A Reason.

George Johnson, the Dominion statistiian, reports that the average number in the family has decreased in the Eastern Maritime Provinces, this being due in part to the decay of early marriages and the increasing tendency to celibacy; this latter, he thinks, is "due to the spread of education which enables females to become better wage earners and therefore less interested in marriage."

We notice that some of our conten poraries are disposed to ridicule Mr Johnson for the conclusions he has stated. We are led to think that the "spread

We are led to think that the "spread of education' has had considerable to do with the decrease of population in our reduction has been made in the insurance premium within the town. The report was taken up clause by clause and passed, with the exception of one or two matters which were tabled for the present. An auditing committee was appointed to examine the accounts, and a committee was also appointed to frame amendments to the act, after which the meeting adjourned to meet again in four weeks time.

We are led to think that the "spread of education" has had considerable to do with the decrease of population in our rural districts. As the young men, brought up on farms, have become, by the superior system of education, fitted, or had up to matural ability developed, for other occupations, they have had a distaste or, at all events, a loss of regard for the farmers' life encouraged with the result, in hundreds of instances, that homes and farm life have been abandoued and the most promising element of rural society has immigrated to the cities and towns of to the Provinces and States.
