this country, and at the same time to try to inaugurate a plan that was within the financial competence of those concerned. As a result of that invitation, on the 9th of April last, I believe it was, that conference convened in this city. All the provinces of Canada were represented, and a general and prolonged discussion took place with respect to all the various matters and the complexities of the position as it faced those interested. It was the unanimous view of the representatives of all the provinces that they could no longer finance works and undertakings on the same scale that had obtained in the year prior to that date. These representations were heard by this government, and further representation was made by the provincial premiers, headed, I think I am not unfair in saying, by the premier of the province of Quebec, for whom I have the utmost and profoundest respect. He made it very clear, and he was supported in his contention by the other provinces, that he wished to promote the scheme of direct relief. Obviously the expenses to those concerned would be materially reduced. Just as soon as the scheme of direct relief could be perfected, it was put into motion, save for the completion of works which had been commenced, the stoppage of which would have resulted in a total or partial loss of the benefit of the work done. Appropriate action was taken by the Dominion government to seek the advice of the provinces as to what works should be completed, and agreements were made and understandings arrived at in this connection. Many of these works have not yet been completed; others have been.

The relief act of 1932 received assent on May 13, 1932. Under this act agreements have been completed with all the provinces except Prince Edward Island providing for a dominion non-recoverable expenditure of one-third of an amount not to exceed $600 per family for the purpose of providing a measure of self-sustaining relief to families who would otherwise be in receipt of direct relief. This scheme was to provide for the placing of such families upon the land, the remaining two-thirds of the expenditure to be contributed by the province and municipality concerned. Agreements have been completed with respect to this project with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, and provide for a total dominion expenditure of $1,385,675. It may be said by some that that is a huge sum of money to be devoted to the endeavour to place some of our citizens upon the land where they can become self-supporting, but I do not think it is. This is not a colonization scheme, state-aided; it is not offered as a solution for unemployment; it is a measure which I believe to be constructive whereby selected families with agricultural background are placed upon the land where they can sustain themselves and get into some productive vocation. These families would have received at least the amount of our subscription to this scheme under direct relief.

Let me point out to the house something which I think is often overlooked. During the period from 1919 to March 31, 1932, this Dominion spent in its immigration department the sum of $36,718,454.97. That expenditure had nothing to do with the soldier settlement scheme, the three thousand family scheme or the New Brunswick five hundred scheme; that is simply the amount spent by this dominion in order to induce, invite and encourage anybody from anywhere to come to this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say: Oh, well, we are not all to blame because others on this side of the house, when the positions were reversed, advocated the same thing. I have searched the records and I find that when hon. members on this side were in opposition they advocated the encouraging of people to come and settle upon our lands to consolidate those lands which were served by the railways of Canada. So far as I have been able to learn they never advanced the idea that the people who were to be encouraged to come here should be other than those who were ready, willing and able to take up farm settlement along the lines of our then projected transportation system. Anyone who cares to survey the immigration into this country during the period I have mentioned will find that there was no hope of any considerable percentage of those immigrants ever taking up land and being out of competition with the industrial workers in our cities. That fact is borne out by what has happened. Go through our industrial centres, go through our lumber camps and our mines and you will see there the men who were encouraged to come to this country by the booking agents in Europe, by the steamship lines and by the iniquitous system of permits which was in vogue for a few years, displacing Canadian labour—they are not on our farms at all.

One of the first duties which this administration had to face when it came into office was to see that that condition of affairs no longer should prevail, and, as hon. members of this house now know, prompt action was taken to revise the regulations with respect to immigration into Canada. In passing let me say that very large numbers of the immigrants to whom I have referred are good workmen. The first criticism I have to make is that they are not on our lands, they are in our industrial centres; my next criticism is that their coming here was not so regulated that we could at least exclude the major portion of those who are today the instrument contributing largely to the sentiment growing up in Canada condemning their compatriots who are trying to make good.

I should like to pursue this matter a little further. We had to take measures to correct this situation. I find by reference to the figures that in the fiscal years ending March 31, we encouraged the following numbers of immigrants to come into this country:

| Fiscal Year | Number of Immigrants |
|---|---|
| 1927 | 143,991 |
| 1928 | 151,597 |
| 1929 | 167,722 |
| 1930 | 163,288 |
| 1931 | 88,223 |

Perhaps that last figure will require an explanation. When, in August, 1930, I came first into contact, as the responsible minister, with the Immigration department, having this situation under review and desiring if I could, without being unjust and unfair to those who had perhaps started to come to Canada and had broken connections with the old land or the land of their birth, I inquired as to how many would probably still be on their way or be covered by permits, and it was most difficult even to make an estimate of how many there were. For some reason or another the early spring of 1930 was a prolific season for permits and a great number of people whose permits had not expired because they were for five months, came forward after this government came into power. It would be obviously unjust were this government to say: You must not and shall not enter Canada. They had been granted the right to do so, and I think we did only what was fair and just in permitting them to come. But in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1932, immigration to Canada dropped to 25,752. Many of those are the wives and children under eighteen years of age of men who had come forward preceding their families, and in each case I gave very strict instructions that the settlement arrangements must be of such a kind and character that the man in this country would be able to receive and care for his dependents.

Having in mind what I have just said, and the amount of money that has been spent in those few years in the Immigration department, I think hon. members will all agree with me that the principle involved in the allocation of $1,385,675 for the purpose of carrying on from a federal standpoint what I believe has not before been attempted with the exception of the soldier settlement, is a proper one, namely, that if any Canadian money is to be spent for these purposes it should be devoted to colonization at home until we have by a proper corrective process remedied to some extent the urban and rural complexion of our population, which complexion is today, as I say, most disproportionate. Only forty-five or fifty years ago our urban population was only 18 per cent; today it is almost 54 per cent of our total population. The reason is obvious.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reason is obvious—the tariff policy.

Mr. GORDON: My right hon. friend says the tariff. The tariff has been blamed for so many things and the resort to the tariff in times of stress by hon. gentlemen opposite is so frequent that I could almost put the word to music.

There were, of course, contributing causes. Industry attracted the young men and some young women from the rural to the urban districts. They were attracted undoubtedly by high wages and other considerations regarded as inducements to take up urban life. At any rate, this money has been allocated for the purpose to which I have made reference.

Prior to this step being taken I had an interview in November, 1930, after some correspondence, with the presidents of the two railway companies, Mr. Beatty and Sir Henry Thornton. In answer to a joint letter directed to me by the presidents of the two railway companies, in which they rather urged a continuance of the railways agreement in a modified and restrictive form, I directed this letter to each of them. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I read it. This one is dated October 30, 1931, and is addressed to Mr. Beatty; a similar letter was sent to Sir Henry Thornton:

I have received the joint communication of October 1st from Sir Henry Thornton and yourself, giving a review of the colonization activities of the two railways for the past five years and submitting your views with respect to an immigration and colonization program for 1931. I thank you for this letter and have to state that illness which has confined me to my room for several days has prevented an earlier acknowledgment.

We have a common purpose I trust when considering a colonization policy for this country, namely, to do that which is best for Canada both socially and industrially, giving these terms their widest construction, always bearing in mind that this is a British country with two major peoples, English and French speaking. We may differ in points regarding such policy but there is no ground for difference regarding the desired objective. I wish to state further that the conduct of immigration and colonization as a national business function must take proper cognizance of the importance of our Canadian transportation systems, particularly in view of their bearing on our whole financial and economic structure. I will not dwell on the soundness of the railways' policy as stated in your letter, namely that of projecting railways in advance of settlement. You have made it abundantly clear, both in previous public utterances and in your letter of the 1st instant, that actual and sound land settlement from a purely business point of view (as well as from the national standpoint) results in the type of business that is best for the railways, namely, the production of freight traffic, which I understand constitutes approximately 70 per cent of the total earnings of the railways. Colonization of this character conforms to my own view.

We have just concluded an emergency session of parliament, summoned to cope with a national unemployment problem. When parliament met in September it was reported on the basis of the most accurate survey and information available that 117,000 people in Canada were unemployed and that this number would be increased to 200,000 by the end of the calendar year. As Minister of Immigration and Colonization, it was my duty to analyse the situation with respect to the bearing that immigration had on the problem in hand. Analysis showed that of the total immigration of 221,561 people admitted to Canada in the sixteen months ending with July 31st of this year no less than 99,367 were males over eighteen years of age, and of this latter number 25,305 had entered in the first four months of the present fiscal year. It is clear, therefore, beyond peradventure that either substantial numbers of immigrants who have recently arrived in Canada are in the ranks of the unemployed, or conversely, they have displaced Canadians who are now unemployed.

Confronted with this situation I could choose one of two positions—blame the immigration policy of the previous administration, including the Continental Railways agreement under which very substantial numbers of immigrants were brought to Canada in recent months; or address myself (in so far as it is my duty as Minister of Immigration and Colonization so to do) seriously to the task of assimilation and absorption of these people. I have chosen the latter course, and it is my view that Canada is now faced with a colonization and assimilation problem of major importance within her own boundaries, and she will have little time to devote in the immediate future to the question of active solicitation looking to the entry of any substantial number of people now resident in other countries. Unqualified expressions from responsible representatives in several of the provinces amply support this opinion.

It is my view that, confronted as we are with this assimilation and colonization problem within Canada, there is ample scope for constructive colonization work on the part of the railways, provinces, and the Dominion Department of Immigration and Colonization—work of a character that while primarily putting people into productive enterprise, will at the same time result in the type of colonization and settlement which your letter of October 1st so clearly points out as such sound business from the point of view of the railways. I may say that at the present time I am giving careful study to a submission from one of the western provinces which outlines a comprehensive colonization plan for settlement on the land of Canadian residents. This particular plan appeals to me as eminently constructive, and in fact for some years past I have held the view that there was a sound field within our own borders where the activities of all concerned in this great problem could in a large measure be usefully employed.

In this letter I am not attempting to reply in detail to the various points raised in your letter of October 1st. In view of the general position I have outlined I do not see that any good purpose is to be served at this juncture by attempting to fix responsibility for mistakes that have occurred, and we must all try to learn aright and apply with courage the lessons pictured by the mistakes of the past without dwelling unduly on the question as to whether these mistakes were made by the government, the railways, or both. Your letter, from your point of view, points out that the immigration and colonization activities of the railways have been conducted in a manner resulting only in actual placement and land settlement. I have carefully noted your reference to the issue of "government permits" by the previous administration. I may state that as long as I am Minister of Immigration and Colonization I will take full responsibility for the number of such "permits" it will be my duty to issue. Making due allowance for the "permits" issued in 1929, and up to July 31st of the current year, together with the commitments of my predecessors, I hope that the railways will assume responsibility with respect to immigrants they have brought in or may bring in to Canada.

With regard to your recommendations, I may say that as far as assisted immigration from the British Isles is concerned we are in agreement that assistance shall continue for juvenile immigrants. For agricultural families I think passage assistance should be limited to British families coming under the New Brunswick Scheme, or any similar scheme for families, as well as the wives and children under eighteen years, of men already settled on the land.

The assistance for juvenile immigrants and the New Brunswick Scheme have since been discontinued. The letter continues:

With respect to female domestics, my view is that having regard to existing conditions, passage assistance should be discontinued for the coming year.

I suggest that immigration from the Continent should be limited for the time being to those classes admissible under P.C. 183 as amended on the 14th of August last. Existing conditions indicate that we will have next year an ample supply of farm labour and I suggest no encouragement can be offered to a movement even of agricultural families who are without sufficient funds to begin farming on their own account. I am of the opinion that our inquiries into family settlement, both British and continental, will show that many of the families who came in last year and this year have drifted away from the farms either through lack of capital or because of insufficient wages. Until this condition clears up I am convinced that our immigration, particularly from the continent of Europe, must, in the interests of Canada as well as of the immigrants themselves, be limited to those agricultural families who have sufficient capital to establish and maintain themselves on the land.

In conclusion, it is very gratifying to find that you are of the same opinion as myself with reference to directing our joint efforts toward promoting British immigration in preference to any other.

As suggested by you, I should like very much to have a full discussion of the situation with Sir Henry Thornton and yourself here in Ottawa at a date mutually convenient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By whom is that letter signed?

Mr. GORDON: I thought it was a very good letter, so I signed it myself.

At 11.05 the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, November 23, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COOTE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of an inaccurate report appearing in the Ottawa Citizen this morning under the heading "Glimpses of Parliament." The portion to which I refer is as follows:

> The division saw the United Kingdom treaty ratified 84 to 42, with all the Conservatives voting for it and all the Liberals against it. The third group split up,—Kennedy, Speakman, Luchkovich, Campbell, Lucas and Carmichael voting with the government, and Bourassa, Neill, Woodsworth and Miss Macphail against it. The rest didn't vote at all.

I was present in the house yesterday when all the votes were taken, and I announced the fact that I was paired with the hon. member for East Calgary. That statement is recorded in Hansard, I think, in connection with every vote. If it is accurate to say that all the Conservatives voted for the agreement and all the Liberals voted against it when we know that many of them were paired following the usual custom, it is not accurate to suggest that those in this corner who were paired did not vote. I should like to say also that so far as I am aware all the members in this corner of the house who were not recorded as voting were paired, and those pairs were recorded in Hansard. I simply suggest to the Ottawa Citizen that this apparent inaccuracy in all fairness might be corrected.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Just a further word with regard to pairs, Mr. Speaker. I think there should be an understanding—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking on a question of privilege? He knows what is meant by a question of privilege.

Mr. GOTT: On a question of privilege I should like to say that I was in the house for every vote yesterday, but there is a possibility that I was not recorded as having voted because I did not announce my pair.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CENTRE BLOCK EMPLOYEES

Mr. YOUNG:

1. How many employees are engaged in the centre block when parliament is not in session, and what is the total cost per annum to the government?
2. How many additional employees are engaged during the time parliament is in session, and what is the cost to the government per day of such additional employees?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

House of Commons—

1. As at September 30, 1932: permanent, 88—annual salary $237,618; temporary, 120—annual salary, $139,787.70.
2. As at October 31, 1932: sessional, 292—salary rate per day, $956.37.

Department of Public Works—

1. (a) 17; (b) $25,244.88 (after ten per cent deduction made).
2. (a) 21; (b) $84.33 (after ten per cent deduction made).

Note.—The information applied for in so far as it applies to the Senate, should be asked in the Senate.

*QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION—EMPLOYEES

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Was Mr. Barthelmy Pelletier in the employ of the Quebec Harbour Commission in the month of April, 1931?
2. If so, what were his office hours?
3. Did he devote his full time to the duties devolving upon him as an employee of the commission during the month of April, 1931?

Mr. BENNETT: This question, together with questions 5, 6 and 7, is a question that it is not within the ability of the government to answer. Clearly not one of these questions could be regarded under any circumstances as a question which the government would answer if it had the ability to do so, notably question No. 6. I remember this matter being discussed in the house some years ago. The government finds itself in rather a difficult position; this is an independent corporation created by statute, and it is impossible to ask whether or not a man was absent from his work for an hour or so, and who recommended that he be allowed to absent himself. Those are not questions which can be answered by this government. The affairs of the Quebec Harbour Commission, of course, are under survey; the accounts are audited and a report is provided. The matter might be taken up, I conceive, in the public accounts committee, where payments to that corporation are examined. I think an agreement was made by the late Minister of Finance that the accounts of the harbour commissioners could be considered in the public accounts committee. Obviously these questions cannot be answered by the government, and I do not think some of them could be answered by the commission itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The information sought by questions 4, 5, 6 and 7 not being available to the government, the questions will be dropped.

Questions dropped.

NICOL, LAZURE AND COUTURE

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Upon whose recommendation did the Department of National Revenue retain the services of Messrs. Nicol, Lazure and Couture, solicitors of Sherbrooke?
2. How long have they been in the employ of the Department of National Revenue?
3. In connection with what cases were their services utilized?
4. What sum was paid to the above named solicitors?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1. When legal services are required the Department of Justice nominates the legal agents to be employed.
2. Application is made to the Department of Justice in each case.
3. R. and G. Manufacturing Company (in liquidation), Rock Island, Que.
4. $1,373.50.

BEADLE, SASK.—POSTMASTER

Mr. CARMICHAEL:

1. What is the name of the present postmaster at Beadle, Saskatchewan?
2. On what date was he appointed?
3. Who recommended him for the appointment?
4. Did other persons apply for the said position?
5. Was the Canadian Legion British Empire Service League asked to recommend a great war veteran for this position?
6. If so, did they recommend one as requested?
7. Was he appointed? If not, why?
8. Did the department receive applications from veterans of the great war? If so, on what dates and what are their names?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. John A. Flower, OAS.
2. November 15, 1932.
3. R. L. Hanbidge, M.L.A.
4. Yes.

5 and 6. The legion was not asked to make a recommendation but was notified of the vacancy in the usual way. The application of Mr. J. Bradley, OAS, was supported by the legion.

7. No, Mr. Flower was the returned soldier selected.

8. Yes. J. Bradley, 5th October, 1932; John A. Flower, 14th October, 1932.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—YEARLY COST

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Since the inception of the League of Nations, what has been the yearly cost of Canada's membership in that body?
2. During the same period, what are the several items that make up the annual cost of said membership?

Mr. BENNETT:

1 and 2.

| | Contributions towards support of league | Expenses of office Canadian advisory officer | Cost of delegations | Cost of publications | Total cost |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1919-20..... | $ 64,043 15 | — | — | — | $ 64,043 15 |

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POST OFFICES—QUEBEC

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was the location of certain post offices in the province of Quebec changed since the month of August, 1930?
2. If so, what are the post offices and in what county is each one located?
3. What is the distance between the location of each new post office and that of the former post office?
4. Did the postmasters lose their position as a result of the change in post office location ordered by the Post Office Department?
5. If so, what are their names and address?
6. Was each postmaster instructed to change the location of his post office before the change was made?

IMPORTS OF FARM IMPLEMENTS

Mr. GOTT:

1. What were the total imports of farm implements into Canada each year, calendar or fiscal, 1917 to 1931 inclusive?
2. What changes of tariff were made in the foregoing years on imports of farm implements?
3. When were such changes made?

DOMINION PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Referring to the statement made last night by the Prime Minister with regard to a prospective Dominion-provincial conference, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman, if he is able to give us the information, whether or not it is proposed to include in the agenda and have considered at the conference, the question of jurisdiction with regard to the operation of and rates charged by motor vehicles and motor buses which work in competition with the railways.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): That matter has been under consideration, but no conclusion has been arrived at.

ANGUS SHOPS, MONTREAL

ADVANCES BY GOVERNMENT TO CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), and the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier), submitted questions which had to do with the opening of the Angus shops in Montreal. The position is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sought the assistance of this government, since otherwise their shops not only at Angus but throughout the whole system probably would not have been opened until some time in the new year. The government agreed to assist, but the terms and conditions under which that assistance will be given have not been completed as yet. As speedily as they are completed they will be embodied in an order in council which will be brought down in the house immediately.

There was one other question submitted by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, as to whether any advances or loans have been made to any other industry or industries. The answer is that there have been none other than those which already have been disclosed to the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON GOING INTO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Prime Minister allow me to anticipate a possible question which may arise later this week, in the event of our desiring to go into committee of supply. As my right hon. friend knows, unless some departments already have been in committee of supply it would not be possible to take up on Thursday and Friday without the unanimous consent of the house any of the items which may be in the supplementary estimates. We on this side have no desire to delay matters, but inasmuch as we have not been in committee of supply at all, if the government wish to proceed with supplementary estimates on Thursday or Friday we would like it understood that the order of procedure on either of those days would be the same as on Monday or Tuesday.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that if we got into committee of ways and means today we would be able to take an appropriate moment formally to move the house into committee of supply so as to comply with the provisions of the rule, and in order that the house might be in committee of supply on Thursday and Friday for the purpose of considering the items included in the supplementary estimates. I tried to explain to the house that the only reason we are dealing with the supplementary estimates now is that since the house is in session a warrant could not be issued for the payment to the returned soldier pensioners of the relief provided for them. It has not been the custom of any administration to vote the entire sum; as the right hon. gentleman knows, the matter usually has been disposed of by means of governor general's warrants. Technically, however, the house is in session, so a governor general's warrant cannot issue to meet the requirements. I offer that reason as an apology for asking the house to consider supply at this time; for that reason we are asking that these items be considered. Whatever suits the convenience of the house and of hon. gentlemen opposite certainly we will endeavour to do in connection with supply. I was going to suggest, if it is the desire of the house, to expedite the business, that with unanimous consent I should be willing that the house should meet at eleven o'clock in the morning. That, however, is entirely as the house may think.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I object to sitting after eleven o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that we should sit after eleven o'clock; I said I should be willing that the house should meet at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not object to that. I could not hear—I hear so little of what goes on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are lucky.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a possibility that we may not advance far enough today to have the house consider a motion to go into supply. Except it were understood that we were not to deprive ourselves of the right of discussing any question we might wish to take up on the motion to go into supply, I do not see that any useful purpose would be served by a formal motion. I hope the Prime Minister will not expect us to give consent to any arrangement which will deprive us of the right of taking up any matter we may wish to discuss on going into supply. I think that ought to be understood.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is perfectly clear that in going into supply the right of this chamber to make known its grievances is so well understood that not even this government will endeavour to limit it in any way.

Mr. BOURASSA: Don't put that on the shoulders of your colleagues.

Mr. BENNETT: If, therefore, it suits the convenience of the house and we do not reach supply today, we will make a formal motion to go into supply, as though we had not been in supply.

FRUIT GROWING INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), under the guise of a question, made a statement as follows, that:

> About one-third of a cargo of canned fruit loaded at St. Catharines on a Norwegian tramp was shipped from Medina, New York, and labelled with Canadian Canners labels, to be conveyed by that steamer to the British market.

In the first place, I wish to say that a statement of that kind, unchallenged and unrefuted, would certainly do serious damage to Canadian trade. I therefore made immediate and very careful inquiries and am able to inform the house that there is not a word of truth in the statement. The goods so canned were the product of Canadian farms, fruit and vegetables, and canned in the factories of Canadian canneries under the inspection and supervision of the inspectors of the Department of Agriculture in accordance with the Canned Foods and Meats Act. In every sense this was a Canadian shipment, and I add this, that far from permitting the impression to go abroad that in any way Canada was not playing the game in its trade with the United Kingdom, the fact is that Canada has every reason to be proud both of the magnitude of the shipment and of its contents.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): On Monday last the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), asked a question in regard to the uniform and equipment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on Remembrance or Armistice day, in this city. I have now the information. "A" division paraded with Sam Browne equipment with no revolvers or ammunition, and no rifles. "N" division paraded with Sam Browne equipment similar to "A" division, but their revolver holsters were attached to the belt. They carried no ammunition, revolvers or rifles.

THE GOLD STANDARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Now that the government is in such a receptive mood I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to an item which appeared in a Montreal paper last night, a newspaper not unfriendly to the government, declaring that it is the general belief in Ottawa that between adjournment and the reconvening of the house on January 30, Canada intends to go off the gold standard. Will the Prime Minister allay the feelings of the people in this regard?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman for affording me the opportunity to answer that inquiry. Canada has not been on the gold standard, as that term is used, since 1929, when there was shipped to New York $40,000,000 of gold or thereabouts and gold was no longer a commodity that could be freely bought and sold, as it must be in order to enable the country affected to be on the gold standard. Secondly, there could be no action taken by the government between now and January 30 that would repeal or amend the act that provides for the metal coverage of money—

Mr. JACOBS: Under peace, order and good government?

Mr. BENNETT: That is no longer in force, the hon. gentleman having voted against it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Therefore the hon. gentleman need have no fear that the provisions of the law as they now stand, providing for the metal coverage with gold of our paper currency to the extent of 25 per cent thereof up to $50,000,000, and thereafter dollar for dollar, will be amended, varied, altered, changed or repealed between now and the 30th day of January.

Mr. JACOBS: The answer is therefore no?

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Customs Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I did not contemplate the third reading of this measure at the moment. May I say to the minister that I understand that the section which is being repealed is being repealed in order to assist in meeting one of the undertakings in the trade agreement with Great Britain. There are, however, two sections in the Customs Act, one, section 43, and another, section 36 (2), which bear immediately on what is said to be the aim of this bill. I gather from correspondence which has come to my attention that unless section 36 (2) is also repealed or amended in a manner similar to that proposed with respect to section 43, what the minister is doing now in amending section 43 will really amount to very little or nothing in the way of affording the kind of relief which it is intended it should give. Apparently the practice of the Department of National Revenue has been this. Where an appeal is made taking exception to what is being done under section 43 and the minister has found it difficult to support the position taken thereunder, he and his officials claim they were acting under section 36 (2). But if the appeal is made in the first instance against what is being done under section 36 (2), the minister then says he is acting not under that section but under section 43. Section 36 (2) leaves the right of final decision with the minister. As I have said correspondence which I have received since the matter was discussed on the second reading, has been to the effect that unless section 36 (2) is modified in the same way as the other section, the purpose which the minister purports to be serving will not actually be served. I may be wrongly informed as to what the effect will be, and if I am I hope the minister will show wherein this is the case. If not, I hope he will see his way clear to carry out along the lines I have indicated what is believed to be necessary to accomplish what is said to be the object of the amendment.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Speaker, I understand that I have not the right to speak at this stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, you have.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no reply on the third reading.

Mr. RYCKMAN: With the consent of the house, I would be glad to reply to the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). By agreement with the United Kingdom representatives we are doing in this bill now before the house for third reading exactly what they asked should be done in that respect. As my right hon. friend must know, this bill deals with the section which provides for action by the minister after the governor in council has decided, upon report of the minister, the course to be taken. Section 36-2, to which my right hon. friend refers, covers action to be taken by the Department of National Revenue within itself. It was not introduced by this government, it is departmental routine action and in respect to that it is not proposed to make any change.

Mr. YOUNG: May I ask the hon. minister a question? Do I understand him to say that the British government objected to action of this kind being taken by the minister but had no objection to the same action being taken by departmental officials?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the house to the fact that the house is not now in committee. These objections to the provisions of this bill should have been made when the house was in committee. The motion for third reading is debatable but it does not permit of a series of questions to and answers by the minister.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

WAYS AND MEANS—UNEMPLOYMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for committee of ways and means.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I understand that my time is not quite up and I think perhaps I can usefully employ the balance.

Last evening I was discussing the effort which the government had made along the lines of returning people to the land in order to afford some outlet, in so far as it could be afforded, to those who were upon direct relief in the cities. During the time this policy of colonization within Canada has been in force and up to September 30, 1932, 66,407 individuals have been absorbed upon the land. This has been brought about by the voluntary return of people to the land or by the return of those upon direct relief and who took advantage of the several agreements which were entered into with the provinces. It is hoped that many of these people will remain upon the land and become permanent settlers.

It might be of interest to the house to know what the feelings of the railroads are in this respect. The railroads acted in conjunction with the department, and I should like to read a short letter from the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, dated October 15, 1932. It reads:

> I have today studied a comprehensive report submitted by the chief commissioner of colonization of this company which indicates that during the past two and one-half years, 4,143 families have been settled along the company's lines.

Those are families who were within Canada, not new immigrants. The letter continues:

> You will appreciate, I am sure, that I have received the information contained in this report with more than ordinary interest and satisfaction. In addition to the benefits which logically may be expected through the settlement of lands tributary to the company's lines, such activities also represent a definite contribution to the improvement of the dominion's agricultural and industrial situation.
> It is, perhaps, trite to say that in the well directed settlement of our agricultural lands is to be found a very substantial contribution to the solution of Canada's railway difficulties. Yet, in that axiom rests also, in large degree, the answer to other Canadian economic problems.
> The report to which I have referred recalls the meeting at Ottawa in the fall of 1930 which set in motion the coordinated land movement of your own department, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific colonization departments, with a view to the settlement of people with some resources and a background of practical experience. The results to date confirm the views that were expressed at our first joint meeting as to the possibilities of settlement of this character during the period in question. They indicate that the proposals were, indeed, well founded.

Yours very truly,

E. W. Beatty.

We have received from time to time many requests and proposals from the provinces and the municipalities with a view to providing direct relief in as economical a way as possible. Proposals have been made with regard to the carrying on of works in conformity with the expressed views of the provinces. As I indicated last night, the projection of certain works has not met with their approval and, for obvious reasons, we cannot project these works without that approval. However, various works were undertaken in order to see that people should be given such food and shelter as might be necessary during these trying times.

In Prince Edward Island at the instance of the provincial government, this government has contributed fifty per cent of the labour costs in the reconstruction of the Falconwood hospital. The dominion's proportion amounts to $5,328.24 out of a total of $10,656.49.

The provincial government of Nova Scotia pointed out the desirability of returning to their homes in continental Europe some 140 families from the mining section of New Waterford. The federal government contributed forty per cent, or $8,000 of a total cost of $20,000. These miners had come from central Europe at the instance of the coal company.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am bound to call the hon. minister's attention to the fact that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the house consents.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. POULIOT: Not only that, but the minister has the right to defend his department.

Mr. GORDON: I am just praising it.

These miners were thrown out of work, I am told, as a result of the last report of Sir Andrew Duncan which recommended the closing down of certain collieries in that locality.

The dominion is also contributing forty per cent of the cost of certain provincial highway construction. Our share will be $32,000 out of a total expenditure of $80,000.

The dominion is also contributing fifty per cent of the cost of certain construction on the trans-Canada highway. Our share will amount to $66,823.96 out of a total expenditure of $133,647.90. On this work the following tabulation shows the number of men engaged, the number of days worked and the wages paid from May to September:

| Month | Number of men working | Number of days worked | Wages paid |
|---|---|---|---|
| May | 900 | 17,961 | $57,075 |
| June | 1,090 | 22,796 | 61,695 |
| July | 765 | 12,603 | 36,869 |
| August | 724 | 14,208 | 42,233 |
| September | 855 | 11,208 | 31,729 |

As regards Ontario, the dominion, under an arrangement with that province, is contributing one-third to the cost of the projection of the road through the locality in the neighbourhood of Dysart, the province and the municipality putting up $50,000 as against $25,000 by the dominion. In Swazey township in New Ontario, not in my riding, the dominion is assuming one-half of the cost of a road into a new mining locality. The dominion is also assisting in Ontario to the extent of 50 per cent of the board camps to which reference has been made from time to time in the house. In these camps 2,279 men were given employment in May, working 29,254 man-days. In June 3,355 were given employment for 57,066 days and in July 3,794 were employed for 66,536 days. In August 3,604 men worked 61,764 days and during September 3,499 men were employed 68,430 days. The cash allowance paid to the workers and the wages paid to the key men for May, June, July, August and September amounted to $329,758.78.

In the four western provinces the provincial governments were confronted with a situation with respect to that class called transients. Dealing with transients is a difficult problem. The very word "transient" would indicate some of the difficulties. Time after time news would come by telegraph to Ottawa that so many men had congregated in some of the western villages. Although immediate steps were taken to see that the men got food, lack of which was complained of, oftentimes within twenty-four hours arrangements were made to see that they were given food, but when it arrived, those men had drifted on another hundred miles. Time after time the provinces and the Dominion government were in a position where they could not move as fast as the transients. The situation became ridiculous. These men of course have been described as hungry, lonesome men, but the facility with which they would move about the country was a puzzling problem to both the provinces and ourselves.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps they were not satisfied with the food provided.

Mr. GORDON: We were not fast enough to catch up with some of them to give them the food. At any rate, this resulted in the provinces and any other agencies available taking steps to see that riding illegally on trains should cease and that these men should be identified and placed under some sort of discipline, or control, or whatever you like to call it, in order that we might at least identify the problem with which we had to deal. The Dominion government, recognizing that the western provinces had been the magnet to attract single men from other provinces and also the depository for immigrants from Europe, realized that there was something more than an ordinary responsibility to this type and class. The provincial governments in the west found their finances strained and the federal government took appropriate action to standardize the relief given to those men. In each of the western provinces independent committees have been set up in order to deal with this situation and possibly to deal with relief generally. Those committees are now functioning; the transients are being registered; they are being cared for in camps and being given some useful work to do. There are certain places, but not many, where those people object to going to camps and some of them, going to the camps, say that they will not stand for this sort of treatment. Fortunately, however, that kind of objection does not obtain in the great majority of places. So far as our information goes, generally speaking, the matter of taking care of those men and providing them with work where work is available is proceeding satisfactorily. That applies to transient, single, homeless men.

In Manitoba, the dominion is contributing 50 per cent to the cost of road grading on the provincial roads to Clear lake the federal contribution being $3,500. The dominion is also contributing $7,200 towards the cost of construction of dykes on the Assiniboine river. Also, the Department of the Interior of the federal government has taken and is taking steps to absorb many men in useful work in the national parks. This information, while not in great detail, will be amplified in the report which will subsequently be filed pursuant to the provisions of the statute.

[Mr. Gordon.]

In Saskatchewan, as in Manitoba subsistence camps and the farm placement scheme, which was in operation last year, have been continued this year, the dominion contributing to the cost.

In Alberta, the same provision, with slight variations, is made, the dominion contributing to the cost in each instance.

In British Columbia, the same policy is being pursued with respect to single, homeless men and also the contributions are being made, as in the other provinces, towards general relief of those in need.

As regards the number who are receiving direct relief, I think I should refer to this matter now because some days ago I made a short reference to it when, in answer to a question, I said that in the month of August there were some 840,000 men, women and children in Canada being given relief, not continuously, but for varying periods. This statement was unfortunately misconstrued by some hon. members and by a section of the press. Therefore, in order that it may be made clear to the house, more detailed information should be given. In the month of August, 1932, the number of men, women and children receiving relief was 841,931. Of that number 162,135 heads of families were receiving direct relief. It will be seen therefore that those who sought to interpret or fell unconsciously into the error of construing that statement to mean that there were 841,000 heads of families on relief were quite wrong. In the month of September last the number of those on relief had fallen to 802,592. That is, the figure dropped in the month of September, 40,000 below the August figure. The number of heads of families receiving direct relief during the month of September, also fell to 158,171. Those figures if compared with the returns as to employment will in the main agree, the employment figures having steadily improved during the past three months. We expected that the unemployment situation would become more severe on the opening of winter, but it does not seem to have so developed. There may be and likely are places in Canada where it has so developed, but generally speaking that is not the case so far as the records disclose.

I shall not take up more of the time of the house except to say this: When we speak of our country and of its illimitable resources, and I think I have heard that phrase often before, we must bear in mind that we have a small population, but that we have immense resources, immense territories owned by the crown and, fortunately, all not alienated to those who might improperly exploit them. If the citizens of Canada would realize the opportunities that there are in their own country, and instead of hiving in the industrial centres would get a comprehension of the empire that they have in trust, then even though there is a dislocation of industry and trade in the world today I think there would be very little suffering or deprivation amongst the people of this country.

I would offer this observation in closing my remarks. The individual has a responsibility. The individual cannot continue to lean upon his fellow-man forever, and forever turn to the state to correct every misadventure which may befall him. The individual should develop a little more courage. I know that I shall be criticized for saying this, but I shall continue to repeat that this country and the world have passed through periods of stress probably not as general as now prevails throughout the world, but just as distressing, and perhaps this depression, if we can call it such, will at least bring out in bold relief to the individual the absolute necessity for his developing a little courage, and with the development of courage and initiative on the part of the individual to take advantage of this great empire that Canada presents it will not be so hard for each individual to get the share of the resources to which he is entitled.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I was very glad indeed to hear the Prime Minister yesterday make the statement that he intended to call a Dominion-provincial conference for the purpose of considering an unemployment insurance scheme. I am certain that if a determined effort is made at that conference a working plan can be developed in this country in time to present it to parliament when we reassemble after the New Year.

I am also very glad the work that was accomplished in this regard by the late government has not been in vain. It is well known that during the life of the late government we referred this question to the committee on industrial relations headed by my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). That committee after a great deal of work brought in recommendations to the house which were accepted by the government and parliament and as Minister of Labour I had the honour to canvass the provinces with regard to an unemployment insurance scheme, and the files of the department will disclose that several of the provinces are on record as being willing to put into operation an unemployment insurance scheme.

I desire also to thank the members of the Labour group for bringing this question of unemployment before the house. At this time I consider it is one of the most, if not the most important problem that faces this country today, and indeed will face in the future, and therefore I do not think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) last night should have gone out of his way in an effort to belittle the leader of the group that brought this question before the house. The hon. Minister of Labour last night, referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr Woodsworth) said:

> A review of the pages of Hansard, however, from the first year the hon. gentleman graced this chamber, will show that in every pronouncement he has made, the phraseology is nearly always the same, he voices almost the same fears, the same suspicions, the same lack of confidence in any other human being in the world but himself, and always with patient regularity he sets up something that never resolves itself into fact.

I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has voiced the fear of unemployment ever since he came into this chamber, as well as before that, and surely unemployment itself has developed into a fact. I do not think the Minister of Labour should have gone out of his way to use that language to the hon. member.

The Minister of Labour in his remarks did not hold out very much hope for improvement in the system under which we are now working. He did not hold out any such hope as the Conservative party did in 1930, of a job for every man willing and able to work, because he said:

> It is quite true that I should like to see, as every member in this chamber would like to see, men in all walks of life guaranteed happy, productive employment. That never has been the case if I read history correctly, and I doubt if it will ever come to pass; there is always a percentage that cannot realize that sort of thing.

Those were the words of the Minister of Labour last night. Where in that statement is the hope of getting every man a job who is willing to work? I can well understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) would not understand the phraseology of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Had he understood it he would realize that, with a proper system of distribution, the poor we would not always have with us, to adopt the expression of the Prime Minister. It may be that the Minister of Labour did not understand the words of the member for Winnipeg North Centre, but in 1930, the Conservative party as a whole understood his phraseology. I recall, as emanating from that group, a certain motion, and I recall further that every Conservative who spoke congratulated the Labour group upon bringing the matter before the house and, when the time came, voted in favour of the motion because it embarrassed the government of the day.

For the information of hon. members I should like to state that during the election campaign of 1930, a circular was distributed showing that members of the Labour group had introduced a motion concerning unemployment, and that while on the one hand every Conservative member had voted for it, every Liberal member had voted against it. On that occasion the government of the day did not appeal to the Speaker to have the motion ruled out of order, although they might have done so on the same grounds taken the other day. It may be that on this occasion the Minister of Labour does not understand the psychology of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Instead of trying to belittle the efforts of the western member the minister ought to try to keep in touch with the Labour group so that he might understand their points of view. Notwithstanding anything the Minister of Labour said last night with respect to the Labour group, I am convinced that they are a great acquisition to this House of Commons and that they do very useful work. When acting as Minister of Labour I was very glad on all occasions to welcome any suggestions they had to make.

Probably the minister did not understand the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I wonder if he would understand this expression of opinion from the Alberta conference of the United Church of Canada:

> The present system has now been under trial for a sufficient period to lend itself to fair criticism, and the present unhappy condition of over production, under consumption, is its condemnation.

That is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been saying for many years but the Minister of Labour cannot understand it. So I say the thanks of the house are due to the hon. members who have brought this discussion to the front. Last night the Minister of Labour, or the Minister of Immigration—I do not know for which office he was speaking—sought to blame the condition of unemployment upon the immigration policy of the late government. I wonder if he realizes that for years past practically all Conservatives urged upon the Liberal government the necessity for a greater influx of immigrants to Canada.

[Mr. Heenan.]

The Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, the late Premier of Ontario, went to Europe in 1928—I met him there myself—on which occasion he was seeking to bring immigrants to that province. In that year the province spent $171,129 in their efforts to bring in more immigrants. Speaking before the Toronto Transportation Club on his return to Canada Mr. Ferguson had this to say:

> We cannot hope to populate this country with British people alone; there are large areas in the continent from which we could draw the most desirable people.

Then, we remember the efforts of General McRae, the former representative of Vancouver North, who with the applause of all Conservatives urged upon the government of the day the adoption of a plan to bring in 300,000 people per year at a yearly cost of $30,000,000. What would have happened to this country had the Liberals adopted the Conservative proposals of that day?

I could point to the words of many hon. members now sitting on the government benches, but at this time I shall quote the words of only one of them. The following are the words of the present Prime Minister, as they appear in Hansard of February 11, 1929:

> It will be found that the increase in population in this country, brought about through bringing additional people in, will not only lessen unemployment for those who are now in it, but will increase employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the Tory policy.

Mr. HEENAN: Now the Minister of Labour and Immigration takes the opposite view. I suppose we must call that cabinet solidarity. Then we have the statement of the present Mayor of Winnipeg, that unemployment was brought about by immigration in 1930. The Winnipeg Free Press carries the following report of his words:

> The best thing for this country would be the arrival of 1,000,000 Britishers, declared Mayor Webb.

He was asking for 1,000,000 Britishers at a time when there was an unemployment problem. Yet he was out in the country speaking against Liberal candidates because they had allowed in too many immigrants. The propaganda of Conservatives in Canada added to the propaganda of the Conservative press has been responsible more than any other agency of which I know, for bringing in immigrants.

Concluding his remarks the Minister of Labour threw aside altogether the old slogan that the present government would get every man a job who was able and willing to work. Now he announces the gospel of every man for himself. In his view every man should step out with a proper spirit and outlook on life. If there are any men who have not such spirit but are actuated by a feeling directly the opposite, I contend it is because of the actions of the present Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues when, in 1930, they went through Canada deploring the conditions and telling the people with crocodile tears in their eyes, that when they were put into office they would see that every man able to work would have it. The people took them at their word. For once in their lives the Canadian people believed the Conservative party and the present Prime Minister. Today, quite properly, they are looking to the man who promised a cure for unemployment. We are told by the Minister of Labour that unemployment is on the wane, that he would instil into the minds of Canadian people a spirit of "every man for himself", a better Canadian spirit, and so on, and so on. When the policies of the present government have failed, when those policies have accentuated unemployment difficulties, it is only natural that the people of Canada should look for assistance to that right hon. gentleman and his government. They look to the right hon. gentleman who promised to deal with unemployment from a national standpoint. He said, "It is too great for the municipalities and the provinces; if we are elected to power we will take over unemployment relief on a national basis." There was no constitution standing in the way on that occasion; it was swept aside in connection with old age pensions, unemployment relief and so on. There was no question about the municipalities; it had become far too great for any municipality or province to contend with. "Elect us," he said, "and we will take it over as a national obligation, constitution or not." I am afraid, however, that the Prime Minister has not the same constitution now that he had in 1930, when he was making these promises. Not only did he promise these things during the campaign; he repeated those promises in this house. After the leader of the opposition had catalogued some of the promises that had been made and stated that the people would expect their fulfilment, the Prime Minister stood in his place and uttered these words, which will be found at page 39 of Hansard of the special session of 1930:

I do not propose for a single moment to traverse in this house the matters which were gone into on the hustings. I shall content myself with saying to the right hon. leader of the oppostion and his friends that we will keep the promises we made.

There was great applause then from the government side of the house. Having made those promises to the electors and repeated them on the floor of the house, what has been the government's program for the cure of unemployment? We have waited patiently for two and a half years, but everyone knows that unemployment has steadily increased. There is no excuse for unemployment in this country at the present time. Let me quote the words of the present Prime Minister at Victoria on June 16, 1930, when he said:

Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times if the government is discharging its duties as it should?

If those words were true then, Mr. Speaker, is there any excuse for times having become worse after the Conservative party took office? There were 170,000 people unemployed at that time, taking the figures of the Conservatives, while there are about 750,000 people unemployed today. So I ask if this government is discharging its duties as it should. What has been done with regard to the coal mining districts of Nova Scotia, for example? The Prime Minister and some of his colleagues made speeches in that area; at Halifax, as reported in the Halifax Herald of July 4, he said:

I will not sacrifice the coal industry of this province or the steel industry of this province to any other country in the world. We will not tolerate this importation of Soviet coal when we take office.

He went on to say at St. Thomas, on July 21:

It was unfair to have Russian coal enter the Dominion to replace a Canadian product produced at such a low living standard under Soviet rule.

Commenting on that speech, the Sydney Post had this to say:

The importation of Soviet coal, mined under cheap wages and living conditions, works an injury to Canadian miners. It causes unemployment, it leaves the children hungry, mothers exhausted and the father willing and anxious to get work but unable to obtain it.

Those last few words are in box car letters. What has become of those promises to the miners of Cape Breton? I know what has happened. At the time those words were uttered the mines of Nova Scotia were producing seven million tons of coal, while in the first full year of the Conservative regime their production dropped to four million tons, and the wages of the miners were reduced.

Now what have we? We have the conditions pictured by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) last night, and I have before me a copy of a resolution which was sent to the Prime Minister also. It states in effect that there is nothing but hunger, despair and suffering in the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia. It mentions the relief of thirteen cents per head per day, and points out rightly that it takes from 40 cents to 90 cents a head to keep murderers and convicted criminals in our penitentiaries. Yet these decent men, who were deceived in 1930, are expected to live on 13 cents per day. I wonder what the miners of Nova Scotia will think when they read the confession of deception made by the Minister of Labour the other night. I have read what was said during the campaign. At page 1084 of Hansard for this session the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) made the following statement:

> This Russian coal was meeting competition only from American anthracite, a coal which we do not produce.

Later on in the debate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) said:

> The minister knows the Russian coal was anthracite and the Nova Scotia coal is bituminous, and that the Russian coal would not come into competition with the Nova Scotia coal.

To which the Minister of Labour replied:

> Everybody knows that.

Did you ever hear such a confession of betrayal and deception on the part of any member of a government? Then we have the Kenora Miner and News, which reprinted a report from the Regina Herald in which it was pointed out that another carload of English soft coal was landed in the Annapolis valley at a time when employment was so badly needed in the province of Nova Scotia. What do the trade returns show? They indicate that last year, while the miners of Nova Scotia were suffering, there were 12,999,942 tons of bituminous coal imported into Canada. That is how this government is carrying out its promise to the miners of Nova Scotia.

What benefit has been derived by the lumbering business or the pulp and paper industry under this government? The Prime Minister complained, during the election campaign, with regard to the exportation of pulpwood from this country; he said it was working a detriment to Canada. The provincial Minister of Lands and Forests made the same complaint, as did also my good friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). The Toronto Globe of May 29, 1930, has this to say:

> After his nomination Mr. Nicholson spoke briefly and declared there would have been no occasion for the mill to close down if the Canadian government had prohibited the export of pulpwood from deeded lands, as United States consumers would then be compelled to increase their purchases of newsprint from Canada in place of using Canadian pulpwood in their own mills.

The report goes on to say that this view was supported by Hon. William Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario. At that time, Mr. Speaker, the mill of which they were speaking at Espanola was closed down, and they sought to establish the fact that the mill was closed because the Liberal government was not doing its duty in connection with that industry. What are the conditions today in northern Ontario? This government has had an opportunity of doing something for that industry, but what do we find? Pulp and paper mills are closed down practically all through the north, or are working part time, and that with a general reduction in the rate of wages of those men who are employed. The pulpwood cutters are unable to sell their wood either at home or abroad, and in the lumbering business in northern Ontario, I told the other day just what the conditions of those employed are. I do not think it would be amiss to repeat the facts now. I had a statement with regard to four young men who were induced to go from Winnipeg to work in the lumber industry at the head of the lakes. They worked twenty-three days, including Sundays, working eighteen hours a day, and at the end of that time their wages, on the basis of $26 a month, amounted to $18.55. After deducting railway fare of $9.55, doctors' fees, and a few other little supplies, they had $1 handed to them for their twenty-three days' work. The result was that they were $8.55 short of their train fare back to Winnipeg, and then this government put out an order to have men arrested if they attempted to steal a ride on railway trains.

What about the railway problem? Our railways are a good barometer of conditions in the country. We find that the railwaymen were promised better times and full dinner pails, but what are the facts? According to a return tabled the other day by the government there were employed on the Canadian railways in 1928, 187,710 employees; in 1929, 187,846; in 1930, 174,486; and in 1931, 154,569. In other words, there was a reduction as between the last full year of the Liberal regime and the first full year of the Conservative administration of 33,277, and a general reduction in the basic rate of wages paid. How do wages compare under the Liberal regime and under my hon. friends opposite? In 1929 there was paid for railway operations and small construction work $391,790,157, and in 1931, $229,499,505, or a reduction between 1929 and 1931 of $162,300,652. That is the full dinner pail which the railwayman has received from this government. What encouragement is there for the railwaymen of Canada? We have had a royal commission and apparently it dealt with the question of wages and with railwaymen's affairs, but not one single Canadian railwayman was on that body. Instead there was a Mr. Loree, president of a railway in the United States with the worst working conditions in that country. In the view of the government he was good enough to be on the board. We have the report of that commission, and legislation has been introduced in the other house based upon that report. What does it recommend? The abandonment of branch lines, the abandonment of portions of main lines, merging of services, cooperation instead of competition. Where, oh where now is that slogan, Amalgamation never; competition ever? What has become of it? If this is put into operation as outlined by the report, it will throw thousands upon thousands of railroad men upon the streets, unemployed. The Conservative party in 1930 received a good many railwaymen's votes, I am sorry to say, on the strength of promises to do certain things, amongst those promises being the promise not only to aid existing traffic channels but to build extensions. That was the promise that was held out to the railwaymen of the country—to build extensions to the railways—and many good railwaymen voted for the Conservative party because they believed that the promises which the party made to them were sacred. But now for the rude awakening. The men have awakened to find that there is less work and lower wages and in many instances loss of homes with all their life savings gone. I repeat, where, oh where is that slogan, Amalgamation never; competition ever? Now that the Prime Minister's policies have failed, now that he has fallen down on his promises, he wants to be absolved of them all. He says, in effect, "Who could foresee at the time we were making these promises that there would be a world depression?" Well, the Liberal leader and all the Liberal candidates said that there was a world depression—

Mr. CHAPLIN: You said there was no depression at all.

Mr. HEENAN: —but the present Prime Minister could not foresee it. I read the other day an article giving an account of a meeting which he addressed at Kitchener. He asked, "Why have we unemployment in this country?" A man in the audience rose and said, "We have it all over the world," and people in the audience cried, "Put the calf outside." There was a calf who wanted to tell the Prime Minister what the economic conditions in the world were, but they would not listen to that calf. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would heed the words of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson), uttered in this house last night:

> So far as we are concerned, we recognized in 1930 and we recognize today that the conditions with which we were confronted were largely world conditions.

There is one of his own followers able to tell him. But we had Mr. Ferguson too. That gentleman went through northern Ontario declaring that the condition was worldwide, and he asked, "Why does the government sit around helpless and not bring about better conditions in Canada? Never mind conditions in the rest of the world. Canada is our job, and Canada should be Mr. King's job." He said that the then Prime Minister ought to bring about better conditions in this country, and he promised something else—because he was not going to take second place to the right hon. gentleman opposite. Let me read what he said:

> "Is there any one who will say there is not a general depression that is retarding the growth and advancement of Canada," he said. . . . "I am looking forward to a remarkable change in the next few months," continued the Ontario premier. "I am looking forward to the speeding up of the wheels of industry, to increased payrolls and greater prosperity for the people of Canada. I expect these things because I feel sure, just as sure as I am standing on this platform tonight, that on July 28 the people of Canada will rise in their might and say to Mr. King: "You have had 10 years in office and conditions are getting steadily worse. We are going to try another fellow in your place!"

We have the other fellow in my right hon. leader's place now. He has been tried and found guilty of deception, and trying to pull the wool over the eyes of the electors of this country; and his Minister of Labour now stands up in his place and says "every man for himself." We need a greater outlook on life, a greater individuality. The Prime Minister has said; Come unto me, all ye that are weary and are heavy hearted, and I will give you rest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Work.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes—I will give you work. What did the Prime Minister's lieutenant the Premier of Ontario say? He is reported in the Kenora Miner and News as having received tremendous applause at Kenora when he stated that he believed in high wages. Those who applauded him have seen the day when they had to accept a reduction in their pay cheques; they have seen the day when the province has carried on work in northern Ontario and paid the slave wages of only $5 per month and board. That statement by Premier Ferguson was another effort to deceive the people. He is reported in the Toronto Telegram of July 21, 1930, as having said at Kenora.

> With the election of a Bennett government we will have legislation to improve conditions and start turning the wheels of factories. Industry will resume and the farmers will get some profit for their labour. Jobs will increase. The home will be happy, the housewife will smile every day.

Was it any wonder that the housewives who listened to him laughed outright? But they have shed many bitter tears since that time. Although they paid no heed to Mr. Ferguson, there were too many people in this country who believed the Conservative candidates and were satisfied to elect a Conservative government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Never again.

Mr. HEENAN: The present Minister of Labour of the Ontario government, a great campaigner who in 1930 had the cure-all for unemployment had the following to say at the directors' luncheon of the Canadian National exhibition on Labour Day, 1931:

> We always have had periods of retrenchment and expansion, and we always will have them.

He is practically saying what the Prime Minister said the other day—the poor we will always have with us. He continues:

> These things move in cycles. I do not know any cure for the depression and I don't think anybody else does.

Doctor Monteith did not see any way out of the depression except to depend upon the old law of supply and demand. I do not think he ever heard of the Versailles treaty, signed by Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. HEENAN: May I have just a few more minutes?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am not the master of the rules. The hon. member may continue if the house consents.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him an hour.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: An hour would not be sufficient for me to tell my hon. friends what I think of them.

Article 13 of the treaty provides that henceforth labour shall not be considered as a commodity.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand the hon. member is a good physician in private life and I suggest that he prescribe something for the government. They need to be cleaned out instead of being fed on soothing syrups. Sir Robert Borden signed this treaty, but the government's position is that in view of the great number of unemployed in Canada, the wages of workmen should be reduced and living conditions should be lowered. It is quite evident that Doctor Monteith does not speak the same language today as he did in 1930. Is it any wonder that the reports state that the labourmen present disagreed with his remarks?

We have been through very stringent times during these last few years. I know what the government is up against; I am sorry for them, but they took the job into their own hands. The Prime Minister of this country stated at Toronto in effect that if anyone advocates radical measures, the iron heel of ruthlessness will be used. When the Prime Minister of Canada uses language such as that, surely there is an excuse for the miners in Cape Breton sending him a resolution ending with these words: If you do not do something for us hurriedly, we will take the law into our own hands. It should not be expected that men who are endowed with the spirit of freedom will sit idly by and listen to the Prime Minister or anyone else in authority make statements advocating the use of the iron heel of ruthlessness.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did not the hon. member's government send soldiers down to Nova Scotia under similar circumstances?

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend knows that at the time to which he refers the provincial government requested that the soldiers be sent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member is trying to get behind something.

Mr. HEENAN: If we are going to discuss such matters I might mention that it was not a Liberal government which ordered the soldiers out to Winnipeg in 1919, to shoot down the strikers, nor was it a Liberal government which ordered the soldiers last year to shoot down the strikers in Estevan who had a legitimate grievance.

Mr. POULIOT: The soldiers did not shoot anyone because they had a good chaplain.

Mr. HEENAN: The present Prime Minister has brought this thing upon himself. In 1930, even before the elections, what did he say? He went to Regina and, put into the minds of the labouring people of this country the thought of revolt. He is reported as follows:

While Mr. Heenan was denying the existence of a serious unemployment problem—

That is not true. The report continues:

—a soup kitchen had been opened in Montreal. He was reminded of the revolution of 1845 in France on the right to work.

What right has any man aspiring to be the Prime Minister of this country, to utter words such as that and now to advocate the iron heel of ruthlessness to be used upon any man who clamours for the right to work?

I should have liked to go on, but I am afraid of myself. However, I will conclude by saying that the government which is now advocating the iron heel will get the whole foot when they go to the country. I know that instead of the iron heel they will get the leather toe.

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, speaking yesterday to this question the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) quoted a a letter, the authorship of which was not divulged. This letter purported to give a description of the conditions which prevail in the relief camp in Riding Mountain park in Manitoba. I do not intend to repeat the whole letter, but I should like to quote two sentences. The first is:

I have been asked by a committee of men, who are working at Riding Mountain park to bring to your attention the utterly disgraceful situation which exists there.

The second sentence reads as follows:

I asked several old-timers their opinion of it and they state in fact that it is without any question the worst camp they have ever seen on the American continent. The toilet is thoroughly filthy, unsanitary, and far too small.

Then, taking as the gospel truth this letter, the authorship of which is not given, the hon. member makes a definite statement so to speak. He says:

The question may be asked: Why do men suffer such indignities, and four reasons are given in the letter, as follows:

1. Fourteen miles from the nearest railway.
2. Stool pigeons who report the least attempt at organization.
3. Intermittent surveillance by mounted police.
4. General breaking down of morale.

The camps which are in existence in Riding Mountain national park this year are similar to those which were in existence during the season of 1931-32. While those camps were in operation, three daily newspapers in the province, namely the Winnipeg Free Press, the Winnipeg Tribune and the Brandon Sun, sent their correspondents to Riding Mountain park and made their own investigations and reports. No doubt those reports were and are known to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In case he does not know them, may I respectfully draw them to his attention, namely, the issue of the Tribune of January 5, 1932, the issue of the Free Press of February 6, 1932, and may I read one paragraph from the latter issue:

As regards actual living conditions, they have been fairly accurately put before the public. The work is healthy and not too arduous. The attitude of the foremen to the men has been decent and sympathetic to a degree. The food is plentiful, and is becoming much better as the cooks adjust themselves to new and sometimes trying conditions. Sanitary conditions, though not all that could be desired, are gradually being improved upon.

That is a description when the camps were being formed, and conditions have improved. May I also read from the Brandon Sun under date of January 5, 1932? The paragraph is headed:

Superintendent's Fine Work

But so able has been the supervision given by Mr. Smart, who incidentally is an old Brandon boy, and a son of James A. Smart, twice mayor of this city in the early days, that the huge camp has functioned almost without a single hitch anywhere. Lumber was readily available, and the huts were soon up. The stores followed, and the provisions were soon on their way. Almost as soon as the city of Winnipeg was ready to send its first batch of men to this big camp, everything was in readiness.

I read that for the purpose of paying a deserved tribute to the superintendent of that park and those who were associated with him in its administration. During the course of last year's operations one man who sent a letter to the press, signing his name K. McDonald, complaining of conditions there, was answered by one of the men in the camp. This will be found in the columns of the Winnipeg Free Press under date of January 2, 1932. Let me read this paragraph from his letter:

As regards Mr. K. McDonald's complaints, I would like to refer to the recreation hall he so slightingly refers to in his letter, and leave it to your readers to judge for themselves. This hall is a splendid idea, which has now developed almost every kind of amusement and entertainment necessary for the boys to pass the long winter evenings, and it is certainly being taken advantage of by the men in all the camps in the vicinity. I might mention that those in authority have had recently installed a small plant sufficient to supply the electric light for that place. The hall provides all the reading and music they want, and as for sports, they have playing cards, checkers, indoor tennis, basketball, volleyball, football, hockey, all supplied free.

They get all the writing materials they require, also the use of a camp barber, and efforts are still being made to further assist them. This recreation hall was placed at the main camp for the reason it was the most central to the other larger camps, and there is never a night that there are not plenty of men from the other camps, and all having a very enjoyable time.

May I also read an article which appears in the Winnipeg Tribune under date of November 17, 1932, headed:

Men of Riding Mountain camps hold sing-songs.

Community singing will soon enliven the nights of workers in the government camps for the unemployed in Riding Mountain national park. At the request of a number of men at Camp 6, the Tribune today dispatches several hundred song sheets such as were used at the "nights of community song" last summer for use during the long winter nights.

The men of Camp 6 had written: "Will you kindly forward some of your song sheets as we would like something to sing at our concerts in the winter nights. We are having a real good time with plenty of good food and everything is good and clean."

May I commend that to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That was written, unsolicited, by men who are now at work in the park. May I say in addition that I visited those very camps myself last year. I visited not one, but every camp situated in the Riding Mountain park area. I took particular pains to inspect their sleeping quarters. I visited the storehouses where the food was kept and found it was kept in splendid condition. I visited the places where the meat was cut and dressed, the dining halls where the men were fed and the recreation halls where they were entertained at night. I had meals with the men; I sat down at the tables with them, and the food was excellent. The dishes, tables and utensils were spotlessly clean and everything was in the best of order. In the course of my life I have lived in soldiers' camps; I have been in lumber and many other camps and this scurrilous letter—I can call it nothing else—is absolutely false when it states that conditions in that camp are the worst on the North American continent.

In addition to that, during the course of my visit I talked to the men who were employed there. Not a single complaint was voiced to me during my visit, and further, to prove that those camps are handled in an efficient, clean and sanitary manner, may I say the key men, known as foremen, sub-foremen, timekeepers, etcetera, are drawn from the homes of people living in the vicinity of the park, men who come from as good homes as there are in the province of Manitoba. Those people eat and have their being in exactly the same manner as do the ordinary working men. It is not difficult to obtain any numbers of those men; I could secure hundreds, yes, thousands, of men in Manitoba to live under those conditions as they exist in Riding Mountain park today. The trouble is not that we cannot get men to go there; it is that we are unable to provide work for all who want to go. This morning I took occasion to telephone to the superintendent of the Riding Mountain national park asking him if any complaints had been made to him or brought to his attention, and he told me that he knew of none; that no complaints had been made to him by the men themselves, nor from any other source whatever.

To sum up, may I say that the administration of that camp this year is exactly the same as it was last year, which administration was commented upon favourably by the three dailies of the province of Manitoba; that a fully qualified medical man is this year in attendance all the time the same as he was last year, his duty being to look after not only the health and well-being of the men but also the sanitary arrangements of the camp.

May I say further that the men who were at work in that camp last winter left it in better physical condition than when they entered. The great majority of them had put on weight, a fact that can be very easily verified from the men themselves. There was very little sickness and certainly no epidemic.

Now what is said on the other side, Mr. Speaker? We have merely a letter, the authorship of which is not given, written by a man who does not even pretend to give first-hand information or to write from his own knowledge, but says that he is writing from information supplied to him by some unnamed and unknown committee. Then we have an hon. member of this house quoting from such misinformation and untrue statements, taking them for gospel truth and basing an argument upon them. Certainly that hon. member can find no fault if the cause which he advocates is not advanced by such tactics.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to discuss this important national problem and cast my eyes across the chamber I am amazed at the lack of interest taken in this question by that great national party whose leader said in 1930 that he would either cure unemployment or perish in the attempt.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What about the co-operative movement?

Mr. MITCHELL: Keep the baby quiet. If you cannot make an intelligent interruption, don't interrupt at all.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this is the most important problem that has come before this house since its opening on October 6. All the legislation that we have hitherto discussed and the many agreements which have been ratified pale into insignificance in comparison with this all-important problem, and I am amazed, Mr. Speaker, to see so many representatives of industrial ridings absent from this House of Commons during this debate.

Mr. COTNAM: How about your own group?

Mr. MITCHELL: Seventy-five per cent of them are here.

Mr. COTNAM: That makes three.

Mr. MITCHELL: What about your own group? I would say to the hon. gentleman that there is one thing which the working people of this country have to be thankful for, and that is that this question might never have been raised except for that small group to which he refers.

I was much interested in the attitude taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on this question, but the discussion in my judgment drifted entirely away from the purport of the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg. We had a discussion of the responsibilities of the provinces and their relationship to the dominion under the British North America Act. We also had an announcement that there would be a conference of the dominion with the provincial governments for the purpose of exploring the possibility of introducing a system of unemployment insurance. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this country has reached such a stage in its development, and there has been such a change in the complexion of its national life, viewed from the standpoint of agriculture and industry, that the British North America Act, is in need of immediate revision. The Prime Minister yesterday quoted a decision from the privy council that unemployment was not a national question, and contended that the present emergency did not come within federal jurisdiction. All I have to say to the Prime Minister is that I should like him to tell the eight hundred thousand people in this country who are drawing relief that the problem of unemloyment is not a national question. I know of no authority better able to give direction in the solution of this very important question.

As the question of unemployment insurance has been broached, I should like to say a few words about it. We have long held the opinion that unemployment insurance is a national responsibility. The house will recall the many difficulties that were raised as to divided responsibility in connection with old age pensions. Those difficulties did not prevent old age pension legislation being enacted by this parliament, and unless unemployment insurance legislation is enacted under the jurisdiction of the federal government in my opinion it would be unworkable. Think of the difficulties otherwise, with men and women passing from one province to another in search of employment. If we are to have a sound system of unemployment insurance it must be under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

I should like to make a few observations on the present slump or depression, as it is often called. I think we are all agreed that it is not like past depressions. Many seem to think that we shall simply glide out of this depression, but I would point out that it has not only brought many concerns and industries into bankruptcy, but also threatens many nations throughout the world. That is where, in my judgment, it differs fundamentally from depressions that we have had in the past, and that is why I think there is more of a political complexion in our attitude in meeting the problem. I have heard many peculiar remarks made across the floor of this house in connection with the problems of agriculture and industry. Not so long ago I remember one hon. member taking credit to the government for the fact that eggs had gone up in price. If he had laid the eggs there might have been some ground for his claim, but I think that we will all agree that the government was not responsible for that; it was the chickens.

Last night we heard another peculiar observation in the course of this debate. The Prime Minister of this country quoted a saying nineteen hundred years old, that the poor are always with us. I do not recollect that observation being made during the election campaign of 1930. I state frankly that I am not one who takes the position that under the present industrial conditions it is necessary for the poor always to be with us. I believe that when the leader of the government, in an effort to justify his position, made that assertion he showed a lack of intelligence and appreciation of the possibilities of the age. I am not unmindful of the efforts made by parliament since the beginning of the depression. I am not unmindful of the further fact that if we are successfully to cope with the depression we must take an entirely different viewpoint concerning our powers and possibilities of action. We must change our views if we are to alleviate conditions which have arisen out of the depression. Direct relief has been tried; the dole has been tried. I should like to say to those people who believe we will glide out of the depression the same way we glided into it, that a depression of equal intensity has existed in Great Britain for the last ten years. There is no reason why, unless we take some conscious action to meet present difficulties, the depression from which we are now suffering, should not last for an equal length of time in Canada. England enjoys the advantage of some very necessary social machinery capable of alleviating the difficulties from which our unemployed men and women are suffering. I believe we must agree that the leaders in business and finance in Canada have turned out to be fair weather sailors. The statement is made in the navy that any man can steer a ship in calm water, but it takes a good sailor to steer one when it is rough. In view of that I believe the leadership in connection with this problem must be taken over by the government. In the past it has been the practice of governments to take credit for good times; in my view they should also take credit for bad. This is not the first government which has slipped into power through promises to solve unemployment problems, but probably they were more definite than others in their declarations. It cannot be said that they have been left holding the bag; they grabbed the bag and apparently are willing to retain it.

In connection with our economic difficulties there are two schools of thought. First, there are those who hold that the problem should be approached from an international standpoint, and there are others who hold that it should be approached from a national standpoint. Today I am not going to discuss the international aspect of the problem. I believe we are in for a prolonged period of intense nationalism. I believe that condition through which we are passing, from the viewpoint of the relationship of one country with another, is going to be of long duration. That condition is the very essence of mass production and the present system under which we live.

With that viewpoint in mind we realize that we have at least some responsibility in approaching economic problems within our own borders. A few evenings ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) expressed the view that we would all be glad if, in the near future, general price levels were doubled. That is admitted by people of all shades of opinion. In some cases the wish is father to the thought, and in others definite suggestions have been made to meet the difficulty. I am frankly disappointed at the position taken by many hon. members concerning currency and what is termed reflation by some and inflation by others. Judging from the experiences in Australia, Great Britain, Sweden and many other countries, I have come to the conclusion that a process of inflation is the most practical way of meeting the problem. I am wondering if those opposed could offer an alternative method which would produce the results achieved in countries which have experimented in this connection. Originally I believed the natural consequence of currency inflation was a lowering of the standards of living. That however, for some unexplained reason, has not proved to be the fact. In Australia there has been an inflation of currency and, at the same time, a reduction in living costs. In Great Britain there is an inflation of practically 25 per cent, and a reduction in the cost of living. I could go on and on and tell similar results in other countries. For the present however I shall say nothing further concerning this matter.

Now I shall direct my remarks to the position in which industrial workers find themselves. Industrial workers of Canada are in a position similar to that of the workers in nearly every other country. There is this exception however, namely that the influence of mass production has made itself felt more on the North American continent than in any other part of the world. I believe it is absolutely necessary to get a clear view of any problem in which you are interested and for which you are endeavouring to find a solution. We have what is known as technological unemployment, which means the displacement of men and women by the machine. Then we have the unemployment brought about by the depression and the stock market crash, which has placed thousands of clerical workers on the labour market. Then we have unemployment brought about by the operation of the stop watch, or what is known as the time study method. Then we have another important factor in connection with unemployment, brought about by the enormous development of the chain store, which has well nigh eliminated the small storekeepers in our larger centres and cut down opportunities for employment to thousands of men engaged in that industry of distribution.

In placing these four facts before the house, Mr. Speaker, I come to the amendment offered by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). Since I have been a member of this House of Commons a number of commissions and committees have been appointed to consider different subjects. We had the radio commission; last year we had the civil service committee, and at present we have a Senate committee considering the question of our railways, which arose out of the appointment of a commission. I see no reason why a royal commission should not be brought into being to deal with what is in my judgment the most important problem in this country today. The amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg went right to the heart of the problem. It dealt with the means of eliminating unemployment; the question of jurisdiction as between federal and provincial governments; the increase of real wages and the annual productive capacity and consumption in relation thereto; the reduction of hours of labour; the spread between wages and productive capacity, and technological unemployment. Whatever else may be said of this amendment at least it is an attempt to analyse the cause of the enormous amount of unemployment we have in this country today. I should have liked the government to take the responsibility of carrying out a similar policy, but apparently they do not intend to do so. In this regard it often has been said in this house that this is an international question, and that nothing can be done unless all the nations in the world take similar steps. I refuse to take the position that no move should be made in this matter until India or China reaches the degree of civilization we have in Canada today. Are we to wait until the last nation becomes civilized before attacking the problem in Canada? I think in view of the intense nationalism which exists in the world today, and in view of the magnitude of the problem that confronts us, it is absolutely necessary to take national action, and if business and financial concerns will not do it the government of the country should do it. Business has had ample opportunity; it has received a great deal of assistance from this parliament, and failing action on the part of these institutions I think the government should step in and see that everyone is provided with work. This is what they promised to do in 1930.

Other countries in the world are attempting to meet this problem. At the last meeting of the International Labour Office in Madrid it was pointed out that unemployment is the cause of the depression, not the result. Some European nations are using the facilities of government in an endeavour to at least alleviate the unemployment from which they suffer. We find that in connection with the reduction of hours of labour, no matter what may be said to the contrary, some concrete action has been taken. I have heard it said many times in this house that the problem is one of distribution. I think if we stop talking about the problem and tackle it we might make some progress.

I should like to quote a few examples of the action taken in some European as well as American countries, in connection with this very important problem of mass production. In Austria the minister of social administration has undertaken an inquiry into the question of the reduction of hours. In Belgium a commission of inquiry has been appointed for the same purpose. In Colombia a bill was submitted to the chamber of representatives providing for the seven hour day, and more recently the government stated that it considered it imperative to arrive at a better arrangement of hours of work by means of international agreement, either of a general nature or for particular industries. In Czechoslovakia a bill providing for the forty-four hour week has been drafted by the ministry of social affairs and submitted to the other ministries concerned. The forty-four hour week has been introduced in the offices of the sickness fund under the auspices of the national social service institute. In Danzig the forty-four hour week has been applied to government departments and public services. In Denmark a committee was set up to examine the matter and to report in time for the possible introduction of legislation when parliament met in October. In France a bill has been introduced in the chamber of deputies in favour of the forty hour week. The Minister of Labour, Mr. Dalimier, has stated that he will urge that the question of the forty hour week be placed on the agenda of the next international labour conference. In Germany a decree of June 30, 1931, authorized the federal government to reduce hours of work to forty in the week in those industries where such a reduction was technically possible. Recently, by circular of June 17, 1932, the Minister of Labour caused committees to be set up in each state to study the question, and the regulation of hours of work by arbitral award is contemplated as a possibility in certain cases. In Italy, as Mr. de Michelis states in his letter,—and I may observe by the way that Mr. de Michelis is the official representative of the Italian government at the International Labour Office—the National Council of Corporations on June 15, 1932, adopted a resolution proposing that the possibility of a compulsory reduction of hours of work to forty per week in all administrations and undertakings should be considered as rapidly as possible with a view to the conclusion of definite agreements of an international character. In Poland a bill enabling the government in times of economic depression to reduce hours of work so as to distribute employment over a larger number of workers was adopted by the Diet and the Senate. Further, a bill has been submitted with a view to limiting hours of work to forty in the week, and the Minister of Labour has drafted a bill to reduce hours of work to forty in the week in the case of certain classes of salaried employees, including bank and insurance clerks. This bill has been submitted to the National Association of Industry, Mining and Commerce. And in the United States there is a very definite move on the part of the Americans, in their practical way, to bring about a further reduction in the hours of labour in the industries of that country. Recently I read that this move had received the endorsation of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

I think it can be conclusively proved that unemployment is no longer an effect of the depression but is a cause of its intensification. We have tried the old ways of meeting the problem. We have cut wages, and right here I would observe that if low wages were the basis of success of any country, then India and China would be the most successful nations in the world today. We have cut down services. At present before the Canadian Senate a committee is sitting on the same subject which has been inquired into by the Duff commission, and should the policies suggested by that commission be carried out it would simply mean the throwing of 20,000 men on the labour market.

Frankly, I think we should attack this problem on the two main fronts. We should attack it, on one front, from the point of view of currency, and on the industrial front from the point of view of mass production. We should be realists in this regard. In my judgment we should take the responsibility that rightfully belongs to us in an effort to carry out not only the declarations made by members of the present government in the last election but the wish, I am sure, of all parties in this house.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): It was not my desire, nor is it now, to make any extensive remarks with regard to this problem, but the problem is of such magnitude, there are so many industrial workers in my constituency, there are so many farmers who are really suffering in this depression, that I consider it imperative to make some contribution to this debate.

I wish first, as a Conservative representing a riding which has a large labour complexion, to congratulate the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), my neighbour, upon the speech he delivered in this house with reference to this matter. It was a reasonable speech; it was a humane speech and as a Conservative and supporter of the government I think it is only just and proper to say that on many occasions the hon. member for North Winnipeg espouses the same cause and speaks in the same way as I desire to speak, especially when he has humanity for his client, as we have all here this afternoon in this matter.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): There has been a good deal of talk in this house about the promises of the Prime Minister. I believe that this country is absolutely sick and tired of this parade of promises—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): —and I am addressing this remark particularly to the Liberal benches in this house. If you look at the performance of the Prime Minister in this greatest of all world depressions; when you think of the energy he has expended; when you realize the amount of money that has been gathered from the taxpayers of the country at a time when it is hard to pay taxes, I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people who are for the most part fairminded, will regard the Prime Minister, in the midst of this world depression, as being in a sense absolved from specific performance if he honestly, courageously and energetically tries to solve this problem as he has tried.

Last evening when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) was speaking on the question, I made a few calculations in mental arithmetic, and I reached the immense sum of $186,000,000 that had been gathered by this policy from the municipalities and from the provinces, and the money expended by this government towards the relief of the unemployed. I remember also that the Minister of Labour stated that 850,000 souls in this country were at the present time living on direct relief. It was no mean achievement, Mr. Speaker, by the shores of Galilee, when 5,000 people were fed; and it is no mean achievement in this day and under present conditions for 850,000 Canadians to be cared for by the organs of government in this country. There is a tendency on the part of some people to laugh at any scriptural quotation, and the remark was made this very day, that when the Prime Minister observed last evening that, "the poor ye have always with you," he was trying to invoke the aid of scripture to buttress up a weak argument. He was not doing any such thing. He was trying to proclaim an eternal truth which was stated long years ago by one whom most of us call the Master of Life and who had a capacity for understanding truth.

I do not want in any utterance this afternoon to play politics. I do not expect that I shall ever again be a member of this house, but I think that this problem is altogether too serious for any such speech as the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) made this afternoon.

Mr. YOUNG: Or the Minister of Labour, last night.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The hon. member will pardon me, but I am speaking of the former Minister of Labour. He made merely a political effort. I feel sure the labouring people of this country will find more in the speech of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) than they will in the speech of the former Minister of Labour.

Mr. SANDERSON: Or in the speech of the Minister of Labour of the present government.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): There is one idea which I should like to put forth. The Prime Minister of this country exercises perhaps more power than has any other prime minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): There is no doubt in your mind, Mr. Speaker, or in mine, that he absolutely dominates this parliament—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Hon. members say "hear, hear." He dominates this parliament not only by his energy but by his capacity, genius and devotion to the interests of this country.

Mr. SANDERSON: He is the whole government.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No hon. member on the other side can stand up and say that the member for Selkirk has been bought and paid for. I took it upon myself last session to stand up in this house and vote against the Prime Minister and the government. I had the satisfaction of speaking to the Prime Minister afterwards and having him say: I believe you did the right thing as far as you were concerned.

Mr. SANDERSON: He was only fooling.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I want to give the lie right here and now to the idea that this is a muzzled party, that we are not free. As far as I am concerned, if I should come to the conclusion that it would be in the interests of this country and in the interests of the workers or the unemployed to vote against this government, I would do it tomorrow.

Mr. GOTT: That is more than the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) would do.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I should like to refer to another effort made by this government, the measure which parliament was called to discuss this session—I refer to the imperial trade agreements. If the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) were in his place I should like to say to him quietly, humbly and kindly that I am proud to be a Conservative, I am proud to be here in this house and to have registered my vote in favour of imperial consolidation and reconstruction. There are many hon. members on both sides of the house who believe in and who love and reverence the British Empire not because we have, shall I say, prejudices of blood, but because we believe that the word "British" stands for freedom, because we believe that it stands for progress and because we believe that the world can get out of the impasse in which it now finds itself only under the leadership of the British Empire which is presided over by such progressive statesmen as Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Baldwin.

I believe that these agreements offer the only remaining way in which we may solve our economic difficulties, but I say, fearlessly and unafraid, that the benefits of these treaties will not accrue to the workers and farmers of this country until the exchange situation has been remedied. I should like to tell the eastern representatives and the people of eastern Canada a little about the situation which exists in the agricultural west. Considerable debate occurred last year with regard to the ten per cent cut in salaries and indemnities, but how would hon. members like to get a seventy-five or eighty per cent cut? The government statistics reveal beyond dispute that the income of the western wheat farmer has been reduced by seventy-five to eighty per cent. If you have an income of $1,200 per year and have that income cut down by seventy-five per cent, you are left with $300. Hon. members can see the problem which is facing western agriculture. They would have some conception of the conditions which exists if they went through the wheat growing areas, if they saw the people working almost without hope of reward, going bankrupt and wearing second hand clothing. This is the time when there should not be a mustering of the forces of party but rather a mustering of the forces of humanity. Whatever portion of this house best serves humanity, serves it honestly, fearlessly and in a humane way, that portion is living up to its duty and ought to be returned.

The suggestion has come from the other side that if we went to the country we would not be returned. It is my belief that the leader of this government and many of its members are more concerned with doing their duty to the people than they are thinking of being returned at the next elections.

Another question which should be grappled with is that concerning currency. We have seen the results of the action taken by the American government in raising its tariff. Hon. members know and must admit in their reasonable and non-political moments that the only avenue by which we could hope to reestablish our trade was through imperial channels. We have sought to open up those channels but money is the blood of trade and with our money being at a premium of twenty-five per cent in terms of British currency, we have a tariff, or a wall if you like, which offers almost an impassable obstruction. I want to say publicly in this house that if this wall is not demolished, we are going to remain as we are now, in the straitjacket of international finance and chained helplessly to the gold standard.

There is one matter which might have been discussed at the imperial conference, the matter of the shortening of the hours of labour. We hope to increase our trade through our imperial connections but we ought to realize that the forces of production have been increasing and were increasing before the war to such an extent that even the international trade of England was being decreased. If we realize the power of the human race at the present time to manufacture goods and to grow crops we must realize that this problem of the lessening of the hours of labour must be faced. I believe that we should face it and a beginning can be made by the British Empire.

My main reason in speaking this afternoon was to deal with what might be called the adequacy of relief. I do not believe that any reasonable Canadian expects this government during this depression to provide work for all Canadians. There are some who believe socialism would help. I believe the only persons who can make that statement are individuals who really believe men and women are not primarily interested in themselves, but have become impelled more by social mass interest than by self-interest. I believe they fail to recognize that the great force which has brought the world up to its present standard is that of individual initiative, the force of free men working out their salvation industrially, morally and spiritually, by relying upon their own energy and by working in compliance with the eternal laws of God, for we all subscribe to the doctrine that man was made free. There is no use in our flying in the face of those principles. By talking about new money, by talking about cooperation, we may gain votes in our constituencies; we may return here during this terrific depression while the mass of the nation is restive and dissatisfied, but we are not going to cure the problem in that way. Every man who faces this situation ought to recognize that the system which we have, this competitive, capitalistic system, is the truest, most undisguised and least hypocritical expression of humanity as it is. How did it come into existence? It was not devised; it was not foreordained; it was not planned; it was human beings working upon the forces of nature and expressing themselves. It may be that by preaching doctrines and nostrums which are at variance with humanity as it is, you may reap a political reward, but that is not going to solve our problems or enable us to grapple with the situation.

Now, as to the inadequacy of relief, I brought this question up last year in the house when I received word from West Kildonan, which is a suburb of Winnipeg in which for the last two years between 650 and 700 people have been living on direct relief, that the sustenance provided for the unemployed was not sufficient to maintain health and that it was likely to leave the unemployed in a permanently unemployable condition. I want to say this—and perhaps if I say it more quietly hon. members will listen to me; if I lower my voice, they will have some regard for the statement—no matter what we do by way of law in this country; no matter what treaties are originated here; not matter what agreements are made, if a policy of humanity is not pursued sufficient to maintain the health, strength and vigour of our Canadian unemployed and their children, this government and this commons will be forgotten. I do not expect to change the world. Years ago I did have that idea; when I came to this house I had some conception of the superposition that I would hold, of the extraordinary power I would have, but I have come to this conclusion that just as I was merely number 667 among half a million men in the expeditionary force, I am only one-two-hundred-and-forty-fifth, and hardly that, of this assemblage.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We all sympathize with the hon. member.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I do not need the hon. gentleman's sympathy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I needed some when I was a young member.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): When I was interrupted, I was speaking about the inadequacy of relief. Before I left home I went to the municipal secretary and I said: "Will you give me the names of twenty-four families who have been living on direct relief for a year or more?" I knew none of the people that I visited. I took twelve of the names and I went with the medical officer to their homes. Let me say this, that the bravest battle that was ever fought and that is being fought in this country today is that being waged by the fathers and the mothers who are unemployed and are trying to bring up their families and to get through this depression. Those people are the unsung, unknown heroes of Canada today. Just to give an example, in one home to which I went a new baby had arrived. There had been a caesarian birth. Does the house know what that woman was doing? She was giving up part of the meagre rations that were allowed to her to sustain her life, so that oranges might be purchased for that little child. I went to another home where a man and his wife were living in very small quarters. This was a man who had been a valued workman, one who had been in charge of a construction camp, who had not been able to obtain employment for eighteen months. He said to me: "Mr. Stitt, how long is this going to last? I have tried to get work, and I've walked the streets. I walked them day after day. I asked for employment. But I cannot walk just as far as I could a year and a half ago." I said: "How is that?" "Well," he said, "I have to give some of the relief that I get to that boy who is not up to the ordinary physical standard."

There is no use in multiplying these cases; there is no use in exposing them in the house unless something is done. As a lawyer I know we have our constitutional limitations; but one of the peculiarities of the whole situation is this, that everything or almost everything is being left to Mr. Bennett and the Bennett government. I believe that the Prime Minister and his government should be given credit for utilizing the constitution in such a way as to make even those organs of government which are not responsive to the situation play their part and do their bit.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the hon. member for Selkirk if he is prepared to run in the next general election as a Bennett candidate?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I have not the gift of prophecy. Like every politician, like every man who is honest, I may change my mind. I may run as a Bennett candidate; I may not run as any candidate; I may not want to run, but after the spectacle which I saw yesterday, I do not think there is any possibility of my running as a Liberal candidate.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the same question with the word "independent" inserted?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Yes, I might run as an independent. One cannot tell. I am an independent right now, supporting the Conservative government, supporting the Prime Minister, because if there had not been at the head of this country a man of affairs who knew something about banking and industry, who had the fearless courage to stand up and save an insurance company when certain people on the Liberal side were trying to demolish it, what would have happened to Canada if the organs of finance and government had broken down? I say I do not care about coming back to this house either as an independent or anything else. The only thing I care about is that Canadians who need help and who ought to be preserved, receive it.

Just think of it, 850,000 Canadians putting up this battle today! We spent millions and billions on 500,000 Canadians engaged in a war of destruction—a necessary war, I admit—but surely we can so work through our constitution that we can loan or grant money in order that these people may receive balanced rations and be adequately cared for.

My words, Mr. Speaker, have not been uttered as they ought to have been, nor have my thoughts been clothed in the language by which I should wish to express them. I went to the fields of Flanders in 1914, a lover of humanity. I came to this house largely because I wished to serve the working people of my constituency, and I came here still a lover of humanity. I am not a destructionist; I hope I am not an opportunist; but I say that the great thing we need today is cooperation and kindliness and humanity. In the great fight which our fellow-Canadians are making with such splendid courage I think that every Christian man and woman will honour this government and any man who will try to ameliorate their conditions and raise them if possible out of the low estate into which they have fallen, through no fault of their own. If we would but apply the golden rule preached to a distraught world by the Master 1932 years ago, could we not achieve the hope of His heart and the dream of all just men which He uttered when He said, "I came that men might have life and that they might have it more abundantly."

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I listened very attentively last night to the highly documented and well delivered address of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). It is needless for me to say that I am absolutely in favour of anything that may be done by the government or the Department of Labour to alleviate the dire distress of the Canadian people. I also find myself in hearty agreement with the announcement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), yesterday that he was going to call an interprovincial conference to discuss certain social questions. At the same time I hope that the government will not fail to give leadership to such a conference in many of these important problems. I have in mind more particularly unemployment insurance. No doubt some of the provinces are not in a financial position today to start a system of unemployment insurance. I repeat that I hope that the federal government will take the leadership in this important matter.

There are two questions with which I wish to deal particularly, direct relief, and the back to the land movement. The Minister of Labour said last night that the present system of direct relief is only a palliative, that it is not to be a permanent feature of our national life. Every citizen of this country will agree and hope that that is the case. I am speaking more particularly for the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house, and I must say that direct relief is not giving satisfaction because it does not go to the root of the present depression. Direct relief is not curing unemployment. It is not making people happy, and that applies not only in my own section but throughout Canada, for the very good reason that many deserving people, although the government is willing to help them, when they cannot find work and are actually in need of relief, will not apply for it. I wish to say on behalf of the government that in northern Ontario the distribution of direct relief is handled entirely apart from the political machinery. But at the same time quite a number of people who are willing and ready to work and cannot find it are too proud to ask for bread and butter.

I have great sympathy with the last speaker. He spoke of the wonderful character of the people of his constituency and of the courage they were showing in these trying times. I believe the same can be said of the people throughout northern Ontario, and indeed in all parts of Canada. But under the system of direct relief the morale of our people is suffering. There are more people today who do not work than there were two years ago.

Let me ask why it was that this government decided last session that direct relief should be provided instead of work. I do not think an adequate explanation has ever been given. In northern Ontario there are important undertakings to be carried out by manual labour which should be financed jointly by the province and the federal government. We had the spectacle of parliament passing resolutions and statutes last session providing for direct relief, but actually the principle of direct relief is not being applied in northern Ontario. What is done there is this: People are given an order to get goods, whether it is provisions or clothing, at the stores. They are given scrip for which they have to work. For instance, if a man receives an order for ten dollars' worth of goods at the store he is compelled to work five days at two dollars a day, and then at the end of that time he is not given any money, but simply the scrip. I do not think that was the intention of the law that we put on the statute books last session. I think it was at all events implied in that legislation that the money would be given direct with no strings attached. I wish to repeat that there is no politics in the distribution of direct relief in northern Ontario. My point is that direct relief in the shape of money is not given. A man requires more than food in order to live. He must have clothing, boots and shoes, and medicine, and I maintain that when a man is made to work he should be given good Canadian currency instead of scrip, so that he can buy the necessaries of life he likes.

As the previous speaker said, I do not want to make any political capital out of the present situation, but I think it is the duty of every hon. member to bring to the attention of the government any anomalies that have come to his attention. I would also point out that the scrip which is given to those seeking relief is not negotiable. Naturally the storekeepers are always glad to receive orders from the government because they consider the government is safe to deal with, and so it is, but several storekeepers in my part of the country have had to wait for three solid months for their money from the government, and some of them are good Conservatives at that. It is working to the injury of the retail trade in our section. I shall not criticize the government for distributing these orders through the channels of retail trade. I believe it is right in some sections to give the majority of these orders to retailers. But let me point out that in 1919 the federal government appointed a commission to make an inquiry throughout Canada. Speaking before that commission as a retail merchant, I said that no men were suffering at that time for the very good reason that the retailers were extending special credits to their needy customers. The same principle applies today. We speak of the working men suffering, but we must remember that along with them retail traders are suffering. Go into retail store offices today and you will find ten of millions of dollars on their books which they never expect to collect. I will go further: A single retailer will not allow a man to go without having something to eat for the following day.

I have no doubt the Minister of Finance will try to remedy the condition, because he has some power over it. I have no doubt he will take steps to see that those scrips given to retailers and wholesalers by people receiving aid, are made negotiable, and that arrangements are made to have them payable at least once a month. If those orders were negotiable retailers and traders could cash them with their bankers, thereby establishing better credit under special circumstances. At least in my section of the country direct relief has not struck at the root of the difficulty. However, as a loyal Canadian citizen I told my people to accept direct relief, and to try to apply it.

No doubt the human element enters into it; no doubt in the application of the principle adopted by the government some people will suffer. I believe the governments either provincial or federal, are bound to do their utmost to relieve the present situation. There is one other point to which I should like to direct the attention of hon. members. I have no doubt the high officials in Ontario want to be fair, so far as the distribution of direct relief is concerned. The fact is, however, that some men are placed in charge who do not fully realize the settlers' problems. The moment they step into their little offices the farmer or settler finds it impossible to have access to them. Those men, who are supposed to have full knowledge of conditions, are not familiar with them. In the new section of the country from which I come it is impossible for any one to know the exact situation unless he goes over the ground himself. In northern Ontario there are farmers who need relief, but through pride, and as true Canadians, they will not go and ask for it. Government provisions should make it possible to have travelling inspectors who would make it their business to go into every section of the country and make personal inquiries.

I speak feelingly in connection with this subject because, unhappily, most of the districts are unorganized. Many municipalities such as that of Moonbeam, Machin, Shackleton, and so forth, and some municipalities in the constituency of the Minister of Labour, have not the money to extend to the settlers the direct relief to which they are entitled.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRADETTE: When the house took recess, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking sincerely and from personal knowledge of some of the defects of the application of direct relief in my own section of the country. I also attempted to show some ways in which the situation could be remedied. From the beginning of my remarks I have kept in mind that, as the Minister of Labour said, the government really is trying to alleviate the situation so far as is humanly possible. One statement made by the minister last evening pleased me a very great deal; it appears on page 1465 of Hansard:

> . . . there is no reason today why any person in the dominion should go without food, without fuel and without shelter, because the municipalities are bearing their share of the burden and bearing it manfully.

Of course the suggestion is made that the provinces and the dominion also are bearing their share of the burden manfully. I said before six o'clock, however, that in my section of the country there will be suffering, not so much from lack of shelter as from lack of food and clothing during the coming winter.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): Where?

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not like to have such a reflection made by any hon. member of the house. It is no pleasure for me to mention certain dire conditions which exist in my own constituency, but I believe it to be my duty, as well as the duty of every hon. member of the house, to bring matters of this kind to the attention of the government. I am doing it the more readily because I realize that the government want to remedy such situations, and we want the government to realize the conditions as we find them. Before six o'clock I said that the people of Canada do not want to become mendicants. They want to stand on their own feet; they want to work out their own salvation as far as that is possible, so I hope this relief is only an emergency measure and that before next summer some way will be found to provide work for the people in every section of the country.

Now I wish to come back for a few moments to the election of 1930. I am not going to open up the old wound by mentioning the promises that were made; I think they are well before the people at the present time. One of the promises made in my own constituency, as well as in the constituency represented by my friend the Minister of Labour, was the promise to build a trans-Canada highway. So far as I know only a few minor repairs to the Ferguson highway from North Bay to Cochrane and west to Hearst have been carried on, and no real work has been done on the important connecting links. I have no quarrel with other sections of Canada; I am not envious because thousands of men have been working in the camps in the Ottawa valley, but the fact remains that the implicit promise was made by the Minister of Labour during his campaign. I know he has done his best to fulfil that promise, but nothing very much has resulted. This is work that could have been carried on last summer, last fall and this winter.

There is another highway which should be constructed. I believe this is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but I think with the help of the federal government a highway should be constructed from Sudbury to Timmins, to provide communication between those two mining centres. The population of the Porcupine district is in the neighbourhood of twenty thousand people, who have been trying for the last ten years to have that highway constructed. I think that rather than put people on the dole or give them direct relief they should be put to work to provide some communication between southern and northern Ontario.

There is still another highway which I believe should be given consideration; that is a highway from Cochrane to La Reine in Quebec. For many years an anomalous condition existed in northern Ontario; direct communication with the province of Quebec was absolutely lacking until the Ferguson highway was built. In Cochrane, in Kapuskasing, in Iroquois Falls and in Timmins we have been agitating for years to have the provincial government build that road, which will be only forty-two miles in length, to provide communication with La Reine on the Quebec side. I believe this is the time to go ahead with that work.

Mr. MALONEY: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, coming from an Ontario constituency myself, I wish my hon. friend would indicate the route the trans-Canada should follow.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows very well that an interjection of this kind is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. BRADETTE: I agree with the Minister of Labour, who promised that the trans-Canada highway would go through the northern section of Ontario.

Mr. MALONEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member addressing the house gives his permission, an interruption may not be made.

Mr. MALONEY: I am seeking information; I shall be so glad to get the ideas of my hon. friend. We are very anxious to have that trans-Canada highway, and if the hon. member can suggest the proper route let us have it.

Mr. BRADETTE: I certainly have no quarrel with the hon. member because the trans-Canada highway passes through his constituency; I hope in the future he will have no quarrel with me if it passes through my constituency as well. There are many fire hazards in northern Ontario in connection with which many men could be given work. This would prevent a recurrence of the fires that from time to time have visited Cochrane, Timmins and Haileybury, the home of the Minister of Labour. All those who live in northern Ontario know of several of these hazards; everyone knows of the dread of the people of Rouyn, Porcupine and even the Timmins district from fire during last summer. I believe useful work could be done in this connection.

I believe that in the matter of the relief of single men northern Ontario has been slighted. I have seen many instances of poor settlers who, because they were single men, could not obtain relief, and I do not think that is right. I have no time to explain why there are so many single men in that part of the country, but I do not believe any difference should be made between different classes of people following the same occupation. I believe hundreds of young men could be given employment this winter and next spring in removing the fire hazards of which I spoke, which are well known to the Minister of Labour and to everyone else who has visited the northern part of Ontario.

I want to compliment the government on the work they intend to carry on in connection with airports, which will result in the employment of many single men. I do think the wages to be paid are too small, but these men will be given some work, and that is one of the proper things to do. This work is extended to northern Ontario as well; we have not such a large population, but we have many men who could be employed in this work, and I think this request should be given due consideration. I know the Minister of Labour well enough to be sure that he has already brought up that point in the cabinet.

There is one other matter with which I should like to deal at some length, because I have it very much at heart. I refer to the policy of the government with regard to the back to the land movement. I mention this matter because I am heartily in favour of anything that will help the agricultural classes and reduce unemployment in the urban centres. Last evening the Minister of Labour, dealing with the matter, found it possible to take a roundabout way in mentioning the amount of money to be spent in connection with this scheme. He said that $1,385,675 had been spent, and said he did not believe any member of this house could criticize that expenditure. Then, however, he went on to deal with the immigration policies of the former government. At page 1466 of Hansard I find the following statement by the minister:

> Let me point out to the house something which I think is often overlooked. During the period from 1919 to March 31, 1932, this government spent in its immigration department the sum of $36,718,454.97.

That paragraph can be interpreted as a reflection upon the late government, but I submit that no hon. gentleman on the other side of the house can criticize that administration so far as immigration is concerned. I may say that I for one have protested time and time again against the bringing in of too many immigrants and placing them on the land, people whom it was humanly impossible to mantain there. That is why I resent that paragraph. I cannot make anything out of it but a reflection on the Liberal party and on the late government. But the hon. gentleman went a little further:

> Hon. gentlemen opposite may say: Oh, well, we are not all to blame because others on this side of the house, when the positions were reversed, advocated the same thing. I have searched the records and I find that when hon. members on this side were in opposition they advocated the encouraging of people to come and settle upon our lands to consolidate those lands which were served by the railways of Canada.

Well, I have been in the house for some time and I do not need to go very far to find utterances of hon. gentlemen now sitting on the government benches who, when they were in opposition, advocated a more extensive immigration policy for Canada, criticizing the former government not only for days but for weeks, because they were not bringing more people into the country to settle on our vast lands. Take for instance a statement made by one of the leaders of the Conservative party, a former member for Vancouver North, General McRae. On March 9, 1928, the organizer for the Conservative party made a speech in the house in which he proposed the expenditure of $300,000,000 for the purpose of increasing immigration. He proposed to take 50,000 acres of government owned lands in the west, scrub land, clear 80 acres on every quarter section at an estimated cost of $12.50 per acre, and on these lands he was going to put 300,000 settlers, a settler to each quarter section. The government was to build a house, a stable and outbuildings at a cost of $500 each. This scheme was actually discussed seriously in the house by the Conservative party and on March 22, 1929, General McRae repeated and emphasized his remarks. Surely the Minister of Labour will realize that even today there is no railway accommodation in the Peace River district, where the then member for Vancouver North, wanted to put these immigrants. That gentleman made the following remarks on the date I have just given:

Last year, in response to the Minister's request, I made bold to submit to this house a definite colonization program, but owing to an accident, I was unable to appear before the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

He said that he would stick to his original proposal, which he believed would be a good idea for the country, although the plan apparently did not meet with the approval of the government. He went on to say:

I proposed last year that the government issue land bonds against their expenditure on such a development. I gave as the maximum required $300,000,000 for a ten year program, as an average of $30,000,000 per year.

Later on he made this statement:

I presume the hon. member agrees that we must increase our population. My idea of the only place it can be increased is on the land.

I come now to the views expressed by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). As reported at page 2892 of Hansard of May 28, 1929, the hon. gentleman said:

But I do not see how you can possibly handle immigration without an adequate organization, and certainly I cannot endorse any such idea as that this magnificent country should put up its shutters and close its doors completely, taking the stand: "We have great resources; let us hang on to them and keep other people out." Surely, we have a more encouraging conception of Canada's future greatness. I personally do not understand the attitude taken by the hon. member for Battle River and by the minister himself.

Finally, we have the views expressed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who stated his very definite attitude to this matter in a speech which he delivered in the house on June 7, 1928, as reported at page 3923 of Hansard:

And I want to place myself upon record that it is a fallacy to believe that the bringing of more people into Canada means the cheapening of labour and the lowering of the high standard of living of those who are here. History teaches us that if you get people settled in a country you are making work. Every time you bring a new productive person into the country, whether he be productive by his hands or his brains, if you are unifying your efforts, you are already opening up new avenues of work. That has been the history of other countries, and I am sure it will be the history of this country.

Time and again hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were on this side of the house criticized the late government with regard to the rigour of medical examinations of immigrants. I remember the junior member for Halifax taking the government to task for deporting a single person from Canada. That will give the house an idea of the position taken by hon. gentlemen at that time on the question of immigration.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this subject affords no room for criticism on the part of any party in this house. The Minister of Railways, speaking in northern Ontario on one occasion, made the statement that Canada should be the mecca for all the surplus population of the globe. I believe the Minister of Labour wishes to be fair, and I suggest that if he had taken the trouble to study the situation closely he would not have found it possible in his speech last evening to leave the false impression which he created. Coming to his own figures, I will quote what the hon. gentleman said at page 1467 of Hansard:

But in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1932, immigration to Canada dropped to 25,752.

I have in my hand a clipping from one of the Montreal newspapers today, in which it is said that in the port of Quebec alone last summer 30,000 people came in; so that if 30,000 immigrants entered that port alone during the past summer it is safe to assume that we shall have 100,000 new immigrants at the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what it said.

Mr. BRADETTE: I will read the article:

30,000 immigrants entered by Quebec.

Quebec, 22. (P.C.).—The number of immigrants who arrived in Canada by the port of Quebec in the course of the present navigation season was a little less than that of the preceding season, according to an estimate of Abbe Philippe Casgrain, chaplain of the port. Abbe Casgrain, who is preparing for a tour in the Canadian west, believes that there will be 30,000 new immigrants this year.

Taking that figure as the basis for other ports in Canada, we can assume that at the end of the fiscal year 1932-33 the number of immigrants who will have come into the country will be about 100,000. I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, that those who live in glass houses should refrain from throwing stones. There is another statement made by the minister on this matter. Speaking of immigrants, who, he said, in most instances found their way to the urban centres, he said:

In passing let me say that very large numbers of the immigrants to whom I have referred are good workmen. The first criticism I have to make is that they are not on our lands, they are in our industrial centres; my next criticism is that their coming here was not so regulated that we could at least exclude the major portion of those who are today the instrument contributing largely to the sentiment growing up in Canada condemning their compatriots who are trying to make good.

I believe that statement could be interpreted in several different ways, but to some extent it can be regarded as a reflection on people who are now good Canadians. Only last fall about 500 foreigners took out naturalization papers in my section of the country alone, and those people will be first class Canadians. The ex-Minister of Labour saw for himself in the section of Iroquois Falls, on the occasion of a Labour Day celebration, several young athletes, boys and girls, who although they bore the so-called foreign names, were born and bred Canadians and proud of their nationality.

I think the Minister of Labour has a better knowledge of this situation than anyone in the province of Ontario. In our section of the country we have a wonderful rural settlement of Poles, Lithuanians, Czechoslovakians and Russians. These people have been placed on the land and will remain there. We also have settlements of people who have come from England, similar to the community near Hunta. Hundreds of English families have settled and will remain on the land. It may be true that eventually there is a sifting back to the city but the Minister of Labour should not allow the impression to go forth that all the immigrants brought to Canada during the past thirteen years have found their way to the urban centres. The argument which I am putting forth will apply still more forcibly to the western provinces, where hundreds of families have remained on the land and become good Canadian citizens.

As the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) has said, we should try to keep away from a political viewpoint in the discussion of such a serious matter. However, statements have been made which cast reflection upon certain sections of this house and I think it is the duty of hon. members to put the matter in the proper light.

I do not think a single member of this house or a single citizen of this country will criticize this government for what it has spent on the land settlement scheme. The total expenditure is not quite a million and a half dollars. However, I do not believe that any governmental scheme for land settlement will prove to be beneficial to any section of the country unless assistance is provided by the federal or provincial government. But it must be admitted that this scheme as it is being worked out under the present regulations is a step in the right direction.

Certain citizens from Ottawa were sent to the districts of Englehart and New Liskeard, and found it impossible to remain on the land. But we cannot single out only failures because there are quite a number that succeed. However, I believe that this back to the land scheme under the present administration may prove to be workable. In Ontario we are trying out a scheme which I believe will prove to be beneficial to all concerned. A small party has been settled on the land a few miles south of the town of Hearst in the district of Cochrane, and also at Rivière Solitaire in Quebec. They have been placed on the same concessions where they have good road accommodation, stores, schools, post offices and churches. This principle is being carried out also in the province of Quebec.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member has asked several questions. I do not mind hon. members asking me proper questions—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Smith) may not insist upon his question unless the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) permits it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Go ahead.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): Is the hon. member opposed to the attitude taken by the government in connection with relief for the unemployed?

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member must have been absent when I was speaking, otherwise he would have known that I am in favour of the actions taken by the government although I believe that they did not go far enough.

I maintain that the action taken by the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario should be carried out in other sections of the country. These people should be placed as closely together as possible; they should be settled in the same townships in order that they could erect schools and have the benefit of other necessary facilities. A few years ago strenuous objections were raised to the work of our missionaries, but I believe in this back to the land scheme the missionary, whether Protestant or Catholic, is needed. The hon. member for Selkirk mentioned the wonderful fortitude with which our people are facing their difficulties, but I believe that that is primarily because they are of the Christian faith and have listened to the teachings of their missionaries, their priests and their ministers.

An effort is being made to populate our rural sections with assistance being given by the federal and provincial governments. The people already on the land cannot find a living, yet others are being placed on the land and no assistance is being provided. The Minister of Labour stated yesterday that the people from the rural districts were going into the urban settlements. No doubt many who are now on the land at the present time will return to the urban centres, when conditions improve, but the best way to keep people upon the land is to make prosperous the primary holders of that land. I know if the settlers in my own section could make a profitable living, others would come in from the larger centres of population. At the present time these larger centres attract the people because the distribution of charity is better organized.

I believe the government is sincere in its effort to help the rural population in the newer centres, but it should carry out the land clearing bonusing scheme for which we have been agitating in northern Ontario for the last fifteen years, and with which I think the Minister of Labour is in sympathy. I would suggest that a bonus of $25 per acre be given for each acre put into cultivation. Such a bonus would prove to be of great assistance to these people. The government of Ontario is ready to grant a bonus to the settlers of that province provided assistance is given by the federal government. Should such a system be put into effect I venture to prophesy that every new settler in northern Ontario would be satisfied with his lot. This would bring about a movement from the urban to the rural sections. It is the duty of this government to see that our rural population is prosperous.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): Isn't that a provincial matter?

Mr. BRADETTE: I said it was a provincial matter but I said also that in a case of national distress, the national government should help.

It is not my intention to repeat the points raised during the last election, but there is one matter to which I should like to refer. I have brought this matter up several times since the election, but as it affects northern Ontario most particularly, I think it should be brought up again. I refer to the lack of market which we have for our pulpwood. If the settlers in my section of the country could find a ready and reasonable market for their products they would need no help from any government. I appeal again to this house to ask if it is not possible to get the United States to enlarge its market for this product of northern Ontario. During the last election the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), and a minister of the Ontario government said that they would do everything to stop the exportation of pulpwood into the United States. As I have said before, so far as the settlers are concerned, their finished product is pulpwood; they can go no further in the manufacturing process.

Before I conclude, may I say that I hope the government will do its utmost to study and understand the problems of the people of my section of the country. We have been told that the government is going to call an interprovincial conference. We have come to the time when guidance should be given by the government, when direction should be given by leaders of finance, economics, commerce, and labour and I venture to say that the Canadian people, realizing that efforts are being made to solve their problems, will bear in fortitude the present conditions in the belief that eventually their problems will be solved, and that in the meantime they are receiving the consideration that they fully deserve.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly pleased the other evening when the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) moved the resolution in connection with unemployment, and I was also glad to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) state that the government did not wish to curtail or would not curtail discussion on this subject. I listened also with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister today when he spoke of projects on which the government were working and which would probably be laid before parliament when we meet again in January. One of them, in connection with unemployment insurance, should meet with the approval of every hon. member. Unemployment insurance is good not only for the country as a whole but for the industrial workers and the industrialists as well. I am sorry such a measure was not introduced many years ago when the country was in much better position to carry out unemployment insurance than it is at the present time. When one considers that those with money invested in industry can in ordinary times make profits on inflated book values, pay interest and lay by surpluses, including money for depreciation and all other purposes, surely some thought should be given to the poor worker who at times receives in wages merely a pittance, a bare subsistence, who in time of sickness does not draw wages or salary, and who, when he gets old and becomes of no more use or service to his master, is discarded; he is not treated even as well as an old horse, because oftentimes an old horse is looked after until it dies. Surely in this day and generation we can give a little thought to the human element that helps in large measure to produce the wealth of our country.

I know many hon. members are anxious to return home; I know also we were summoned here for a special purpose in connection with the Ottawa conference trade agreements, but I sincerely believe, with destitution and unemployment such as they are today in Canada, we can very well afford to spend a good deal of time discussing this question which affects not only this country but the whole world. I am sorry some hon. members take, with regard to this depression, the view that was portrayed in a picture show to which I happended to go last Saturday evening, when a man speaking over the microphone was supposed to be talking about the depression. He said: "What is depression? Depression is a dent. What is a dent? A dent is a hole in the ground. What is a hole in the ground? Nothing." And he said: "What do I want to speak about nothing for?" It seems to me that at least some hon. members take that view, and say: what is the use of discussing this depression? I know the trade agreements are now practically through, but even if they accomplish all that the Prime Minister and the government expect them to do, it will take a good deal of time before even the benefits which they claim will accrue from them and will reach the masses of the people.

It is the immediate present and the coming winter in which I am particularly interested, and when one hears the figures as to the number of unemployed throughout the country, he must realize that those who are without work are more vitally interested in the present than in what may happen to Canada a year or two or three years hence. I was very much pleased this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) as well as some hon. members on this side, say in regard to the trade agreements that until our exchange situation is finally adjusted, no great good can accrue from them so long as Canada keeps in line with the United States in monetary matters.

I do not propose to rehash old political speeches. I am one of those who feel that many such speeches do not serve any useful purpose. They may at times contribute some heat, but I believe no useful end is served by delving into the realm of the past and throwing political epithets across the floor. In passing, however, I am going to make one remark, and it is in regard to a statement which the Prime Minister made in no uncertain terms the other day. He said that unemployment was primarily a municipal, secondarily a provincial, and after that a national problem. I think the country as a whole would have been better pleased had he and those who sit behind him adopted that strong, emphatic attitude in the early part of 1930, when that principle was enunciated to the house by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I know many hon. members then took the opposite view. I am not going to discuss the election cries that were raised, and the statements made that anything can be done in a national emergency. There is no use, however, in saying that this is not a national emergency, but something else, because the country as a whole looks upon it as a national emergency. It is a national emergency and it is up to the Dominion parliament to take a stronger stand and do more than it has so far done. I am sorry the Prime Minister would now make that emphatic opinion after being two and a half years in office. It would have been better had that stand been taken in the early part of 1930, because I well remember, as reeve of a municipality, the problem had been besetting us for nearly a year, and I think I can say safely there was hardly a reeve in British Columbia who did not consider that the situation was away beyond him at that time. We at least who were holding municipal office at that time were firmly convinced that it had then got beyond a municipal and provincial problem. We did not agree with those who took the attitude that it was not a national emergency.

I have listened to many tales of the early pioneers. I would just remind the house that, while all credit is due to the early pioneers, there is a difference between them and the pioneers of today, because today we have in almost every province pioneers equal to those of long ago. In the early days the mode of living was different from what it is today. If a man who went into the woods could find a deer and grow a few potatoes, and have flour, and so forth, he was well content. The wealth of people was, at least, not so prominently displayed as it is today. At the present time, however, conditions differ greatly. It is true the early pioneers toiled and moiled, but the earth, with the primitive tools they had, did not produce to the same degree or extent that it does today. Under present modern conditions the earth yields bountifully, in fact too much so. Some countries, and especially the one to the south of us, have been known to burn some of their crops in the hope of finding a better market for what remained. We have granaries full of food; in British Columbia we have farmers with their barns choked full of produce none of which they are able to sell or even barter. In the old days people were more self-sustaining. They went in then for trade and barter. A farmer obtaining clothing, sugar and so on for his produce. We have, however, got beyond that stage. In British Columbia, at least, the merchants will not or cannot take the goods which the farmer has to sell. There is absolutely no market. So he is really suffering just as much as the early pioneer, if not more, and his sufferings are more acute in that he sees great hoards of produce heaped up which he is unable to buy. We have everything in abundance. It is a famine in the midst of plenty. It is a condition for which we cannot blame God for it has been brought about by the ingenuity of man and by his inherent greed. Cheap as the goods are the buyer has not the means to purchase them just for want of a little bit of metal or a piece of paper, for want of what someone has called the bloodstream of our economic life. This country has an abundance of goods of all kinds, and what we are suffering from at the moment is a lack of distribution.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) speak before six o'clock in the strain he did. I would like to see more of our discussions carried on in the same dispassionate manner. My remarks on unemployment will I hope be along the same lines and be constructive rather than destructive.

I want to make some suggestions regarding relief as it is carried on in the province of British Columbia. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) yesterday and again today touched on some phases of the relief scheme. I have before me The Province, and in connection with some statements that it makes I want to offer a criticism which I think should be made in this house.

First of all I find that military camps are being established, into which single unemployed men are being taken, where they will do some work and are going to be drilled. This government cannot take the stand that all this is being entirely done by the province, that it is purely a provincial matter because in the case of a military camp I am sure the Minister of National Defence must have been consulted. I think it is a dangerous thing to do. The government is anticipating something that may never occur. To take unemployed men and train them as soldiers and then take them out against other unemployed is not very good business. I deprecate the idea, and I think I am not too severe when I say that that should not be done, particularly at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: What is my hon. friend's authority for saying that the government is putting unemployed in military camps and training them as soldiers?

Mr. REID: My authority, first of all, is that anything pertaining to a military or militia camp would come under the Dominion government. Then I read this:

> Mr. Lougheed announces the camp for unemployed militiamen will be at the end of Seventh and Eighth avenues, and the men will work at extending Chancellor boulevard to provide bus service to the university, via Seventh avenue.

Some work is going to be given them. Here is another paragraph which says:

> Entirely apart from its own merits the concentration of 300 trained militiamen in the Vancouver area is expected to have a salutary effect this winter, counteracting any tendency towards sabotage, such as made necessary last year the extra policing and patrol of the whole of the greater Vancouver area at considerable added cost to the city and the government.

I am reading from a paper that is published in my riding. The government must know that unemployed militia men are being put into the camp at Point Grey. The information I have is that they will work part time and devote the rest of the time to drill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If my hon. friend will permit me, he has an entirely erroneous idea of the matter.

Mr. REID: I sincerely hope that I am wrong and that the minister will be able to contradict that statement. But that was the information that reached me from the coast, and until it was corrected I thought that this was the proper place to bring it forward and criticize it. If such a thing is going on it should be known. I am personally against any such move, and I should be glad if when I am through the minister would explain just what the situation is.

Mr. GORDON: If my hon. friend will permit me to make an observation, the newspaper report which he is reading is absolutely and entirely wrong from beginning to end. It is another illustration of how much anxiety can be raised in the public mind by the reading of articles such as have been read by the hon. member. A casual inquiry from either the Department of Labour or the Department of National Defence by the hon. member would have entirely disabused even his mind of any such idea as is contained in that newspaper article. There is no thought of drilling the unemployed as soldiers in any way, shape or form, and I hope that the hon. member in future will try to get accurate information before making any such statements.

Mr. REID: I think it ill becomes the minister to make the remarks he has made, because I am quoting from The Province of Vancouver which bases its article on the statements of Mayor Taylor of Vancouver, and of the Hon. N. S. Lougheed, provincial Minister of Lands in British Columbia. If this article is not correct they are the men who should contradict it. The statements I have quoted appeared in one of our most prominent newspapers on the coast, and no contradiction of them has appeared as yet.

With reference to the back to the land movement, I realize that probably any scheme is better than no scheme at all, and I have no fault to find with part of the scheme whereby men may be established on the land. But I cannot altogether agree with the back to the land movement as it applies to the lower Fraser valley and the Pacific coast of British Columbia. I have in my hand the Langley Advance, a paper published in the midst of a farming area, in which the municipal council has called a mass meeting of all the citizens to discuss ways and means of taking care of the destitute—mark you, not the destitute unemployed—but destitute ranchers who have been settled there on what we call stump ranches of five- and ten-acre lots. I might say there are two classes of farming in British Columbia. One is carried on in the dry belt, and the other on the coast. On the coast, farming is done mostly on small acreage farms. If the scheme is to take people who are already poverty-stricken out into those districts, I think it should be looked into very carefully before any settlement is done, especially in a farming district where public meetings are being called for the purpose of relieving destitute ranchers and where I might say the reeve is going to retire because he cannot give any assistance to old friends of his who have been in the district for forty years and who now require assistance. I am not sure where they are going to be placed; the Pacific coast is a very general designation. There is no intimation just where these people will be located. It takes considerable money to establish them, and when we find that ranchers already in the district are destitute I think the scheme should be inquired into very carefully before the men are taken away from the cities and put on the land. No doubt the cities will be glad to let their unemployed go anywhere so long as they get out of the cities. It is said that the cities will take them back if they are unsuccessful as settlers. I doubt very much if they will, because, in the province of British Columbia, once a man gets into a municipality he becomes the responsibility of that municipality. Many of the municipalities are not backing up this scheme, and I want to assure the minister that many of those who are proposing this scheme in British Columbia have never attempted to do any of what is called in British Columbia stump ranching. I speak from experience. It is hard enough to go on a place that is cleared and keep it going without taking up land that is not cleared, even if you are given $600 to carry you over for the first two years. I notice that single men are being cared for, and in connection with their care the subject of camps has come under consideration. I believe the camps in British Columbia have been well constructed, but I do not like the idea of giving single men food and clothing, but with nothing to do. No farmer or business man would take an able-bodied man, give him his board and then let him sit around his home doing nothing. If an able-bodied man has any spirit, he wants to work. The fact is that many of the unemployed if only given a chance are willing to work. In my view to leave them idle will breed discontent. True, they may organize football teams and social clubs, but I do not like to think of our men being herded into camps with nothing to do but read books and play. I am opposed to handing out charity without having work done in return. In my view plenty of useful work could be done, and many of the unemployed are willing to do work in return for their board and lodging. It has been intimated to me, however, that no work has been expected from them, except the few chores around the tent.

Mr. GORDON: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I must say the statement he has just made is entirely incorrect. These men are placed in camps, comfortably housed and expected to do useful work. In order to relieve the hon. member's mind I say to him that even in the province of British Columbia, about which he feels so fearful, there has been a general desire to work on the part of the men, and work is being done by them.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to mention a little incident which came to my attention, but owing to the minister's remarks I am bound to do so. Today I received a letter from a gentleman in charge of a camp in British Columbia. He tells me that on one occasion a doctor was called to attend a sick man in one of the camps. Upon his arrival he found that hot water was necessary, and asked one of the unemployed men to get some, while he attended to the patient. The unemployed man replied, "We are not going to do work; we are not expected to do work. Go and get it yourself." I had not intended to relate that incident, but the minister has drawn it from me. I should be very happy to furnish him with further particulars, if he desires to have them.

Last evening the Minister of Labour discussed at great length the question of immigration. I want to make some comments in this connection, and to state that I am not as alarmed as the minister regarding this particular problem. I know from experience that about ninety per cent of the ranchers in the lower Fraser valley were in their earlier years industrial workers. They came to this country as bakers, electricians, and so on. They had a desire to get out into the country for themselves, and have become some of our most successful ranchers and farmers. No one can tell who will make a good settler or a successful immigrant. I know, however, that the Minister of Labour discussed at length the problem of the unemployed who come to the city. Probably I misinterpreted his remarks, but I noticed particularly that he gave figures for only those years in which the Liberals held power. While I know many evils did exist through the immigration policy of the late Liberal administration, yet I must say that most of the immigrants coming to this country were at least white settlers and could be assimilated into Canadian life, their children becoming good citizens later on. I would like to mention the damage done not only to British Columbia but to the whole of Canada when, during an earlier Conservative administration, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were allowed to bring in about 25,000 Chinamen to work on our railways. Then, from the years 1911 to 1921 about 31,000 Chinamen were allowed to come to Canada. When the Minister of Labour rises to speak I should like to have his views regarding that type of settler, and his opinion as to whether or not they will make good in Canada. I have always claimed the Chinese are an unassimilable race, and with the Japs, should have been kept out of Canada. They were first brought in during the construction period of the Canadian Pacific railway, and gained a foothold at that time. Word went back to the orient that this was a land of opportunity for the Chinaman, a man whose standard of living is as low as that of a galley slave. They came in by the hundreds. Today we find them not only on the land but practically controlling the business centre of the city of Vancouver.

[Mr. Gordon.]

I hold in my hand a report issued in 1927 by the legislative assembly of the province of British Columbia in which there are set out figures concerning orientals in British Columbia. These figures reveal that they are in practical control of almost all business in the city of Vancouver. The following table will serve to show the percentage of business held by Orientals in that city:

| | Per cent |
|---|---|
| Laundries and laundry offices | 82½ |
| Greengrocers | 91 |
| Hawkers and peddlers | 72 |
| Poulterers | 62 |
| Fish dealers | 45 |
| Restaurants | 33 |
| Bath parlours | 53 |
| Cleaners and dyers | 39 |
| Barbers | 32 |

And so on, all along the line. Probably hon. members will not believe that Chinese control fifty-three per cent of the bath parlours in the city of Vancouver. The fact is that in the early days of the Canadian Pacific railway, and then again between the years 1911 and 1921 they came in by the thousands. In my view the Asiatic type of settlers should be kept out of Canada; they will never become assimilated; they will never be Canadians in the true sense of the term. If they were not in Canada at the moment there would be much more work for our own kith and kin.

I shall devote part of my time now to the matter of loans. Although I do not claim to be a financier, in my own way of doing things I should like to give a few interesting figures and make a few suggestions based thereon. Many of us have been speaking about inflation and also advocating it, and some hon. members have characterized our talk as foolishness. As I have stated previously, I should have liked to have our dollar at a point equal to the English pound sterling; such a condition in my view would have reacted greatly to the benefit of Canada.

My figures, however, are in regard to our debt and interest. I have before me the total debt of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion. I find that the bonded indebtedness of all municipalities is $1,209,645,181; the bonded indebtedness of the provinces is $1,016,647,165, and the total indebtedness of the dominion, according to a statement recently issued by the Department of Finance, is $2,501,854,198. This makes a total of about $5,000,000,000 for a country with a population of a little over 10,000,000. It is a very heavy debt for such a small population, and one which is crushing the very lifeblood from our people. Debts with high interest charges cannot be maintained if our people are to prosper as they should. I know that if steps could be taken to lower by even one per cent the interest charges on our recent debts we would be saved about $52,000,000, yet when those of us on this side spoke about inflation and suggested that the government issue its own currency, we were met with the argument from the other side that our indebtedness in the United States was so great and our interest charges there so large that we would lose money by doing so. It was a surprise to me to find that of our public dominion debt totalling $2,501,000,000, only some $240,000,000 was payable in the United States. I say that was a surprise to me, because the argument had been advanced that if we inflated our currency and our dollar went down, our interest charges in New York could not be met.

Then I looked at the debt payable in the old country, and I found a very remarkable fact. Some debts were incurred back as far as 1888, and on four of those old debts payable in London amounting to $42,159,415 we have paid interest totalling $49,214,142, while the original sum is still owing. It makes one think just what interest charges amount to; in this one case we have paid more than the principal sum in interest alone. I believe that if it could be done by some means or other we should now pay off the $311,000,000 we owe in London. If that were paid in sterling we would make a saving of over $47,000,000, since we would pay with the pound at around $3.73 instead of $4.86, and on the interest payable in London we save about $2,000,000 at the present time by paying in sterling. Of course if sterling reaches the level of gold or if we go down to the level of sterling we will lose that $2,000,000, but an ordinary business man with debts maturing in London would gladly borrow the money somehow if he could make a saving of that kind. I think this is something which should be given consideration by the government. Foolishly or otherwise I believe the government should have issued its own currency with which to pay some of its debts, but if we cannot do that why not try silver coinage? South Africa has silver as legal tender, and many other countries with which we trade also use silver. The United States, though not officially on the silver basis, has a dollar bill payable in silver. At this time I think we might very well consider the idea of silver coinage if we are afraid to follow the policy of inflation or of issuing paper.

My time is getting short, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to make just one other suggestion. I have made these few observations realizing that in these days the task confronting any government is not easy. But I believe that if the nations of the world, including Canada, had tackled this problem with the same spirit and enthusiasm that they tackled the late war, the question of unemployment and destitution would have been solved long ago.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word during this debate. The constituency of St. Boniface flanks the city of Winnipeg and embraces within its confines the city of St. Boniface, the Winnipeg suburb of Elmwood and the town of Transcona. These are essentially working centres; you may travel the length and breadth of that constituency and you will find few mansions and no millionaires. I have heard it said in this house that about ten per cent of the working population of Canada is unemployed. Speaking for the working constituency of St. Boniface, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that easily fifty per cent of the working people are unemployed.

The world at large seems to be in rather a crazy frame of mind, and Canada is not the least crazy place in the world. For several years past this country has been abundantly productive, but still we find poverty and distress on every hand. Throughout the length and breadth of this land there should be no unhappy soul, but from north to south and from east to west unemployment is everywhere present, together with misery, deprivation and almost starvation.

Mr. SPOTTON: Well, well.

Mr. HOWDEN: They are to be found on every hand.

Mr. SPOTTON: What did you do about it?

Mr. HOWDEN: That is just what we want to know. It is up to this government to do something.

Mr. SPOTTON: What do you propose?

Mr. HOWDEN: If the hon. gentleman will keep his shirt on perhaps he will find out what I propose.

Mr. SPOTTON: What do you prescribe? You are a physician.

Mr. HOWDEN: This is a strange state of affairs; with granaries bursting with wheat, markets glutted with merchandise of all kinds, idle factories and packed warehouses, we have twenty-five per cent of the inhabitants of this country poorly clad, poorly fed and poorly sheltered. It is found by those who are feeding men just now that good, wholesome meals can be provided for nine cents, but I will venture the opinion, sir, that a great many men in the part of the country from which I come do not very often see meat on the table, scarcely ever have milk, and are glad enough to have bread. With wheat at 25 cents a bushel, beef at 2 cents a pound, pork at 3 cents a pound, eggs at 10 cents a dozen, poultry at 5 cents a pound, milk and butter and everything else at correspondingly low figures, what a utopia this country ought to be; but if you have no money what matters the price? These men have no work; no pay; poor food; poor clothing and not much shelter. What a shame to this civilization!

No man could listen to the debates in this house and remain in doubt as to the causes of this condition. They are too many and too complex to discuss here and now. May I pause for a moment to say that wealth was originally produced by men and labour; it is now produced by machinery and men, and just a few men. The wealth of the world, as much as there is any possible demand for at the present time, has been produced. It is now in the hands of the few, and until it is absorbed or to some extent consumed there is no need for any more labour. The vast army of unemployed men have no purchasing power, no means of obtaining a share of this wealth, and the few show no voluntary disposition to share their portion with the others. And so the impasse; and so unemployment and discontent and demoralization. If there were famine in this land we might half expect those directly affected by unemployment to accept their lot with a certain degree of resignation and finality. Some time ago I saw an article in which the statement was made that in 1931 Canada produced $700,000,000 worth of products of which the Canadian people consumed less than half. The figures may be incorrect but the facts are there. Canada produces at least twice as much wealth yearly as is required to support the needs of her population in abundance. In the ranks of the unemployed today are many men who a short time ago were living in comfort, and many who were well to do. They are reasonably intelligent men and they are aware of the facts. They are disposed to wonder and to ask where the other $350,000,000 went to. They are Canadians, born and brought up in this land, the children of Canadians, whose forebears were Canadians. Canada for Canadians, but for all the Canadians, not for a few.

Is it any wonder that there is intense dissatisfaction? The right hon. the Prime Minister said last night that the poor we have always with us. He might have said as much of thieves and profiteers. Dissatisfaction does not describe it; it is much worse than that. In every city in Canada there have been serious riots; there has been bloodshed. In many locations in the western part of this country the air is at present surcharged with bitter resentment. At present only the fear of law maintains some degree of order. But, Mr. Speaker, should the time come when the governments and municipalities of Canada find that they are unable to cope with this unemployment situation, unable to feed the idle people in this country, no law, no force either military or whatever you like, will restrain this mass of discontented, resentful human beings.

I would pause here to observe that to some extent the liquid resources of this country are running down. The provinces are in many instances in a rather bad way, and while I do not know just what the proportion is, I can assure you that there is a very large proportion of municipalities in Canada that are insolvent. I want to read a letter that has come to me from St. Boniface—and I may remark here that there are only about one thousand families all told in the city:

Dear Mr. Howden,—

At a largely attended meeting of La Ligne Civique des Citoyens de Saint Boniface composed of all French speaking citizens, I was instructed to draw your attention to the serious situation which has developed in our city through continued unemployment.

It may be interesting for you to know that in September we had in St. Boniface, six hundred and forty-eight families on relief which made a total of thirty-one hundred and eight persons. A total sum of $24,240 was spent of which our city is forced to pay one-third. Refunds for federal and provincial government shares are always two and three months in arrears and we are greatly concerned as to whether our bankers will continue to carry us.

The situation is so acute that our city council has decided to default on its interest payments and there will be no more debenture coupons paid until an adjustment is arrived at between the bond holders and the city giving us a reduced rate for further payments of interest. This however is not sufficient and unless the federal government will accept to increase their share of direct relief to at least 50 per cent as they were urged to do by the conventions of premiers and mayors of western Canada we will find ourselves unable to continue granting relief to our unemployed and even then it may be possible that our city will be in such a financial position as to make it impossible to continue granting relief to its needy citizens.

This letter is signed by George Chavanne, president. I have another letter of precisely the same tenor from the southern end of the constituency of St. Boniface, the end from which I hail, namely Norwood. It reads:

At a recent meeting of this organization I was instructed to write to you (and to the Minister of Labour) drawing your attention to the increasing seriousness of the unemployment and relief situation in the city of St. Boniface, and to the increasing difficulty of the city authorities to deal with the situation. In the month of September there were 648 families, with a total of 3,108 persons receiving relief in the city. There has already been a cut in the relief allowance with a prospect of further reductions. I am instructed to urge you to bring this matter before the federal government and impress upon them the necessity of absorbing a greater proportion of the cost of relief. The city is contributing one-third towards this cost, but if a greater share is not assumed by the government in the near future, we are given to understand that the city will be unable to continue to give relief to the unemployed. We trust that you will realize the seriousness of the situation and urge the government to take immediate steps towards relief.

The government was elected to office on the understanding that it would avoid these very conditions and put an end to the state of affairs that then existed. Their proposed plan was simple and it was widely advocated: increase the tariff, shut out the foreigner and keep Canadian markets for Canadians. After more than two years of trial it has failed utterly and unemployment has increased from 100,000 to 700,000 in that length of time, with a corresponding aggravation of all the attendant evils. Last night the Minister of Labour seemed disposed to take the former Liberal government to task for its policy in connection with the bringing of immigrants to this country. I sat on the other side of the house for five years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in opposition and I remember hearing the Liberal government of that day being taken to task week after week and month after month. The opposition of that day never wearied or tired of informing the government that they had no immigration policy, that what the country needed was immigrants and that the government had fallen down completely. That was what they had to say. I do not need to mention the various hon. members who spoke at that time upon the matter, nor need I refer to the suggestion made by the then member for Vancouver North, now Senator McRae, or to the criticisms of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). Not only did the opposition of that day advocate immigration to this country, but seemingly every representative and intelligent business man was calling for the same thing. This country was experiencing a wave and surge of prosperity; railroad lines were being built, great edifices were being erected, rock cuts were being put through, basements were being dug out—there were all sorts of dangerous work to do, and the ordinary Canadian, the ordinary Britisher would not do it, nor would the Irish or the Scotch. We had to have bohunks, so nicknamed, and dagoes and Chinamen and men of that type to do the work. They were the only ones who would do that class of work and the big business men of this country demanded that they be brought in.

Mr. MULLINS: What does the hon. member mean by "bohunks"? Is that an insult to the intelligent new Canadian?

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not need to tell the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) the type of labourer to which the term "bohunk" is applied. I do not apply that term in any sense of disrespect, but that is what they were commonly called by Canadians—bohunks.

Mr. MALONEY: Who are they?

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member to my left tells me that they are Tories.

Mr. MULLINS: That shows their intelligence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No personal reflections intended.

Mr. HOWDEN: One cannot say that the government has been idle or has made no effort to relieve conditions. From time to time they have expended large sums of money, unfortunately not always to the best avail, but undoubtedly affording a certain measure of relief. But the evil itself is as far from being cured as ever. The country has gone behind over $200,000,000 in two years. Unemployment never can be cured in this way, neither can it be cured by unemployment insurance.

The right hon. the Prime Minister spent some time last night discussing unemployment insurance. That is decidedly a factor, but he has stated many times that the only form of unemployment insurance which he would consider would be contributory. It is beyond me how contributory unemployment insurance is going to help the idle men we have in Canada—almost a million—who have not a cent to their names. The only way to cure unemployment is to provide work. Give a man a job, keep his mind and his body occupied and he will be reasonably contented. The worst feature of the present condition of unemployment in this country is not the poverty, the distress and deprivations to which these men are being exposed; it is the fact that they are idle. No decent, honest man can be idle and happy. These men are dissatisfied and discontented at home; they meet in groups upon the street corners and, believe me, the topic of their conversation is not the least bit complimentary to the government of the land. Unfortunately science has advanced to the point where but few men are needed to cultivate the wealth of the country, and the burning question before us today is: What will we do with the balance?

Mr. SPOTTON: Weigh it.

Mr. HOWDEN: I might inform my hon. friend on the other side that I am a little deaf and cannot hear what he said; probably it is just as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member is lucky.

Mr. HOWDEN: The recent inter-imperial conference was heralded as a great saving force, and one which would soon provide a way out of our troubles. It has come and gone, and its only result has been to raise the tariff, to destroy world trade for Canada, and to increase our difficulty. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think for one moment that the unemployed throughout this country believe that they are going to get any relief from the recent conference? If they do, they certainly have another think coming.

The functions of government are to control, to direct and to protect. This matter has long since become a federal responsibility, in fact, the government freely accepted that responsibility when appealing for office. No one seems to know the way out, but if a way out is not soon found, we will have a panic and our institutions will come toppling down about our ears. This is the time for all to think and to endeavour to find a plan or remedy which will have some lasting effect. The government has been borrowing vast sums of money which when expended have returned like waters to the fountain. There is no lasting benefit in this practice but to those who lend the money. How long is the government going to mark time? With unemployment increasing at the rate of 300,000 a year, with the deficit of the country growing at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, with Canada spending $135 for every $100 that she collects, how long is the government going to fiddle while Rome burns?

Mr. SPENCE: Will the hon. member tell us how to remedy the situation?

Mr. MALCOLM: A change of seats—that is the answer.

Mr. HOWDEN: Our immediate need in this country is money to fill in the breach; our ultimate need is work to offset unemployment. Many hon. members have advocated inflation. I am quite free to admit that I have no knowledge of these matters. At home I am merely a rural doctor and I do not know very much about money. But if there be any virtue in inflation; if there be any possible chance that inflation will help this country out of its difficulty, it ought to be seriously considered by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have started it to some extent.

Mr. HOWDEN: I believe they have. During the crisis of the great war this country needed men and the government conscripted manhood. In the present crisis we have need of money, and the country's wealth should be at the disposal of the government. But that would not be enough; we must have work if we wish to avoid chaos. Why not let us trade freely with the world? We can supply at small cost the things that they need, and they can supply at small cost the things that we need. Fair exchange is equitable and what this country needs, and it would put a vast army of men to work.

An hon. MEMBER: How are you going to get over their tariffs?

Mr. HOWDEN: That is the trouble. We are going to get over their tariffs some day, before very long, but while hon. gentlemen opposite still remain in their seats, we shall have some difficulty in doing it.

We have millions of acres of fertile land in this country, and we have hundreds of thousands of idle men. Why not bring them together? Since coming into this house I have consistently advocated that this be done. I should like to read an article; it will not take very long. Last year in the city of Winnipeg a scheme was developed to put a number of men on farms and small plots of land in Manitoba. A Mr. J. P. Seimens was the instigator of this movement, and he writes in connection with it as follows:

With reference to the general back to the land movement, Mr. J. P. Seimens, former Manitoba farmer and business man, who started the present local movement early in 1931, writes as follows: "This back to the land movement is no fanciful scheme, but the only really constructive, economic, sane and stable thing that can be advanced. Governments elsewhere are beginning to see it is the only way under present conditions. We can do without new federal buildings, canals, better highways, etc., but the food that all require must come from the ground. It seems absurd, for instance, to spend by labour $1,100,000 for a ditch that can be made by steam shovel for $150,000. This saving of $950,000 would place 1,000 families, representing 5,000 people at least, on land. This is what our governments must do and quit borrowing money and spending it to feed the people on a system which we could not afford in prosperous times. The sooner we realize world conditions, the sooner we will come to a system of small mixed farming without debts and big overhead. There are not too many farmers. Half our city folks should go on a piece of land and earn a decent living. This is what our fathers did and they were content.

I do not suggest that men be placed on large holdings requiring extensive apparatus and with heavy operating costs. What thousands of men need today is a piece of land and some food and work. Let them begin on small holdings, settled in communities, of forty or eighty acres at most, with a shelter, some poultry and seed for a season. Thousands of seriously minded people are today anxious and longing for just such a start. Since the beginning of time men have taken their living from the soil. Today they do the same thing and they must continue to do so for all time.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on the anouncement he made last night that it is his intention in the latter part of this session to introduce a bill embodying the principle of unemployment insurance. I receive the intimation with hope and gratitude, tempered with the assumption that the bill will be a workable and equitable one. I also agree with him that it would not be practicable unless it were on the basis of a contributory system. But of course we must recognize that unemployment insurance, however desirable it may be to initiate it, has no bearing upon the present unemployment relief situation.

Dealing with the latter, I was very sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) did not yesterday make such a statement of policy, especially as regards British Columbia, that would not have required or compelled me to enter into this debate, because I do so under compulsion. Last night, speaking about a certain situation, he used the expression: "No time was lost." That may have been true as regards the situation of which he was then speaking, but it is a horrible travesty on the situation as we know it in British Columbia. Instead of saying that no time was lost, I would submit that almost all time was lost in that regard.

I am on record in Hansard last spring as saying very frankly that I believed the Dominion government had made a very genuine attempt to meet the unemployment situation, and I ascribed to the British Columbia government the blame for mismanagement of the relief, whereby great inequalities took place, money was spent on political heelers and material, graft prevailed, and in the end many people suffered owing to lack of money and maladministration of the funds. I did not blame the Dominion government for that. This last summer, however, the situation, as I saw it—and I had some opportunity to see somewhat behind the scenes—has very considerably changed. The British Columbia government, influenced by I know not what, perhaps by the fear of God or by some motive less praiseworthy, perhaps by the fear of an imminent provincial general election, certainly changed its attitude, and, not simply on one occasion but on quite a few occasions, showed that it was making a genuine attempt to deal with the situation; the trouble certainly seemed to be that the Dominion government was stalling from time to time.

I would like to compare the promises that were made with the results. As we all remember, last spring when we were passing the relief bill, if we sought to delay the proceedings by inquiring as to the meaning of the different sections, asking that the substance be put into the act instead of into the regulations, so that we would know exactly what was being done, we were threatened and reproached again and again with holding up the relief for the poor, and the picture was held up before our eyes of hungry men, destitute women and starving children whom we were preventing from getting relief. We were told in regard to all these matters that we were inquiring about at the time: "Pass the bill and all these things will be added to you in the shape of regulations." We were promised that the regulations would be published in the Gazette. They were not. There was a very brief summary published from time to time which did not tell you anything.

I quote from the remarks of the Minister of Labour on April 28 last. Speaking of the relief measure he said:

> When the legislation is approved, agreements will be entered into with the provinces whereby I trust a contribution will be made—the basis has not yet been determined because the agreements have not yet been entered into—by means of which loans or advances will be made by this government to the provinces for the purpose of taking care of the destitute people for whom the provinces have primary responsibility.

A little further down on the same page he said:

> It has not yet been definitely determined—

He was speaking of the Dominion government's share:

> —but I hope it will be immediately on this legislation receiving the approval of the house.

On another date, May 9, I had been making some inquiries to find out just what the Dominion government's share was going to be, and had pointed out that it would not be fair if it was confined to one-third because the previous year the Dominion government had contributed one-half of the expenditure on works, and I had pointed out that the municipalities could not afford to pay one-third this year. Then the Minister of Labour said:

> With respect to direct relief generally—and this covers all the instances to which the hon. member has referred—the present discussions have been on the basis of contributing fifty per cent. I do not know that any better arrangement can be made. That again, of course, may be subject to some review when the agreement with the provinces is concluded. At the moment, however, and I do not think it is likely to be changed, direct relief generally will likely be on the basis of a fifty per cent contribution.

That is plain enough, is it not? So we established three principles at that time. First, immediate action was going to be taken on the passing of that legislation. Second, the Dominion government would grant sufficient sums to the province so that the province would lend sums to the municipalities which could not finance themselves. Third, the Dominion government had it fully in contemplation—they did not think this would be changed—that the Dominion government's contribution would be fifty per cent. Something was also said about the back to the land movement, but I need not go into that just now. I certainly went home, as I believe other hon. members did, with the idea that these were promises made in the house and that we could rely upon them. The municipalities were naturally anxious to know what the situation was, and I told them that if they could not finance themselves they would be able to apply to the province, which would be compelled to grant them such assistance as they required by lending them the municipality's share. The situation was acute because several of these municipalities were, in plain and simple English, broke; they had no money. The province took care of the single men, but the married men were down to the point of starvation. Some municipalities said that they would give them a relief order, but the stores would not cash the order. I will give an instance without mentioning the name of the city. Its population is 2,340, relying upon lumbering and fishing for their livelihood. Last June the large saw mill at this place was closed down, throwing 600 employees out of work. The fishing has not proved a remunerative business this year, as all the fishermen can get is one cent a pound for white salmon and three cents for red salmon, not enough to pay expenses, and in consequence many of the fishermen are destitute. The municipality could handle two hundred more people per month, affording them relief, if they had the money to put them to work, but they say: "There is not sufficient tools and equipment to keep them at work, as we only have two dump trucks, which are at present not being operated because we cannot afford to buy fuel." Fancy a town of that size which could get neither cash nor credit to buy gas for two trucks—What was being given at that time for relief was being taken from moneys appropriated for the schools' expenses to the end of the year. They were diverting part of the money that should go to the school teachers to provide relief funds from time to time. They go on to say that they cannot get any further loan or overdraft at the bank and that "the city request the government to loan us our proportion." Out of a population of 2,340 only 25 were industrially employed at that time. Here is a letter from the Minister of Finance of British Columbia saying:

> Respecting your information that the federal government had offered to loan to the province an advance if necessary—

They got that from me:

> —my information is that the federal government will not loan to the province any funds in advance but only when actual vouchers for expenditures already made have been received at Ottawa.

That was a lovely idea to pass on to a city that had not any cash or could not raise enough credit to buy gas for its trucks and was taking the school teachers' money in order to pay relief.

Later on under date of September 12, the Minister of Finance of the province, an able man, wrote:

> At the present time I am not very optimistic about securing the required loan from the federal government.

That was on September 12, five months after we had passed the legislation. He continues:

> The federal Prime Minister reserved decision until matters could be discussed with members of his cabinet in Ottawa. Decision on various other matters was held up also so it is somewhat difficult for me to state the exact position.

That was five months after we had voted the money in a hurry because it was urgently needed. Then we have the Union of British Columbia Municipalities, a large and important non-political body passing several resolutions in the last week in June. One asked that the provincial government apply for help under the so-called federal blank cheque, and demanded a clear cut statement from the government of its policy. We have been asking for a clear cut statement for two years. Resolutions were also passed that the provincial treasury should finance the municipalities, etc., and those resolutions were based on twelve facts, of which I shall mention a few: Unemployment steadily increasing; clothing, boots and shoes are becoming necessary; owners of property now housing the unemployed, owing to continued non-payment of rent, are being forced to take eviction procedings; electric light is being cut off; many municipalities have been carrying on direct relief through credit given them by local storekeepers, but storekeepers now find it impossible to continue giving this credit; banks will no longer extend the usual credits to some municipalities; the inevitable result of reducing to any considerable extent the amount of relief now being granted the unemployed will result in great hardship and consequent unrest leading to riot and possible loss of life and destruction of property.

That was not from some demagogue speaking in the house for political effect but from the Union of British Columbia Municipalities expressing the situation as it existed as of that date.

Let me show also what efforts I made in that regard. On June 15 I wrote to the Minister of Labour setting forth the situation and saying that I had seen in the paper that they were going to contribute only one-third. I pointed out the situation very much as I have outlined it here tonight. I did not get any answer to that letter. The minister told the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) tonight that if he had made a casual inquiry at his department he would very easily have got the information he desired, but let me tell the house that when you write the Minister of Labour you are by no means certain that you will ever get an answer, and in my experience the chances are 99¾ per cent against your ever getting one. I think I have six letters unanswered now. In the absence of a reply from the minister I wired him on June 23, pointing out the really desperate situation in the small cities and begging for action and the appointment of a commissioner. Getting no answer I wired the minister again on July 19. I got an acknowledgment from one of his officials, but no answer except the statement that the federal government was going to contribute only one-third. I wired, as I say, on July 19, pressing the situation, and later I wrote the minister again. I might as well say while I am on the subject that I have three letters which I wrote to the minister on a very serious situation with respect to the old age pensions which also remain unanswered. I pause for a minute, Mr. Speaker, to wonder what kind of mental reservation the hon. gentleman made when he took the oath of office which allows him to repudiate and ignore reasonable representations made by members of parliament in matters of public concern. Representations are made to him by members elected by the people, the same as he was, and in some cases elected by even greater majorities. I say that, however, in passing.

I desire at this moment to quote a few articles from the press. These are not criticisms or editorials but plain items of news, just as would be the account of a fire. They contain no criticism of anything that has been done, but are, as I say, simply news items and are taken almost entirely—I would not say entirely—from the Conservative press of the province of British Columbia. Here is an article dated Vancouver, July 12:

> The executive of the Union of British Columbia Municipalities, meeting here tonight, decided to apply direct to Ottawa for a federal representative to study the unemployment relief problems of the province.

Another item states that the Victoria city council made the same representations and, further than that, the British Columbia government, not insulted or annoyed, backed them up, because the article goes on to quote the attorney general of the province as follows:

This request already had been sent to Ottawa without result.

Premier Tolmie had been in Ottawa trying to push the case of the province, and had been in consultation with Mr. Gordon. The articles goes on to state:

Hon. W. A. Gordon, Dominion Minister of Labour, this morning assured Mayor Leeming over the long distance telephone from Ottawa that he would immediately call together the unemployment committee of the federal government to consider appointment of a direct federal representative to investigate unemployment conditions in British Columbia.

Then we come to September 2, and find a dispatch from Victoria as follows:

The British Columbia government will ask the federal authorities to loan municipalities money for relief purposes. . . . No arrangements for federal assistance have been made for the coming fall and winter and the municipalities of this province will be quite unable to cope with the situation, according to the government's view.

In any case British Columbia wants above all to get a definite answer from Mr. Bennett as to his government's unemployment policy for the coming year.

There is a request for a statement as to the unemployment policy for the coming year, and I call attention of hon. members to the fact that the dispatch is dated September 2, when two-thirds of the year had gone. Certainly they were not unreasonable in their demands, were they? After two-thirds of the year had elapsed they were beginning to push and agitate for an announcement of Dominion government policy. Certainly they were not being what would be called exigent in the matter.

I have before me what purports to be a stenographic report of an interview with the Prime Minister when he visited Calgary on September 6, 1932. He is reported as having said:

I cannot say to you that the dominion will accept fifty per cent of the burden from May 1.

Then he goes on to give reasons, but does not say definitely that he will not or will do anything. The matter is left up in the air. In a dispatch of October 8, I find the following:

Hon. J. W. Jones stated yesterday the provincial authorities have not yet received word of the new federal policy on relief for western Canada. . . . During the day the government asked the federal authorities for early advices on its relief policy for the west.

That is on October 8, and I ask hon. members to recall that we left Ottawa around May 24 or 26. A dispatch of October 12 states that the Dominion government wired for information, and that the British Columbia government immediately wired the information—

In the hope that it would facilitate announcement of a federal relief policy . . . but all these plans are in abeyance pending an announcement of federal policy. Meanwhile the dominion owes the province nearly a million dollars on account.

I am not prepared to stand behind that last statement, and I would not contradict the minister if he says it is not so. I have had some experience in that regard. Then, on October 22, I find the following big headlines:

Ottawa assumes complete cost of big relief group.

Then in smaller type:

Dominion to take over British Columbia camps, moving single homeless men from cities.

That is the way it is put. Then the article goes on to state:

The commission has been selected by the federal government under Doctor W. J. Black, with the approval of the provincial government.

Then the article goes on to say that the Dominion government are going to take over provincial camps. Following that we find this interesting statement:

Nothing in this arrangement—

And this appears in the Daily Colonist.

—touches on the question of married men and other men with dependents, which, it is assumed, will be settled later.

They are hopefully looking forward to an announcement later than October 22. Then we have an item in a western paper received from Ottawa under date of October 26:

The government is not in a position to make any exact pronouncement of policy respecting unemployment relief but if any responsible provincial government officials report their inability to care for the needy within their jurisdiction the government will take adequate action, Hon. W. A. Gordon, Minister of Labour told the House of Commons this afternoon.

That is on October 26; and again I call the attention of the house to the fact that we left Ottawa about May 26. This article appears in the paper about five months later. The article to which I have just referred contains the expression: "responsible provincial government officials." What does he term a responsible official? They had been making representations right along; the Hon. Mr. Tolmie was sent to Ottawa. They had been wiring continuously, and making long distance telephone calls. On that date, however, that is all the minister had to say. I note also a statement that there are 20,000 single men, and a total of 83,000 people, on relief, including dependents, in the province of British Columbia.

We will go back four days to October 22, and turn to an article from Victoria under that date:

British Columbia prepared today to open up unemployment camps on main roads throughout the province. . . . The Public Works Department is arranging to open camps which have been closed all summer and which will form the base for road work during the coming winter.

From this article we would conclude that something is to be done—at least it so states. We find however that nothing was done until nearly a month later. After begging, imploring, wiring and long distancing the government, we find that five months later they are going to do something; they are going to begin work just when the pitiless fall rains are coming on. People in the east talk about the harsh climate, but apart from a few days of extreme blizzards the eastern climate is far better for outside work in winter than that of British Columbia. That pitiless, penetrating, cold rain takes more out of a man, does more injury to his health, than a temperature of twenty or thirty degrees below zero.

These camps have been idle. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was criticized for stating that no work was being done in the camps; I bear him out, and say that they were doing nothing. In the early summer they did work for some time, but when they found they could not get relief or assistance from Ottawa the work was cut down. The men were told they could stay in the camps and would receive two meals a day but no money for tobacco, and if they did not like it they could leave. That was the condition existing when I left home.

Time, that ever rolling stream, kept going on, and we find on October 31 the following article:

Plans for opening unemployment camps in many parts of British Columbia to house homeless single men from urban centres were shaped at a conference here today between members of the cabinet and Major J. G. Fordham's Unemployment Commission.

Then the article goes on to state that the commission will ask the federal government for $250,000 so that "an actual start may be made." Note that expression, "an actual start." A start had not been made on October 31. On October 27, a decision was arrived at to have a conference between the government and the commission on unemployment, and they were to decide what camps would be opened. An article under date of October 27 contains the following paragraph:

But apart from these matters the government is concerned with the delay on the part of the federal government in deciding who is to take care of single men in rural districts—

Note that.

—as they are specifically excluded from the control of the Fordham commission. It has no knowledge yet either what is to be done about maintaining married men in cities and in rural districts.

Premier Tolmie said today he was hopeful—

Mind you, he was hopeful on October 27; he must have been filled with optimism.

—the federal government would outline its policy on these important matters without delay so as to permit the province to make the necessary arrangements. Meanwhile municipalities are clamouring for some definite understanding on the whole situation.

Were they wrong to clamour? If they had taken more definite action I would not have blamed them. Then on November 4 we are informed that the British Columbia municipalities are to receive a share of the loan of $150,000 which the federal government is putting up. The further statement is made that out of seventy-eight municipalities twenty-five will have to have assistance. With this question so far settled, though as yet they had not gone to camp, the provincial government turned their attention to the problem of the married men remaining in the municipalities. Definite arrangements under which municipalities would care for these men, with federal and provincial assistance, would be made immediately, according to the announcement. The government proposed to budget the municipalities and tell each how much money it might expect for relief purposes during the coming winter. The problem of the care of married men in municipalities and married and single men in unorganized districts was "still under negotiation."

I may say that the idea of budgeting is a nice expression, but it means this: We are going to say to a city whose requirements are $5,000: "We will give you $3,000 and you can do as you like." They may say: "But we cannot get along with that much; we must have $5,000." Then we will say: "We will give you $3,000, and you can do as you will." So they must cut down still lower the amount per head or raise the money in some other way. And now we come to the culminating feature with regard to these single, homeless men going into camps. Something really has been done in this regard.

Mr. GORDON: I wonder if I might interrupt my hon. friend to ask if he has a copy of my telegram to Hon. R. W. Bruhn, dated May 6, 1932, or of my letter to Hon. S. F. Tolmie, dated May 7, 1932.

Mr. NEILL: If the Minister of Labour puts me in the position of having to stand in this house and say that letters and telegrams from myself went unanswered he can hardly expect me to produce letters or wires sent by him to someone else.

Mr. GORDON: I am merely asking if the hon. member has those copies. They would be very illuminating.

Mr. NEILL: I have not; neither have I any reply to the letters and wires I sent the minister. In any event, it is recorded in the Vancouver Province that on November 17 three hundred single unemployed men out of the twenty thousand in the province went to various camps; they really did go. Now I should like to deal with a point which is not directly the fault of the minister, but I want to ask him to use his influence because certainly he has a responsibility in connection with matters of this kind. The province announced that on November 3 they intended to have another conference with the union of municipalities; at that conference they were to announce that a fixed scale of relief for food would be enforced, not suggested or left optional. That is to say, the city would not be able to spend so much and have that amount augmented by the province; the province would say, "You will spend so much and no more." Here is the municipal food unit allowance as first announced: $9.50 per month for a married man, $3 per month for his wife and $2.50 per month for his child, and since that time it has been changed to only $9 for the man; $3.50 for the woman and $2.50 for the child. The unemployed are not certain to get even that sum, however; each municipality is to be told just how much it can have by way of budget, and that amount will not be sufficient to pay these allowances.

I should like to direct attention to that state of affairs. Surely matrimony must be at a premium, and those members who are single ought to become married, since in the opinion of the government of British Columbia a wife can be maintained for $3.50 a month. That is considered an appropriate sum in that province. From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand let us spread the news abroad to a waiting world that in British Columbia in this year of grace, or I may say disgrace, the government of that province, encouraged or at least sanctioned by the federal government, proposes to allow a married man $3.50 a month for his wife and $2.50 for each child. That amounts to 11 cents a day for the woman and 8 cents a day for a growing child. I wonder how much that is a minute! We are told that this is going to be enforced, and they have announced that all the municipalities must accept that rate.

These are the conditions. I have been trying to show the trouble that has been caused by delay, and in these matters there is nothing more dangerous than delay. There is a Latin proverb of which the English translation is "He gives twice who gives quickly." If you tell a man you cannot do something or that you will do it on a certain day, that is something definite, but when you say it is up to the province and the province says it is up to the dominion and so on, it puts the men, and especially the married men, in a very desperate situation. That is the position today, which is to be relieved so far as the dominion is concerned by this $150,000, with which I will deal in a moment.

Now I should like to quote from the order in council which deals with these single men. It states that it has to do with single, homeless unemployed. It does not say single, destitute unemployed; they must be homeless. So far as I can make out, and I am not trying to quibble or attack the government unfairly—

Mr. SPENCE: Did you ever do anything but quibble?

Mr. NEILL: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. SPENCE: That is my opinion, anyway.

Mr. NEILL: Then I am really sorry for my hon. friend, but perhaps I might be allowed to go on, Mr. Speaker. Apparently this will only apply to those known as car riders, those men who are floating around the various provinces riding on box cars. That will not apply to Vancouver island, because you can only reach Vancouver island by boat, and they have a guard on the gangplank. So we have none of this class on Vancouver island, which includes three-fourteenths of the province of British Columbia; at least it returns three members of parliament. What does that mean? I have a friend who owns a cabin, in which he lets two unemployed men stay. Must he throw them out on the street before they can qualify as single, homeless unemployed? They are not homeless. The word should have been "destitute". From the quotations I have read with regard to the government of British Columbia, apparently they accept the interpretation that this only applies to those called car riders, that is, the floating population. But a man may be hungry even if he is single and has a ten by six shack. What is to be done about those people? We find the government of British Columbia saying they do not know, that they are hoping, and so on.

I must hurry on. Now the government have given $150,000 to the province to provide for those municipalities which have no money. That is a good idea, but that provision is only for November and December; it will end in five weeks. If it took six months to get this thing started how long will it take to get it extended?—because the unemployment will not end in December.

That is the situation; we are still getting only one-third, though we were promised one-half. There has been a delay of six months, and now this relief is given to the single men who will not qualify unless they are homeless. This is a burning question with us, because we have a number of single, idle men.

What is the policy of the government? That is what I am trying to get at; for goodness' sake give us a definite policy. What is the policy about the loans; what is the policy with regard to the single men throughout the country, and the married men? Above all, is the minister going to allow himself to become a party to this allowance of 11 cents a day for women and 8 cents a day for children? He may say, and very probably will say, that this is a provincial matter, but the responsibility cannot be dodged in that way. The other day the Prime Minister said he could not appoint a commissioner because this was wholly a provincial concern, but this government has given the province $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. Do you mean to say that they cannot exercise any jurisdiction over their own money, that they cannot say: "We are going to give you so much money, $4,000,000 or $2,000,000 or whatever it may be, but we have some right to see that it is spent in a reasonable way. We do not want to see destitute women being fed at the rate of 11 cents a day, or children at the rate of 8 cents a day." Do you mean to say that if the province were confronted with two alternatives, either to accept such reasonable conditions or to do without the money, they would not take it? The Prime Minister says the primary responsibility is on the province. If the province is not prepared to shoulder that responsibility then the province must be prepared to accept any reasonable conditions which may be imposed by the government granting the money.

Then will the minister not use his influence to stop this budgeting? That is a smooth phrase, but it simply means that the municipalities will be imposed upon. They have proved beyond question that they cannot carry on. Now when they want $5,000 they will be given $3,000 and told to stretch it out as far as they like. They cannot stretch it to that extent.

The other day the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked a question on the orders of the day, which was answered very gracefully and very pleasantly by the minister, who said:

> I am confident that no one in this country need worry about being adequately supplied with food, fuel, clothing and shelter.

Food at 11 cents a day? This is no time for honeyed words and well-turned phrases; it is a question of dealing with the situation. On another occasion the hon. gentleman said:

> The policy this government will adopt will be made manifest from time to time.

That is not a policy; that is opportunism—"from time to time." It is a matter of hand to mouth. A policy is a definite, prearranged, decided plan of which everyone is appraised and by which people can govern themselves. If the government do not formulate a definite policy for the coming winter and do so immediately, they will work a grave injustice to the government of British Columbia, their own political friends, and to the municipalities which are really in a desperate condition, as well as to the taxpaper who does not know where he is going to get off at. Lastly, it will work a grave injustice to the destitute people in the country who do not know from day to day just what they may expect. Whenever a man says to me, "I have had only so many days' relief," I have to tell him that the government changes its methods from week to week and I am therefore unable to say what their policy is. Let the government of British Columbia stick to one policy. There is a good man there in the person of Doctor Black. Give him adequate powers to dominate the situation and to do whatever is necessary; otherwise the situation will become quite desperate.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): I rise to speak on the unemployment question because I believe that unemployment and farm relief is the most important and urgent matter before this parliament in the present session. There was a time not so long ago when most people in this country believed that the unemployment situation was merely temporary, but anyone who has given any study to the matter must long ere this have come to the conclusion that the situation will exist in Canada for some years to come.

During this session figures have been given in the house to show that an analysis of industry in the United States, and the improvement that has been brought about in the use of machinery, and other economies effected, indicate that if they wish to produce in that country the same quantity of goods today as they produced in 1929 it would require only fifty-five per cent of the employees that were engaged at that time. That means that at the peak of production in the United States fifty-five per cent of the employees engaged in 1929 could now produce the same quantity of goods. I presume that will hold good so far as Canada also is concerned, and if that is so it means that we are facing a problem of some years' duration.

I am under the impression that the government thought when they came into power that the policies they were putting into force would have the effect of ending unemployment. After two and a half years of these policies, however, they must have come to the conclusion that they will not meet the situation. The Prime Minister and all those associated with him must realize, I think, that these policies of high tariffs, of Canada for the Canadians, will not improve matters. I hope that during this debate someone will be able to offer to the government some ideas that will help to alleviate the condition in which thousands of our people now find themselves. There is at present a great deal of dissatisfaction not only among the unemployed but also among the agricultural classes. Unemployment as I see it is linked up with the problem of farm relief. We are not going to be able to employ all the people in this country who are now idle, industrially; we shall not be able to do so for many years to come. It seems to me therefore that the more closely we can get back to the production of the necessaries of life the easier and cheaper it will be for us to support these people.

Now, the back to the land movement is all right so far as it can be worked out, but I believe there is another means of getting people back to the land which is a little different from what the Minister of Labour has so far carried into effect. I have visited different farms in Ontario and have inquired of farmers why such and such a piece of work has not been done, why improvements have not been made here and there, and they tell me that the reason is that they are not able to hire men to do the work. One fellow said to me, "There are thousands of things to be done around this place but I am not able to employ men to do that work." He told me that in the adjoining town there were now many persons on relief and thousands on relief last winter. In years gone by, he said, there would be dozens of men calling at that particular farm to get jobs in the spring of the year. This year not a soul has called looking for work. I talked with another fellow a few miles from that place and he told me that there had not been a man on his farm in the last two years looking for work. They are not looking for work on the farms because they are getting relief in the towns and, as I understand it, in many towns once they get off relief they have difficulty getting back. This particular farmer said, "We have any amount to eat, any amount of room, and we need to have the work done; but we are not able to pay wages." I asked him whether it was not possible to get men to come and live on the farm even without wages instead of living on relief. He replied that he supposed it would if an arrangement could be made to get the men to come out. He told me that he had gone to the employment office this fall and asked the man in charge whether he had any spare men. The man in charge replied in the affirmative; he told him that there were any number of men available, and he gave him the names of some of them. The employment officer knew this man was a farmer. The farmer went to one man, of three whose names had been given to him, and at eleven o'clock in the morning this man was still in bed. He came down however to interview the farmer. He asked what work he would have to do. He was told that around the farm there were numerous things that needed to be done but, said the farmer, just now a man was needed to pick apples. This man replied, "I don't know anything about picking apples; I know nothing about farming." He was an electrician who had been out of work a year and a half and had been on relief. He said he might get a job at his trade and therefore he did not want to go on a farm. The fact was he did not wish to go off the relief that he was getting in that particular town, and the result was that the farmer went no further to look for unemployed men but hired neighbour farm boys on whom he felt he could depend.

I believe that any number of men could be placed on the farms if we had a commission or committee or some organization that would be able to get the facts and to put them in proper form. I would suggest that in these townships throughout Ontario, throughout the rural municipalities and in the agricultural districts, assessors or somebody connected with the council should be required to make inquiries and find out what farmers can take on men and have them housed and fed. We could possibly make arrangements later on to give them a few dollars for clothing. It is quite possible that many farmers can pay a few dollars, but not to the extent of standard wages.

In connection with relief there has been considerable dissatisfaction and annoyance caused to the different municipalities because of their being required to take care of people belonging to other municipalities. I think it would be advisable to have every man registered. He should be obliged to give the particulars of his life and where he has been working for the last two or three years. He could then be allocated to the province where he has lived, say for the last full year. As far as the municipalities are concerned, the man could be allocated to the particular municipality in which he had lived for, say the last six months. Our municipal acts provide that the cost of taking care of destitute sick shall be charged to the municipality to which they belong, but so far as taking care of other destitute persons, no provision is made, at least in our province. I quite realize that a constitutional question is involved as between the dominion and the provinces, but the Prime Minister has told us that he intends to call a dominion-provincial conference, and it should be possible to have this matter discussed at that time. The provinces could pass the necessary legislation so that these people could be allocated to their proper municipalities and the cost of any relief charged to those municipalities.

Linked up with the question of unemployment, which I look upon as being national in scope, we have another situation which pertains particularly to western Canada. The farmers there are in very distressed circumstances. I have lived in the west for most of the past thirty years, but it is only during the last year that I realized how hopeless the situation is for many of the settlers on the prairies. They have debts which were incurred when wheat was selling at one dollar or better per bushel; at the time they borrowed their money they got one dollar's worth of value, but now, with the prices of commodities what they are, they have to pay the equal of four dollars for every one they borrowed. I am not figuring in the interest in this computation. So far as the man who loaned the money a few years ago is concerned, when he loaned a dollar he loaned only a dollar's value, but today every dollar he gets back is worth two dollars in commodities—I do not say four dollars because there is the middleman's profits and overhead to be considered. Is it fair that the agricultural class should be asked to bear this burden and that the man who loans the money should get back twice what he loaned in addition to the interest? I believe an adjustment should be made, and it is the duty of this government to take the lead in making that adjustment. This matter might very well be discussed at the proposed dominion-provincial conference in order that some solution could be worked out. I can state quite frankly that those debts are not going to be paid; the man on the land cannot pay them and he is left in an absolutely hopeless position. We might as well start something which will permit him to see the end of the road because he has now reached the stage where he has given up all hope. I realize that the federal government cannot undertake this matter by itself, but I believe that the provinces and the dominion could work together in solving this problem. This situation is linked up with the serious one of unemployment.

I rose only to pass on these suggestions to the government. We on this side of the house believe that the policies of this government have aggravated a system which was already all too serious. Hon. members opposite believe in that policy, but notwithstanding their belief in it I know that they want to work out a solution of this national problem. Surely after two years and a half of these expedients—dilly-dallying, as some hon. members have described it, a committee of this house, a commission or some body should be organized to take hold of this situation of unemployment and farm relief and endeavour to work out a solution. I am sure that every hon. member in this house speaking on this particular question does not do so from the standpoint of politics; I believe he is making a sincere effort to help his fellow men and I am sure that if a committee or other body was set up, all members from all parts of the house would give every assistance in their power in the solving of this difficulty.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, entirely too much time of this session has been taken up in discussing a matter of comparative unimportance. No doubt trade treaties and imperial agreements are of importance—let us hope that they will lead to something worth while to the future of Canada—but important as these things are, I do not regard them as being sufficiently so to occupy six weeks of the time of this house when practically no consideration has been given to such vital and emergent issues as unemployment and the condition of agriculture generally throughout Canada. No doubt the debate in connection with the imperial conference was interesting to those who think that the tariff is the key to the door of prosperity and that unemployment, international trade, the prices of agricultural and other commodities and the problem of debts are all problems which can be solved by the raising or lowering of the tariff by a certain per cent. I have no desire, of course, to speak slightingly of that which other hon. gentlemen regard as being of very high importance; it is perhaps true that the problems which I have enumerated are affected to a greater or lesser degree by the tariff, but I press the conviction that however important the tariff policy may be, it will not remove the economic causes of unemployment; it cannot be a substitute for a sound monetary policy, nor can it take the place of planned economy. Above all, it cannot in any sense meet the present emergent situation in respect to either unemployment or agriculture. I think it is safe to say that the people are not, or at least of late have not been, much interested in the imperial conference; not that they do not desire imperial trade, but because other matters more urgently claim their undivided attention. No possible agreement with Great Britain can lead to the absorption by that country of Canada's yearly output of goods. So that if the people in general have not shown such enthusiasm about those agreements as have some hon. members, it is not to be wondered at.

The discussion on unemployment, which has just taken place, has, I think, helped to impress upon the house the need for action. The motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was timely, affording the government, as it did, an opportunity to state its policy on unemployment. If the discussion had brought out nothing other than the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) it would have been well worth while. I do not regard the policy of the government in respect to unemployment as adequate, but I am glad that it has announced some policy and that we may hope, as conditions become more and more acute, the government which has taken at least one intellectual step may in the near future be led to take a definite and practical step. The Prime Minister, as is customary with ministers who deal with unemployment questions, was very careful to point out the constitutional difficulties that stand in the way of a practical policy of unemployment insurance, and once more to emphasize that the Dominion government, has not control of the unemployment situation, but that constitutionally such matters belong to the various provinces. He has promised, however, that during the recess and prior to our reassembling in January, he will call a conference of the provinces and they will be asked to come to some decision on the matter of unemployment insurance.

The principle of unemployment insurance which the Prime Minister endorses is one which is commonly called a contributory system. I suppose most people will agree that it is, at least for the time being, perhaps the best policy to adopt, but may I point out to my right hon. friend that the 750,000 or more in Canada who today are living very largely either on charitable doles from institutions or on direct relief from the government, are not in a position to avail themselves of a contributory insurance scheme, even if that were introduced tomorrow. So that while the government's policy of unemployment insurance may be all right for those who are employed, it is useless for those who are not. Surely it is clear that men who are on the dole, men who are begging on the streets, cannot undertake to pay insurance premiums against unemployment. It may be all very well to have such a policy, but my point is that it does not meet the situation of the moment, neither does it meet the situation of the future in its entirety; for taken at its best, unemployment insurance is merely a palliative which, by the way, has been tried in Great Britain for a considerable time and, it would appear, has almost outlived its usefulness in that country and will ultimately be discarded for a policy much more fundamental and far-reaching. At the present time in Canada it might be well to have as a transition palliative a policy of insurance, but to ask men who have been unemployed for two years or more and who, so far as we can see will have no opportunity of being employed in the future, to make a contribution to insurance, is merely to utter an absurdity, for it cannot be done.

Let us now turn to another phase of the question, and that is the one which I think should concern the government and parliament much more than even unemployment insurance. I refer to some way of meeting the unemployment problem at its source and taking constructive steps which may ultimately lead to eliminating what is known today as unemployment. In the meantime the government of the day, having to face such practical difficulties in respect of unemployment, should be looking around for some means by which those who are unemployed, instead of being given small doles that are not sufficient to keep them alive, should be employed in a really wealth producing enterprise. From this section of the house we have before now urged that policies, say of house building, road building, and other useful projects, might be undertaken by the state, which, whatever else they did, would leave the country wealthier than before. This would at least give the unemployed some place in which to live and a greater assurance of security, rather than have them disgruntled as they are, mere beggars for the state's scanty recognition. Instead of being indigents they would have the opportunity of producing such goods as would add to the national wealth; and their manhood would be sustained by the feeling that they were rendering to the country service for anything they would get in return. I suggest that not as a conclusive and all-embracing policy, but as an example of the measures that could be undertaken. I submit that is a much sounder policy than that of making loans of public moneys to private institutions in order to coax them to employ men. If such a policy is followed, we shall always find private institutions which will be very glad to take advantage of it. But I do not wish to say anything more on the unemployment situation.

I want now to ask the house to give some consideration to the agricultural phase of our national problem. I should like to ask that the government state frankly to the house during this debate what its policy is to be in respect to the pressing problems of the farmers of this country. In that regard we must take into consideration the question that is troubling them more than anything else at the moment, and that is the prices which they are obtaining for their produce. Arising out of that very much reduced income, there comes the problem of how they are to meet their financial obligations from day to day; the interest on the borrowings which they had made prior to the slump in farm prices; taxes; the maintenance of their standards of living —in short, all the problems that confront an agriculturist in Canada under present circumstances. I do not need to inform either the government or this house of the conditions of agriculture in detail. I feel sure that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches are just as well acquainted with the facts as I am. I could therefore not hope to enlighten them at all. But I do wish to make another plea with them for a more practical consideration of the question than they have hitherto given it.

The prices of farm products are, as will be admitted by all, the measure not only of the farmer's income but, as things are in Canada now, of the economic security of the nation. It has long been recognized that the agricultural industry is without exception the most important to Canada, and when we find that that industry is completely prostrate it is no wonder that conditions of unemployment and of business stagnation prevail throughout the country. It is safe to say that for the last two years the income for agricultural products has not been sufficient to meet operating expenses, and I think that that is a very conservative statement. It must not be forgotten, either, that many farmers were heavily in debt at the time farm prices slumped. Those who were heavily in debt then are now hopelessly in debt; for during those years not only have they been unable to reduce their indebtedness by paying off anything on the principal, but interest and compound interest has been added to the principal. Many of them have also been unable to pay their taxes. There were many perhaps who, when prices slumped, were not in debt, and it may be that a few of them have been able to remain out of debt, but if they have done so it has been at the expense of their standard of living, which must have been very much reduced, and by selling their stock. In these ways some have struggled nobly to keep themselves out of debt.

As I say, this house is in possession of all the facts in respect to agricultural conditions The situation has become so critical, however, that in some parts the farmers threaten to go on strike by refusing to produce next year's crop unless something is done to relieve their burdens. In that connection I may be permitted to read a telegram which came to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), a few days ago from Rumsey, Alberta. It says:

> A mass meeting of the farmers of Rumsey district demands an immediate bonus on wheat either bushel or acreage plan; the immediate abandonment of the gold standard and the appointment of a national board to control production and marketing of all agricultural products. Plans for complete strike of industry to be pushed unless demands met.

I do not argue, Mr. Speaker, that a threatened strike of farmers has become general throughout Alberta or throughout western Canada, but that wire shows what some of them are thinking, and it indicates that the situation is surely of such significance as to warrant this house and the government giving a great deal more attention to the situation than has been paid to it so far this session.

I have here a number of resolutions which I received, some of them only today, dealing with urgent conditions in western Canada. Here is one I received from Mr. H. G. Laycock, of Ponoka, Alberta, who happened to be secretary of a mass meeting that was held in that town:

Whereas, several months have elapsed since Mr. H. H. Stevens promised sympathetic consideration to Mr. Speakman's resolution re the formation of a council of Social and Economic Research, and whereas the need for such council is daily becoming more imperative;

Therefore be it resolved that the federal parliament implement that promise by establishing this council and setting it to work.

Here is another resolution passed by the same body:

Whereas the price of agricultural products is far below the cost of production;

And whereas most of the producers of primary products are heavily involved in debts;

And whereas at present prices we are in a hopeless position to carry on;

And whereas the extremely low prices of primary products is to a very great extent due to our present monetary system;

Therefore we request at once—

Will the government kindly take note of the time element in this resolution:

Therefore we request at once dominion control of currency and credit, and that the issue of this currency and credit should be based upon the natural wealth and productive capacity of this country, not, as at the present time, upon one single commodity, gold, and that its volume should be determined by the goods and services to be dealt with and the legitimate requirements of the people.

Those resolutions, Mr. Speaker, are symptomatic of the general opinion that prevails throughout western Canada. The house has taken no action on those conditions so far during this session. My object now is to urge the house and the government to action. The Prime Minister during the last election campaign wisely said, in effect, that it was unthinkable that in Canada, where there is such an abundance of real wealth and only ten millions of people, anybody should go hungry or idle and without reasonable economic security. I am as convinced now as I was then that the Prime Minister was right in that view; nevertheless there are hungry and idle people by the hundreds of thousands in Canada, and not only are there idle people whom we call the unemployed, but there are debt-burdened people who are being threatened with eviction right across this country because they are unable to meet their financial obligations. So the situation today is many degrees worse than it was when that observation was made by the leader of the government.

I frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that the government has worked strenuously and the Prime Minister heroically to try to meet the situation along the old lines. His efforts have all been directed along the old channels, which do not lead directly to the root of the problem. Neither the Prime Minister nor the government has explored new ways, and yet new ways will have to be found; for the old ways are inadequate. Surely I do not need to argue to this government that the old ways will not do; for have they not tried them well? Did any government ever try them with more sincerity or show more ability in their application than this government? Did any government ever try the old ways with a greater amount of faith than this government has had, and meet with greater failure?

What are the facts? The measures which have been employed to meet the economic situation in Canada have been measures which were to a certain extent successful in past generations, but faced as we are with a new problem arising out of an entirely different situation those methods are not longer applicable. What I say to the government and to the house is that we must either make capitalism yield life and security to our people, or we must abandon it and begin to build a new system on the foundation fact of abundance. So far as I am concerned I would not spend one hour of my time trying to patch capitalism. I know, however, that the government still holds the view that that system may be resuscitated and made to function. Holding that view, as they do, I must hold the government responsible for making the system work, and if they cannot make it work I suggest that they frankly say so, abandon it, and build another system on the foundation of that abundance which is the most startling and important fact of the economic life of the modern world.

I now come to another phase of the agricultural situation. A very large percentage of our farming population have obligated themselves to pay the loans advanced to them in the ordinary course of their business, namely in the purchasing of land or to meet the cost of goods obtained on credit. These obligations were undertaken prior to the great slump in prices of farm produce. Not only has that obligation been made larger by the interest compounded during the last several years—that in itself would be serious enough—but in the terms of prices of commodities in which a loan payment is possible, the debt is two or three times larger than when contracted.

That condition came about for two reasons. The first is obvious to everybody, namely, that the overproduction of farm products reduced their value in relation to other commodities and in relation to debt values. That is the first. I am not going to charge the government with the responsibility for overproduction of wheat, but I do charge them with failing to act in connection with the other factor which enters into the matter, namely, that of deflation. When the present government came into office Canada was proceeding steadily along a policy of deflation. Until last week we continued to follow that policy. What has been the effect of it upon parliaments—yes, and upon people—who find themselves in debt? Our dollar may have been sound, but it was not honest, and in my view an honest dollar is of much greater importance to the life of the nation than is a sound dollar. A dollar which equalled one bushel of wheat a few years ago when farmers accepted financial obligations has been stretched to equal three or four bushels of wheat. That is not an honest dollar. The dollar has been very accommodating, so far as stretching is concerned, but outside of that it is nothing to be proud of. I believe the question concerning the honesty of our dollar is of such importance that this parliament cannot afford to ignore it. When we have a situation such as I have just mentioned; when through the manipulation of credit by those in charge of it—which, by the way, is not the government—the value of the dollar can be altered so as to increase two or three fold the debts of already overburdened farmers, we are confronted with a problem the importance of which cannot be over-emphasized. Unless the values of commodities, with which alone these debts can be paid, are brought to a parity with commodity values equal to those obtaining when the debt was contracted, it is simply impossible for those debts to be paid. The farmers did not enter into a contractual obligation to give three bushels of wheat for one. I agree with hon. members who state that contractual obligations are sacred, but I argue that the contractual obligations which farmers entered into when they obtained loans a few years ago cannot now be interpreted to mean that they must pay those loans in three times the value which pertained when they received them. I maintain a system which demands that that be done is dishonest and cannot be defended by anyone. Values have departed, in very large degree, from farm investments, just as they did from investments on the stock market. The unpaid interest compounded and added to the principal, plus the increase of debts through deflation, plus the unpaid taxes which have resulted from the unfavourable economic conditions of the past two years, have brought the farmers of western Canada to a very serious position.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is now eleven o'clock. Does the hon. member wish to move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: Before the house adjourns I was going to ask the right hon. leader of the opposition whether he would think it desirable to adjourn until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning; if so I should be pleased to move accordingly. If there is any likelihood of concluding the business of the house this week we might sit at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning; if not we might as well wait until three o'clock. I shall be guided by whatever the right hon. gentleman has to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish I could give the right hon. the Prime Minister some assurance as to the length of time hon. members may require, but I am afraid I cannot do so. Personally I had hoped we might conclude this week, but I am afraid I cannot give my right hon. friend any undertaking in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not expect the right hon. gentleman would be able to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say, however, that hon. members on this side will be agreeable to whatever the right hon. the Prime Minister may decide or wish to do.

Mr. BENNETT: That being the case I move, seconded by Mr. Rhodes:

That when this house adjourns it stand adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning (Thursday).

That, of course, is with the consent of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the first business?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman realizes the first business is now the last business. We will continue with what we are doing, and when that is concluded and the Speaker leaves the chair the Minister of Finance will continue with the resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Today we proceeded first with a bill; I was wondering if tomorrow we would go on with the redistribution measure.

Mr. BENNETT: I was prepared to take only second reading of the bill on Tuesday of last week, but, as I stated to the house on that day, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth asked that it be not then proceeded with. Subsequently the hon. member sent me a note to the effect that it would be satisfactory to proceed on Wednesday, but I did not receive the note until the Wednesday had passed. I think it would be better to dispose first of what may develop into a protracted discussion than to take the representation bill, which can probably be dealt with in a very short time, because in that connection I shall make the ordinary motion to refer it to a committee, which has heretofore been done. The bill is exactly in the form of the bills presented on the two previous redistributions, and it is proposed to follow the same course. The bill will go to a committee of the house, to be named either when the bill is referred or later, as was done on the last occasion. It is proposed to proceed with ways and means immediately the Speaker leaves the chair.

At 11.02 p.m. the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, November 24, 1932

The house met at eleven o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I lay on the table of the house parliamentary return, reference No. 43, inquiring whether any amounts have been paid by the Dominion government to the province of Quebec for the year 1932 as a federal contribution to provincial direct relief expenditures for Lake St. John county, Quebec.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SUPERIOR COURT, KAMOURASKA

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. When will the government fill the vacancy which occurred recently on the bench of the Superior Court, judicial district of Kamouraska?
2. Have any complaints been made in view of the congestion of the dockets resulting from the existence of such vacancy?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. In due course.
2. One letter has been received upon the subject.

WAR DEBTS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Does Canada owe any war debt to the United Kingdom at the present time?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

2. If so, what is the amount of such indebtedness?

Mr. RHODES:

1. No.
2. Answered by 1.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—DISMISSALS

Mr. POULIOT:

What are the names, addresses and dates of dismissal of the employees of the Post Office Department, who were dismissed on charges of political partisanship arising out of the provincial elections in the province of Quebec?

Mr. SAUVE:

Post office—Postmaster—Date of dismissal:
Batiscan, W. Moreau, March 3, 1932.
Boulanger, A. Larouche, March 8, 1932.
Knoxbridge, E. Couture, January 11, 1932.
Lac Ste. Croix, A. Duchesne, March 10, 1932.
Le Petit Bois Franc, M. St. Pierre, August 13, 1932.
Normandin, J. B. Hebert, March 12, 1932.
Ruisseau à l'Eau Chaude, A. McLaughlin, August 20, 1931.
St. Jacques, J. Levesque, April 15, 1931.
St. Norbert (Berthier), J. O. Laporte, December 16, 1931.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT BUREAU

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Is National Development Bureau to be transferred to Trade and Commerce, and if so, to which branch of that department?
2. If not, is it a fact that some highly paid officers of said Interior department are to be absorbed by Trade and Commerce department?
3. What duties would be assigned to these officers by the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it well to direct attention to this question, which is not a proper one. It asks what the government proposes to do or is going to do.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RESIGNATION OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. POULIOT:

How many postmasters have resigned since the month of August, 1930, after having received a letter or circular from the Post Office Department notifying them that complaints of political partisanship had been made against them?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. BENIOT DE PACKINGTON, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, since the month of August, 1930, with respect to the postmastership of St. Benoit de Packington, Témiscouata county.

MISS RUTH EDWARDS

Mr. GAGNON:

For a copy of all letters, requests, correspondence and other documents, exchanged between the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and the different branches of the Department of Agriculture in the different provinces of Canada with the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa, and between the different officers of the Department of Agriculture concerning the transfer from Ottawa to Montreal and elsewhere of one Miss Ruth Edwards who is now working in the Department of Agriculture, Seed branch, Montreal, since 1925 up to now.

MISS MARGUERITE GIRARD

Mr. GAGNON:

For a copy of all letters, requests, correspondence and other documents, exchanged between the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and the different branches of the Department of Agriculture in the different provinces of Canada, with the Civil Service Commission respecting the employment and promotion of one Miss Marguerite Girard, an employee of the Department of Agriculture, Seed branch, Montreal, since 1925 up to now.

INQUIRY REGARDING QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex) : I wish to call attention to the fact that a question of mine which was on the order paper yesterday has been dropped, although it was not answered. I should like to have it restored to the order paper.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It was made an order for return and passed accordingly.

RELIEF TO PENSIONERS

INQUIRY CONCERNING READJUSTMENT OF WINTER AND SUMMER ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The other day I asked a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health with regard to the relief given to disability pensioners. I have a further wire from Winnipeg today, as follows:

Winnipeg pensioners without food, insufficient fuel and clothing. Many children unable to attend school. Immediate increase in relief plus clothing allowance needed.

I understood the minister to say the other day that the department had not been granting clothing but that the pension allowance was equal to that paid in the cities. I am informed that this is not so. May I ask the minister whether it would be possible to have the allowance increased to the extent of the decrease last spring.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Will the hon. member give the signature that appears on the telegram which he has read.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The telegram is signed, "D. H. Niles, Disability Pensioners Association, 504 Beverley St."

Mr. MacLAREN: The question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other day had reference to clothing, and when I replied on that occasion I did not notice that that feature was included in his question. I subsequently sent an answer to the hon. member, to make it clear that the provision did not include clothing and that the department had never furnished clothing for pensioners. If the hon. member will now kindly send me a copy of the communication which he has just read, I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The telegram will appear in Hansard.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS TO CONSIDER TARIFF RESOLUTIONS

On the order:

Resuming adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald) please take the chair.

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Mr. IRVINE: May I point out that I have the floor.

Mr. BENNETT: On ways and means, on Thursday, the Speaker leaves the chair automatically. I said yesterday, when the matter was raised with respect to supply, that the rule is clear with respect to ways and means that the Speaker must leave the chair on Thursdays and Fridays without motion put. The Speaker has done so.

Customs tariff—77. Beans, viz.: Tonquin, crude only; locust beans; locust bean meal: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): If it meets with the approval of the committee I suggest that unless there is some special reference which it is desired to make to those items considered when the bill covering the United Kingdom agreement was in committee, we should deal with items which were not dealt with at that time and which have to be dealt with as a consequence of our having dealt with certain items in connection with the United Kingdom bill. For example, item 77 covers beans, viz: Tonquin, crude only; locust beans; locust bean meal. This item which will be found as part of the resolution which appears in the votes and proceedings of October 12 is the residual of item 77b passed in connection with the United Kingdom agreement and which was taken out of the original item 77.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister whether in his view it is necessary to pass in committee of ways and means the items which have been passed already under schedule E attached to the British agreement, or whether it is his view that in approving of the United Kingdom-Canada agreement and the other agreements, this house, once these measures have passed the Senate and assent is given to them, will not thereby have enacted into law the rates set forth in those acts?

Mr. RHODES: Oh, no, it is essential that we should pass in committee of ways and means the various tariff amendments. The governing law is that which will be found in the bill to be based upon these resolutions to be passed in committee of ways and means. I referred to these special items in order to point out that the discussion which took place when the bill was in committee would serve equally as well for the committee of ways and means. It is quite necessary that we should pass all these items. My right hon. friend will recall that when the bill was in committee I expressed the hope that we would not duplicate the discussion at that time when we reached committee of ways and means.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Some of these items do not appear to be changed, and I should like to know whether or not every item is intended to show a change from the schedule in effect.

Mr. RHODES: As I explained in connection with item 77, portions of certain tariff items were extracted to form part of the United Kingdom agreement and it is now necessary to make adjustments in committee of ways and means. As we come to the items which must be considered in ways and means and which are in addition to those considered in connection with the bill, I shall direct the attention of the committee thereto.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Am I correct in understanding that where an item has been split and a portion has appeared in schedule E, it is then necessary to readjust the balance?

Mr. RHODES: That is quite right; it is necessary to deal with the residual.

Mr. BROWN: Am I correct in understanding that there are no items in this resolution except those which were dealt with in connection with the agreement with Great Britain?

Mr. RHODES: There are only technical amendments or amendments necessary because of the articles already passed as part of the United Kingdom agreement.

Mr. BROWN: There seems to be at least one item here which has reference to the New Zealand agreement made last year. I shall direct attention to it when it is reached.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the minister to say on a previous occasion that if the house itself were to pass a measure involving changes in customs duties without going into ways and means, the duties thus imposed would be binding at law and that it would not be necessary to go into ways and means in order to make an agreement respecting duties with another country. I have all along understood the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite to be that the Liberal administration did that very thing when we were in office, that we made agreements with other countries which were approved and became law without the house considering the tariff changes involved in committee of ways and means. Is that what the minister is still contending?

Mr. RHODES: I am not calling into question any circumstances as I do not think it is necessary for us to deal with procedure at this moment. However, I have no objection to answering my right hon. friend. If my memory serves me right, we dealt with one or two items in connection with the New Zealand treaty, which items were contained in the bill and in connection with which the house did not proceed into ways and means. I may be wrong, but that is my recollection. Whether or not that be so, the fact is that it is absolutely essential that we should go into committee of ways and means, not only to carry out the tariff proposals which were provided for in the United Kingdom agreement but to make the necessary adjustments to the tariff schedule in connection with certain items which were taken from the parent items. That is why I directed attention to item 77, and I shall be glad to call specific attention to each individual change which has been made in addition to those already considered. It will be recalled that I pointed out some time ago that there were some forty items or portions of items which we must consider in committee of ways and means as a consequence of passing the items in connection with the United Kingdom agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is something more than the mere question of procedure, there is the question of whether or not it is necessary to go over the items which were included in the schedules attached to the bills already approved.

Mr. RHODES: I think I get my right hon. friend's point. Technically, we should go over each item but my right hon. friend will recall that when we went into committee on the bill I pointed out that if we took the discussion there it would not be necessary to repeat it. It will be only necessary to deal with the other items and then pass the whole lot, unless there is some particular item to which hon. gentlemen wish to refer. I have no desire to limit the discussion but I should like to avoid unnecessary duplication if it can be avoided.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that which the minister has just said brings out the point I have been trying to make clear all along. My hon. friend now says that technically it is necessary to go into committee of ways and means on every item. I say that the principle governing the imposing of any duty makes it necessary that that duty shall be imposed only as a result of a resolution coming from committee of ways and means, and that it can only be imposed where a resolution has been recommended to the committee by a minister of the crown who has the authority of His Excellency in the first instance to make that recommendation. The minister says that he thinks on some previous occasion, possibly with reference to New Zealand, we never had a committee of ways and means to consider the tariff items—

Mr. ERNST: It was done in the budget.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and if that be the case, I would say it is because no duties were being raised or any additional burdens being placed on the people or that the duties had already been considered in committee of ways and means as a part of the budget, or else that there had been a complete oversight on the part of all parties in the house as to what its rules require, an unintentional oversight and something with respect to which no question has been raised.

I hope the minister will now see that what I have been saying all along, namely, that we should have proceeded in committee of ways and means in the first instance, and that it is only when we have in ways and means approved the resolutions that we can with propriety legislate to approve agreements based upon those resolutions, is the right course to pursue. May I direct my hon. friend's attention to standing order number 60. This is not a question of procedure but a question of principle which governs the imposition of burdens upon the people. Standing order 60 reads:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

And section 551 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms has the following, which is related not to the British procedure, but procedure in this House of Commons:

> It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

We have thus far in this house passed, or rather approved, four agreements, three of which impose additional burdens upon the people. We have done all that without being in committee of ways and means at all. It is quite true that we have been in committee of the whole for the purpose the minister has just referred to, namely, for purposes of discussion only, but not for the purpose of voting resolutions upon which fresh impositions in the nature of customs duties must be based. The discussion was general, but with respect to the agreement with South Africa, the committee was denied the right to do more than refer to the items in the schedule. We were told by the chairman that we might only refer to them; it was only when we came to the United Kingdom agreement and secured the general consent of the house that we were given the liberty of discussing them in detail. The step that we are now taking is the one which should have been taken at the outset with respect to the duties which appear in the schedules of these agreements; we should have gone into them all in the first instance item by item in committee of ways and means and had the resolutions reported therefrom; afterwards we would have been in a position to enact legislation based upon the items approved. The government has repeatedly said, referring to the treaty with the West Indies, the treaty with France, the treaty with Czechoslovakia and other agreements, that it is following the same procedure as was followed by the former administration in reference to these measures. I respectfully submit that the government is not following the same procedure, for this reason; that in these other treaties to which reference has been made—I speak subject to correction, but I think I am right—additional burdens in the form of increased customs duties were not imposed upon the people and it therefore was not necessary in those cases in the first instance to go into committee of ways and means to have the house adopt the necessary resolutions. Those agreements related to duties as they were existing at the time, or as already mentioned the house had dealt with them in committee of ways and means when it was considering the budget; any additional charges or duties imposed by the agreement were in the nature of changes made when the house discussed the budget resolutions, and it was after the budget resolutions had been approved that the agreements were brought in and the approval of parliament was asked for them. It has been one or other of those two courses, but in any case if any additional burden has been imposed upon the people without the resolutions being considered in the first instance in ways and means with a minister of the crown recommending them to the house, I can say without fear of contradiction that has been due to an oversight in connection with the rules, for which oversight all parties in the house were responsible and with respect to which no question was raised at the time.

With regard to this agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada and the other agreements, the question was specifically raised and the attention of the government was directed to the proper procedure and the underlying principles. The government took the attitude that there was a difference in the methods of procedure followed in the British and Canadian houses. In that the minister is entirely wrong. The principle is the same in both houses. It is a fundamental principle which is at stake, and one which should have been observed.

Mr. RHODES: With respect to the earlier portion of the remarks just made by my right hon. friend I am in entire accord. He has asserted that we are now taking the right course for the purpose of enacting the tariff schedules, but with respect to the latter portion, my right hon. friend and I must agree to disagree. I do not for one moment assent to the proposition he has made that we should have started in the first instance in committee of ways and means. If he will look at article 9 of the United Kingdom agreement, he will find that it reads:

> His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule, provided that nothing in this article shall preclude His Majesty's government in Canada—

And so on. We are now doing that, and the only reason we are in committee of ways and means is in consequence of the United Kingdom agreement which calls upon us to implement it. We can do that only by committee of ways and means. I do not propose to labour this argument with my right hon. friend, because I am prepared to agree at once that he is thoroughly sincere and, if I may say so without offence, obsessed with the idea that we are proceeding wrongly in this matter. I wish to repeat: If the house had in its wisdom rejected the United Kingdom agreement, it would not be necessary for us to go into committee of ways and means. Therefore it would be absurd, prior to the house having assented to an agreement, to go into committee of ways and means in order to implement items in the tariff which are called for only if that agreement is approved by the house. I submit that we must agree to disagree. I believe we have taken the absolutely correct procedure. Having said that, I do not know that I can say anything more. I do not know that any good purpose can be served by our discussing the question as to what has been done hitherto with respect to the agreements and whether we have or have not gone into committee of ways and means. My right hon. friend and I are in entire agreement that it is necessary to go into committee of ways and means and we are here. That is the essential part.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not any more desirous than is my hon. friend to delay the committee by discussing the matter at greater length, but it is one that may affect subsequent procedure in this house and it ought to be definitely settled at once. May I ask the minister this question: Assume for some reason it had become necessary to adjourn this house today, the Senate having approved the agreement with Great Britain and His Majesty's representative having given royal assent to that agreement so approved; would that agreement not then become binding upon Canada as law, and would not the changes in the tariff which are contained in the schedule which form a part of it be law? May I ask my hon. friend to answer that question?

Mr. RHODES: May I point out to my right hon. friend that we cannot in committee settle a question of procedure. The only procedure we have to do with in committee is a technical one having reference to the articles and the subject matter for consideration in committee. The question whether we should proceed in committee is one which can be decided only by the house.

May I say to my right hon. friend that there is nothing mysterious about this thing. If we were to proceed to adjourn parliament without having gone ahead in committee of ways and means and passed a bill based upon those resolutions, and if the United Kingdom agreement were to pass the Senate, be assented to by His Excellency and become law, we would be placed in this position, that while we had agreed in that agreement to do certain things, we would not have implemented our pledge by reason of the fact that we had not taken the necessary action in ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend and I are not very far apart just now. He says we would not have implemented the agreement. But that does not answer my question whether what was embodied in the agreement would not become the law. He has said that this house has proceeded simply with the agreement without going into committee of ways and means, thereby implying that we can make an agreement imposing duties without first of all going into committee of ways and means.

Mr. RHODES: The bill would become law, yes, but we would not have passed the necessary implementing legislation associated with it which we must pass in this committee of ways and means. My right hon. friend and I are not very far apart. The only difference between us, as I apprehend it, is that my right hon. friend says that we should have proceeded with ways and means before we proceeded with the bill. I am in direct disagreement with him on that point, and I think we must agree to disagree in that respect. I think logic is on my side for this reason: If we had proceeded into committee of ways and means and had passed these resolutions and had then failed to pass the bill, what position would we have been in? My right hon. friend says that the answer is obvious and that it is only necessary now that we should go into ways and means because parliament has agreed that we ought to do what we are now called upon to do in committee of ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my hon. friend says that in the circumstances I have mentioned the bill approving the United Kingdom trade agreement would now be law, that means that everything in the bill is binding on the country, that it is part of the legislation of the country, that the duties there imposed are part of our tariff schedules.

Mr. ERNST: He has not said so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what he said, and if the bill is the law that must be the case. But whether the Minister of Finance says so or not, after the bill is approved by parliament and assented to by His Excellency that bill is the law and the tariff is in effect as set forth in the schedules. But the procedure would have been wholly unconstitutional and against the fundamental principles governing in these matters. That point is very clear.

I am stressing what I am saying at the moment first of all because I believe that we would have had an entirely different view of this situation if we had proceeded in the right way, but even more I stress it because it is the duty of every hon. member, and of no one more than the leader of the opposition to see that the rules of the house are observed and that the right procedure is observed, and that fundamental principles are observed, and also to see if there have been mistakes made in the past or being made in the present that they shall not, if possible, occur again in the future. My contention is that we have already enacted these tariff schedules so far as this house is concerned, and going over them here and now a second time is a mere pretext in so far as the items in the schedules may be the same as those we have discussed. They are already enacted so far as the action of this house is concerned, and they have been so enacted without this house having done what the Minister of Finance himself says is necessary in imposing any duties or obligations upon the people, namely, being considered first of all and approved by resolution in committee of ways and means. We are at this moment in committee of ways and means for the first time this session, and we have not yet considered a single item. The whole procedure I contend has been subversive of the rules of this house.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I shall not yield to my right hon. friend in a desire to see that the rules of this house are observed in every particular. We may differ sometimes upon the interpretation of a rule, but I am just as anxious as any hon. gentleman in this house to see that its rules are strictly observed, and I believe that they have been strictly observed in this instance except in this one respect, that we are breaking the rules of the house at the present moment in discussing a question of procedure here that ought to be discussed in the house. But I am not going to stress that point.

My right hon. friend draws an inference from what I said which he could not properly draw at all. I said a moment or two ago that if we passed the United Kingdom agreement and it passed the Senate and received the assent of His Excellency the Governor General it would become the law, but at the same time I said that we would have failed to implement the agreement contained in the bill unless we passed the tariff schedules in committee of ways and means. In other words, the statute itself would not make operative those changes in our tariff. That must be done in committee of ways and means, and then we would have to pass a bill, just as we shall have to do after these resolutions have been approved by this committee. A bill will then have to be introduced and pass through all its stages.

I submit to my right hon. friend that we are not serving any good purpose by prolonging this discussion. As I said before, we are in agreement up to one point. We are in agreement that we are regularly in committee and that we ought to be in committee of ways and means, and that we should deal with these schedules in committee of ways and means. The only point on which we differ is that my right hon. friend says that we should have considered these schedules in committee of ways and means before we considered the bill. I say precisely the reverse, because if we had not passed the bills it would not have been necessary to go into committee of ways and means at all.

Customs tariff—20a. Butter produced from the cocoa bean: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 3 cents per pound; general tariff, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say something on this item.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no objection, but we agreed that we would not repeat the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wonder that the minister does not want anything to be said.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, now, Mr. Chairman, I was simply reminding the right hon. gentleman, in I think a most courteous and friendly way, that we had agreed that we would not repeat the discussion. The right hon. gentleman himself was the one who responded to that suggestion, but if he desires, I have no objection to his discussing every item all over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I think the house has only to look to what I said to the Prime Minister last night with respect to my desire to see proceedings brought as speedily as possible to a termination to realize that I have no desire unduly to discuss any matters, but I have a desire to make perfectly clear the position of this side of the house on some matters which have not been discussed. Surely I have that right. May I ask this question of the minister? According to the change that is being made here, the duty on butter produced from the cocoa bean is being raised from 2 cents per pound in the intermediate and general tariffs, to 3 cents per pound in both those tariffs. May I ask the minister whether that change will apply to goods of this class coming from Great Britain and also to goods coming to Canada from Ireland? I assume I may take it that his answer would be that it does.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then may I ask this? The British agreement has a clause providing that the margin of preference on goods coming from Britain must be maintained for a period of five years. That is explicitly set forth in that agreement. That means that in order to maintain the preference of three cents given to Britain the intermediate and general tariffs cannot be lowered for a period of five years. Will my hon. friend show me where in the agreement with the Irish Free State there is any undertaking that the intermediate or general tariff shall be maintained at any existing level; in this case it would be on cocoa butter at three cents per pound.

Mr. STEVENS: It is quite clear. Under the British agreement we fix a certain rate of duty in the British preference column, and we undertake to maintain that preference on certain articles. Under the Irish agreement we extend to the Irish Free State the duty rates extended to Great Britain, and as long as the duty rate is maintained against Great Britain it must necessarily extend to and be maintained against Ireland for a period of five years. It is as simple and as clear as day. That is provided by, I think, section 3 of the Irish treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just said that under the British treaty we extend to Ireland these privileges. I did not ask with respect to the British treaty; I asked with respect to the agreement between Ireland and Canada. Where, in the agreement between Ireland and Canada, is there any condition or any undertaking to maintain any preference? There is none. I should like to make my position clear, in order to illustrate what I sought to bring out the other day, and which was responsible for the change, in my own mind, as to the attitude hon. members on this side of the house should take towards the Irish agreement. That change was brought about because the minister was placing an entirely different construction upon the Irish agreement than we were placing upon it or than its wording permits being placed upon it.

First of all, may I say that at the beginning of the discussion on the agreements, I asked the Prime Minister if there were any undertakings or understandings with respect to any of them which did not appear on the face of the agreements themselves, and I was assured by the Prime Minister that there were no such undertakings or understandings. I accepted his word for that, and in every action with respect to the agreements since that time I have based my action upon that assurance. I have been under the impression that there was no undertaking or understanding of any kind between this country and either the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland, the Irish Free State, South Africa or Rhodesia which did not appear on the face of the agreements made between those respective countries and Canada.

The agreement between the Irish Free State and Canada is comprised in its entirety in the schedule attached to the bill we have before us. That agreement I studied carefully before this house met, in order to see what was to be given to Ireland. My reading of it led me to believe—and I am sure other hon. members must have come to the same conclusion; it is the only conclusion that could be come to by the reading of the agreement in itself—that it simply gave to Ireland an undertaking that no duties other than those which were imposed on British goods coming into Canada would be imposed upon goods coming from Ireland, and that no higher rates of duty would be imposed against goods coming from Ireland than are imposed against Great Britain. That, and nothing more, was set out with respect to goods coming to Canada. Let me illustrate: If, for example, there were no duty on linen from Great Britain to Canada, for the period of five years for which the agreement would be in force, duty could not be imposed on linen coming from Ireland. Or, if duty on linen coming from Great Britain to Canada had been fixed at ten per cent, then Canada could not place a duty of fifteen per cent on linen coming from Ireland, because we had undertaken to see that no higher duty would be imposed against goods coming from Ireland. The clause is as clear and distinct as it can be.

> Goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, imported into Canada, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

That is the whole undertaking as set forth in the agreement with Ireland with respect to duties upon goods coming into Canada. In the light of the assurance given by the Prime Minister that there was no undertaking or understanding which does not appear on the face of the agreement itself for which approval was being sought by the government, I was prepared to voice my approval of the Irish agreement. But, what do we now find?

When we come to the bill to approve the agreement, we find that the government has done something with respect to Ireland which is entirely wide of, and apart from the terms of the agreement altogether. The agreement relates only to duties—no new duties, no higher rates of duty, that is all. By the provisions of the bill, however, the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us on Tuesday last, the government was asking not only approval of the Irish agreement but approval of the Irish agreement plus the British agreement, in the one measure. Mark you, this is not as respects anything in the agreement itself; it is what appears in a separate bill. It is supposed to be an act approving the Irish agreement, but, according to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it is an act to approve of the Irish agreement, plus approval of the British agreement in its entirety. I say that is complete deception. Whether or not it was deliberate or intentional I must leave to the opinion of hon. members. To say that it was would not be parliamentary, but if that was the intention and the intention a sincere one, I believe it to be most extraordinary that the intention and the language by which it was carried out, were not made known to the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce before we were asked to support anything of the kind. Speaking when we were approving the agreement on Tuesday last, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

This whole bill—

The bill approving the Irish agreement.

—is based upon, allied to, intertwined and amalgamated with, or any other similar term you like to use, the British agreement. Every jot and tittle, every crossed t and every dotted i of the British agreement is in this.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if there was occasion for surprise that, having accepted the Prime Minister's word with respect to what was proposed to be done in connection with the approval of the Irish agreement, and being led to approve it on the understanding that it did not increase or maintain duties, but simply gave to Ireland the benefit of duties imposed against Great Britain and being led to believe that duties would not be raised or new duties imposed I should change my position and ask the party with which I am connected to change its position when we were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the bill not only enacted the Irish agreement but imposed the whole of the British agreement upon us as well.

Mr. ERNST: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment.

Mr. ERNST: I am rising to a point of order. I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the item before us is cocoa beans or sour grapes. I do not know what the remarks of the right hon. gentleman have to do with cocoa beans.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know whether the hon. member who has just spoken is speaking as a member of parliament or as a very smart boy?

Mr. ERNST: I am serious, Mr. Chairman; what have the remarks of the hon. member to do with cocoa beans?

Mr. REID: Give him another medal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My remarks are directly connected with the item before us.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have everything to do with the item before us, because the whole question of the maintenance of duties is raised by this as well as by every other item. My contention is that there is nothing in the Irish agreement which obliges us to maintain any rates of duty, so long as that agreement is in force. In support of my belief that there has been some endeavour to mislead parliament, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the sequence in which the different agreements were brought into the house. First there was the agreement with Southern Rhodesia, followed by the agreement with Ireland; that in turn was followed by the agreement with South Africa, and last of all we were called upon to deal with the agreement with Great Britain. The terms of the bills approving the various agreements are much the same, but there are one or two significant differences in certain of them, the significance of which has only just become apparent.

Article 4 of the schedule attached to the agreement with South Africa is as follows:

His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada will, in regard to the goods enumerated in schedule "A," maintain the margins of tariff concession represented by the difference between the rates accorded to Union goods in that schedule and the presently existing rates on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

That was a clause in the agreement with South Africa definitely obligating us to maintain certain rates with respect to commodities coming from South Africa to Canada. In the Irish agreement there is no clause corresponding to that at all. There is no article in the agreement between Canada and Ireland which obligates us to maintain any preference, any margin of tariff concession or any existing rates at all. If at this time we are obliged to maintain any preference or rates of duty with respect to goods coming from Ireland it is because the government has gone outside the Irish agreement altogether and, by a clause in the approving bill which is worded differently from those in the bills approving of any of the other agreements, has done what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said it was the intention of the government to do, namely to smuggle the whole British agreement into the bill which we were being asked to pass at that time.

When we considered the bill approving the agreement with South Africa we found a clause worded except in one particular similarly to that which appears in the agreement with Ireland. It reads as follows:

After the said agreement is brought into force, and so long as it remains in force, goods mentioned in the said agreement, the produce or manufacture of the Union of South Africa, imported into the Dominion of Canada in the manner provided in the said agreement, shall be admitted to the Dominion of Canada at the rates of duties provided in the said agreement.

The clauses are exactly the same in the bills approving the South African agreement and in that approving the Irish agreement, with the exception of these last words of section 3. They will be admitted to Canada, the South African approval act says:

At the rates of duties provided in the said agreement.

If those words had been used in the bill relating to goods coming from Ireland we would have had and would now have no exception to take.

Mr. STEVENS: There was no schedule in the Irish agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a reference to duties, which is the same thing. A schedule only sets out certain duties. "At the rates of duties provided in the said agreement;" that is as far as any act approving the Irish agreement should have gone, because it did not relate to anything else except undertaking that duties would not be raised or new duties imposed.

May I say this further. There is a double reason why in the act approving the Irish agreement the same language should have been used as in the South African agreement: it is that the language in the schedule itself warranted the use of the same language. Article 2 in the schedule is:

Goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, imported into Canada, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The act approving that does not include, as the South African act does, the undertaking with respect to duties set forth in the agreement, but it inserts something which does not appear in this other agreement:

. . . shall be admitted into the Dominion of Canada on the terms granted to similar articles, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

"On the terms granted." On those words, which we were expected to read in the light of the agreement between Ireland and Canada, and in the light of the Prime Minister's undertaking that we would not be asked to approve anything that was not in the agreement, we naturally assume that the terms there referred to were the terms of the schedule, that is to say, the terms of the agreement itself, and nothing more. Instead they were in the intention of the government quite other terms, namely, those of the United Kingdom agreement, terms of which we had no knowledge or suspicion whatever until the Minister of Trade and Commerce so informed us just before the division on Tuesday last. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is entirely in order, and indeed necessary, to bring up this matter at this point, because it affects the whole schedule of tariff items or rather tariff resolutions now before us. If the government continues, as I presume it intends, after what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, to say that in approving the Irish treaty we were approving the whole British treaty, then all I can say is that the house has been completely deceived, and the country has been completely deceived as to the true nature and intent of the agreement made between Ireland and Canada. May I illustrate what I am saying in this way; there is nothing on Ireland's part which corresponds to the undertaking which we are giving in this parliament with regard to maintaining the British agreement in reference to goods coming to Canada from Ireland. The fact that there is not, shows that this addition has been made, not at the instance of the Irish Free State at all, but by the present administration for purposes, I venture to say, too sinister to permit of my mentioning them at this time.

Mr. STEVENS: In the first place I want to draw attention to the fact that this has been all out of order. Not only out of order in that we have an item before us and are in committee of ways and means, but on the ground that the Irish agreement, the South African agreement, and the British agreement have passed third reading and left this house. But I am going to crave the indulgence of the committee for a moment, if on no other ground than on the question of privilege, to reply to the last observations of the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman said that with motives too sinister to mention the government had deliberately deceived this house. In the first place that is not a parliamentary reference, it is strictly out of order. In the next place it is not true, and it cannot be borne out by the record. The right hon. gentleman has repeatedly in the last half hour indicated and also inferred it the other evening in a brief observation that he made just before voting, that he was deceived by the Prime Minister and by the government, when the Irish treaty was before the house. If you turn to page 888 of Hansard you find there the record of the introduction and acceptance by the house of the Irish treaty. I am going to read what the right hon. gentleman then said and what the Prime Minister said, and I will leave it to the house as to where probity rests in this matter.

Mr. Mackenzie King: With regard to the schedule,—

Referring to the Irish treaty.

—I observe that for the most part its purpose is to secure both the Irish Free State and Canada against duties being raised against each other. It is protection as against the raising of duties on the part of either country.

That was his interpretation on the first reference he made to the agreement. Yet the Prime Minister deceived him, did he?

Mr. Bennett: I do not think the right hon. gentleman has followed the language of the schedule. The first article reads:

"Goods the produce or manufacture of Canada, imported into the Irish Free State, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of any other country."

In other words, no more favourable terms can be accorded any other country than to Canada. Then, so far as the complementary article is concerned, it provides:

And the Prime Minister reads again from the agreement to the right hon. gentleman in reply to his question, enlightening him, calling his attention to the point. The Prime Minister reads:

Goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, imported into Canada, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Calling the right hon. gentleman's attention to precisely what was in it, yet he now says we deceived him on that.

[Mr. Stevens.]

But that is not all. Then the right hon. gentleman proceeded. I quote again from page 888:

Mr. Mackenzie King: It may be said, however, that, generally speaking, the emphasis is on protection of each country against higher duties, rather than—

And the Prime Minister interrupts, and sets him right.

Mr. Bennett: No. I think I can put it fairly by saying that it does not do either one or the other. It does, however, secure this preference to Canada, that we shall receive the benefits of the lowest rates imposed by the Irish Free State; and, conversely, we afford to them the rates, whatever they may be, charged against the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland.

Yet the right hon. gentleman says we have deceived him, says that he had not an opportunity of understanding the Irish agreement. Twice the Prime Minister set him right when the agreement was before us, twice he answered him, twice he corrected his interpretation of it, the same interpretation as he now puts upon it. The Prime Minister carefully, as a nurse would for a child, corrected the interpretation the right hon. gentleman put upon it. Yet he comes to the house today and says that this government deliberately deceived him, and "for motives too sinister to mention." What are the motives that he infers? What motives have we? Everything that human beings could do has been done in the last three weeks to satisfy every reasonable question asked by my hon. friends. I apologize to the committee for speaking with a little heat, but is it any wonder? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, leaving aside my hon. friends on this side of the house, is it any wonder, sitting here as we have week after week for six weeks, and during the past two weeks going over these items in the most minute detail, that we should feel at least somewhat chagrined when the right hon. gentleman stands up and says that "for motives too sinister to mention" we have deliberately deceived him, in face of the fact that the Prime Minister set him right twice previously when the Irish matter was under discussion?

Now, coming to the point that the right hon. gentleman has raised, he says that I can show nothing in the Irish treaty that guarantees to the Irish the continuance of the preference. I have already answered the question but I will answer it again, and I appeal to the intelligence and reasonableness of any hon. gentleman opposite whether my interpretation is not a fair and correct one. We made no specific schedules with relation to the Irish. It was a broad and sweeping contract. The contract with the Irish was simply this, in plain language—and it could not be plainer than it is in the article itself. We said that we would give to the Irish the rates and conditions and terms that we gave to Great Britain. In other words, we looked at it this way when discussing the question with the Irish—and I may say that I discussed it with them myself and found them most reasonable gentlemen. We took this general view. The Irish Free State is now separated from the United Kingdom under Dominion status, whereas previously it was part of the United Kingdom, like northern Ireland. But we said that for the purposes of these trade negotiations we would look upon the Irish Free State as though it were part of the United Kingdom and northern Ireland, although in order to conform with the constitutional status we had to enter into this separate agreement; and instead of going into a lot of elaborate detail we merely extended to them all that we have extended to the British. Now, what have we extended to the British? Certain schedules, certain rates of duties and preferences; and furthermore we have guaranteed that in regard to schedule E the spread will be maintained. That, broadly speaking, is what we have done. We have simply said to the Irish, "We will give to you the same rates, the same spreads and for the same period of years." Could it be more clear or more definite than that? "But," says my hon. friend, "I don't see that mentioned in here." Well, the language itself ensures it:

> Goods, the produce or manufacture of the Irish Free State, imported into Canada, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties than those paid on similar goods, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

In the next article we declare that this agreement shall be in force for a period of five years from the date of its coming into force and thereafter until the expiration of six months from the date on which either government shall have given to the other notice of its intention to terminate the agreement. If it can be made clearer than that, if the right hon. gentleman can suggest how it can be made clearer, I should like to know.

I resent, more than I can express, indeed, more than I dare to express, the suggestion, the unfair, unparliamentary statement of the right hon. gentleman, that from motives too sinister to mention this government had deliberately deceived. He had no right to make that statement. There was no ground for it. There has not been one moment during the past six weeks that we have not laboured, to the point of absolute exhaustion, to give the right hon. gentleman and his followers replies as courteous and as full and complete as we could; and I may say to him that, in marked contradistinction to his attitude, many hon. gentlemen opposite, gentlemen, have come to me and come to the Minister of Finance in my hearing and, I know, out of my hearing, and have thanked us for the manner in which we have replied to their numerous demands. That I look upon as parliamentary sportsmanship. In the face of the courteous corrections which the Prime Minister gave to him when he put upon the Irish agreement the same interpretation which he now puts upon it, I invite the right hon. gentleman now to say whether or not he was justified in making that most unparliamentary and unfair slur upon the government and upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept the minister's invitation. May I direct his attention to the fact that in all that the Prime Minister said and in what the minister himself has just read, the Prime Minister was careful enough to speak of duties and rates of duties, but he made no mention whatever of any preferential margins or maintenance of preferential margins or of any of the terms of the British agreement. The minister has talked about parliamentary sportsmanship. May I say that hon. gentlemen opposite knew, and knew very well, that our main objection to the agreements was what they effected in the way of making tariffs permanent and seeking to maintain preferential margins at a level which would shut out goods from other countries. It was not only the part of sportsmanship but a part of the duty of the ministry itself, which it did not perform, to have drawn the attention of the house to the fact that these clauses had the meaning which is now attached to them if such was the meaning attached to them by the ministry. That is the answer I make to the minister. May I further observe that so far as parliamentary sportsmanship is concerned, we have nothing to learn from the hon. gentleman.

The first obligation upon a ministry, in dealing with any question, to say nothing of an imperial question of such large proportions and far-reaching possibilities as this, affecting as it does the relations between different parts of the empire, is to disclose to parliament the fullest significance and bearing of all that is implied. When I speak of sinister methods what I have in mind is precisely the kind of thing that was done when the ministry sought to carry through a byelection in South Huron on the basis of agreements which had not yet been made public—giving to the public that part of the agreement which related to the preferences we were to get in the British market, but withholding from the electorate all those increases in duty which were contained in the other part of the agreement, a kind of procedure which was followed in this house, when we were given only the portions of the agreement referring to preferences in the British tariff before being given the parts referring to the increases in our own tariff, and when we were asked and compelled to give approval to the agreement before we had discussed in committee of ways and means the tariff changes involved. That is all of a piece. It has been an endeavour to have parliament legislate in the dark, to have the country governed in the dark; and the sinister part of the whole business is this—

Mr. STEVENS: That is false.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —that under the guise of an endeavour to further trade between different parts of the empire this ministry has been seeking to increase the tariffs of the country beyond all previous proportions and to fix them at intolerable heights for a period of five years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not want to protract the debate, but—

An hon. MEMBER: The Irish vote is gone now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the hon. gentleman who interrupts cannot make any more intelligent contribution to the discussion, he had better leave the chamber. It seems to me that this whole discussion has been brought about by one circumstance, namely, that these agreements were all thrown together at the conference at the last moment, not necessarily through the fault of this administration. The fact is, however, that they were thrown together at the last moment in undue haste. Remember what happened. When we commenced to discuss the British agreement, Bill No. 8, article 1, different interpretations were placed upon it by many of us, rightly or wrongly, as a result of what the Prime Minister himself said when he introduced the resolution, and we debated the matter for some ten days until we obtained the admission from the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself that there was no guarantee in article 1 of the British agreement with regard to preferential margins, but only in regard to free entry. Then came schedule 2, and I deemed it my duty with respect to article 2 of the agreement to make another inquiry as to whether the British government was obliged thereunder to maintain the schedule of duties which were given to Canada and which the minister himself said constituted the kernel of the agreement so far as Canada was concerned. The same with article 3 and article 4, to the end of the chapter. Right through you will find in all the agreements nothing but chaos and confusion—absolute and utter confusion. And that confusion was added to by the confusion of the ministry itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not expect my hon. friend from Renfrew to understand this argument; he is not intellectually qualified to do so. Let me deal with the facts. Now, the resolution was introduced into this house by the Prime Minister. The first request came from this side at the time we were considering the merits of the resolution. We asked that the schedules of the bill be considered in detail in order that we might obtain the necessary knowledge. That request was refused and we were compelled to vote upon the resolution as an entity. The bill was introduced and when it came to second reading we asked that we should go into committee of ways and means at that time. We are now in committee of ways and means for the first time. I agree with my right hon. leader that we have violated every single rule of this house in the procedure which we have adopted.

In regard to the treaty with Finland, the treaty with New Zealand and the treaty with France, a special rule of parliament applied and continued to apply until 1927. The previous government carried out the rules of this house to the utmost degree, while this government has broken those rules.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member is out of order now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are out of order all the time.

Mr. ERNST: What has this to do with butter produced from the cocoa bean?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The other evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in referring to the Irish treaty, said:

> Every jot and tittle, every crossed t and every dotted i, of the British agreement is in this,—

Is that statement true? It is an absolute misstatement of fact. The British agreement contains article 2 and schedule B which do not appear in the Irish agreement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce should be the last to impute motives to other hon. members when he himself has made such a statement as appears on page 1427 of Hansard. I ask any hon. member in this house: Is that a true statement? It is not. Article 2 and schedule B of the British agreement do not apply to Ireland. I say to the minister: am I not right?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly you are.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course I am right.

Mr. ERNST: Were you ever wrong?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The other day when the minister got up in the house—

Mr. COTNAM: Just a gas tank.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend has not recovered from the effects of last evening, he should leave the chamber. The minister may have made that statement in a hurry, but I ask him: Is it fair to say that every jot and tittle of the British agreement is contained in the Irish agreement when article 2 and schedule B, which he himself said two weeks previously were the kernel of the British agreement, do not apply to Ireland? As my hon. friend pointed out a few moments ago, the Prime Minister stated, very fairly I think, that our goods entered Ireland under the most favoured nation rates and that possibly they had given us better conditions than they had to Great Britain, taking into account the tariff war now being waged.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When I am through, certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend asked a question and then answered it himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will not deprive my hon. friend of his opportunity to answer, but I do suggest that when he says that every jot and tittle of the British agreement applies to Ireland, it is not the fact because schedule B and article 1 do not apply.

Mr. STEVENS: That is for goods going the other way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, for goods going the other way. The trouble with my hon. friend is that he was going both ways when he made that statement.

Mr. STEVENS: It was your leader who was going both ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I ask hon. members on both sides of the house: when any one says that every jot and tittle of the British agreement applies to Ireland, what does he mean? Does he not mean that every clause in the treaty between Great Britain and Canada which affects goods coming from Great Britain to Canada and going from Canada to Great Britain, applies to the Irish agreement which affects goods coming from Ireland to Canada and going from Canada to Ireland? The terms are absolutely synonymous; the minister knows that and he knew it when he made that statement. In parliamentary language, I say that that statement is not in accordance with the facts because article 2 and schedule B do not apply to Ireland.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): I should like to direct attention to one or two matters which have occurred to me. We are now dealing with the first item in the resolution, and I would refer the committee to standing order 60, quoted by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, which reads:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

All the items in the resolution now before the committee have been passed upon by a committee of the whole house. My impression from the minister's opening remarks was that there were certain items which would have to be dealt with, which were consequential to the agreements and that this discussion would necessarily be confined to such items. If we go over the whole thing again then we will be repeating what has been gone over in a committee of this house. In doing this I think we would be up against the rules of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me that there was an understanding that we would not repeat in committee of ways and means much of the discussion which had taken place when the bill approving the United Kingdom agreement was before us in committee. What we have been discussing this morning is something which has arisen since that time and which relates to a matter in its general significance quite apart from the understanding arrived at. As we go through these items one by one, should expect that we would not repeat what was said with respect to the particular items when we were in committee; that is perfectly clear, but we would like the items called one by one as we may wish formally to register our disapproval of many of them. Speaking generally, we are opposed to all increases; if we do not oppose every item as we run along, it is simply because we do not wish to delay unduly the proceedings of the committee. But we want to have that perfectly understood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know just what the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite is going to be. If they are going to contend that because we do not rise and oppose each item, we are thereby consenting to the increases, we will insist upon our right to rise and oppose each individual item. If there is not going to be fair play on both sides of the committee, we will not get through as soon as hon. gentlemen opposite expect. I want it to be understood that if we do not rise and oppose every single increase, it is not because we are consenting. We are opposed to all increases which appear in this resolution. We intend to exercise our right to register that protest with respect to single items and in doing so it will be but indicative of our general attitude.

In regard to your remarks, Mr. Chairman, although it is perfectly true that these agreements have been referred to in and somewhat discussed by the committee of the house, where matters have reference to the imposition of duties or taxation, they must be brought before the house in the first instance in the form of resolutions and discussed in committee of ways and means. Such matters cannot be dealt with in any final or authoritative manner by discussing the clauses of a bill only after its second reading.

Mr. RHODES: When we were in committee on the bill we agreed that the discussion would proceed in the form it would take in committee of ways and means. At that time I expressed the hope that when we came to committee of ways and means, we would not duplicate the discussion. That was assented to. Despite that, however, I have no objection; if hon. gentlemen wish to open up new items, that is their privilege. But I wish to point this out: we are now in committee of ways and means and the rules specifically state that discussion in committee shall be applicable particularly to the item under consideration. I wish to say to my right hon. friend that practically the whole of his remarks made in committee today have been distinctly out of order. He was discussing in the first place the principle of bills which are not before the committee, which have been agreed to by the house and which have been passed on to the Senate. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was doubly out of order. Not only was he discussing that, but he proceeded to quote from a previous debate in the same session, and to do so is precluded by the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Trade and Commerce did the same thing before I did.

Mr. RHODES: The Minister of Trade and Commerce was exercising his right to make a reply to the leader of the opposition—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have I not also the same right?

Mr. RHODES: —but he particularly pointed out, in doing so, that my right hon. friend was out of order and he could reply only as a matter of courtesy and privilege. It is not necessary for my right hon. friend to make specific objection to each individual item. By the statement he has just made he preserves his whole position, and lest there be any misapprehension upon that point, let me repeat that we understand the right hon. gentleman and his supporters are opposed to every one of these items.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The increases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Items which involve increases.

Mr. RHODES: Which involve increases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the maintenance of the preference.

Mr. RHODES: In the maintenance of the preference. We have that specific declaration, I hope beyond any question of peradventure. That being so, I submit, if we are going to make any progress, we had better return to cocoa butter, follow it with other items and endeavour to make progress.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): Shall I call out each item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Call out the numbers.

Customs tariff--135b. Sugar, above number 16 Dutch standard in colour when imported or purchased in bond in Canada by a recognized sugar refiner for refining purposes only, under regulations by the minister, when exceeding 98 degrees, but not exceeding 99 degrees polarization, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 31·64 cents.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. RHODES: This is the law as it stands today, unchanged in rate or in wording. It is merely placing as a specific item in the tariff that which is now the law.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My difficulty is this: it is in the tariff; just why is the government inserting it now in the tariff resolutions?

Mr. RHODES: It was not in the tariff. It was done by order in council following the Australian treaty. It comes now into the tariff for the first time and is given a number.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain what is "16 Dutch standard"? We want to get at the bottom of this.

Mr. RHODES: There has been a debate upon this every year. It is a colour standard. It is a highly technical matter and I am not in a position to give my hon. friend a correct technical description of this item. If he would go down to the Department of National Revenue, the officials there could show him the specimens and give him the technical explanation, but I cannot do so.

Mr. YOUNG: I have an idea that the "16 Dutch standard," which has been abandoned by nearly every country but Canada, has been very highly valued by Canadian sugar refiners for purposes of their own. But apart from that, item 135, which is the raw sugar item, quotes the rates on sugar above 16 Dutch standard at varying degrees of polarization. On sugar over 98 degrees the preferential rate is 35·6 cents and the general rate $1.47. In item 134, which is the refined sugar item, we find the corresponding rates: $1.09 under the preference and $1.89 under the general tariff. The difference between $1.09 and 35·6 cents would be the margin of preference which our Canadian importers enjoy. That is seventy-four and a fraction cents per 100 pounds. We find in italics a description of sugar, the same as in this item 135b. This is dated August 3, 1931, and in the item, as regards the duty on sugar of that classification, that is between 98 and 100 degrees polarization, the preference was reduced from 35·6 cents to 31.64 cents, applying only to Australia. On August 22 of the same year we find the same thing applied to the British preference, that is a reduction in the duty that the refiner will pay on his raw sugar coming from those sources, but we find no corresponding reduction in the consumers' item. The effect of this would be to increase the profits of the refiners by four and a fraction cents per 100 pounds on all sugar that they refine coming from the British Empire. I would like the minister to tell us, if he can, what further process of refining sugar above 98 degrees polarization requires.

Mr. STEVENS: This dissertation by my hon. friend is one that we have of course heard before. There are those who take certain views regarding the process of estimating the standard of refinement, if I might say so, of sugar. I think this is the argument Mr. Deachman presented to the tariff board so very fully a year or two ago and I believe it would be most unwise to enter into an argument on it at the present time. May I reply to my hon. friend by saying this: This method has been accepted by the governments of Canada, the parliament of Canada and the trade for many years. It would be most unwise to enter into a discussion now as to whether some other process is better. This is our process and it has been in our statute for many years. So much for that phase of the question.

As regards Australia and the change that was made about a year and a half ago, that country, in the mills which treat the sugar cane, brings the standard of its refinement up a few degrees, I think it is two, higher than that normally accepted by Fiji, the West Indies and some other centres, I believe Cuba. So, in order to give Australia an opportunity to enter this market with some part of her sugar product, we adjusted the tariff item accordingly. That was most valuable on our part and to our trade, because we had an excess of trade going south to Australia to that which she was sending back. This gave Australia an opportunity for shipping some heavy and also valuable cargoes to this market.

The third point raised by the hon. gentleman was: What refinement was necessary beyond 98 degrees? It is very material. He has asked a technical question which, naturally, I cannot answer and I do not think the departmental officers who are here are qualified to answer it offhand. But I can assure my hon. friend that this sugar must be refined. Let him get that clearly in mind. The degree of refinement, however, is lessened by two degrees or, shall I say, two stages, if you like, to that of 96. It must be refined and the decolouring of the sugar—I cannot give the technical term at the moment—enters into the refining, and the sugar is produced in whatever form is desired, whether lump sugar or granulated or brown sugar. The hon. gentleman may take it from me that this is a raw sugar to all intents and purposes but refined to a little more than 96 degrees.

Mr. YOUNG: Is not sugar above 98 degrees polarization marketable as refined sugar?

Mr. STEVENS: I remember when I was a boy in the old country they used to sell there a lot of sugar known as Demarara sugar, which is very similar to this. It is a sugar partially crystallized, still in its yellow state. It certainly could be used, but as a matter of practice it is not used in this country. I presume that anyone who wished to get the sugar in that form could do so if there was any demand for it in this country. It contains certain impurities which should be taken out.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—171. Books, printed, periodicals and pamphlets, or parts thereof, n.o.p., not to include blank account books, copy books or books to be written or drawn upon: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUPUIS: The other day I wished to discuss a question on this item and the minister said that we would have the opportunity when the item came up in the committee of ways and means. I should like to make a plea with the minister on behalf of those whose learning is acquired through French literature, French books and French culture. In this country we have two sources of learning, the French and English languages, and a large number of our citizens acquire their learning through French books, French literature and French culture; and not only those whose origin is French, but people of other races who also study French literature. I am making this plea in all sincerity in the hope that all the books and periodicals and articles covered by items 171, 171a, 178 and 178b shall have the same rates set out here when coming from France. Otherwise there would be a discrimination against those who study French literature and who derive their learning from the fountain head of French culture.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is suggesting that by this item we are creating a discrimination against our friends in the province of Quebec and elsewhere who desire to purchase French books and French literature. May I point out to him that for many years there has been such a discrimination. Under the old tariff these books came in at a rate of five per cent under the British preference, and 10 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs. So no discrimination is being introduced by this legislation. If you will, you may say that we are perpetuating or accentuating a discrimination already existing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Accentuating, because the margin of preference is increased.

Mr. RHODES: The most that can be said is that we have accentuated or increased the discrimination already existing; there can be no dispute about that. But inasmuch as the British agreement was entered into between Great Britain and Canada I must say to my hon. friend that we could not take cognizance in an agreement of that character of any arrangement to take care of the objection raised, because these books come from France and not from England. Notwithstanding that there has been this discrimination in the tariff for years, this is the first time so far as I personally am aware that the question has been raised in this house. If it has been raised before, I have not heard of it. Inasmuch as this is an agreement, we cannot alter it in this house without the consent of the British authorities, but I think there is much merit in the contention of my hon. friend in that these rates operate to the disadvantage of those who wish to buy French books, and so far as I am concerned I am quite content to take the matter up with the British authorities and see if we cannot make an adjustment which would be more in conformity with the equity of the case. It seems to me that that is as much as I can say under the circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to propose, Mr. Chairman. There is an item in the tariff today, 178a, which provides for the prepayment of customs duties through the post office. Under this agreement we are admitting at a lower rate of duty the articles mentioned in item 178, but we have not provided for a corresponding reduction on those articles which come in through the post. The amendment I have to suggest makes the rate upon the articles which come in by post the same as provided in the agreement for articles coming in under item 178.

Mr. STEVENS: I beg to move that schedule A be amended to provide for the deletion from the said schedule of tariff item 178a, and for the substitution in lieu thereof in said schedule A of the following item enumeration and rates of duties of customs:

178a. Provided, that on the goods specified in item 178 and imported by mail on and after the first day of July, 1914, duties may be paid by customs revenue stamps, under regulations by the minister, at the rates specified in said item, except that on each separate package weighing not more than one ounce the duty shall be each: British preferential tariff, 1 cent; intermediate tariff, 2 cents; general tariff, 2 cents.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was the British government consulted in regard to this change?

Mr. RHODES: No, they were not, because it is a change downwards.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad to hear that.

Mr. POWER: Did the minister get a reciprocal concession?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For mutual advantage.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—210. Peroxide of soda; silicate of soda in crystals or in solutions; bichromate of soda; nitrate of soda or cubic nitre; sulphide of sodium; nitrite of soda; arseniate, binarseniate, chlorate, bisulphite and stannate of soda; prussiate of soda and sulphite of soda: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I should like the minister to relieve my mind from a suspicion that this tariff was introduced to help Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. RHODES: I moved an amendment in committee on the bill which I propose to move very soon. The hon. member is just one step ahead of me. I have a motion to move which will meet the objection the hon. member has in mind. We are not quite to that point yet however, because it is an amendment to item 210.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are discussing item 210.

Mr. RHODES: Inasmuch as we have taken a special item out of it, I wish to add the words "n.o.p." to it. I ask my colleague to move accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS: I beg to move:

That item 210 as detailed in resolution No. 1 of October 12, 1932, be amended by insertion of the letters n.o.p. immediately after the phrase "nitrate of soda or cubic nitre" in line two thereof.

Mr. BROWN: Does that put cubic nitre for agricultural purposes on the same ground as—

Mr. RHODES: I know what the hon. member is going to say, and I have another motion in connection therewith.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have before me an amendment which I moved in committee on the bill and which I am now asking my colleague to move.

Mr. STEVENS: I move:

That the following item enumeration and rates of customs be inserted in resolution No. 1 of October 12, 1932:

"210e. Nitrate of Soda or cubic nitre when imported for use as a fertilizer, or when imported by manufacturers of explosives for use exclusively in their own factories in the manufacture of explosives—Free, free, free."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this agreed to by the British government?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose it is also agreed to by the Irish government?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would it be in order to extend the same privilege to item 218, acid phosphate?

Mr. RHODES: If that chemical is used as a mixture for fertilizing purposes it is free today.

Mr. BOUCHARD: But it is a poor mixture.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member suggests it should be used in its natural state?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: I am not particularly familiar with the technical operation and application of various chemicals, but I say to my hon. friend that we will consider his representations and if we deem it advisable we will take up the matter with the British authorities. I will not however undertake to say it will be taken up unless in our judgment we decide we should do so, that is as far as I can go.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it agreed to by the Irish Free State?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member knows we do not have to communicate with them in this connection.

Mr. BOUCHARD: When item 218 is called I have some further remarks to make.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—218. Acid phosphate, not medicinal: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BOUCHARD: For the information of the minister I wish to add a few words to what I have already said. Acid phosphate cannot be mixed with many other ingredients entering into the manufacture of fertilizer. Therefore in my view it would be very necessary to have this material come in free. A large amount of it is being used by the farmers. Acid phosphate is very readily absorbed by plants. I am confident the minister will see to it that farmers are given all the advantage which could be derived from this item.

Mr. RHODES: There is nothing I can add to what I said a few minutes ago.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—229. Soap, common or laundry, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 50 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $1.50.

Mr. YOUNG: We are opposed to item 229.

Mr. RHODES: Will it be satisfactory if it is carried on division?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We want a standing vote on this item.

Mr. RHODES: Just a minute; I have a right to discuss this item. My reason for speaking is this: The other day when this matter was being discussed my right hon. friend was very clear in his statement that he was aware of the fact this agreement had to pass in toto, and that it was not subject to amendment. Under those circumstances we had every right to assume that these items, when we came to them, would not be challenged beyond an indication of the attitude of hon. members opposite. My right hon. friend was very clear in his statement that there could be no amendments to the agreement. To keep good faith it is necessary that we should pass these agreements in toto. Under those circumstances I submit he will have accomplished his purpose equally well by having the item carried on division.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is for us to say.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend is taking an illogical position. By challenging this item and calling for a vote upon it he is flying in the face of the very position which he took at an earlier stage on this agreement. We understand perfectly well that many items in this agreement are not acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite. I would go further and say that the whole agreement is not acceptable to them. But they understand the position, and in view of the statement of my right hon. friend it seems to me he is in fully as good a position if he takes the attitude of opposing the article to the extent of saying: Carried on division, which indicates that he and those who support him have voted against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, what my hon. friend says is correct as to my agreeing that so far as the items in the agreement were concerned we could not change them. They had to be accepted or rejected in their entirety. We understood that, that the agreement had to be passed as a whole. But we are through with the agreement now. The house is at present in committee of ways and means, considering resolutions involving far reaching changes in the tariff to all intents and purposes making a new tariff. Certainly we on this side have not deprived ourselves of the right, which every House of Commons has in committee of ways and means, of asking that with respect to particular items members shall show by their actual standing up in the house, whether they support them or not. It only bears out what I was saying before, that in this committee of ways and means hon. members should have had the opportunity of registering their position first and to make first the provision necessary to implement any agreement. Then, when we came to the agreement, certainly if provision had been made for the tariff schedule being adopted in its entirety there would be something to be said for there being no occasion to alter it in any particular.

Mr. RHODES: I must say I have been surprised by some attitudes taken by my right hon. friend, but the attitude he now takes amazes me. What he says is that the agreement itself, it is true, we cannot alter, we may be opposed to certain clauses but it must go through as a whole, but now we are in committee of ways and means. My hon. friend knows perfectly well the reason we are in committee of ways and means, it is one and one only, that is to implement what we have agreed to do in our United Kingdom agreement. My right hon. friend is in an illogical position, I think he is in an unethical position. He says: While we will agree to these items we have in the bill itself, when we come to put them into effect in committee of ways and means we can oppose them. That is the position that my right hon. friend is taking, but this item has been passed as part of the schedule to the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. RHODES: Excuse me, it has. Now my right hon. friend says he is going to oppose it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely if any gentleman is illogical it is my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Every item is called, and the chairman asks, "Is the item carried?" My hon. friend is willing that we should carry it on division. Surely if an item is to be carried on division we have the right to register our vote, a standing vote, the same procedure altogether. My hon. friend says, Yes, vote against it, but it will be on division. If you want to rise, no, that is not ethical, there is something wrong about it—

Mr. RHODES: No, excuse me—

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows he is wrong, that is why he wants to prevent me speaking. Even if my right hon. friend had been willing to say, "We will not divide the committee", every member here has the right to ask that there be a division. I ask for one, as far as I am concerned, on that item of soap, and I will ask for one on two or three items.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit me, I did not wish to stop him from speaking, I merely wanted to rise to put him right. I never for one moment suggested that it was not the right of hon. gentlemen to have a vote on every item in this committee. Of course it is. It is equally their right to discuss ad libitum every single item. We have never called that in question. I was merely pointing out in the first place that the position taken by my right hon. friend is that we cannot amend this agreement, and in the second place pointing out the illogical attitude he took on the schedule to the bills, and now when we come to the same item in committee of ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said we expressly reserved the right to record our vote against certain of the items and intended to exercise that right.

Mr. RHODES: There is no question about the right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is obstructing.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

---

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 229 is under consideration. Shall the item carry?

Mr. RHODES: Some question was raised before luncheon in regard to this item and I would not wish to take advantage of the situation. Is it all right to pass the item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: On division.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, all the items are being carried on division.

Item agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—278b. Crude peanut oil, for refining for edible purposes, used as materials in Canadian manufactures: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment which I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to move. It deletes this item and puts it back on the free list across the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We cannot object to that.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—401. Wire, of iron or steel: (a) barbed fencing, coated or not: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(b) twisted, braided or stranded, including wire rope or cable, coated or not, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(c) drawn flat or cold rolled flat after drawing, coated or not, n.o.p., not more than ·25 inch in width and less than ·1875 inch in thickness: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(d) coated with zinc, or spelter, curved or not, in coils, ·144, ·104 or ·092 inch in diameter, with tolerance not to exceed ·004 inch, and not for use in telegraph or telephone lines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(e) coated with zinc or spelter, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(f) single or several coated, n.o.p., covered with any material, including cable so covered: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent, intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(g) n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: There are two or three items on which we laid special emphasis when they were under consideration before. This item is one and item 409, cream separators, is another. From our standpoint, these are the worst things in the whole agreement. The government has already made a number of changes, one of which was referred to a little while ago. That item, peanut oil, was 10 per cent under the general and 10 per cent under the intermediate, and it has again been put on the free list. Possibly that was done through communication with the British government; I do not know. Might we not ask the government, however, to take up these two special items, barbed wire and cream separators, with the British government, with a view to seeing whether they will not agree to having them restored to the free list.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member has made himself abundantly clear as to what his views are with respect to these two items, not only at the moment but also when we were discussing the item under the bill. May I say to him that if in practice it transpires that the fears expressed by himself and his associates are apt to be realized, we shall be only too willing to discuss the matter with the British authorities, in which event I have no doubt they would take the same reasonable attitude as they have taken with respect to other items already dealt with.

Mr. BROWN: We do not like to have the burden imposed upon us of proving that our fears have been realized, because even though prices may not increase it does not necessarily follow that these duties will not eventually have an effect on prices.

Mr. RHODES: I quite agree with my hon. friend. We will not take the attitude that it will be necessary for the hon. gentleman to prove his point. We will take judicial notice of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thank the minister for his undertaking to take judicial notice of our objection, because this item outrages the conscience of everyone on this side of the house, so much so, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think we should let it go without a recorded vote. If the minister had made the same representations to the British government as he has made with respect to two or three other items, I think he might have been able to have this item free across the board, and I believe that there are supporters of his who would like to see these duties abolished. I should like to record my vote in the most emphatic way permissible.

Mr. RHODES: I may point out, with respect to these items, that the commodities are being manufactured in Britain. In that respect this item is a little different from the item with regard to peanut oil. I hope my hon. friend will not feel it necessary to divide the committee, but that of course is his privilege. I cannot add anything to what I have said in reply to the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us vote.

Item agreed to: yeas, 53; nays, 31.

Customs tariff—409. Cream separators and complete parts therefor, including steel bowls: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think we should have a recorded vote on this item.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 57; nays, 35.

Customs tariff—412d. Offset presses; lithographic presses; printing presses and type-making accessories therefor, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to propose to this item to add the words "complete parts of the foregoing, not to include saws, knives and motive power."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has this been agreed to by the British government?

Mr. RHODES: No, it has been offered by us as a still further concession.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Or by the Irish government.

Mr. RHODES: If it goes to the British government, it goes to the Irish government.

Mr. STEVENS: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—422b. Trench and ditch excavating machines, round wheel or vertical or ladder boom, chain and bucket type, for digging vertical or sloping bank ditches: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I intend to suggest a similar amendment to this item, that the words "complete parts thereof" be added.

Mr. STEVENS: I move acordingly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has this been agreed to by the British government?

Mr. RHODES: My statement with respect to the other item applies also to this one.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—427c. Machinery, viz.: power churns, power milk coolers, power fillers and cappers, power ice-cream mixers, power butter printers, power cream savers, power bottle sterilizers, power brine tanks, power milk bottle washers, power milk can washers, ice-breaking machines, valveless or centrifugal milk pumps, sanitary milk and cream vats; none of the foregoing machinery to include motive power: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I am going to suggest an amendment to this item to add the words "for dairying purposes" after the word "machinery" in the first line of this item. This is to make it absolutely clear that the machinery to be admitted is for dairying purposes.

Mr. STEVENS: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—476. Surgical and dental instruments of any material; surgical needles; X-ray apparatus; microscopes valued at not less than $50 each by retail; and complete parts of all the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 59; nays, 30.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I thought the minister was going to give us some information in connection with this item.

Mr. STEVENS: We have just voted upon it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was referring to item 476a.

Mr. STEVENS: That item is free all across the board. We cannot do any more than that.

Customs tariff—523c. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, composed of yarns of counts of 100 or more, including all such fabrics in which the average of the count of warp and weft yarns is 100 or more: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 32½ per cent; and per pound: intermediate tariff, 3½ cents; general tariff, 4 cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I object to this item as I object to all of them, but I think we should divide on this particular one as a protest against the whole of the cotton schedules.

Item agreed to: yeas, 59; nays, 30.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, could you not proceed with less rapidity? One must not overlook the fact that the people are called upon to pay the piper and we should like to understand what we are doing. You read too rapidly.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): It is to save the people's money that I am dispatching the work.

Customs tariff—540. (c) Towelling and glass cloth of crash or huck, with or without lettering or monograms woven in, table cloths and napkins of crash with coloured borders, in the web, wholly of flax or hemp; woven fabrics, in the web, composed in part of flax or hemp, not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent: general tariff, 35 per cent; and per pound: British preferential tariff, 3 cents; intermediate tariff, 3½ cents; general tariff, 4 cents.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment with respect to item 540 (c). The purpose of the amendment is to correct what was obviously a typographical error, because, if hon. members will look at the votes and proceedings they will see that the ad valorem was 22½ per cent under the old British preferential tariff. It shows 25 per cent here. The purpose of the amendment is to reduce this to 22½ per cent as was originally intended. I would ask my colleague kindly to move that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are all for that.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—551a. Yarns and warps composed wholly or in part of wool or hair, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent; and per pound: British preferential tariff, 7½ cents; intermediate tariff, 15 cents; general tariff, 17½ cents.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to make to this. It is purely for the purpose of clarification. The amendment is to the effect that the words "of wool" be inserted immediately after the word "wholly" in line one of this item. I would ask my colleague to move that.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent; and per pound: British preferential tariff, 18¾ cents; intermediate tariff, 32½ cents; general tariff, 35 cents.

Mr. VALLANCE: To this item which includes all woollen clothing, we object as being 30 per cent, 40 per cent and 40 per cent, and I think there ought to be a division on this.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will realize that we are reducing the British preferential rate on this item and are not increasing either the intermediate or the general rate.

Mr. VALLANCE: But we are objecting to the whole principle of this.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend then is taking the position that he is objecting to our reducing the duty on this commodity. We are not increasing the intermediate or general rate, and on the other hand we are reducing the British preferential rate.

Mr. VALLANCE: We think it is too high.

Item agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—586. Coal, anthracite, n.o.p. per ton: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 50 cents; general tariff, 50 cents.

Mr. YOUNG: This is an increase. We shall have to vote on it.

Item agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—598a. Brass band instruments, of a class or kind not made in Canada; bagpipes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This is the Reid item. I have an amendment to propose which I think will be acceptable to the hon. member for New Westminster and also the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. This amendment admits free of duty complete parts for bagpipes..

Mr. STEVENS: I move that.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—599. Hides and skins, raw, whether dry, salted or pickled; and raw pelts: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BROWN: This is a most interesting item. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing it but to congratulate the government upon having had a change of heart. Those of us who were here during the last two parliaments will remember that the government of the day was continually being bombarded from this side to impose a duty on raw hides. I remember very distinctly a speech made by the present Minister of Justice. Perhaps the house will also remember that last year this question came up and during the course of the discussion it transpired that a tariff had been imposed upon hides because of a verbal understanding which the government had had with New Zealand at the time of making the New Zealand treaty. I just want to congratulate the government upon having had this change of heart. I am curious to know what brought it about. We could hardly conceive that it was due to any arguments advanced from this side of the house. I would ask the minister what influences were brought to bear upon the government to make them reverse their decision, and whether this change is satisfactory to New Zealand.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely satisfactory to New Zealand.

Mr. BROWN: What brought about the change of heart?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, a little common sense.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—625. Caps, hats, muffs, tippets, capes, coats and cloaks of fur, and other manufactures of fur, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: This increases the intermediate and general tariffs on an article of necessity to the people, and I am opposed to it, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to: yeas, 64; nays, 35.

Resolution as amended, agreed to.

Resolution No. 2 agreed to.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would you kindly read this article in French.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): I have just read it in French.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I was able to follow it well; however, I wish to have it read in French.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): I did read it in French. I always do so.

Resolutions as amended reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Is there any objection to taking the first and second readings now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We on this side are anxious to expedite matters, but we also wish to have an opportunity to discuss the question of farm relief. If the Prime Minister is in a position to give us an undertaking that we shall have that opportunity at a definite time there will be no objection to proceeding with this bill, though none of us have seen copies of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Under those circumstances, as soon as this is through the question could be raised on the motion for supply or on second reading of the representation bill, whichever best suits the convenience of hon. gentlemen.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. RHODES moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of this bill I desire to say that the objections which we have raised all along to the increases in the tariff we desire to make at the present time with added emphasis after having had the discussion we have had upon the resolutions in committee of ways and means today and seen more clearly than ever the extent and the effect of the increases. We on this side are entirely opposed to increasing the tariff as proposed in this bill and we are prepared to vote against the second reading. With this understanding it may perhaps be declared carried on division.

Mr. RHODES: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Speaker, carried on division.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there a copy of the bill?

Mr. RHODES: I think there are copies available for distribution, but if not I assure my hon. friend the bill contains the schedule as passed, with the amendments, and is in conformity with the resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no hesitancy in accepting the word of the Minister of Finance with respect to what may be contained in the bill. In so doing however I should like to point out again that all of this procedure should have been carried out stage by stage and in detail before we were asked to approve of the agreements based upon the changes in the tariff now being made.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the right hon. gentleman opposite wish the bill to stand for third reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might as well finish it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Rhodes moves, seconded by Mr. Stevens, that the said bill be read a third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall proceed with the Representation bill, or with the motion to go into supply, whichever the right hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should prefer supply. In order to regularize matters I believe the minister should make a motion.

SUPPLY—FARM RELIEF

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply:

He said: Under the ordinary course I could not proceed today in supply, not having considered items on a day other than Thursday or Friday. I take it however that hon. members are content to accept the motion as if it had been moved on a Monday or Tuesday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I intimated the other day that on going into committee of supply I should have a motion to bring forward which would have reference to farm or agricultural relief, and I intimated at the time that if the house had a statement from the Prime Minister as to the government's policy in the matter, and if we had an opportunity of discussing the government's policy whatever it might be, I would not move the motion. Up to the present time however we have had no statement from the Prime Minister as to the government's policy with respect to farm relief. We have not heard what it is or what it is to be from now until the time parliament reassembles. In the circumstances, so that we may have an opportunity of placing ourselves on record I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Casgrain:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas parliament has been in session since October 6, of the present year, and is shortly to adjourn until January 30, 1933;

And whereas, since parliament assembled the government has not made any statement of policy with respect to the relief of existing agricultural conditions;

And whereas, the position of agriculture in Canada has become increasingly deplorable and, unless relieved, will bring about a condition of distress hitherto unparalleled;

This house is of the opinion that the government should immediately announce what policy, if any, it has with respect to the relief of agricultural distress, and permit full consideration of the same before parliament adjourns over the months of December and January.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to have the government consider this amendment as intended as being one in the nature of want of confidence. That is not its purpose at this time, if the Prime Minister has at this time a statement of government policy which he is prepared to make to the house, and if he is prepared to give us an opportunity to discuss this matter. If that course is adopted, I shall ask the consent of the house to be allowed to withdraw the amendment after the Prime Minister has spoken at any stage of the discussion hon. members of the house may wish. If we do not receive a satisfactory declaration from the Prime Minister, then I would ask that the amendment be put.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at great length on this occasion, but there are some matters which I think ought to be brought to the attention of the house. Perhaps there is no need of emphasizing again and again the unfortunate position in which agriculture finds itself today. However recognizing as we do that the prosperity of Canada depends upon the stability of agriculture we feel we cannot give too much attention to that subject. About a year and a half ago I was compelled to move an amendment somewhat similar to the one to which we have just listened, and on that occasion I said there was grave danger of farmers losing their equities in their lands. In some quarters that statement was ridiculed. If not ridiculed, at least it was not accepted as a serious statement of fact. There can be no question today however that the condition I described obtains. I hold in my hand a paper published in my constituency, and in it I find a list of lands to be sold for taxes. This is an old established community, a community that was settled fifty years ago. There have been tax sales at various times since then, but in very few cases was land put up for sale for taxes when the men were actually resident on the land. But today I find in looking over this list that some hundreds of farmers have their land put up for sale for taxes because it is simply impossible for them to pay those taxes. Again and again it has been brought to our notice that the low prices at which farm products are being sold make it impossible for farmers to meet their obligations. The time must come, be it sooner or later, when some steps must be taken to relieve the farmers from the obligations that have been incurred and have accumulated during the last few years. Some steps must be taken to secure that the farmers who are now on the land are enabled to remain upon it. What profit will it be if through the disposal of this land, whether it is taken over by the loan companies or the municipalities, men should be turned off land on which they have been living for many years, and then perhaps go and purchase another piece, perhaps one of these very parcels indicated in this list. Some steps must be taken by the dominion or by the provinces to ensure to farmers continued possession of their land; otherwise I do not see anything for it but a wholesale leaving of the land by those who are now on it.

These tax sales indicate one thing. There has been discussion as to the proper method of providing relief, and there are those who still strenuously advocate that relief should be given by way of work. I am inclined to think that we are driven to the necessity of providing relief by way of direct contribution. Ideally that does not commend itself to any of us. But so far as the municipalities are concerned at least it would be simply impossible for them to carry on any share of relief by way of work. Cases come to our notice from time to time that indicate the serious nature of the situation. Here is one, brought to my notice no longer ago than this morning. A certain man in a certain town was on direct relief. I was told that that man had securities in the way of mortgages on land, and land that he owned himself, worth at least $15,000. But he has not been able to collect a cent, and the result is that he is on direct relief. Now we could not hold that a man possessed of so much property should be allowed to starve, any more than a man who had nothing. But it could not be considered equitable that, in case times improve, he should be in a position to collect everything in the way of principal and interest on the mortgages that he holds. A lien of some kind should be taken on that man's holdings, he should not be allowed, if he so desired—we will hope he would not—to exercise his full rights without at least paying back the amount received by him for his immediate needs.

Let us consider another case that was brought to my notice, from the standpoint of the taxpayer. I was visiting in a certain town and there was brought to my notice the case of a young widow—

Mr. COTNAM: Tell us about her.

Mr. BROWN: I think the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) must have had it indicated to him quite frequently that if he wants to make a speech—

Mr. COTNAM: If I could not make a better speech than you I would not want to make one.

Mr. BROWN: The house will be the judge as to the merits—

Mr. COTNAM: We are the judges, we are judging all the time.

Mr. BROWN: The case brought to my notice is probably typical of a great many. A young widow of a soldier who was not able to secure a pension—

Mr. COTNAM: Never mind the young widow.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member not realize that this is a serious situation?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I ask the hon. member to desist from intervening in this irregular way.

Mr. BROWN: This young widow's husband had only been able to leave her a small sum of money, with which she was able to build a house to live in. She has no other source of income. Yet because of that small property that she holds she is burdened with taxes, and compelled to pay a share to support those who are out of employment today. The consequence will shortly be that her property will be gone, and she and her family will also be on relief. That emphasizes the fact that a tremendous burden is being laid upon the taxpayers, and we may very well ask how long those who are at present able to pay will be able to continue payments for relief. It is sometimes said that there is too much tendency to look to governments for relief. That may be true, but I think we have a right to look to governments for relief in cases where restrictions have been put upon people by governments themselves.

I want to call attention to a certain matter with which I have had to deal. Perhaps I will be criticized by members of the government for bringing this matter to the attention of the house, but I feel I would not be doing my duty to my constituents or to the people generally if I did not state the facts as I know them to be. Governments frequently make the statement that they cannot do this or that because of limitations imposed upon them, it may be by the constitution or by the demands of expediency. But we should remember that just as in war time things were done which perhaps would not be done under ordinary circumstances, so in times like these we may reasonably expect that governments will not hold to the rigid rules which might properly obtain under ordinary circumstances; and it is because I feel that the particular case I want to mention is one of those where it would involve no harm or injury to anyone to depart from that method of procedure which might have been justified in normal times that I desire to bring this matter to the attention of the house.

In one part of my constituency the farmers have for two years suffered from a plague of grasshoppers. A year ago feed crops were completely destroyed, oats and barley being a complete failure. They did manage to salvage a little wheat. This year the situation is very much worse. They have no grain crops and their potato crop has been also completely destroyed by grasshoppers. Shortly after reaching Ottawa I received a number of communications from men in my constituency, asking me to interview the government to see whether they could not possibly be induced to allow potatoes to come in from across the border in Dakota. In Dakota, I might explain, they grow rather extensive acreages of potatoes. In normal times they have a fairly good market to the south and so they grow large acreages, whereas we, not having a market, in some cases grow only enough for our own use. It happened also that in the north part of the state of Dakota there were some local showers which gave them a fairly good potato crop.

It was brought to my notice that potatoes could be bought at 10 cents per bushel on that side of the line, and later it became known that they could be had for the digging. I approached the government on this matter, writing to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Revenue. An answer came to me from the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that 10 cents a bushel was a price that did not represent a fair market value, and so forth. I took that to mean—

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think the hon. member will find that the reply was that there was a duty levied by parliament upon potatoes coming into this country. That was point 1. Point 2 was that we did not feel we had authority to make a regional tariff.

Mr. BROWN: In that case I will read the letter I received from the minister:

Ottawa, October 17, 1932.

Dear Sir,—

I have been giving careful consideration to the representations which you made to me in your letter of the 7th instant, relative to conditions in the vicinity of Morden and Winklet, where there apparently has been a severe plague of grasshoppers which has resulted in the destruction of garden crops.

When you suggest that we admit potatoes free of duty when imported by the residents of this district, I dare say you have in mind the action which was taken some years ago in connection with the importation of hay. I do not feel that this is a proper remedy for the unfortunate conditions in which the residents of this place find themselves. It practically means the establishment of a sectional tariff which is unsound in principle.

I can scarcely believe that our producers of potatoes are taking advantage of the tariff to the extent which you indicate. Does the price of ten cents a bushel for potatoes just across the line in your opinion represent a fair market value? I am not familiar with the prices of garden produce in the district but ten cents a bushel for potatoes would seem to represent distress selling and unfair competition with Canadian farmers who are producing potatoes.

Yours faithfully,
E. B. Ryckman.

J. L. Brown, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

As you will see, emphasis is laid on distress selling. Now my whole objection to the attitude of the government is that they give attention to that particular phase of the matter rather than to the distressed condition in which some of our farmers find themselves. That was the first answer I received from the minister. I received a very urgent telegram from one of my constituents, as follows:

Potatoes are nine cents a bushel across the line today. Many in the ground to be had for the digging. Potatoes in Manitoba fifty-five cents a bushel. Request Ryckman once more to lift duty for relief-needing farmers.

That is signed by C. W. Wiebe, a member of the Manitoba legislature, and the date is November 1. Although I had received an answer to my former communication to the Minister of National Revenue, I felt it my duty to take the matter up with him again and accordingly I wrote, sending him a copy of Dr. Wiebe's telegram, and urging further consideration of the situation. I received this letter in reply:

Ottawa, November 3, 1932.

Dear Mr. Brown,—

I wish to acknowledge your letter of the 2nd instant, with enclosed telegram from Dr. C. W. Wiebe, M.L.A.

I do not feel that I can add anything to my letter of the 17th ultimo. There are better methods of relief than the creation of sectional tariffs.

Yours faithfully,
E. B. Ryckman.

J. L. Brown, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that under ordinary circumstances the course we advocated might not be justifiable. But take the situation as I have outlined it: starving men and women, and horses and cattle dying for feed, on one side of the line, and abundant potatoes on the other side—potatoes that could be had for the digging. Yet the laws of our country prevent these farmers having access to those potatoes. The result is that they have no potatoes at all. Since the minister says that there are better methods of relief than the creation of sectional tariffs, I wish to ask him now just what proposition he has to make to relieve these people. Under the circumstances I have a right to ask what method of relief is forthcoming. These people will have no potatoes for seed next year; they have no money with which to buy them. They have lost their crop for two years and are in dire need of relief. As I say, I admit that under ordinary circumstances the minister would have been quite right in the course he pursued. But, Mr. Speaker, these are not ordinary circumstances. We are not living in normal times, and it may very well be that we shall be compelled to adopt, not only in a matter of this kind but in many other matters as well, a course of action which otherwise we would not advocate for a moment.

I wish therefore in dealing with this question of farm relief to know just what proposition the government has for relieving the people whose situation I have brought to the attention of the house. Not only that, but still further west in my constituency, where the feed crop was also destroyed, horses and cattle are likely to die for want of proper feed. In this same local paper which was sent to me I read:

Horses will die on straw.

Many cases of sick horses are already reported, due to a steady diet of wheat straw. Lack of oats and barley, and prohibitive prices for bran and shorts, will account for the death of thousands of valuable horses over southern Manitoba during the next six months. At present prices of wheat a farmer could afford to pay, say $5 per ton for bran, but $16 is out of the question. Must the horses die?

As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any great length with regard to this matter. The situation is clearly before the house. We will admit that the government has done much to relieve the situation, but I do not believe it appreciates the full seriousness of the situation that confronts us. It is easy for a man sitting in a comfortable office in the city to look upon these matters with a degree of composure, but it is not easy for those of us who actually know the conditions and who, when we go home, will find ourselves face to face with our neighbours who are passing through the hardest of hard times. Can we wonder that there is a growing feeling throughout the country that the powers that be have but little to offer in the way of actually relieving the distress of the people?

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. On October 12 the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), seconded by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) moved an amendment to the address to his excellency. One of the fundamental matters covered by that amendment was agricultural distress. I find upon referring to the amendment now moved by the right hon. gentleman and seconded by his chief whip that it covers identically the topic covered by the previous amendment. Under the rules of this house, as exemplified the other day in connection with an amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), the present amendment would appear to be out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I say that the amendment now before Your Honour relates not to the past but to the future. It asks what the policy of the government is with respect to agricultural relief and what it will be during the months of December and January, at which time this house will not be in session. This information is asked for in order that hon. members when they return to their constituencies may be able to state exactly the government's policy. The amendment moved to the address in reply to the speech from the throne was as follows:

Whilst reserving any expression of view upon the merits of the agreements concluded at the recent Imperial economic conference, this house is of the opinion that the tariff policies of the present administration have seriously injured the trade of Canada and have intensified the economic depression, and that the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for unemployment and agricultural distress as pledged by the Prime Minister.

The house regrets that, except the dole, the government has no policy with respect to the relief of unemployment.

It also deplores the government's obvious endeavour, by postponing the revision of the Bank Act, to avoid immediate consideration by parliament of the all-important subjects of banking, credit and currency.

There is in that amendment a specific reference to the fact that the government has not had any policy with respect to the relief of unemployment, but there is no reference whatever to the government's present day or future policy with respect to farm relief. The essence of the amendment which I have now placed in Your Honour's hands is the government's present and future policy in this regard. The amendment to the address contains the following: "the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for unemployment and agricultural distress as pledged by the Prime Minister." Those words relate to the past, they state that the government had failed up to that time to implement pledges given with respect to the relief of agricultural distress, but I hope this failure on the part of the administration is not going to follow the lines suggested by what the hon. member who raised this question has said and be continued as long as this parliament lasts. While the government has failed in the past we hope that in the future it will try to carry out the pledges which have been made; at all events that it has some policy to deal with conditions as they are at the present time and a definite policy as to the future.

Without re-reading the amendment offered today it must be perfectly clear that it covers conditions of distress as they affect agricultural communities at the present time. It is offered in an effort to obtain from the government a declaration of policy which has not yet been made and which it is all-important should be made before this house adjourns over the months of December and January.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): There is only one point which I desire to emphasize in connection with the point of order, which I submit is well taken by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and that is that the rule referred to is intended to limit the discussion upon any one subject to once in a session. The amendment to the address contained the words "the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for unemployment and agricultural distress."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thus far.

Mr. RHODES: I submit it is not competent for my right hon. friend to take the ground that he can project into the future and thus escape the rule. The rule is for the purpose of expediting the business of parliament, it states that there shall be but one discussion during one session upon one subject and if the interpretation were to be placed upon the rule which my right hon. friend seeks to place upon it, then it would be rendered null and of no effect. I submit that under the circumstances the point of order is well taken.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order. It seems to me that the distinction drawn by my right hon. leader is very marked indeed. The amendment moved to the address and the one now presented are entirely different, the one was condemning or sought to condemn the government's policy in the past while the other contains not the slightest suggestion of condemnation, it asks only for a declaration of policy with regard to the future. The present amendment is constructive, asking as it does for a declaration of policy; the other one, which was disposed of by this house, was a condemnation of the previous administration of this government. Surely the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) must admit that the two are absolutely different and that this discussion would not necessarily revive the discussion which took place in the early part of the session. This amendment seeks only to induce the government to be frank enough with parliament and with the country to give a declaration of policy with regard to what we may expect before we reassemble on January 30.

Mr. RHODES: If I may be permitted to reply to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Mackenzie). I take no objection to his pointing out that the distinction in the two amendments as to what is sought to be done, but he forgets that the cardinal principle of the rule is that a particular subject can be discussed only once during the session. The rule cannot be affected by any variation in intent. This is the point which I endeavoured to make clear when I rose a moment ago. The rule has reference to a discussion twice upon the same subject in the same session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the minister has had an opportunity of further replying, perhaps I may be granted a like privilege. I would point out that as yet we have not discussed the present policy of the government with respect to agriculture. We don't know what the policy is, we want to know if the government has any policy and if so what it is: and that is the cardinal feature of my amendment.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I feel it necessary to say but a word or two. I think the facts developed so far demonstrate that the present amendment is out of order. The amendment to the address contained these words: "the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for unemployment and agricultural distress." All that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has said up to the present time is that the government has failed to appreciate the agricultural distress, of which he gives instances. So it is traversing in toto the objects as found in the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the amendment to the address was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I ventured to say to one of my colleagues that the effect of the amendment would be very greatly to shorten the session, for the discussion must necessarily be limited, because the opposition could not again traverse the same ground. If I expressed a little amazement at that time that the amendment covered so many subjects and so much matter, I thought it had some compensations, because they could not again be the subject matter of discussion. When the other evening I heard the amendment that we should tie the dollar to the pound, I saw at once the end of further monetary discussions in this house this session. When I heard the subamendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the terms in which it was moved, and the vote taken upon it, I realize that if the rules were to have any effect at all, we had further greatly limited discussion in this house for this session. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has pointed out the rule. It is aimed at the prevention of duplication of discussion and as I ventured to point out the other day, once this house has taken a decision upon a matter, it is not competent to take another decision upon it during the same session. That looks reasonable. Otherwise the conduct of business in the house would be impossible and the protraction of the session interminable.

My hon. friends opposite saw fit, for reasons best known to themselves—and I am not complaining of their judgment—to risk many matters in one amendment and one subamendment. They risked, for instance, monetary reform, agricultural distress and other subjects of that character. They having risked them all in the amendment and the subamendment, the decision having been taken and the house having negatived in their entirety their proposals thus made, it would strike one as elementary under the terms of the rule that it is not competent to evade the rule by the suggestion now made. The amendment now before the house is palpably an effort to evade the operation of the rule. It is assumed you can say: I want to know what the policy of the government is going to be, and thereby evade the rule that prevents duplication of discussion. One might, if one were censorious, direct attention to the language of the amendment. One might observe it says that, whereas parliament has been assembled for a couple of months or, say forty-odd days, there has been no statement of policy. The answer might obviously be: Just look at Hansard. I do not wonder my hon. friend across the floor smiles. Every possible thing that could be said about everything under the sun will be found there, all the way from the Einstein theory down to the problem of the poverty of an individual in the most remote part of the country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is this on a point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The amendment reads:

> And whereas, since parliament assembled the government has not made any statement of policy with respect to the relief of existing agricultural conditions—

And agricultural distress has been, as I pointed out, discussed. The next recital is:

> And whereas, the position of agriculture in Canada has become increasingly deplorable and, unless relieved, will bring about a condition of distress hitherto unparalleled.

It then demands a statement of what the government is going to do in the future. If there has not been a discussion on agricultural distress and the deplorable condition of agriculture, the English language is at fault in having recorded the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite in the terms in which they are reported in Hansard. There can be no doubt that the government that made the motion and the opposition and other members who moved the amendments on which a decision has been challenged and taken, have exhausted the discussion this session on those matters. I did not view it as a matter that did not have its compensations. One of them is the operation of the rule which has just been invoked, because you cannot do indirectly that which you cannot do directly. The discussion having taken place at length, further discussion on the same matter cannot go on. The speech of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) was the best illustration of this. All you would have to do would be to compare that speech with those which will be found on Hansard since the house met on the question of agricultural distress. They will be found to be exactly the same except that the illustrations differ. If the question is one of monetary reform, all one has to do is to read Hansard. So far as this matter is concerned, I submit that what has been said by my colleague has been abundantly borne out by the rule and the amendment is out of order.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the chamber when the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) raised the point of order, but I have listened to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett). Objection is based on the amendment which was moved to the address. The only part of that amendment which refers to agricultural conditions is as follows:

> And that the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for unemployment and agricultural distress as pledged by the Prime Minister.

That is, had failed at that time. That was the amendment moved to the address. This motion submitted by my leader wants the house to declare that in its opinion:

> The government should immediately announce what policy, if any, it has with respect to the relief of agricultural distress, and permit full consideration of the same before parliament adjourns over the months of December and January.

That is a wholly different matter. I submit that the apparent contention of the Prime Minister that because a matter has been discussed in any way, a further discussion during the same session is prevented, is altogether wrong. My hon. friends opposite have only to remember the session prior to the last general election when the matter of unemployment was discussed in the house at least ten, twelve or fifteen times. The rules prevent the house from discussing a motion which has already been decided. When a question has been submitted and decided by the house, whether by way of a bill or a resolution, the same bill or the same resolution cannot be submitted again during the same session. But a discussion on agriculture or labour or unemployment or distress can surely be started in the house many times during the same session. I submit also what I submitted the other day that, according to Bourinot, even if the matter had been the subject of a motion, if it is only part of a former motion, it can be submitted again to the house.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, just a word on the point of order. It seems to me if the theory as laid down by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is to be carried out, it would be very easy for any hon. member on the government side to move an amendment to the address covering all subjects which could possibly come up during the session. The result of that would be that we might as well pack up and go home.

Mr. BENNETT: That would mean the defeat of the government. That is all.

Mr. POWER: I do not conceive the rule was ever intended to cover any such action as that. I believe, if we accept the point laid down by my hon. friend, we are extending the rule too far.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to give an additional reason. The motion now before the Chair is to go into supply. This is an amendment on a motion to go into supply. It is therefore a motion in the nature of a vote of want of confidence on a topic on which the house has already voted confidence in the government this session. That is the crux of the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has spoken the second time on the subject, may I say that at no stage of this session has the house expressed confidence in the government's policy with respect to agriculture as it is to prevail during the months of December and January.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion before the house is that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply. An amendment concerning agricultural conditions in Canada and agricultural relief has been offered. The point of order has been raised that the amendment is out of order on the ground that it again introduces matter that was debated and disposed of when the right hon. leader of the opposition on October 10 moved an amendment to the address including the words "the government has wholly failed to afford a remedy for agricultural distress." Whatever the object of the amendment may be and whether it concerns past, present or future policy of the government seems to me to be beside the point. The question for the Speaker to consider is: Has the matter raised by the amendment been discussed and debated? The subject matter of the amendment now proposed was undoubtedly discussed and debated upon a former occasion, and to allow a discussion of this question now would be simply to repeat the debate that has been held on agricultural conditions. The amendment moved has not been accepted by the government, and so is a motion of want of confidence. The house refused to condemn the government's policy on agriculture by rejecting the amendment to the address. In view, therefore, of that decision and in view of the precedents I find this amendment, which deals with the questions of agricultural conditions and agricultural relief, to be not in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that I shall have to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows: The Speaker having decided that the amendment offered by Mr. Mackenzie King to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair is out of order, Mr. Mackenzie King appeals from that decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

SUPPLY—FARM FINANCE AND MARKETING

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, some very bright and noble ideas have been put forward during the last few days, but, unfortunately, all were lost before they arrived at the foot of the throne. Nevertheless, despite the casualties I make bold to send forth another to be slain if necessary. I beg to move seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) that all the words after the word "that" be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas, the prices for farm products now prevailing are the lowest on record and do not bring returns to the farmer sufficient to meet the cost of the current year's operations; and

Whereas, farmers have in years past obligated themselves to pay large sums of money for goods and services and to repay loans advanced for the purchase of farm equipment and the carrying on of farming operations; and

Whereas, the principal sums of such debts had a relation to price the farmer was receiving for his products; and

Whereas, such debts are being greatly increased by unpaid interest charges and through the depreciated values of their products by which alone debt can be paid;

Therefore be it resolved; in the opinion of this house, the government, as emergency measures, should:—

(a) take such action as will lead to the writing off of all accumulated interest charges outstanding and to effect a substantial reduction in interest charges for the future; and

(b) bring the Canadian dollar at least to that point where Canada will have a parity of exchange with her chief competitors in the British market; and

(c) immediately consider the advisability of again paying a bonus on wheat, either on a bushelage or acreage basis; and

(d) that this house is further of the opinion that the government should create a "marketing board" competent to supervise and control the marketing of farm products.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not look at that amendment until I get through speaking, because by that time it will probably be out of order. I am not going to speak very long, because last night when eleven o'clock came I had just about arrived at the point where I wanted to move the amendment which I have just moved. Then this afternoon when I was all primed up to make my motion I discovered that by the rules of the house it could not be done. I am very glad that the motion of the right hon. leader of the opposition was ruled out of order, because it gives me the opportunity to move mine. Now I hope you will find that you have got one that is really in order. I suppose that objection may be taken to the first clause of the amendment, on the ground that it is too drastic for us to ask that all interest charges that are overdue should be cancelled. May I point out that the economic conditions prevailing in Canada have automatically cancelled the income of hundreds of thousands of our working people, and the same conditions have cancelled a very large percentage of the income of our agricultural population. But while economic conditions have cancelled the income of farmers and of people who are unemployed, and very materially reduced the income of those who are fortunate enough to be employed, still interest goes on. Interest charges go on like Tennyson's Brook, getting bigger all the time as it comes towards the sea, and nothing is done to prevent that accumulation. Let me point out to this house what was done in connection with the loan made to the Canadian Pacific Railway last year. I must be careful to say that I am not opposed to giving the Canadian Pacific Railway a loan, I hope the government will give a loan to any organization that requires it, provided the government is in a position to do so. The Canadian Pacific Railway obtained $1,447,-222.71 from the government last year, and in return for that I presume they kept their shops open a month or so and thus gave employment to a number of people. But my point is that in the order in council dealing with that loan it is plainly stated that as soon as the railway company shall resume payment of the dividends at more than the rate of five per cent per annum the loan may be repaid. And repaid without interest. Now that is a very good precedent. If the government can lend money to any organization, Canadian Pacific Railway or any other, and not require them to pay it back until they are able to pay over five per cent dividends, and then permit them to pay it back without interest, surely it is not too much to ask that the government take whatever action it can to cancel the accrued interest against the agricultural population of this country. Surely every hon. member of this house will agree that it is entirely unfair and absolutely unjustifiable that the calamity of this depression should be borne by one class only of the community. By what right should coupon clippers be exempt from their share of the difficulties brought about by circumstances such as these? All that we are asking is that the interest accrued during these periods of hard times should be written off.

The government may argue that this is a matter for the provinces entirely. In that connection I have had discussion with authorities in our own provincial government, and it is the opinion of those authorities that it is not within the right of the province to deal with interest charges, that it is within the right of the dominion. If it is argued as a point of order, I should certainly say the matter is in doubt, and that if it is not clear it should be settled now by a higher court. But, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that my amendment merely asks that this government shall take such steps as may lead to the writing off of this accrued interest. The government is already taking steps to call together the provincial premiers in a conference dealing with other matters, surely the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance could ask the premiers of the provinces to consider this question, if it is clear that it is within provincal jurisdiction. If it is not clear, I suggest that the government should take that action directly, and let the chips fall where they may.

With regard to the bonusing of wheat, I am aware that the Prime Minister has made a statement in that regard. The substance of that statement the house will recall. The government has assisted in the hedging of wheat on the market for some time, believing that by giving such assistance they have maintained the price of wheat somewhat higher than it would otherwise have been. That may be true. But the fact is that the price is still far below anything that can be regarded as an economic price. Even if the assistance which the government has given to the grain trade has resulted in a little higher price, when that price is still so low that farmers cannot pay expenses, then the argument goes by the board.

May I draw the government's attention to an article which appeared in the London Times of November 11, in which is set forth something of the policy of the Australian government in respect to agriculture. In that dispatch we are told that in the House of Representatives Mr. Lyons, the Prime Minister, announced important modifications of financial policy designed to reduce the burden of taxation, and to provide relief for wheat growers by a bonus amounting to £1,250,000. We know that the wheat grower of Australia must sell his wheat in the same market as the wheat grower of Canada. Let it be remembered that to begin with the Australian wheat grower, with a currency value below that of Great Britain, his chief market, is at a very great advantage as compared with the Canadian farmer. Added to that is the bonus. So that he is in a position, if not to make farming pay, at least to stay in the farming game. Now, we urge that something be done to place the farmers of Canada on a basis of equal competition with other parts of the British Empire or with other countries that will compete with us for such wheat markets as there may be.

With regard to the next point, which deals with our competitors in the British market, I may say that Australia has a lower rate of exchange than any other country competing with us. It may be argued again that this matter has already been dealt with. It has not, I contend, and though I must anticipate its being ruled out of order, I submit that it is perfectly in order because it asks the government, not to deflate or to inflate or to do anything else of that character, nor does it necessarily propose any monetary reform, but simply suggests that we should bring our dollar to a parity with the money of Australia or of any other country with which we compete. That can be done by arbitrary action, by order in council; it can be done by statute of this parliament without altering the value of our money at all, by watering it this way or that. This feature therefore has not yet been discussed. Of course, if I were asked how it should be done, I would not do it by statute in that way; I would adopt a more sensible method. Nevertheless the government may do it without involving such an intricate question as monetary reform.

With regard to the last part of the amendment just moved, that dealing with a marketing board, I have nothing to say because there are others who will follow me in this discussion who have a greater knowledge of that subject than I.

These proposals put forward in our amendment are proposals which we think will meet an emergent situation existing today in agriculture. But this government should not be content with emergency legislation. It should be looking forward to some fundamental and constructive proposals going to the very basis of the difficulty in our economic life. There should be, for instance, some national planning in respect to increasing the consumption of goods in Canada, and national planning with regard to the intelligent production of goods in the country. What is the use of farmers continuing to produce an enormous surplus of wheat which we can scarcely give away to other countries, let alone sell to them? But are we to starve in Canada because we can produce too much? That is the question of the day. That is the economic problem that confronts this government and all other governments, and I say that it is not sufficient for us, even if the government were to adopt the amendment put forward, to deal merely with the emergent condition that exists today; we want them to deal with the whole situation in a fundamental manner so that we may be able to go forward, constructing a new social order which will know what to do with abundance and which will not starve its people because it has too much.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): In seconding the amendment which is now before the house, I find myself very happy in supporting something which I believe—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is there an amendment before the house?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. McDade): The amendment reads:

Whereas, the prices for farm products now prevailing are the lowest on record and do not bring returns to the farmer sufficient to meet the cost of the current year's operations; and

Whereas, farmers have in years past obligated themselves to pay large sums of money for goods and services and to repay loans advanced for the purchase of farm equipment and the carrying on of farming operations; and

Whereas, the principal sums of such debts had a relation to price the farmer was receiving for his products; and

Whereas, such debts are being greatly increased by unpaid interest charges and through the depreciated values of their products by which alone debt can be paid;

Therefore be it resolved; in the opinion of this house, the government, as emergency measures, should:

(a) take such action as will lead to the writing off of all accumulated interest charges outstanding and to effect a substantial reduction in interest charges for the future; and

(b) bring the Canadian dollar at least to that point where Canada will have a parity of exchange with her chief competitors in the British markets; and

(c) immediately consider the advisability of again paying a bonus on wheat, either on a bushelage or acreage basis; and

(d) that this house is further of the opinion that the government should create a "marketing board" competent to supervise and control the marketing of farm products.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I think we should have the French version of this amendment, seeing that it is quite a copious one.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. McDade): The amendment is now being translated by the official translators and will presently be available in French.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I think the discussion should not take place until the French translation is available.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit that it is entirely out of order for a private member to make any proposal involving the expenditure of public money, and the amendment which has been proposed involves such expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: In the absence of the Speaker, I would suggest that decision on the point of order be reserved. Undoubtedly it is not competent for a private member to propose the expenditure of public money. I think that has been too often pointed out in this house to require discussion. It is equally true that it is not competent for this parliament to destroy contracts in provinces. And there are two other matters that have been discussed already, covered by the amendment. I will not express any opinion about it further, because the Speaker is not here, and I suggest that possibly speeches might be made on the motion to go into supply, without reference to the amendment, until the Speaker returns.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The subject which has been again brought to the attention of the house is one that has been discussed from time to time. It was discussed last session and it had been discussed at sessions prior to that. It has been discussed from different angles during this session and undoubtedly it will be discussed again. But, Mr. Speaker, it is discussed so frequently and reiterated so often, not for the mere purpose of repetition. Take for example a body of men in this country who I assume are as keen and subtle students of human psychology as may be found—our expert and professional advertisers. Their campaign of advertising is carried on in the main upon one basis, and that is that it requires a constant repetition of undoubted truth, a constant repetition of fact, the hammering away like the constant dripping of water upon a stone until the facts are so registered upon the subconscious minds of the people that they are accepted almost automatically. For these reasons we have placed, and we shall continue to place before the house and the country, not only the conditions which require consideration but some of the suggestions which we believe if put into effect will, to some degree at least, remedy the conditions which exist.

I shall not at this time dwell at length upon the condition which faces agriculture. With every statement which has been made as to the deplorable situation, I fully agree; with the statements and arguments in connection with the calamitous price levels, I am fully in accord, as must be every man and woman who knows anything about the subject. The fact that this condition cannot be perpetuated indefinitely or for any great length of time without bringing bankruptcy and ruin upon not only the farming industry but the nation itself, is equally obvious. It is possible that there are men and women engaged in other businesses, merchants, professional and business men throughout Canada, who adopt an attitude of serene and detached sympathy towards this matter. They are acting somewhat like the man who, standing safe upon dry land watches the struggles of some poor wretch overwhelmed in the turbulent waters, and contrasts his position of safety with that of the drowning man. The man who looks upon the possible ruin facing the agricultural industry and considers it as being of no concern to him, is about as stupidly unintelligent as the man who happens to be comfortably ensconced in the top story of a great skyscraper and, looking down upon the crumbling foundations, pities the poor chap in the bottom story. He says: How sad it is that that poor fellow will be soon in such an uncomfortable situation; he feels safe and unconcerned because he is far above the foundations beneath him but does not perceive his own peril. Business in Canada of every kind and all branches of industry are much in the position of such a man.

I shall not press this point, but I should like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to the attention of the house, the fact that when we speak of possible ruin and bankruptcy, we are not simply using terms and expressions—we are stating facts. The facts are these: not only wheat, our chief commodity, but almost every product of the farm in western or eastern Canada, is being sold at a price far below that which will meet the legitimate costs of production and leave a profit. These prices will not meet the actual out-of-pocket expenses which are necessarily and inevitably incurred. Take wheat, for example. The price received is approximately twenty-five cents a bushel for No. 1 at local points in my province. That price fails to meet the cost of the seed, the cost of repairs, oil and gas for machinery, the cost of binder twine, and other incidentals in respect to harvesting and the cost of threshing and hauling in the crop. These are actual out-of-pocket expenses; I am not considering the value of the land or any interest which the farmer should receive thereon. I am leaving out of consideration his year's work and the value of his labour and management; I am leaving out of consideration even his taxes, and the interest which he should pay but cannot pay upon any debts which he may have incurred. It requires no mathematical genius or professor of economics to come to the conclusion that no business or individual could carry on indefinitely in that way without becoming absolutely bankrupt and ruined. These facts have been reiterated so frequently, stressed so often and challenged never, that one would imagine there is no thoughtful citizen of Canada who is not aware of them and concerned in their solution. The question will be asked, and it frequently is asked: what do you suggest should be done about it? Why weary the house with vain repetition? Why reiterate the facts which are admitted and deplored by everyone? I do not intend to shelter behind that bulwark so often erected and say: it is the responsibility and the sole responsibility of the government to find a remedy. I might do this, not only because in the government and there alone lies the authority and power through which and by which any action can be taken, but because in the government lies the capacity and means of knowledge and study which are not at the service of private members. The government has at its disposal the services of skilled and experienced men who have spent years in the searching and compilation of facts. In the Department of Agriculture there is a small group dealing with economics. These men have been employed because of their aptitude for and knowledge of this work. They are given the time and the salaries to continue their endeavours and explorations. I might well suggest to the government that having these avenues of information, the responsibility is theirs, not ours. However, I assume for myself and for every hon. member of parliament some share of the responsibility. I shall not take the attitude which was taken so often by the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition, when in reply to a similar challenge and question he said: "It is time enough to prescribe when the doctor is called in—we are not called in." In times like these, when the very foundations of our nation are shaking, when hundreds of thousands of men and women are suffering, one should not stand upon technicalities. This is not the time to shelter ourselves behind the bulwarks of partisanship or of the particular position which we occupy in the house. So we shall do what we have done in the past, and offer what we can by way of suggestion.

I think the whole house listened yesterday with interest, with admiration and with deep feeling to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) when he described so eloquently and passionately the troubles and miseries of some of our unemployed and the magnificent heroism which they had displayed. I cannot say that I agree with all he said; I cannot associate myself with him in his individualism and denial and denouncement of cooperative action, but I can associate myself with him in that passionate plea which he uttered for humanity itself. I agree, as I think we all must agree, that wonderful heroism is to be found among those fathers and mothers who are unemployed and who are striving earnestly and sacrificing heroically to raise their children in decency and comfort. They are, as he said, the unsung heroes. But there is another body of men and women who might well be said to be unsung heroes. I refer to the farmers of this country, who, month by month and year by year, facing the inevitable, but fighting still; who, year by year, seeing the hope of profit from last year's work vanish, seeing in front of them an almost impenetrable wall of hopeless economic destitution, continue to do their best. Year by year, with hope unquenched, with courage amazing, they plough their fields, again sow their crops and carry on their farming operations. No wonder this is said to be a "next year" country. But even those men, willing to gamble against nature, to strive against odds, must ultimately reach the end of their resources. They are reaching it today and they call upon us for help.

What can we do? We cannot conquer nature; we cannot conquer drought or hail or the vicissitudes of the weather or the climate. We cannot go forth into the world and raise the world price levels. We can do nothing of this. But we can do some of those things we have suggested and which I shall again suggest. As is pointed out in our amendment, the ruling upon which is suspended for the moment, one of the problems which presses more heavily upon the farmer than upon almost any other class is that of debt, that constantly increasing, pyramiding weight of interest bearing obligations. During these past years it is obvious that no average farmer, depending upon the product of his farm for all he earns, could pay the interest upon those obligations, let alone any portion of the principal. That interest, compounded every year, continues to mount up, and the debt, as has been stated in our amendment, has today reached an impossible point. In addition, the goods through which alone he may pay that debt—for he has no other source of income; he earns no wages—have so decreased in value that it takes an enormous and increasing quantity of them to discharge any portion of his obligation. Is that fair? What can be done? The Prime Minister very readily, and rightly, pointed out that it is not competent for parliament or the federal government to interfere in provincial contracts; in other words, that where contracts were made under provincial law, it was not possible for this government to interfere with or to alter their terms. I agree with him.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I rise to a point of order, in view of the original objection that I raised, and also in view of the fact that the subject matter of the amendment is to be found on today's order paper under notices of motion as number 6 standing in the name of the hon. member (Mr. Speakman) who has just been speaking so eloquently. May I ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I did not hear the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member raises the point of order that the amendment is not in order. He implements his statement on the first objection and now asks for a ruling. If any other hon. member wishes to speak to the point of order, I shall hear it; otherwise I shall rule.

Mr .SPEAKMAN: Was the point of order based on the fact that a notice of motion stands in my name on the order paper, dealing with the question of debts and debt interest?

Mr. CASGRAIN: In part.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Your honour, unless you wish to make a ruling now, I shall go on and not transgress the point of order raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must give a ruling. I cannot find that the amendment is not in order on the ground that it involves public expenditure. Subsection (c) is that the government——immediately consider the advisability of again paying a bonus on wheat, either on a bushelage or acreage basis.

That the house resolve that the government immediately consider the advisability of doing something does not involve public expenditure. But I do find that the amendment is not in order, first, because it entails discussion on the subject of agricultural distress and the relief of agriculture, which I have today ruled to be out of order, and, second, because it involves a matter of which notice has been given and which stands upon the orders of the day as it does under number 6 on today's order paper as a notice of motion standing in the name of Mr. Speakman, in which the matters raised in the amendment are set forth and similar remedies are proposed.

In support of that I would refer the house to Bourinot at page 420 in which it is set out:

> The ordinary rules of debate are applicable on this occasion.

That is, the occasion on which a motion is before the house for the Speaker to leave the chair so that the house may resolve itself into committee of ways and means or of supply. In this instance it is supply.

> The ordinary rules of debate are applicable on this occasion; for instance, a matter already decided by the house, or of which notice has been given, or which stands upon the orders of the day, cannot be discussed.

In my opinion, the matter which stands on the order paper of the day as number 6 in the name of Mr. Speakman is identical to that of the amendment now before the house. I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I thank you. I shall not further transgress by dealing with the matters covered by the point raised or by the resolution which stands in my name.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is in order in discussing the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Quite so. I was speaking at the moment on the question of the accumulation of debts. It was drawn to your attention that that part of my address was out of order. I understand, however, I may proceed in a general way. Therefore I shall leave that portion of it with this simple statement: The condition is obvious. In asking the government to take the lead in remedying this condition, we are not suggesting that it should transgress the law or should break provincial contracts or should interfere in provincial matters. We are asking this: In view of the fact that the situation has become impossible; in view of the tremendous potentialities that lie there and the effect upon the country as a whole, we ask that at the forthcoming interprovincial conference the federal government take the lead in setting forth the situation, and that in discussions with the provincial governments they together attack this problem; because unquestionably by a combination of the two authorities there will be sufficient power to deal with any matter affecting the welfare of our people. In respect of this debt we simply ask that the government take the lead in this matter; that they bring the provinces together in conference with the Dominion government, that each contribute its share of power and authority with a view to dealing with this matter courageously and frankly. The only way in which the end sought can be accomplished is, in my opinion, by a definite reduction of the amount involved. Is that fair? I think so, for after all when the money was loaned it had a certain value, and its value was what it would buy. Now any man who receives in return for his loan an equal amount of purchasing power, an equal value in commodities and goods, is being treated fairly and honestly, and is making a sacrifice which is slight in comparison with the sacrifice which is being made by many people in this country, including the agriculturists. Having said so much I shall leave that subject, in view of the ruling of Mr. Speaker, and shall proceed to other suggestions.

The second suggestion which is made, while it will not in itself cure the situation, is one upon which immediate action could be taken by the government in order at least in some degree to remedy the situation. The government, of course, cannot increase prices in the markets of the world. But the Dominion government has full power and authority to deal with our own currency and our own finance. While not suggesting that any change in our financial system or the amount of currency issued or the manner in which it is issued would meet all our problems and bring in the millennium, I do suggest that this is the most immediate and practical step which the government can take to partly remedy the situation which now exists. Other hon. members have mentioned Australia as an illustration, and pointed out the position of the farmers there. What Australia has done it seems to me that Canada can do. As a matter of fact, in other departments the government has recognized the situation and has taken action. Take, for instance, the question which has been discussed so frequently during the last few days in this house, the currency dump. Why is that applied? Because the government recognizes that the manufacturers of Great Britain producing under a depreciated currency are able to do so at a price advantage as compared with the Canadian manufacturer, and therefore that advantage is in part removed by the imposition of a dumping duty. I think that that will be admitted by all to be the reason for the dumping duty; otherwise there would be no reason for the action that has been taken. It having been accepted then that the manufacturers of Great Britain are placed in an advantageous position in respect of their export trade by reason of their depreciated currency, by what reasoning can it be suggested that the same thing would not apply to this country? It is obvious from that very fact that depreciation or inflation, if you like to call it that, does not increase the cost of living or of production within the country to a degree equal to the advantage which it brings; otherwise the advantage would be taken away. So it is obvious that this is not only a practical suggestion which can be carried into effect by this government but one which, when put into application by Great Britain, Australia and other countries, has resulted in a definite and positive advantage to the producers of those countries. With the examples of those countries before us, this is no longer an untried experiment, no longer the fantastic dream of some theorist, but a practical matter which is being carried out in a businesslike way, and the results of which are obvious. Since it has reached that stage, not only do we not need to apologize for advancing the suggestion, but I think we are justified in urging the government to put into effect the same sort of measure here in order to give to Canadian producers the advantage which similar measures have already given to producers in other countries.

This question is of particular importance now to agriculture. In all the work that we have done in the last six weeks, in all the multiplicity of argument and debate, we have had in view one thing—increasing trade within the empire, increasing the percentage of trade that we shall do with the mother country, increasing the percentage of our farmers' goods which shall be sold in Great Britain. And yet, as we have pointed out again and again so long as we refuse or neglect to deal with this money question, so long will all our efforts in that direction be in vain, and so long will our farmers be unable to take advantage of the very opportunities which we have been trying to give them through these agreements. There again we have a real and definite reason for urging this government to try something of that sort in relation to our present agriculture.

May I suggest this? Even were there a risk involved, even were there some doubt and uncertainty as to the results, would it not be better to take action which offers a reasonable prospect of success than to sit here in paralyzed inertia while agriculture goes bankrupt and is ruined before our very eyes? This is a serious question, Mr. Speaker. When I came down here from my constituency in Alberta I left the farmers there still hoping for results from their crops, still hoping that something would come from these agreements, still hoping that during the present session and before winter comes some action would be taken by the government that would enable them to carry on. We have almost reached the end of this part of the session and are preparing to go home, and what can I say to them when I go back? What hope can I offer to them? What can I tell them has been done during these two months to meet their situation or to provide against the future?

There have been the agreements, yes; but as we have indicated, unless the money question is settled, they offer nothing for the present. Only the other day, Mr. Speaker, I got word that less than half of the crop in my own district has been threshed, that throughout that whole countryside, on account of the inclemency of the season, more than fifty per cent of the crop was still in the stook, and that some of it had been stooked and restooked two or three times and would be left there for the winter. No bonus on wheat can help a man who has not threshed his wheat, but in view of this calamity greater importance is being attached by our farmers to the smaller side issues. All they can hope for now is that they may get some revenue from their hogs and milk cows, their cattle and poultry. Their crop is a dead loss. Additional costs have also been piled up owing to the crop having to be handled over and over again, and the quality of the grain has deteriorated so that it is worth practically nothing; it will not be worth the trouble of threshing. That simply shows the increasing seriousness of the situation. The people there are waiting for something to be done—not simply waiting; they are doing all they can themselves, but they are hoping that something will be done by parliament which no body but parliament can do. So it is that we in this group suggest that parliament definitely and earnestly take action, whatever the risk, if any be involved, along the lines which offer the most immediate prospect of relief by tackling this money question, and tackling it immediately.

There is another suggestion which we have offered and which we now offer again. As we go through Canada today, not only through our farms but through the large and small marketing centres, we cannot but be struck by the fact that the marketing situation is chaotic It would seem that everybody is doing what seems best in his own eyes. There is individual effort everywhere and no concerted effort anywhere. The whole situation, from a marketing point of view, is haphazard and chaotic. We suggest again, as has been suggested before, that to assist in this matter and to enable us to take advantage of the agreement, a law be passed which will appoint and organize a marketing board, a board which will have sufficient power and authority to bring order out of chaos and to direct and control channels of commerce so far as farm goods are concerned, not only for export but for the domestic market. Particularly should it operate in connection with our export goods.

As has been stated before and may well be repeated, we cannot take advantage of our opportunities in the British market unless we so organize as to control our exports, and to make absolutely certain that week by week and month by month quantities which can be absorbed are sent there. We should send no more and no less; the quality should be made uniform, and grading should be such as to be relied upon.

In short our suggestions are these: We suggest that the question of debt be tackled by the coming interprovincial conference, and that joint action be taken to reduce the amount of it. We urge that the government, with courage and intelligence, tackle the monetary problem, and at least give our farmers a chance by placing our money somewhat on a parity with our competitors, so that we shall not be labouring under a perpetual disadvantage. The difficulties connected with the monetary problem are just as effective as any customs tariff in keeping our goods from the markets of other countries. We suggest further that the government take the responsibility of appointing a marketing board so that the marketing of farmers' produce can be thoroughly organized, and so that they may receive full advantage of the best prices offering anywhere. Their exports should be so regulated that the right quality may be available in proper amounts in the proper market.

I am satisfied that if these three suggestions were carried out they would result in great good to agriculture. I am satisfied, further, that if these measures were introduced the farmers would take new courage and new hope, and new life would be given to the farming communities. I am satisfied that if these improvements are carried out the good will be reflected in less unemployment, improved conditions and better business throughout all parts of Canada.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the session unduly without good cause, but in bringing before the house a résumé of the needs of agriculture I feel that I am justified in taking at least a little time at the end of the session to discuss matters which have been spoken to by the two hon. members who preceded me, and which may be spoken to by others who will follow. Agriculture, although only one of the basic industries of Canada, is the chief one. If it is not carried on at a profit and in such a way as to enable those interested in it to stay on their farms and continue to produce the primary products, then there is a very bad outlook for the general industry of Canada.

It is most unfortunate that the matter of agriculture has not been placed before the house by the government previously in the course of this session. During the last six weeks we have dealt with tariff matters which benefit chiefly the manufacturing interests. Hon. members in this corner of the house, and I believe some hon. members who do not sit in this corner, would have been better pleased had the government of the day made a definite statement early in the session concerning its policy with reference to agriculture. The condition of that industry is so bad, as the two former speakers have said, that today it has become without a doubt the most serious problem that we in Canada have to face. The government has come forward to safeguard the interests of other industries. On various occasions it has stood behind the financial interests in respect to certain accounts so that they would not operate at a loss. I could cite one or two cases of that kind. Then, we hear that money is being loaned without cost to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company so that they may open their shops. As I have stated previously, many of the tariff changes which we have been discussing have been in the interests of manufacturers. Further, the exchange dumping duties have protected the manufacturing industry, and while the interests of that industry have been safeguarded, agriculture has suffered a double loss.

As other hon. members have pointed out, our chief competitors, such as the Argentine and Australia, in selling their products in the old country enjoy a distinct advantage over the producers of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what they say.

Mr. SPENCER: Without taking up too much time of the house, I should like to place on record the prices now received for some agricultural products. Today wheat is selling at a price lower than it has been in the last three hundred years. The situation is so serious that taxes cannot be paid, mortgages cannot be met, and bank loans cannot be wiped out. The banks consider agriculture to be such a bad risk that they will not make loans to the farmers. In that connection I should like to draw to the attention of the house an instance which came to my notice a few days ago—and may I say I could tell of many similar cases. A farmer applied for a loan of $50 with which to buy twine. He was reputed to be a first class farmer, had lived in one community for over twenty years, and had no debts against him with the exception of a mortgage on his property. He lives in very plain circumstances. However, when he applied for a loan of only $50 he found there was no response; not a dollar would be advanced for twine. The banks consider the outlook for agriculture so bad that they will make no loans. It takes seven bushels of wheat today to buy a 98 pound sack of flour. Oats have sold from five to ten cents per bushel. Ten bushels of No. 1 feed would buy ten pounds of rolled oats. Barley is fetching eight to eleven cents. Cream is about half the value it was in 1928. Hogs are selling at $2.40 a hundred pounds. I was informed the other day of a man who had sold a thousand pounds of pork and with the proceeds had bought the repairs for a couple of binders to do his harvesting. Beef is selling at from $1 to $2.75 per hundred pounds. Lambs are selling as low as $2.50 to $2.90; sheep can hardly be sold. Wool is selling at two to four cents a pound. As someone pointed out to me, it would take the value of two fleeces to buy a pair of socks. It would take a thousand pounds of wool to buy a decent suit of clothes. Hides cannot be sold. The other day in the south end of my constituency a farmer sent 52 yearling calves to market, and they brought him $460. At the same time eight beef cattle fetched $120. With such prices it is impossible for agriculture to carry on. It is regrettable to find that figures on the cost side of farming have not been reduced. Interest rates, for instance, have not only been kept up but are going higher, and freight rates the same. Such charges as commissions, elevator charges and so on are just what they were. I appreciate the act passed by this house a few days ago, brought forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) making it possible to cut elevator charges. They are being cut, I understand, very little, but it will help a bit. But up to the present time they have been either as high as or higher than in previous years.

To give some idea of the seriousness of the situation, particularly with respect to the farmers of the prairie provinces—I am not in a position to speak for those elsewhere—telephones, which are most necessary in the farm homes, are being taken out, I might say by the hundred, until a telephone is hardly of any use to those who have them because so many are off the rural line. Farm implements are selling at war-time prices, and repairs have actually gone up. Oil and gas are up; barbed wire is likely to go up, with the tariff increases on two tariff schedules considered the other day. Cream separators, as we have also heard, have been put up 25 per cent on two schedules.

The feeling is so intense in the prairie provinces that mass meetings are being held in many places. At a mass meeting held at Mannville, Alberta, in my constituency, a short time ago, no less than three hundred farmers were in attendance. When you get three hundred farmers gathered at any point it means that some of those farmers have come from a very great distance. I am going to read a resolution passed at that meeting:

> Whereas, the present rate of exchange places the Canadian producer under a great disadvantage in the sale of his products, and whereas he is undersold on the world markets by competing countries, a situation only made possible by the exchange rate, therefore be it resolved that Canadian currency be immediately depreciated to the same extent as that of our competitors.

Another mass meeting is to be held in a couple of days at Kitscoty, Alberta, where I have no doubt that as great or a greater number of farmers will put in an appearance. In a manifesto that is to be presented to that gathering I read in part as follows:

> The outstanding and major issue today is the relation existing between debtor and creditor. Creditors demanding payment and debtors unable to pay.
> The creditor resorts to legal process, thereby compelling the unfortunate debtor to convert into cash any or all of his goods and chattels, regardless of the sacrifice frequently resulting.

If, as we submit, the present plight of farmers and others results from conditions over which they have no control, then they have not broken faith; are not shirking their responsibilities and have no desire to evade their obligations.

Then it goes on to say:

Therefore, be it resolved that as an emergency measure—

I will just give two items in this statement:

—the farmers be allowed to retain legally the proceeds realized from the sale of farm products:

1. To the extent necessary to buy goods and services to continue their farming operations.—

Surely that is in the interest of the country at large. If anything is done to drive the farmers off the land it will have a direct detrimental effect on all business.

2. That mortgage rights of foreclosure be stayed unless deliberate negligence by the farmer is proven.

We approach this problem not "in humility and ignorance," but with understanding and courage, firmly resolved to secure Canadian economic reconstruction.

Those last lines, Mr. Speaker, seem to me to place the matter very clearly before this house, and to state in no uncertain terms exactly how the people, who are suffering as we have pointed out, feel in regard to this situation.

I was interested the other day in hearing the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), say, I think with a good deal of satisfaction, that a large number of unemployed had been placed on the land—I believe he said some 66,000.

Mr. GORDON: No, I said that included people absorbed on the land—men, women and children.

Mr. SPENCER: I stand corrected. I can only say that I wish the Minister of Labour every success in his undertaking; for if they can be absorbed on the land and are able to stay there and get a living, then there is hope that conditions will improve. But I have great fears of the result. I have lived on the prairies for the last twenty-four years. I know exactly the conditions. I know what people have gone through and what they are going through today, and I fear that we are going to have a problem on our hands somewhat similar, maybe, a little smaller, because of the smaller numbers concerned, to that which we had in regard to the returned soldiers.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPENCER: When the house rose at six o'clock I had just referred to a large mass meeting that was being called in my constituency to discuss agricultural conditions. They are directing attention in their manifesto to the big issue of the day, which is the relation existing between debtor and creditor, the creditor demanding payment and the debtor being unable to pay. They say that so long as this condition exists there can be no successful farmers' strike, no production control, influencing of prices, security of tenure, retention of homes, or even obtaining the necessities of life. It is therefore not surprising, in view of this situation, that they should use the language which I quoted before six o'clock and which I repeat now:

We approach this problem, not "in humility and ignorance," but with understanding and courage, firmly resolved to secure Canadian economic reconstruction.

These people are carrying on the great industry of agriculture and they feel that their backs are up against the wall. They realize, after twenty or thirty years' continuous struggle to make their homes and to improve them, that the day has come when they are holding them with the greatest difficulty, and many are being forced off their land simply because they cannot pay a dollar debt with a thirty-cent product. This has meant greater difficulty to the farmer than anything else, because in those parts of the country with which I am most familiar, I am thankful to say, the returns from the land, so far as produce is concerned, have been on the whole very fair indeed. But the frightfully low prices which I outlined this afternoon make it perfectly impossible for these people to meet their liabilities, and something will have to be done at least to relieve the situation.

Comparing the farmers of Canada with those of Australia, particularly the wheat farmers, we find that not only are the Canadian farmers handicapped in the selling of their wheat, on account of the exchange caused by the difference between the Canadian dollar and the British pound, but the Australian farmer, one of their chief competitors, has the benefit of a nine cents per bushel bonus.

The situation as I have outlined it has meant that the standard of living on the farm has been reduced, and if something is not done to stop the continued deflation that standard will fall still lower and lower until it will reach the stage where we shall be ashamed to refer to it.

If one travels through the country at all today one must appreciate the fact that no building improvements are being made; that help on the land is being dispensed with on every possible occasion; and that sometimes children are being kept from school in order to assist their parents. The fact that labour is being dispensed with means that the people are trying to get along with too little help, the result being that weeds are increasing and farms deteriorating, and needless to say land generally is falling to an absurdly low price, though even at that price very little indeed is changing hands.

I wish to direct the attention of the house to a type of farmers we have who are putting up a courageous fight, men who, when they went on the land thought that they had at least a chance of making homes for themselves, even if they might not make money. I refer to our returned soldier settlers. I was delighted the other day to hear from the lips of the Minister of Labour, who has charge of the soldier settlement problem, that not in a single case would the government enforce collections in these difficult times if it meant bringing real hardship to debtors who were doing their best to make ends meet. I think I am quoting the minister correctly. I am rather afraid, however, that he is not as closely in touch with what some of the collecting officials are doing at this time as he might be. I am continually having brought to my attention cases of real hardship if the one-third per cent of the crop is collected from the soldier settlers, which is due from them to the board. I am not going to bother the house with many of these cases, but I will put two of them on record.

The first one comes from a man named J. A. Brown, of Westlock, Alberta. His total crop comprised 828 bushels of wheat and 870 bushels of oats. If one-third is deducted for the soldier settlement board he will have remaining 552 bushels of wheat and 580 bushels of oats. After deducting seed and elevator dockage, he will have remaining 480 bushels of wheat at 26 cents, or $124.80; 480 bushels of oats at 8 cents or $38.40, making a total of $163.20. This man has school taxes to pay amounting to $54; municipal taxes, $22.45, and a threshing bill of $67.50, or a total of $143.95, and if you deduct that from the larger amount it leaves him with a balance of $19.25. He has a family of four to keep until next year, and he says in a footnote to the letter he has written me that ninety per cent of the other boys around there on soldier settlement farms are in a similar fix.

Mr. GORDON: After the receipt of that letter, did the hon. member forward it to the department?

Mr. SPENCER: I took the matter up with the department and they said that the official in charge was out west but that they would draw this man's case to his attention as soon as he came back. The next man is J. G. Adkins, Jr. His total crop amounted in value to $327, and if he deducts $109 for the board it leaves $218. His school and municipal taxes and threshing bill and binder twine amount to $201.36, leaving a balance of $16.64. This man has a family of seven. He tells me that his original debt in 1920 was $3,000. He has paid $2,000 and still owes $3,696. I thought I must be wrong in this figure and I looked up the record tonight; I have in my hand a statement from the soldier settlement branch at Edmonton showing the total debt outstanding to be $3,696.09.

I am quite sure that the minister, when he realizes the situation, will give this matter every consideration possible. I feel, however, from what he said in the house the other day, that he could not have been advised of some of these most difficult cases to which attention has been drawn by various members of the house. I am also quite sure the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government must realize the serious situation of agriculture in this country, and that is one reason why I am surprised that a statement has not been made with regard to government policy, indicating how agriculture will be relieved.

I have here a clipping which is supposed to be a statement from a speech of the Prime Minister delivered in Calgary on December 30. Unfortunately I have not the year. This is what he said:

> The marketing of the wheat crop will leave our agriculturists without a sufficient competence for the winter months, and will find them, when the spring comes, without the seed for next year's crop.

This being so, I am surprised that no results have been obtained from the efforts put forth from different parts of this house to have the Canadian dollar tied to the British pound so that we might have some chance of competing in the British market.

For the last few days we have been discussing the problem of unemployment. In my opinion this problem is largely one of purchasing power. None of us object to being what might be called unemployed, that is to have a little more leisure, if we have the wherewithal to spend while enjoying that leisure. The term "unemployment" is applied to those who are in enforced idleness with nothing to spend. If agriculture was put upon a paying basis, the unemployment problem would largely disappear, although perhaps not entirely. I am one of those who appreciate that if we make the proper use of science and invention, we will always have an unemployment problem unless we shorten the hours of labour. If agriculture was placed upon its feet employment would be given to several hundreds of thousands of people now out of work. There would be an increased purchasing power which in turn would provide work in the factories for large numbers of unemployed.

I feel confident that more people have been driven off the land by the hard conditions they have had to face, than the number put back on the land, as mentioned the other day by the Minister of Labour. I am continually receiving letters from municipalities stating that more and more people are in such circumstances as to become cares upon the municipality in which they reside. I understand that those who become charges are liable to deportation. I should like to know how many have been deported on account of the position in which they found themselves. I have before me the total figures for 1930, which show that 4,205 were deported in that year at a cost to the country of $138,220. I have no doubt that because of the hard times during the past two years, the total number of deportations now would be still larger.

It is because of the serious situation of agriculture that I have thought it worth while even at this late hour of the session to take up the time of the house as I have. I have no doubt other hon. members will cover other phases of this matter which I have not had time to deal with, but within the time at my disposal I hope I have brought some information to the attention of the house which will make those hon. members who are not in position to understand our problems appreciate them and realize, as we who live in the agricultural sections do, that the problem of agriculture is the greatest to be faced by Canada today.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, if I understand aright, there is a motion before the house to go into supply. Perhaps it is a good thing that we have the motion to go into supply, the motion to go into committee of ways and means and the address in reply to the speech from the throne, because otherwise I would be at a loss to understand how we would find it possible to bring before this deliberative assembly the final analysis of public affairs with which we as hon. members of this chamber ought to deal. That is one impression I have received as an hon. member of this house, especially during the last year or two. As I have said, it is a splendid thing to have a motion before the house once in a while which will enable an ordinary member to take up the great questions and the great problems, financial and commercial, which concern this dominion at the present time. When we read our history we find that the Canadian parliament has sovereign powers in dealing with commercial treaties and with legislation. We have the competency now as a great assembly to pass the legislation we desire to pass in the interests of Canada. I think it is time that this house should reassert itself in connection with the freedom of discussion, the freedom of debate, and the freedom to take up any problem of paramount importance at any moment confronting the people of Canada.

There is no offending resolution on the order paper standing in my name; perhaps if there were it would be impossible for me to discuss what I want to discuss this evening. More than likely it would, I would be ruled out of order; I would not be allowed to say a word about the unemployment and farm relief problems which concern my riding, my province and dominion. More than that, if I had a question standing in my name on the order paper or if there were an amendment in my name before the house, presumably I would find it impossible to discuss what I am about to discuss. I am afraid the gag would be applied, I would be stopped and told that I was out of order. So far as discussing problems of special importance to my own riding and my own province is concerned, I would not have that opportunity. Because I have rightfully forty minutes of the time of this house at my disposal and because it is impossible to rule me out of order, I am only too happy to rise in this debate to say a few words in connection with one or two matters of vital importance.

One matter with which I am concerned is the problem of unemployment, the biggest problem before this country today. Why should we not discuss it fully and completely? Another problem before Canada is the problem of farm relief. Why should any hon. member from western Canada or any other part of the dominion be stopped from discussing farm relief or unemployment? I cannot see any reason why he should, and as a member of this chamber I stand upon my rights when I say that so far as I am concerned I am going to do my duty to western Canada, to my own riding and to Canada as a whole by discussing these two important problems.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Give them a crack about the Bright Fan.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I hope to say something about the Bright Fan later on, and when I do I hope the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) will be in their places.

Mr. QUINN: What about the flag?

Mr. McINTOSH: Apparently the hon. gentleman is a small Canadian and he does not believe in a distinctive national flag. I shall endeavour later to put him where he belongs on that question.

Mr. QUINN: Can the hon. member spell "able"?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, and many other words that the hon. member cannot. If I may proceed, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the unemployment issue, we find on page 1455 of Hansard, in the address which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) recently made to the house, the following words:

> I shall only summarize the situation by saying that the government has in course of preparation what we believe will be an appropriate agenda to submit to an interprovincial conference.

He is coming to grips with the unemployment problem at last.

> It is proposed to call that conference so that it may conclude its labours between now and January 30, when the house will reassemble. At that conference it is proposed to discuss all those matters that have engaged the attention of governments, both provincial and federal, with particular reference to the question referred to by myself on April 29, 1931, namely, the problem of unemployment and how it should be and may be dealt with under the divided jurisdiction which exists in Canada.

These are practically the concluding remarks of the Prime Minister on November 22. That brings me face to face with the problem of unemployment insurance, because that problem and kindred subjects the Prime Minister admits are to be discussed at a provincial-federal conference between now and the reassembling of parliament toward the end of January. Hon. members who have been members of this house for the last few years will realize that as far as the groundwork of unemployment insurance is concerned, that was done two years ago. It was done by the Liberal party when in power, in cooperation with our friends in the corner of this side of the house. We had an investigation before the industrial and international relations committee each year for two years, one in 1928 and another in 1929, and as a result of those two investigations that committee came to certain conclusions. One was that we accept and endorse the principle of compulsory social insurance, based upon compulsory contributions derived from the state, the employer and the employee. That is the backbone of any unemployment insurance policy. That conclusion was come to in 1928 under a Liberal administration.

Another conclusion arrived at was that as far as jurisdiction in the matter of unemployment insurance is concerned, it belonged exclusively to the legislatures of the different provinces. That was number two. Number three was that when the census should be taken in 1931, information in connection with unemployment insurance would be secured and action follow the securing of that information. Number four was that since unemployment insurance was a big problem, more than one province should go into the system. One province would not be enough; two provinces would not be sufficient, and the idea was that as many provinces as possible should take up the principle, hammer out the legislation and adopt unemployment insurance as a principle in industrial affairs in Canada. These are only some of the conclusions of the 1928 report of the Industrial and International Relations Committee. I might continue and say that in 1929, the next year, the problem was reinvestigated and practically the same conclusions were reached. The point I want to drive home is this, that when the Liberal party were in power, all the discussion in conection with this great problem was undertaken and completed; the groundwork for an unemployment insurance system was laid, and all the present government has to do is to take up where the Liberal party left off, show a little bit of courage, leadership and constructive idealism, and go ahead and evolve,—hammer out something that will be for the benefit of the industrial workers of this country.

In regard to an analysis of this intricate problem of unemployment insurance, there was one principle adopted in Great Britain. Across the border in the United States they have practically committed themselves to an opposite principle. In Great Britain they adopted a national system of compulsory insurance, and across the line—where little has yet been done—the feeling is that every industry ought to be responsible for industrial economic stabilization within its own limits; that every industry should not only be responsible for the economic stabilization within its own limits, but should adopt a principle of unemployment insurance by itself, then every major industry could be linked up with the other industries of each state, have the state come in and cooperate with those coordinated industries and thus give to that state and gradually to the republic as a whole a coordinated system of unemployment insurance that would work out to the benefit of the entire nation. In Great Britain they have accepted the opposite method; they stand for a national system of unemployment insurance which is backed up in a public way and to which the public is committed. But in the republic to the south of us they believe industrial insurance is largely a problem of private industrialists and that by getting together and cooperating, they, as large employers of labour, can largely overcome the obstacles in the way and effect a solution of the unemployment difficulty.

I have not time here to go fully into the question of unemployment insurance. One could talk for an hour on that subject alone, because it is a highly complicated one. But may I say that it is recognized as a preliminary principle of great importance to have a coordinated system of labour exchanges right across Canada, and by manning those exchanges by experts, by having no person appointed to them except on the basis of merit, by having the state cooperate with those exchanges and by squaring away the question of jurisdiction provincially and nationally, I believe there ought to be no difficulty in Canada giving a splendid lead in regard to this very vexatious question. I hope when the conference meets between now and the first of January, the Prime Minister, as promised, will gather representatives of the provinces together, and by discussion, by conference and by analysis of the industrial situation facing the different provinces in regard to this matter, there will be arrived at some successful conclusion and as a result we shall see adopted in this country at no distant date a scientifically sound system of unemployment insurance.

When that problem is being worked out, the greatest care should be taken to safeguard the interests of agriculture. A system of unemployment insurance must be largely for the industrial employees of Canada. That system should be such as to secure for them an adequate livelihood, to get for them from month to month and year to year work, a job or relief, and not have them wrongfully on the dole as they are now from one ocean to the other. May I read at this point a letter showing the condition to which unemployment has brought many a citizen of Saskatchewan? This letter is from a man who taught school for many a year and then went into business. He went to British Columbia and is now back in Saskatchewan. This is his story. I think the letter will depict better than can the language of any hon. member, the situation as it exists today in that great wheat growing province of Saskatchewan. The letter, which is dated Esterhazy, Saskatchewan, November 15, 1932, reads:

Mr. Cameron R. McIntosh, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. McIntosh:

I am writing to beg that you remember me if you know of, or should hear of any kind of position.

I have nine children to feed, clothe and educate. Their suffering and illness for lack of necessities prompts me to write to you. Their present environment and condition if not soon improved is bound to influence their future as Canadian citizens. We are now staying with relatives who cannot afford to keep us, but as the alternative is exposure on the road allowance—

Note that, Mr. Speaker:

—we are compelled to share their little. I was compelled to leave Spiritwood last summer because my wages were cut down to a point where I could no longer exist. I sold my household goods to obtain funds in an unsuccessful attempt to better my condition. This is the first time in twenty years that I have been out of work. This is my reward after twenty years of service in Saskatchewan. By your acquaintance with me you know that I did not waste my money, but all I could earn I spent on my family. If it has been unlawful to raise a family I have no reason for annoying anyone, but for the sake of my innocent children I must exert every means to obtain employment and only experience could make you realize the abominable horrors of unemployment, the demoralizing influence of its agonies.

Will you please advise me of any openings you may know or hear of anywhere in the province or in Canada?

There is a letter, Mr. Speaker, that shows exactly the condition of affairs of many a head of a family in the province of Saskatchewan. I drew to the attention of the house the other day the fact that those seeking relief in the city of Saskatoon, and I believe it is true of other cities in western Canada, have to sign a document mortgaging their little homes, for which they paid $300 or $500 or $1,000, as the case may be, before they can get one dollar of relief. From the standpoint of the state, or the strictly legal standpoint, to take the best possible security you can get, may be a good proposition, but looked at from the standpoint of national justice and common decency to an individual citizen who has done his part in the building up of this dominion it is a very hard thing to endure. To show what is going on, I will quote from a telegram I received:

> We are asked to sign a document that on demand we should give a mortgage on our homes and chattels, also all moneys that are earned except statutory exemptions; further that any relief commissioner or its officials can enter our homes at any time they see fit.
