The member opposite raises another situation where an hon. member moves from one political group to another recognized political party. Yes, there have been cases of people moving from the Progressive Conservative Party to the Liberal Party or to the New Democratic Party. In fact, we had one member in the last Parliament who I think visited every party. He was elected as a Progressive Conservative and sat with each of the other parties, and ended up finally sitting as an Independent.

If you were to accept the arguments by my hon. friend across the way, then you would have the absurdity, Mr. Speaker, and the potential in theory of 295 separate political affiliations the blue party, the pink party, the yellow party, the green party, the up party, the down party, the inside out party, et cetera.

What this is intended to be is a serious historical record that can be consulted and will help scholars and others in the future to determine the political dynamics of the place at a given point in time. If you allow people to designate their own political affiliation after they have been through an electoral process, would we have accepted, for instance, the hon. member's request, having run as a Progressive Conservative, having sought the concurrence of his voters, and having been elected that way, to emerge on the opening day of this Parliament and to stand up in his place and say: "I want to be recorded in the back of this book as a communist"? Would we have accepted that the designation of political affiliation is entirely in the member's hands, in the hands of the electors?

Perhaps we can turn our attention east to India. Its system is such that you run under a political affiliation and when, for one reason or another, you tire of that political affiliation and are not willing to support the majority consensus that is reached, then your seat is declared vacant and you have the right to run as an Independent or an independent Conservative, or whatever you will, and to seek re-election.

Perhaps this Parliament would be well served if people were to take that step and to seek their voters' approval under a different kind of label. I think none of us in this Chamber who believe in democracy would have any difficulty with that. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that to invent a political affiliation which does not exist under the Canada Elections Act and to request the Parliament of Canada to approve the designation of that political affiliation in its written records, when it does not exist as a label one can use in running for election in this country, would be a serious mistake. It could lead to all kinds of abuses over time where people deliberately run under one affiliation with the intention of emerging at a later time under a different one.

There are those of us in western Canada who have faced that reality, going back to the late 1970s. Some of those who presently form the core of the Reform Party sought nomination in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. There was one in my riding back in 1977 who sought the nomination to represent the Conservative Party with the intention of winning election as a Progressive Conservative and emerging in this Chamber as a member of another political group, devoted to western separatism.

That is not very democratic. It is not something that this House should allow. If people get elected under a banner, that is one thing. If they no longer like the banner under which they got elected and they can join another party in the Chamber that was legitimately elected, then that is another thing. But if neither of those two situations exist for the member, then I think we have no choice but to list them in the back of our book as an Independent.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants and also to the government Whip's intervention.

First of all, I would like to correct what I believe to be an error in the first hon. member's submission to the House concerning the fact that parties do not appear in the standing orders. I draw his attention to Standing Order 33, wherein parties are specifically mentioned. I am sure I could find others had I the time to go right through the order book.

Parties are mentioned in Standing Order 33 and they are referred to as existing in the House of Commons, and so parties do crop up in there. There are many references to parties in the Canada Elections Act, as I am sure he knows. I did not want him to create the wrong impression that parties were not in fact part of our electoral structure. There has been a significant change in the electoral structure since the 1960s, the time period of which he was speaking.

I recognize that members are free to run with a party label now in an election and that the label can be put on the ballot, but it is up to the candidate who is seeking election to choose whether he or she wishes to have a party designation attached to his or her name.

The hon. member should remember that. In other words, we are not compelled by the Elections Act to run as representatives of a party or with a party label attached. We have the option of refusing and just leaving no affiliation following the name on the ballot.

The hon. member in choosing his own designation here as a member of this House is free to make the choice that he suggests he is entitled to make, notwithstanding what the government Whip says.

I well recall the incident he referred to with Mr. Churchill, the former member for Winnipeg South Centre. I also recall the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, Mr. Benidickson, who for many years was a Lib-Lab member of Parliament. He would not take a straight Liberal appellation, although he sat with the Liberals in the House. He insisted on Liberal-Labour appearing as his party affiliation in the Wednesday editions of Hansard. He ran as such, but of course he could not put that on the ballot because he was elected, for many years at least, before the party designation could be put on the ballot. It was his choice as to what he wanted to be.

I recall there were independent Liberals. I recall there were independent Conservatives in the 1960s. I am sure that the changes in the Elections Act which have allowed a designation to be attached to a candidate's name have not changed the procedures or rules of this House in respect to a member's right to designate his or her party status.

I think what the government Whip is suggesting is that because there have been these changes in the Elections Act, somehow we cannot have anything independent except Independents in this House. In other words, if you are going to withdraw from a party, you must therefore become an Independent or a member of another recognized party. I do not think that is so. The member who makes the change and withdraws has his or her choice as to how he or she wishes to be called or designated in this House.

While designation as an Independent may result in the loss of certain privileges and obligations of being a member of a designated party, it does not mean that the person cannot designate himself as an independent Conservative, an independent Liberal or an independent New Democratic, and make that perfectly proper in terms of the listing in Wednesday's Hansard. There is nothing terribly official about it, but I think the member is entitled to make that choice. I submit that the government Whip is seeking to alter the rules under which we have operated here by reference to the changes in the Elections Act made in the seventies. I am not sure it is necessary.

If Your Honour has any doubt on the matter, I think it would be an appropriate case for a referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where the matter could be considered in detail. But I submit, on the precedents that have been established in this House for many years, that it would entirely proper for the hon. member to choose his designation, insist that it be inserted in the Wednesday listing as an appendix to Hansard, and Your Honour could take cognizance of that designation for all purposes in this House.

I do not think that such a designation on his part would be contrary to the practices and traditions of this place. Indeed it would be fully in accordance with them, in so far as they have existed over the years. I submit they have not been changed, either by design or by accident, as a result of the amendments to the Canada Elections Act in the early 1970s whereby party designations could be placed on a ballot paper.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wanted, at the earliest possible moment, to correct an inadvertent mistake by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. In his reference to a western member crossing the floor, I think he referred to Jack Murta.

Of course Jack Murta was and is an hon. gentleman who was loyal to his party over the course of his tenure here. I think he was referring to Jack Horner who crossed the floor to join the Liberals and was soundly defeated in the subsequent election.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member for Calgary Southeast. understood that the discussion was in respect of our former colleague, the Hon. Jack Horner.

I want to put a question to the House. Can any member advise me as to what legal impediment there is against the hon. member calling himself an independent Conservative in this House?

I have listened to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Calgary Southeast, and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I will consider the matter and I will come back with an reasoned response.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, not to rebut but I got more interested in the submission of my friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, as he developed it. I am quite aware that if it is a question of political parties that name is in the Standing Orders, and obviously there is even more of a designation in the Elections Act. The name of parties does not appear in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members. I will consider the matter. The hon. member who has raised it has been a member of this House for many years. His father was a member of this House for many years before that. In all those years he, his father, and his family were supporters of a particular political party. Certainly the hon. member receives a certain amount of sympathy in this Chamber on both sides of the House when he raises the matter.

I will try to come back with an answer which is appropriate for the internal management of the House.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-58—TABLING OF REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Report of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-58, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, with amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank all members who took part in the committee's proceedings, the support staff, and especially the Clerk of the Committee, Ms. Santosh Sirpaul, who worked tirelessly, sometimes through the weekend, to prepare reports and comments for the committee.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I take special pleasure, since today is International Human Rights Day, in presenting the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. Our fourth report is in both official languages and is entitled Unanswered Questions.

I believe it is one of the rare times, if not the first, that a standing committee of the House of Commons has used its power to analyze a government response to a previous committee report and to request further information. This fourth report is an analysis of the recent government response to our second report, which called on the government to develop a comprehensive national strategy for the integration of disabled persons into Canadian economic life.

The committee's unanimous view is that the government response, while it contains worth-while initiatives, is not a truly comprehensive response. We are therefore calling on the government for a further contribution to the dialogue which our second report initiated. Clear and complete answers to the questions raised by our second report are important so that Canadians, including those with disabilities, will know what to expect from their government. More broadly, they are needed because committees of this House can only be effective if their work is addressed substantively by the government.

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests a comprehensive response to this report within 150 days. We believe this response is already overdue, because it relates entirely to our second report and we are requesting the government to provide its response as soon as possible.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Amherstview, Napanee and other areas near Kingston and the Islands.

These petitioners reside in the riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, which is represented in this House by a Conservative member who, apparently, will not present these kinds of petitions in the House. However, I am pleased to present it on their behalf, because these people are opposed to the goods and services tax and particularly in so far as the tax applies to books and newspapers.

The petitioners recite that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of our democratic traditions. Accordingly they feel that our democratic structure is threatened as a result of the imposition of this wicked tax on the printed word, and they call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to lay upon the table three petitions signed by individuals, primarily from the province of Ontario, but also from the province of Quebec, mainly in the area of Ottawa and surrounding communities, who express their sincere opposition to the goods and services tax and in particular, that it applies to magazines, books and newspapers.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax. They further call upon the Government of Canada, that in view of the Canadian-made recession, it not proceed at this time with the goods and services tax which will have a very negative effect on the Canadian economy, especially Canadian consumers as well as small businesses all across this country.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of petitions signed by almost 600 people from the constituency of Lambton—Middlesex asking this government to phase out the use of MMT in gasoline.

On December 1 this government officially phased out the use of lead as an octane enhancer in automotive fuels, but it still continues to allow methylcyclopentadlenyl manganese tricarbonyl to be used, which is another neuro-toxic substance that has been banned in the United States since 1978.

These petitioners ask this government to act now, ban MMT and replace it with environmentally friendly ethanol. This would provide a market for millions of tonnes of Canadian grown grain.

Mr. Speaker, I also have petitions opposing the GST, opposing the closing of local post offices and petitions opposing cuts to our veterans services.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present two petitions from residents of metropolitan Toronto.

They call upon the government to withdraw its plans to tax books and periodicals. The printed word is a cornerstone of our economic prosperity and our freedom of expression. These residents of Canada call upon the government to not tax these books and periodicals.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my first petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, points out that the government's cutback on passenger rail service is not environmentally sensible. They point out that the most environmentally friendly way of large passenger travel is by train.

They are asking the government to reconsider its decision to curtail certain routes and to invest more appropriately in the movement of Canadians via passenger rail.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from people in Kingston and Belleville.

They point out their concern at the government's decision to proceed with the goods and services tax. They feel that this is a regressive tax which permits benefits to certain Canadians in certain regions of the country. It is particularly punitive against northerners and people living in more remote areas of Canada. They are asking the government to reconsider their decision, back off, and introduce real, fair, tax reform instead.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions.

The first one is from small business people in my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby. They call on this government not to implement the goods and services tax. They say it is an unfair form of taxation because it forces small business people to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden and that it will prove to be an implementation nightmare for their small businesses.

They also say that the tax does not address the concerns of small business with regard to the MST. Instead, it increases the tax burden for the small business community. They ask this government to reject the proposed goods and services tax, to consult with business, labour and with consumer groups to reach a broad consensus on tax reform.

ABORTION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by petitioners in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia as well as the Vancouver area.

This petition says that the choice to bear children or not to bear children is a matter of personal choice and not one of criminal law. The Canadian Medical Association already has guidelines and regulations in place concerning abortion. They say that criminal sanctions do nothing to address the reasons why women seek abortions, and do nothing to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to refrain from imposing any criminal sanctions against abortions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East) moved:

That this House regrets that almost one million Canadian children are living in poverty, that 1.4 million Canadians each year must rely on food banks and that the current recession and the proposed Goods and Services Tax will make this situation worse; and

That the House, desiring the elimination of poverty in Canada by the year 2000, demands immediate programs to ameliorate the plight of the working poor, including a review of the minimum wage, discriminatory employment practices, current available children's benefits and other income support programs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since today is the final allotted day for the supply period ending December 10, 1990 the House will move through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill. In view of the recent practice, do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

• (1540)

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions. I am not sure whether there is agreement, but I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons as well as the House leader for the New Democratic Party whether or not there there would be a disposition in the House for the time allotted to the parties in the speaking order in which they are recognized by the Speaker that that individual party have the right to divide the time as it sees fit, namely, for our first speaker, instead of having the 20 plus 10, we would have ten and five and ten and five.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to signal our usual co-operation on this matter and as we are such fine people on this side, we will co-operate in any way we can.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not appreciate the implications in those last comments but I have to say that since this is the final allotted day and the fact that we are not beginning debate until well after the usual time, I would like to make a slight change to that proposal. I think in the interest of equity and fairness that we consider the proposal but that we simply rotate in the usual fashion, not on the basis of 20 and 10, but on the basis of ten and five. If that is the interest of the House, we are certainly willing to co-operate.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting proposal which comes from the House leader of the New Democratic Party. It is a major deviation from the practice of what we have been doing in this House for quite some time of course, but in view of the circumstances quite appropriate.

I would have thought that the hon. member would want to co-operate, in view of the fact that the subject matter is put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton East, and have more members of his party and my party enter the debate. But on the proposal which is being put forward, in view of the fact that it is unprecedented to have that kind of an arrangement, we will have to go back to the 20 and 10.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we can simply ask that our hon. friend from the New Democratic Party consider the proposal made by the Liberal Party earlier. My hesitation in accepting the proposal that he made is quite simple. The issue we are dealing with today is of such fundamental importance that many of us have laboured long and hard to compose remarks which deal in considerable length with a very important issue and one which was dealt with previously by his previous leader.

By giving to the parties themselves the ability to decide how to divide up their time, we would have a system that is equitable and fair and would enable the Liberal Party to make proposals and to organize themselves in the way that they felt was most effective but would not derogate from the ability of members to deal with this important subject in a more extensive way if they felt it was constructive to do so. I think it is consistent with the traditions of this place and if we are prepared to show sufficient flexibility, it would meet the needs of members on all sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There has not been agreement. Do we go for 20 and 10 and if the respective parties would like to designate their own party as ten and five when they get up to speak, that would be fine. I am at the disposal of the House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, again, I like the idea although I have noticed when you calculate the times you have managed to freeze out the last two New Democrat speakers because we are starting late.

I am quite prepared to undertake to maximize the number of participants in this important debate. I cannot do anything but agree with the minister that this is an important debate, particularly in light of the fact that it was initiated a year ago by the then leader of the New Democratic Party.

I would agree with my colleague's proposals to have the parties decide whether they want to break their sections into ten and fives, with the undertaking to my two colleagues that prior to completing this debate there would be ample time after the first round to have two speakers from the New Democratic Party. If not, I do not see any advantage in agreeing to this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we should just start off with 20 and 10, as proposed. Debate.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate that 15 days before Christmas, we take this opportunity in the House today to pause and reflect for a moment on what it is that we are really here for.

Frankly, I, myself, in reviewing the package of government actions since 1984, was shocked to examine the extent to which the Tory knife has cut deep into the hearts of poor children and poor families in the country.

I moved this particular motion, not as the end to the problem of poverty, but rather as one opportunity for the House in a full and frank way to discuss a number of issues which touch Canadians living in poverty. Over the next several hours, Mr. Speaker, you will hear from members of our caucus who will address very specific concerns bringing to bear their expertise in the area.

One of the things that shocked me—and I think it probably shocks a lot of Canadians—is that not only do we know that almost 1 million Canadian children live in poverty, but that 1.4 million Canadians must rely on food banks to supplement their daily bread.

Forty per cent of those people are children who, by virtue of the fact that they do not have enough to eat, are not able to excel in school, are 1.7 times more likely to have psychiatric disorders, are 1.8 times more likely to perform poorly in school, and are twice as likely to have conduct disorders. Poor children are the kind of children left to repeat grades more often than children from families who are not poor. Twice as many poor children fall behind in educational achievement by the age of 15. They become the drop–outs whom millions of government dollars are hopefully trying to encourage to stay in school.

We have to deal, as a government and as a political party, with how we intend to wipe out poverty. The first thing we have to do is examine what has happened over the past six years.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree with me that the last six years have dealt a real blow to families and children in the country. I was shocked myself to learn of the kinds of deep cuts that have been brought about by the government to programs that are directed towards helping the poor and, in particular, helping children.

The very specific major cutbacks in EPF transfer payments will cut approximately $22 billion from medicare over the next 10 years. If you set aside the EPF transfer payments, and look at other federal government programs, Mr. Speaker, directed towards poor families, what you will find as a result of Tory policies is $20 billion in spending has been cut from families, children, and elderly people who most need the resources.

In constant dollars, the cutbacks of the child benefit system beginning with the family allowance in 1986 cut $1.6 billion from the pockets of Canadian families to help children. The deindexation of child benefits in the tax structure cut $3.5 billion from the program between 1986 and 1991. The clawback of the family allowance and the old age security will cut $215 million in spending this year alone, and $618 million a year by the end of the three-year phase-in period.

The Mulroney government has cut back on EPF transfers, as I have already mentioned. In fact, the cumulative effect of the cut in transfer payments to provincial governments for health, social services, and education—the kinds of programs needed to provide support to working poor families—represent a cut of $31 billion for medicare and post-secondary education. Approximately $22 billion of this will be taken out of the heart of medicare.

In 1990, the Mulroney government announced a plan to cut transfers in CAP to Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta, claiming these provinces were too wealthy. This cut represents $75 million in 1990 and $80 million in 1991-1992.

The Mulroney government has also cut its proposal to spend $4 billion on increasing the number of child care spaces. That, combined with the fact that the government spending under CAP amounts to $2.6 billion, means that the government's savings of $200 million annually again is being carried out on the backs of working and working-poor families.

We have heard time and again in the House how Bill C-21 is going to do so much for the working poor. Well, we are getting the tally. In municipalities across the country as a result of Bill C-21 the welfare rolls are rising. Bill C-21 was not a measure to create jobs or to assist those thousands of workers who have gotten their walking papers over the last number of months as a result of the government's monetary and fiscal policies. In fact, Bill C-21 will see a $1.3 billion annual cut in benefits to the unemployed. These are real people who are lacking hope and the federal government's $1.3 billion cut is going to reach deeper into the pockets of those families who now currently cannot afford to support themselves.

The main impediments to families being caught in the cycle of poverty are the issues of food and housing. Can you believe, Mr. Speaker, that in 1989 the Conservative government of Brian Mulroney actually spent less on housing across the country than was spent in 1984? At a time when housing costs across the country are sky-rocketing and when the number of homeless has reached into the tens of thousands of homeless families across the country, the Mulroney government is spending less in real dollars in 1989 than it spent in 1984.

For the benefit of those on the other side of the House, I would like to table a copy of a list all of the cuts that have hit poor and working-poor families since 1984. Those cuts total over $20 billion, excluding the specific amounts relating to EPF transfers. That is $20 billion taken from the hands—in fact, from the mouths—of the children of Canada.

One of the reasons we wanted to launch this debate was not only so that we could wake up Canadians to the fact that we have a country which has an increasing gap between the rich and the poor. We do not have to go to the papers to see the evidence of it. We can go into our own constituencies and to the food banks. Only last month in the city of Montreal there was a line-up down the street of people trying to get second-hand clothing because they did not have enough money to clothe themselves. The federal government's response to the situation of families in real need is to cut, cut, cut to the bare bones.

Let us look for example at a very specific area. I was frankly shocked to hear the Minister of Labour in the House today, in response to my colleague from Winnipeg, claim that he was not immediately moving to increase the minimum wage because only a small percentage of Canadians would benefit from it. Mr. Speaker, the percentage may be small but I think the federal government and the Minister of Labour should hang their heads in shame that the federal government has the lowest minimum wage of any government in Canada. My colleague pointed out the fact that a single woman supporting a child would have to work 87 hours a week at the minimum wage merely to reach the established level of poverty. Frankly, you see the real need in provinces such as Newfoundland which has a higher minimum wage than the federal government. After I have tabled the analysis of the cuts of federal spending, I would like to take some time to read into the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have permission to table the document? There has to be unanimous consent in order to have it tabled. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, I am sorry. There is no agreement.

Ms. Copps: I am sorry Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry. The hon. member has no agreement to have the document tabled. There was no agreement. Debate.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare is disagreeing, let him stand up and say so. The Speaker asked the question and everyone agreed. There was silence.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seeks to table, with unanimous consent, what is simply a partisan list of rhetoric. If the hon. member wants to do that, she can easily either include it in her speech or she can put out a press release.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member does not have unanimous consent. She is on debate.

Ms. Copps: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not think it is important for Canadians to have a sense of just how deeply his government has cut. I can understand why he does not want to because it is a shameful record.

I was the one who was shocked when I actually sat down and read in black and white the depths and level of cuts to social programs across the country over the last six years, to housing programs and to food programs. It is no wonder that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would not want to have that information on the record. It is a harbinger of more ills to come under his government. He certainly has done very little in his new capacity to try to alleviate the situation.

Given that he is unprepared to look at the facts that the opposition wants to lay before the House, would he consider the facts about the federal minimum wage? The federal wage has not been raised in the last four years. How many members of the House would like to go four years without a pay raise? How many would like to go four years without a raise? The federal government has gone since May 26, 1986, without a single increase to a pathetic and pitiful minimum wage of $4 an hour.

Alberta has a higher minimum wage of $4.50 an hour. British Columbia, which is not known for labour enlightenment, has a minimum wage of $5 an hour. Manitoba's is $4.70. New Brunswick's is $4.50. Newfoundland's is $4.25 and we know the difficult economic conditions in Newfoundland. In the province of Ontario, as of June 1, 1990, the minimum wage is $5.40 an hour. In Prince Edward Island it is $4.50 an hour. In Quebec it is $5.00 an hour. In Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories it is $5. In Yukon territory it is $5.39.

When we asked the legitimate question in the House today of the Minister of Labour as to why the federal government had the lowest minimum wage in Canada, he actually had the gall to respond that it covered so very few people and since those people were part-time, he did not want to eliminate their jobs. That is the same kind of rationale that was originally used to buttress the rationale for slavery. The rationale was that minimum employment standards could not be introduced for fear of cutting out jobs in the cotton fields.

Even if the minimum wage covers only 1.3 per cent of the federal working population, at least the federal government should send a signal to provinces across the country that we are not followers, but rather we are leaders when it comes to providing support and, in particular, income support for the working poor.

One of the great fallacies of our generation is the fact that people who are living in circumstances of poverty are doing it because they do not want to pick themselves up by their bootstraps and work. The Macdonald royal commission on the economic condition of Canada discovered that over 50 per cent of people living in poverty in the country are in fact working.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the others who are not working outside the home are primarily women who are working inside the home and who are making a valuable and equal contribution to the state of not only the Canadian economy, but also to the psyche of Canada.

What we have on the government side is a deliberate decision to undercut the capacity of working Canadians to support themselves and their families, not only by specific cuts in programs, but also by a tax policy and a tax strategy which is gradually killing off working families in this country.

Between 1984 and 1991, total income taxes for working poor families increased 60 per cent. Under the so-called Tory tax reform, total income taxes increased 60 per cent for working poor families, while high income families saw their income taxes fall by 6.4 per cent.

Mr. Belsher: How many families no longer pay any income tax?

Ms. Copps: It is no wonder that the Gallup poll published today shows that Canadians have no faith in this government's capacity to equalize the tax burden, because they have seen six years of gouging of working poor families and six years of increases to high income families.

Let us look at one specific Conservative initiative. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare is going to have a chance very shortly to bring out another recycled version of his child care program. I think it will be the sixth or seventh version of the same promise that was made in 1984.

I would like to ask the government why in the context of its child care policy does it continue to support a tax deduction system which benefits high income Canadians to a much greater degree than low income Canadians?

Surely, Mr. Speaker, when you are talking about providing benefits to working families to pay for decent child care for their children, it should be important to target those finances, to target that care toward families who most need the help.

I do not understand a tax system that says if you earn $60,000 or $80,000 a year, you are entitled to more assistance to put your child in child care than a family that is earning $30,000 or $40,000. I hope that as part of the minister's new package of reforms, he will transfer tax deductions into tax credits so that those families who really need the help will get the help when it comes to child care funding. That is only part of the problem that we will be addressing more specifically in some of the presentations that have to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before going into any details, I think we should recognize the fact that the minimum wage system is shocking. The answer given by the Minister of Labour in the House today is shocking, because it shows the federal government has the lowest minimum wage in this country. The minister explained that only 1.3 per cent of the population was affected. Mr. Speaker, whether one person, 1,000 people or 100,000 people are affected, this kind of injustice is entirely unacceptable!

Ten years ago, the federal government had a very progressive minimum wage policy. Today, we are even worse than British Columbia, Newfoundland and all the other provinces. Their minimum wage is higher than the federal government's, where the minimum wage has remained set at $4 since 1986.

Perhaps hon. members would like to consider the following: Can they afford to wait four years until their next raise? I don't think they would be prepared to wait four years. So I think we can hardly say this to people who are earning the minimum wage, whatever their numbers. I also think the Minister of Labour should clarify the comment he made in the House that this affected people who worked part-time and they did not want to eliminate part-time jobs. Do we want to make wage slaves out of women, Mr. Minister, because by forcing them to work for $4 an hour, this is practically—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions or comments?

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question. I congratulate my colleague, the member for Hamilton East, on a fine speech. She made some comments with regard to minimum wage and the fact that the federal government should be leading rather than following. She was also mentioning when her time was finished that most of those persons on minimum wage salaries are women. I would ask her if maybe she could complete her statement, if she would do so, to continue enlightening us on her statement.

Also in her speech she referred to a document that she wished to table. Some members of the House preferred not to have it tabled. I was wondering whether she could divulge the contents of that document as well if she could find time.

Mr. Beatty: She already did. You may have slept through it though.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the minister of health and welfare says: "She already did. You may have slept through it though". He may sleep through the fact that his government has cut $20 billion from the pockets of poor Canadians over the last six years. A lot of other Canadians are not sleeping, and a lot of Canadian children are not sleeping because they do not have adequate nutrition. He may think it is funny and he may sit there and smirk over the fact that 40 per cent of Canadians using food banks now are children. He may laugh over the fact that in the city of Montreal there are children who cannot write their school exams because they do not have enough food in their stomachs. We on this side of the House do not think that is a laughing matter and one of the reasons that we want to introduce at this stage, 15 days before Christmas, a sole debate on the wide range of economic and social policy issues, including the minimum wage, is because the absolute minimum level of federal support needed to maintain the loss of purchasing power that has occurred over the last six years of Tory power strictly related to the minimum wage would require an increase in the federal minimum wage up to $5.88 an hour.

We are hoping on this side of the House that the debate today will begin to evolve not only around the areas of cuts. Believe me they are not hard to find in "slash and cut" Toryland. They can find the money to sell the GST, but heaven forbid that they should put food in the mouths of Canadian children.

At the same time, we want to see a real government solution to the very specific problem of the working poor in this country who are having to work at wages that the federal government should be ashamed of, the fact that $4 an hour has not changed since 1986, the fact that the real purchasing power of the poorest of Canadians employed under the federal system has remained stagnant since that time and the fact that they have lost in real dollars, based on the annual minimum wage rate in 1979, $1.88 an hour in their purchasing power as Canadians.

We on this side of the House want to see the government bring real programs forward to provide support to those Canadians who are trying to make it in a very difficult economic period and we do not need smirks and rhetoric on the part of the government. What we need are very specific programs. We are asking the government for some specific commitment on the particular issue of minimum wage and on a revisiting of the children's benefits that have been butchered by this government over the last six years.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I too congratulate my colleague from Hamilton East for touching on a whole series of points that affect average Canadians and people who are suffering through this government.

We have something in common with Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie as to the steel mills, and I am making reference to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I ask the hon. member to comment on the 85 per cent ruling which people who have been involved in a labour dispute for, in our case 16 weeks, and even after the 16 weeks people are not automatically entitled to unemployment insurance after having lived on $100 or less for all of those 16 weeks. These are families and it is particularly difficult at this time of year.

I would ask the hon. member about the 85 per cent ruling. It seems strange to me and I am sure it must seem just totally unjust to people who are involved in this kind of dispute that the government would take a ruling that has been struck down by everyone, including the Federal Court of Canada, to the Supreme Court of the land to ensure that this 85 per cent ruling remains intact, to the detriment of the workers of this country.

I am just wondering if she has any comment to that effect. Why would the government persist in such an unjust ruling?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, obviously the federal government should have allowed the law of the land to remain the law of the land when in fact the court struck down the 85 per cent ruling back in July 1989.

The fact that it did not seems to be further indication of the fact that it wants to squeeze workers off unemployment insurance. When you look at the net result of Bill C-21, which is cutting billions of dollars from unemployment insurance, the 85 per cent rule is a further nail in the coffin of a lot of steelworkers.

What makes it really difficult, Mr. Speaker, is if you look at the lengthy labour disputes both in Hamilton and in Sault Ste. Marie as they related to the steel industry, they came at the head of a very difficult recession. The fact is that in our own community of Hamilton, thousands of workers who are ready, willing and able to work are going to spend a very bleak Christmas not being able to work because the jobs simply are not there.

The jobs are not there because of the strike, and I think this is the point of the 85 per cent rule, and why it should be struck down. The jobs are not there because we are in an economic downturn caused by the high interest rate policies of this government.

Having concluded the steel dispute, both in Hamilton and in Algoma, at the same time as the recession hit us right between the eyes right across the country, the workers at Algoma are being hamstrung or strangled effectively by this 85 per cent rule. While in Hamilton they did have a sufficient number of recalls because we raised the issue in the House, it did in fact result in a positive—at least from the perspective of collecting unemployment insurance—result for some of the workers.

The same has not been said for Sault Ste. Marie, and many of those workers will continue through the Christmas season on welfare just like the thousands of other workers who have been cut off as a result of Bill C–21.

I continue to be shocked when the Minister of Employment and Immigration constantly during Question Period in the House points to Bill C–21 as a great reform for Canadian workers.

What it is is a chance for the federal government to get out of the business of unemployment insurance and to hang a lot of workers out to dry. That is why we are seeing the welfare roles across this country swell as a result of the Bill C–21 government legislation.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on the matter of Bill C–21, the hon. member should know that Bill C–21 only came into effect three weeks ago.

Any person who was collecting UI was collecting it on the old rules. She is way out to lunch on that.

The Bill C–21 changes have not the slightest thing to do with what she is talking about.

She made another comment that I noted here, that $1.3 billion had been cut from the system. There has not been a penny cut from the system. It has been readjusted within the system. She does not know what she is talking about.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the member is so out of touch that he has not been in touch with the Burlington welfare office.

If he went home once in a while and found out what the Tridon workers know, he would know that in fact the welfare roles in Burlington, Hamilton and in the area are increasing as a result of the government's decision to cut back on women.

I was in Hamilton just this weekend. I will be there next weekend and the weekend after. I am listening to the workers. The workers at Tridon in Burlington are calling me because they call their member of Parliament, and he hides behind the minister.

Here you have a community in Burlington, his own Tridon employees being told to take a hike, their jobs are being exported to Smyrna in the United States and what does this member of Parliament do? He has the nerve to stand up and defend a government program on unemployment insurance that is going to see thousands of working Canadians, in particular women, part-time workers, the working poor, cut their unemployment insurance as a result of Bill C–21. Those are the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of any issue before Parliament that is of greater importance than the issue of poverty, and particularly poverty as it relates to Canada's children. I think those Canadians who find themselves in low income across Canada have a right to expect from their members of Parliament a debate that was meaningful, one that stuck to the facts, and one that simply did not try to obscure the situation with partisan rhetoric.

As a consequence, I know that many Canadians will be disappointed in the presentation that was made by the hon. member for Hamilton East in that in the place of hard facts what she presented was bitter partisan rhetoric, which did not do anything in terms of painting a picture of the problems of poverty in Canada. Nor, as members will note, did she make proposals on what could be done to improve the situation. Instead, she was more interested simply in partisan denunciations of the government.

Over the course of this debate, the House will be showered by statistics of all sorts from all sides. Indeed, I will be relying on some of those myself. Statistics can be very helpful in terms of setting a context which will help us to understand the nature of poverty in Canada and what can be done by the government to deal with it. But statistics can also do damage because they can obscure the true human face of poverty. It can cause us to forget about the millions of different stories of Canadians who find themselves living in poverty in circumstances which are as different as the people themselves.

When I was preparing for my intervention today, my thoughts went to a young woman whom I met in Ottawa a few weeks ago. Though she looked much older, she was only in her late twenties. She was a single mother of one daughter and had moved here hoping to find greater opportunity, hoping to find work which would enable her to support herself and her daughter.

She received no support at all from the child's father. Nor did she seek any. She had taken part-time work which meant that she could no longer get the sort of benefits that other people on welfare could get, but she wanted to be independent and to have the opportunity to support herself and her daughter.

Talking with her was both troubling and enormously heartening in that it showed both the human cost of poverty and something about the tremendous indomitable nature of the human spirit. What she asked from us here in this House was not charity or pity, but opportunity and respect. She richly deserved both of those from all of us.

During this debate we will hear a range of statistics. As I mentioned, I will be using some of them myself, but what we should not ever neglect is the human face of poverty, one which involves the young people from one coast to another, affects their hopes and their dreams, and affects the qualify of lives of Canadians who find themselves caught in poverty. It should be these people and not partisan advantage which should be the focus of our activities today.

I hope that in the time remaining to the House, what we will be doing is concentrating on constructive suggestions in terms of what we can do as members of Parliament and as concerned Canadians in order to deal with so important an issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we are getting together and looking for solutions to the problem of child poverty. Although today's motion contains a number of partisan elements that members on this side of the House will not be able to support, and although we may not agree with the means proposed to achieve the end, I am convinced we are prepared to commit ourselves.

[English]

I have two children of my own. This starting point makes me particularly concerned about the issue of child poverty. It is difficult for me to accept, as it should be difficult for any parent in this Chamber to accept, that other children, like our own, should find themselves growing up in conditions of need and hunger without adequate food or shelter.

A few minutes ago the member for Hamilton East painted a picture of a government determined to increase poverty among Canadian children. The facts, however, present a very different picture.

Since the present government took office in 1984, considerable progress has been made on the issue of child poverty. The number of children living in low income circumstances has dropped from 1.1 million in 1984 to 837,000 in 1989. Nevertheless, it troubles me that despite these results there remain children growing up facing immediate hardship. It troubles me that poverty rates are as high as 50 per cent for native children and that low income affects as many as 59 per cent of children in female headed, lone-parent families. Quite simply, what these figures represent, in human terms, is a tremendous challenge for all Canadians.

The task of eliminating poverty, among children by the year 2000, is difficult and challenging. We must recognize the complexity of the root causes of poverty. We need to understand what keeps Canadians on welfare, and we have to help them to break the cycle of poverty.

Let us first look more closely at the nature of child poverty in Canada. The problem is founded on a range of issues including lone parenthood, welfare dependency, family breakdown, poor education, and the health status of the family, to name just a few. Over the last couple of decades, the proportion of low income families fell gradually throughout the 1970s, shot up dramatically in the beginning of the 1980s, and has declined substantially since. The proportion of Canadians on low income has declined from about 23 per cent in 1969 to about 12 per cent in 1989, a significant change. However, low income still affects 3.1 million people annually in Canada, including 444,000 elderly and 837,000 children. Only now are rates as low as before the recession of the early eighties appearing.

For example, for two-parent families with children, the incidence of low income stood at 9 per cent in 1980, peaked at 12.4 per cent in 1984, and dropped to 8 per cent in 1989. For lone-parent families it stood at about 50 per cent in 1980, rose to about 56 per cent in 1984, and dropped to about 47.4 per cent in 1989. In broad terms, the data show important trends concerning child poverty, particularly since the mid-eighties. Rates have been falling steadily and, on the whole, have dropped considerably.

Let us look at these trends more closely with respect to children. In 1984, more than 1.1 million children lived in low income families. By 1989, that number had dropped to 837,000. In 1989, 300,000 fewer children lived in low income families than in 1984. The proportion of low income among children has declined from one child in five in 1984 to one child in seven in 1989. While this is still too many, it does represent an improvement of more than 25 per cent, and this is significant progress.

Those who say that the incidence of low incomes is increasing during the mandate of this government should check their facts. I am also encouraged by the heightened public interest and attention to issues relating to children. Of course many of the references are not good news items, including child abuse, child poverty, and unmet child care needs, but this interest has sparked a wide variety of individuals, voluntary agencies and businesses as well as governments to concentrate anew on the needs of children.

The recent World Summit for Children has ignited some of this interest. The summit served as a source of reflection on the plight of children, not just inside Canada but outside our country as well. Around the world, we have learned how pervasive a problem child poverty remains. Moreover, in Canada poverty has many associated dimensions, all of which serve to complicate the response. Child poverty tends to reflect family circumstances and parents' abilities to provide for their children. Single parent families headed by women are particularly vulnerable to poverty, with almost one-half of these families living below the low income measures. Lone parents are disadvantaged by having the double burden of raising their children on their own, as well as having to provide the basic economic supports, essentially one parent performing the responsibilities of two.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am also concerned about the large number of single-parent families that depend on provincial welfare systems. The economic and social costs are considerable when a person cannot participate fully in society. It also worries me how children will grow up in this kind of situation. It is clear we must give serious thought to ways of breaking the vicious circle that prevents Canadians from being self-sufficient and forces them to depend on welfare, and we must speak very frankly about this.

[English]

I would like to move from the statistical examination of the child poverty problem to the root causes of poverty: illiteracy, disability, lack of education, corrosive family conditions, and family break-up.

These conditions can put in train a cycle of poverty which continues through generations of families. I am talking about problems faced by children from lower income families such as higher rates of high school drop out.

Studies have shown that poorer kids tend to do substantially worse in a number of measures of school performance, like failed grades, conduct problems, hyperactivity and learning disorders. Probably as a result of this weak performance, poor kids are twice as likely to drop out of high school as other kids are.

As a consequence, many children who have grown up in poverty find themselves without sufficient education and engaged in a life-long struggle to get and to keep a job. This is just one example of how the cycle of poverty manifests itself.

The link between poverty and education is incontrovertible. Eighty per cent of the heads of poor households receiving welfare have not completed high school. With the national drop-out rate in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent, we clearly have a problem of serious proportions and one which the government has taken initiatives to address.

Poverty is also associated with a number of other social and health problems. For example, poverty tends to become one of the factors which contributes to crime. As well, although Canada's rate of infant mortality is enviable by any international standards, Canadian children born in poor neighbourhoods face an infant mortality rate almost double that of their wealthier counterparts.

I would like to move now to set out the approach taken by the federal government since 1984 in addressing this problem. As I stated earlier, the years since 1984 have seen significant improvements, with 956,000 fewer Canadians, including about 300,000 children, in low income situations.

The government's approach has recognized both the need for a healthy, well managed economy, which will provide opportunities for families to support themselves, and a variety of programs and policies for people in need.

The government has worked to develop a climate in which job creation can prosper. Families want to be self-sufficient. They want to control their own resources, their own lives, and the lives of their children. They do not want to be dependent on others. Canadians have created over 1.6 million new jobs since 1984, more than 80 per cent of which were full time and about 60 per cent of which have gone to women.

A healthy economy also helps to supports and maintain much needed social programs. Since 1984 the government has taken many steps toward these goals. We have removed 850,000 low income Canadians from the tax roles; increased the value of the child tax credit by over 50 per cent; introduced a new child tax credit for pre-schoolers, a supplement now valued at $203; doubled the allowable limit of the child care expense deduction for pre-school aged children from $2,000 to $4,000; and increased maternity leave to 15 weeks for the mother, with an additional 10 weeks for either parent under unemployment insurance.

It is easy for the opposition simply to demand further programs. On this side we do not have that luxury. We are also forced to consider the mounting burden of debt; a burden of debt that today amounts to a debt in the name of each and every Canadian, man, woman and child from one coast to another of over $13,000. To spend uncontrollably today and to leave our children to pay the bills later would be the cruelest, most inhumane thing that we could do to them. This must be an issue that is kept before this House as this debate proceeds.

Members opposite simply propose to spend more money and to increase the debt load on our children. It steals from our children. It steals from generations yet to come. Our children have a right to expect that they will inherit a government, an economy, and a country which is well financed and which provides opportunities for them, and not a mountainous burden of debt.

We have made tough decisions but, when we did so, the most needy were protected. That is why when the 1990 budget introduced the family allowances benefit recovery, we made the threshold $50,000 on an individual income basis, a figure that was high enough that lower income recipients of family allowances would not be affected.

When the 1990 budget introduced the 5 per cent limit on the growth of Canada Assistance Plan expenditures, we made sure that only the wealthiest provinces were affected. This measure does not cut social assistance nor does it prevent increases in provincial improvements to social assistance or social services. Federal contributions under CAP will continue to increase for all provinces. They are only limited for a two-year period to 5 per cent in three provinces in the strongest fiscal position.

Provincial governments will continue to be responsible for administering assistance programs, deciding priorities and allocating resources in these areas.

The Canada Assistance Plan provides approximately $6 billion to support these programs. And over the past four years, we have worked with provinces towards more innovative uses of CAP funding. For example, we have developed the employability agreements which help social assistance recipients in their transition to the work force.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, hon. members are also aware of the government's efforts in dealing with other causes of poverty: initiatives have been launched to promote literacy, to prevent and treat drug addiction and alcoholism, to provide better pensions and tax benefits for the disabled, and to help enforce child support orders.

[English]

Other urgent problems face Canadian children. For example, our family violence and child sexual abuse initiatives are well under way. As you know, Rix Rogers, my special adviser on child sexual abuse, recently completed a report entitled "Reaching for Solutions". In the near future, I intend to introduce a new strategy for dealing with family violence, including child sexual abuse.

One of the recommendations of the Rogers report, and of other earlier reports, was the creation of a children's responsibility centre within the federal government. As a follow-up to the world summit, the Prime Minister assigned me the responsibility for bringing to cabinet recommendations on the declaration and plan of action agreed to at that summit.

The Prime Minister also requested that I create a new mechanism, a children's bureau, within my department to ensure co-ordination and consistency in areas which address children's issues. We are moving ahead quickly on that, Mr. Speaker, and hope to make considerable progress in the months ahead.

This year the federal government will spend about $1 billion on child care. Additionally, as the Prime Minister has indicated, we will put in place a new child care program during the life of this Parliament. It will better help families manage work and child rearing. In particular, we will help those most in need of assistance, such as single mothers who require child care in order to enter the job market and to help break the cycle of welfare dependency.

I have talked at length about the situation with respect to child poverty and the government record to date. We have made good progress in Canada, but I believe that we can do more. This House cannot magically produce programs called for in the motion before us which would bring immediate solutions. I believe the government is on the right course and we are taking the kinds of decisions that have to be made in order to get at the roots of the problem.

If the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton East are any indication, we will be hearing plenty of partisan rhetoric designed to do more to improve the status of the opposition than that of the poor today. But let us not forget the people who are supposed to be our primary concern here. They require and they deserve our full attention.

As I have pointed out, there are no easy solutions or quick fixes for poverty. No one knows that better than the poor themselves, because they know how complex and how varied the causes and the effects of poverty can be. Most important of all, we have to ensure that the economic foundations that support the social programs that we cherish must remain solid. But if fighting poverty will require well planned, long-term solutions, there can be no excuse for callous complacency based on the belief that because the poor have always been with us, they must always be with us in the future.

To those who say that Canada cannot afford to fight poverty, I say that we cannot afford not to fight it. For sustaining people in poverty can cost much more than giving them the tools to lift themselves out of it. Acting today to break the cycle of poverty can prevent generation after generation from being caught in a costly trap that inflicts its damage in both economic and human terms.

Let me conclude this way. At the World Summit on Children, the nations of the world committed themselves to giving children our highest possible priority. That is exactly what we must do here today at home as well, to give them our priority, to give them and their families the tools that they need to lift themselves from poverty and to ensure that they can share with the rest of us in the benefits of a rich and a compassionate society. That has to be our goal as a people. There is no challenge more worthy of us as members of this House of Commons.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I noted the minister made some remarks at the beginning which stated that maybe our line over here is only going to be partisan. He challenged us to put forward ideas to help this situation.

First of all, I do not think there is a member of Parliament in this House who has not had some personal experience with real poverty in his riding. In my own riding alone, 25 per cent of the children who go to all the schools have single parents. We all know what is going on in this country. I do not want to play with any of the statistics.

As I listened to the minister, I recalled what happened this summer when all of a sudden the Prime Minister, through Order in Council, sent the ships off to the Persian Gulf. All of a sudden, moneys were found and away they went.

I am also very respectful of the deficit. I would like to ask the minister, because sometimes when one is in health and welfare, one does not think of some of the various resources. However, the minister, having been a former Minister of National Defence, is well aware of the 500 to 600 armouries that exist across this country, especially in the major urban centres. Most of the time these amouries are sitting idle. There are many good men and women in the militia who make a great contribution to our community.

During this very special period of Christmas and the new year, when times are tough and the economy is extraordinarily tough, there is an extraordinary burden on the Minister of Finance, why could we not take a page out of the organization in Toronto which organizes the food bank day? It is only for one day at the CNE but the volunteers manage to gather enough food to feed people for a couple of weeks. Why couldn't the minister co-ordinate this sort of thing with the Minister of National Defence and not just sort of quote that "things are getting better and there are fewer people on the poverty line". Let us make a real two month or three month action plan and put the kind of will behind it, not unlike the kind of will that we put behind sending men and women to the Persian Gulf.

I would ask the minister what he would think of that as a possible suggestion. I am not suggesting it is long term, but it may bridge things and help ease some of the pain and create some hope.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest and great attention to the hon. member's suggestion. I want to give his suggestion the seriousness that it deserves. I have some difficulty understanding exactly what it was he was proposing that we should be doing.

He made reference first of all to the Prime Minister sending troops to the Middle East by Order in Council during the summer and then went from that to some reference to armouries in Canada without specifying what he had in mind to do with the armouries.

Mr. Mills: Using the armouries to act as food banks, et cetera and support systems for the poor.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, members of Canada's Armed Forces and certainly members of our reserve forces are involved on a continuing basis in contributing to their communities and to doing anything that they can to be helpful. In cases where there are programs that they can put in place using armouries, they are glad to do so, using the resources that they have available.

If there is one thing that certainly characterizes the spirit of the men and women whom I was privileged to serve with when I was Minister of National Defence, it was a very deep sense of commitment to the community in which they served. I know that their approach in every single instance when it is possible for them to make a contribution was to do everything they could to do so.

The hon. member also made a juxtaposition—and I hope he will forgive me if I pick up on that as well—between the money we are spending on the armed forces, perhaps to send troops to the Middle East, and money we are spending in other areas.

I am in this House uniquely positioned to make a comment on that as a former Minister of National Defence who is now Minister of National Health and Welfare. We in this society benefit enormously, and my children are an example, from growing up in a society in freedom and in tolerance. The men and women who serve in Canada's Armed Forces do so in order to ensure that all Canadians, particularly all Canadian children, will live in freedom from fear and that they will be protected against threats which could take away the freedom that we enjoy and consider part of our birthright as Canadians.

The legacy of freedom, the tradition of freedom we have in this country allows us to deal with that other side, the human side of ensuring we are also a society which is compassionate. I do not believe it is a choice between either defending our country from abroad or contributing to international affairs, or doing what we need to do here at home.

Mr. Mills: I never said that.

Mr. Beatty: My hon. friend said that he was not making that suggestion and I take him at his word, but when he made reference to the Prime Minister sending troops off to the Middle East I was concerned that he was suggesting, as some others previously have, that we should have been holding back and not spending money in the defence of freedom on the grounds that somehow we could not afford to do it.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to ignore either the cause of freedom, or the cause of fighting poverty. Both must be a priority for us. Both deserve the attention of this House.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I think most Canadians understand and certainly everyone in this House understands that children are poor because they live in poor families. They live in a family where the parents are poor. In many of those homes it is a single mother who is trying to raise her family. Of all of the poor children in Canada, almost 65 per cent of those poor children are in homes led by a single mother.

We have to look at what this government has done over the last six years. The things that this government has done have made it more difficult for that single mother, or that poor working family to try to bring their children up. What have we seen? We have seen a government that brings in a GST which will impact more heavily on the working poor and the poorer people of this country. We have seen a government that has brought in UI cuts which will impact very negatively on women in the workforce because we all know, Mr. Speaker, that women are in and out of the workforce more frequently than men and this bill will have an even more severe impact on women.

We have seen a government that has deindexed family allowance which has increased the child poverty rate. We have seen a government that brings in a "now you see it, now you don't" kind of child care policy, a minimum wage that is miserly, and I guess the final crashing blow in my province of British Columbia, in Ontario, and in Alberta, is this government putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. It makes it impossible for those provinces, they say, to raise welfare rates. It makes it impossible or much more difficult for shelters to be built for battered women, for child care spaces to be made.

I would ask the minister what is it he is really saying to the mothers of children in this country, particularly the single women who are trying to raise their children at poverty levels. What are you really saying to them with the actions you have taken, in particular the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister has one minute to answer all those questions.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, what we are saying to those families is that it is vital, first of all, that we ensure that those children inherit an economy that is soundly managed, that the sort of policy advocated by the hon. member opposite of stealing from our children by simply spending money, running up the national debt higher and higher, year after year, would put a crippling burden upon them and threaten the very existence of the social programs that are so important.

The hon. member refers to the GST. If she were candid with the House she would concede the fact that families earning under $30,000 a year are better off because of the GST tax credit. The hon. member refers to unemployment insurance. If she were candid with the House or with the poor of Canada she would note the fact that what we are doing is providing for better assistance to families to train to give them secure, decent jobs to be able to get themselves out of poverty.

She talks about the cap on CAP. If she did so, she would recognize the fact that what we have done is continue to increase spending. On child care, it has increased under CAP at the rate of about 20 per cent per annum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. minister's time has expired.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to join in this debate, but I confess to you I am uncomfortable, as all of us should be when we are well-clothed, well-fed, and well-housed and we have gall to talk about poverty.

In my opinion, if you want to have a discussion in the middle of a Canadian winter about poverty, first of all you should have to do it outdoors, and you should have to stand around for a while in the afternoon and feel the cold. You should not be allowed to eat that day. You should not be allowed to wear warm clothing. Most importantly, you should have to do it surrounded by the poor. I would defy any of the members who have made an intervention in here this afternoon to make the same kind of a speech to those people as they have made to us. The Speaker would not be there to intervene on their behalf. The language certainly would not be parliamentary, but perhaps the message might get across.

I listened, for example, to the minister make a very finely prepared speech this afternoon. I did not hear him mention, though, that the numbers that he used are from 1989, the last year, of course, for which those numbers have been gathered. They have absolutely nothing to do with life in Canada right now in the middle of a recession.

I am as uncomfortable with the use of statistics in this kind of a discussion as I am about us having it, because the truth is in this country if one child goes to bed hungry tonight, we should all be ashamed. There is no reason for poverty in this country.

One of the things that I know is a problem for members of this Chamber is that in this town, it is pretty tough to get much of an assessment of poor people and what they are like. You really have to search them out because they are not obvious. Driving into Ottawa off Highway 416 and coming in on what is known as the South River Road, there are the kind of mansions that are rare in Canada, but they are there, and they are all around this community. There does not appear to be much poverty here, but I will put some money out that says tonight it could be found within a spitting distance of this building.

If you want to find somebody who is cold tonight, and they do not have a place to live, they will find a warm grate, I will bet within the Chambers of this building somewhere. They will find a parking garage. They will find a hallway. They will find a hotel that left the door open. They will find somewhere where there is a delivery door that is open.

In any of our major metropolitan cities the irony is that among the luxury condominiums somebody found a way to get into a nice warm garage for the night. At our major international airports, they are not flying off to Jamaica, they are finding a hole in the wall where at least it is warm and they are there.

I will bet that within 100 yards of this building now, there is somebody who has no job and who is begging for money on the street. Tonight, they will split a bottle of wine with somebody and sleep over a heating grate. We will not see them because we probably will not get out of cars long enough to go looking for them, but someone will.

There is a great controversy in my part of Canada about where there ought to be food banks. People are saying: "Well, we want to do away with them." Yes, we do in the long run, but the problem is how do we feed people who need emergency assistance now? Our traditional ideas of who might actually use a food bank are changing immensely.

There are parts of southern Ontario that look affluent to somebody driving by, but where people have got virtually their entire income invested in a place to live and do not have any money left to feed the kids. They get to make the choice: "Do I feed the kids or do I pay the mortgage? Which do I do?" It is something that grabs you—or it ought to grab you—that in the middle of this kind of a society, in the middle of this kind of wealth, we cannot afford to feed the poor and we cannot afford to provide them with opportunities.

There are many things about government that I do not understand. I am trying to explain at the moment to a 65-year-old woman why she has to get divorced to get a pension. What makes me even more angry is that this stupid rule is not new. This is not the first time this has cropped up. When we got looking into how could such a stupid rule exist, we found that this stupid rule has been around for a while. It has been looked at and studied by bureaucrats. Recommendations have been made and laws have to be changed. How can that be? Can our society be so dumb that it does not understand the stupidity and the cruelty of a rule like that? Is our society so stupid that it does not understand what happens when a kid does not have a proper place to live? Is this some great mystery? Do we not know what happens to a poor child in an urban centre or a rural centre, when he does not have enough food in his belly or a proper place to live? Do we not know who breaks your windows? Do we not know who steals your hub-caps? Do we not know who causes crime?

A young guy, 26 years old, came into my office a couple of years ago. He had been in jail since he was 16. He sat across from me and he said: "I can't handle it outside, Mike. I got to go back into the slammer. That is where I have grown up. At least there, I know what it is like in a prison. I can't live on the outside." I spent some time with Randy and said: "Well, Randy, here is a support group. Here is some social assistance. Here is how you get a telephone and how you use a telephone and how to budget your weekly allowance."

He came back a week later and he said: "I can't do it. I just can't cope with this." So, I called my local cops and asked: "What can we do for this guy?" They said: "Mike, we can't do anything for him. He has not broken any laws." But Randy knew the system in Canada. He knew that if he went out the next day and robbed the Bank of Montreal, we would not be worried about money. We would know exactly what to do with Randy. And that is exactly what Randy did. He went out the next day and held a young woman hostage in a bank.

We knew right away how to handle this. The Durham Regional Police Force arrived with their 12-gauge shotguns on the dashboard. The legal system clicked into place, and there was no problem with that. If we had tried the day before to get a little counselling for Randy, there was not enough time, there was not enough budget, and no one cared enough. But the moment he knew how to hold up a bank, we knew how to deal with that situation. That is the great tragedy in this country.

One of the things that makes me very angry about Canadians is that they do not know their country very well. There are many people to whom I have talked who have said: "Well, there is no problem with child poverty in Canada. I mean, maybe there is the odd, isolated incident here and there." We should take all those people down to an inner-city school for an afternoon and put them into a roomful of 30 little kids, five and six years old, who have not been fed properly that day. We should just leave them there for an afternoon and see how they cope with children who are hungry. They ought to try that for a while. It is not nearly as comfortable nor as easy as anybody would like it to be but it is there and it is real.

Maybe it would be a great asset to the House this afternoon if there was a single mother in here who was able to say: "I have to make some decisions about whether I go to work or not. Because, if I go to work this week, then I have to withdraw all the benefits that I get from social assistance, all the little medical cards and all of the subsidized housing. I am disqualified for one group of benefits the moment I earn a certain amount of money." How would any one of us like to make that decision? Do you want a little dignity and go to work, or do you want to rob your children of some benefits?

Well, many of our provinces are trying to work their way through some great change in the social assistance system which seems to be hide-bound into little rules and regulations and has absolutely no common sense to it. That is a challenge because there are lots of people who are extremely well paid and extremely intelligent who are there to defend the system as it is. They do not want any change because it alters their life-styles. It makes them change, instead of their clientele.

One of the good things, to be positive if I can for a moment, is that at least this House on a couple of occasions has taken part of an afternoon to talk about poverty, but it has not done a heck of a lot in the interim. I want to make some arguments that we do know how to alleviate some of these problems.

We do know, for example, that we will make the choice, as people who are participants in governments, as to whether or not we want just to hand people money—and there is nothing wrong with that—or whether we want to do something substantive such as raising the minimum wage and, in the long run, how we spend our tax money. That is really what the argument is. The argument is not about whether or not the Government of Canada gets involved in the long run in the financial impact of poverty. It does. Whether it wants to or not, sooner or later, it will pay the price. It simply is a question of when we pay the price.

Do you want to pay it up front? Do you think that the public and the private sector should both share some responsibility in that? If you do, then it would seem to me that you would simply advocate one thing and that is that there should be an increase in the minimum wage, that it should happen on a regular basis, and that it ought be something like 60 per cent of the average industrial wage in Canada. This is not rocket science. This is just basic economics about how people look after their own needs.

I know that there are many members who have participated in this kind of debate and have said: "Well, look at our employment statistics in Canada." This is where I have a problem with statistics. It may well be true that there are a whole lot of people who have jobs. That is really not pertinent. What is pertinent is what kind of a job it is. Is it a short-term job? Is it a long-term job? Does it pay a decent wage? Does it have a benefit package with it?

One of the things that you have to look at when looking at the whole Canadian system of how we provide a safety net for people is that the system has all these little loopholes in it. People do learn after a while how to play the game. If the bureaucrats think they are smart about setting the rules and regulations, they should be forewarned: "Wait a minute, there is another group of people out there who are just as smart as you are. They may not have university degrees, but whether they eat or not tomorrow depends on whether they can figure out a way around your little rule."

I will bet you they will get you 99 per cent of the time. You can set up any set of rules that you want. If somebody out there is poor, starving, and will not eat next week, that is one heck of an incentive to find a way around a stupid rule. I will bet they will most of the time.

I have watched several American programs lately. In particular, 60 Minutes has been going around to different American cities analyzing poverty in America, the kind of stuff which it does particularly well. It is making the argument that the rich are going to get hurt by poverty just about as much as the poor, because sooner or later the balance will shift. At a moment in time when there are a whole lot of poor people and a small number of rich people, that is when some kind of a revolution takes place. There are a lot of people sitting around saying: "This is not just unfair. There is no way out of this poverty trap for me except some kind of totally irresponsible social movement that nobody else likes."

In many American cities now, particularly among black groups, there are people who are becoming very militant because they have been waiting a long time for the American system to work. It is not working. They are just as poor as they ever were, and they do not have a house the same as it always was. When they once had jobs in the inner part of most American cities, those jobs have gone somewhere else.

We are seeing that in Canada. Most of us do not want to see it. In my riding in the last year, we have had about 13 of our smaller plants go down. Many of these plants were places, for example, where for the first time in their lives women were working in an industrialized trade union situation making a really good wage and they thought they had it made. They thought they finally had gotten a good, long-term job that paid well and that had a good benefit package. Now that whole job is gone.

We will argue whether that is cause and effect of free trade, recessionary period, only temporary, or whatever, but for the individual who finally thought she had her place in the system—she had stuck with the system, had gotten herself a good job, and supporting herself and her family—now the job is gone. There is going to be bitterness there. There is going to be a rancour there that we are all going to have to contend with.

I have noticed just since being a member here, having observed a lot of different chambers at work, that there is a rancour in this place that I do not like and that all of us sense. Maybe it is Parliament doing what a parliament is supposed to do. Parliament is not a gathering of the wise, and the most experienced and talented people in the nation. Look around this room. We are told this is a parliament. Parliament is just a representative group of people. If a nation is angry at a moment, its parliament is going to be angry. This place certainly is. This is a nasty place to be at the moment.

Part of what we must realize is that it is our job sometimes to set aside the partisan stuff and to deal with the real issues of the day. On an issue like this, we have some very serious problems ahead of us.

Part of it is not just that we can isolate the poor any more. We cannot. There is a whole raft of people out there who are now being called the working poor. They are going to be extremely nasty. They are unused to being poor. They do not like it, and they will not take it very long. Some of them have come to me.

One of the things that I noticed is that in things like the collection of new taxes, most people in small business do not want to collect taxes. They make no bones about that. Some of them are simply adopting the obvious. They are saying: "Why should I bother keeping records for the Government of Canada, the Government of Ontario, or anybody else? Give me some money. I will fix your plumbing. Game over." I think that is going to become a national trend as it is in many jurisdictions. When people think that a tax process is unfair, when people decide that they do not want to play that sport any more, they simply do not keep the records. The government does get the tax money. They pocket $10 less. Away we go. We will see that in more and more businesses now. Today I have seen notices on the wall: "If you want to pay by cheque, by credit card or if you want a receipt, the cost of this service is $30 or $20 cash". Then the taxation process becomes self-defeating. As more and more people are hit by poverty, as more and more people get crushed in that process, they will seek whatever means of redress they can to escape it.

The alternative will be for the Government of Canada, the government of each province, and the governments of all of our municipalities to say: "Wait a minute. We cannot afford in the long run to allow this to continue in that way". We know how to build non-profit housing. We know how to provide people with useful, productive work, we know how to get people so that they can sustain themselves with some dignity. We are very proud in this country. Sometimes I get very angry when people say: "No country in the world has a social assistance program like Canada". Baloney, lots of countries to do. People are very proud of the fact that our senior citizens get pensions. Sure, they do, but all of our systems are straining and all of our systems are failing a larger and larger group of people.

One final thing ought to be put on the record this afternoon. I recall when I was a member of the Ontario legislature going to Moosonee. It was a legislative committee and the members were a little grumbly because we had to ride the train to Moosonee. It was not exactly first-class travel but they were amused that the train stopped, people came out of the bush, got on, loaded on canoes and all of that. Then we went to a motel in Moosonee and they were upset there was only one television per floor, it was black and white, they locked the doors at ten o'clock and there was not a great deal for members of the legislature to do after ten o'clock at night and so they were kind of snarly.

The next day we met with people who said things like this to us. "I know people who live in mud and stick huts, who do not have a television set, who do not have a job, who do not have a pension, who do not have an education, who do not have a future. If the future is anything it is probably a bottle of cheap wine". Most of us sat back a little bit at the end of that day because we had felt very put upon, very hard pressed that we were losing our creature comfort.

Part of what perhaps needs to happen to members of this House and people in this country is simply open our eyes a little bit and look around us and see the very real problems that other Canadians are having. Arguments between political parties, about different regions of the country, all of those arguments have to take place. They are a very necessary part of political life. However, just maybe once in a while we should set all of those things aside and get at the very real problems, the very real things for which Parliament can do things; attack poverty, talk about greater issues, about what this country is supposed to do. Do we have a plan in mind to kind of get us from a problem where we are now, to identify some solutions to see if we can resolve the problem. I think that needs to be done.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech of my colleague from Oshawa. He said a lot of things that I think we, as parliamentarians, have come across and have been frustrated with. For example, rules. We all see these rules that we have to put up with in these various situations. No matter what system is set up, they set up a series of rules.

They do not set up the rules, however, for the people who need the help and who use the system properly. They set up the rules for those who abuse the system. That is the unfortunate part of the whole thing. Because some people abuse the system, all of a sudden we need to have rules to make sure that they do not abuse the system. If we did not have people who abused these systems that are set up, no matter what they are, whether they are speeding limits or whatever, we would not need to have them.

I agree with the hon. member, it is a frustrating thing, especially when there are people who need help desperately, deserve help, and because of some rule or some regulation that government has brought in for whatever reason, we cannot help those individuals.

He talked about jobs, whether they are good jobs, meaningful jobs and so on, and 80 per cent of the jobs that have been created over the last five years have been full-time jobs. A good proportion of those have been very good jobs, long lasting jobs and so on. We are into a recession now and some people will be laid off within the work force, but of the jobs that have been created, they have been full-time, and that has been a change from the previous period. I want to comment on one final thing and ask if the hon. member had heard of it. It is time that we took a look at changing the methods of providing assistance to people. For example, in my region of Peel, the Social Affairs Department has provided a program for single parents, primarily women, who have found themselves all of a sudden without a spouse for support and with no training. They have not been in the work force for years, if ever, and find themselves on family allowance. The Social Affairs Department have a program where they give these women basic training and send them for job interviews. The department helps with finding a job. If they do get a job, the regional Peel social services pay for three-quarters of the day care. They pay for three weeks out of the four weeks for the day care which makes it better for these people to accept the job. That is what the member was talking about, that they had to make the decision of whether to get a job or to stay on social assistance.

Is the member aware of this program, and if so, would he not think that that is the type of program that they should be involved in more and more because the delivery of social services comes at the local level where people understand the problems probably a lot better than we do?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, in the province of Ontario, as one example, and I am aware that other provinces have done the same thing, the social assistance review committee studied all the forms of social assistance and pointed out a number of barriers to people actually breaking out of the poverty trap. A number of our municipalities have tried to provide more flexibility. The new government in Ontario is certainly aware of the cost of that and is also aware that there is great potential there.

I would make this comment, too. One of the real problems in Canada is that the structure of government is such that the level of government that comes up with this brilliant notion initially very often has nothing to do with the delivery of the service. Social assistance is one of these things. Some bright idea that someone in Ottawa thought about 30 years ago is being handled by someone in Burlington this week. The two may never have communicated and when the person in Burlington, Oshawa, or wherever, says that this is a stupid system and you have to change some of the rules, it only takes two or three decades to transmit that message because it has to go through so many levels of government.

One of the things the Thompson report talked about, and it is blatant common sense, is to try to identify the purpose of this exercise. It is not to put someone on a program for life. It is to get someone out of poverty. That is the name of the game. If there are things that must be done that hurt someone's feelings because the bureaucracy has to move around a little bit, then the bureaucracy should move around to try to identify what it is that a single mother needs to get her back into the workforce.

I bet all of the members here have done exactly what I have done. We have participated in setting up unemployment help centres, counselling and referral centres. We have all talked to people in the social service agencies who know that their system has some problems in it, who would very dearly like to bend some of those rules, and sometimes do.

The Thompson report in Ontario is one major step in trying to put some common sense into a very complicated system. In many centres it is beginning to work. The new government, I know, is very supportive of that and wants to extend it around the province. I think that needs to be done on a very broad scale all across Canada.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for a very moving speech. His reference to real life situations in his riding was what made it such a strong appeal.

I would like to refer to just one situation that I had in my riding concerning children of refugee claimants which, of course, is a federal jurisdiction. A Polish–Canadian doctor came to me a couple of weeks ago about a group of children who had been here for over two, sometimes three, years, and whose families were going once again to be uprooted and sent back to Poland because they did not pass the test now. They did it when they first came but now the rules have changed and they will have to go back to more poverty and insecurity in Poland.

We talked about this. There are many other children from other ethnic groups who are here in the same situation. In fact across Canada there are many thousands of children of refugee claimants who are in that backlog.

In this year when there has been a UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Prime Minister headed a summit on children, does the member think it would be a good idea, very just and humanitarian for this government to have a waiver for all those children and their families, thus saving millions of dollars as well, which might go into school food programs or something similar for poor children who have come through trauma.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I agree heartily with the idea that children should not become the object of some process that harms them. I am very grateful that when my ancestors came to this country, there was nowhere the immigration system that they have now or there is absolutely no chance I would be here.

When you identify for example a major problem, like the immigration problems we have now, there is a need to move dramatically on a large scale with things like an amnesty for children to alleviate all the illnesses in the system. Surely none of us would argue the point that a child should not become yet another problem to deal with.

The member and I have discussed this. It is quite possible that the ruling in the end will be somehow that the children will be allowed to stay and the parents will be sent back to Poland, or probably that the parents will be allowed to come here if the children go back home.

All we ask for in all of this is just a simple little bit of common sense that where you have identified the problem, when it is children who are affected most dramatically, surely a straightforward answer, if not necessarily a simple answer is what is required.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if I could ask the consent of the House that for this next round, the round we are starting now, in other words the next 20 minutes, that it be shared by two Liberal speakers in succession, rather than one for 20 minutes. It would accommodate us as we have two members who would like to share the next round.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Black: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Winnipeg North has the floor.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, do we have consent?

Mr. Speaker, child poverty is a major public health problem in Canada. We have one million infants and children who live below the poverty line. They are without adequate care, food, clothing and shelter. Their numbers are nearly equal to the total population of Manitoba. Each poor child is accompanied by the spectre of poor health, which follows him or her from the womb to the grave. That is what poverty means to the health of a poor child—the topic that I shall focus on during this debate.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that today is the 12th birthday of our youngest son, Christopher Justin. C.J., as we fondly call him, understands that I will miss this special day for him in Winnipeg. He understands the seriousness of the issue we are debating here today, and he understands that as a paediatrician and our party's critic for national health and welfare, I could and I should add a new dimension and perspective to the debate.

This member has lived through poverty during childhood and schooling. I know what it was to be poor. Hence I am pleased to debate this issue. I am pleased to be part of the Liberal Party of Canada, which is privileged today to do its duty on behalf of all poor Canadian children whose survival depends on our fortitude and generosity, whose future we can help chart and whose future, when secure, shall determine the health and greatness of our nation.

Today we have before us the opposition day motion introduced by my colleague from Hamilton East, which I was honoured to second. This motion shall call once more to the consciousness of all Canadians, the plight of our poor children and asks that their needs be met with more than words.

Children are the innocent victims of economics. During the last recession of the 1980s, there was a jump in the number of children living below the poverty line. What will happen now, as we are once again in the grips of economic strife? I fear the worst for the children of the poor. As a father and a paediatrician, it greatly saddens me to see a child become ill. Tragically, poverty cannot pay for a clean bill of health.

On average seven Canadian babies in one thousand do not survive infancy. For the poor, that number is twice as high. For native Indian children, the death toll is not seven or eight or nine per thousand; it is 19. For Inuit, 28 in 1,000 babies do not live. Over all the life expectancy of a poor boy is five and a half years less than a rich boy, while a poor girl lives two fewer years. Poor children are involved in four times as many traffic accidents. They die two to ten times more often from fires, drowning, suicide, homicide, and respiratory infections. Cancers and substance abuse are much more likely to strike down poor children.

Why? Unsafe, crowded housing, inadequate access to medical care, poor compliance with therapy, and poor nutrition provide some explanations. Other answers are much more complex.

A high percentage of underweight babies are born to poverty stricken parents, suggesting less than adequate pre-natal care. These infants, if they survive, often suffer from brain dysfunction, cerebral palsy, major visual and hearing defects, and epilepsy. Underweight babies also tend to have a lower than average IQ. Poor mothers breast feed less often and for a shorter time than mothers from higher income families. Their babies often become anaemic, weighing half a kilogram less than average and measuring two centimetres less in height. Even their tiny heads are one centimetre less in circumference.

The health problems among poor children seem to be never ending, not only physical and nutritional but dental and psychological. Some hospitals have noticed a rise in meningitis and diarrhoea among them. Absenteeism at school increases. Dental records reveal more cavities, missing and filled teeth. Mental illness occurs one and a half to three times more frequently.

These Canadian child paupers are such a grave concern that in 1988 seven social service organizations banded together, forming the Child Poverty Coalition, in an effort to save them. The coalition's aim is to make child poverty a national priority.

All social conscious groups, like the National Council of Welfare and the social planning councils in many provinces, recognize the problem. So too do the Liberal Party, the soup kitchens, the media, child and health care workers, and anyone else with eyes that see reality.

Why is the government blind to the issue? Why has the government not made children a priority? Why does the government hide behind public relations ruses? I speak about the Prime Minister acting as co-chair of the recent United Nations World Summit for Children. Did his international posing help our own struggling children, or did it convince the world that a hungry child is not a Canadian child? Recently my hon. colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, told the House about his government's record on reducing child poverty in Canada.

While I am pleased as well that there has been a drop in child poverty between 1984 and 1989, is it fair to compare a recession year to a non-recession year? If we compare the pre-recession year of 1980 to the year 1989, we must admit that there was no significant change in the rate of poverty among Canadian children. It was 14.8 per cent in 1980 and 14.6 per cent in 1989. The disturbing situation remains, and we still have one million poor children.

A poor child is usually a hungry child. In fact, 40 per cent of food bank dependents are children. Food, something we take for granted, is precious to the hungry and lack thereof translates into more social and health problems for the thousands who are strangers to regular, balanced meals. A malnourished child cannot develop properly. Children need good nutrition to grow strong and healthy.

A disadvantaged child will often go to school with an empty stomach. Trying to concentrate with hunger gnawing at your insides is a difficult thing. These children fall behind. Is it any surprise, then, that twice as many high school dropouts are youths living in poverty?

Even education, the thing that could help break the cycle of poverty for a poor child, is denied. As the child bred of poverty becomes an under-educated adult, what are his or her chances of finding a good job and of marrying and raising children to a better world? The chances are very slim, very slim indeed.

Instead he or she perpetuates the cycle of poverty with low paying jobs, social assistance or more frequent and longer bouts of unemployment, with more health problems and a shorter life expectancy.

These children of which I speak are not of a war-torn or struggling Third World country. These are Canadian children, 15 of every 100, who are strangers to daily balanced meals, cheated out of a proper education, and fated at birth for a hopeless life of poverty. They do not even have their health to rely on.

Why must this government perpetuate a cycle of poverty and neglect, which will forever shackle poor families, their children and children's children?

Where is the evidence for my indictment of this government? Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to read from an article that appeared in the March issue of this year's Policy Options Politiques. It entitled "Social Policy by Stealth", authored by Grattan Gray, a retired journalist and a long-time observer of the Ottawa scene who has written for Maclean's and Quest.

To indicate the basis for my indictment of this government, I quote:

> I have been studying the development of social policy in this country for a number of years, from public documents, House of Commons debates and academic papers, but I have never seen the sort of development that has taken place in recent years, and which seems to have slipped by many of the professionals and academics. In brief, the Tory style of restraint has become what can only be characterised as "social policy by stealth".

I underscore "social policy by stealth". Why is that? I continue:

> It relies heavily on technical amendments to taxes and transfers that are as difficult to explain as they are to understand and thus largely escape media scrutiny and public attention. It camouflages regressive changes in the rhetoric of equity in an attempt to convince Canadians that tax increase are tax cuts and that benefit cuts are benefit increases—confuses the electorate and so insulates itself from criticism.

This is telling evidence of the performance of this government. Let me quote another paragraph:

> It also abolished universal old age pensions and family allowances in one fell swoop by means of a devious mechanism known as the "clawback" which is the crowning achievement to date of social policy by stealth.

I could continue to quote much more from this article but time will not permit me to do so. Let me just say in terms of federal and provincial income taxes that families earning $20,000 have an increase from 1984 to 1991 of 386 per cent, compared to a 4 per cent increase in taxes for those who earn $100,000.

Let us look at federal child benefits. For those earning $20,000 to $50,000 there is a drop of as much as 2 per cent to 25 per cent in child benefits. People earning $20,000, near the poverty line, still had to suffer cuts in child benefits.

I ask this House this simple question: Which cost would be lower, the cost of helping poor children now or paying to let the cycle of poverty spin? Just imagine the cost of health care alone and add to that the cost of criminal justice and lost productivity. It is indeed appalling because we realize that we are truly dealing with a government that has no heart. How can we measure the social cost of broken dreams, want, and lives lived under a cloud of hopelessness? The beginnings of an answer could be as simple as a national school lunch program, ensuring every child has one meal a day.

However, I submit that the most important government policy would be one of full employment, which policy my leader challenged this government to declare but which this government refuses to declare. Instead, this government insists that unemployment is an instrument of economic policy. For parents to be working and bringing home pay which is above a poverty line existence is the best guarantee for the healthy future of sons and daughters.

Our present social welfare system discourages the will to work. Take for example the case of a single mother. Her chances of finding proper child care are almost hopeless. If she takes a job and loses her social assistance, gone too is state funded help toward the costs of dental care, special medications, and health related equipment. Offspring of low wage earners may be forced to go without these things if the need arises, simply because parents cannot afford such "luxuries".

The life of one single mother came to light, not long ago during a court case in Winnipeg. The court heard how the woman was reduced to pawning furniture to buy food and to stealing milk and diaper ointment. Is it not tragic when furniture is swapped for food and mothers are forced to steal? Is now not the time for the government to act and provide greater support? Witness after witness who has appeared before the subcommittee on poverty of the standing committee on health and welfare in the last two years has singled out unemployment as the primary cause of poverty. Since child poverty mirrors unemployment, the Minister of National Health and Welfare now has a unique opportunity to take up the cause of child poverty. We are now in the midst of a recession. It is not the time to blame individuals for unemployment. The government's economic polices must not bankrupt its citizens, especially its children.

I therefore challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to declare poverty our most serious public health problem. All children by definition are entitled to the average life span, to good health and to excellent education to ensure life, liberty and happiness.

I dare the minister to table in Parliament at once a plan of action, short term and long term, to lend credibility to his ministry. I dare the minister to announce soon his long overdue child care program. I dare him to convince his colleagues in cabinet to pursue a full employment policy as the chief and long-term assault on poverty, to tell them children are not small adults warranting only small budgets.

As one subcommittee witness said: "A country which is not committed to a full employment policy cannot expect employment to be the vehicle for eradicating poverty."

I agree we should spend for national defence, but should the nation not also defend our most obvious future, our children? There are two ways to protect future generations, and this one, declaring war on poverty, should not go unrecognized.

Let the next generation of children never know the want and pain of poverty. On behalf of poor Canadian children, I challenge the minister to make a better future more than a dream for children. I dare the minister and his government to increase the minimum wage in areas of federal jurisdiction and to require that all federally funded and cost-shared programs meet the federal minimum wage as a condition of funding.

I dare the minister and his government to revisit the newly amended Unemployment Insurance Act and to restore federal financial support for this program.

I dare the minister to institute fair taxation. Canadians are asking not only what is adequate, but also what is enough. It does not make sense that a full-time child care worker should only earn $10,000 a year, while a chief executive officer of a big corporation would be earning $600,000 a year.

I dare the minister to look into establishing a national nutrition policy to reflect the real priorities of our Canadian poor. The minister of health, towards the end of his speech said: "We cannot afford not to fight poverty." I agree.

I therefore dare the minister to move now for a better and bright tomorrow for our poor Canadian children.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the debate this afternoon I have listened to the comments made by various speakers, and I would like to put a question to the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

I have here a document which says "Canadian Job Strategy—Estimated expenditures for the Quebec region". Unfortunately, I don't have the figures for Canada as a whole. I only have those for Quebec. I have a number of data here which I will not quote at length because it would take too much time.

I listened to the speeches, Everybody said that we were cutting government subsidies, established programming, budgets, and so forth. I see here: "Job Development"; for the Quebec region, the budget for youth in 1989-90 was $34 million. In 1990-91, it will be $44 million. I see another one here: "Skill Shortages", a program to upgrade the skills of people on the labour market; $12 million in 1989–90 and $13.3 million in 1990–91. And "Community Futures", $8.5 million in 1989–90 and $11.8 million in 1990–91. Total spending was $112 million in 1989–90 and will be $121 million in 1990–91.

I don't know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North has these figures but I wish he would explain how he can talk about cuts, when these figures tell us the exact opposite, Mr. Speaker. Does he have an explanation?

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to reply. When one looks at a set of figures and finds that one has spent a certain amount, it has to be related to the amount that is required for the given activity, in this instance child poverty. I am glad that the government had to spend this money. I would be doubly aghast if it had not.

My submission is that this government has not spent enough. The fact remains, it is very clear, it does not need any complex analysis. We still have one million poor Canadian children. How do we explain to these children that the government has spent enough?

The hon. member commented on retraining programs. They are good too. However, if there is no job to be found after the training, what is the training for? We just heard in the news last Friday that some 60,000 jobs were lost during the month of November, over and above the job loss in October. Do we say that this government has good fiscal and monetary policy? No.

The Minister of Finance in his last budget said we could expect a rise in unemployment, indicating that unemployment is government economic policy. I am really perplexed. Unemployment immediately translates into poverty. Witness after witness who appeared before the subcommittee on poverty of the standing committee on health and welfare have said so.

Is the hon. member telling me now and telling this House that those witnesses who work for poor children, who work for the poor of our country, are wrong? I submit that the government is wrong and those people are right. The children of Canada are lucky that we have these people who advocate for them because children cannot vote, but still also have hearts and minds to be protected.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened with attention to the remarks of our colleague. I know he is a paediatrician and professor of medicine. He certainly knows what he is talking about when he speaks of children.

Mr. Lewis: Which is remarkable for members on that side of the House.

Mr. Boudria: "Which is remarkable in a similar way to other speeches of members of the opposition", I believe is what the Minister of Transport said. I am paraphrasing here so that it can be on the record.

I want to ask our colleague, who is obviously very knowledgeable in this area, if he recalls, as I do, that just prior to the last election campaign the government produced a program of child care, not a perfect one. It was certainly faulty. The government produced that program, brought it to the attention of the House and then when the program was actually before the Senate, it called the election prior to the bill being approved by the Senate and then failed to reintroduce the same legislation after the election was over.

I wonder if my colleague recalls that, and given that he probably does, will he tell us in his opinion if he agrees with me that this government was not sincere when it said it wanted to have a national child care strategy, that it was all empty rhetoric and it was attempting to find some way of scuttling its own bill, which eventually it succeeded in by calling the election at a time when the bill was before the Senate, thereby allowing it to die on the Order Paper.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, as usual my colleague is always keen in picking up on very important issues and certainly child care is one.

Mr. Lewis: I know it is Christmas, but this is a bit much.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, it is the essence of Christmas that we challenge and rekindle in us the warmth of the human spirit, the spirit of fortitude and generosity. In that way we can spread goodwill and make warm friendships and cultivate the love of family. Love of family means that we should have the means with which to take care of our children.

When working mothers, particularly single parents, need child care spaces and cannot find one, what do we say to them? It is not fair. It is not fair that this government would promise to do something during an election and just drags, drags and drags after the election.

Let us also remember that children are a unique group of citizens. Unlike adults, children continue to grow. For every day of delay in attending to the needs of children, those days can be multiplied in terms of adverse effects if we fail to deliver that service.

I would challenge the government to consider establishing child development centres across the country so that we can truly address the needs of our children, our most valuable national resource.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, before starting my brief comments on this topic, I wonder whether it would be possible to obtain the unanimous consent of the House for dividing the 30 minutes allowed the government into two periods of 15 minutes, that is, two 10–minute periods, each followed by five minutes of questions and comments.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Danis: I want to thank hon. members of the Official Opposition and of the New Democratic Party.

I rise to speak in this debate as Minister of State (Youth). As you know, my mandate consists in representing Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24 in cabinet and preparing national guidelines and designing national initiatives to promote their interests and well–being.

I realized that the motion presented by the hon. member for Hamilton East was about poverty and its impact, and that is why I was anxious to take part in this debate.

As the Minister of State (Youth), I saw with my own eyes, in the course of recent consultations, how poverty that affects children at an early age can later create problems that are practically impossible to overcome when they have to earn a living and support a family.

However, this motion does not give any recognition to what is being done today to deal with a very important aspect of the problem. Mr. Speaker, I am referring to employment. The best way to break the vicious circle of poverty is to find a job, and the best way to find a job is to get an education.

Let me give an example. According to a recent study, the poverty rate was 14.3 per cent among families where the head of the family had less than nine years of schooling, and this compares with 8.3 per cent for families where the head of the family had at least finished high school. When the head of the household had finished post–secondary studies or had a trade, the poverty rate was lower, around 6.7 per cent. Finally, only 3.7 per cent of families where the head of the family had a university degree were living in poverty in this country.

To recapitulate, the family poverty rate ranged from 14.3 per cent when the head of the household had less than nine years' schooling to 3.7 per cent when the head of the household had finished university. The only variable was the number of years of education.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if we look at the circumstances of single parent families, we find a shocking poverty rate of 30.5 per cent. It is partly due to the fact that this group includes a very large number of either elderly or very young people with a very tenuous link with the labour market. This group also includes single parents such as teenage mothers.

In this case the difference is even more revealing. When the head of the family has not finished grade nine, the poverty rate is 53.8 per cent. In the case of single parents with a post–secondary education or some kind of trade, the poverty rate goes down to 20.4 per cent. If the head of the household has a university degree, the poverty rate goes down further, to 12 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, education can make all the difference. By continuing their education, young people can acquire the proper skills that will help them cope with future changes. I am sure we all realize that a child that grows up in poverty is more likely to drop out of school and thus contribute to the poverty of another generation.

One would think these figures would convince young Canadians that an education is important if they want a decent future. Unfortunately, that is not really the case. About 30 per cent of Canadian students drop out of high school. If the present drop-out rate continues, by the year 2000, one million under-educated and untrained young people will have joined the ranks of the labour force, at a time when the demands of global competition are such that we need an increasingly educated and skilled labour force.

Hon. members know that if Canada is to continue expanding as a trading nation, it cannot afford the social costs generated by an uneducated labour force that cannot compete with that of other countries. Since skill requirements in various sectors are increasing, the result will be a definite lack of productivity at a time that is critical for the Canadian economy.

Today, the number of researchers and scientists in this country is among the lowest per capita of all industrialized nations. In a survey conducted by the Conference Board of Canada last year, two Canadian companies out of three stated that among their employees they had a number of people who were illiterate and thus incapable of doing the tasks they were supposed to do. Furthermore, half of Canada's companies have trouble finding qualified employees with the requisite skills. In fact, earlier this year, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development made it clear that a lack of skilled workers was the most serious problem facing our economic growth in the 90s.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that most members are aware of these facts. If we are to compete effectively in a global economy, we must take the necessary steps to provide our labour force with the skills it needs to meet the future requirements of the labour market.

That is why the government is leading the way in this area by taking steps to help young Canadians prepare for tomorrow. However, we are not alone in having to deal with this responsibility. In fact, the co-operation of industry and unions, provincial governments, educational institutions, communities, parents and young people themselves is both crucial and necessary.

Through the department responsible for Youth, the government is about to implement the Stay in School project. To that end, we have allocated $296.4 million. The project is aimed first of all at persuading young people to continue their secondary education. Although we realize that education is first and foremost a provincial matter, we intend to take advantage of the knowledge and good will of anyone who is anxious to find a solution to this problem.

Mr. Speaker, I would be the first to acknowledge the excellent work being done by teachers in this country. However, the time has come to create new partnerships in order to help our schools and reinforce the connection between education and the labour market. I would like to point out that this objective is about to be met thanks to the Stay in School project. Our plan is threefold. First, the federal government is developing new labour market entry programs and services and expanding existing ones to create awareness among those still attending school. There are the Cooperation Education Program, career workshops, Canada Career Week and counselling services to name a few.

We have since developed an activity called Starting Point as part of the Job Entry Program, which is an element of the Canadian Job Strategy. It is aimed at providing the young people with numerous tools, such as career evaluation, adoptive school and job experience.

Second, we are mobilizing our partners at the national and local levels to get them involved in solving the problem. In the Mobilization of partners part of the program, we are bringing together counsellors and business people, labour representatives, teachers, parents, social organization officials and the young people themselves. I recently arranged a series of meetings with the young people, including young native people. Widening the scope of the labour market entry programs is one thing, but solving the drop out problem is another. That is why a concerted effort is essential.

The best thing to do is to start by gaining the support of the young people who were confronted to the problem so that they can relate their experience.

During the next four years, the federal government, on the advice of the provincial and territorial governments, will work closely with groups interested in issues relating to the students to better connect education to the labour market.

Our objective is to support community projects and to encourage community participation. By encouraging the community to look for an answer to the problem of dropouts, we are allowing the community to come up with solutions that will have popular support.

In this way, everyone at the national as well as local level is contributing to finding ways of keeping young people in school.

Third, as part of the information component of the Stay in School program, we are preparing information packages on careers and trying to create more public awareness about the dropout issue. We want to inform potential dropouts and their parents on career opportunities and the fundamental importance of high school.

[English]

Reducing the drop–out rate is a real challenge, but not one beyond our grasp. We owe it to our young people to make a parallel effort. Since last February when the stay–in–school initiative was first announced, a range of activities has taken to promote this objective.

Last April, for example, the federal government co–sponsored the Conference Board of Canada's first ever National Conference on Business Education Partnerships. More than 400 senior executives from business, labour, and education attended the conference, along with representatives of government, community groups, and young people.

We must help people understand themselves. What is required is for them to go in a direction that appeals to them. But to do so, we must give the professionals the tools they need to provide proper and meaningful career guidance to young people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the minister's time has expired. Questions and comments.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the Minister and I thank him for his comments. There is an issue of particular interest to me, and the minister raised it. It is this whole issue of the dropouts in our school system. The Minister mentioned a number of programs. Some of them are totally new and have a good chance of being successful, at least I hope they will, being myself the father of two teenagers. Fortunately, they are both in school. One is a bit too young to consider dropping out and the other is attending the university, Thank God, as far as I know, he has no intention of dropping out. But the same is not true for many young people. I see friends of my son dropping out of school at 16 or 17. Of course, as long as everything goes well, they have no problem, but when we face hard times—as we do now—they are the first to loose their jobs because they lack seniority, of course, and for other reasons as well.

Can the minister tell me if any of the programs in his Department provide better incentives for staying in school? Has the minister considered for instance something along the line of investing more into programs like Cooperative Education. Such programs at least teach the young people the importance of pursuing their studies by showing them that it is not always so great on the labour market.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister has two minutes to answer.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. There is no doubt in my mind that school dropouts are among the problems facing Canadians today. Let me quote you a few statistics. For instance, 30 percent of our high school students in Canada drop out. The rate varies across the country. In some provinces, it is 20 percent, while in others it exceeds 70 percent. That is totally unacceptable.

When we look at Germany or Japan, where the rates of dropouts were as high as ours 25 or 30 years ago but have now fallen to 4 or 5 percent, we know it can be done. Therefore, the initiatives I mentioned earlier in my short speech are among the initiatives the federal government undertook these past few years in an attempt to reduce the rate of dropouts. The specific program my friend referred to, the Cooperative Educaton Program, is indeed one of the programs—

[English]

It is really one of the most successful programs that we have in place. It is certainly our intention to make sure the program continues to make as much progress as it has in the past. In my travels across the country, that is one of the programs that the kids have told me they appreciated the most.

Like my friend, I also have two kids, but at least they are in school for now. Thank God for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Finance.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, debating this bill is like arguing against motherhood. There is not a single person in the House—and I do not think there are too many people in Canada—who would not be happy to do something directly, not only for the working poor—which this bill addresses—but for any of the people in Canada who are in poverty today, in fact anybody in the world who is in poverty.

A person has to consider what, in fact, is in the best interest of the working poor of Canada. Is it to continue the process of spending more than one has? Driving the national debt up? Borrowing from our children to pay for today? Or, is it in fact to establish an economic program that is sound and that will take us into the future where our children and our grandchildren can look at a country where they not only have a job but they see far reduced levels of poverty in the working poor, as well as in any other category, whether it is the seniors or the children.

Whenever a Conservative in particular stands up to address a topic like this, people immediately say: "Oh, he is a Conservative. He doesn't care about people." I would like to point just a brief example.

It is not just Canadians who think this way. There are other countries around this world which also recognize that you cannot give something out unless you have the money in pocket. To take another country in America, if you look at Mexico, it has far more people in poverty than we in Canada. If you want to call it working poor, most of those people are working and they are very poor.

What is in their best interests? Is their government's approach to try to solve that poverty without an improved economy? It has tried, but it does not work. We cannot improve the plight of the working poor without upgrading our economy. That is the task that this government has undertaken.

But, in every step of the way in trying to improve this economic condition in Canada, we have been opposed. At first I thought it was just politics, but I have come to realize that many people in the opposition actually believe in what they are saying and what they are doing. They do not believe that you need to have a sound economy before you can spend the money—

Mr. Boudria: Yes, we do.

Mr. Worthy: —that if you want to spend more, no matter what the cause, that it is okay, that somehow or other that debt does not really count.

I do not believe that, Mr. Speaker, and thank goodness a number of people in Canada do not believe that. Just as an example, the economic program that this government has established is a sound one. We believe that if you want a bigger piece of pie, you have to get a bigger pie.

That is a simple analogy. You do not need to be a rocket scientist to figure that one out. If you want more pie, you have to have a bigger pie in total. Our policies are encouraging that. But what has happened? Just this fall we saw nearly a year's backlog of sound economic legislation being held up by our friends down the hall. The first was Bill C-21, the reform UI bill, very important to this country. If you want to upgrade the working poor, especially the ones who need to get from a low paying job to a better paying job, you need a program that is going to work on training and education. Part of that was in Bill C-21. That was one of the main reasons for it. It was a a reform UI bill that would provide some of the help that the opposition is actually looking for.

We had Bill C-28, another tax reform, to try to get greater taxation from large corporations. That was held up. We have Bill C-69, the government expenditure restraint bill, again trying to put this economy on a sound footing. That also was held up.

These, if they had not passed, would have added billions to our deficit.

Now, what is the bill currently being held up? It is the goods and services tax, a tax designed to improve our local industry, to make us more competitive on world markets, to take away the unfair competition that importers have over the producers of our own products, to try to put our exporters on an equal footing.

The bill does more than that. It adds capital initiative to the whole economy, up to $9 billion a year initiative that is in fact going to end up with a net result of more jobs and more dollars for the exact people we are talking about today.

Also, in passing, it helps businesses so that their capital and operating costs are more effective, more competitive, and of course therefore providing more jobs.

If we really want to assist the working poor, I would encourage the hon. members who proposed this bill to urge their friends down the hall to in fact pass it.

These bills are the ones we have just passed in the last year to try to improve our economy, but we have been practising economic policy for six years now. What is the result of that? It has been aimed at restraint, at tax reform, and at improving our whole economy.

Let us address restraint just briefly. In spite of the fact that 33 per cent of our government spending is for transfer of spending, there is another 24 per cent in transfers to the provinces. These are the dollars that go directly, in most cases, to the kinds of people who need it the most. It is transfers for the elderly. They get $17 billion per year. Their increases over the last five years have been at a rate exceeding 7 per cent. There are the UI recipients. There is family allowance for the young people we are talking about. There is veterans allowances. Under the transfers to the provinces, there are the hospitals, the schools and, of course, the welfare payments that are very important. All of those have been increasing at close to 6 per cent per annum. Yet, the total government spending has been at a rate of 3.6 per cent. It is obvious that we have been cutting back on many other aspects of our program. It is an example I have used in the House. I would like to repeat it one more time.

When we took office, this government was spending $10 billion per year more than it was bringing in in revenue. Currently, we are bringing in $10 billion more in a year than we are spending. That is a $26 billion a year turnaround to try to get this country back in shape so that we can afford the programs that we all wish we could provide for the working poor.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I would ask again for the consent of the House that two Liberals could be allowed to speak in succession. Unless we get that unanimous consent, our Quebec colleague from Montreal will not be allowed to speak. That would be terrible, given the tremendous state of poverty there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): In a few days, Mr. Speaker, most Canadians will celebrate Christmas, time for culinary traditions, joy, peace, religious ceremonies, family reunions, and gift sharing. For most of them it will be a time to rejoice, yet an ever increasing number of Canadians will only be able to remember better days. What with increasing lay-offs and practically nonexisting opportunities to find alternate employment at decent wages, our population is getting poorer at an alarming rate! We are in a recession, the government promises to implement the GST next month, and chances of landing permanent jobs are getting slimmer by the minute.

Mr. Speaker, food banks, clothing distribution centres and people queuing for a bowl of soup are increasingly common. Still we lack the resources and the funds to bring a minimum of relief to the ever larger numbers of needy people.

[English]

Poverty is being felt throughout this country and some areas are touched more than others. From Vancouver's lower east side to Halifax's north end, from Winnipeg's core area to Toronto's Jane, Finch and Regent Park complexes to name but a few, poverty is fast becoming a fact of life of too many fellow Canadians.

Just as an example, in one month a food bank in the Montreal region counted roughly 1,200 people, including 400 children under age 15 who were so hungry they could not wait to eat whatever they could find in the grocery bags! These children often leave for school without eating anything because there is nothing to eat at home. These children have a hard time concentrating and learning on an empty stomach.

A child with an empty stomach finds it hard to listen to what the teacher has to say.

Mr. Speaker, those children will be our next adult generation. They are the ones who will have to fashion to future of our country. And they will be our judges.

That so many children live in poverty in a society like ours is intolerable. According to the Canadian Association of Food Banks, the parents of over one million children must rely on food banks to feed their children every day.

Mr. Speaker, it also intolerable that so many young need to escape trough artificial means in order to survive in a world that has let them down. We are talking about young people who live in this very country. We are talking about our own young people. About youth who have a potential to offer, but whose essential needs are not met.

What is this government going to do about it? When will it make poverty in Canada a priority on its agenda? Poverty is not only a provincial responsibility, it is also a federal responsibility.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote Judge Ruffo who is well known for her stand for children: "Our children are trying to tell us something, but we aren't listening. Our children have no hope so they are destroying themselves in drugs and suicide and prostitution and committing more and more violent crimes".

We must all stop ignoring the problem. We must get involved. This government must admit that there is a crisis, that there is indeed an emergency. This government must get involved before it is too late. It might already be too late. Throwing the problem in another camp will only delay things. Those in power must act now or there will not be a tomorrow for thousands of Canadian kids. When will this government commit itself? When will it accept to do something?

Mr. Speaker, whether we like it or not, the problem is here and, far from going away, it is growing, Pediatricians report that the number of cases of ear infection, pneumonia, diarrhea and meningitis among children of low-income families is increasing. Child abuse is on the rise: 36 and 35 per cent respectively among girls and boys age 14 and 15 in Canada were victims of sexual abuse. How long will this government wait before taking action? When will this government accept to face the music and realize that the problem is in its own backyard?

Mr. Speaker, poverty goes hand in hand with all the other social ills. It is urgent to find and implement ways to put an end to this critical situation.

According to Statistics Canada, one child in ten lives in poverty. The death rate among new born babies of poor parents is twice the national average. The rate of school dropouts among children of poor families is 2.2 times higher than for other children. What a sad picture!

What will tomorrow be like if we refuse to face these facts? When will the Prime Minister make Canadian men and women a priority? In Canada, the number of poor people, among all age groups, is increasing. Unfortunately, this is a well established fact. Hardship is no longer limited to some social classes and certain age groups.

Bankrupcies plant and store closures, job losses and salary cuts are every day occurrences. Overnight, Canadian men and women by the thousand find themselves financially destitute.

How can we believe in a country which so easily neglects its own citizens? There is no longer any income security or any hope to make dreams come true. A much too large proportion of our citizens have a very uncertain future. What tragedy will have to happen before this government wakes up and implements programs in co-operation with the provinces? The situation has become unacceptable and yet, only a modicum of help is being offered. We expect voluntary agencies to do everything, but it is not possible, it is not enough.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention the situation of our senior citizens, too quickly forgotten by a society moving in high gear. To illustrate what I want to say I will give you the example of the group Sun Youth in Montreal, which announced that it would hold, last November 21st, a distribution of used clothing for older people. It was supposed to start at 8.30 a.m., but at 6 a.m. people started to line up. More than 1,200 people over 60 came to get free clothing, and this during a single day. These are people who barely managed on their pension or welfare cheque. Once they have paid for rent and some food they have nothing left. Mr. Abramson, 74, who was in charge of the quality of clothing said and I quote: "Senior citizens are the most mistreated of our citizens. Governments have money for this or that, but nothing for those who helped build this country and paid for it with their taxes."

Mr. Speaker, what more does this government want? Our children are going to school hungry; teenagers struggle for survival in the street due to a lack of income and decent employment; our senior citizens line up to get free clothing to face the elements.

We are often told that: "Canada is a rich country, a caring country, but for who? When will the gouvernment acknowledge that this country is in a crisis, not just a recession? When will the government put in place job creation programs to offset all the closings and to increase the number of jobs available? When will the gouvernment invest in this country and give equal opportunities to all its citizens? When is the government going to act?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have here a document dealing with Canadian children which I received recently from Statistics Canada. By the way, I wish to congratulate Statistics Canada for providing hon. members with this very useful tool.

In this document I have found rather alarming data concerning children living below the poverty line. Here are a few facts: In 1988, 4 per cent of children lived in families where the annual income was below $10,000; 11.7 per cent lived in families where the annual income was between $10,000 and $19,999, that is to say, between $10,000 and $20,000. These two groups together represent nearly 15 per cent of the population.

What I find even more appaling, Mr. Speaker, are the following statistics: When we consider single-parent families, where the heads, in 80 per cent of the cases, are women, 23.9 per cent of children live in families where the income is below $10,000 per year, and what is even more surprising, 41.5 per cent belong to families where the income is between $10,000 and $20,000 per year. If we combine both these figures, we find the following statistics: 65.4 per cent of children from single-parent families belong to families where the income is under $20,000 a year.

I wish to in view of these disturbing figures ask my hon. friend if she does not feel that the time has come for all levels of government to make sure that former spouses—men most of the time—do their part in providing for their families after a separation or a divorce. In my opinion, these statistics are a national disgrace and I would hope that the various governments will deal with this issue and make sure than men—I say men, because these estranged spouses are almost always men—provide for their children after a marriage breakdown. May I ask my hon. friend to comment on this.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my colleague and I am grateful to him for giving me this opportunity to speak about children that have been forgotten in the vacuum left as a result of family divorce or break-up.

For a number of years now the two government levels have been throwing the problem back and forth between themselves. They say: "Not our fault, this is a provincial responsibility. There is no federal legislation covering that aspect". I would suggest that time has come indeed for both government levels to assume their responsibilities.

I want to get back to the situation of these children, if my colleague will allow me. Earlier today the minister was telling us that the number of poor children, children who go hungry, is going down. That is quite false! On the island of Montreal the numbers are not going down.

Here is an example concerning schools. La Salle's Saint-Jean-Baptiste school ranks 70th among Montreal's poorest. If we talk about the city of Montreal it is even worse. But for the whole island the figures are dismal, 41 per cent in one school. Referring to the island or only the city of Montreal as such, we are looking at almost 40 per cent in practically every ward. The mortality rate in the poorest areas is 68 years of age, against 80 in the richest district.

One out of four Montrealers lives in poverty. These are not the figures which the minister gave us this afternoon for last year or the year before, no, these are the findings of the latest surveys made in Montreal. I think that the government has the duty to help Canadian men and women who live below the poverty level.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this very important debate. I must say, as an aside in beginning this debate, that I am a little surprised by the unwillingness of the NDP to participate in the way that we wish to participate.

It is a party that has long prided itself on cornering the market on the concern for the poor but, when a push comes to a shove, it has singularly been unable to provide speakers for this very important debate. I certainly hope it is not a sign that it puts the partisanship of a by-election, where its members are working today, over an important debate on the future of this country.

Mr. Boudria: Well, they are not going to win in that by-election anyway.

Mr. Walker: Perhaps, but the people of Canada expect members to come in and debate these issue very seriously.

This has been a very good opportunity to hear different points of view on the poor of Canada. Sometimes in reciting our concerns for money, as we have heard from the government side, and some of the problems that have emerged in our economy, we lose sight of what these figures mean. What does it mean to have a reduction in funds?

Let us look at the big question of what happened in the early part of 1980s, and why a deficit was created versus what is happening right now.

In the first case, the deficit was created because the Liberal Party was too generous to the poorer regions of the country. Year after year we tried to increase the amount of moneys we gave to the provinces. People forget that. For example, from 1979–80 through to 1984–85, before this miserable government took over, we went from $1.8 billion in transfer payments to over $4 billion. That is an increase of over 100 per cent. The deficit, of course, has gone up from just over $120 billion right up to $400 billion. The government has been niggardly toward the provinces. It has increased the transfer payments by only 30 per cent.

There has been a tremendous, negative impact across the country as a result. We raise questions constantly in the House having to do with food banks. They should look at reality of 1.4 million people at various times during the year having to go to food banks and deal with the reality that by the third week of the month people are out of money.

They should deal with the reality that there is a welfare economy out there and people are pushed into lousy housing. They should deal with the reality they cannot feed and clothe their children, not make denials or say that they do not have any money. There is money in this country. They should check out the profits, the way in which people spend their money, and the charter flights to the States. They should check out their friends. There is money if we have the guts to work for the poor.

I challenge this government to work for once for the poor and not against them. The food banks have come to the Parliament of Canada, not looking for a legal argument from the Minister of Health and Welfare that it is not his responsibility. They have come with the very important desire to see that the right to eat and to have food is considered a basic human right in this country. When, since the Depression, have we had Canadians coming to this building asking to be fed as a right? We have all assumed we would feed each other. We have all assumed that volunteers could do it or that government could do it. The volunteers are tired, and the government is saying it has no money.

On this side of the House we believe that the government has a responsibility. We want the minister to step forward and begin to outline a plan of action so that Canadians can be fed, housed, and clothed.

Throughout this country it affects people from all walks of life. Nobody plans on being poor, but people do end up being poor. Let us quit blaming the victims. Let us quit pretending that somehow people got themselves into this trap because of their own doing.

They should look at the job losses in the last month alone in Ontario and Quebec. All those ministers are sitting quietly there thinking that they do not have to worry about it because it is out there and not in their region of the country. They should check with the people at home at Christmas. This is a problem in their constituencies. This is a problem among their voters. They want to have some reassurance from this government that it understands what is going on.

I would like to talk to the House about a very important poverty problem in the city of Winnipeg. For the last 10 years, the three levels of government under the leadership originally of the member for Winnipeg South Centre brought forward a program called the core area initiative, which is perhaps the most innovative program, without exaggeration, in North America. It has been an award winning program. All three levels of government have contributed and worked hard together. They have probably generated $.5 billion in investment and expenditures in an area. Winnipeg has developed, I am very sad when I say this, into one of the poorest regions of the country. It and downtown Montreal have the most pressing urban poverty questions dealing with people who have ended up so poor that they cannot deal with that reality.

The minister of energy, who is responsible for this program on behalf of the federal government, said in the press, to the mayor of Winnipeg, and to the premier of Manitoba last week that he was not sure he could find the money. He was not sure that the program was any good. He was not sure that the accountability was appropriate. He was not sure whether he wanted to deal with the city of Winnipeg any further. He was not sure until he heard from the people of Winnipeg and therefore he wanted public hearings.

The language of public participation and public hearings is something we all generally support. We want the government to have some hearings. But what he did not say in public—and it is what every person in Winnipeg who is concerned about the future of the core will say—was that he has never shown up at public hearings. He refuses to answer correspondence. He refuses to take phone calls. He will not talk to the people until it is too late.

In downtown Winnipeg, the urban futures group headed by a very respected academic from the University of Winnipeg has just completed five months of hearings, five evenings plus private hearings. They had 95 presentations. Every major group concerned about the future of the downtown made a presentation. They were listened to and out of that came a very important report. In that report they wanted to send a message to the governments in Manitoba, at city hall and in Ottawa that the core area initiatives should be continued. They ask:

> Continue the tripartite commitment to inner city revitalization. Much has been accomplished by the CAI, but much more needs to be done. The time has come to reassess direction and focus, not to abandon the undertaking and leave that which has been achieved vulnerable to erosion.

It is the absence of other programs that terrifies the people in the inner city.

• (1830)

We talk about refugee programs, immigration programs and the cutbacks that are hitting the new poor in this country. When we talk about cutbacks to aboriginal language programs, to aboriginal education, to aboriginal training programs, and to aboriginal economic development projects, we are talking about the same people in the core area initiative. When we talk about the lack of funding for university education, we are talking about people—

Mr. Hockin: There is no cutback on that program.

Mr. Walker: There are cutbacks. If the minister is willing to get into a semantical fight about whether or not this government has cut back, then I think that he should understand his estimates much better. Every Canadian knows there have been cutbacks; every Canadian feels it. Is the minister going to say that there have been no cutbacks in the CBC, in the same constituency? Is he going to say the core area initiative has not been cut back? The minister should be better prepared when he comes into debate and not be taking potshots when the sidelines.

The second thing the group was looking for was to give priority to initiatives that foster community and individual empowerment and that directly improved the conditions in which current inner-city residents lived. To accomplish this, they asked that government broaden the partnership to include a much greater planning and decision-making role for inner-city communities, second, that they provide greater support to education, training, employment, community-based economic development and social service initiatives that promote ownership, self-help and self-determination, not dependency and, finally, focus physical renewal on neighbourhood needs such as adequate affordable housing, infrastructure and community facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on, but it is a case like the core area initiative that could be used in every city in this country. Instead of cutting back, instead of pretending to Canadians that life is continuing on as normal and that there are still plenty of programs out there, if the government would face the reality that it has created a problem for itself and now for every Canadian and that we face a moral crisis, an economic crisis, a taxation crisis, and a crisis of poverty caused by the programs that the government created, and if the government would come out of today's debate understanding that one essential point that the opposition is not here to harangue it but is here to help them understand the desperate voice of poor Canadians in wanting Parliament to respond. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to join in this debate.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask my hon. friend three questions.

He speaks about funding for the poor in Canada and he especially made reference to the aboriginal community. Is he aware, first of all, that the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Program, which is close to half a million dollars for the next five years, was increased more than inflation, close to 8 per cent year-over-year from the previous funding?

That program includes in it a whole host of self-help programs, including the small business start-up program which was increased from $72 million to $80 million a year. It is a program which is my responsibility. We were able to get that increase above 10 per cent year-over-year. Is he aware that that program has created 5,000 different, small businesses, on and off reserves, in the last five years? Is he aware that that program has done more than any previous federal government program for reducing dependency and creating entrepreneurship, creating jobs and creating business on and off the reserves, and that it has been increased far above the level of inflation, far above almost any other line in the federal government budget?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, in a debate of honesty and sincerity, one recognizes that there are always ministers who try. But the problem becomes that, for these small efforts, they expect to be congratulated. Unemployment on the reserves remains somewhere between 80 per cent and 95 per cent. In Winnipeg there are probably somewhere in the neighbourhood of 50,000 unemployed aboriginals. Anybody who can stand up and say that this program has made a substantial difference in the community simply ignores the reality of the depth of poverty. The problem with this government is that it gets to be defensive about these issues instead of saying that it has started but it has not really accomplished anything.

The major programming that affects the plight of aboriginal people is not only the on-reserve programs such as education. Do not forget the tremendous changes created by the people returning to reserves on issues of housing. The government is probably 15 years behind in housing programs. Just when we found out last year that young people wanted to go to post-secondary education facilities more than ever before, they are faced with a government cutback. We heard in Question Period today about the need for further funds in Labrador.

We find that at the very moment in which we see a tremendous amount of pride emerging in the aboriginal community, this minister and the minister of Indian affairs, since the crisis in the summer, standing up and saying, "Don't you understand how much we have done for them".

When people have a good working relationship, they do not have to stand up and tell people how much they are doing for each other. These people understand it. What we find is the absence of any real progress is causing tremendous frustration in a community which deserves every opportunity it can get.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, earlier, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North was making his speech, I asked him about the figures, and he told me that they could be used to say anything one wanted them to say and that they could be interpreted any way at all. I listened to what was said by the previous speaker, who also referred to a number of figures. I would like to know whether the figures he just referred to are the absolute truth. Should we bear in mind what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North or does the Liberal Party have the absolute truth on this matter, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, the hon. member asked me whether or not my statistics are correct. Is he calling into question the quality of the research and the honesty with which I approached my speech? Everything was correct in my speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister for Science on a point of order.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, if you are going to allow time for someone to respond to one question, perhaps he would like to respond to the question that my hon. colleague put, which he carefully avoided.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On a point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today on a point of order concerning the legislation we shall be considering later this afternoon. I spent almost all afternoon reading the legislation. I found some rather strange things and I would like to comment on them now here in the House.

I looked up Standing Order 81(5) which reads as follows, in English, and I quote:

[English]

> Supplementary estimates shall be referred to a standing committee or committees immediately they are presented in the House. Each such committee shall consider and shall report, or shall be deemed to have reported, the same back to the House not later than three sitting days before the final sitting or the last allotted day in the current period.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that today is the last day of the period. It is also obvious that two standing committees of this House did not meet to consider the supplementary estimates. The two committees were the Standing Committee on Transport and the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

Mr. Speaker, we have evidence that this is so. On Monday, December 5, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said in the House that he had written a letter with three other colleagues in, the Liberal caucus to the Clerk of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, asking him to arrange for a meeting of the committee. However, he said that this was impossible. Obviously a committee that did not meet could not have examined estimates.

On October 18 last, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan raised a question of privilege in the House and indicated the Standing Committee on Transport had held one meeting, but that all members of the government had stayed away from it. On November 28 last, the Speaker gave his decision on the question of privilege and said the following:

[English]

> I have to say to hon. members and to the public that the working of committees is very important to the working of the House of Commons. I do ask hon. colleagues to make every effort possible to come to whatever agreements and understandings among themselves which are necessary to make these committees work.

If those committees are so important, as the Speaker said, and I agree with him, it is crucial that they meet, pursuant to the Standing Orders of the House, particularly section 81(5).

[English]

We were told when this was raised last week by the House leader for this party, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, that debate could take place in this Chamber on these estimates on the allotted days.

I have already indicated there are six allotted days in the supply period. Today is day number six. Day number five was on November 21. In other words, all five days had elapsed on November 21 before these supplementary estimates were tabled on November 23. The government apparently held back these supplementary estimates so there was only one day left in the House to discuss them, which is not in breach of the rules, and I cannot complain on that score. But for the government House leader to suggest, as he did, that somehow we had an opportunity to debate these estimates on supply days was utter nonsense because today is the only day we have an opportunity to debate them. These particular estimates in these two committees could not be considered in the committees because the committees could not meet because the government refused to allow them to meet in clear breach of the obligations under the rules.

The point that has to be made here is that on November 23 when the supplementary estimates were tabled in the House, the President of the Treasury Board, who I am sure took advice from his colleague, the Leader of the Government in the House—and clearly it was misguided advice in the circumstances—proposed a motion to refer these estimates to various committees.

The two that I think are worth noting are the references to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. There were a series of votes referred there and then there were three votes referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

I have filed with the Clerk of the House a notice of objection in respect to every single one of those votes. A motion of concurrence has been proposed by the President of the Treasury Board to concur in these 17 or so votes because of these notices of objection.

My point is that the notices of objection relate to these particular items because they could not be considered in committee because the government refused absolutely to allow these committees to meet. There is ample evidence contained in the proceedings in Hansard to which I have referred on the dates that were raised by hon. members and which were not effectively refuted by any member of the government. No one stood up on the government side and said: "We have done our best to get these committees together". They, in fact, had done their best to stop these committees from meeting.

Since Standing Order 81(5) requires that each committee shall consider and shall report these estimates and since the committees could not meet to consider, I submit that these estimates should not be in this bill. The draft bill that is going to be introduced later, if the votes all carry the way they are, has these very votes in it. I was horrified to read these in here. I thought the government would have the good sense to excise them without having to wait for Your Honour to rule them out.

I ask Your Honour, in having heard my argument and having realized, I am sure, as the government House leader must realize that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member.

It being 6.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of Supply.

CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 17B, DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 17b, in the amount of $19,496,000, under Consumer and Corporate Affairs—Goods and Services Tax Consumer Information Office, in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, immediately before the bells began to ring, I was in the midst of making a point of order before this House concerning the validity of the government's proposed supply bill. I deliberately put the point of order before the House at that time because I did not want to be met with the argument that because the House had adopted these resolutions, these supply motions, that somehow it affected the validity of this bill.

My submissions were that the bill was out of order and, with great respect, I think I am entitled to a ruling on that before the House proceeds to consider this bill.

My colleague, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott–Russell, had no opportunity to intervene in the point of order and I think he may have something to say on this important point, Sir.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House, and I will try to speak loudly so as to overcome the heckling of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: We certainly do not want a situation in which the hon. member is unable to put the argument.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to make this argument very brief and very succinct. I want the Chair to be aware that I share very much the opinion of my colleague for Kingston and the Islands that the estimates of all departments and agencies dealing with and reporting to the consumer and corporate affairs and government operations committee should not be proceeded with at this time.

I say this to the House pursuant to a letter that I tabled in the House of Commons on December 5, 1990. This is a letter from the clerk of that committee which indicated to me that the committee could not convene "until the chairman has been duly elected". I quote further from the letter, which says: "The only person authorized to convene a committee for the election of a chairman is the chief government Whip, as in the case of special committees". In other words, what we have been told by the clerk of the committee is that the estimates could not be dealt with at that committee because the government Whip did not cause the meeting to happen, did not cause the committee to sit, enabling it to elect a chairman, thereby making us unable to consider the estimates before us.

This opinion was given to us by the clerk of a standing committee of this House and it remains unchallenged by the government. It is an opinion that comes from a committee chairman, presumably then with the cognizance of the Clerk of the House. Need I remind the Chair that the clerks work for the Chair of this House.

If the committee could not meet, as it was indicated to me, I submit to you that we cannot tonight consider a vote on those particular estimates.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I too want to submit, as have previous speakers, that proceeding with the bill before us is really out of order. I refer to Standing Order 81(5) which states:

> Supplementary estimates shall be referred to a standing committee or committees immediately they are presented in the House. Each such committee shall consider and shall report,—

Mr. Speaker, it says shall consider, not may consider or possibly consider, but shall consider. We know that the national defence committee has not considered the $350 million expenditure for the gulf operation. We also know that the consumer affairs committee has not looked into the incredible overruns regarding the GST.

I raised it with the government House leader and actually sent a letter to the chairman of the defence committee suggesting that they do what the Standing Orders require them to do. They have not. These supplementary estimates have not been considered by the respective committees because the committees have not met.

Therefore, I submit, as have previous speakers, that proceeding with this bill at this point would be in fact out of order.

• (1910 )

Mr. Speaker: I have, of course, listened very carefully to the arguments that have been put forward. I do not think that it is necessary that I should leave the chair and reserve on this. This is not the first time this argument has been put forward. It is an understandable one because of the rules being that at a certain point these matters will be dealt with.

I have listened carefully to the hon. members, but if it is the wish of the House to change the proceedings, then it will be necessary to change the rules. I do not find that I am able to comply with the arguments that have been put forth, although I understand perfectly well why they were put forward.

These arguments have been put forward on other occasions by members who are not sitting in the same place tonight.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We have another vote. It being 7.25 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the House will now proceed to the taking of deferred division on a motion at the report stage of Bill C–258, an act respecting the establishment of a centennial flame research award to publicize the contribution to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved that Bill C–258, an act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities, as reported (without amendment) be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps to help, I can say that the members of the New Democratic caucus support this bill unanimously.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find a disposition in the House that if the question is put members would be unanimously supporting this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, on private members' bills we have a tradition around here of not applying the whip. However, I think the idea that our employees should receive this kind of treatment is worthy of examination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, following the lead given by the House leaders of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party, perhaps in this private members' matter, I might have the rare moment to speak for the Conservative Party on this and suggest that on this side of the House, also, there would be unanimity in supporting this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I believe there was some understanding that we would also deal with Bill C–225, a motion to withdraw the bill and send the subject matter to committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is exactly what I was going to put. Merry Christmas.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine) that Bill C–225, An Act to amend the Public Service Employment Act (staff of Members of the House of Commons), be read the second time and referred to a Legislative committee; and on the amendment of Mr. Funk (p. 15354).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.40 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of a recorded division on the amendment of Mr. Funk, at second reading stage of Bill C–225, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act (staff of Members of the House of Commons).

Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE ENVIRONMENT

TABLING OF REPORT GREEN PLAN FOR A HEALTHY ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), it is my great pleasure to table today in both official languages Canada's Green Plan for a Healthy Environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. de Cotret: Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to offer my sincere thanks to the many Canadians who helped to prepare the Green Plan.

[English]

I would also like to underline the commitment of the Prime Minister and all my colleagues to this very worth-while initiative that we are putting forward today.

AIR ONTARIO CRASH

TABLING OF SECOND INTERIM REPORT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the hon. Virgil P. Moshansky's second interim report into the Air Ontario Crash at Dryden, Ontario, and the Minister of Transport's initial response to the recommendations of this interim report.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege and, indeed, an honour to have this opportunity to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of the citizens of the great city of Kamloops.

The petition points out a whole variety of concerns that the petitioners have regarding the government's intention to proceed with the 7 per cent goods and services tax. They call it a cruel and brutal tax, coming at the wrong time, hitting the wrong people and being the wrong tax along with the fact that is a very regressive consumption tax as opposed to a fair tax reform.

The petitioners are asking that the government reconsider this decision, back off on proceeding with this tax and introduce a comprehensive fair tax reform package instead.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present almost 1,000 names and petitions from residents in the city of London, Ontario, and other places in southwestern Ontario.

The petitioners point out to the government that they are very upset about the ever increasing automotive emissions, the thinning of the ozone layer and global warming. We need to take immediate action to protect our environment and communicate the advantage of using ethanol as an environmentally clean automotive fuel.

The petitioners are equally concerned about the use of MMT as a gasoline additive. The manganese portion of MMT that comes out of the exhaust emissions of automobiles is an insidious neuro-toxic substance that must be banned to protect the lives of the children of this country.

I am very pleased to table these petitions on behalf of the people of southwestern Ontario.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to lay upon the table 10 petitions.

The petitioners reside in the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Alberta, Quebec and indeed in communities across the country.

All petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax. In particular, they make reference to the tax which is proposed to be on magazines, books and on newspapers. They would hope that the Government of Canada would see its way clear in removing the goods and services tax, particularly at this time in view of the Canadian-made recession and the various negative effects it is having on Canadian consumers and, indeed, small businesses across this country.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36 I have the honour to place in front of the House a petition from nurses across Ontario who have petitioned with their concerns about the grave implications of future social costs of child poverty and have noted that in fact well over one million children in Canada are caught in lives of poverty and they are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to call a First Ministers' conference on poverty and on child poverty specifically. Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to table this.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to table a petition signed by numerous residents of Toronto and Mississauga. These Canadians are outraged at the government's proposal to place a tax on books and the printed word as contained in Bill C-62, the goods and services tax bill which, fortunately, is being held up appropriately in the Senate to try to save Canadians from this monstrous tax grab.

These Canadians call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition under Standing Order 36 from a number of residents of Alberta and other provinces. This petition has been prepared by the Diocesan Peace and Justice Committee and adopted by the Program and Planning Committee of the diocese. It calls on the government to halt all NATO low-level flight testing and related training over lands inhabited and claimed by the Innu and Inuit people, to withdraw Canada's invitation to NATO to establish a permanent NATO tactical weapons training centre in the Goose Bay-Nitassinan area which would vastly increase the number of low-level flight tests annually, and to take steps to protect the livelihood of Canadians who would be adversely affected economically by the cessation of fighter bomber training.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from a number of residents of metro Toronto who are concerned about the government's legislation for a goods and services tax, and it points out the many unfairnesses and disadvantages of it, and urges the government to reject the proposal, and instead to reduce the bank interest rate by 2 per cent so as to reduce interest rates on the federal debt and increase small business and general employment, and increase employment in such useful work as—and they list a number of badly needed public works across many Canadian cities.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a further petition from a number of residents of metropolitan Toronto, also concerning the low-level flights over Nitassinan, who oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay, and demand that Canada end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada, and redirect the NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal people to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promote sustainable development for all Canadians.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might have unanimous consent to revert to Reports from Committees.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STRIKING COMMITTEE

59TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 59th report of the Striking Committee. This report deals with the membership of the legislative committee pursuant to Standing Order 113(1). Upon presentation, such reports are deemed adopted.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, December 6, consideration of Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, as reported (without amendment) from the legislative committee; and Motion No. 4A of Mr. Langdon (p. 16404).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate, the hon. Minister of State for Privatization.

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-84

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I rise this morning to move:

> That, in relation to Bill C-84, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

> That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of State for Privatization.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I will be brief, because I know the opposition will want to rant and rave for a couple of hours this morning and shed great big crocodile tears on how terrible the government is—

Mr. Baker: I wonder, Madam Speaker, if you could rule that the hon. gentleman is in fact in order by speaking. He has already spoken on moving the motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the House may have seen, I hesitated before recognizing the minister. I think the hon. member is right.

The minister could have given his speech and moved the motion at the end of his speech. Then automatically his remarks would have been heard and the motion would have been moved, but in the circumstances I cannot give the floor to the hon. minister.

I will, then, recognize someone on my left. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have had to make a speech several times on government time allocation motions, so it is getting to be a bit of a habit.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Prince Albert finds the speeches boring. If he paid closer attention, he probably would be able to glean germs of truth about the autocratic and dictatorial way that this government treats the House of Commons. He is going to get another 10-minute lecture on it this morning, I am afraid to say. I have some facts and figures that I think will amuse hon. members opposite when they consider how dictatorial their efforts have been.

I want to turn particularly to the record of this House during this session of Parliament which has gone on for almost two years, it started in April 1989, so that members can hear the litany of time allocation and closure that has been used throughout the session of Parliament. First of all, I want to look at the raw data. The fact is that in the official statistics produced by the Table, it is evident that 294 hours and 41 minutes have been spent considering second reading of government bills. I will repeat that figure for the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin. He looks interested: 294 hours and 41 minutes.

There have been 82 government bills that have received second reading, from my quick count of the records. This means that the average time spent on second reading debate through this session has been 2.14 hours per government bill. That is not excessive, and yet here we have time allocation once again.

On third readings, the total time spent is 94 hours and 27 minutes. Some 53 government bills have already received third reading, and they say we are holding things up. Imagine, 53 government bills which have received third reading. That means 1.7 hours of debate per bill at third reading, and this is considered excessive by hon. members opposite. I find their approach to Parliament absolutely incredible. Their attempts are always to ram things through.

Let us look at the record. I keep citing these figures; they seem to fall on deaf ears. Closure has been used in this Parliament, that is since November 1988, a total of 13 times by this government. Then there is time allocation—and I am separating the two for the purpose of this discussion—which has been used seven times until today. This is number eight. That is seven times previously and eight times so far in this Parliament.

But that is only part of the story. If we look back at the lamentable record of government members since May 1985 when they started using time allocation, they have now used it on a cumulative basis 25 times in five years, from 1985 to 1990. They have threatened to use it on at least four other occasions when they proposed time allocation and then either withdrew it or had it thrown out by the Speaker, as they did in October of this year, because the Minister of State for Privatization, who got up and once again made an error as he did this morning in not making a speech first, tried to propose time allocation at second reading of this bill. We in the opposition, ever vigilant of Parliament's rights, got up and urged the Speaker to chuck that notice out, and he did. Therefore the minister was unable to move it as quickly as he would have liked.

If we count the attempts—and I see the minister has reappeared—we will find it has been 31 times that the government has either attempted or succeeded in using time allocation in debates in a five-year period. In the 19 previous years, Liberal governments used it a total of 29 times. On any comparison this government has gone hog wild in trampling on the rights of Parliament to debate.

I would like to quote some words. I found some quotations as I was browsing through books last evening. Perhaps hon. members opposite would care to guess whose words these are. I will first quote this line:

> Professor Ivor Jennings, the great English authority on Parliament said—and rightly—that "the function of Parliament is not to govern but to criticize, to modify Government policy, and to educate public opinion". To those who say that Parliament should be turning out legislation in quantity, my answer is that its mission is freedom and the assurance that all the people shall receive justice. It is not a slot machine into which one drops a slug to see the legislation come out.

Who said those words? Was it a great Liberal Prime Minister of Canada? No. Was it one of the members of the present government? No, certainly not. One would not expect to hear those words from the present government, the way it tramples on Parliament's rights. I will tell the House who it was. It was a previous leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada and a former Prime Minister of this country, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker. He said these words. Let's hear them again. When referring to Parliament he said:

> —its mission is freedom and the assurance that all the people shall receive justice. It is not a slot machine into which one drops a slug to see the legislation come out.

Yet this government and in particular the government House leader take the view that if Parliament does not pass second reading of bills in faster than two hours, it is too slow and it had better get on with it, have time allocation applied and jam it through in a day.

That is exactly what we have heard from the Minister of State for Privatization this morning: one more day at report stage on this very important piece of legislation that is selling off part of the purchase of Canadian taxpayers, Petro–Canada, which they have bought and paid for with their tax dollars. The government is selling it off in order to meet its lust for privatization of Canada's assets. I submit that the government is misguided, as usual.

Let us hear some more words from the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker who must be held in some esteem by hon. members opposite. I would be the last to want to quote Mr. Diefenbaker as an authority on much, but on the rights of Parliament he had some very sound ideas and certainly he understood the institution better than the present government House leader and his entourage. In fact I would venture to say that Mr. Diefenbaker was one of the best Leaders of the Opposition that Canada ever had. No one will deny that as a Leader of the Opposition he was outstanding. I do not think anyone will deny that as a Prime Minister he was a disaster. The hon. member for Edmonton East would not deny that.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I certainly would. The Conservative Party has abandoned John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Milliken: I am sorry that he thinks he was good. He should join the Conservative Party then, because clearly that is where his ghost remains.

Mr. Diefenbaker spoke about the importance of opposition, and I would like to quote again from this speech. I assume it was a speech given in Parliament by Mr. Diefenbaker, but someone with great foresight published it in this book entitled Those Things We Treasure. It is a collection of speeches, and I commend it for reading to the government House leader and his entourage. I quoted from page 46 of this little work:

> The need of a strong Opposition is supported by almost every political writer. Among these is Professor Bassett, who has stated that: "The Opposition is not merely tolerated, but treated as indispensable". He emphasizes the existence of an Opposition as an example of the difference between democracy and autocracy.
> Opposition is as necessary to the parliamentary system as is the Cabinet. The two are inseparable. One without the other would mean tyranny or chaos. It is commonplace for all governments to view effective opposition as obstruction and this is a view too often and too lightly taken up by critics outside Parliament. An Opposition that discharges its parliamentary responsibilities properly is bound to appear to those opposed as obstructionist.
> The weapon of the Opposition is discussion and argument. If the Opposition stand is not justifiable in the opinion of the people, the people are not slow to show their displeasure.

I could go on, but these are words of a former Leader of the Opposition and a former Prime Minister who understood the role of an opposition in Parliament, who suffered at the hands of an opposition in Parliament because it was an effective opposition.

I submit that this government is afraid to suffer at the hands of this opposition, and that is why it keeps closing off debate on the demerits of the bills that the government is continually bringing before this House. Debate on every contentious bill is closed off. I have already indicated the list of over 20 time allocation or closure motions in this Parliament. Never before has closure been used as often as it has been in this Parliament. Yet the government just carries on as though this was a perfectly normal and perfectly standard procedure. The fact is it does not want to hear the truth about the dreadful bills it is producing.

I want to read one more quotation about the role of an opposition, and I quote again from Mr. Diefenbaker:

> Without an Opposition, the administration of the day could and would carry on the task of running the country, but such a situation would be identical with a totalitarian one–party state. Efficiency of administration was claimed by Hitler and Mussolini, but freedom died.

That is exactly what is being trampled out here. It is an effort to stifle criticism, to stifle objection, to stifle the legitimate concerns of the people of Canada as expressed through their elected representatives.

We were not sent here to sit and pass bills willy–nilly. We were sent here so we could offer alternatives, criticize proposals, and educate the public on the damaging effects of government measures. Certainly the damaging effects of many of its measures are becoming readily apparent. One only has to look at the unemployment it has created, the high interest rates it has pushed and established in this country, and the various economic disasters with which it has come up. I do not want to go into those matters in the course of my speech, but I do say that in considering the approach to the public this government has an obligation to listen to the people of Canada, to listen to their representatives in Parliament, and to give us a fair and reasonable opportunity to be heard.

We have had one day on report stage of this bill. There were many amendments moved. There are many more to discuss, but the fact is that we are now being limited to one further day and third reading on a very contentious bill is going to be limited to one day. I call it a disgrace and I call on the government to withdraw this motion.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, once again I find myself participating in a debate limiting the time of the House for consideration of Bill C–84. We had the same thing, of course, at second reading. We had a total of three days of debate on Bill C–84 at second reading.

I should note perhaps that the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill, the Minister of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, sent a letter to one of my local newspapers, the Edmonton Journal in which he claimed that in fact there had been four days of consideration by this House of Bill C–84 at second reading. Of course, he neglected to point out that one of those days was taken up with the debate on the time allocation motion so that in fact there were three effective days of debate on Bill C–84 at seconding reading, approval in principle of the scheme to privatize Petro–Canada and thereby to alienate from the Crown assets worth, depending on how we wish to calculate it, somewhere between $2.3 and $6.7 billion.

Having been rushed through this House, like an over–large bride to the altar, the bill wound up in committee. In committee, we had an organization meeting a week before we were to start hearing witnesses. This meant that the witnesses that those of us on the opposition benches did manage to convince the government majority to invite, had a week or less to consider whether or not they could make the time to appear before the committee at the times made available to them by the committee; consider whether or not they had the time to prepare the presentation that would do justice to their beliefs and considerations; and consider therefore whether or not it was even worth–while to make the venture.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that several of the witnesses that even the committee in its stingy wisdom decided to invite had to decline because they were unable to make the necessary arrangements at such short notice. Although there was no closure or time allocation in the committee, the effect was the same. Consideration of the bill in committee was truncated. That too has led to inadequate consideration of this bill.

Ten days were devoted to the study of the bill in committee. They were October 31, November 6, 7, 8, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28 and 29. In those 10 days we heard a total of 11 witnesses, of which all but six were government witnesses. We heard six witnesses representing themselves or groups, including the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc., the Energy Clean Air Caucus of Alberta Friends of the Earth, an investment counsellor by the name of Mr. Gobert, the Council of Canadians, Professor Hershel Hardin. That is about it; $6.7 billion in assets, six non–government witnesses. That is more than a billion dollars a witness. We rushed them through there.

Now we find ourselves at report stage. Several amendments are being proposed. We have had one day's consideration. After one day's consideration, the government has determined that that is enough. It is time to bring down the axe and move this thing off into the final day of report stage consideration and then one day at third reading. That will be the equivalent from the start of second reading to the conclusion of third reading, with all steps in between including all the days spent in committee, to authorizing that expenditure or that alienation of the assets of $6.7 billion at the rate of roughly $400 million a day. That is big spending. It certainly makes me uncomfortable.

I do not believe that this House and its committee has given anywhere near the careful consideration to the bill that it warrants. It is the largest privatization ever undertaken by the government and ever likely to be undertaken by the government. It means the selling off of the one major Crown asset in what, virtually everyone agrees, is a strategic resource area. It is proposed to be done through a regime that will see the Canadian people recoup nowhere close the full worth of their assets.

Why, Madam Speaker? It cannot be haste, arising from the need to have the legislation itself in place because once the proposed legislation passes third reading in this House, it will go the other place. Most people around here are of the opinion at this point that the other place, being consumed with the matter of the GST, will undertake little or nothing else, while that is being considered. Further, it is expected that that consideration will conclude and the sound and fury will finally subside sometime before Christmas. Do you know what happens then, Madam Speaker? The House prorogues and all things on the Order Paper die.

So one of two things is going to happen, Madam Speaker. Either this bill will be stuck in the Senate and die with all the other unfinished business there, in which case what is the point of ramming it through the House? Or the GST fight will continue in the Senate, in which case we have plenty of time in this place to give this bill the full consideration it warrants.

But the government is determined that this massive alienation of the assets of the people of Canada, this turning off of those opportunities which Petro-Canada could represent to the Canadian people in the future, those opportunities to diversify our energy base away from the traditional hydrocarbons of oil and gasoline into far greener pastures, should be accomplished with a haste that is at least unseemly and, in my less charitable moments, I would characterize as obscene.

It is clear that the government is not to be dissuaded from this path. It is clear that, as is the case with most other matters that it has brought before this House, at least in my experience here, it is unshakeably convinced of the near divine wisdom of its proposals and is thus uninterested in consideration of either alternatives or of nagging problems within its own proposals. Presumably it believes them not to exist. But I must tell the government, Madam Speaker, that the Canadian people believe them to exist. The Canadian people can see what is going on in this House, they can see the overweening pride with which the government conducts its business in this place and the Canadian people, in the long run, will not tolerate it.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal, just briefly, with some of the statistics that were being used to indicate that there has been a lot of use of closure and of time allocation. Unfortunately, the member is correct, there have been a number of occasions when these were used. But I think if we look back to the period from 1980 to 1984, there were 25 different times that the government of that time, the Liberals, used time allocation and twice that they used closure.

In the subsequent four years, 1984 to 1988, this government used time allocation on 20 occasions and used closure on two occasions. But there have been, in this last two years, as the member has indicated, an unusual number of occasions when closure and time allocation were used. I think a person has to ask why.

Madam Speaker, it does not take a rocket scientist to figure it out. It is obviously considered by the opposition to be good strategy on their part to force the government to use closure or time allocation because it makes them look strong and they have the appearance of opposing. But the reality is that the government must pass its legislation. The people in this country demand it.

They do not understand why it takes so long for us to move legislation through the House. There are a few other things that people of Canada understand, but it is sometimes difficult to get the opposition to understand.

There is good reason for this bill to be passed now, and I will try to address that.

There has been good coverage through the legislative committee. It did have several days of second reading review. I think this government is fully cognizant of the fact that there are many members in this House who would like to speak to this bill.

In endeavouring to satisfy that demand, because we feel it is a legitimate one, we offered to extend the hours last week. That offer was refused by both opposition parties.

I think that tends to speak a little bit to what I consider the seriousness of their desire to really speak meaningfully to some of this legislation.

I would like to address briefly why it is necessary that we pass the bill now. As the hon. member from Edmonton has indicated, it is the largest privatization in terms of dollars that we have undertaken in Canada. Many members would like to see it delayed, because they actually disagree quite aggressively with privatization.

We heard a number of witnesses in the legislative committee who directly addressed this. They told us as a committee: "Yes, you should get the bill through. You should put the minister in a position where he can deal with those shares as early as possible."

One of the witnesses, a financial analyst, termed it as a window of opportunity. The bigger the window we provide PetroCan and the investment community, the better their chances of returning optimum value for those shares to the Canadian taxpayers.

I think that is of great concern not only to the taxpayers but to every member in this House. It is a real window of opportunity. The witness talked about some of the current situations in Canada that we know affect the oil industry. We know it affects the share values.

We all know there is a crisis in the Middle East. Nobody knows exactly what the market response will be to it, but it is critical according to this witness that we set our affairs in order so that PetroCan, the government and the Canadian taxpayers can take maximum advantage of that window of opportunity.

I will keep it very brief, because my colleague has already discussed this. We held nine or ten committee meetings. We heard from 10 or 11 different witnesses and groups. There were a lot more people and we did group them, but we consciously tried to hear those people across Canada who the committee felt it was imperative that we do hear from.

We wanted to hear from people representing the environmental lobby groups, and we did that. We wanted to listen to investment dealers, and we did that. We wanted to get some legislative expertise advising the committee as to the PetroCan legislation, and we did have that.

In fact, we had a couple of visits from experts in that area. The committee desired to hear, and we were able to produce, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who gave excellent testimony to the committee.

We heard from the executive officers of Petro-Canada. We heard from two labour groups; one representing the Energy and Chemical Workers Union and the other from the Canadian Labour Congress. We heard from a number of other groups, including the Petro-Canada International Assistant Corporation, the Bureau of Competition, the Commissioner of Official Languages who wanted to express his desire to see the French language provisions stretch further than what the bill allowed and what we were suggesting.

We had other consultants and representation from the Canadian Life & Health Insurance Association who were encouraging us to eliminate some the restrictions that we had on the bill. We resisted that effort.

It was an excellent cross-section that the committee heard. We heard testimony for and against, but most of the evidence against the bill tended to address the concept that Petro-Canada should be used as a policy instrument. They felt that somehow or other to understand and to control any of our resources or any of our major industries, we have to own and control a full cross-section of that industry. The logic escapes me, but it seems to be so obvious to others.

That implies to me that, if we want to understand and control the forest industry, the government should be out there acquiring and owning interest in an integrated forest industry company that controls resources in different parts of Canada. People in the industry and across the country would say we would be insane if we felt that that was the only way we could get a window on the industry.

Another major industry I could mention briefly is the food industry. There is nothing probably more important, except the forest industry in Canada. It would imply that for the government to understand, to know what is going on and to control it, we should be owning large tracks of farms and ranches and food processors. Heaven forbid that we should end up investing in the golden arches across Canada so that we have a window on that industry.

With reference to the witnesses we heard from, the Minister of Energy, for one, spoke to it elaborately. I realize I do not have time to cover it completely. Bill Hopper is another. One of the most interesting witnesses was the former minister who I understand had a part to play in the original creation of Petro-Canada as a government agency, Marc Lalonde. Just recently he was asked if we require Petro-Canada as a window on the industry? His response was: "We have developed in the government in the Department of Energy and the National Energy Board certainly a much greater knowledge about the industry than there was in the sixties and seventies." I could go on.

He covered consumer protection, energy prices, and the public policy role. His answer was: "No, no, no. We do not require PetroCan as a window on the industry or for us to know and understand this industry."

I realize my time is up. We do need to get this bill through. The window of opportunity is now. We have heard from the experts and I look forward to the ensuing debate.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on time allocation on a very important Canadian bill, one which marks the demise of Petro-Canada in Canada.

I say this because we are debating at present the rights of Parliament to have a debate. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands has already spoken about the time that has been spent in debating this bill. We have not had ample opportunity in my opinion to do away with Petro-Canada.

This government does not care about the rights of Parliament to debate. It does not care about the rights of Canadians, through their parliamentarians, to have a say in the policy of Canada. It was only 10 years ago that the very issue of the election was Petro-Canada and our National Energy Program. Canadians said yes to Petro-Canada at that time.

By using time allocation, the government is beginning to show Canadians why it has made Parliament an useless instrument as far as Canadian policy goes. I think that in this bill there should be an open vote. I think that Canadians should be able to tell their parliamentarians what they want from the government and they do not have that ability. We do not have an ability in the House to have a vote of all the Atlantic members together against an issue that the government may be proposing.

We only have a right to get up in two hours of debate and say that the process is wrong. It is wrong that the government cuts out the debate on such an important national company. It shows the complete disregard that the government has toward any process here in Canada. I would go on to say that it shows that the government is intent on destroying everything that has been made to make us a country called Canada.

In six years of government this Prime Minister has brought forward policies that have ended our ties as Canadians and brought about an adversity in regions that our ancestors in this hallowed place worked hard against. It was to try to make a place called Canada.

Petro-Canada had that very goal. It was brought into force at a time when Canadians needed protection in the oil and gas industry. We still need that protection, but the government says: "No, we will privatize everything or we will get rid of it."

Take the trains, for example. They went east and west, or west and east. We do not have them. Take Air Canada. The government privatized it. We used to have an airline that was first around the world, first in Canada for service and for safety. What do we find now? We do not have even two airlines that can exist in Canada because the policy of the government has been to go right along with the U.S. and deregulate.

The government has done it in the fishery, a natural resource that is now privatized. To what degree? My colleague from Newfoundland can tell me how much he thinks, but I would venture to guess that the fishery in Canada is probably privatized to about 80 per cent if one took the whole range of fish. The government is forcing our fishermen on the east coast in less than a week to make a decision on the livelihood and the role that their enterprise will play. Boats under 45 and boats over 45 must choose from a package of 100 pages sent out to them last week. They have not seen it before and they must choose by tomorrow as to what will become effective January 1. Of course they are confused, but that is exactly what the government wants—confusion in the west, confusion in Ontario, confusion in Quebec, confusion in the east, and it will govern. It will sell Canada short. That is what is happening in this bill.

Why? The Prime Minister does not come in to answer the questions on that. He will give you a smoke and mirrors discussion on what he sees as the role of Canada.

I think we should be given time to go home over Christmas and the government members should be made to ask their constituents whether they want to see Petro-Canada, the only oil company left in Canada, go to the U.S. We are giving 25 per cent ownership in this bill to foreigners.

We used to have expertise in air. We used to have expertise in oil and gas. We were respected around the world for our policies that made us Canadian, from east to west, north and south. But we had a goal as Canadians. The government is tearing that goal apart.

In the east we do not know where we will be after June 1990 because this Prime Minister does not want to give us any direction as to where he wants to see Canada go. He wants to see everything gone. He wants to see his big friends in the United States take it over, just like Petro-Canada and just like what is going to happen to our airline industry, in the end, with a minister who will bring in open skies that will go north-south instead of east-west or west-east-north-south within Canada. This government is tearing everything apart.

Let me just repeat that in our process—and it has certainly been shown up in six years—there has been no consultation with the Canadian people. There is no consultation by this government with its big majority to put an onus on the government back-benchers to go home and ask the people if they approve of the policies that are coming forward.

We are going to have so many parties in Canada that it will destroy Canada by making it into small regions instead of a strong federal system that can compete with all countries of the world. We used to be able to compete with all countries in the world. In oil and gas, we had a spot, not because of Mobil or any of the big U.S. multinational companies, but because the government had given Petro-Canada the ability to sit at the same board tables as the multinationals.

But not this government. This government says: "We'll privatize it." It will privatize it at a time when we are going through a potential energy crisis in the Middle East; when we are in a recession so that only the big income earners, who are not here in Canada except for the few millionaires who are friends of the government and for whom it has provided over the period of six years; when Canadians themselves are having increased oil and heating costs on the east coast that are incredible; and when incomes are going down as people are being laid off because of the readjustments that are happening as a result of the free trade agreement. The manufacturing sector is going out the window, just as this government likes to see all its policies go—out the window and down into the United States.

It is time Canadians started to know that every one of us have a constituency office and every one of us should be listening to our constituents. I would offer that every one of us in the House should be telling our constituents the exact position that their member of Parliament feels on a certain bill. If we were honest with the Canadian people and told them what the objectives of this legislation are, we would find a greater result right across Canada in terms of a bill such as this and in terms of a cut-off on such an important issue as a natural resource that is ours in Canada.

This government does not care about resources. It says: "Whoever is the highest bidder, we will give it to them, as long as they are our friends. If they are not our friends, we will give it to the second bidder. But we are not going to look much further than that."

In the two years that I have been back, I have seen it in the Post Office; I have seen it in the CBC, and I blame the CBC to a certain extent for some of their own cutbacks— I have seen it in Air Canada; I have seen in it with the trains; I have seen it in the fishery which is at our door-step. The government cares nothing about the policy as long as it can privatize a resource.

I know my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I feel very strongly about a time allocation that the people of Canada will not have an opportunity to voice their concerns because their members of Parliament are perhaps not even explaining it to them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this morning with regard to Bill C-84 and the privatization of Petro-Canada.

• (1200 )

I also had the opportunity of being a member of the legislative committee that reviewed the bill clause by clause. Indeed, we heard from quite a number of witnesses.

What I would like to bring to your attention today, and to indeed the attention of all my colleagues in the House, is that we had about 35 names of witnesses that were proposed from all the members on the committee, which we reviewed very carefully.

We did submit invitations to many of those witnesses. It was unfortunate that some could not come, or were unable to come for reasons which I will not refer to today. Out of the group, we did hear from nine. It was quite a balanced group.

There were some who were very much against the privatization, and I would like to review some of the reasons that they felt the company should remain in control of the government. Of course, there were some witnesses who were for the privatization.

I happen to come from Calgary which is in Alberta and happens to be one of the main producing provinces with regard to fossil fuels, mainly oil and gas. I guess we could say that 90 per cent of our oil and gas does come from the province of Alberta. We are particularly concerned that the total petroleum industry in general is a very healthy one and one that runs with no government intervention.

I speak of no government intervention. Let me clarify that the environment is very important. As we heard earlier—about an hour ago—the Minister of the Environment brought forth the green plan, and I have to commend him for it. Obviously fossil fuels in the emissions are problems.

No matter if the company is a Crown owned corporation or, indeed, if it is a privately owned corporation, it is going to be subjected to the same rulings, constrictions, hearings, observations, criteria and laws of the country.

Whether it is a Crown corporation or private, it will not make any difference. That was one particular issue that was brought forth with regard to the committee hearings.

In another area, it was mainly the fact of security of supply and a Crown corporation could guarantee security of supply. Actually, it is quite the reverse. A Crown corporation cannot guarantee security of supply. The one thing that is so very important is the capital that is needed to explore, develop and produce the hydrocarbons.

It is very expensive, more so with the synthetic type of oils, oil sands and, of course, in our frontiers it is more expensive than the western sedimentary basin.

Aside from that, the fact is that security of supply depends upon the petroleum companies exploring, developing and producing. Petro–Canada presently is quite strapped for funds, and a privatized company would really enable them access to financial markets.

In that case, it is going to make them directly more competitive with the industry. They are going to be able to become more aggressive in pursuing business opportunities.

I know it is hard for some people on the other side to understand, but just one little small word of wisdom is that these companies are in the business to sell oil and gas. When a barrel of oil or an MCF of gas is sold, it has to be replaced.

In order to replace it, a great deal of capital is required. What we are doing here, after a great deal of consultation, is allowing Petro–Canada the freedom to go out and access the capital. We are certainly cutting the apron strings to the government with regard to the financing.

That is not really new, because its mandate was changed in 1985 when it was told to operate within the private industry with no more government funding.

For security of supply, it has a far greater opportunity. With regard to the environment, it will be subjected to the same rules and regulations. I heard an hon. member just a few moments ago speak about Canada selling itself out. There is nothing further from the truth. In Bill C–84, there are qualifications for foreign ownership at 25 per cent. Indeed, no one person can own more than 10 per cent. So, I think the minister has done an excellent job in maintaining control in Canadian hands.

As to accusations that this government is selling out Canada, nothing could be further from the truth. The open skies project that the hon. member mentioned is not a fait accompli. We are holding consultations across the country on the open skies, as is the U.S. The consultations include people from all industries, labour unions, municipalities, airports and provincial governments. It is through these consultations that the ground rules for negotiations will take place. We have not said that there will be open skies. What we are doing is formulating the basis for negotiations, and if it is not good for Canada it will not go through. There is absolutely no way that we would sell out our industries.

We know in the airline industry that perhaps there is not a level playing field, but do not get the idea that because of a proposal, it is a fait accompli. That is simply not the truth.

In the other area about selling out Canada, I remember in December, 1988, the debates on the other side with the free trade deal. Madam Speaker, you know perfectly well that the free trade deal—and it is actually better management trade with the United States—is probably the greatest thing this country has.

We have watched over the last few weeks as the negotiations at GATT failed because of the high subsidies coming from the European market. But, what did we hear in December 1988? "Go to the GATT. That is where you should handle your international trade obligations, put all your eggs in one basket". We said: "No deal, we are not putting all our eggs in one basket. We will look to our greatest trading partner, which happens to be south of the border and you will live to see the day that this country and all Canadians will be grateful that we do have a Canada–U.S. trade agreement".

Not only that, but as the Europeans gather together in 1992 to form a trading bloc, you will see the western hemisphere pull together. When you put 400 million people with the 300 million people in North America, that is 700 million people to compete with the 350 million in Europe.

Let us get back to PetroCan, because it is really what we are debating today. I have to say that the prices of gasoline, oil and natural gas have nothing to do with this government or this bill. We have moved to a free market system, which is exactly the way it should be. If the price of petroleum in the free market goes up, the price of Canadian petroleum goes up. If the price in the free market system goes down, Canadian prices go down.

There is one thing I would like to see, and hopefully it may come about through the petroleum industry. This is the change of price at the pump. It is really relatively slow, but in some other countries it is last in, first out. This means that you see the price rise immediately and consumers may better understand why gasoline prices are going up and down. Right now, we have a 60 day to 90 day lag with the oil that is in the pipeline. So, the reflection of price changes are not seen at the pump for 60 to 90 days, and that is difficult for some Canadians to understand.

Moving to a free market system and a freed up privatized Petro–Canada will enable the company to compete and, after all, what this government is based upon is private enterprise. We should certainly not be holding oil companies under government intervention with regard to expanding their industry.

I am very pleased to participate and want to conclude by saying that we heard from many witnesses on both sides of the question in committee. I feel there has been a very fair hearing and it is time to get on with debate.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member from the government side was speaking and saying that there has not really been that great a change in Canada with the government's policy relating to Crown corporations, I was thinking about any number of communities, say, Grand Falls, Windsor, Botwood, or Gander, Newfoundland, and about a person sitting at home, right now, in one of those smaller communities and about what that person is thinking.

Well, the first thing that comes to mind about Crown corporations, since this government took over, is that the government sold the telephone company. It sold Terra Nova Tel. Now, when he picks up the telephone to make a telephone call, it is no longer a federal Crown corporation that he is dealing with. He is no longer dealing with "Information" or an operator who might be just next door. That Crown corporation was sold. This person looks down the street, while he is using his telephone, and he sees the place where the post office used to be. This is another Crown corporation and it has been replaced by an outdoor mailbox that he tries to get open when the weather turns cold. The government now sends around the names of various de–icing fluids and there is a hotline; it is nice that he has a hotline in the middle of the winter, to phone if the de–icing fluid does not work on his mailbox. There is 24–hour service and if he phones that number, somebody comes and opens his mailbox.

So the telephone company, a Crown corporation, has been sold. The post office, another Crown corporation, is gone; it has been replaced by an outdoor mailbox. Now, Madam Speaker, this same person worked in Bishop's Falls, a short distance away, where the railway used to be. The tracks are now being taken up. This is another Crown corporation which has been taken away since the Government of Canada came out with its policies on Crown corporations. He no longer can look up into the sky and see Air Canada planes flying; that Crown corporation is also gone from his airport of Gander.

As if that were not enough, when it comes to his telephone, that Crown corporation was sold by this government, when it comes to his mail, that Crown corporation has a new policy which means no more post offices, and when it comes to getting to his place of work, the railway has been literally taken up and the tracks have been all stacked, just outside of Botwood, with the railway ties also being taken up. Air Canada is gone from his community. Now that was not enough.

There is only one Crown corporation left that Newfoundlanders now deal with and that is the great job-creator in Hibernia, Petro-Canada. Now we have a bill before the House to sell Petro-Canada. So that is his telephone, his mail, the railway, the airline, and his place of work, gone.

There is only one thing which one can conclude from all of that. With all of those Crown corporations gone, there is one more thing that has to go. That is the Government of Canada, and it is going to be gone in the next election.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I must say that if you listen carefully these days—and it does not matter what part of Canada you listen to—you will hear a rumbling going on which people ought to know is the government's effort at a demolition attempt to destroy the country.

What has happened is that slowly but very systematically the Government of Canada is dismantling what Canadians understand and know as their country. There is a growing rage across Canada. It does not matter if you are from British Columbia, Newfoundland, or the Territories; Canadians knows that their country is eroding around them.

They know that one of the most effective ways the government has employed to destroy Canada, or as some people have put it to Americanize Canada, is to eliminate those structures and those institutions that have made Canada different from the United States, that have set us apart, that have been uniquely Canadian.

I am talking about the systematic dismantling of the Canadian airline system through the selling off of Air Canada, the removal and elimination of VIA Rail service through critical parts of Canada, the elimination of rural post offices throughout the country, and the dismantling of CBC. We find today in terms of those people who were in hiding in Kuwait that one of the elements which kept their spirits up and motivated them to hope was listening to CBC International. That, of course, will no longer be with us after April 1. The Canadian presence globally through CBC will be dismantled.

We have seen whole sets of Canadian institutions destroyed, eliminated, curtailed, cut back as a result of this government's systematic sort of methodical dismemberment and dismantling of Canada. That is why when people today are asked, "What do you think of the present Mulroney government", they laugh. This isn't a government; it is almost some foreign agent at work in terms of dismantling what we built up over the decades.

We find that in the government's rush to eliminate one of the most critical institutions in terms of differentiating Canada from other countries as a major oil producer, almost every other oil producing country in the world has a national oil company like Petro-Canada. In some countries, as in the Middle East, their Crown corporations control all of their oil patch. Other countries control portions of it.

There is hardly any oil producing country in the world that does not have a version of Petro-Canada, and for a good reason. They want their citizens to benefit from this fossil fuel wealth. They want to have an eye on the industry. That is why we introduced Petro-Canada. Unfortunately, once the mandate was created, it did not operate as a lot of people thought it ought to operate in terms of being different than Mobil Oil, Chevron, Shell, or whatever.

Then the Conservatives decided to give it a very specific mandate and said: "Don't operate any differently than any of the private sector corporations". Then of course, Canadians wonder why we have this corporation which operates exactly like Shell Oil operates its companies. Other countries do not do that. Other countries operate their Crown corporations differently, and so they provide a whole range of additional services to their citizens.

Then government members hear that 60 per cent of Canadians do not want to privatize Petro–Canada, so they quickly start to move legislation through because they know when Canadians hear the arguments against this, more and more people will be mobilized against this government's action like they are against the GST and most other actions of the government.

What do we see? We see the government introducing closure. This government is so used to bringing in closure that it has become a way of life. Closure has now become a regular way of doing business because this government is anti–democratic. It does not believe in a parliamentary system. As a matter of fact, this government finds the parliamentary system an absolute nuisance.

If you find the traditions and the time honoured approach of Parliament to be a nuisance, what do you do? You use closure and muzzle debate. You do not allow members of your own party to talk. You do not allow members of the opposition parties to present their views. You try to manipulate the news and the debate. You try to propagandize all the information that comes out, as we are seeing today with the green paper in terms of the incredibly sophisticated propaganda machine that is already at work.

There were three PR firms hired to put the right spin on the dream paper to give the people of Canada the illusion that the government actually cares about the environment. Canadians are not being fooled. They are bright and knowledgeable people. They can see through all this smoke and mirrors, fancy dancing and propaganda machines that the government continuously tries. If the government would only do a good job, then the people of Canada would support it; but it would rather put fancy spins on what it is doing.

Look at what we are doing today. Once again the government introduced closure. It introduced closure at second reading. My gosh, we only had three days to talk about the principle of dismantling and privatizing the largest Crown corporation in Canada with assets nearly $6.7 billion. After three days, it said that it had heard enough, that it did not want to talk about it any longer. It wanted to jam it into committee and then manipulate it through committee and so on, and it did not work. It tried to get a deal, deal, deal. It tried to roll the dice on this one and tried to make a deal. It wanted us to speak a few hours into the night and so on. It was absolutely ridiculous.

Of course there is no co–operation when it tries to dismantle Petro–Canada. Why on earth would we co–operate and facilitate the dismantling of what has become one of the critical symbols of our whole country? But this is nothing new. Look what the government has done to the GST.

Let me make a prediction that within a matter of hours the Conservatives in the Senate will pull some anti–democratic, anti–parliamentarian, absolute jackbooted, dictatorial, totalitarian technique, as they have done in the past, to jam the GST through the final stages in the Senate of Canada. Look at what they have done in this House with the GST. They brought in closure at second reading and then put it into the committee.

Then we saw an absolute spectacle of embarrassment when the chairman of the finance committee said: "I have to create a whole new set of regulations and rules because there is no way I am going to be able to move this using legitimate parliamentary procedure." He created a whole set of new rules. At least he had the courage to apologize to this House, which he did. He apologized for this unparliamentary behaviour. The whole matter had to be sent off to a committee because it was so irregular. That is how it got to the committee, because he could not use legitimate parliamentary procedure to do it.

An hon. member: What?

Mr. Riis: The GST. Then at report stage they brought in closure and then at third reading they brought in closure. Then it went off to the Senate and we saw an absolute abandonment of any shred of concern for democracy for the parliamentary tradition. Again, the Conservatives in the Senate, after abusing and abusing the parliamentary system in this House, are now doing exactly the same in the upper chamber.

This is a government that dislikes democracy. It dislikes the parliamentary system. It dislikes the traditions and the principles of the democratic parliamentary tradition. It uses what is at its disposal time and time again, more than any government in Canadian history. Over the last few months, it has said that it would impose this unpopular agenda on Canadians, that it would jam this legislation down their throats, and that the best way to do it would be to minimize debate so that it could fool the maximum number of Canadians so that they do not understand what the government is doing. Therefore it is going to use closure at every opportunity.

We ought not to be surprised that once again, while debating this incredibly important piece of legislation, the government is going to curtail debate. Here we are, having spent a handful of days, and I mean a handful of days, discussing the most elaborate, massive privatization effort in Canadian history. The minister responsible for privatization has announced that it is going to tolerate only one more day at report stage and one more day at third reading. Madam Speaker, you have given me an indication that my time is nearly up, but in closing let me say that Canadians realize that we have an elected dictatorship now where the government as elected says that it will do anything it wants to the people of Canada for four to five years.

When the people of Canada have had the opportunity, whether that opportunity is in Vancouver Island, in Labrador or anywhere in between, to indicate how they feel about these brutal totalitarian tactics, we have seen them indicate time and time again that they would turf this government out so far as to eliminate the Conservatives from the political landscape of Canada for years and years to come, in an effort to restore what all Canadians feel so strongly, and that is, our parliamentary tradition and our democratic way of life.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Madam Speaker, I must say that one of the more difficult tasks we have here in the House is to listen to the tiresome hyperbole that we have just listened to, talking about dictatorship and tyranny and so forth.

I would like to go back a bit and remind the member for Kamloops that the parliamentary process really begins not with the tabling of legislation here in the House but on the election trail when each one of the parties lays out its platforms and its intentions for a legislative program in the House. That is when we tell people what our agenda is going to be.

One of the traditions we have re-established in this Parliament that our Prime Minister has brought back to this Chamber is that the legislative agenda has a resemblance to what we talked about on the campaign trail, not like his predecessor, Mr. Trudeau, whose parliamentary agenda bore no relationship at all to the election campaign and the sloganeering.

We have brought back the basis of parliamentary democracy in that the campaign ought to introduce the ideas that we would bring forth in the legislative program. The member for Kamloops does not want to pay attention to this. He has a group of people going across Canada talking to Canadians about parliamentary reform. Meanwhile, that party over there frustrates Parliament here in the House by denying the government its legislation.

I was on the McGrath commission with their party representative, the member for Winnipeg—Strathcona. We took a trip to England to talk to members of the mother of Parliaments who said that over there in the election campaign each party has its agenda. They call it a manifesto, and when the party is elected the opposition party says: "Okay, you are now bringing in your manifesto in the form of legislation. You are entitled, on the basis of your election campaign, to your legislation. Provided that your manifesto laid it out and your legislation matches the manifesto, you are entitled to it".

I think members opposite know there is no secret at all across Canada that we have consistently campaigned on the notion that we believe in privatization. That is no secret. I think neither opposition parties will be fooled by any kind of a notion that we did not believe in that. We believe in privatization.

Back in the 1979 government of the right hon. member for Yellowhead, we brought in a program to begin privatizing Petro-Canada. It should not come as a secret or surprise to these people that we would want to do that.

In the United Kingdom, when they want to talk about the legislation resulting from their manifesto, the parties get together in the House of Commons and agree that the government is entitled to table legislation but the opposition is entitled to lay out its philosophy, its ideology, and its opposition. But the government is still entitled to the legislation. They decide how much time should be given to the debate. They decide if it should be four or five or six, not days, not weeks, but hours—five hours for a debate. Debate on the biggest pieces of legislation in the British House of Commons lasts four, five, or six hours.

This member for Kamloops talks about tyranny because he has not had several weeks to debate a bill, even though we have campaigned on it, even though it is an integral part of our philosophy, even though he knew we would want to do this. He does not believe that the government is entitled to its legislation.

I want him to know that this government was not elected to introduce or enact a socialist agenda. His objection to the legislation is that it does not conform to his ideology. He is entitled to his ideology and his beliefs but we were not elected to introduce his ideology. We were elected to introduce and enact ours. Privatization is an integral part of our philosophy and we are entitled to it. As a truly democratically elected majority government, we are entitled to this legislation.

I do not know why he gets so frustrated and why he introduces all the hyperbole, as did my friend from Gander, "Where is Air Canada gone?" I went home last Thursday and my boarding card said "Air Canada" on it. It had the famous red and white colours. I think all the personnel were Air Canada personnel. I think Air Canada is still flying. Why is it any less Air Canada that there are private shares held rather than public? I think Air Canada is there.

By the way, he says, "Where is the post office corporation?" I believe it was the Liberal Party, the Liberal government that privatized and made that a Crown corporation, took it out of the government portfolio and made a Crown corporation out of it. I think it was Andre Ouellet, as a matter of fact, who did it. Now he says, "Where are all the post offices?" I think they are still there. They have not been taken away.

We believe in this. We believe that privatizing Petro–Canada is good for Canada. I remember when the original bill was first brought in. My friend across the way who represents the farming community remembers when it was brought in. It was supposed to be a window on industry. I think the initial capital infusion was $500,000 back in about 1975. That was the window on the industry. Now we are talking about $5 to $6 billion. Some window. We think that privatizing Petro–Canada will be good for the company and it will be good for Canada.

My friend from Calgary who spoke just a few minutes ago pointed out one of the very important needs of Petro–Canada, and that is a cash infusion. We cannot keep injecting new government capital into that corporation. The people of Canada now know that the government—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): They don't need money.

Mr. Friesen: The member for South West Nova says they do not need money. Tell Bill Hopper they do not need the money. They need the money. The people of Canada know the Government of Canada does not have the cash to throw into that corporation. However, if we do privatize it, if we allow the people of Canada to buy shares, there will be a fresh infusion of cash into that corporation that it could not get any other way.

I want to ask members opposite a very simple question. What is it that creates this marvellous transformation of a company that if it is a Crown corporation, a government–owned corporation, what is it that creates this great transformation of humanity that makes it so much better if the management of the corporation are all of a sudden government employees? Why are government employees running a corporation so much better than private employees who are subject to a board of directors elected by the company, by the shareholders? What is it that makes the president or the board of directors of a government–owned corporation so much more humane, so much more imaginative, so much more generous than if it were a privately–owned corporation?

Does some magical thing take place when that person takes his orders from the government? Would it not be better to have a company like this removed from the government agenda and let it run its own agenda based on the marketplace, without political input, or in some cases political interference?

Would it not be better to have it market driven and let its agenda be driven by the marketplace rather than by an agenda of a political party, whatever political party is in office? Would it not be a more wholesome company if it were driven that way, rather than by the agenda of some people who are elected and have their own agendas rather than a market driven agenda?

I say to hon. members that we have been elected on an agenda of a marketplace economy. I have made that freely known in every campaign I have run in and I have run in five. We have always made that known. We are bringing in a legislative agenda on the basis of our political campaign.

The government is entitled to its legislation. The opposition is entitled to voice its opposition. It has no business frustrating it and forcing the government to bring in time allocation.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate concerning time allocation on this bill.

I have listened with great interest to the speakers. There was an indication that somehow debate is being stifled in this particular matter. The record shows that there have been four days for second reading and approval in principle of this particular bill. There were 18 speakers, nine of whom were opposition members.

The legislative committee held nine meetings and heard from 11 witnesses, as we heard previously. Obviously, nine amendments were also discussed there. There was an opportunity to discuss the various aspects of this bill. Currently, at report stage, there have been 18 speakers; 15 of whom were opposition members.

We have gone through a process, and we will continue to go through a process with regard to this particular bill. There certainly is no intent on the part of the government not to have an orderly debate. Also, the government has the responsibility to get its legislation through and make sure that it is passed.

I look at the particular bill itself, the privatization of Petro–Canada. There has been mention made in the House about the privatization and a comparison made to Air Canada. I had the opportunity on Thursday last to be in Montreal when Air Canada appeared before a committee euphemistically known as the open skies committee.

It was a treat to see a company which is dynamic, ready to approach the problems that will result and the opportunities that will be presented a company that has private shareholders, that feels that it can compete in any market and wants the opportunity to take part in that competition.

There was some reference to certain conditions that they would like to see put forward so that they could compete more adequately in the United States market. They were not unreasonable requests, but they came before us and said: "Yes, we want the opportunity to compete. We feel that we can do it. We feel that we are a vibrant, alive company and we just want the opportunity to be able to compete in any market."

That is encouraging to see. It is not a company holding back, saying: "We cannot take chances. We cannot take part in these opportunities that present themselves." We know that with the globalization of the world markets, more and more competition is coming to the fore. These companies are going to have to be able to respond to that competition.

In that regard, the bill before us will take Petro–Canada into a private situation with private investors throughout Canada. It will give these investors the opportunity to invest in a vibrant Canadian company.

There has been mention about the dismantling of Petro–Canada. Nothing could be further from the reality of privatization. Privatization allows an infusion of capital into these companies. It takes it off the backs of the taxpayers to provide the extra capital that may be necessary.

We know the financial position of the federal government at the present time. This privatization is a benefit to the federal government as well as a definite benefit to the company itself. It is better able to compete. It can have a fresh infusion of capital and it can go on and do the things it was set up to do. There will be no dismantling of this company as has been alluded to here, certainly just the opposite.

When we look at the original intent of setting up Petro–Canada as a Crown corporation, we must ask: Is the public policy initiative for this company still necessary? Should it be in a government controlled situation? I would submit that it certainly is not.

The original intent was to increase petroleum supplies and Canadian presence in the industry. Well, Madam Speaker, that has occurred. We moved from an interventionist aspect to one that allows market forces to freely take part and to allow the company to take advantage of the opportunities that present themselves.

We have to realize that the world has changed since Petro-Canada was originally set up. It has fulfilled its function, but it can fulfil its function better as a private company. As I mentioned, with the infusion of private capital and the board of directors being responsible for the company, that will occur.

Petro-Canada was also to act as an agent in any state to state trading. Apparently there has only been one contract ever signed, and that aspect has gone by the board over the years. So that particular public policy aspect for the company has disappeared as well.

We now get to what is the final matter. As has been mentioned, the company was to serve as a window on the energy industry. We have the various boards in place now that can monitor the energy industry, that can look into it. Obviously this is an expensive instrument to use as a window on the energy industry.

Petro-Canada has outlived all of its public policy purposes. With the necessity for an infusion of new capital and the flexibility that will bring when it is privatized, obviously it is important that this legislation get through this House and become law. This is what we are talking about with the time allocation motion.

There is also a question of time. This bill gives the minister, or whomever is designated, the opportunity to market the shares of Petro-Canada. Obviously, that has to be something that is looked at and done in a very timely fashion.

There are a number of safeguards built into the sale of shares. No one individual can own 10 per cent or more of the shares of the corporation. No foreign ownership can exceed 25 per cent. We have discussed that as well when the bill concerning Air Canada was before the House.

This is an opportunity for this company to go forward, to be able to compete and to still fulfil all the public policy objectives that were originally set out. It also unburdens the public treasury from any responsibility that it would have in that particular regard. That is very important in these economic times.

It is a very important bill. It is a bill that should go through this House and obviously is the reason for the time allocation motion that we see in front of us.

It has also been mentioned that maybe the Middle East crisis is going to create some difficulty with security of supply. As I mentioned, the whole world is coming to globalization and a market economy. We see that even in eastern Europe when they realized the futility of trying to have a centralized system and trying to control all aspects of what goes on within their companies. They realize that it has been a failure. It has not worked. They must allow the market to take part.

I see that you are indicating that my time is up, Madam Speaker. Again, with the safeguards that are built into this particular bill, with the opportunity for this company to have an infusion of capital and an independent board of directors, and the opportunity to go ahead in the petroleum industry, it is too important a bill to be bogged down in procedure in the House of Commons. There has been sufficient debate and we will have more. I certainly hope that this bill will go forward.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise today in opposition to the government's decision to invoke time allocation on a bill which certainly affects the lives of Canadians across the country. Why the government does not want a full and healthy debate on the bill is obvious.

I certainly would like to have had the opportunity to voice my concerns in detail on the privatization of Petro-Canada because this bill is a very complicated and detailed bill. This time allocation is denying me the opportunity to discuss in detail how the privatization of Petro-Canada will affect Canadians.

As my colleague suggested in committee, this bill as written states that Petro-Canada may not sell all or substantially all of either its upstream or downstream assets to any one person or group of associated persons. The question is how is "substantially all" defined. That depends on one's view of this definition. It may well be that medium-sized assets that are of national or strategic importance are being left unprotected by the vague wording of this bill. These assets may lose their commercial importance to Petro-Canada but their sale may well impact on the lives of Canadians across our country.

My riding of Malpeque on Prince Edward Island is a rural riding. Such decisions which may not appear to be substantial can really have a major impact on a small community. Such a decision was certainly made by this government when it closed our CFB Summerside. It may not have been a substantial decision when one looks at the enormity of the Government of Canada as a whole, but it had a substantial effect on the lives of many of us in Prince Edward Island. In fact, the after shocks of that decision are still being felt today.

Just last week when I returned to my riding, islanders were concerned about a decision that had been made by Holland College to discontinue adult education classes at Summerside and Kensington as of January, 1991. These classes had to be cancelled due to a shortage of funds. That shortage of funds is really due to two decisions made by the federal government. The first was the closing of the base. Because of that closure, a number of islanders, in an attempt to put their lives back together, enrolled in the Holland College adult education courses to better prepare themselves for finding a new job. This larger enrollment created an under-funding situation.

The second reason was the government's decision to cut back on the funding to the provinces for education. That also of course contributed to the shortage of available funds. Fortunately, the provincial government came to the rescue and provided the extra funding needed to keep these important educational courses alive in 1991. I commend the Ghiz government for its swift and timely action on this matter.

I also commend the students for having the courage and initiative to go back to school to upgrade their skills and knowledge. But, I certainly condemn this government for its policies which created this crisis in the first place.

I condemn the government today for imposing time allocation and so denying me an opportunity to speak in detail about the effects that this bill will have on Canadians, especially Canadians in eastern Canada.

In my province of Prince Edward Island, as in all provinces in eastern Canada, we are very dependent on imported oil. The continuity of supply of this non-renewable resource is paramount to our economic growth and prosperity. Across Canada, the energy demand for petroleum is about 41 per cent, which certainly is a significant figure. However, in Prince Edward Island, we are doubly dependent upon petroleum for a total of 75 per cent of our energy demand.

We are trying to diversify the energy mix in my province through efforts in such areas as the biomass energy field which involves the burning of wood chips at very high temperatures. This initiative has provided the Island with an environmentally friendly energy source, along with badly needed jobs. Unfortunately, these efforts have been frustrated by the government's cuts to alternative energy and conservation programs. This is yet another example of the government's complete lack of attention to my province of Prince Edward Island. This bill may very well place Prince Edward Island in an even more volatile economic position due to our dependency on imported petroleum.

I urge the government to consider the ramifications of its decisions on the real people out there. There is more to effective decision-making than simply adhering to the bottom line. This bill requires a thorough and full debate due to the complexity of the subject matter itself.

This morning I expected that we in the opposition would have an opportunity to address the concerns of our constituents, concerns that the government is ignoring and which the government is not allowing to be heard in detail in this Chamber.

It is no wonder that Canadians have lost confidence in this government. I certainly regret not having the opportunity to speak in full detail today on the privatization of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I cannot say I am pleased with having to speak on time allocation today, but I want the opportunity to do so because I think that we are faced here with an approach by the government to push through the privatization process of Petro-Canada as quickly as possible. It recognizes that there is a growing wave of discontent across the country relative, not only to this particular bill, but to many other government actions.

This bill is the largest privatization in the history of this government or any other government and covers assets of $6.7 billion on which it will take a loss. There is no way that, under the structure that is being established in this bill, it will get this amount back.

If we had a concern for Canada's well-being, or if this government had a concern for Canada's well-being, it would be sure that there was ample opportunity to discuss the pros and cons of this bill before we got rid of Petro-Canada.

The resource that we are exploiting in Canada, the oil that is being exploited by Petro-Canada and other private corporations, does not belong to those corporations. It belongs to the people of Canada. It should be exploited in the best interests of the people of Canada.

We do not believe—many people of Canada do not believe—that Shell, Esso, Standard, and all the multinational oil companies that do this exploiting are doing so in the best interests of the people of Canada. They do not believe that getting rid of Petro-Canada is the best way to have at least some inkling into what is there.

We recognize that Petro-Canada has, to some extent, ceased to be an instrument of public policy. But this also is a planned approach on behalf of this government.

This company which has a good solid commercial base and more assets than most other companies do have in Canada has not showed up as being as possible as Shell or Imperial because the government has made it a policy approach that it should not show up as being entirely competitive with these companies. The only way it could defend the sale of it was if it was not making a return on its investment.

It has not been a particularly good investment, but it is very difficult at this time to say that we should sell this company. Judging whether or not Petro-Canada has some reason for being in the future, as far as the Canadian people are concerned, it is very difficult to say yes or no to that, because we, as legislators, must be sure before we make that kind of a move that what we do is in the best interests of Canada. We have not explored the possibilities. We have not spent the time necessary to do so.

The Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources did a fairly comprehensive study on Petro-Canada. Indeed, in the process, it made the recommendation that the privatization of Petro-Canada not be proceeded with until the federal government has completed the process begun in energy opposites and has articulated an energy policy.

That is why I suggest that we, in this House, as the Parliament of Canada, are proceeding with this bill much too quickly. In fact, I think that the time allocation should be turned around to the extent that the government should withdraw the bill until it knows whether or not it really needs Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy.

In the six years that it has been responsible for Petro-Canada, the government has failed to use it. It has directly used it as an instrument of public policy, and it has directed Petro-Canada to operate as any other private sector oil company, except that it was not supposed to make any money.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will interrupt the member at this time. There will be 5 minutes left should he with to continue with his remarks after Question Period.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

BEAUSÉJOUR BY-ELECTION

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the beautiful riding of Beauséjour, Jean Chrétien and the faithful, local Liberal Party fashioned a great victory.

This is a victory for a courageous leader and also for all Canadians who are desperately looking for integrity and fairness in government. I say to these Canadians: Do not despair, in a few years the misery will be over. This is a victory for all Canadians, hoping for a real leader, one who will not hesitate to stand up for Canada and Canadian values, whether in western Canada, the north, the Atlantic, Ontario or Quebec.

This is a victory for all Canadians hoping for a real leader who will stand up for Canada and Canadian values. This is a victory for all Canadians who want a leader who will refuse to pay homage to American destiny by being head-waiter to the President of the United States. This is a victory for all Canadians who believe that the people, not the national media, are sovereign in this country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was disturbed in reading about the current case before the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal challenging that province's electoral boundaries. Nine university professors want to rewrite the political map based on representation by population. This would have serious repercussions in rural Canada.

It is often stated that our country's strength lies in our resources. Mr. Speaker, it would be more correct to state that the heart of Canada lies in the people who develop our natural resources. Our regions and its people are the essential part of this country that creates our wealth.

Throughout the ages, we have enjoyed representational democracy in this country, not rep by pop, but a hybrid of it. The Canadian democratic process has always allowed for a consensus among those regions of this country.

It is vitally important, whether we are talking about resource management, the environment, or the deficit, to have effective input from the heart of Canada.

We must resist the notion of rep by pop, Mr. Speaker, for the more responsible Canadian solution that has made this country strong and our parliamentary democracy an envy of the world.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment promised Canadians a green Christmas present. What we received today, with the tabling of the green plan, is a snow job.

As a public relations exercise, the green plan is a great success and, in view of the money spent on promotions, this comes as no surprise. What is surprising is that the government actually expects Canadians to believe that this expensive ploy will miraculously make Canada a world leader in environmental policy.

In an effort to instil a warm feeling at Christmas time, the government has hired not one but three public relations firms. Under the façade of consultation, the government spent $6 million on a glitzy, cross-country PR caravan.

The big sell on the environment, begun by the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, has become a big bust. The green plan is part of the supposed "good news agenda". Canadians see no good news in a document designed purely to deceive. The Conservatives have once again demonstrated that when it comes to governing, nothing beats a good ad campaign.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, last week, Mr. Yves St-Germain, the Montreal Urban Community's chief of police, stated that one of the causes of family violence was that men were shocked to see their wives leave the family home to go to work. His statement is one of many attempts to put the blame on women who work outside the home.

Mr. St-Germain's comments, which were made at a conference organized to coincide with the anniversary of the tragedy at the École polytechnique, prove that a typical male prejudice that would blame women for all men's misfortunes is still alive and well.

Mr. Speaker, coming from the chief of police of the fifth largest police force in this country, such statements are intolerable, and I demand the resignation of Mr. St-Germain.

BEAUSÉJOUR AND YORK NORTH BY-ELECTIONS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker, yesterday in central and Atlantic Canada, Canadians re-elected Liberals to the House of Commons. Our thanks and appreciation go to the people of Beauséjour and York North for their confidence and support.

Congratulations to our leader, the hon. Jean Chrétien, and Maurizio Bevilacqua for their great electoral victories. In both ridings, despite the multitude of candidates, the Liberals won with more than 51 per cent of the vote.

There are many members of this House who would have liked to receive that much of a vote in their own ridings in the last federal election.

Aboriginal people, westerners and northerners welcome back their long-time friend, Jean Chrétien.

From north to south, and east to west, the Liberals will continue to fight for Canada and the people of this great land.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Jean and Maurizio, well done. The best is yet to come.

GREEN PLAN

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, here are some of the measures proposed in the Green Plan. The government will reinforce existing partnerships and create new ones with aboriginal people and non-governmental organizations, including environmental groups. The same will apply to Canadian industry. Individual initiative will be encouraged, and funding for the Environmental Partners Program will be increased. The Environmental Choice Program and National Environment Week will also be maintained and reinforced. A national youth advisory committee on the environment and development will be established.

Furthermore, a Canadian youth secretariat on environment and development will prepare young Canadians and other young people for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to be held in Brazil in 1992. To support scientific research, a five-year action plan on environmental sciences and technology will be established. And Mr. Speaker, this is only the beginning. Congratulations!

BEAUSÉJOUR AND YORK NORTH BY-ELECTIONS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, two by-elections, two exhilarating victories for the Liberals in Canada: Jean Chrétien in Beauséjour and Maurizio Bevilacqua in York North.

The NDP's "Rae" of hope faded in Ontario last night with the Liberal landslide victory over the NDP in York North. Liberals are not only alive, but thriving.

Is the Conservatives' showing at the polls in Ontario an omen? Are they about to tie their rate of popularity to the rate of the GST? The by-election proved that the only things less popular with Canadians than the GST are Tories.

Liberals won both by-elections with over 50 per cent of voter support. This is the trend of the future. There is hope for Canada.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment's green plan, tabled in the House of Commons this morning, is little more than a feeble attempt at dealing with critical environmental issues facing Canadians today.

Despite the fact that the green plan is vague and promises business as usual for the immediate future, the essence of the plan hinges on adequate environmental assessment legislation. That legislation, Bill C-78, is currently in a House legislative committee where, to date, every single witness has criticized the government's bill, calling it inadequate and fundamentally flawed. There are plenty of reasons why Bill C-78 should be withdrawn and redrafted into a strong and enforceable environmental assessment bill.

None is more important than the fact that the green plan now relies on it for environmental protection. What we have here is an environmental plan that rests firmly on top of the San Andreas fault of assessment legislation. Without stronger initiatives for the assessment process, the inadequate green plan is meaningless.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, Canada's Green Plan was born out of a process of public consultation which began in March 1990. Canadians participated in information sessions in 41 cities and towns across the country. Recommendations were made by many representatives of the provinces and territories, municipalities, industry, unions, environmental groups, youth, natives, academics and religious organizations. In all, this process allowed for 10,000 people to present their views to government.

Canada's Green Plan is a strong response to the views and concerns of Canadians. It effectively adopts some 80 per cent of more than 500 recommendations that emerged from the national consultative session held in Ottawa in August.

The plan encourages participation of all Canadians. Canada's Green Plan will ensure a healthy environment for ourselves, our nation and our planet.

GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Green Plan will bear fruit. This is what we can expect in the months to come.

We should see tremendous progress in cleaning up our air, waterways and soil.

We should be able to reduce waste production very substantially and be far more careful in how we use our sources of energy.

There should be a definite improvement in the protection of wildlife and national parks. There should be better protection for the fragile environment of our northern regions.

In their development plans, companies will have to consider the impact their activities will have on the environment, just as today they would consider the cost of capital investment, manpower and equipment.

We are convinced that, on the basis of the criteria I just mentioned, the Green Plan will be very successful. Mr. Speaker. this is an action plan that will produce results, which will be a genuine test of our Canadian Green Plan.

BEAUSÉJOUR AND YORK NORTH BY-ELECTIONS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, Jean Chrétien is back!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchi: Back in the House of Commons which has been home to him for many a year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchi: Yesterday's overwhelming victories were confirmation of Mr. Chrétien's vision for a proud, independent, and above all, united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Bravo.

Mr. Marchi: His campaign was a campaign for Canada and a call for Canadians to still believe in themselves and in their country—

Some hon. members: Call the election.

Mr. Marchi: —despite the cynicism and despair they hold for their national Tory government.

Yesterday's winners were Jean Chrétien, Maurizio Bevilacqua, and the Liberal Party of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchi: By contrast, the loser was the Prime Minister of Canada who, as Leader of the Conservative Party, did not even have the courage to field a candidate in Beauséjour, and whose candidate in York North roughly equalled the same 7 per cent level of his GST.

Canadians spoke last night loud and clear. On behalf of the Liberal Parliamentary caucus, I welcome our two new Liberal members of Parliament, made in Canada for Canadians.

GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, the Green Plan is a giant step we must all take together to guarantee sustainable development that will benefit both the environment and the people of this country. The Green Plan focuses, organizes and channels efforts being made across the country to protect the environment.

During the next five years, additional funding totalling $3 billion will be released under the Green Plan. With the budgets for existing programs, this will mean a total of nearly $10 billion in federal spending on the environment during the five years following implementation of the Green Plan—

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robitaille: —in other words, a 50 per cent increase in federal funding in this area. This new budget is a clear demonstration that the Government of Canada considers spending on the environment as an investment in the health and economic future of this country.

Congratulations to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of the Environment and to the government!

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, forestry initiatives in Canada will suffer because of the lack of support for our forests and this government's green plan. In British Columbia, we were told to wait for the green plan to get an additional $300 million for forest renewal.

Instead we get recycled promises and no specific measures to help our forests.

The Tories have sold B.C. and other provinces a bill of goods, and in B.C. the forest minister took it hook, line and sinker.

The green plan's proposal for a personal contract to plant trees recognizes what Canadians already know: the Boy Scouts plant more trees than this government. The government should get on with the job of renewing expired forest agreements immediately.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, Canada's Green Plan makes history today in marking the first occasion that our country has committed itself clearly and comprehensively to the environmental imperative.

In so doing, we are recognizing that life in today's world demands two such imperatives—one environmental and the other economic—within which disciplines we must sustain our future development on earth.

The green plan identified eight strategic areas of priority and more than 100 specific initiatives to be aggressively addressed over the next five years. It truly is an action plan, but it is more than that: it is a profound statement of principal and philosophy about how we must live our lives on this earth if mankind is to survive.

HON. JEAN CHRÉTIEN

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, today is the beginning of the end for the Tory Party: Hon. Jean Chrétien is on his way, and to quote Mr. Chrétien: "We are going to start working to get rid of this terrible government".

Our leader will once again prove it is possible to be a francophone and be at home anywhere in this country. It is possible to be a French Canadian. Welcome to our new leader! Tories, on your guard!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, before asking my question, I want to say what a pleasure it is to rise on behalf of a caucus that as of last night was strengthened by a factor of two: York North where the NDP's ray of hope was dashed and Beauséjour where we elected the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Today, after much huffing and puffing, we have finally received the green plan.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: Its basic message is that of the Cheshire cat. How dare they clap as the environment of this nation goes down the drain.

Only a Tory party would clap over a plan that has the rest of the country crying. The basic message of this plan is straight out of the Cheshire cat in Alice in Wonderland. It says, and I can almost quote from the plan: "If you do not know where you want to go, then any road will get you there."

This plan has no vision. It has no coherence, and it has no legislation. This is not an action plan. Everything in the plan is subject to 18 months of consultation. Nothing is firm, and it is all subject to approval.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mr. Martin: All the Tories are doing, Mr. Speaker, is asking Canadians—

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, they are asking us to trust them. They told Canadians to trust them with day care. You failed us before. Why should we trust you now?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this morning we tabled the green plan for Canada. It is a comprehensive plan. It is a plan that was done in full consultation with Canadians. We had over 11,000 Canadians involved in the consultation process. It is a five-year action plan. It is a revolving plan. After year one, we will add year six.

It is a plan that addresses the concerns that we heard from all those Canadians who took the time and effort to participate in the consultations. It is a $3 billion plan: $3 billion of fresh, new federal money. That plan has been approved by cabinet and will be implemented.

• (1420)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, "$3 billion", said the Minister of the Environment. New money invested in the Green Plan—and I quote—"—represents 1/2 of 1 per cent of government spending over the next five years". Furthermore, all funding promised in the Green Plan is subject to cabinet approval, which means further discussions. There is no guarantee that the Green Plan will not vanish in to the fog, like the commitment to a national daycare program.

Next year, the government will invest more new money to implement the GST than to protect the environment. That is where its priorities lie. And now for my question: How can the Prime Minister justify spending more money next year to clean out our pockets than to clean up the environment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what we are trying to clean up is a situation that was neglected by the previous Liberal governments for 60 to 75 years.

I think Canadians will understand that when a government makes a formal commitment to cabinet to invest $3 billion—that is, three thousand million dollars—in a plan that is clearly defined with specific objectives, that government is taking the kind of action those people in the opposition have never seen before.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have the plan in front of me. For a year now every time this minister or his predecessor has lost a battle in cabinet, every time they have had to eat crow, they have come before the cameras to mouth words which are not their own. Then they would lamely tell us to wait for the green plan.

Today we have the green plan, and it is the environment that has lost. Once again the minister is mouthing the words but the voices are not his own. They are the voices of the minister of energy, they are the voices of the minister of finance, they are the voices—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: Given the fact that the minister is unable to voice his own opinion but has to voice that of other departments, will he tell us in a Tory government what is the difference between a Tory Minister of the Environment and Milli Vanilli?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all, when the member opposite was standing on his feet, he was waving what he claimed to be a copy of the green plan. It is a summary. I would be happy to send the hon. member a full copy so he knows exactly what we have in the green plan.

What is the difference between a Tory environment minister and anybody else in this country, particularly somebody from the opposite side? We care about the environment. We have done our homework. We have made the commitments. We have taken the action, and we have something to clean up the environment after all the years of neglect.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

At Geneva in September and again today in the green plan the minister soft-pedals the urgent threat of global warming and ignores the overwhelming consensus of scientists that we can and must cut carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent by 2005.

Why does the minister's plan contain action to help Canadians prepare for global warming instead of stopping it dead in its tracks and committing Canada to cut our emissions by 20 per cent by 2005?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government of Canada on this issue is well known. It is one that is leading most of the industrialized countries around the world.

We are going to make sure that emissions by the year 2000 are no higher than they were by the year 1990. We are moving to encourage international partners to reach a convention and protocols simultaneously at the Brazil conference in 1992.

We are one of the countries that is funding less developed countries to develop the necessary research so that they can be at the table as equal partners. We are right at the forefront of that. We have made the direct commitment in Geneva that we fully recognize that we would have to go further after the year 2000. We want to go further, but with all the rest of the international community following because this is an international problem.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Somebody has to lead, and it is obvious it is not going to be Canada now that this plan has been released.

The government has green words on alternative energy and conservation to slow down greenhouse gases, but it has a grey record since 1984 of savage cuts from $500 million to $50 million on alternative energy and conservation. We have a green plan today that is full of surprise packages which are full of hot air.

Is there one concrete action, one concrete funding program that has been approved by cabinet, now to cut greenhouse gas emissions and to improve the use of alternative energy and conservation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite talks about grey words. On global environmental security, we are talking about $575 million of new money to deal with the issue. To my mind that green paper means something in this community.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

For decades Canadian governments, led largely by the Liberals and now today by the Tories, have refused our repeated demands to get tough with corporate polluters. This failure, as the government knows, is a major contributor to the environmental crisis that we are in now.

This government had an opportunity through the green to change that. It had an opportunity to come out strong for some kind of enforcement, yet it proposes to give taxpayers' money to those very corporations that pollute our environment.

Will this government abandon voluntary compliance, bring in real legislation with real enforcement, and make the corporate polluters pay?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the NDP had read the green plan carefully, she would have found that in the Green Plan we are talking very specifically about four new pieces of legislation and fifteen new areas of regulation.

Having said that, I believe, while they are required, that we have to go further in inciting Canadians to work as one. We have to work as a federal government with provincial, regional and municipal governments, with the private sector, and with Canadians as a whole to reach the purposes that have been set out in the green plan. Regulations, yes. Legislation, yes. But co-operation first and foremost.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

I have read the plan of the government very carefully. Where the document states that we have to rely on voluntary compliance and that self-regulation is better than government regulation, that means there are no regulations, no environmental auditor, no staff assigned to monitor legislative regulations. It is this reliance on voluntary measures that has created the mess we are in, and the minister knows that.

In the last year, under the Environmental Protection Act, we have seen three prosecutions. Will the government announce today that it will bring forth whistle-blowing protection legislation so that workers in this country, if they want to act environmentally responsibly, will have their jobs protected? That would be a real directive.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the green plan we talk about the Drinking Water Safety Act, the Canadian Oceans Act, the Wild Animal and Plant Protections Act, the National Energy Efficiency and Alternative Energy Act. All of them are time targeted. All of them have been committed to by this government. All of them will be before this House in the very near future.

The green plan does promote a number of legislative measures and a number of regulatory measures, but the act also affords a measure of faith in Canadians. They have responded well in the past and will in the future because Canadians want their environment cleaned up.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, everyone wants the environment cleaned up, including the workers in this country who simply want protection so that they can participate in that cleanup without risk of losing their jobs.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. It is clear that like the previous government, this government has no intention of prosecuting companies that pollute the environment. Will this government at least announce the creation of a charter of environmental rights, so that Canadians can do what this government is not prepared to do itself?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what this government has done is table a concrete action plan for the next five years which involves new federal funding totalling $3 billion. That is what Canadians have asked us to do and that is what we have delivered. That is what it takes to get all Canadians at all levels of society involved, with us, with you, in a genuine environmental program.

• (1430)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. He keeps talking about the $3 billion in the green plan, which in fact is 40 per cent less than he had previously promised.

Isn't this $3 billion really an empty shell because not one nickel of that $3 billion has been specifically approved by cabinet for any of the projects mentioned in the green plan and, in fact, if any of these projects come before cabinet, they could well be axed by the Minister of Finance of the President of the Treasury Board and never actually see the light of day? Is that not the truth?

Mr. Andre: Three billion dollars means nothing to those guys.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a $3 billion empty shell must be a very huge shell indeed. We are talking here about $3,000 million of fresh new federal money for the environment, associated with a program that has been fully approved by cabinet. I am not sure where my hon. colleague is getting the information that he is using for his questions. This is fresh new money. It fulfils a major commitment of our Prime Minister and of this government to ensure that our environment is protected for the years to come.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister says it is fresh new money, but in fact Canadians will know it is the same old stuff from this government that cut the Canadian Wildlife Service by 25 per cent and cut $40 million from the energy division of the National Research Council, so it is the same old thing.

I want to ask the Minister of the Environment this question. The minister in his green plan asks Canadians to be friendly to the environment, yet he fails to exempt any environmentally-friendly products or services from the GST. How can Canadians take the government and its green plan seriously when the government intends to slap the GST on even environmentally-friendly products and services? Does this not show the government simply is not credible when it talks about its new-found belief in a clean environment for this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take the question because it gives me an opportunity to congratulate my hon. friend on a job extremely well done as leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and to congratulate the new leader of the Liberal Party who will be entering the House very soon.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, ever since the leader was replaced in June, the popularity of the party has sunk from 53 to 30 per cent. So the question is going to be, "Can Herb really be replaced?" I wish him well and congratulate him on the excellent job that he did for his party and for all of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Herb, Herb.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend asked his usual incisive question. He expressed a legitimate fear about environmental programs being—and I quote him—"axed by the Minister of Finance or the President of the Treasury Board".

This is presumably based on experience, because the federal-provincial water management program was cut. Grants to universities for water resources research were cut. The Pollution Abatement Technology Program was cut. The Arctic marine pollution program was cut, and the Wildlife Habitat Acquisitions Program involving purchases of land for habitat protection were cut, all on September 8, 1978, by the then Minister of Finance, Jean Chrétien.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, while we are in a congratulatory mood, maybe we ought to congratulate the Prime Minister for his marvellous performance at the polls last night.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: Where is your deposit, Brian?

Mr. Simmons: My question is for the Minister of Fisheries. The government's green plan is to focus national attention on the importance of the fisheries. It says it is going to have detailed federal strategies and operating procedures in place after 1992, all of which is commendable.

What I and thousands of fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada want to know is what are his immediate strategies between now and 1992, particularly this winter, to deal with the very unprecedented crisis those people are facing through no fault of their own.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): When the hon. member congratulates the Prime Minister on the results at the polls, I remember the poll of November 21, 1988. We thought they were excellent. Those that matter he tends to win. I like that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, concerning the important fishery issues to which the hon. member refers, as he knows, we have been consulting with the industry, the fishermen, the unions, the provincial Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, along with my colleagues who have been trying to find ways to help this winter.

It is important for those fishermen this year that we take measures to ensure that the groundfish management plan is adopted. We must also ensure the future of the fisheries in that part of Canada. We fully intend to do this.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my good friend the minister is smart to reflect on November 21, 1988 because that is the most pleasant electoral experience he and his crowd are going to have for a long time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: The Fraser River in British Columbia, as the minister will know, is home to the largest salmon run in the world. I noticed with pleasure that the minister has plans to double the fish population in that river over time. That, itself, is a commendable goal.

Will the minister make a similar commitment to work towards the doubling of Atlantic groundfish stocks over the same timeframe?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, by the way, I remember some predictions in May of 1987 about the November 21 election of 1988. Again, I saw the results.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would probably invite me to make a statement that I, this government, or the scientists, can double the fishery in Atlantic Canada.

Unfortunately, I am not a Liberal. I do not work miracles. We have to keep working hard with the fishermen and scientists to try to do what is possible. What is possible is to sustain the fishery. That is part of the green plan, to sustain the fishery in Atlantic Canada. With participation, we can all do this together.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

I am sure he is aware that the corks are popping in the boardrooms all over the country. This is a government that is standing by, without having an environmental assessment of any of the major megaprojects coming forward in this country. The green plan was supposed to be $5 billion with tough new anti-pollution laws. Unfortunately, it shrank and it has been deformed into a unsecured $3 billion political slush fund.

Will the minister explain the $2 billion that has been cut from the plan, and why the government has opted for voluntary compliance and self-regulation of polluters when that mindset is precisely what has brought about the decline and destruction of Canada's environment.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to explain the disappearance of something that was never there.

We have a $3 billion, five-year action plan. This is a plan to support other initiatives that this government has taken on the environment, such as Bill C-78, one that my hon. colleague has not been too swift to approve in this House or in committee.

This is a bill that will be very helpful in terms of environmental assessment. It comes on the back of a record that would be enviable for any industrialized nation in this world in the matter of environment.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. It seems that for over three years now, the Union des municipalités has been requesting $5 billion in order to improve municipal infrastructures, namely sewers and water systems. We don't see in the Green Plan any reference to that. Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us, first, how much money will be used to improve municipal infrastructures? Second, will he give us a schedule showing when this money will be provided to municipalities? Is the Green Plan only an empty plan?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Green Plan does address questions like the ones my friend raised. I believe he should know that municipalities are creatures of the provincial governments from a jurisdictional point of view and a constitutional point of view. This question has been raised many times and our gouvernment has frequently answered requests from municipalities.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government's green plan is nothing but a garbage heap of reused and recycled propaganda with reduced commitment to the environment.

As an example, this government's drinking water safety act does not apply to a single drop of drinking water flowing into Canadian homes and communities. The standard only applies to federally-controlled water sources. It does not apply to water treatment in 99 per cent of the communities across the country.

My question to the Minister of the Environment is this. Why did the minister not provide the leadership in obtaining federal–provincial agreements to protect drinking water for all Canadians?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when my colleague talks about a recycled plan, that the only thing that is recycled in this plan is the paper that it is printed on. Everything else is new and meaningful.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the provinces and the municipalities have been pushing this government for years to adopt an infrastructure program which would clean up sewage and water and share the responsibility among the three levels of government.

Instead, this government's answer was to provide and offer to sponsor a conference. Worse still, it wants to force another tax on drinking water of somewhere between 200 to 300 per cent.

Why is this government ignoring its environmental responsibilities and ignoring the co–operative approach in dealing with water and health concerns of Canadians?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be very clear for the record. One hon. member opposite says that we do not have taxes in this plan and another says that we intend to increase taxes by 300 per cent.

The record can read very clearly that we are not proposing any new taxes in this green plan. We are proposing a comprehensive action plan for Canadians for the next five years. The plan will evolve. We will add year six after year one and year seven after year two. It is the most comprehensive environmental plan for the country that has ever been put before the House ever since Confederation.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of the Environment. Canadian farmers are anxious to build an industry less dependent upon chemicals and pesticides. Other countries such as the Netherlands have already implemented specific positive measures. Yet today in your green paper all you can assure Canadians is that there will be another report in 1991.

Why the delay? Why are you continuing to put this industry at risk?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, quite the opposite. We are not putting the industry at risk at all. As recently as last Saturday, I have had meetings with the industry. It is very concerned about the chemicals it uses in agriculture, and it would like to work with us to figure out the best approaches to deal with the issue.

The chemicals are pollutants and the agricultural people in this country are conscious of that and they want to work with government to find the best solution. That is exactly what we intend to do.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member would want to put the question through the Chair. The hon. member for a supplementary.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. On page 28 of the green plan there is the following incredible statement:

> Native people are particularly at risk from environmental hazards due to traditional lifestyle patterns and food sources.

They are not at risk because of what they have done. They are at risk because of what we have done.

Why did the minister not deal directly with those companies and provincial Crown corporations which take turns in destroying our aboriginal communities?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all the interpretation of that quote does not do justice to the statement in general that was made in the green plan about the plight of aboriginal people. We are addressing the concerns of aboriginal people in the green plan.

In terms of their traditional living habits, obviously there is a problem. There is a problem because the food chain for aboriginal people is quite different from that one would find in a city such as Ottawa, Montreal, or Toronto. We are concerned about that. We need better science. We need more help. The aboriginal people have pointed that out to us and we are working very closely with them to come to the best solution possible.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the green plan projects new spending on energy conservation, renewables, and alternatives to counteract global warming of an average maximum $115 million a year.

Added to current spending, that will bring us up to about $155 million a year, just a little less than is spent on the nuclear industry all by itself, and less than 40 per cent of what was spent in these areas in 1984.

Given this unmistakable, unconditional surrender on global warming, will the minister agree that the green plan's section entitled "Anticipating and Preparing for Global Warming" represents the government's real strategy—do nothing substantive to stop it, but try to cope with it when it happens?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has made mention of energy efficiency. In fact, I recall just in the last committee meeting that he and I attended when we were discussing the Petro-Canada privatization bill that he in fact commended the government and the department for the leadership we had taken in alternate energy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and also relates to global warming.

In response to another question in the House this afternoon, the minister responded by alluding to Canadian leadership on reduction of $CO_2$ emissions. Yet the document, the green plan, states that the target is going to stabilize carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000. In the same document it states the government is going to have difficulty meeting the stabilization targets.

How is the government going to achieve this goal?

• (1450 )

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have restated the goal in the green plan. That is a goal that we have committed to internationally at Bergen, repeated in Geneva, and expanded upon, as a matter of fact, in Geneva. It is a goal that we feel confident we can meet.

From a scientific point of view, we know exactly how we can reach most of the goal. We are very confident in this area, as was the case, for example, with CFCs and the ozone-depletion problem that we will probably be able to surpass the goal.

The science has to be developed further and if the hon. member looks at the green plan carefully she will see that there is a very significant part of the Green Plan that deals with research and development and scientific work in the field of the environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the new Minister of the Environment is costing $2 billion in losses for those who are concerned about the environment. We can see that the departure of the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was a very costly proposition for the environment, Mr. Speaker, just to end up with a series of pious wishes. Can the Minister of the Environment tell me whether the provinces have been consulted and how much of these $3 billion are earmarked for Quebec?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to tell my colleague from Richelieu that the Green Plan was drafted in full consultation with 11,000 Canadians. In addition, we did have consultations with all provincial governments, and I can assure my colleague that this new $3 billon appropriation is a lot more than anything that had been envisaged in a plan such as this one. The funds will be distributed equitably to all regions of the country so that we may all do our share to reach our environmental objectives.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): My supplementary is for the Minister of the Environment. I said something about consultations with the Quebec government, Mr. Speaker, but I did not get an answer and three points needs to be clarified. For example, the report provided by the minister has precious little to say about research and innovation. And then PCBs will be dealt with in 1995, not 1992. I should also remind the minister that back in 1986 we were talking about investing $1.5 billion in wildfowl protection, but now we are down to $175 million for threatened species and historic sites and centres. Is a fire-sale priced environment the only thing the minister has to offer to Quebecers?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting that I did not answer his first question. I will give him a much more specific answer. Not only did I meet with the Quebec environment minister along with others, but I got to talk to him personally. I gave him an outline of the Green Plan and the Quebec Minister of the Environment was quite satisfied. There were further consultations about the finer points of the Green Plan and the Government of Quebec was satisfied with the approach taken by the central government.

HOUSING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to Minister of State for Housing. Recent newspaper reports indicate that the Government of Quebec is not particularly enthusiastic over federal policies concerning subsidized housing. Can the minister tell us why the federal government would favour Ontario to the detriment of Quebec when it comes to funding subsidized housing?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that Quebecers will get their fair share of available resources and that Quebec is not short-changed to the benefit of other provinces or territories. In 1990, Quebec got 26.9 per cent of all housing units, against 25.2 per cent for Ontario. As you would know, Mr. Speaker, my responsibility is to help any low-income family find decent living accommodation wherever it happens to live.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, CBC President Gerard Veilleux said today with respect to its cuts that "politicians, and in particular the cabinet, have the responsibility for keeping the CBC alive".

Will the Prime Minister admit that neither he nor the Minister of Communications even bothered to meet with the CBC President? They did not even bother to lift a little finger to do something to help the CBC before the savage cuts took place and were announced? Will the Prime Minister tell us why he and his cabinet abdicated their responsibility with respect to the public broadcasters?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Since 1936, Mr. Speaker, all governments, including this one, have assumed their responsibilities towards the CBC. Moreover, I met Mr. Veilleux on many occasions following his appointment as President of the CBC. He never mentioned that he wanted to discuss with me how the CBC budget should be spent and how the president and directors of the CBC should administer their own budget.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it would make a very interesting exchange between the Prime Minister and Mr. Veilleux to find out who was correct in this particular situation.

I have a supplementary question. This morning, the CBC was unable to assure hon. members that there would be no further cuts nor any other closing of television or radio stations. The Minister of Communications did nothing to protect the CBC at the Cabinet meetings. Would the minister admit that he did not even lift a finger to help the artistic community in Canada? If you did, what did you do? Tell me!

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Since 1984, Mr. Speaker, this government on many occasions increased the budget of the CBC. As for the future, Mr. Speaker, only the Liberal Party knows it.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, forest resources development agreements have not been mentioned in the green plan, yet they are fundamental to the survival of the forestry industry in Canada. The minister announced that he proposes to plant 325 million trees in our towns and cities.

Is the minister not confusing his priorities when there are some 220,000 hectares of harvested land that will not be reforested in Canada because they are not included in the green plan?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my hon. colleague is mistaken concerning the Green Plan and the regular programs. As far as reforestation is concerned, I suggest that the federal-provincial FRDA agreements have been quite successful so far.

The Green Plan is something else, an innovation which will benefit the Canadian people as a whole. Surely forestry was taken into account, but I would not want my hon. friend to confuse the resources allocated under the various federal-provincial FRDA agreements with those allocated under the Green Plan. It is something which is entirely separate in an effort to improve the situation. It is new money which is made available to Canadians for the development of forestry resources and for the use of the Canadian people as a whole. That is the intended goal of the Green Plan.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Must I remind you, Mr. Speaker, as well as the government that there are in Canada six forestry development agreements which are essential to the survival of the forest industry in this country which have not been renewed. Why were they not included in the Green Plan?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where my hon. friend was when we signed forest resource development agreements with New Brunswick and when we increased the budgets. Each and every Canadian province has received an offer and is currently looking into the federal proposal.

I can tell my hon. friend that contrary to what his party has done, since 1984 we have increased the forestry budget by 300 per cent, we continue to develop the Canadian forest and the Liberals are certainly in no position to tell us what to do in this area.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the minister's green plan hinges on strong, reliable and credible environmental assessment legislation. But, every witness appearing before the C-78 legislative committee has said that that legislation is flawed, inadequate, needs substantial amendment, or should be withdrawn and redrafted.

Is the minister prepared to go back to the drawing-board with Bill C-78, or is he content to let the future of his green plan rest on this San Andreas fault of environmental assessment legislation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I have said time and time again, and particularly when I tabled Bill C-78 in the House, if there were some meaningful and constructive amendments to be brought forth, the government would certainly be interested in studying them.

Recently, I have met with my critics on the opposition side and we will be meeting shortly to talk about a potential amendment to Bill C-78. The important thing is that the bill goes much further than most environmental assessment bills that you find in any industrialized country. We need it badly. It is a tool that this country cannot do without. We will improve the bill if we can. We are open to ideas and constructive criticism of the bill and I will meet with the opposition parties very shortly to discuss it.

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-84

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure today to have the opportunity to make a few remarks with regard to Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada Public Participation Act.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, perhaps the Chair would be kind enough to indicate to the House how much time is remaining with regard to this particular debate and the time allocation motion on Bill C–84.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am advised by the Table that there are 17 minutes left to debate before I must put the question to the House.

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, again I would like to start and I understand we only have roughly 17 minutes left in this debate.

First reading of this bill was on October 1, 1990. Second reading took place on October 10, 1990. with a total of six speakers. Three of those speakers were opposition members. Again, on October 11 there were three and two. On October 23, three and one. October 29, six and three, for a total of 18 speakers, nine of whom were opposition members.

The legislative committee which met with regard to Bill C–84 held nine meetings and heard more than 10 witnesses and groups of witnesses. The Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources also appeared before the committee. I should refer to the fact that the minister for privatization appeared there twice. The bill was then amended on November 30 at report stage. As of today, there have been 18 speakers, 12 of them from the opposition parties.

While listening to the debate in my office I heard an uproar over the fact that again the government has moved time allocation. If you go back between 1980 and 1984, you will find that there were 25 time allocation motions and two closure motions moved. This party, between 1984 and 1988, moved 20 time allocation motions and two closure motions.

I now want to deal with the facts with regard to Bill C–84 and some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. On October 23, 1990, CBC radio network, Morningside, former energy minister Marc Lalonde with regard to the privatization of Petro–Canada said that it was never the purpose of Petro–Canada to protect us against the various parts of the market.Nobody ever guaranteed that the assistance of Petro–Canada would mean cheaper oil. Petro–Canada had to buy the oil product and produce its oil and sell it for the price it carries in the marketplace.

This statement is quite interesting when you think back. October 28 is a black day on the calendar of western Canadians. That is the 10 year anniversary of the national Liberal national energy policy. It is a memory that will go on for many, many years for western Canadians and, in fact, for all Canadians, when the government of the day brought in its National Energy Program.

It was interesting to hear the leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Chrétien, who was elected last night, a former cabinet minister, admit that the National Energy Program was wrong. He stated in Calgary that it was a mistake. Just what the position of the Official Opposition is going to be on this issue, I do not know. We are already starting to see policies of yesterday when he was in cabinet. It is now going to be: "I am sorry, I made a mistake. We are going to try to do it over again".

It is interesting to talk to individuals such as Ian Smith, then of the Canadian Petroleum Association. He recalls: "I remember driving home with a Canadian oil company president. It was warm. His window was down. So was mine. He said, 'This is the worst day of my life'. People everywhere were saying 'They cannot be doing this to us'. He watched the TV. It was one blow after another; Allan MacEachen reading it out."

We all know that the hon. member now is in that other House and he is doing it again to Canadians. Now it is with regard to another piece of legislation that is going to move this country forward. The Liberal Party always loves to see us in a recession, whether it is caused by the national energy program which crippled this country, or through the debt which the Liberal government brought Canadians that we are now paying.

When we see what is going on, we understand our objectives which were largely anticipated from 1984 until now: to promote efficient development in the use of Canada's energy resource; increase the flexibility, diversification and competitiveness of Canadian energy companies; assure security of supply; ensure that energy production and use occurs in an environmentally responsible manner; the private opportunities for increased Canadian ownership and control of the domestic petroleum industry; and finally, to ensure energy contribution to a national reconciliation.

That is basically what we are looking at within Bill C-84, the opportunity for Petro-Canada to move forward, to move into this new decade, to ensure that it has the opportunity, the structure in place that it will be a stable company for years to come.

We listened to those who were before the committee hearings. I would just like to take a moment to read what some of the witnesses said. One of the witnesses from the investment community, Wilf Gobert, a financial analyst, said that "The legislation on privatization should be dealt with as quickly as possible. Whether or not the climate is right or the timing is right, the privatization of Petro-Canada should proceed as quickly as possible. The government ownership of Petro-Canada should be reduced to nil as quickly as possible".

There is an individual who really knows what should happen. He recognizes the fact that Canadians and Petro-Canada must have the opportunity to move forward.

As we hear day in and day out in this Chamber, the opposition are continually asking this government to move into more social programs and to move forward with new technology. There are only so many dollars out there and there are only so many things that we can do. If we are going to allow Petro-Canada the opportunity to move forward with some of its programs and projects, it is only right that we should be moving forward in this House with this bill.

I would like to move on with a couple of the witnesses. William Hopper, whom everyone in this House recognizes, said:

> We do not have the adequate funds available to meet our investment needs for the years ahead—. In the downstream we must make multi-million-dollar investments to improve the environmental impact of our activities.

He goes on:

> There have not been enough funds left from our cash flow to finance all our 1990 expenditures. We have had to take on more debt this year. To rely on further borrowing for large capital investment needs, we expect, over the coming years would be highly imprudent.

It is indicating once again by the president and chairman of Petro-Canada that this bill is vitally important to the ongoing process of Petro-Canada, to ensure that they will enhance the opportunities of the company.

I have some of the hearings in which these points were brought forward. It is vital that they be put on the record because they certainly indicate some of the concerns and some of the areas which should be dealt with. I am going to move on to Mr. Hopper and some of the information that was tabled at the time:

> Petro-Canada has clearly made a contribution to the security of energy supplies in Canada. What then of our role as a window on the industry?
> I think people have tended to read a bit too much into this phrase over the years. Our activities did help government understand the extent of Canada's petroleum resources and the available options for developing them. But Petro-Canada was never formally called upon to provide advice to government. We have not had any formal role in developing energy policy, but were just one of many sources of advice to policy-makers. I do not see any need for a unique role for Petro-Canada in this area in the future. Over the past 15 years, considerable expertise has been built up within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the National Energy Board, the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration and other agencies. And Canadians generally, have a much greater understanding of energy issues today than in the mid-1970s.

I think this type of information is worthy to put on the record. Let us get on with passing Bill C-84 and give Petro-Canada the opportunity to do the job it wants to do.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to speak on the current issues before us.

The first question is shall we allow privatization of Petro-Canada, the aim of Bill C-84, and what I call the product of this debate. My answer is no.

The second question is shall we limit full and extensive debate on this bill, including general public participation and input, as motioned via time allocation. My answer is it should not be.

First, I shall speak on the product. Petro-Canada, until now, has been a Crown corporation whose survival is now at a stage. It is on the list of the endangered species, that is the national species. It is not about wildlife nor our forests, it is about a national institution.

Previously, we had seen this government privatize Air Canada. We have no more public control of our skies in essence. We have privatized VIA Rail and dismantled it. The institutions that bind our land are no longer there. Recently, there was a threat to our Constitution. Federal-provincial relations have been strained.

Even more recently we have seen threats to our social programs: Unemployment Insurance Act amendments that would penalize our breadwinners, the clawback that would penalize our seniors, child benefit program cuts which were made, and even now the threat to medicare.

What does Petro–Canada reflect? It reflects public policy, Canadianism, and Canadian values. What are these values? Canadian ownership and control of the oil industry grew from 1980 to 1985. Three events at the time allowed it to happen. The key is that we have assumed Canadian ownership and control of our energy supply.

The second value is about security of energy supply. Canada is one of the fortunate countries in the world to have a wide range of conventional and renewable energy sources that it can call upon for its energy needs. We believe Petro–Canada is our only remaining energy lever against big, foreign owned energy multinationals.

Today we are facing a crisis in the oil industry due to the crisis in the gulf. We cannot leave things to chance. We must take control of our resources for the benefit of our nation, for the benefit of our future generation. We believe that Petro–Canada serves us as a useful instrument, as a useful insurance. As a national company it has played a vital role in state to state negotiations during periods of uncertainty in the world oil trade as we are now facing. Yes, Petro–Canada has a bright future for us to play as a public corporation. It could play a leading role in the ongoing growth of our nation. It has done an excellent job in the past. We should allow it to continue with the job. Canadians need a voice in the energy industry, and the answer is continuing public ownership of Petro–Canada.

In the remaining couple of minutes, I would like to speak about the process of time allocation. The member for Kingston and the Islands has kindly provided me with information that since May 1985, 31 attempts have been made by this government to impose time allocation. The success rate of this government in so far as time allocation is concerned has been great. It succeeded in 25 times out of 31 in moving time allocation, about 4.6 per year on the average, while the Liberal record on this note was only about 1.5 a year in the many years a Liberal government has served this country.

When one considers the many events in parliamentary debate during which time this government moved time allocation they concerned vital programs such as family allowances, employment equity, government expenditures, and today Petro–Canada.

As I look back at the problem before us, I would like to quote from the historical summary of Standing Order 78 which governs this particular motion:

> From the early years of the Canadian Parliament, it was recognized that complete freedom of debate was impossible and that some restraint would have to be exercised or some accommodation reached in order for the House to conduct its business within a reasonable time frame.

This quotation is from the Annotated Standing Orders of the House of Commons, 1989 Edition. The key words I would like to call to the attention of the House are: "within a reasonable time frame". I submit that we have not been provided with reasonable time for debate of this particular bill in this House. I know there is always a continuing conflict, a continuing competition between the role of the majority and the role of the minority. The real challenge to the majority is to see the hearts of the minority because the minority in this Parliament represents the majority of Canadians across the country.

As I conclude my debate on this issue, let me just say that yes, we are opposed to the privatization of Petro–Canada. The Liberal Party believes that it ought to continue as a national institution. We are equally opposed that the guillotine of time allocation has been imposed on this debate so that Canadians from across the country shall not be heard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 3.21 o'clock p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), have expired.

Accordingly, pursuant to the Standing Orders, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

FISHERIES ACT

Hon. Mary Collins (for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C–74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Debate.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I was a little hesitant in rising, not because I lack enthusiasm for this marvellous bill, Bill C–74, but because I fully thought that, on third reading, my friend from St. John's East or the Minister of Fisheries would have talked to the House at least for a few minutes about their hopes as to what the bill will achieve.

Mr. Reid: I will. I will, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Simmons: He promises that in time he will do that, so I shall forge on with my few remarks on this bill.

The basic premise of this bill is that it ought to improve fish stocks through tougher enforcement measures. The member agrees to that. I think I have his attention. We are on the same wave length as to what the bill ought to do.

Mr. Reid: Cheek to cheek.

Mr. Simmons: We are also cheek to cheek, as he says, on the matter of the need for such tougher measures, because those who stay within the law on this issue have nothing to fear.

The people who this bill goes after, in effect, are those who come into our waters illegally and engage in all kinds of illegal activity, from overfishing to dumping valuable fish resource, to polluting the ocean, and to using it as a dumping ground wilfully and without regard for its consequences and damage to fish habitat and the environment in general terms. These are the people we are after.

We can name them in terms of categories. By and large, they are the fishermen from metropolitan France, Portugal, and Spain. I have carefully said metropolitan France because I want to distinguish between the fishermen from St. Malo and other parts of metropolitan France, on one hand, and those from St. Pierre and Miquelon on the other.

That latter group of fishermen does not have a voice in the House because they do not belong to this country. But it should be said in passing that in many respects they are our brothers and sisters of the fishery. When we suffer in terms of loss of resource or depleted resource, they suffer. I stand to be corrected, but I do not know of any blatant examples involving the fishermen of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I know of many blatant examples of pollution and overfishing, going over many years, involving fishermen from St. Malo and other parts of metropolitan France.

Maybe, in passing, I might mention the relationship that has grown up over the years between the fishermen of St. Pierre and Miquelon, on the one hand, and the people of the south coast of Newfoundland on the other. For example, there are many cases of intermarriage between people from places such as Grand Bank, Point May, Lamaline, and those communities directly facing St. Pierre and Miquelon. I go to St. Pierre as often as possible, usually once or twice a year, to practise my French, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Reid: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: Ah, my friend from St. John's East can laugh.

[English]

Perhaps he has much justification for laughing at that idea, but he and I have a hope that one day we will be able to speak to our fellow Canadians in either of the two official languages.

I have a particular immediate aspiration in that about 4,000 or 5,000 of my constituents are French–speaking people whose first tongue is French. So, the onus is on me to get on with the task of being able to speak the other language. I have made a start. My Christmas cards this year, for the first time, are in both official languages. We are getting there very, very slowly—but I digress.

Mr. Brewin: Do you translate yourself?

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for Victoria rears himself awake at this late hour in the afternoon. The answer to his question is, yes, I do translate. The problem is in being able to understand what my francophone friends are saying quickly enough to respond to them, but that will come in time. Now, I digress again.

Let me get back to some other French-speaking friends I have in St. Pierre and Miquelon. I do not represent them, of course. Let it be clear that I represent the people directly opposite on the coast of Newfoundland. But I was making the point along the way that they are not the people who are the culprits who are polluting and overfishing. They understand all too well how finite, how precious, and how delicate is the resource and fish habitat there, and how important is the need to protect it.

Having made that distinction, let me once again talk about the real polluters. They are the French fishermen from metropolitan France, the Spanish, and the Portuguese.

Human nature being what it is, I think it will come as no surprise that from time to time some of our own Canadian fishermen are involved in acts which do not contribute to the future well being of the fishery. Having said that, do not let anyone get off on the kick that somehow, if we can beat all our Canadian fishermen into the ground, we have solved the problem.

There is a particular instance—and I will not get into it, it is not on my part of the coast, nor is it in the part of the coast represented by the gentleman from St. John's East—in Atlantic Canada which is well known to members of the House where there was some flaunting of regulations to the detriment of the well-being of the fishery. But this is not an issue that particularly affects my coast. I am not saying all the people I represent are lily-white, but I am saying that my people in Burin—St. George's are very sensitive to the need to have proper conservation. That is why I can stand here and represent them in speaking to this bill and say to you, Madam Speaker, knowing that I have their support and encouragement, that fishermen and plant workers in Burin—St. George's, and I believe in Newfoundland and Labrador, generally, support this bill because, among other things, it seeks to implement better conservation measures through tougher enforcement of the requirements of fisheries related law.

At second reading, in committee, and at report stage, we on this side have said repeatedly that we support the principle of the bill and we support much of what the bill tries to achieve. But at the same time, we have some particular concerns about individual matters addressed in the bill or individual approaches of the bill. It is for that reason that my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, moved amendments at the committee stage, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Cardigan. Both of these members, in dialogue within our caucus, have been very helpful in bringing a perspective to the debate and in our arriving at a position that honestly reflects what the fishermen want and feel is needed while at the same time seeking to accommodate the government. It comes as a surprise, I am sure, that I would even say that. But we were seeking to accommodate the government on a matter on which we believe we are very much on the same wave length, that is the need to adequately conserve the stock so it is there for another time.

My colleague and friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, will be getting into some of the detail of that subsequently as well as my friends, the hon. members for South Shore and Labrador.

There are a couple of points which I want to make before I finish. I am getting a signal from my good friend, the hon. member for St. John's East. I am not sure whether he wants me to go on for a long time or for a very short time.

Mr. Reid: Just as long as you want.

Mr. Simmons: I will tell him that, as usual, I will only take as long as is necessary.

Mr. Boyer: But not necessarily longer.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member will realize, of course, that I have unlimited time. He should know that in my day, I have given two very different kinds of speeches. I stood not far from here in December 1979, just back here on the back-bench, and I gave my maiden speech in this Chamber. Fifteen minutes after I sat down, the government of the right hon. member for Yellowhead fell. Hon. members can see that I have been known to give very powerful speeches.

Mr. Boyer: This is the egocentric version of Canadian history.

Mr. Simmons: But I should tell him—

Mr. Boyer: There was another speech.

Mr. Simmons: Ah, ah, now the member has made that global leap that he is known for. I said two things: I said I made a speech and I said the government fell. He jumped to that silly and wrong conclusion, Madam Speaker, of thinking one affected the other. That is the kind of mistake he often makes and we forgive him for it, especially since it is so near the Christmas season.

I want to tell him about another speech. It was in the Newfoundland House of Assembly. My friend who is now in the Senate, Senator Doody, was the Minister of Finance and it was my honour to be his critic, in opposition. I was to do the lead-off speech, as I am doing here today, on another matter. It was thought needful at the time to talk at some length. I managed to talk for 16 hours and 42 minutes. So I have been known to give powerful speeches and long ones and, if the member will tell me which he wants today, I will accommodate him.

Mr. Boyer: There is so little time and so much to do, why don't you make it a short, powerful speech.

Mr. Simmons: I shall take the advice of my friend from Toronto. I am struggling to remember the name of his riding.

Mr. Boyer: Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

An hon. member: If you have a memory problem, that is not his fault.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, apart from being a man who makes mistakes, also is a man of great ideas and he just gave me one. He said that I ought to be short and powerful. I make him a commitment that I will keep at least one of those undertakings. Since my younger son is probably by now waiting in the lobby to go off to the Christmas party, I shall see that it is short and leave it to him to decide whether it was powerful.

Despite the need for brevity, I have a couple of things I would like to say. One of them is that I am absolutely appalled at the way this government is treating the fishery. The Atlantic fishery is what I want to talk about specifically because I know more about it than I do about the Pacific fishery, although my friends, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, the hon. member for Cardigan and I are making some efforts to get our heads together on that issue as well. We three are the critics in this party for the fisheries issues. But let me stay with the Atlantic fisheries because it is something I know a little more about.

We live in a time of unprecedented crisis in the Atlantic fishery from foreign overfishing, from the depletion of the northern cod stocks through some miscalculations by the scientists three or four years ago, from the erosion of the Gulf stocks, and from the complete collapse of the inshore fishery on most of our coasts, particularly in Newfoundland.

Mr. Dionne: And the incompetence of the minister.

Mr. Simmons: All of those reasons we understand in some measure. What we do not understand is the government's approach to the problem.

When the present Minister of Fisheries, whom I have a lot of respect for, came into the ministry, I had great hopes for him and his ability to deal with the issue. I still do, given his competence, his track record in cabinet before, and his passion. I like somebody who has a bit of passion in any job, the kind of passion that the minister of energy exhibits. He tries to hide it most of the time but it beats just underneath and it comes through once in a while. Whether it shows or not, it dictates his actions. That is what encourages me. The same can be said about the gentleman who is the Minister of Fisheries. He engages his commitments with a passion, also with a right mind.

The minister's lieutenant, the member for St. John's East, is no amateur either when it comes to passion or intelligence. He might not agree because he is too modest a man. A good team, I say seriously. A good team. If that crowd has to be in the government—and I have serious problems with that—then I am delighted that the Minister of Fisheries and his parliamentary secretary are the gentlemen who are responsible for fisheries. Together they have the brains and the commitment to do something about the problem.

That being the case, why is something not happening? Part of the answer has to be that these guys got their marching orders, or to put it differently, got their orders not to march. They got their orders not to do anything. They got their orders to keep their feet as though planted in cement, to be motionless in achieving any results as far as the fisheries are concerned.

This government lacks any priority when it relates to fishery matters, not because the gentleman from Baie Comeau has a hate on for fisheries. That is not the issue. His lack of action on fisheries is incidental to the total issue. The total issue has to do with his deliberately spelled out agenda as it relates to rural Canada. Fisheries, fishermen and fish plant workers happened to have created the sin of living, of being born and raised and having found their employment in rural Canada, rather than downtown Montreal, Vancouver or Toronto.

I do not get my jollies going after those cities. I love those cities. I was in Toronto yesterday on a very special mission, a mission which I may say was successful, thanks to a lot of people. The mission is known as North York, and the gentleman from Etobicoke—Lakeshore, despite his attempts at denial, will know that it was a fairly successful mission, depending upon the point of view, of course. But I digress again.

Toronto is a great city. Vancouver is a great city. Winnipeg, of course.

Mr. Edwards: Edmonton.

Mr. Simmons: If the member says Edmonton is a great city, I absolutely agree with him.

An hon. member: What about Prince George?

Mr. Simmons: The member is pushing his luck back here now.

Some hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, it is not that we in rural Canada hate the big cities. If that is what turns you on and you like big cities, that is all right, but this government must have an obligation to the cities as well. These obligations to urban centres should never be treated as a trade-off against rural centres. It should never be an either/or situation. A government worthy of its name, a government worth its salt, as we say back home, has to recognize that there is to be a balance in terms of its treatment of all parts of this country.

That is why I have great difficulty. The fishermen and the plant workers also have difficulty understanding that they have to bear the brunt, whether it is in matters relating to fisheries, post office closings, rail closings, transport downgradings, taking the guy or the girl off the tower in St. John's after 12 o'clock at night. The member cannot agree with that. That is unconscionable. They would not do it in Toronto. These things are happening to rural Canada in the name of restraint, but no such restraint is taking place with respect to opera houses in Toronto or space centres in Montreal.

I am not saying we are against opera houses or space centres. I am saying if some pain has to be inflicted, in the name of common sense and the name of fairness, do it equally across the board. Do not say to us that it all has to be done in St. John's, Burin, Port aux Basques and those places but none has to be done in Toronto where the opera houses go ahead or Montreal where the space centres go ahead, restraint or no restraint. Do not tell me that somebody over there does not hate rural Canada when I see the evidence of it every single day, whether I am talking about the fishery, rural post offices or unemployment insurance gutting. It does not matter what I talk about. If it is rural Canada the code over there is the same. Rural Canada, cut the guts out of it. Urban Canada, that is a different matter.

I hope when one of the members on the other side representing the administration rises and gives the administration's view of reality on this issue, they will take up the issue that I have raised and explain to me if there is another reason why rural Canada is getting the axe at every single turn. I understand restraint. I understand we do not have unlimited amounts of money.

What I do not understand and will refuse to understand, as long as I represent the people of rural Canada in this House, as I have the pleasure of doing, as long as I represent people who live in 158 communities, almost all of them fishing communities along 2,000 miles of coast line in western and southwestern Newfoundland, as long as I represent those people, I will not either by my silence or by my words say: "It is all right, Mr. Prime Minister, to close rural post offices and ask people to drive great distances. It is all right to try to take blood out of a turnip in terms of what you are doing to fisheries spending. It is all right to do that as long as you keep the opera houses going in the Torontos of this world". It has got to be fair.

To the degree that I understand it, which is not a very great degree, I love opera houses. I went to one myself one time.

An hon. member: What opera?

Mr. Simmons: The gentleman from Provencher, from Manitoba, is an absolute delight. He knows I feel this. He is in absolute delight because even as I talk about a matter that serious, he can see the human side to it. That is what I like about him. He never ever loses his perspective, despite the crowd he is tangled up with over there. How he stays there, I do not know. That he keeps his perspective while there, I admire. He wants to know what opera. I shall tell him.

I have been to one opera in my life. It was last Sunday. It was a good one. Laugh all you want. It was a good opera. It was called Amahl and the Night Visitors, a special children's Christmas opera. I recommend it to everyone. It is about the Three Wise Men.

Madam Speaker, I know what you are thinking. You are thinking what has this got to do with the fishery. I was asking myself the same question. I think you will agree that I am allowed to say that I have just achieved something that nobody else has ever achieved in this House. I finally got the attention of the NDP. They might not understand what I am saying, but it appears they are listening from the noises coming from that corner.

As I was saying to my friends in the NDP and elsewhere, this government has treated the fishery very, very callously. I now want to make the distinction that I implied earlier. It is not because either the gentleman from St. John's East, the parliamentary secretary, or the gentleman from New Brunswick, who was minister of fisheries, has a hate on for the fishery. These fellows plead the case day and night and plead it well. But for them, the fishery would be in an even worse state than it is. They plead the case well.

They know the problem, but they are too loyal to the party to admit it very openly. The problem is the same problem that the gentleman from St. John's West is having, the Minister for International Trade who with his known candour is less secretive about his view of matters than the gentleman from St. John's East. He is known to be completely fed up with this entire approach to rural Canada. I predict that his days are numbered in that cabinet, not because he will be flicked out but because he cannot stomach it much longer. I would suggest that he will not be there come May or June. I will tell you that now, Madam Speaker. He is finding out what the gentleman from St. John's East and the minister of fisheries are also finding out, that this government has an agenda that excludes, that precludes, that shuts out forever, as long as it is in power, anything to do with improving infrastructure, way of life and opportunity in rural Canada. That is the problem right there.

I do not know how that can be changed except through change in the government. I think the people of Beauséjour and York North gave notice yesterday that they are prepared to do that. They spoke for all of Canada yesterday when they said that they were prepared to change the government as soon as the government gives them the opportunity to change it. That will come in time.

My fear, as it relates to fisheries, as it relates to rural Canada generally, and as it relates to the kind of country that I have come to love and want to continue to help build, is that by the time this crowd is turfed out of office in the next two or three years there will not be enough left of Canada for anybody to govern. The Canada we knew is fast disappearing. The east–west ties are being broken down whether we are talking about the pulverising of CBC last week or the other issues I have mentioned already. There will not be enough of this country left to govern, I say to the minister of energy. In addition to saying his prayers every night, he must cry himself to sleep when he thinks about this. There will not be enough left of this country to govern. My friend from South Shore—

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): South West Nova.

Mr. Simmons: How I ever got her confused with the member for South Shore, I will never know. My apologies to both, but mainly to her. It is a matter I am not likely to be soon forgiven for, either. I know she has an important speech coming on and I should not delay her.

In conclusion, I would like to say that we support the principle of the bill. We have done it from the beginning of its legislative path to this House. We support the principle. We have a few difficulties with it. These are well known to the parliamentary secretary. We have debated them in committee. He has been reasonably accommodating. The government eventually used its majority to have its way, but that is not completely within his control. He will have to answer for it in part. We tried to make it a better bill, but we still support the basic premise of the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: For a minute I thought the hon. member was going to start singing Menotti's masterpiece to us in the House today.

Before recognizing the next speaker it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam—Food Banks; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration; the hon. member for Hamilton West—Hamilton Harbour.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to have a chance to say a few words in the House today on Bill C-74.

I brought some of my material with me and I have covered my desk with some of the very important documents and reports that we had a chance to take a look at, both in committee and in the House. They will certainly help us as we proceed with discussion and debate on this legislation, which is an act to amend the Fisheries Act. It is a bill that, like the previous speaker as said, we have supported in principle since it first started its trek through the legislative process. In fact, in committee we moved a number of amendments.

I want to thank my colleague, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, who really started off the debate that we had in this House, for some his work on this legislation in committee.

I repeat a comment that I made at report stage when discussing some of the amendments to this bill. The quality of the witnesses before the committee was a credit to the industry and to the work of representatives from all coasts who had a chance to review the bill and give us some suggestions and advice. In particular, some of the advice was from those who really work day to day in the fishing industry. They had some very valid comments to make.

Bill C-74 is basically legislation that increases generally the fines for a number of offences under the Fisheries Act: ticketing offences or general offences under the act and, most important, an area that I spent some time on as well, that of habitat protection.

In committee some amendments were presented and in fact eventually came through to the House at report stage. I am pleased that two very important amendments were passed to the legislation. The first was a unique amendment that would require a person when convicted, if the court so ordered, to pay for promoting the proper management and control of fisheries or fish habitat.

In the original bill, the question of fish habitat was not involved. This gives a unique opportunity in terms of laying a charge and seeing that our fisheries habitat is protected so that a particular person, company or whatever that commits the offence understands the gravity of the problem and that hopefully Parliament and the courts recognize that it is not just a case of being a cost of doing business, as was repeated to us many times from the witnesses in committee.

The test of how good is the second amendment will likely come next year, because in the legislation we have also asked that the minister of fisheries be required to table in the House an annual report outlining the whole range of convictions and fines that the department has laid over the course of time. That will be an important report to Parliament, because it will give all Canadians an opportunity to see the direction and the impact that these legislative changes are having and that existing regulations are followed.

They will make the minister more directly accountable to the people of Canada for carrying out the Fisheries Act. This is an area of the legislation about which there has been a great deal of concern, in particular on the west coast. In fact many regulations of the Fisheries Act are not being followed and carried out by Fisheries and Oceans officers for whatever reason.

This will give yet another message to those fisheries officers and to the courts that Parliament takes fooling around with fisheries habitats seriously. We are not prepared to let whomever it is go and destroy fish habitat. They should understand that it is not just a $100, $200 or $300 fine, but that it is a serious charge. In fact those persons or operations will be charged to the point where they will have to go out and promote better management and better protection of the fisheries habitat than existed before.

With regard to habitat protection in particular I want to make a few comments. The summary of the information and background material provided to the committee by the minister regarding fisheries violations was very interesting in terms of the number of ticketed offences, some of the habitat convictions, what has happened as a result interventions by fisheries officers, and whether in fact there was any follow through. I ran one particular figure by the witnesses who appeared to see how relevant it was, whether it related to their first-hand experience when it came to the fisheries resource.

In 1988 in the Pacific region there were 1,959 convictions, resulting in about $320,000 in fines. Habitat convictions totalled 11. I asked virtually all the witnesses concerned about habitat protection who appeared before the committee if this reflected in their view the problem that we are having with habitat protection, at least on the west coast. It was a clear no from virtually all of the witnesses. They said there were severe problems that Fisheries and Oceans officers had in a number of areas. In particular, they said that there was a sense within the department that when officers in their field work come across a skidder running across a creek, damaging a stream or whatever, they are reluctant to charge the particular operator. There is a sense that senior Fisheries and Oceans management will not back them up or support them. In fact it may go as far as Ottawa, that there may not be support there to back them up. If they are in fact charged, just exactly what does happen when it gets into the courts? They are slapped on the wrist, given a $100 fine and off they yet there may have been serious damage done.

That became painfully clear when an internal Fisheries and Oceans memo was released to the public which summarized, in the view of this particular Fisheries and Oceans officer, some of the very clear internal problems within the department when it comes to protecting the fisheries resource. I want to read into the record the particular quote from this memo, because it is clear to me that this officer felt strongly enough about the way the department was conducting itself to write to a supervisor to express concern.

I think it is an important message that we heard in committee and that we talked about in report stage. It has to be repeated today. If we are not aware of how important protecting the fisheries resource and habitat is, we must ensure that the department carries through with any of its concerns. I would like to quote from the memo which reads:

> We (DFO officials) have determined that DFO friendly corporations—will enjoy relative immunity from the Fisheries Act.

The memo went on to state:

> —it must be appreciated that DFO habitat enforcement has reached an all time high in inconsistency—

The memo went on to state that "it must be appreciated that DFO habitat enforcement has reached an all-time high in inconsistency". The memo states with respect to current violators of the Fisheries Act, that "because of the immunity phenomenon—a large number of violators—are not being properly pursued—It could appear that Alcan—et cetera, are given immunity from the law and we are just after the little guy".

Probably nothing sums up the concerns which people have with the Fisheries Act than that particular paragraph. It should tell this House how important it is that these amendments and this legislation carries through with the kinds of policies and procedures that will ensure our fisheries will be protected.

In fact, even in today's vague plan—not the green plan because it is really lacking in a great deal of specifics. One of the particular parts of the green plan released today talks about the release of the enforcement and compliance document. It is a very important document for this reason, and it was referred to in our committee by witnesses from the West Coast Environmental Law Association.

This document is the operating manual that fisheries officers use in their day-to-day field operations but has yet to see the light of day. We see yet another promise in the green plan to have it released. It is very important that that document see the light of day because it speaks directly to the comments made in this weak memorandum that the fisheries officers do not feel that they have the support in their department to carry out habitat protection work and to ensure that those kinds of provisions are carried forward.

I do not think we should talk about Bill C–74 and about habitat protection without mentioning a particularly sad example where the department and the minister failed to protect the fisheries resource and that is in regard to the Kemano project.

Last week the former minister of the environment from British Columbia made a very clear commitment to environmental assessment hearings conducted into this project, which will have a dramatic impact on the salmon habitat and the Nechako, a major tributary of the Fraser River. Yet it has been exempted from the environmental assessment process. Obviously, the former minister from British Columbia has learned that to fool with the environment is a very dangerous thing. He has now had to resign from cabinet, and who knows what he will go to next.

It is clear that that very important fisheries issue is not going to go away, it will stay in the news in British Columbia and across the country for some time to come. We have had a number of fisheries and oceans scientists who have expressed their concerns and will likely express their concerns further when this whole matter goes back into the courts in the new year. It is a very important issue that we cannot avoid. We have asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to conduct a full environmental assessment whenever the premier of British Columbia gets around to appointing a new or an acting minister of the environment. The whole cabinet is probably acting in some capacity or other because there have been so many resignations from the Social Credit government.

I would encourage the current Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to participate, not just with environmental assessment, but if there is to be public hearings. Are those now out the window because of the resignation of the B.C. minister of the environment who is a partner with this government in helping to destroy the Nechako river and reduce the flows on the Fraser?

Speaking specifically of the Fraser River, a major salmon rearing river in British Columbia, and one that all British Columbians are familiar with, it is going to be probably the subject of more debate to come, more work to come and an integral part of what we are talking about in Bill C–74. It comes to ensuring not just a multijurisdictional approach to resolving a lot of the problems around the Fraser River where all the stake holders are involved, the different resource industries and what have you, but as well in the commitment that we had, which again has very few specifics.

There is no funding commitment on stock rebuilding and protection of the habit base in the green plan, and of course the commitment to following that monitoring compliance and enforcement measures will be increased. That is essentially Bill C–74. It is important that this be done when it relates to the Fraser River because of the importance of that river to the fisheries in British Columbia.

Our caucus, in particular led by the chair of the New Democrat B.C. caucus, the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, has done some excellent work in preparing a report with our views about the importance of the Fraser River from top to bottom. There has been a management plan for the estuary part of the river that has been generally, not universally, seen as a positive approach and one that should be modelled for the entire river.

Our caucus held the only meeting in the upper end of the Fraser River in Prince George, where the Fraser River coming from the east end of my riding is met by the Nechako River coming from the west and starts its flow south. We were the only group to hold meetings in Prince George to talk about the importance of the Fraser River. As well, there are meetings coming up in the interior and a river boat tour of the Fraser River at the lower end itself. The department has produced what I think is a very revealing document that I certainly would be willing to provide to the parliamentary secretary if he is interested. It is a very revealing document about the concerns that the department and officials have about the protection of the habitat on the Fraser river. It is very revealing and perhaps even controversial. It shows the commitment at the field level from the staff. We hope this commitment is going to carry through all the way up to the minister. I hope it is there and I hope that this bill is going to encourage that that happens.

We have said that we support in principle Bill C–74. We were successful in getting two of my amendments through which the government supported. What is more important than that is I know we are going to ensure that we hold the department and the government accountable. If this bill is going through the House and if we are supporting it, then in supporting it we have to follow up to ensure that the provisions of the legislation are followed and are acted upon and that the commitment to protect the fisheries resource on both coasts is there; that it is there from the field staff, it is there at the departmental level and it is here in the House of Commons and in the Parliament of Canada.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I spoke on second reading of this bill. I attended one of the committees when some of the witnesses came before the committee. I feel pretty strongly about this bill, contrary to some of my colleagues who will be speaking in this debate.

I think it is very good to have a bill with the primary aim of protecting fish habitat, as this bill is supposed to do. But I have three areas of major concern about the bill. They are, first, the use of penalties to fishermen, to help conserve and protect the fish stocks. The second concern is about where these revenues, provided for in the bill, are to come from. They will come from those in the inshore fishery because they are in the majority. I will discuss each of these concerns at length.

Third, I do not feel that this bill will be equally applied. This stems from my second concern which is that the inshore fishermen are the ones who will bear the brunt of this particular move by the Minister of Fisheries. When I say that I do not think the penalties will be equally applied, I feel that it should not just be the inshore fishermen who will bear the brunt of this legislation. What about the foreigners who are overfishing? What about the offshore overfishing that has been going on?

I would like to say that, when one starts using penalties to force conservation and protection of the fish stocks, one can only feel that the communications or consultation process of this government has fallen down. It is like everything else, it has fallen down. I say that, because there is inadequate effort, on the part of the Minister of Fisheries and this government to arrive at a process of consultation with the fishermen who are going to be the ones who are going to bear the brunt of what we pass in this House. Certainly, there is overfishing. Certainly, there has been inadequate stock assessment.

The department of fisheries has not had the money or the capabilities in the Scotia Fundy area to assess the stocks. It has not wanted to listen to the fishermen. You could catch any number of fish in the Bay of Fundy this fall and this summer, and yet there was no reassessment of the stocks, no support to the fishermen who were looking to that stock in order to gain their living. There is no attempt by this government to reassess or to come back with an assessment of the stocks, an assessment which the industry has called for, I have asked for in this House, and the local communities have asked for. Madam Speaker, I say that this shows the inadequacy of the fishery policy of both the previous minister and this minister.

I will just read a letter which I received last night from a group of dragger fishermen, who have vessels which are under 45 feet long. I am bringing this up because it just happens that Canada's Green Plan mentions this and I will deal with it shortly. The letter states that, in respect of the individual boat quota allocation, it was agreed by the association not to accept the proposal, as is. This is a plea because these fishermen have to accept this by tomorrow. They say that it was agreed by the association not to accept the proposal as is. They got the proposal last week. It is about 100 pages long. They say: "We feel that the individual boat quota, as proposed, would be very destructive to the conservation of our fish stocks."

They go on: "The individual boat quota proposal does not address the problems of possible large-scale dumping of fish". We know that this goes on; the minister is aware of it; and, the department is aware of it. The letter goes on to say that the "problem of select high-grading is not addressed". Select high-grading means that they will take the larger fish and throw out the others. They will select from their catch and throw the smaller fish out. So it does not address that problem at all.

"It allows for dumping and for transhipping." That means if they have put their nets in and come up with too much, they either dump it in order not to meet the individual quota, or they give it to someone else—transhipping.

The association has said the individual boat quota proposal "does not address the problems of possible large scale dumping of fish, or select high grading which would cause dumping and transhipping which would be to the detriment of fixed gear quotas".

At this time, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans does not have the capability to curb the above problems which are sure to have serious consequences on our fish stocks. If it does not have the capability, why are we passing an act that, as I said, allows it to go and apply in an unequal fashion?

The association agreed that "more time was needed to implement a fishing plan that would better serve the fishermen, industry, and communities, again emphasizing better methods for conserving our stocks of fish". This is what this act is supposed to be about. They are asking for consultations.

In determining individual boat quotas, and I am reading again from the letter: "Using history, we feel an injustice has been done." This is the question that the fishermen are asking me, as well as other members of the House, I am sure, who come from inshore communities. Why can the government not listen to the fishermen? It has all this consultation. Why can it not listen to them that such a proposed quota policy is not going to work.

> Individual quotas, sometimes called "boat quotas" or "enterprise allocations", are an important feature of the management of several Atlantic fisheries, including groundfish and offshore scallop. They are shares of the Total Allowable Catch (TAC), or fleet allocation, assigned to individual licence holders. Individual Transferable Quotas (ITQs) take the approach one step further by allowing transfers among licence holders. This provides greater flexibility and promotes more efficient utilization of fishing capacity. ITQs have been implemented in several domestic fisheries and are in place in other parts of the world, including the fisheries of New Zealand and Australia.

Just on that point, we had Mr. Nichol from the west coast come before the Fisheries Committee recently. He mentioned that 85 per cent of the fishery in New Zealand was now privatized. But the ownership was not in New Zealand. It was with multinationals. It did not belong to New Zealand any more. What was theirs in their waters did not belong to them. It had been privatized because of the individual transferable quotas.

But it is stated in the first fisheries item in the green plan:

> Accordingly, in consultation with the fishing industry and the provinces, the government will put in place a system of Individual Transferable Quotas (ITQs) for various fisheries.

There are two things in that statement by the Minister of Environment. His counterpart, the Minister of Fisheries wants to see individual transferable quotas in various fisheries. To me, various fisheries could mean the lobster fishery, the crab fishery, or any type of fishery, capelin or whatever.

I have just read from a letter from a person in desperation to the Department of Fisheries saying that it was not consulting. Nobody in the industry wants individual boat quotas. No boat that I know of under 65, wants an individual boat quota without—

Mr. Reid: You better check your facts.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): My colleague says that I had better check my facts. I can guarantee you that the only ones who want an individual boat quota are the minister's officials. I do not know why they want it. Is it for their rich friends who can then buy those individual transferable quotas, and eventually we will have a multinational company of the fishery on the east coast?

• (1650 )

The government uses that example, and then comes back to this act and states that "we are going to use individual boat quotas for conservation and protection of our fish stock." The whole being of this bill before us, Bill C–74, is to conserve and protect fish stock.

It does not make sense when there is a group saying that they would like to consult with the government, giving the things that they would like to see addressed, such as a management plan and consideration of under utilized species 4WS, east of Halifax on the mesh side, size of fish, fuel costs, and gear costs. Those are all good ways of looking at conservation.

With regard to mesh size, for instance, the sector applied a mesh size this year in that area, and it worked. They had been asking the department to put in a mesh size for years, and it worked. We got a good sized fish.

Now, on top of all of this and without any consultation, as of January 1, 1991, we are going to have new regulations that are going to affect every inshore fisherman whether in P.E.I., New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia. The penalties are going up.

Mr. Reid: For those who break the law.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): The maximum penalties on summary conviction for a first offence—I come to my second point.

The parliamentary secretary over there is hollering at me, but I would say: Where are they getting the revenues?

Let us face it. The bulk of their fishermen are in the inshore. It does not apply to overfishing.

Mr. Reid: The bulk of them obey the law.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Any good legal person would tell you. Who are the people who cannot afford the lawyers? Who are the people who go in and plead guilty?

There is nothing in this act that separates a small, under 42-foot boat, an under 45-foot boat, an under 65-foot boat, or an over 125-foot boat. There is nothing in this act that distinguishes 1,000 pounds over, 500 pounds over, or 200,000 pounds over, which one might see. There is no distinction.

Because of that, we will find that the ones who can afford a good lawyer will probably get off. I am a lawyer. I know that. If they can afford a good lawyer, they are probably going to get off.

An hon. member: Fancy lawyers.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Fancy lawyers is right.

The bill does not distinguish between a big and a small infraction of the law. It does not say that the big can afford a defence lawyer, and the small are probably going to plead guilty. It does not say that the Department of Fisheries has the discretion to pick and choose whom it is going to go after, because it is overworked.

If it was applied to everybody, then people would say: "Well, everybody is going to get it." But they are not going to apply it to everybody. They are going to go to the easiest port or the easiest harbour and apply it to whomever happens to be there. It might be the one guy who happens to have a few more fish in his boat on that particular day and who never offends a law.

The department does not seem to be able to go after those people who break the law. Most fishermen would say it should go after them. For some reason, those are the people who get away.

As I said, it does not distinguish between the big and the small, between the big companies that can pay penalties and can get the benefits of having maybe thousands of fish over a long period of time—they may be caught once, get a good lawyer and get off—and the fisherman who may have that one catch for the first time over the limit is caught. He probably goes into court scared, and pleads guilty.

As I said, Madam Speaker, this bill does not go after some of the culprits who are out there. We give our under-utilized species away. We give them away. Just like we do not have a stock assessment, we do not have a program that helps the fishermen or the industry get into the under-utilized species. We just give it away and give a bi-catch that the foreigners can overcatch, dump, or select and throw out. We are not going after them.

We are not going after the Americans who come over on the Georges Bank side and take the fish when our fishermen are not allowed there because of stock protection.

This bill has many things in it that are bad for an inshore fishery. I can support the basic concept of protecting the habitat. I can support the oil-liner or the tanker that goes by and cleans out its oil tanks as it is leaving being penalized. That person should be penalized. Maybe there is not enough within the act to penalize that type of destruction of the habitat.

I cannot support a process that is just encouraging the minister not to consult with the industry and not to have letters come here stating that it has not consulted and that it is forcing people to take a ballot tomorrow. There is not one fisherman to whom I have spoken who was pleased with the results of lack of consultation or that whatever they had put forward had not been listened to.

I say to all my constituents who are fishermen, and I feel bad, that they should be aware that this bill will probably pass and be in force on January 1, and that the offences and the penalties are very serious. I say that because I am sure that it will be the inshore again which bears the brunt of this Minister of Fisheries' lack of putting into place a proper management plan that reflects that we have a natural resource. If there is a good assessment of stocks, then there will be fairness in the fishery. There will also be an understanding by the players in that field that once the stocks are taken, then the fisheries should be closed.

This is not the way it is. The government is saying: "We are going to catch you, no matter what you do, whether the stocks are still there or whether the quota has been taken. If you come in that day over the limit, you have had it."

My time is almost up. I cannot say that I can support this bill. Given the opportunity, I will be voting against it. I think it shows policy that has no consultation with the industry, particularly the inshore. Again, the government is privatizing, using fines and penalties to overcome its ability to go out and consult with the people of Canada as to the viability of a natural resource, the fishery.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, as this is my first opportunity, now that the questions and comments are in place, I would like to assure my friends opposite that indeed I will speak in this debate. I look forward to being able to put forward the government's point of view and to be able to respond to some of the very good suggestions that my friend my Prince George—Bulkley Valley has made and as I am sure some others will.

I would like to comment very briefly on what our friend from South West Nova has just said. First, the premise that we must operate under is the people that will be paying penalties or fines under this act are only people who have broken the law of Canada, who have been charged and convicted. They are not the lion's share of my fishermen, and the fishermen whom I know, who do not break the law. They are so concerned about the management of the fishery that they, themselves, take into hand the law to preserve the fishery.

On the question of consultation, and I stand to be corrected, but I do not remember one witness, and I was there for every single one of them, who complained they had not been consulted. I should also point out that those witnesses said everything from, "throw the book at them" to "nail them to the cross" and that "what we needed was toughness". The way to address the question of equity between large and small was quite simply to take away their licence, an equal application.

I realize that time is there, but it is important to correct the record on a couple of points. I wish I had longer. I could certainly use it.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-14, an act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Atkinson: Madam Speaker, I would ask for unanimous consent that I be allowed to replace Mr. Nicholson for this particular bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Atkinson moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to make these remarks on third reading of this bill. The member for Niagara Falls has been looking after this bill through the House of Commons as he did with a similar bill in the 33rd Parliament. He cannot be here today. If I may I certainly would like to wish him and his wife well as they await the birth of their child. This is the reason I have replaced him here today, Madam Speaker.

This bill amends and clarifies the law in Canada prohibiting marriage between related persons. It reduces the number of prohibitions to two. They are brothers and sisters by whole or half-blood or by adoption, and lineal ascendants or descendants.

Today in Canada there are approximately 30 couples coming within the prohibited degree of relationship. As similar legislation has failed to pass in previous Parliaments when Parliament prorogued or dissolved, it is certainly my hope that you will find disposition in the House when the question is put that members would unanimously support this bill.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak just a very few words to follow my hon. friend in connection with Bill S–14 which has come to the House of Commons after many years, approaching seven or eight years of attempts to create a bill which would improve the general law dealing with the prohibition of marriage for individuals who are related at various degrees.

My friend has mentioned that 30 or so couples are waiting pending a resolution of this bill in the House of Commons and in the Senate. It appears as though the many years of waiting have been worth it and we on this side of the House are pleased to acknowledge the work of the several individuals in the Senate and the House of Commons who have finally made this bill a reality and will firm up the federal government's jurisdiction in the field of marriage.

We are pleased to support this bill at third reading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House at this time, as I see that members are present, to call it six o'clock and to proceed with the adjournment motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

In accordance with Standing Order 38, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved.

FOOD BANKS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, on October 16, 1989, I rose in the House and put a question to the Minister of Finance on the matter of poverty. The question pointed out that the Vancouver food bank provides 3,200 bags of food weekly; Edmonton's food bank feeds 11,000 people each month; Regina's food bank provides 5,500 meals, and 6,000 boxes of food a month come from Regina's food bank; and Toronto's food bank feeds 84,000 people a week. A Montreal study shows that one in five kids are hungry in this country. Food banks in Canada are becoming institutionalized.

I asked the minister if he was planning to wait until food banks in Canada bar their doors to force this government to act or is the government going to provide adequate financial support for Canada's hungry.

The response was:

> —during the course of the last five years we have demonstrated—

We, meaning the government.

> —a very clear commitment to addressing the problems of those in lower income brackets.

The minister went on to say:

> Let me enumerate some of these matters.

He said, referring to the government again:

> We have increased the size of the child tax credit quite significantly from what it was in 1984. We were the first government to bring in the refundable sales tax credit. That sales tax credit has been increased on two occasions since its introduction in 1986.

He also went on to talk about:

> —changes that resulted in 850,000 low income Canadians being put in a position where they would not have to pay tax—

So, in each of these three areas he feels that the government has addressed the problems and the cause of poverty in this country.

That was on October 16, 1989. Today is December 11, 1990. When I rose last October and raised the question that we are discussing today, there were 906,000 unemployed in Canada. The unemployment rate was 6.7 per cent. Today, the latest figures show that there are 1,246,000 unemployed workers in Canada. The unemployment rate is 9.1 per cent. Since June some 200,000 more have been added to the unemployment lines.

Since the finance minister has finally acknowledged that we are in a recession, he has to address this question in a far more serious and meaningful way than to just say we have introduced tax credits that assist the poor.

First of all, many, many of the poor already are not in a bracket where they are required to pay taxes. This is a recession of the government's making. These figures that I have just given do not fully convey the depth and breadth of hardship faced by hundreds of thousands of Canadians. Too often we talk in terms of numbers. In this case, I will give one more number. In the last year 1.4 million Canadians have depended on food banks to survive. This 1.4 million people represent the fall-out of a made-in-Canada recession, the fall-out of unemployment, and the fall-out of poverty that is becoming deeper and deeper in this country.

We have to look at those families who are visiting the food banks.

We have to look at what the dramatic and difficult realities are in their lives, the reality of going from a family that is in full productivity in terms of being part of the community, a family that has pride and dignity in work, that lives in a home and participates fully in the community, that becomes unemployed or under-employed and, in fact, finds itself living in a situation of poverty, that because of lost employment must move to another home, moves down in terms of the cost of living and in many cases loses their home. Such a family may indeed be in a position now—and many families who are not unemployed during this recession and have been living the recession throughout the period since I raised this question—of having to deny their children full participation even in the school system, in the kinds of things that their peers and classmates need to do, who are not allowed to participate in extracurricular school activities because of poverty. This makes a difference in a child's life. I guess the most important part is that the increase in demand in food banks is escalating and children in this country are hungry.

As we look forward to going home to join our families for the Christmas season, again we have hundreds of thousands of families in this country who cannot think in terms of Christmas but only getting through one more month until the cheque comes, who must go to a food bank to ensure that their children get the basic necessities. Yet, Canada is a signatory to the UN's commitment to the UN Children's Bill of Rights which states that children shall have a home, shelter, food and an education and, yes, even the right to play. Yet, in Canada 1.4 million Canadians are dependent on food banks to survive.

All estimates point to a dramatic increase in the demand for service and that demand has no place in a country like ours. Four more food banks have opened in Newfoundland. Food banks in Surrey are receiving 200 new applicants a month and a further 100 people a month are being turned away. In Toronto, food is being rationed because of the high demand. One hundred thousand people in metro depend on a food bank each month.

It is no longer acceptable for the minister to get up and tell Canadians that all these jobs have been created because people cannot live on incomes from McDonald's, Kentucky Fried Chicken or service industry jobs. People in Canada need decent paying jobs and they need full employment.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked if the government is going to provide adequate financial assistance for Canada's hungry. Her question shows quite clearly that she simply does not understand the programs that the government has done and is doing to help the disadvantaged in this country.

The hon. member should know that the federal government actually shares 50 per cent of the provincial expenditures on welfare under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is true that the government has proposed in the last budget that the three richer provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario be subject to the 5 per cent ceiling under CAP. However, the lower-income provinces are not subject to that ceiling. In those provinces the federal government matches dollar for dollar whatever the province spends.

Under our Constitution, the federal government cannot interfere in an area of provincial responsibility. Responsibility for setting welfare benefits at an adequate level rests with the provinces, and I therefore invite the hon. member to point her finger at the provinces, not at the federal government.

While provinces are responsible for the welfare system in this country, the federal government has indeed not shirked its duty in areas where it does have constitutional responsibility. The government has implemented a number of social initiatives to help those Canadians with low incomes.

One of the first things we did upon coming into office was to extend eligibility for spouses' allowance to all widows aged 60 to 64, and more than 50,000 low-income Canadians, many of them who are women, benefit from this provision.

We have taken steps, in collaboration with the provinces, to help social assistance recipients get off welfare. We are spending some $1.8 billion, as part of the Canadian Jobs Strategy to help people find jobs.

The government has also announced a new human services strategy to help Canadians take advantage of job opportunities. The government has implemented tax initiatives to help low income Canadians. The child tax credit has been increased. The federal sales tax credit was introduced. A new supplement to the credit has been introduced for pre-school children. The credit is now delivered twice a year, which we are very pleased about, and some 850,000 low income Canadians have been dropped from the tax rolls, as a result of tax reform.

The federal government has therefore already acted vigorously to meet the needs of low income Canadians, because Canada must be caring and compassionate to those who cannot help themselves. The federal government is quite prepared to do its fair share.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on the previous occasion when I asked the minister why the Toronto backlog office had decided to bring Caribbean backlog claimants to the front of the line, although they were distinctly the last to come in, mostly just two years ago at the end of the backlog period, I was told that this was not happening.

Some of the evidence that this is happening was presented to some of us today at an informal meeting with some members of the Black Action committee. Some described their experiences as consultants accompanying a client and the client being asked: "Are you from Trinidad? Yes, okay, we will hear you. Are you from Jamaica? Yes, we will hear you. Are you from Iran? Yes, we will hear you another day". This was definitely sorting out people from the Caribbean as against people who had been here years longer.

In fact, in a meeting on September 9 with representatives of the bar association, Mr. Pirie, a senior official of the department of immigration in Ontario, was quite frank and said: "Yes, we have changed the rules three or four times, since the minister said first come first served. We are bringing in the Caribbeans first". Now the reason he gave was because they speak English and they do not need to take time for translation or to find translators.

Partly as a result of that, yes they have increased the rate at which they are reviewing the backlog cases, but they are still going to have to take up those Iranians or Sri Lankans or Salvadorans. It will take just as long to do these cases six months from now as if they took them in the proper order that the minister directed. The department is not speeding it up; it is only manipulating the statistics, in order to look as if it was being speeded up.

In fact, in the two months from the end of July to the end of September the number of cases that was reviewed increased by 20 per cent. For Iranians it was 5.7 per cent, for El Salvadorans it was 4.8 per cent and for Sri Lankans it was 3.6 per cent, all under 6 per cent, but for Trinidadians there was a 197 per cent increase in the number of cases they brought in and for Jamaicans there was a 35 per cent increase. Clearly, the program is not being run the way the minister directed it should be run, the way the minister has said it is being run, both in this House and when she came to meet with the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. This is a very serious matter.

There are three possible explanations as to why they are bringing the Caribbeans first. One is the given one which does not wash because, as I say, it will take them just as long to do them all together when they have done the Iranians and the others who cannot speak English.

Another is that practically all those people are black skinned, more or less black; not white anyway. The minister finds it offensive to suggest that there could be a racial prejudice there. I find it offensive there is evidence of racial discrimination there.

Finally, in fact what Mr. Pirie said is that we are bringing the manifestly unfounded cases first. Contrary to law, Canadian law and the United Nations law, which says that each case will be judged individually if they have claimed refugee status, they are saying that all the Trinidadians are cheaters, all the Jamaicans are cheaters, and "we will whistle them through like that".

Seven Trinidadians have been found by the panel to have a credible basis. By the minister's rules they should be landed. Oh, no. No, the minister has appealed all seven of those Trinidadians cases found to have a credible basis and should be landed, according to the minister's rules.

In other words, the minister does not want it to appear that anybody in Trinidad has a credible basis or a credible claim to refugee status.

I can understand the minister does not have time to sit in hearings rooms and see what is going on. I understand that some of her Ottawa officials have, at best, very little time. But if the minister does not know what is happening in her city—she has a riding just north of me, St. Paul's riding—there are people she can ask, such as reputable lawyers in private practice, some of whom have appeared successfully at the Supreme Court.

This government lauds private enterprise for privatizing all kinds of public industries because private enterprise, according to this government, is the way to go. They regularly condemn lawyers in private enterprise who represent refugee claimants. Most of these refugee claimants have very little money. No lawyer is going to be a millionaire by representing refugees.

Only in refugee law does the government—and I have heard this more than once from officials, from the ministers and from the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board—constantly blame private lawyers for slowing down the process. They constantly overlook the adjournments caused because the department has not brought the translator or the case presenting officer or the adjudicator, or does not have a board room for them to meet in.

There are all kinds of delays. It is about half called by the representative of the department and half called, according to their figures, by the representative of the client. Yet the minister and others only talk about the one side. They are too defensive in trying to defend the indefensible. They had better admit the truth of what is going on, even if it is not what the minister directed.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand upon the reply given by the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina on October 30.

We met earlier this afternoon. In fact we rushed from the meeting here. We probably could have exchanged papers there and saved some time here.

First of all, processing of backlog claims has not been specifically directed toward those from the Caribbean. The ordering principle for processing backlog cases has generally been to deal with the oldest cases first.

As the hon. member knows, claimants from the Caribbean countries form a large part of the backlog population. The time has now come, as everyone knew it would, to process those claimants. Any suggestion that this or any other group has been singled out for special attention is simply wrong.

Although the backlog clearance program was slow to start, in recent months the processing rate has improved considerably. As of October 26, 54 per cent of the backlog of 85,000 cases has been opened and 31 per cent has been decided.

Furthermore, the Toronto backlog office is attempting to maximize operational efficiency by scheduling panel hearings according to language, interpreter availability being considered, background and any other relevant factors.

However, other backlog processing activities continue in the meantime, as does regular immigration program delivery.

It should be noted that backlog processing activities are resourced and staffed separately from the regular immigration process activities. These are temporary resources allocated specifically to deal with the backlog.

To those who want an amnesty or an administrative review, we say that neither is a solution. Canadian experience and that of other countries has demonstrated that such measures simply do not work.

With respect to the new refugee determination system, Bill C–55 is in fact working quite well. Three of the major goals of the new legislation were to reduce the amount of time that it took to render a decision, to render fair and consistent decisions, and to reduce—if not stop—the flow of manifestly unfounded claimants. All of these goals have, to a large extent, been accomplished. There have not been any large scale movements of manifestly unfounded claimants such as was seen with the old system.

There has been some difficulty in moving to maximum efficiency, but this is normal for a new and very complex law. In the first nine months of 1990, 27 per cent more cases were opened than in all of 1989, and 20 per cent more cases were terminated than over the same period the previous year.

While there has been an unfortunate build–up of cases in the system, it must be remembered that cases are being decided in a number of months rather than a number of years, as was the situation under the old system.

The refugee determination system has seen the intake of new claimants almost double in the second year of its operation. Given the results to date, it is apparent that the system is coping quite well with what is coming before it.

The Auditor General has recently proposed a number of changes, and many had already been acted upon. For example, when the Auditor General suggested that steps be taken to reduce the number of adjournments and improve the scheduling of hearings, the department sent out in August, 1990 detailed directives outlining a modified approach which reduces the number of adjournments, and increases the efficiency and effectiveness of scheduling. In December, scheduling supervisors met to analyze the progress in scheduling and to work out improved procedures to reduce the number of adjournments.

The Auditor General proposed that the first hearing process for cases not contested by the Minister of Employment and Immigration be streamlined. Employment and Immigration undertook two pilot projects in Vancouver and Niagara Falls. It evaluated and simplified the inquiry process, in which all cases conceded that first level hearings would be dealt with by means of a paper process only. Following these pilots, Employment and Immigration moved to implement the process nationally. This is being done right now.

Finally, the Auditor General stated that Employment and Immigration should consider having medical examinations and security and criminality checks conducted promptly following the time a person claims refugee status, given the high percentage of acceptance experienced to date. Procedures are in place to conduct criminal checks on persons arriving at ports of entry whose identity is in doubt. Efforts will be made to speed up medical and security checks.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, to follow up on numerous earlier questions to the Minister of Transport, I would like to take this opportunity to reflect on the conduct of Burlington realtor, Peter Lush, in his conflicting roles as Chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission and agent for the vendor of pieces of property the Hamilton Harbour Commission was interested in purchasing. Most importantly, I would like to summarize the government's actions which perpetuated the conflict.

Realtor Peter Lush, who resigned his position with the Harbour Commission on October 2 of this year, was initially appointed to the Hamilton Harbour Commission in December of 1986, and subsequently re–appointed in 1989 by Orders in Council.

It was widely known that Mr. Lush had several close friends in cabinet, such as the Conservative member for Lincoln, who, it is reported, encouraged and supported Mr. Lush into becoming chairman.

It is also known that, at the time of his appointment to the Harbour Commission, Mr. Lush declared that he would not have become a harbour commissioner if it meant giving up his real estate listings with J.I. Case that the Harbour Commission was interested in purchasing. However, the appointment was made anyway, despite the conflict of interest that would have been glaringly apparent to all in 1986 when the present Deputy Prime Minister, in his capacity then as Minister of Transport, made the appointment. Mr. Lush had to swear an oath in relation to the Hamilton Harbour Commission's policy guidelines. The objective of the guidelines are clear:

> The object of this policy is to conserve and enhance public confidence in the integrity of the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners by establishing clear rules of conduct respecting conflict of interest and to minimize the possibility of conflicts arising between private interests and the public duties conferred upon commissioners."

• (1730)

Not only were sections of the policy breached by Mr. Lush, but the objectives stated above were not even considered by Mr. Lush until three years after his appointment, and only then because the matter was raised in this House. However, his business associations in connection with the harbour commission should have been dropped at the outset of his appointment, as is prescribed in the conflict guidelines. Guideline (d) provides that: "On appointment to office, Commissioners shall arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent real, potential or apparent conflicts of interest from arising." In short, Mr. Lush should have either given up those listings that the harbour commission was interested in and for which he was the broker, or Mr. Lush should not have accepted the appointment in the first place.

The law firm engaged to report on the conduct of Mr. Lush, commissioned by this government, reported to the minister in connection to this very point:

> In order to comply with guideline (d), Mr. Lush had an obligation to arrange to have Lush Realty Corp. cease acting as the vendor's agent for J.I. Case, in its dealings with the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners as soon as he took office as a commissioner in January, 1987, and not over three years later on March 13, 1990. Mr. Lush did not, by simply declaring his interest and abstaining from decisions, avoid or withdraw from the situation that was giving rise to the conflict. By continuing to have his company act as agent for J.I. Case, he was in a position of constant and continuing conflict.

Mr. Lush advised the Minister of Transport on March 13, 1990 of his decision to dissociate his group of companies with J.I. Case lands in Hamilton, which he should have done much sooner. However, evidence has shown that Mr. Lush did not sever those ties. Notwithstanding, it was convenient for him to declare a dissociation because the final deal on the $10 million property in question was made on March 9, 1990, just four days earlier.

During those crucial days, I drew to the attention of the Minister of Transport that Mr. Lush was in a continuing conflict of interest in his capacity as Chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission. The minister merely challenged me to make my allegations outside of this House, which I eventually did, but he did not address the substance of my concerns. The minister said that there was an allegation made at an earlier time, which was vetted by the counsel for the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

I would like to know how two so diametrically opposed and dissimilar reports could have been issued with regard to the affairs of Peter Lush. The first report into the affairs of Mr. Lush came as a result of one of the commissioners requesting the commission's lawyers to give an opinion as to Mr. Lush's position.

The law firm noted that Mr. Lush was in a conflict of interest, but that he had declared so and refrained from decisions with respect to the properties as a commissioner. The firm also noted that with respect to section (j) of the policy guidelines, that "a commissioner should not —enter directly or indirectly into a transaction of a pecuniary nature either with himself or any other member of the commission", and that, "purchase of land by the commission was not a transaction of a pecuniary nature with Mr. Lush, either directly, or indirectly. The transaction is with J.I. Case, and while Mr. Lush will clearly benefit from the purchase, he is not a party either directly or indirectly to the purchase of the land."

Subsequently, after I asked numerous questions in the House last March, the harbour commission again consulted its lawyers in regards to those accusations and was given the same opinion.

The most recent legal opinion of November 5, 1990, goes completely contrary to the advice given to the harbour commission in 1989. The law firm which the Minister of Transport commissioned set out the conflict in precise terms:

> There can be no question that in the negotiations for the sale of lands, the interests of J.I. Case, represented by Lush Reality Corp., were in conflict with those of the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners. J.I. Case naturally wished to sell its lands at the highest prices and on terms most favourable to it. The Hamilton Harbour Commissioner, on the other hand, wanted to buy the lands at the lowest possible prices and on the terms most advantageous to them.

That is the crux of the problem, Madam Speaker. To whom does Mr. Lush owe a greater allegiance? To whom shall he act in the best interests?

Obviously, that was a dilemma of which Mr. Lush did not rid himself, and when I pointed it out to the Minister of Transport, he scoffed. The minister should have known, as a lawyer and former Attorney General of Canada, that it was impossible for Mr. Lush to carry out his public duty when, on the one hand, he stood to gain financially by his position and, on the other hand, he could not have acted in the best interests of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

The law firm concluded on this point:

> —the commissions to be paid to Lush Realty Corp—were to be a percentage of the ultimate purchasing prices. It was, therefore, in the interests of Mr. Lush to reach agreements for the sale of the lands at the highest possible prices. This put his personal interests—in direct conflict with the interests of the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners.

I submit in conclusion, Madam Speaker, that first and foremost the government and the Minister of Transport are responsible for their actions as the appointees, whether they like it or not. The government must make every effort to reclaim over half a million dollars paid to Mr. Lush since those moneys were ill-gained.

Second, I conclude by saying that there must be a better way to ensure that this type of activity does not happen again, including remedies for wrongdoing that result in the termination of the appointment, and if the wrongdoing involves monetary gain that the moneys must be reclaimed.

Finally, if a request is made by a public body to their counsel requesting an opinion as to a conflict of interest by any of their officers, that the opinion be submitted to the Governor in Council for a second reference to ensure government and ministerial accountability.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would like to say for the record that this government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, in September, 1985 brought in the most comprehensive conflict of interest and post-employment code for public office holders ever brought forward by any Canadian government. The aim of that code was to ensure that public office holders conform to a number of principles that would ensure the integrity, objectivity, and impartiality of government agencies.

As with any new ground-breaking initiative of this nature, the process and application were put forth without complete benefit of past experience.

As we all know, with the benefit of hindsight our decisions would be a lot easier to make. However, with some experience in the field now, we have a greater understanding of the inherent difficulties that are encountered in the day-to-day application of the conflict of interest guidelines. The guidelines are meant to provide a balance between the need to enlist the assistance of competent and experienced appointees to government agencies and the need for those agencies to live up to the highest standard of public scrutiny.

If the criteria were to be so stringent as to exclude anyone with outside business interests, you would agree that we would be hard-pressed to find qualified individuals to sit on many government agencies, boards and commissions.

When Mr. Lush was reappointed on December 16, 1989 to the Hamilton Harbour Commission, all parties were aware of his business interests. During the time of negotiations for the purchase of the parcel of land from J. I. Case by the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners, Mr. Lush declared his conflict of interest in accordance with the commission's conflict of interest guidelines and was not a party to the ratification of the purchase and was absent from all commission discussions pertaining to the transaction.

Notwithstanding previous legal opinions which stated that there was no conflict, when the minister became aware of the situation in March, 1990, as the hon. member opposite has alluded to, he immediately moved to ensure a severance of Mr. Lush's interests in the land dealings and was assured this had happened.

The hon. member opposite professed himself to be satisfied with the action taken.

Mr. Keyes: I believed it.

Mr. Belsher: When the issue was raised again in October and the minister became aware that there may not have been total severance, he requested and received the resignation of the Chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, Mr. Peter Lush.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member, the minister gave his word to this House that a thorough and impartial review of the facts would be carried out, and he kept his promise. The law firm that conducted the review submitted its report and in accordance with the commitment made to this House by the minister, the report was made available to the public. In addition, the minister has written to the heads of all federal agencies that report to him and asked them to review the opinion of the independent law firm and to bring it to the attention of all persons subject to the conflict of interest guidelines in their respective agencies.

Furthermore, the Harbour Commissions have also been instructed to seek the guidance and advice of the Assistant Deputy Registrar General when ambiguous situations render the interpretation and application of the guidelines difficult. In view of all the above, the government now considers this matter closed.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, our system holds that justice delayed is justice denied.

Justice is being denied to native Canadians who have filed some 580 specific claims with the federal government. In Ontario alone, there are currently 94 outstanding specific land claims. Since 1985, only four Ontario claims have been fully processed.

The Six Nations of the Grand River Indians in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk currently have 17 specific claims in the system. They are experiencing in excess of a seven-year waiting period in having each claim addressed.

This government's native claims policy is a failure. It operates contrary to the needs of all parties involved. The people of the Six Nations have waited long enough. Some of their claims are well over 100 years old.

I call upon the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make a serious attempt to settle these land claims, and I call upon this government to summon the political will necessary to address these land claims with justice and with efficiency.

VIETNAM

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of informing the House that for the first time in 45 years, a senior member of the Communist Vietnamese government has called for a new, democratically elected National Assembly and a government of national reconstruction, headed by people who are capable, people of integrity. The Vietnamese government in exile is represented here today by Hoang Viet Cuong, president of the coalition of democratic Vietnamese political parties for the liberation of their country. Canada should be proud it is able to participate in the emancipation of a country that, like countries in eastern Europe, will at last be able to look forward to democratic renewal and the liberation of its people from oppression.

Speaking on behalf of all Canadians, we hope that our friends will succeed in their mission and that, with their members and the other political parties in Vietnam, we shall see this democratic election materialize.

Mr. Speaker, speaking on my own behalf, I wish Hoang Viet Cuong the very best and I hope a democratic election will be called as soon as possible for a free and independent Vietnam, so that all Vietnamese refugees throughout the world will finally be able to go back to a free country. We, in Canada, will be proud to have been able to contribute to the emancipation of a people.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, members of this House know that medicare is under attack.

In this latest report issued yesterday, the National Council on Welfare asks—it almost begs—that the federal government strengthen the presence and financial support for medicare. Instead, the federal contribution is now below 40 per cent, and will continue to drop further as the Wilson budgets take hold.

How have we reached this medicare crisis? Through the Liberal bloc funding arrangements of 1977, through the Liberal's six and five program of 1982 and through the continued cuts of the present Minister of Finance.

Now, Conservative and Liberal provincial governments, led by the Liberal government of Quebec, want to destroy medicare through the introduction of user fees and extra billing. The federal NDP has rejected the dismantling of medicare. So has the Ontario NDP government, and so have the four western NDP leaders which issued a statement yesterday in Saskatoon. Only the New Democrats will protect medicare for all Canadians.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Once again Atlantic Canada has borne the brunt of another one of this government's disastrous, ill-conceived private sector mania policies. Just a week ago over 140 Air Canada employees in the Atlantic region found that their jobs were disappearing as the Atlantic reservations office was being relocated to central Canada.

With no consultation, these jobs and over $5 million were sucked out of the Atlantic economy. Remember, Air Canada used to be Canada's national airline with a mandate to serve every region in this country, a mandate that was destroyed when this Tory government insisted on delivering it into the hands of private enterprise. At that time it was the Liberals who predicted that this very thing would happen and it is now the Liberals who will fight with the Atlantic employees of Air Canada against this ill-conceived centralization of this once great airline.

We serve notice to Air Canada head office that we will fight these cuts with all means at our disposal. We remind them that they are not the only player in the field, that Atlantic travellers do have an option. If Air Canada refuses to alter this decision, members of the Liberal caucus will urge our travelling public to exercise that option.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, when Simon Fraser and his voyageurs first navigated the Fraser River almost 200 years ago, they could dip a wooden ladle into the river whenever they felt thirsty. Along many stretches of that same river today one would be loath to put their hand in the water, much less drink it.

The government's commitment to clean up the Fraser River as part of the green plan is a welcome announcement to the citizens of British Columbia. The Fraser River Basin Action Plan combined with new regulations to restrict pulp and paper mill effluent and initiatives to double the fish population in the river will help to reverse the damage that has been done over the years.

It will be a long time before we can take a drink directly from the Fraser and it will take a lot of hard work, but I am confident that by working together the federal and provincial governments, communities, industry, and individuals can clean up our past mistakes to restore the mighty Fraser.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, for many Canadians this will be yet another Christmas without their spouses and families.

Ms. Copps: Shame.

Mr. Gagliano: I would like to read a letter to this House which is addressed to the minister of immigration:

> I am writing this application in absolute desperation and frustration over the way the department has been handling my wife's visa application. I got married to my wife—on January 29, 1989. On my return to Canada I asked for an appointment to file an application. Application was filed on April 24, 1989.
> Since then another 20 months have passed and she is still awaiting for a visa. You may kindly note that she didn't get any appointment yet for an interview or a medical. Repeated inquiry bore no results. At a pace this case is being handled it looks like this visa is going to take another few years before I can be united with my wife. Long separation is already taking its toll and only I know, before I have a total nervous breakdown. Since no one seems to care in your esteemed organization I am writing for your help to obtain a visa for my wife to be with me doesn't matter what type—

SEXIST PUBLICITY

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, Hallmark announced it was withdrawing one of its greeting cards whose message ended with: If you see her, shoot to kill. Two years after the card was released, Hallmark realized that although the card was meant to be humourous, it was in fact a pretty sad commentary.

Mr. Speaker, Hallmark's decision to withdraw this card from the market shows that attitudes are starting to change and that there is no more room for products that denigrate women. Although I want to congratulate Hallmark on this decision, one wonders why the company overlooked this text during all that time.

FUTURE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, December 10, I had the privilege of receiving more than 400 guests at my fundraising supper in Longueuil. It was the most important political event since my election in 1984. People from all parts of the community—business, professionals, the arts—came to support my work and my efforts to promote Quebec's political autonomy and prosperity. I want to take this opportunity to thank them publicly here in the House for demonstrating their confidence in me and in Quebec's future.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the global situation as a result of the events in the Persian Gulf is a boon for some and a disaster for many others. On a $359 plane ticket, a $112 fuel surcharge is added to the price. Today, I wish to express my disapproval of the fuel surcharges imposed by large carriers like Nationair, Canadian International and Intair, who have just filed a third application with the National Transportation Agency for permission to charge travellers an additional $30 to $50. The National Transportation Agency, which is now screening the carriers' third surcharge application, should simply say no.

Mr. Speaker, these are the same companies who in 1986, when we had a price drop of 11 cents per litre, remained suspiciously silent. I condemn their behaviour and I repeat: You are a bunch of profiteers with no respect for your travelling customers.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, few in this country have a stronger sense of their Canadian identity than those of us who live in Windsor.

For us, it is a constant struggle to preserve our identity in the face of the omnipresent and powerful American influence. Thus, we cling fiercely to the symbols, institutions and values that make us uniquely Canadian because we know that to lose them would be to lose the Canada we love.

But we are losing them, all because of a government which believes the American way is better than the Canadian way. Now it is the CBC, the medium of our community and our connection to the rest of the country, which has been taken from us. It is another nail in the coffin of Canada. We are doomed to become a mere suburb of Detroit and no one seems to care. But we care.

On Sunday, at 4.30 p.m., we, the Canadians of Windsor, will demonstrate how much we do care. We ask the Prime Minister to join us and tell us why the Canada that we love is not his Canada. We will ask him to restore the vision of Canada that most Canadians share, or resign, so that we can have our country back.

MEMBERS' STAFF

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to stress the dedication of those men and women without whom my work as a member and that of all my colleagues in this House could not be accomplished. I am, of course, referring to my assistants on the Hill and in my riding and to the political staff of all members of this House. Mr. Speaker, their support and hard work, whether they are managing files or dealing with special problems and God knows there are plenty have made me proud to represent my riding, and I am sure this applies to all of us.

Our assistants work long hours and are a credit to us, both in our ridings and in Ottawa. I know my fellow members will agree they earn every penny of their modest salary, considering their responsibilities and dedication.

Today, I would like to express my gratitude and say that I am proud to be able to count on their competence and dedication. On behalf of all my colleagues, I wish them the very best during the holiday season.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, last week the member for Abitibi indicated to this House that he was going back to his riding with good news on the new tax benefit plan for northern and isolated areas.

I am unable to say the same thing. Thirty-six communities in my riding of Cochrane—Superior will lose the northern tax allowance in 1995 as a result of the decision of the Minister of Finance, who is also prolonging the injustice that he created in 1988.

The towns of Longlac and Geraldton are side by side. Longlac receives the benefit but Geraldton does not, yet Geraldton is as isolated as Longlac. The same situation occurs with Marathon and White River, Kapuskasing and Valrita, Hearst and Mattice.

These towns share the same lack of services, the same high transportation and fuel costs, the same inclement weather. I would have preferred, by far, seeing all of northern Ontario qualify for the tax benefit. This would have been fair for everyone.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): A little over two years ago, Mr. Speaker, our government introduced legislation on drug patents, Bill C-22. It was stalled in the Senate for several months on the pretense that the drug manufacturing industry would not feel compelled to increase its research and development budget, and that drugs prices would quadruple.

Mr. Speaker, research and development expenditures in that sector have almost doubled since 1986 and, at worst, drug prices have only kept pace with the rate of increase in the cost of living. We knew we were on the right track with Bill C-22, just as we know we are on the right track with the GST. The senators must end their charades and unwarranted efforts and pass the GST legislation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Just about every environmentalist has attacked the government's green plan as being nothing more than empty rhetoric. Even its so-called action plans and targets are in most cases nothing more than vague generalities.

For example, if we look at goal 1, clean air, water and land, it speaks when it comes to a target of protection and enhancement of the quality of our water resources. Not one word about specific dates for action, not one word about specific legislation, not one word about specific funding.

Isn't it a fact that the minister's green plan is looking to most Canadians more and more like nothing else but a green scam, and that is all?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all it appears that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has recycled his question from yesterday. I commend him on that, because they were not very good yesterday.

I would like to quote a few environmentalists on the green plan. I would like to start with Mrs. Janine Ferretti, Executive Director of Pollution Probe in Toronto, who says: "The green plan is a worth-while effort moving Canadian society in a more environmentally responsible direction. All in all, we are further ahead today than yesterday."

Mr. Fontana: How much?

Mr. de Cotret: Quite a bit.

My hon. colleagues opposite should read the green plan and acquaint themselves with the 120 specific recommendations that we made.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, last night on national television, the minister said that he was going to sign a Great Lakes program with the United States before Christmas but gave no further information.

Will this plan include funding from the federal government for cities along the Great Lakes, like Windsor, Ontario, to upgrade their sewage and water facilities? Doesn't the minister realize that if this program does not include such funding, the program will be nothing more than an empty shell, no better than his already discredited green plan, or should I say again green scam?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I did say that we were getting very close to an agreement with the U.S. on cleaning up the Great Lakes. It is a very important project.

One has to understand that when we talk about the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River and the tributaries to both, we are talking about a whole ecosystem. We want to clean that up. We have been negotiating with the U.S. At our insistence, as was the case following our Prime Minister's insistence on an acid rain agreement, we are very close to reaching it. I firmly believe that agreement can be signed before Christmas.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister very carefully avoided answering my direct question as to whether that plan will contain funding to help cities along the Great Lakes to upgrade their sewage and water facilities. I think people will note the specific absence of a direct answer.

• (1420)

Again I have a question for the minister concerning his green plan. Experts have been saying that the minister's green plan should be referred to as the "vague plan" or the "empty plan". In his green plan, why is there no specific date as to when these new goals will be implemented? Why no specific information?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about a green plan involving an injection of $3 billion in new federal funds, when we are talking about a green plan whose eight chapters contain 120 new recommendations designed to come to grips with our environmental problems—remember that for years on end the previous government contributed to the problem rather than to the solution—I would suggest that such a plan would indeed rally the enthusiastic support of all Canadians. That is the plan which Canadians have asked for when we consulted them. The plan meets our environmental requirements for the next five years, it will still be in force long after that, and it provides us with the assurance that a clean and safe environment will be our legacy to our children and grandchildren.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Just a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, I was in a meeting with the major environment groups that came here to fade some of the green off this plan. These people were very specific, as my notes indicate: no implementation program, no precise timetable, no funds committed. It is already being described as a public relations document. The minister will disagree, of course, but the proof rests with him.

We are two weeks away from the beginning of 1991. If the minister is ready to make his move, would he tell us just what he has in mind for next year? And my question is this, Mr. Speaker: Is the minister now in a position to table a definite and specific plan of action for 1991 to prove that he is serious, to show us that he knows what he wants to do?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I did have the impression that my colleague had read the document I tabled yesterday. There is no need for me to table another one today. The detailed timetable for 1991 is in the document. The timetable for 1992 is in the document. The timetable for 1993—and 1994 and 1995—is in the document. And the funds authorized by this government, by the Cabinet of this government, are also shown in the green plan. I strongly urge my colleague to read it because I think that would enable him to learn quite a few things.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I read it. So did every leading environmentalist. If the minister thinks that 1991 is in here, then he has not read it himself. The only part of this document which is fully funded is the public relations part. Nothing else.

If the government wanted to know what a decent green plan might have looked like, then it could take a look at what they did in the Netherlands. It could take a look at Canadian green print. It could take a look at the Water Quality Act. There is a great deal in there.

I am asking the minister a simple question. Will he stand here today and give us the precise plan, the funding and the schedule for 1991? If he cannot do that, then why should anybody believe that he knows what he is going to do over the next five years?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, after decades of neglect of the environment by the former government, we have come in with a total comprehensive plan that is time targeted, a plan that is costed, a plan that is funded, a plan that will move us over the next five years toward a healthier, cleaner and safer environment. That is what the green plan is all about.

The green plan proposes some very specific measures, very specific money. The green plan, with the help of all Canadians, will be the road map to get ourselves out of the kind of environmental difficulties that the former government never cared to bother about.

HEALTH CARE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This government is taking this country apart piece by piece: first, VIA Rail, the CBC, rural post offices, and now Canada's medicare system is in danger of crumbling and falling apart. These are the institutions that are at the heart of Canada. They are the institutions that represent Canadians' commitment to one another.

In the interests of the nation, will the Prime Minister state today that universal medicare is part of Canada, that it is a right of all Canadians, no matter where they live, no matter how much their income is?

Will the Prime Minister commit today that national universal medicare will not be frittered away by this government as has every other program of trust? We are losing trust in this government. Will the Prime Minister stand up for Canada?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have missed it, but this question was asked several times over the course of the past seven days. In every single instance what the government did was to indicate its full commitment to medicare. We will this year be transferring to the provinces some $14 billion. That is evidence of good faith in terms of maintenance of the national health care system.

Our determination is to ensure that the principles that underscore Canada's medicare system are maintained and that our system remains one of the best in the world.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker.

What has this government done to show Canadians any trust in its programs? First of all, the minister knows that this federal government has reduced funding to health care in Canada. In the last 13 years, by Liberal governments and by Tory governments, funding has been reduced from 50 per cent to 40 per cent. This minister knows that in 1997 Ontario and Quebec will not receive any federal funding.

Will the minister show real commitment today and state that he will reinstate the 50/50 funding with the provinces? Will he state that today to show that this government has some real faith in the future of national medicare?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member indicates is simply that she does not understand the way in which the system is working. The hon. member should be aware of the fact, first of all, that it was not this government which brought in EPF. It was the Liberal government back in 1977 that moved away from 50/50 cost sharing to block transfers to respect the role of the provinces in terms of the delivery of health care services in Canada.

Additionally, it is simply false to suggest that federal contributions to medicare will end. This year alone the federal contribution to medicare both through tax points and through cash transfers amounts to some $14 billion. Mr. Speaker, $14 billion to a socialist does not represent much money, but to the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada and the users of Canada's health care system, $14 billion is a very substantial amount of money.

Third, the hon. member says that we are reducing money going to the provinces. That again is false. The amount of money transferred to the provinces this year increased over last year. What we have done is to put a freeze on per capita contributions, but in each province the total contributions continue to increase. Nationally, the federal contribution to health care in Canada continues to increase year after year.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister knows and the Prime Minister knows that there are provincial ministers who are now saying that they would like to get rid of the Canada Health Act. I have seen nothing that this government has done to counter those statements, to say that it is going to stand up for national medicare.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government like the Liberals before them is not lifting a finger to stop the erosion of a sacred institution in Canada: our Medicare Program. Will the minister finally do what he ought to do and write to the health ministers of each province and territory today to tell them that a universal medical insurance program is a right for every Canadian, no matter what their income is?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the right to a universal health care system is something that needs to be conveyed privately by me to somebody. It is something which has been stated here on the floor of House of Commons of Canada publicly. The commitment that this government has made repeatedly on medicare speaks for itself.

Now what we hear from the hon. member is that some provincial ministers from some provincial governments would like to collapse Canada's medicare system. The response of the federal government has been clear and unequivocal. The answer is no.

• (1430)

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The National Council of Welfare informs us that, in Canada, the poor die younger than the rich and have eleven years less of good health than higher income earners. The government recognized that such a difference existed between rich and poor. That was three years ago. Will the minister tell us now why the Council says this government did nothing to improve the health of our poor?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is quite wrong to say that this government has done nothing to improve the health of all Canadians. What we have seen in indices, in terms of the health and longevity of Canadians, is that Canadians are living longer and are healthier than ever before in the history of this country.

We continue to be concerned about the discrepancy between those people who are poor and those Canadians who are wealthier. We continue, through a range of programs, to try to address the problems of those Canadians who are poor and we will continue to do so. One of the things that the report of the National Council on Welfare highlights is that there is a whole range of factors including the health care system, and a range of social and other factors as well, that have an impact upon the health of Canadians. We are determined to do everything that we can, in conjunction with our partners, the provinces, and with those in the private sector as well, to improve the health of all Canadians.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, true to form, the minister must think he is running the department of corporate health. The same report, I might add, written by the government's own council, declares that babies born to poor Canadians are twice as likely to die before their first birthday than those born into more privileged homes.

As the minister knows, one of the cures for child poverty recommended by the council, the government's own council, is a national child care program. Quite simply, why does the minister continue to deprive working parents and why is he postponing action on child poverty until the next election?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a practice of asking questions which are virtually impenetrable or of making comments which are hard for any reasonable person to follow. What suggestion she proposes to make about corporate Canada and what relevance that has to the issue she raises remains to be seen.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell the hon. member about child care. Since we came to office, this government has substantially increased the amount of money spent on child care in Canada, well above the level that was provided by the Liberals. Indeed, contributions under CAP have been increasing at the rate of about 20 per cent per annum. At the present time, we are spending about $1 billion on child care.

When members of the opposition, particularly the Liberal Party, talk about the need for child care, let them never forget that it was the Liberal senators who prevented Canada from having a child care program today.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, every summer, when the atmospheric temperature reaches 26 degrees centigrade and higher, the children of my riding of Parkdale—High Park flock to the Sunnyside beaches on Lake Ontario to swim, only to find that the waters are polluted with sewage and other pollutants.

Can the minister guarantee the children of Parkdale—High Park and all the children living along the beaches of Lake Ontario that the green plan will make the beaches of Lake Ontario swimmable this summer? Because if he cannot, how can the government call this report, Canada's Green Plan for a Healthy Environment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is quite clear in the green plan that one of our goals is to make sure that our water, as well as our air and our land, is clear and healthy for Canadians. I mentioned in answer to a question from the hon. Leader of the Opposition a few minutes ago that I was very much hoping that we would be in a position to sign an accord with the U.S. to move forward on the de-pollution of the Great Lakes system and essentially, at that point, be able to have an approach for the whole ecosystem of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

Yes, we are moving ahead; yes, we are committed; yes, the money is there and yes, the agreement is forthcoming.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. Destruction of rain forests, ocean pollution, emissions of $CO_2$ and CFCs contribute to global environmental destruction. The green plan does not set specific objectives to address global environmental issues.

Why does this so-called comprehensive green plan not demand that our publicly funded Export Development Corporation produce environmental assessments before dispersing or leveraging project funds which may have other environmental consequences?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer my hon. colleague opposite to pages 97 to 128 of the green plan where we do, in fact, address the questions of global warming and emissions of greenhouse gases.

Yes, this government has made commitments internationally on CFCs, and we have made commitments internationally on $CO_2$. Those are very clear.

We are going to phase out CFCs totally by the year 1997, well ahead of most industrialized countries. We are going to stabilize $CO_2$ emissions by the year 2000 at 1990 levels. We are committed to further steps. We are committed to helping the LDCs in terms of research so that they can be at the table and this agreement can be a meaningful international agreement.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment.

The green plan establishes as Conservative federal policy the right of corporations to pollute Canada's fresh and salt water and rejects the right of Canadian citizens to have unpolluted fish to eat, to have unpolluted water to drink and to have unpolluted beaches for swimming.

Would the minister explain to this House why he chose to agree in cabinet with the minister responsible for privatization and tore up the chapter on water rights when the green plan was before cabinet?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to underline for my hon. colleague that there was no chapter torn up in any way, shape or form.

We are dedicated to moving towards a healthy environment. I would like to say that there are some rather potent tools to do that if we do not get the co-operation that I believe we will. I would like to remind my colleague that under some legislation I believe he supported, that should we not, there are fines of $1 million a day for somebody who goes against the environmental regulations that we have in place.

There are potential penalties in terms of jail sentences of five years per infraction. That will ensure, if everything else fails, that we will go ahead and ensure a healthy environment for all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I am sure he is aware that he is required, by law, to report annually on the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. He is in violation of the law right now while he sits here in this Chamber. He has not got a job.

However, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister who solemnly signed a treaty with the United States with his friend, President Reagan, three years ago regarding Great Lakes water quality which called for and required zero discharge of toxics into the Great Lakes.

The quality of the Great Lakes has continued to decline from the discharge of toxics from both sides. Will the Prime Minister tell this House and Canadians when the principle of zero discharge will be extended to all Canadian waters, and when will it be enforced even in the Great Lakes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of the Environment has already responded very fully to that and other questions raised by my hon. friend. He has provided very detailed answers.

With the exception of some people who are really captives of interest groups in this country, most Canadians recognize the tremendous job that the Minister of the Environment has done.

Inasmuch as my socialist friend made reference in a comment on an involvement with President Reagan on the environment, perhaps I could refer him to another comment made by the socialist Prime Minister of Norway and chair of the Brundtland commission.

• (1440)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: You're not a captive?

Mr. Mulroney: Mrs. Brundtland is recognized as one of the leading environmentalists in the world. The NDP does not want to hear it, but Mrs.—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: How about answering the question.

Mr. Langdon: Answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I, along with my colleagues on the other side, are somewhat astonished, but having made such a big deal of the environment today, and having raised President Reagan, my hon. friends do not want to hear one of the world's leading environmentalists, Mrs. Brundtland, who was speaking to the issue that is before the House.

Here is what Mrs. Brundtland said. The socialists should listen to a fellow socialist.

> There is the leadership role that Canada plays in international affairs and in particular in the ongoing work of sustainable development.
> There is Mr. Mulroney's personal commitment to the issues and the unique way he has mobilized industry, science and private organizations in his own country to work together, creating a strong cross-sectoral movement in Canada.

I always believed there were some socialists who knew what they were talking about.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday the minister said that his green plan represents fresh new money. Yet this government has cut funding to alternative energy by approximately 90 per cent since 1984.

How can the minister stand there and say that this is new money? How much money will be spent on alternative energy under the green plan? More specifically, how much will be spent in my province of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Andre: I'll spend the old money.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure my colleague the $3 billion that was announced yesterday within the framework of the green plan is all new money. It is money that was committed by cabinet. It is money that is there for the environment over the next five years and it is money that is designated to fulfil 120 recommendations that are put forth in the green plan.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment concerning the green plan. As the minister knows, one of the environmental time bombs waiting to go off is the sunken oil barge, Irving Whale.

In 1970, the Irving Whale with its cargo of 4,200 tonnes of bunker–C oil sank off the northwest coast of Prince Edward Island and has been slowly leaking ever since.

Recently, oil similar to that of the Irving Whale washed up on the north shore of P.E.I. I and the fishermen of my riding want to know when the federal government will remove the Irving Whale or its contents, and why isn't there money in the green plan to diffuse environmental time bombs like the Irving Whale?

An hon. member: They had a long time to do it.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say that I am concerned about all these issues as much as my hon. colleague is.

I cannot give him a precise answer to the questions that he has just raised. I would like to take it under advisement for a day or so in order to get the exact information.

We have a section of the green plan which deals exactly with emergency preparedness. I must say that is an area that was neglected over the last decade.

The government is now taking action to make sure that we have the emergency measures in place to respond to issues like the one my hon. colleague has just raised.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The four western provinces stand to lose the RCMP through the government's insistence on transferring more policing costs to the provinces and the municipalities.

The RCMP is one of the strong symbols of Canada and it is truly a force for national unity. Yet the four western provinces may be forced to establish their own police forces if the federal government does not back off. We have already lost too many of our national institutions and this haemorrhaging must stop.

Will the Solicitor General reconsider the federal government's proposal to ensure that the Mounties are kept in the west?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everybody here knows that the exercise we are going through right now is to make sure that the RCMP does remain in the west. We are discussing the cost–sharing that was established 10 years ago. Obviously, I will continue to discuss those issues with the representatives of the provinces and the territories.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. I do not think I have to tell this minister that the RCMP is one of the best police forces in0z the world. Surely the minister must know that if the western provinces lose the Mount-ies any replacement force would be very hard pressed to match the RCMP. The west would be the loser. It would smack of discrimination and add further to western alienation.

We in the west cannot afford to lose the RCMP. Will the Solicitor General put a fair offer on the table, a fair offer that is acceptable to the west, and save the RCMP?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was doing very well in his question at the beginning of it. Obviously the RCMP is one of the best police forces—if not the best—in the world. I am looking forward to agreeing with the provinces that it is and that they will keep it.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. The government has put a lot of its credibility on the line with privatization.

On Fifth Estate last night we saw the reality of that philosophy. At Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson Airport, the Canadian people get $5 for every passenger who goes through a turnstile. At Terminal 3, handed over to the government's corporate friends, another one of those special interest groups, the taxpayers get only 20 cents for every passenger. Worse yet, the government wants to do to Terminal 1 and 2 what it has done to Terminal 3—turn it over to the private sector.

Since the government claims to be so concerned about the deficit, why is it giving up so much valuable revenue to its corporate friends, instead of using it to improve the aviation system?

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, to answer my hon. friend opposite, it is simply ridiculous and almost crazy to think that Pearson International Airport will be less profitable because the construction will be handled by the private sector. The Pearson Terminal will be operated according to the terms of a lease. That lease provides that the owner of the terminal must make regular payments to the Government of Canada. Now, that will indeed prevent the deficit from increasing, since the $500 millions required to build the terminal are to be paid by the contractor and not by the taxpayers. I think the government made a very wise decision.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the answer may be far simpler than the minister suggests. Last year Huang and Danczkay upped their donations to the Tories from $3,000 to $30,000.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Angus: In light of the decrease in revenue, in light of the fact that many smaller airports in Canada rely on Pearson to generate the funds to keep our system running, and in light of the cuts to flight service stations, air traffic control, and aviation weather reporting across the country, is it too much to ask that the government provide services to people instead of their corporate friends? Will the minister abandon the government's plans to turn Terminals 1 and 2 over to the private sector?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I think that for the sake of all Canadians, it was fortunate the Conservative government was elected for two terms since 1984, because first of all, this got rid of a Liberal government that put the country in debt to the extent of mortgaging the futures of our children and grandchildren. Fortunately, Canadians were well inspired not to elect a socialist government, because the socialist mathematics don't pass the test: They say the government is losing money because the Pearson Terminal was built for $500 million, without a cent of taxpayers money. If the same terminal had been built with taxpayers' money, it would have cost at least $10 per passenger to pay off the debt alone on that amount.

So I think this is one more example of the excellent decisions made by this government to restore confidence in the economy.

AIR–INDIA FLIGHT 182

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

For over five years, the RCMP has been investigating the 1985 Air–India jumbo jet crash which caused what everyone could well be knowledgeable of as one of the worst single mass murders in Canadian history. Of the 329 passengers who had their lives snuffed out, 295 of them were Canadians including 82 children and six infants.

Because of the long delay in this behind–closed–doors investigation, would the Solicitor General now call a public inquiry, or better still, would he allow for a parliamentary inquiry? At the minimum, would he place a time limit on the RCMP to report back to the government?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, although I cannot agree with the entire terminology used by my hon. friend, I want to reassure my hon. friend and all members in the House that the crash of Air–India flight 182 is still under investigation by the RCMP, and that the RCMP is planning another mission to the North Sea this summer in order to try to get further evidence from the wreckage.

In addition, there is a civil suit that is ongoing. Therefore, I think it would be inappropriate right now to agree with the suggestion made by my hon. friend, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am kept informed with respect to this ongoing investigation and hopefully it will be terminated as soon as the RCMP can get the additional evidence it is seeking.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today, Canadians had to come to Parliament to protest against the Minister of Employment and Immigration for the delay of the reunification of their spouses. Five years ago it used to take nine months. Now, it takes two and one–half years to be reunited with loved ones.

In the spirit of Christmas, will the minister intervene and have hundreds of Canadians spend Christmas with their loved ones in Canada?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, one of the things that we have tried to do in our new immigration plan is to move forward the processing of spouses.

I would point out to him that we are very much in favour of having families reunited as quickly as we can and, indeed, we know that larger numbers of family members will be coming in the future under our new plan.

The difficulty, of course, is that the demand is so extraordinarily high. We try to keep up with it as best we can. We have put in improvements for processing. We have given it a higher priority, and I would hope that in the future we could do better. It is important to us and we know that people want to be reunited with their families.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister sounds like a broken record.

Would the minister grant a visitor's visa to a newly–wed spouse so that the couple can be together while waiting for the documents to be processed in Canada? Would that not be an easy way?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand the dilemma that the hon. member is describing. It is difficult to say whether a newly–wed is in a more difficult and lonely situation than someone who has been married a long time.

Let me say that we are looking at ways to ease the situation for spouses and that I will be reporting back to the House when we have new regulations and our new processing in place. I think the hon. member will be pleased.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Quebec has established one of the best health care systems in the world. A number of American experts, including Senator Ted Kennedy and experts from other countries have recognized this fact. At the present time, the Government of Quebec is making major reforms in its health care system. Its aim is to improve access and quality of care for all Quebecers. Does the minister intend to let the Government of Quebec run its health care system as it sees fit?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Health Act gives Canadian provinces all the powers they need to revamp their health care systems. Canadians expect the federal government to continue to play an active role in the area of health care and ensure that national standards are met throughout Canada. The basic concept is simple: universal access for everyone across Canada. Mr. Speaker, this is a concept that is important to all Canadians and it is supported across Canada.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec, respect for rights and freedoms is part of a long democratic tradition of which we are proud. We have reason to believe that the Canadian government has been guilty of violating those rights. Quebec is perfectly well able to protect the rights and freedoms of its citizens, including those they have in the health care area. Quebec Minister Rémillard is asking you to withdraw completely from health care in Quebec, which in fact falls under provincial jurisdiction. What are you going to do?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware of the fact that within the confines of the Canada Health Act the basic principles of universal access and equity of treatment in Canada are set out. The provinces have full discretion in terms of the organization of their health care systems.

My colleague in Quebec has indicated that he believes that his reforms can be done within the context of the Canada Health Act. I have had my officials write to his, seeking more information with regard to proposals made by the Government of Quebec. If it can be done within the law, he has the right to do that.

The principle of universality and the principles of universal access and of equity of treatment that are contained in the Canada Health Act are principles that are supported by all Canadians and are to the benefit of all Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, my question is directed to the parliamentary secretary.

Gérard Veilleux said yesterday at the Communications and Culture Standing Committee meeting: "There was so little political will on the part of the government to support the CBC that I—" that is, Mr. Veilleux, the president "—was never able to get through the Minister of Communications' door to ask for help." He was told the minister was too busy.

Why was the minister too busy to deal with this question that strikes at the very roots and the very heart and soul of national unity, one that has negative impacts on the economic, social, cultural and linguistic fibre of every community affected by this decision?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Communications indicated to the House on Monday, there have been constant discussions with the CBC since the budget of April, 1989.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has refused to meet Mr. Veilleux, will he meet representatives from Sydney, Rimouski, Windsor, Sudbury, Winnipeg, St. Boniface, Calgary, Saskatoon, Vancouver and other cities affected by the 1,100 job cuts, and let these representatives tell him about the negative impact on regional English and French programming? Will he take the time to meet employees who were laid off, which was a nasty Christmas present?

• (1500)

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the minister is always available to consult with Canadians.

Point of Order

I should also point out to the hon. member that there are many other appropriate avenues for the affected people to pursue. For example, it is already set in train that the Canadian Radio and Television Telecommunications Commission will be involved in this issue.

WESTRAY MINING

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

It involves the awarding of an $85 million loan guarantee and a $9 million gift to Westray Mining in the riding of Central Nova, a project which was opposed by federal bureaucrats.

We know that the Prime Minister was lobbied personally regarding this project by the Conservative MLA for the area on behalf of the three companies involved, which just happened to have contributed $33,000 to the PCs in 1988, the year in question.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister why he ignored the advice of his bureaucrats and became involved in the making of this gift to supporters of his own party?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, every member of this House knows that the government contracts for products and provides assistance to all kinds of industrial producers from one side of the country to the other.

As far as Westray is concerned, our department, Industry, Science, Technology Canada offered assistance to the project, otherwise it would not have gone ahead to open an underground coal mine in Pictou County, Nova Scotia.

We have that arrangement. The Nova Scotia Power Corporation will use the coal from that underground mine. I do not know what the NDP have against sound regional economic development.

POINT OF ORDER

PRESENCE OF ASBESTOS IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek some assurance from the Chair with regard to a matter of great importance to members of Parliament, and also to their staffs and to the individuals who work on Parliament Hill.

For quite some time the issue of asbestos has been given great media attention. There are legitimate concerns being expressed by employees, by members of Parliament and their respective staff persons.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you, in your capacity as the presiding officer of this Chamber, have information that perhaps if shared with this House and with the employees and the members of Parliament would shed some light as to what is taking place. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would give careful consideration to full disclosure of any and all information which comes into your purview in terms of any tests which have been done on any of the premises here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to echo the concerns raised by my hon. friend, who is aware that earlier today a press statement by Greenpeace on behalf of the environmental working committee of all those employed on Parliament Hill indicated a concern about alleged concentrations of asbestos and the use of asbestos on Parliament Hill.

I wonder if you, Mr. Speaker, as the presiding officer of this House and as the presiding officer of the Board of Internal Economy would make a statement in terms of the release of all pertinent information at some appropriate moment.

Mr. Speaker: I should say to the House that there may be members of Parliament wishing to rise on this issue under questions of privilege.

Strictly speaking, questions of privilege should be heard at the first opportunity. It may be that if there are members wishing to rise on this matter, they would agree to me referring their application until I have had a chance to respond to the suggestions of the hon. member for Kamloops and Cape Breton—East Richmond.

If I have agreement with that, I would proceed with advising the House of what I think I can advise it of at the moment. If hon. members wish to pursue, of course, I shall hear it.

There is another question of privilege which I have received notice of arising out of a question of privilege that has already been argued. I will, of course, hear that in a few minutes. It does not take quite the same priority precedent as the other.

Further to the interventions of our colleagues, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Kamloops, I wish to inform members of the House of recent action taken by the Board of Internal Economy in response to ongoing concerns regarding the presence of asbestos in the workplace, and the potential harm to employees on the Hill.

I think I should point out that the board reviewed the matter at a meeting on May 3, 1989, and approved the following steps to deal with the situation. I am reading here from the board minutes and I will table these:

> 1. That the situation report and plan of action regarding the asbestos abatement program on Parliament Hill which was requested of Public Works Canada by the administrative committee on March 17, 1989 be presented to the board as soon as possible.
> 2. Where work is required to be performed by House employees in areas where asbestos is known to be present and suitable protective equipment or procedures are not available to such staff, the work be contracted out by the House to a qualified contractor who can safely perform the work within the standards prescribed by Labour Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and Public Works Canada.
> 3. Where services are required to be performed by Public Works Canada staff or its contractors, or other contractors engaged by the House, in areas known to have asbestos, the work be done by qualified staff who will be required to follow regulations, policies and procedures set out for such work by Labour Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and Public Works Canada.
> 4. That House staff and outside contractors be informed prior to commencement of any work on Parliament Hill of the locations of any known asbestos in the area where work is about to be performed.
> 5. That an official of the parliamentary accommodation unit of the Sergeant-at-Arms sector establish appropriate monitoring procedures to ensure that all work referred to in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 be carried out in a manner consistent with regulations, policies and procedures determined by Labour Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and Public Works Canada.
> 6. That the House officials continue their practice of calling upon Labour Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and Public Works Canada officials to assist in monitoring the safety of the work environment.
> 7. That the Speaker write the Minister of Public Works Canada to communicate the board's decisions and request his department's continued assistance in this regard.

That is the minutes of the meeting of May 3, 1989. Of course, certain matters have flowed from those minutes.

In addition, I would like to advise members that the Board of Internal Economy met last week, on December 5, 1990, with officials from the Departments of Health and Welfare and Public Works to discuss the situation further.

I would like to read for the benefit of the members an extract from the minutes of that board meeting. This is a meeting only one week ago:

> The board received a briefing from officials of Public Works Canada and Health and Welfare Canada concerning the presence of asbestos in the Parliament Buildings.
> Members of the Board were assured by officials that no asbestos fibres had been found in any offices tested. It was agreed, however,—

I should say to members that this was a very lengthy meeting, and after much discussion and many questions:

> —that the board would seek further assurance by contracting the services of an outside expert to advise on the situation. It was also suggested that a communication plan should be developed in order to reassure employees working in the parliamentary buildings.

Those are the minutes of a meeting held last Wednesday night. I can assure members that we will be selecting a consultant within the next few days who will be requested to make a preliminary report to the board by January 14, 1991, the contents of which will be made available to all members of the House as soon as possible thereafter. All additional reports will also be presented to the members of the House.

I am tabling for the information of the House extracts from the minutes of the Board of Internal Economy meeting of May 3, 1989, to which I have just referred, and from the meeting of last week, December 5, 1990. Just so that members and the public understand, the government department which is charged with the actual work with respect to asbestos is, of course, the Department of Public Works, with the help and assistance of the Department of Health.

There was a meeting of the Board of Internal Economy today at noon, and I think that I have the support of all members to say to the House and the public that the board, as the employer of all the employees on the Hill, considers that it must take with very grave concern suggestions that there may in fact be difficulties, and the board is proceeding to do so.

I will, of course, make arrangements as soon as our first report comes in from our consultant to make that information available to hon. members and to make available from then on subsequent information which is important and which goes to convey to all hon. members and to our employees what is being done, first of all if there is a danger, second, what that danger may be or the extent of it and, third, what is being done about it and what can be done about it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. Just a moment, perhaps before the hon. member proceeds, I could deliver to the Table the documents of which I just spoke.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and then I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your statement and your assurance that you will provide additional information come mid-January with regard to this important issue.

The hon. Minister of Public Works is in the House at the present time, I know it is unusual to make this request since Question Period has expired, but I wonder if the minister would undertake to provide to the House and to members copies of all of the various tests with which his department is now seized to in regard to the issue of asbestos within the Parliament Buildings so that we can have full disclosure and a full examination of all of the facts. Thereafter, of course, these would be given to the independent individual who will be retained by the Board of Internal Economic in order to make a final and complete assessment and to give assurances, not only to members of Parliament and their employees but, indeed, all people who work on Parliament Hill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put a question to the minister who has, of course, been listening carefully to the statement by the Chair. Strictly speaking, unless the House agrees, I would have to say that I am in the hands of the minister. The minister may want to respond.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gravity of the situation and the desire of all colleagues to be fully apprised of the situation. I will take the request very seriously. I do not know if there are procedural reasons or any other reasons why I could not comply with this, but I will undertake to report back.

I might say that precautions have been taken. Members might like to know, for example, that one sensitive area, the attic of the West Block, has been sealed off. Security officers have been instructed to make sure that access to the attic, which has steel beams covered with asbestos, is not readily available. I am advised that the security service of the House has agreed to keep the door of this area locked in view of any possible risks, and that the access door was completely weatherstripped to make sure that the asbestos is totally contained within the attic space. The House also knows that where renovations are undertaken to the parliamentary precincts, such as in the Wellington Building, asbestos is removed at that time with appropriate precautions.

I also understand, although I am no expert on the matter obviously, that in an inert form, that is to say, not in viable form, asbestos is not generally regarded as particularly hazardous. However, if it is disturbed around service areas, this is not the case.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you also mentioned that when the issue was raised by a colleague in the House last month, on November 19, I believe, several tests were undertaken with the co-operation of my colleague, the minister of health and welfare, as to air quality, and there was no evidence at that time that there was any hazard. But our department is anxious to carry on with this inspection. Of course we will act as the servants of the line departments and the House and carry out whatever instructions you see fit to give us.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, you indicated that you would be acting expeditiously in terms of identifying an independent firm to evaluate quickly the situation. I would simply like to add that perhaps in your deliberations at the appropriate time, and as soon as possible with the firm in question, that you would encourage the firm to be in contact with the environmental working group of employees who are working on Parliament Hill so that they are fully apprised of the progress as well.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on this same point of personal privilege. I was dismayed when I heard your report, Mr. Speaker, that the board of internal economy, if I heard you correctly, discussed the matter of asbestos in the West Block in the spring of 1989. I am dismayed because as an occupant of West Block certainly I was not informed, nor was my staff, that there might have been potential problems concerning asbestos in the West Block. I would have appreciated had I known that.

This morning we received a copy of a report that was made and submitted to the government in December 1988. I quote: "In the presence of strong lights necessary for the videotaping it was possible to see large particles of asbestos fireproofing adrift in the air stream. These particles were moving toward mechanical room No. 6 at the same rate as the smoke particles."

Another part of the report states: "There exists a strong possibility that airborne asbestos migrates from the attic to occupied areas of the building via the air handling system".

If this was the same report that the Board of Internal Economy was looking at in March 1989, I am wondering what has happened in the meantime.

Mr. Speaker: I have probably bent the rules a little to allow this matter to be dealt with now because frankly I think it is an important matter. So does the board and so do hon. members. But we are not here to debate what particular piece of paper the board was looking at at that time.

I am sure the hon. member realizes that the board is retaining independent outside advice to advise us. Beyond that and beyond bringing to the attention of the hon. members the fact that the matter was discussed with great seriousness a week ago, action is taking place, but I do not know that I can transgress the rules by turning the afternoon into a debate on asbestos. I think that is going too far.

PRIVILEGE

PRESENCE OF ASBESTOS IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in line with your earlier remarks I do not intend to pursue it at any length. However, in the light of exposure of this two-year old report today, a three-volume report prepared by independent consultants and released presumably through the Department of Public Works in December 1988, I do believe that at least the members of Parliament and their staff who work in the conditions outlined in that report in the conduct of their duties as members of Parliament and their staff have a right to know what the Department of Public Works knew two years ago about the deterioration of asbestos. On a six-hour videotape which accompanied that report it is shown flowing through the air ducts and throughout the system into the control rooms and throughout that building.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that you are taking strong and early action now, but the fact remains that there was an independent consultant hired who reported two years ago to the Department of Public Works. This report laid out, in broad terms, a plan of action that sounds remarkably similar to the plan of action that you are now requesting another independent consultant to draft a report on and to make recommendations.

I believe it is a matter of privilege in that no members of Parliament and their staff with offices in the West Block—and there are many of them, particularly on the fourth floor—are in fact prevented from carrying out their duties as MPs and staff of MPs without placing their health at what appears to be serious risk. The tone that is placed in that three-volume report is of a nature that any school building in the province of Ontario would have been closed down months ago if they had known that their buildings were in the same apparent state as the West Block.

The least these members of Parliament and their staff require now is the release of that report and the accompanying six-hour videotape so they can form a conclusion for themselves in light of whatever experts they may choose to hire to determine whether or not that building has to be evacuated or whether they in fact should continue to work in it in order to carry out their duties.

Perhaps the only alternative is to shut the building down and either have MPs find alternative accommodation and submit the bills to the House of Commons, or the House should consider immediately whether or not we can find them alternative accommodation.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member. I also appreciate the fact that I had notice of his question of privilege. The matter has been brought back to the House. I think it is now appropriate for the Board of Internal Economy to proceed as we are.

I will take into account the particular matters raised by the hon. member.

ACCESS TO RESEARCH FACILITIES

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today on a question of privilege concerning a serious and important matter that should be worthy of your attention and give you cause to reflect.

Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, I raised a question of privilege about access to research facilities. Mr. Speaker, there have been new developments since then, and I think it falls very much within the purview of this institution to be aware of certain events outside the House that have a considerable impact on the privileges of all members. I am referring to the fact that the services of research staff on the House of Commons payroll have now been made available to individuals in the private sector.

Let me explain, Mr. Speaker. I was astonished to read in the Montreal Gazette on Wednesday, November 28, that two members of this House, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and the hon. member for Outremont, had decided to make available free of charge the research facilities of their parties, and probably their personal staff, to people in the private sector. I would like to quote, Mr. Speaker, from the article signed by Philippe Authier, which reads as follows:

[English]

They have agreed to share researchers and newspaper clipping services.

There is more, Mr. Speaker. This group of members of the business community includes Marcel Beaudry, an eminent Hull lawyer, Sheryl Campbell-Steer, vice-president of the Montreal Board of Trade, Charles-Albert Poissant, president of Donahue, and Sébastian Allard, of the Conseil du patronat du Québec.

[English]

Each has been assigned an aide to sort through briefs and prepare questions. The help comes courtesy of Ouellet and Hogue.

Mr. Speaker, I am astonished to see that public funds are now made available to individuals in the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a serious matter when one sees a resident of Hull, Mr. Marcel Beaudry, given access to research services while the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, who was elected by the people of Hull—Aylmer, is denied access to the same public funds to do his research.

Mr. Speaker, I think you should take a long, hard look at this matter. For instance, tomorrow, the Liberal Party, the Progressive Conservative Party or the New Democratic Party might decide that they support the principles of the Conseil du patronat or the FTQ and decide to transfer their staff to these organizations. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think this is in accordance with the Standing Orders and practices of this House. All the more so since it amounts to discrimination with respect to our political convictions, realizing as we do that we have been denied these privileges, whereas citizens who have not been elected by anybody and who sit on the boards of major corporations are given access to research services paid for by the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I refer you to another article published in La Presse of that same day where it is alleged that the group pools their resources and their staff and that from here on in they will follow a specific strategy where somebody would suggest such or such question to the witnesses just to make sure that all bases are covered. And, according to Mr. Ouellet, there is nothing wrong with that kind of arrangement.

From my standpoint, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that all this should prompt us to raise basic questions as to whether the rules of justice and fairness are respected in this House. Should a few private sector individuals who happen to share the political convictions of certain traditional parties in this House be given ready access to research services, a privilege we have been denied because our views are different? I am not sure that the private sector should have access to the resources of the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker. I think that is a fundamental question because today it has to do with constitutional matters, tomorrow it might be immigration, and the day after it might involve another issue where the resources of the House of Commons would be put at the disposal of one interest group or another.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Charter of Rights and Freedoms for which everybody is grateful refers to freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression. I have every reason to believe that if we are denied access to some services, it is because of our political beliefs. But I will go even further, Mr. Speaker, for I have an even more serious case to report.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean who sits in the House of Commons as an Independent is a member in good standing of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, just as are the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and the hon. member for Outremont. Both these members have access not only to the research services of the House of Commons, but also to a new staff of four people who claim they are there to collect objective data. Well, Mr. Speaker, these objective data are not made available to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, in spite of the fact that he has the same right as both our colleagues on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and should have access to the same services provided by government staff from the Privy Council. Some hon. members of this House are discriminated against because of their political beliefs.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing against the old parties behaving like great bedfellows, but when they get special treatment, they or their party should pay from their own pocket. In this case, public funds, which are provided by the Canadian people and Quebecers, whether they be in favour of the federalist or sovereignist option, are now used simply to promote one side of the issue. I suggest that, as members of the House, we should ask ourselves serious questions, namely: How come Marcel Beaudry can have access to the research services of the House of Commons while Gilles Rocheleau cannot? Why is it that Privy Council staff prepare briefings for all hon. members except the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean? That is my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I listened with interest to the hon. member. Part of his complaint is the subject of a matter which the Chair is presently studying and with which the Chair must deal and respond to the House.

I will consider the other matters. I must say that I will have to look at it very carefully to see privilege. A breach of privilege is when the hon. member is unable to carry on his duties in the House. The hon. member is speaking of research work which is available to parties in this House, ultimately paid for by the Canadian public, but that research is the property of the members of that particular party. It certainly would not be the first time in the history of this Parliament that research work that has been prepared by research groups for any individual party, or for that matter, the Library of Parliament, has been released to all kinds of people across this country to assist them and their groups in various matters that they might wish to do.

I will look at the hon. member's intervention and I will try to take it into account before I bring down the ruling on the other matters that he raised. I thank the hon. member.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS—PRESENTATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

[English]

This report is entitled, "You Took My Talk: Aboriginal Literacy and Empowerment". Members of the committee have worked in the best traditions of committees of this House to achieve this unanimously endorsed set of recommendations. The report issues a challenge to the Government of Canada, ministers of education of each province and territory and to aboriginal leadership.

In the closing month of this year, the United Nations International Literacy Year of 1990, the committee challenges governments and aboriginal leadership to seize the momentum, focus on this issue and put in place the means to deal with the literacy challenge over the longer term.

As a closing comment I should note, that this is the first time a committee report has been presented to this House with the recommendations translated into three of Canada's aboriginal languages, namely Cree, Inuktitut and Ojibway. There are some 53 aboriginal languages in Canada. All have equal value, but for practical reasons only the three most commonly used inscripted languages could be included in this report. The inclusion of these languages is a symbolic recognition of the value of all aboriginal languages. It also recognizes the important relationship between the aboriginal language and literacy.

I also submit the full report in both official languages.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response within 150 days.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development in both official languages.

Canada must compete, and this is exactly to what the report refers. We have to compete to trade and we have to trade to exist. All of the witnesses who appeared before the committee made a clear statement that science and technology are the driving force to create jobs here in Canada, jobs to improve our productivity, to sell smarter and to maintain our standard of living.

In this report, we have made recommendations for improved education at all levels, better training, a sound, stable economic environment, clearer tax provisions and increased technology transfers. We also want to see strong alliances among governments, industry and educational institutions.

There were some important items such as literacy, sustainable development and labour adjustment areas which we did not study. We have not given a report on those areas, mainly due to the fact that we had time limitation and the membership of our committee was changing quite rapidly.

In conclusion, pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests a comprehensive response to the report within 150 days.

BILL C-223—LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-223, an act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace.

There is one amendment, Madam Speaker.

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and honoured to present a petition on behalf of 87 students and staff of St. James Collegiate located in my riding of Winnipeg St. James.

This petition relates to the environment and specifically the Rafferty-Alameda dams project in Saskatchewan. The petition reads as follows:

> Whereas the courts have ruled that a full environmental review must be conducted on the Rafferty-Alameda dams project in Saskatchewan;
> Whereas construction on the Rafferty-Alameda dams project should have stopped during this environmental review;
> Whereas construction has now resumed upon this project without an environmental assessment having been completed; and
> Whereas this project may have serious repercussions upon the environment, including fish, migratory birds and the lands of the province of Manitoba and the federal government;
> Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take every possible action to stop construction on the Rafferty-Alameda dams project and to ensure that a full environmental assessment is conducted.

I would like to congratulate the students and staff of St. James Collegiate on their initiative. I thank them for caring, and we are all very proud of them.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I have one other batch of petitions. This batch of petitions comes from the city of Edmonton. It is pretty straightforward. It says:

> The Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation and without hiatus to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers, and now proposes to include them in the goods and services tax.

The petitioners from the city of Edmonton humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to table nearly 1,000 names on these petitions gathered by CJBK radio station in London, Ontario.

These petitioners are calling on the government to withdraw MMT from the gasoline in Canada and replace it with ethanol, an environmentally friendly additive and octane enhancer.

These petitioners are aware that the use of ethanol would reduce carbon dioxide emissions rather than increase them. It would be a much more positive move than the proposals presented in the green plan yesterday.

FISHERIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is from many people, particularly in the Chinese Canadian community in British Columbia, who are concerned about the diminishing supply of live codfish, which is an essential food for their community.

• (1540 )

They state that live codfish is a commodity of high cultural and economic value as a staple fresh food to Asian Canadians and for millions of tourists who visit Canada. It is always in demand by Canadian families, restaurants and stores. The petitioners further state that because of negligent management of the commercial fishery and the unfair allocation to the sport fishery sector, there is a trend of increasingly seasonal and area closures.

This is disrupting what was formally a year-round fishery. If this trend of federal government negligence towards the live cod fishery continues, these fish soon will not be available especially to some 200,000 Canadians of Chinese descent who live throughout B.C.

Therefore the petitioners demand that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans recognize the special value of these fish to the Asian community and to visitors to Canada, and immediately initiate management action that will ensure that a year-round supply of live codfish is available. This must include adequate federal attention to the long-term sustainable management of these fish and their fair allocation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox–Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people in the communities of Victoria, Port Alberni, Nanaimo, and Qualicum Beach, British Columbia who express concern about the way the federal government conducted the negotiations with the people at Oka during the crisis this summer.

The petitioners stated that they expect the Government of Canada to immediately act upon its authority and responsibility and deal in a just manner with the struggle of all aboriginal peoples in Canada to have their land claims and rights properly addressed. Inaction on the part of the federal authorities will only continue to antagonize race relations in Canada, and provoke dangerous and ignorant acts of racism.

This petition is circulated by the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs and the Manitoba Coalition Organized Against Apartheid.

VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to again present petitions from two volunteer fire departments in Nova Scotia; one from Stellarton, Nova Scotia, and the other one from the Hantsport Fire Department in Hantsport, Nova Scotia.

The petitioners say that since fire departments provide a vital service in protecting lives and property of all citizens, and whereas the federal Department of Communications has imposed huge fee increases for radio telecommunications which include radio licence fees, and since these prohibitive costs could place a severe burden on these fire departments, and since these fire departments are operated by volunteers who give freely of their time to protect the community, they call upon the government to see the folly of its ways and to live up to a commitment made back in 1986 by the then Minister of Communications to exempt fire departments. They are asking that these fire department exemptions be reinstated as was promised by the former Minister of Communications.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): I have another set of petitions. It is appropriate that these are being presented today. Again these are petitions from my riding of Dartmouth. Many people in the Dartmouth–Halifax area are fundamentally, absolutely, 100 per cent irrevocably opposed to this government's crazy goods and services tax.

They are petitioning this government to come to its senses and scrap the tax and not do what it was going to do perhaps today or tomorrow, and that is to use the tyranny of the majority in the other place to push forward this unpopular tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, regarding the proposed goods and services tax.

The petitioners make two points, one that the government ought to reconsider proceeding with this unfair regressive tax and also to point out that the Liberals in the Senate had a number of occasions when they could have actually defeated the tax, but for some mysterious reason, chose not to do so. Presumably they wish to give the impression that they are opposing it. On five different occasions they could have defeated the tax, but they chose not to.

FISHERIES ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C–74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise and discuss Bill C–74. It is an honour to speak to it because it not only affects many of the residents of my riding of Hillsborough, but it affects all residents of Prince Edward Island and indeed many Canadians who are involved in the fishing industry.

The fishery has undergone a tremendous amount of change in the past number of years and I am sure that in years to come change will become a very integral part of this industry. Much of it has been and will continue to be painful. This fact is confirmed by various reports and recommendations such as the Kirby report, the Harris report and the Haché report. Members of this House and of the other place have also studied the fishery and have attempted to make recommendations to this government.

The major feature of the bill we are debating today is a response to some of these recommendations. It would impose a substantial increase in penalties for violations of fisheries law, such as illegal dumping, discarding or misreporting of fish, fishing in enclosed areas, or damaging fish habitat.

A study conducted by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on the management of groundfish in the Scotia–Fundy region of the east coast, the Haché task force, revealed that the maximum fines provided for in the act are regarded by many in the industry simply as a cost of doing business. Therefore, this bill will introduce substantially increased penalties for general fisheries offences.

The bill also attempts to establish proper means of collecting and verifying catches and data. The Haché task force observed that motivation to misreport the areas of species fish is high, and that industry participants had repeatedly claimed that such data was flawed. As a result, the accuracy of information received by the department is questionable due to large scale misreporting and enforcement problems.

In February of 1990, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans released the Harris report on the state of the northern cod stock. The report, written by Dr. Leslie Harris of Memorial University, concluded that a vital goal of management strategy must be the improvement of data used in assessment. It noted the misreporting of catches, disregard rates, and other significant inaccuracies in commercial catch data.

It is now obvious that the industry must be better managed by imposing stiffer penalties for violations and by more effective enforcement. If the government is indeed committed to such initiatives, then it must also ensure that representatives of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are well trained and well-equipped to carry out their heightened duties. It is in all our interests to see the industry better policed, but mere words will not accomplish this. I hope the government will follow up with action.

It is also in all our interests to see the fishery better managed over all. I am afraid that we seriously doubt the government's commitment to doing so. We question the government's commitment to the fishery and to the people who depend upon it, directly or indirectly, to survive. We question the government's commitment to the people and to the economy of Atlantic Canada in general. The mismanagement of our primary resource, the fishery, provides a tragic metaphor for this lack of commitment.

Stiffer penalties and better enforcement, while admirable, are mere band-aid measures for an industry that is being neglected to death by the government. The government's only action, thus far, has been to cut quotas in the name of stock preservation and to attempt to silence the industry with its inadequate fishery aid package of last winter. I will not discuss in detail the many criticisms of such actions, but I will say that the government's response must go beyond such band-aid measures and must use federal resources of funds, expertise, and information to bring about a fundamental restructuring of the economy, both regional and national. Economic development and diversification must be part of the response to the crisis in the fishery, to the crisis that is facing Atlantic Canada.

The east coast is extremely dependent on the fishery. In Prince Edward Island, the fishery is one of three major areas of the economy. Prince Edward Island has approximately 2,500 fishermen, 2,500 plant workers, and 1,400 ancillary workers. These people make up about 10 per cent of the provincial work force and the fishery makes up about 30 per cent of the province's total export market.

It is a sad fact of human nature that when times are good we tend to ignore such imbalances. We fail to acknowledge, or we do not let ourselves acknowledge, the potential for problems. Well, the good times are over. Why can the government not admit that some fundamental mistakes have been made, and why does it not have the guts to correct them?

As I said before, violations of fishery laws by Canadian fishermen and the lack of effective enforcement by DFO are only part of the problem. The plundering of Canadian fish stocks by foreign vessels has to stop if there is to be any hope of replenishing our fish stocks. Fish in Canadian waters must go to Canadian fishermen first. We must not delude ourselves that the Europeans, for example, care about the state of the northern cod stock or the crisis facing Atlantic Canada. When there are no more fish, either for the Spanish or Portuguese ships, they are not going to be too upset about Atlantic Canada. They will go back home, leaving chaos in their wake. Why will the Canadian government not stand up for its own resource and for its own people?

Every time we ask the government what has been done to convince the European community of the damage it is wreaking upon the east coast and of our sovereignty over our own resource, we hear that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister for International Trade are talking. And, yes, I will agree that they do a lot of that, as does the government, but nothing happens. If the results of the agricultural talks at the recent GATT negotiations are any indication, the government can talk the ear off anybody. But, again, nothing happens. The Europeans, like any other nationalistic or economic bloc, are looking out for their own interests and they are making no bones about that. If only Canadians felt that their government was doing the same.

But they do not. How can they when every move the government makes seems calculated to do as much damage as possible at a time when further strain on the economy is disastrous? The Atlantic fishery, which is the corner-stone of our regional economy and the livelihood, directly and indirectly, of so many Atlantic Canadians, is under siege. What does the federal government do at this time of crisis? Does it come forth with long-term strategies, or does it come forth with even meaningful short-term measures? No, Madam Speaker, instead, it guts the unemployment insurance system, the one thing that could carry these people through the long, cold, mean, miserable, recessive year that is to come.

The people of Atlantic Canada do not look upon the UI system as a form of social welfare, as some members opposite are fond of claiming. The seasonal and the fragile nature of the regional economy, such as the fishery, as well as agriculture and tourism, have dictated that the UI system is a vital safety net for our people. Although positive reform is not a bad thing, the government's slash and burn approach to reform is thoughtless at best, cruel at worst, and regressive for certain.

The government claims that its withdrawal of funds from the UI system, its toughening of qualifications, and its shortening of benefits will, in fact, be of greater benefit to the unemployed worker than before. I have not time now to explore the government's amazing mental and economic gymnastics, fascinating as this would be. All I will say is that right now, having mismanaged the fishery almost to death, the government has pulled the rug out from under Atlantic Canadians. So, funds will be allocated to retraining programs. Members from throughout the Atlantic have been saying for months that retraining is not the only answer. The regional economy also needs a sustained, realistic commitment from the federal government.

The past Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said it himself. He admitted that it is tough in Atlantic Canada to talk about retraining or restructuring entire communities. The Atlantic economy, the fishery in particular, is not like a factory in Toronto. But I say, with some commitment from the federal government, vitally needed restructuring need not be impossible for Atlantic Canada. The people of Atlantic Canada, the fishermen, and residents are waiting.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise to debate Bill C-74. The fishing industry is a major concern in my riding of Surrey North. I would like to talk about some of the reasons why it is so important to my riding.

As most people will know, the Fraser River is one of the borders of my riding and, of course, the Fraser River is the home of the world's largest salmon run. It is vital to the riding. We have a major Fraser River salmon fishing fleet that is tied up within the Fraser and the New Westminster docks, and the importance of that resource to the riding in economic terms is well known within the community.

We also have within Surrey a large number of offshore or deep sea fishermen who fish for cod, halibut, herring, and shellfish. The offshore fishermen established themselves in Surrey as a good family-oriented community where they could raise their families and invest in the future of the community. They have played a major part in the economic and cultural well-being of the riding.

In addition, we have a large number of people who work in the fish processing industry, both in the landing and processing of fish. Some of them work within the municipality and others work in Vancouver, Richmond, and particularly at Steveston.

Fourth, we have a large retail industry that is dependent upon the fishing industry by supplying gear and clothing and in terms of boat building and boat repair. All up and down the Fraser River there are small marinas that work on boats, both on the Fraser River boats and boats that go out into the Pacific Ocean.

Fifth and sixth, the Fraser River and the fishing industry is very important in terms of food supply. Increasingly Canadians have been turning to fish for a source of dietary protein. The consumption of fish in nearly all communities has increased dramatically over the last several years and as my colleague from Vancouver East mentioned earlier, there are certain types of fish, particularly cod, that have a great deal of importance to the Asian community, not only as a food source for themselves but to the restaurant industry.

The Asian restaurant industry is a vital part of our tourist trade in Vancouver and on the lower mainland, so the community of Surrey has a vital stake in the fishing industry. It is important that that industry survive, prosper and grow.

Surrey is a family community. It does not have a large industrial base. It relies on small industry, on fishing, and it is in may ways a bedroom community for metropolitan Vancouver. The families there need the stability in order to ensure that they are able to pay their own mortgages, to provide the necessary income for the municipality in the form of taxes to operate our schools, and recreation facilities. Anything that threatens the viability of the fishing industry threatens the viability of Surrey itself.

We have a number of issues that right now are critical to the viability of that industry. Some relate to things that are taking place directly in Surrey. I will give one example called the Surrey Bend. It is a fish habitat area on the Fraser River. It is the last freshwater marsh on the Fraser River estuary and covers several hundreds of acres. It is a habitat for young fish fry coming down the Fraser River before they go out to sea. It is a source of nutrients. It is teeming with other wildlife and it is being threatened by industrial development that simply wants to backfill it for cheap industrial land.

The fisheries department has started to look at it, but even at this late date has not ordered a full environmental impact study. The municipality is desperately trying to rezone the land as environmental and recreational to prevent it.

This type of fish habitat is what Bill C–74 must protect. There are some good parts of this bill because it does talk about increasing the fines and getting better information necessary to protect the fish habitat. We also have a major problem of pollution on the Fraser River as it relates to fishing.

The quality of the water in the Fraser River by the time it reaches Surrey is no longer suitable for agricultural purposes. It threatens, according to people within the fisheries department, the survival rate of young fish stock.

The quality of water is damaged by upstream sewage being dumped into it. Some of that sewage is raw. Some has at least been given primary treatment. It is being polluted by pulp mills upstream at Prince George and Kamloops. At places in the Fraser River 2 per cent of the water is pulp mill effluence.

It is being threatened by lumber practices on the Fraser River, including log haulage and the dumping of hog fuel near it or along its banks with the leakage going into the Fraser River.

We have other major environmental threats to the Fraser River, including the diversion that Alcan is now undertaking on the Nechako River. This government, combined with the provincial government, has given them permission to go ahead without an environmental impact study on a diversion that is going to drop the level of the Fraser River three feet at Hell's Gate.

The damage to the fishing industry is totally unknown. We are threatening the whole viability of the Fraser River fishing industry by allowing Alcan to divert without an environmental assessment. It is all very nice for Bill C–74 to talk about the fact that it is going to increase penalties and allow for the collection of better information.

What we have seen repeatedly is this government and the provincial Socred government in British Columbia—which in B.C., we have learned, is what you get when you amalgamate the Tories and the Liberals—not enforcing the existing legislation that they have.

Under the B.C. Water Act, fish and wildlife are not even recognized as users of water. We have the federal government simply not even enforcing the powers that it now has.

Clearly, we have had examples in B.C. of the existing legislation not being used. I would like to quote from my Department of Fisheries and Oceans memo of November 1988:

> We—

This is DFO officials:

> —have determined that DFO friendly corporations enjoy relative immunity from the Fisheries Act.

The memo went on to state:

> It must be appreciated that DFO habitat enforcement has reached an all time inconsistency.

> Finally, it could appear that Alcan, amongst others, are given immunity from the law, and we are just going after the little guy.

Madam Speaker, they will go after somebody who has had a spill of minor proportions into the Fraser River and, at the same time, will allow Alcan without an environmental impact study to drop the level of the Fraser River three feet. You begin to realize why the people in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans became frustrated.

The federal government brought forward its much awaited green plan. We have been told that one of the priorities that was going to be addressed in the green plan was the Fraser River.

The green plan came forward. It has three quarters of one page that talks about in general, vague terms, doing something about the Fraser River in 1992.

This is in contrast to the NDP caucus report on the Fraser River that we brought forward on November 30 under the chairmanship of the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, which contained 50 pages on what had to be done immediately, and how it could proceed in terms of the Fraser River.

One wonders: Where is the commitment of the government when on three quarters of a page it talks of generalities and platitudes like monitoring, compliance and increasing enforcement measures.

They do not even talk about when, how or where. It says that by 1992, mechanisms will be established for co-ordination.

In the NDP Fraser River task force recommendations were some details of how it could be done. We talked about an integrated management structure because that is one of the things that has to happen between provincial bodies, federal bodies and municipal bodies.

Mr. Reid: How much is that going to cost?

Mr. Karpoff: I do not care what it is going to cost. It is going to be a hell of a lot cheaper than losing that salmon industry.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Karpoff: That is one of the things you guys over there better understand. The cost is not just simply in maintaining—

An hon. member: Tell the Tory to be quiet.

Mr. Karpoff: So you spend a billion dollars to save an industry that is vital to this country.

An hon. member: I don't mind. Do you?

Mr. Karpoff: No. One of the other things that the report by the New Democratic Party talked about was the need for a regional water management authority. There are a number of basins along the Fraser River. You cannot just talk about the Fraser River as if it is the lower estuary. You have to talk about a number of the other sub-basins along that river. You have to get water management authorities in each of those basins that have some co-ordinated plan.

An hon. member: How do you plan to do that?

Mr. Karpoff: Pollution abatement. This report goes into detail about how you have to get systematic pollution abatement going. It is simply not good enough to issue a three-quarter page statement that contains no content or clear picture of where they are going, and that certainly leaves people in British Columbia with a sense that there is no commitment from this government.

Another area that it talks about is industrial discharge. This is a serious problem. Yes, the cost is going to be high. There is no doubt of that, not only probably in direct money by the government, but to industries. Profitable industries are going to have to meet pollution standards. They are going to have to do it with enforcement.

The green plan presumes they are going to go along and everybody is going to co-operate. We have seen repeatedly in British Columbia where companies have simply looked at pollution fines as a licence to pollute. They are quite willing to pay the fines because they know that they are cheaper than putting in the pollution equipment.

An hon. member: Business as usual.

Mr. Karpoff: Sewage treatment. This government has been requested repeatedly by the Union of Mayors and Municipalities to make money available for municipal infrastructures, including sewage treatment. Many of the municipalities simply do not have the financial resources to bring sewage treatment up to the level necessary to save the Fraser River.

Habitat enhancement. I noticed this nice little statement in the green plan by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He does not say when he is going to announce a plan to increase the fish population of the river. He said: "The objectives will be achieved through stock rebuilding, protection of the habitat base". There is no talk about how they are going to protect the habitat base.

I at least hoped they would mention the Surrey Bend in there as one of the major habitat areas under threat. I do not even think that the government knows about the Surrey Bend and what the threat is or what impact it will have.

In conclusion, the New Democrats support some of the things in Bill C–74, but we are frightened that unless there is a change in the will of this government, something far more forthcoming than what has been vaguely outlined in the green plan, this bill is not going to protect the fish in the Fraser River or elsewhere. What is really needed in this country is the political will. I have not seen the political will in Bill C–74, or certainly not in the green plan.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, you will find consent for the following motion:

> That tomorrow at 5 p.m. debate on government business No. 25 and on any amendment thereto be deemed completed and voting on such be deemed deferred to 7 p.m. Monday, December 17.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Madam Speaker, there have been some discussions with the various House leaders of the respective parties, and we would grant our consent both to the introduction of the motion as well as its contents.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, our party agrees with the motion as well.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Surrey North for putting some excellent comments on the record in terms of his concerns about Bill C–74, respecting fish habitat protection, and about the Fraser River, a major river in British Columbia. I know all members of this House are aware of it and how it relates so importantly to the questions we have been debating in this legislation.

The question or comment I would like to put to the member is actually a reference from a document to which I referred yesterday, I believe it was, in the House when we started debate on Bill C–74. This document has been prepared by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on the Fraser River. I would like to read briefly from it and ask the hon. member to comment on it. I think it is an indication of what many of the witnesses had to say in committee on this bill and a lot of the comments members are making about the political will to ensure that the good deeds we are likely to pass today in this bill are in fact followed and carried out.

Page 18 of the report reviews the Fraser River. It takes a look at productivity in terms of salmon production of all species. It reviews from top to bottom some of the concerns of the department about the river. In fact, as I said yesterday, it is a very controversial document and actually a very revealing one.

I would like the hon. member to comment on the reporter wherein it refers to the Fraser River and the lower Fraser from Hope to New Westminster, that part of the river. It comments on the present status and reads: "The lower mainland supports over 50 per cent of the B.C. population and the impacts of constant industrial and urban development have taken a significant toll in production in many urban streams and the Fraser River foreshore. Past diking of rivers and hydro development has caused great losses to the resource".

There is the comment about the future of the river: "With present development practices a loss of salmon production in the urban areas will inevitably continue and the streams will eventually cease to be productive. Urban development, land use practices and technologies must change. All streams must be protected by buffer zones and not be considered storm sewers. Urban run-off must be treated".

Could the hon. member comment on that in relation to his experience with issues in his riding related to the Fraser River, on what the expectations may be arising out of Bill C–74, and if there are some hopes that the announcement of the green plan, if and when we get some specifics, may in fact result in some action from this government?

Mr. Attewell: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I compliment the member for the way he spoke. It was very calm and I could hear. However, when the member for Surrey North replies, I wonder if he might just think of some of us. I must say, without any offence, that my ears are sore from his shouting. We have a very good sound system here. I went outside and turned down the TV when the member was speaking because it was too loud. He should feel free just to speak in a normal tone, and we can listen. This is the season to be generous.

• (1620)

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, if that is the way to get the attention of Tories over there, I will speak even louder. It is time they started to listen. Once they start to listen, then maybe we can calm it down. One of the things that happen is that you guys don't listen unless someone somehow knocks you on the head.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, order. The hon. member may want to address the Chair and not other hon. members directly.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, one of the things I think my hon. friend from Prince George—Bulkley Valley mentioned is the question of political will. We in the New Democratic Party wonder about the political will, particularly when we look at the fact that on November 23 again there were cuts to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans amounting to $11 million, which certainly distract from its ability to carry out enforcement procedures.

My friend asked about problems in Surrey. When I first moved to Surrey many streams in Surrey municipality were salmon spawning streams. Salmon came up Bear Creek and some of the other small streams. Now it is very uncommon to see any salmon coming up those streams. They are lost in terms of salmon fishing.

Another thing that has happened is the loss of habitat. The habitat has been overtaken predominantly by industrial development along the foreshore of the Fraser River. Nearly 90 per cent of the foreshore has been expropriated by the CNR. It expropriated everything along the Fraser River from the Patella Bridge almost up to the Langley border, including putting in an interval yard adjacent to Surrey Bend, again without any assessment of the environmental damage.

The whole question of how to protect the habitat systematically, which has to be done stream by stream and foreshore by foreshore, is vital. As well we have to look at it industry by industry all the way from the headwaters down in terms of pollution.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the third reading of Bill C–74.

We all know the troubles facing the fishing industry in this country. In Atlantic Canada there is a constant fear that tough times will become even tougher as we wait for the 1991 management plan. On the west coast many fishermen are terrified by the damage being done by the individual transferable quotas or ITQs.

The people of Atlantic Canada know what hard times are like. We had many hard times through the years, but in the last six years this government has certainly contributed to them, particularly in the fishing industry. When we look at the government cuts we look at ACOA, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and Marine Atlantic. A prime example of the government's inconsiderateness was the closure of CFB Summerside, a very important part of our economy and a way in which the government could stimulate the economy in Prince Edward Island. Without any thought at all it removed CFB Summerside, which was also used to patrol our coastal fishery.

Members of the Liberal Party welcomed the government announcement that it would increase penalties for fisheries offences. The minister of fisheries committed himself to stiffening the fines for people who violated the act by overfishing. The bill before the House today was a long time in coming, and we are glad to see it here. The bill goes a long way in addressing the needs of fishermen in all parts of the country. Despite this, the bill does not go far enough.

One of the biggest problems facing fishermen in my riding is the state of the wharfs and harbours in Prince Edward Island, and in particular in Cardigan. A wharf to a fisherman is like a hammer to the carpenter. If one removes the hammer, the carpenter cannot work. In this situation, we are not keeping the wharfs in shape and therefore we are hampering the fishermen in making a living in Atlantic Canada, particularly in Cardigan.

What are fishermen to do when the wharf walls and the cribbing are rotting away? This is the situation with many wharfs, like those at Beach Point, Fortune, Georgetown, Graham's Pond, Launching, Montague, Murray Harbour, Naufrage, and Savage Harbour. In Savage Harbour, two years ago, there was a problem with the breakwater. If $25,000 could have been spent in that area at that time, the situation would have been rectified; but it has been let go on and on, and of course the bill has escalated. At Graham's Pond, we have the same situation. At that wharf the bill has now escalated to $1 million or $1 million plus. It is time that the government put some funding into wharf repair in Atlantic Canada.

When I was elected in 1988, I made it a priority to help fishermen get work done on their wharfs. I have to admit that we had very little success. As I said, a job which at that time would have been worth about $25,000 has now escalated to $300,000. If fishermen are to prosper in Prince Edward Island and in the rest of the country, we simply have to put more money into wharfs.

Something else which this bill does not address is the entire question of enforcement. True, there are clauses dealing with the power of the fisheries officers, but there is nothing dealing with the question of staffing. During the committee hearings on the bill there was almost total agreement among the witnesses that DFO was not adequately staffed.

One witness, Mr. Jim Rushton of United Fishermen and Allied Workers, said:

> There has been a consistent cutback over the last 10 years in the percentage of the budget for enforcement. That needs to be strengthened. A fine will not deter someone who believes they will not be caught.

It is obvious to all that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is understaffed. There are fisheries officers working 20 hours a day. One witness told us of an area where there were two fisheries officers taking care of seven wharfs. I am sure that is the problem in many areas. There is just not enough staff to take care of doing the job properly.

If that were not bad enough, DFO is now faced with more budget cuts as a result of the government's poor fiscal management. A sum over $11 million has now been cut from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Capital expenditures, travel costs and, more important, overtime may be cut back. Fisheries officers have a difficult enough time doing their jobs without more restraint. Fisheries officers truly know how important their jobs are but, if they cannot be paid, they cannot do their job.

Witnesses told the committee that problems also exist in our judicial system. Simply put, judges and Crown prosecutors do not place enough emphasis on crimes that occur off our shores. Many judges do not view fisheries violations as being crimes, but to me no other word fits.

What do we call it when a logging company drives a CAT tractor through the headwater of a river where salmon are spawning, destroying a rich and valuable resource? What do we call it when an outlawed fisherman catches 100,000 pounds over his quota, or when a boat captain assaults a fisheries officer who boards his vessel?

Still others believe that Fisheries Act offences are victimless. What happens when a fisherman from Georgetown, Prince Edward Island has his quota cut simply because somebody else has overfished? In this situation, the fisherman from Georgetown is paying the penalty for the crime.

Also, in this situation there is less fish. The fish plant workers are cut back and, it is a direct slam on the economy of eastern Prince Edward Island.

Some witnesses questioned why there was not a whistle blower provision in the bill that would protect those people who report violations of the act. This would be especially true for employees of companies that break the law. Some protection should be given to these people. Even fishermen need protection when they report and testify against their fellow fishermen who have overfished or used undersized mesh. One witness, Mr. Evan Walters of the Scotia–Fundy Seashore Fishermen's Association suggested:

> Something that might do well is the Crime Stoppers system. We have been advocating this for two or three years now. We like this system of some financial reward. There is nothing like money to move the wheels of justice.

Mr. Walters pointed out a number of cases that he knew about where fishermen had sugar poured into their gas tanks or had their tires slashed. He told of one situation where a fisherman had his boat set on fire. These people need protection, and there is nothing in this bill to provide it.

During the committee hearings there was much talk about minimum fines and the like. A number of witnesses from the west coast suggested that they had no problem with the idea. However, fishermen from the east coast were almost unanimous in their dislike of minimum fines.

It was suggested that Fisheries and Oceans should make better use of its power to suspend or cancel the licences of violators. It was believed that this was a much fairer way of dealing with the situation. Suspending a licence could be useful in dealing with the person who breaks the law just once, and the person who brazenly breaks the law every chance he can get. Basically the system would work like this.

A fisherman overfished his cod quota in 1990 by 5,000 pounds and is convicted. In 1991 his licence would be suspended for a period of time that would be equivalent to fishing that amount of fish or more, which would include a fine above the total amount of the catch. This punishment would fit the crime. If a fisherman catches too much this year, then he loses it the next year.

As we all know, this bill is part and parcel of the fisheries aid package that the Minister of Fisheries announced back in May. It is a part of the government's over-all plan of helping the Atlantic fishing industry, flowing from the Haché and Harris reports. The studies done by these two men have been helpful in outlining some of the many problems faced in the Scotia-Fundy and Newfoundland regions of DFO. However, there has been no study done in the Gulf region.

The fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is in a desperate state. In some parts the groundfish stocks have all but disappeared, leaving fishermen and communities in a desperate state. This government has not taken any action to help find solutions to the problems in the Gulf fishery. Until something is done, the situation will only get worse. While the government should help those communities suffering from the declines in the northern cod, it also should be working on the prevention of a total collapse in the stocks of the Gulf, including groundfish and crab.

I certainly would not want to give the impression that there was nothing positive about this bill. There are some giant steps forward, especially in the area of fish habitat protection. Before this bill, the maximum penalty for the destruction of fish habitat was $10,000. This is less than the cost of doing business. To put it another way, a $10,000 fine would be equivalent to the cost of a few paper clips for the government. Those sections of the Fisheries Act were basically not adhered to at all. However, the fines have been increased to $1 million for some serious charges. This is certainly going to show the violators that the government is serious in protecting the fish habitat and that their actions certainly will not be tolerated.

The provisions for the charging of company officers for the violations of their employees is also an important advance. With this new section, corporate officials of Nat Sea, British Columbia Packers or MacMillan Bloedel will have to deal with the possibility that they can be charged if they allow for the destruction of fish habitat, or allow a fishing captain to overcatch his quota.

This bill also allows the courts to impose what are called alternative measures at the time of sentencing. The court can order a person to perform community service, have the person publish the details of the offence or order them to restore a disturbed site. In the fish habitat area, if someone goes in with a bulldozer or whatever, he will be forced to repair the damage. This is a very positive part of the bill.

These provisions will allow the government to properly manage our valuable fish resources. However, if the government is truly committed to preserving our fish stocks, and a way of life for hundreds of thousands of Canadians, it must give Fisheries and Oceans the dollars to do the job. Cutting $11 million from the budget is certainly not the way to help Fisheries and Oceans do their job. Fines are very important. We must show that we are going to stop the violators but we also show the violators we have the means to stop them. We are putting the funds in the area and we will have the officers and enough equipment to patrol the coast. But in this situation we do not.

The government has to be prepared to educate the judiciary so that judges are aware of how serious violations of the Fisheries Act are. If the government does not act on this and the recommendations of committee witnesses, then it has to be prepared to deal with the total destruction of a 400-year old way of life in Canada.

I urge the government to put the necessary extra funding back into DFO. Let us repair the wharfs and put them in a proper state. I mentioned Savage Harbour. At Fortune it is not safe to drive a fishing vessel alongside the wharf. There is debris sticking out and a vessel could be destroyed. It is going to get worse as time goes on. We need to spend the dollars now. If a window blows out of a building and we do not repair it and a door blows off, after a while the building will fall down. If we put a few dollars into wharf repair now, we will have the wharfs in a proper condition and the fishermen of Atlantic Canada will at least be able to fish.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Cardigan for a very balanced and comprehensive overview of this legislation and of many other matters affecting fisheries policy.

I would also like to pay tribute to his excellent work on the committee studying Bill C–74. As other members who participated in that committee will know, he was a very diligent and hard working member. He spoke well on behalf of the fishermen in his riding and indeed, of all the Gulf of St. Lawrence region.

I would like to note as well that he moved an amendment to this legislation which would have provided additional protection for lobster fishermen. That amendment, had the government seen fit to accept it—I still do not understand why they would not—would have benefited not only the fishermen in his area but the lobster fishermen in my area as well.

Indeed, the member mentioned a number of points of concern in his remarks on which I would ask him to embellish if he would. As he said, we support the principle of higher, more stringent fines for fisheries violations, particularly in this time when the resource has been declining and where the consequences for this industry are dramatic.

There remains a concern, particularly with the resource declining, of the application of these fines and especially of the fact that it seems that those most vulnerable will be the inshore fishermen. I want to ask the member, particularly with his great knowledge of the inshore fishery in his area, whether he believes that the act by itself will be sufficient to protect those inshore fishermen.

Also, in his opening remarks he mentioned the individual transferable quotas, which was a recommendation of the Haché task force, concerning the licensing for a large segment of the fishery. He made a point that I think is very relevant not only to the immediate debate of Bill C–74 but to fisheries policies in general. These individual transferable quotas, if not properly regulated, can have a devastating effect on the smaller fisherman who will be facing reduced catches. The quota will not be enough for the small fisherman to survive. Consequently we will see a gradual buying out of the smaller fisherman by larger fishing firms. I would like to ask the member for Cardigan if that is not a fear that he has about the fishermen in his area with respect to this individual transferable quota and other policies of this government.

Finally, the hon. member made a plea for greater expenditure on wharf construction. I could not agree with him more, but I also want to note that part of this government's plan has been the fisheries adjustment package which if my memory serves me right has not been of great value to the fishermen of Prince Edward Island. Perhaps he would like to comment on that as well.

Mr. MacAulay: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague from Cape Breton. Of course we are very concerned about individual transferable quotas and that the fishery will be swallowed up by larger companies. Fines are adequate, but the problem is that we do not have DFO properly staffed to take care of the offshore. One of the prime examples would be in our area when Summerside air force base was closed, and the Tracker aircraft removed. This was something that should not have happened.

Concerning wharf repair in my district, I could go on for the day. It is a continuous battle to get a small amount of wharf repair, even general maintenance, in Cardigan in particular. For example, a $25,000 job after just one windstorm can become a $300,000 job. Shortly after that it becomes a million dollar job. If the fishermen do not have wharfs, there is no fishery.

Without a doubt we support the bill. But we need money for DFO and we need more wharf repair.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to participate in this rather rare moment of support for government legisla– tion, in this case regarding this very important bill, Bill C-74.

At the outset I want to say that my colleagues and I certainly do support this legislation in terms of recognizing the advantage of increasing the level of fines associated with convictions for general fishing offences as well as fisheries habitat offences. This is a move in the right direction, particularly when we look at the evidence. It is actually quite staggering. I have often wondered when one offends fisheries habitat, what is the cost? Is there a cost attached to it, if one is offending the fisheries generally?

The statistics that we were presented are from 1988, but it is fair to say that today it would be somewhat similar. In 1988, for the Pacific region alone, the convictions totalled 1,959, amounting to $320,000 in fines. The average fine for a general fishing offence was $266 and for the average sports fishing offence, the fine was $90. This seems to be rather weak. The telling aspect was that habitat convictions totalled 11, with an average fine of $3,135. In other words, out of all of the convictions of nearly 2,000, only 11 were the result of habitat problems. This comes at a time when we are concerned about the environment and reminds us all of too many scenes that we have seen.

I, for one, time and time again, have wandered up streams or canoed along lakes, only to notice that logging shows have been clear-cut in terms of whole mountainsides. We can argue the merit of that on a site-by-site basis, but we all know that when one logs a mountainside or a hillside down into a lake where fish are found, a band of trees is supposed to be left along the edge in order to protect the fisheries habitat. Often that is not the case. The logging takes place right into the river, right into the stream bed, or right into the lake.

The company then is caught. It is fined $3,135 if it is caught. Of course, that is the cost of one good B.C. tree. When a mile of lakefront is harvested, we can see very quickly that a company would reap literally hundreds of thousands of dollars from that resource and in the process destroy what could be a very important fisheries habitat.

This legislation moves us now in the right direction. I think my colleagues would agree by saying that if one carries out fisheries habitat destruction, was caught, and had to pay a hefty fine, then so one should.

I want to congratulate my hon. friend for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. He put forward two very thoughtful amendments in the discussions in committee. They were some of the most thoughtful amendments I have ever witnessed while I have been a member of the House of Commons.

The first, for example, is an amendment that would fine an individual or a company guilty of a habitat infraction. Not only would they be fined appropriately—that is the minimum—but, if the court so ordered, but they would have to pay for the promotion of proper management and control of fisheries or fish habitat. We would be saying to the company: "Listen, you have carried out a dastardly deed in terms of the fishery habitat. While you probably should be serving 15 years in jail for this horrible offence against the environment, we as a court are going to say that you need to go out into the community and carry on a process to educate and demonstrate that you clearly understand what the offence of which you have been convicted." In a sense, it would help educate the public generally. I think it is an excellent amendment and I congratulate my colleague for that thoughtful interjection.

Mr. Riis: While I am dealing with the excellent amendments that my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley made, I will go on to one other very important issue which is the requirement that of the government, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, file with the Parliament of Canada on an annual basis a report that lists all of the convictions that have occurred in the previous year in terms of convictions regarding fisheries habitat destruction so that we, as members of Parliament, can be appraised annually of the work being done.

It is not because we do not trust the government. Probably we do not trust the government, but in terms of individuals within the cabinet, we can say, sure, there are honourable people there. We are going to look to the minister responsible for the fisheries habitat and say, on an annual basis, we will be waiting with bated breath—no pun intended—for this report so that we can see that things have changed. If we find out that in a year only 11 convictions occurred as a result of the fisheries habitat, we will be very disappointed. We would then like to point out that in fact the minister and the department have not lived up to the obligations of this legislation.

I think it is a nice watch-dog situation. This of course will be ongoing from government to government in the future. Again, it is an excellent initiative by the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Once again, Madam Speaker, I want to refer you to the work that has been recently completed by the federal New Democrats in terms of a task force on the Fraser River. We recognize this as the jewel in the British Columbia crown. Here is a river that makes sense for so many reasons, not least of which is the sports and commercial fishery attached to it, but of course the fact that it is the unifying ecological element that provides life for so much of the province of British Columbia, draining about one-third of that province.

Under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, a number of New Democrat colleagues who have been studying the entire watershed of the Fraser. This has been done for the first time. An excellent job was done by some very dedicated members of Parliament holding hearings throughout the region. This is on an ongoing basis. It will occur in the future as well to try to understand clearly all the implications in terms of the problems and challenges associated with that watershed.

Part of the hearings revealed an excellent presentation by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans from the Pacific Region. It presented a paper entitled, The Fraser: A River of Opportunity, in which it points out throughout the entire drainage some very serious concerns. I want to raise these today briefly, if I have time.

For the Thompson-Nicola system, mainly of course recognizing the production of chinook, coho, and pink salmon, the officials indicate in the paper that its present status is:

> An area of severe-water use conflicts that significantly impacts production due to physical destruction of the habitat (e.g. water diversions, channelization, etc.) low flows and high temperatures.

The paper continues:

> Water management legislation does not recognize fish as a legitimate user of water. Water quality impacts originating at Kamloops (i.e. sewage and pulpmill) make this area one of the three largest water quality hotspots on the entire Fraser River (in addition to the Prince George-Quesnel and [the greater Vancouver regional district areas]). Recent co-operative efforts have been made on the Bonaparte, Nicola and Deadman Rivers to restore or develop production through habitat improvement and better water management. Impacts of the Coquihalla Highway have been mitigated.

I want to take this opportunity to recognize the superb work being done by the tribal council and the Indian bands in the central interior in terms of taking the leadership in providing enhanced habitat for the fishery to the extent of developing their own nurseries. The native people of the area need to be commended for the leadership that they provided in developing fishery stocks of one kind or another in the area.

The report continues:

> This is an area where greater water use conflicts will occur. The inadequacy of water rights legislation must be addressed. Encroachment of linear facilities (highways, pipelines and railways) into habitat and salmon migration pathways are of concern and must be closely controlled.

Now, this becomes very scary. It continues:

> A large unstable rock cliff will eventually result in a slide at Black Canyon on the Thompson River. This is a special concern due to its inevitability and the potential to block the river.

This is almost a shocking revelation and something we have to address very seriously.

You will recall, I am sure, Madam Speaker, being a student of geology, that back in geologic time that particular part of the river was actually dammed off as a result of a major shift of glacial till into the valley and the entire system reversed and ran down through the Okanagan Valley. Over time, erosion occurred and the Thompson River now flows into the Fraser River and becomes part of that great drainage basin.

In passing, I should also mention that with regard to the North Thompson-Shuswap system, again recognizing the production of sockeye, chinook, coho and pink, the report states:

> The habitat basin in this area is under very great pressure from forest harvesting, wood processing, urbanization, recreation, agriculture, water diversion and flood control. Low flows, high temperatures and water quality are constant limitations to fish production in many streams. Shuswap Lake is one of the most important sockeye production lakes in B.C. However, it has been subjected to the greatest developmental pressures of all B.C. sockeye producers. The invasion of the aquatic nuisance plant Eurasian Milfoil into this system is also of concern to salmon habitat.

With regard to the future, the report states:

> In that logging, industrial and urban development has advanced in an unplanned manner—

—in other words, haphazard and chaotic—

> —this area could greatly benefit from a comprehensive land-use plan.

An hon. member: A SoCred manner.

Mr. Riis: Well, my hon. colleague says that this is often the way the Socreds approach development throughout the province. I am pleased to say that the regional district of that area has now taken the task upon itself to ensure that comprehensive land use planning occurs in a thoughtful manner in the future.

The report continues:

> Resolution of water conflicts and removal of the very old and obsolete Hydro Dam on the middle Shuswap River would increase fish production substantially. Intensive large scale agricultural activities with major water demands or effluent production must be isolated from the streams. Many opportunities exist for habitat restoration.

Anyone from that area would be very familiar with that.

Last, I want to refer to the North Thompson system. This is a system that is valuable in terms of the production of sockeye, chinook and coho salmon. Of course, I am just referring to the salmon. I could refer to the great and famous Kamloops trout that is found throughout this entire area. It is important particularly in terms of the sports fishery.

With regard to the present status of the North Thompson system, the report states:

> Streams flowing into the lower North Thompson River are under water-use pressures—from agriculture. Logging is the most widespread concern in the watershed.

This is particularly as a result of some clear-cut practices that are open to some serious question. I am pleased to say that the Canadian National twin-tracking impact has been mitigated.

For the future, the report states:

> Forest harvesting practices must be improved in order to protect the [fisheries] habitat. Water-use conflicts in the lower basin area must be resolved with the Province.

I could go on and on in some detail, Madam Speaker, but I simply want to say that this aspect of the report by the New Democratic Party Fraser River Task Force entitled, The Fraser River Under Siege and chaired by the hon. member for Okanagan-Shuswap makes these points. Of course, if anybody is interested in copies of this, they are certainly available.

I would be remiss, however, if I did not refer to the serious challenges facing steelhead in the Thompson Basin, particularly north and south of the Spences Bridge area. Not many years ago there used to be 20,000 or more steelhead in the area which, of course, was the basis for a major sports fishery. I have had the experience and pleasure of participating in steelhead fishing in the past myself and must say today things have changed dramatically. There are not 20,000 steelhead in the river any longer, there are fewer than 1,500. Just a few weeks ago, the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans allowed commercial salmon fishermen to set their nets during the height of the Thompson River run and an estimated 600 steelhead were killed in the fishery which was meant to harvest surplus chum salmon in the lower Fraser Valley. They assumed that only 15 steelhead would be lost but 600 were lost. There is a real fear now in the area that the steelhead run itself may even face extinction as a result of this unfortunate incident.

As a result, much of the interior hospitality industry which is dependent in this season on the steelhead run is literally going out of business. Many places have had to close because the fishermen and fisherwomen simply are not there because the fish are not there. I am disappointed personally because, not being the greatest fisherman, and because of the number, I will probably not catch any this year.

In closing, I want to say that we support Bill C-74 and will vote in favour of it. We will be watching the government closely to ensure that this whole matter of enhanced convictions, if you like, in terms of fines for general offences and especially fisheries habitat offences is an important step in the right direction. We will be watching the government as a result of my colleague's amendment, which will require annual reports to Parliament, in terms of the number of convictions associated with habitat destruction. I hope this will ensure that the Canadian fishery will advance in terms of increasing stocks and a more sophisticated use in terms of fisheries management.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise in the House today and give my comments on Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act. I am also pleased that, as a member from southern Ontario, my colleagues have given me the opportunity to speak on this bill, which affects our major fishing resources on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

We must not forget the fishing areas of our Great Lakes. Indeed, Lake Erie is well known for Olmstead Fisheries, which is the largest inland freshwater fishery in the world. Mr. LaVerne Kelly is just one person keenly interested in this bill. He is a fisheries inspector. As well, I am no stranger to fishing, Madam Speaker. The St. Clair River, the Chenal Ecarte, Mitchell's Bay, and Lake St. Clair are excellent areas for fishing, in fact the finest fishing in North America. I have been on the water many, many times.

In dealing with Bill C–74, as my Liberal colleagues from the maritimes have noted, we generally support the principle of the new penalties contained in the new legislation. But there are areas of concern. For example, most of the current surveillance effort is concentrated on the inshore sector. And the new resources provided for in the adjustment program are geared toward the inshore sector as well.

It stands to reason that those who will be caught will be overwhelmingly from the inshore sector. Let us look at the penalties. For a general fisheries offence and obstruction of a fishery officer, there is a fine of up to $100,000 on summary conviction and up to $500,000 on indictment, with options of jail terms for one and two years. The alteration of a fish habitat and pollution of a fish habitat are liable to a $300,000 fine, and up to $1 million on indictment, with options of imprisonment for six months to three years.

As well, Madam Speaker, the failure to provide habitat information could mean up to a $200,000 fine on summary conviction, and a court option of six months in jail for a second and for later offences.

These fines and penalties are important. Everyone would agree. Both the Harris and Haché reports recommended amendments to the Fisheries Act to increase fines and penalties for such violations.

These proposals were also part of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program released on May 7, 1990.

Those documents stated in part: "all the surveillance and enforcement in the world will not contribute to rebuilding the fish stocks, if those who break the law face fines that are considered the cost of doing business."

That says it in a nutshell. There must be a deterrence factor involved here. These higher fines and penalties will bring the Fisheries Act in line with deterrents contained in the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

As an aside, I could go on for hours about the Tories' Environmental Protection Act and how weak and feeble and gutless it is.

As we have seen from the minister when he presented his green plan to the House, the only thing good about it is that it is recyclable.

As we have seen, because I raised it in the House with the former Minister of the Environment, only 3 per cent of polluters were charged last year, and there is only one lonely Environment Canada inspector for all of Ontario.

Meanwhile, the government opposite will hire 4,000 new bureaucrats for the GST to make sure that ordinary Canadians comply with the tax rules.

And yet our environmental rules are not being enforced. It is my sincere hope that the new Fisheries Act does not follow the poor lead of this government's Environmental Protection Act. It is all words and no action. Let us hope that the legislation is followed to the letter.

Indeed, during committee hearings on this bill, Mr. Jim Rushton, of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union stated: "There has been a consistent cutback over the last 10 years in the percentage of the budget for enforcement. That needs to be strengthened. A fine will not deter someone who believes they will not get caught."

I have stated how most of the surveillance effort will be concentrated on the inshore fisheries. What about offshore?

We saw the embarrassing example last year of an American trawler ramming one of our navy ships in the Atlantic, and then hightailing it back to the east coast of the U.S.

Let us hope that never happens again. I know that my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has very strong views on that particular matter.

Overfishing is a chronic concern; the government never seems to put its money where its mouth is.

While tougher penalties are necessary, will the proposed legislation accomplish what it is intended to do? If we use the Environmental Protection Act as a guide, as an example of this government's commitment, then the new penalties in the Fisheries Act may just be words, just rhetoric, just promises.

Fishermen and all Canadians want action, not just public relations. While the government blows its horn on how wonderful the fines are, the proof will be in the results.

The government still lacks a comprehensive strategy to apprehend foreign violators, particularly American fishermen on the Canadian side of Georges Bank.

The proposed act will also require fishermen and processors to keep more detailed records. As well, fisheries officers will be given new powers to verify and seize such information. Penalties will be levied against those who fail to produce this information on request.

The bookkeeping requirements of Bill C–74 are extremely stringent.

For instance, Section 61(2) states that fishermen and purchasers may be required to keep records of the number, sex, size, weight, species, product form or other particulars of any fish caught.

Other information required will include the time and place of landings and type of gear, buildings and other equipment.

At first glance, that requirement seems overly draconian for our small, independent fishermen who are just trying to make a living in difficult circumstances.

Section 49 provides for inspection powers for fishery officers to examine records and books of account to verify information, but that is overkill for our fishermen.

I wonder if it is not too much to ask from them. It can be very time consuming for small companies to be audited in such a manner. Sections 78(2) and 78(3) could be seen as unreasonable. The terms of these sections must protect the innocent parties and convict with the full force of the law the guilty ones.

• (1710)

The current resources and personnel needed to enforce the new Fisheries Act are greatly lacking. As Evan Walters of the Scotia–Fundy Seashore Fishermen's Association told the committee: "There are 7 wharfs in my area, and they have 2 fisheries officers. We're back to 20 hours a day."

The government must commit new funds, more surveillance vessels and additional personnel to ensure that the provisions of this new act are executed.

While the increase in maximum fines will discourage illegal fishing, such a measure remains incomplete without the proper enforcement resources. It is unclear as well that given the hike in fines, minor offences could put small fishermen out of business. Many small operators are worried about the unequal treatment of enforcement.

Will they be fined as much as the big companies for the same offence? For large companies, a fine may just be the cost of doing business. The bill only points out the maximum penalty possible. There should also be a minimum fine.

Judges have a tendency to give lower fines; without any guidelines, the minimum practice is likely to continue. We must make sure that the fines are superior to the licensing fees. I quote Mr. Walters again: "The deterrent effect on this bill is and will only be as good as the determination and dedication of the judicial system."

On another issue, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is proposing that his new act will be part of the solution to many of the fisheries' current problems. He then concedes that more must be done for the conservation of stocks. Surveillance is a step in the right direction, but it is not the only answer to all of the problems for the modern fishing industry.

I would like to conclude by stating again that we on this side of the House, led by our fisheries critic, are in general support of the principles of Bill C–74. My only hope is that the new enforcement regulations, such as the three charter patrol vessels announced on October 2 of this year, do not follow the poor lead of the current Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Our fishing industry is in dire straits. The maritime provinces and the west coast depend on a successful and productive fishing industry. We need leadership on this issue. We have a lot of work to do.

As a member from southwestern Ontario, my riding knows the importance of the fishing industry. Fishermen are the "farmers of the sea", who have to deal with not only mother nature, but varying prices and depleted stocks.

Let us support our fishermen.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, this bill before the House of Commons does a lot of things that have not been mentioned in the House. One of the things is that in clause 3 of the bill, it removes sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act. It throws that out. It removes it. It takes it out of the law of Canada.

For the record, Madam Speaker, I would like to tell you what these two sections are. The first section reads: "No one shall, with boat or vessel or in any other way during the time of hunting for seals, knowingly or wilfully disturb, obstruct or interfere with any seal hunting area or prevent or impede the shoals of seals from coming into that area or knowingly or wilfully frighten those shoals."

That is section 10. That has been taken out. Section 11 in the act—it is the law of Canada—is now being removed by this bill before the House. The first section reads:

> Clause 3: The heading preceding section 10 and sections 10 to 16 of the said Act are repealed.

There is no reference to what is in those sections. The House has heard about the first section that is being removed. The second section reads:

> Clause 3: The heading preceding section 10 and sections 10 to 16 read as follows:
> 11.(1) Disputes between occupiers of seal hunting areas concerning limits and the method of hunting or setting nets shall be decided summarily by an fishery officer or justice of the peace.
> (2) A fishery officer or justice of the peace may appoint arbitrators to assess damages in respect of a dispute—

Then it goes on and on. The NDP should be very happy that this is being removed from the bill, because it was the NDP that objected in 1977 when it was included in the bill. It was its critic, Mr. Stuart Leggatt from New Westminster whom we all remember—

Mr. Reid: Justice Leggatt. He was appointed to the bench.

Mr. Baker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans tells me that he has been appointed to the bench in British Columbia. He spoke on behalf of the NDP at that time. He said, as reported at page 7157 of Hansard for June 28, 1977:

> I am opposed to the amendment, not because I am opposed to the seal hunt but because we have nothing to hide and it seems to me the amendment is designed to prevent complete media coverage of the hunt.

That is the first point that should be made about this legislation. I do not now how to describe my dismay in reading this bill before the House.

The gentleman who was pushed for and tried to help the poor people all along the east coast of Canada is the member for Labrador. He is in the House today. He was the one, over all those years, who would stand and move amendments to legislation. Although the government of which he was a part had a bill before the House, he would stand to protect those people who needed income from the seal hunt. It was gratifying to see. He had his motions seconded by an hon. member from the west coast, Senator Marshall, a Tory. They joined forces.

The only objectors were of course members of the NDP. The only people who would not support the motions were members of the NDP. That is why they can stand in this Chamber without mentioning how delighted they are whenever a change is made that will sweep the seal hunters out into the cold, all those people in northern areas of Canada.

I do not know how the government can increase fines for Canadian fishermen when it has given in five different ways this year licences to foreign nations to fish our fish stocks within the 200-mile zone. I have here the foreign allocation summary of Canadian managed stocks, published this month by the department of fisheries: cod, 2G and 2H, Labrador, Faro Island, 2,000 tonnes; France, 4,500 tonnes; German Democratic Republic, 450 tonnes; Norway, 1,820 tonnes; Poland, 725 tonnes; U.S.S.R., 1,635 tonnes.

It goes right down the coast, and then we can go to 4Vn. That is an interesting area. That is Cape Breton Island. We see allocations for redfish and for cod, because of the special agreement with France. We have redfish and Greenland halibut which is the same as turbot.

Mr. Reid: It is not the same as turbot.

Mr. Baker: The hon. gentleman says: "It is not the same as turbot". I might take a little time to explain to him. The scientific name for Greenland halibut is reinhardtius, and that is spelled r-e-i-n-h-a-r-d-t-i-u-s. The scientific name for halibut is hippoglossius, and that is spelled h-i-p-p-o-g-l-o-s-s-i-u-s. The scientific name for Greenland halibut caught off the east coast of Canada is reinhardtius hippoglossius, a combination of the two. It formed the basis of court challenges in Oregon, Massachusetts, Washington, and Alaska. It is defined today by the department of fisheries in schedule 1 of the Fisheries Act as No. 10, under groundfish, Greenland halibut (turbot). I will give the hon. member a copy of it. In fact I have it here, enlarged for him. One is a smaller copy and the other is an enlarged copy. I would like to table it so the hon. member can read it at his discretion.

As I was saying, according to Fisheries and Oceans, we have in Canadian managed stocks for December of this year a total in squid, capelin, Argentine, silver hake, grenadier, witch, Greenland halibut, turbot, redfish, and cod of 206,937 tonnes allocated to foreign countries inside the 200-mile zone, while the Canadian allocation is 637,000 tonnes, of which 109,000 is squid. Almost half of the Canadian allocation is assigned to foreign nations inside the 200-mile zone. As if that were not bad enough—and that is under Canadian managed stocks—let us turn to another way that foreigners get inside the 200-mile zone. That is 200,000 tonnes of groundfish under our management plan. They also got for 1991 from the Government of Canada another way of getting in under NAFO.

This has not been announced publicly, but here it is. I will table it. First, there is a new zone opened in Canada for codfish this year. It is called the Flemish Cap. It was always restricted fishing. There was a moratorium on the Flemish Cap outside the 200-mile zone because it is a spawning ground. But this year Canada has agreed to give on January 1, 1991 an allocation of 12,900 tonnes of cod for fishing. Of the 12,965 tonnes of cod, Canada has agreed that Canadians can fish 100 tonnes, 100 of 12,965 tonnes.

Canadians could not take any because Canadians would have been arrested. Canadians can now take only 100 tonnes, while Cuba gets 480 tonnes. This is agreed to by the Government of Canada. Denmark gets 2,900 tonnes; Canada gets 100 tonnes. The EEC gets 6,465 tonnes; we get only 100 tonnes. Norway gets 1,200 tonnes; we get only 100 tonnes. Poland gets 500 tonnes; we get only 100 tonnes. The U.S.S.R. gets 1,270 tonnes; we get only 100 tonnes. There is another specification that is called others. Others get 50 tonnes.

That is the second way that they get fish. 3L-N, that is a trans-border stock. That is inside and outside, 3L-N. Cuba, G.D.R., the U.S.S.R. 6,104 tonnes; others, 86. 3L-N-O, American place. It is a magnificent fish. Yellowtail, that sounds like the government. Yellowtail flounder, 3L-N-O, EEC; again other nations. 3N-O, capelin; Cuba, EEC, Japan, Norway, Poland, and U.S.S.R. Then squid in 3 and 4 along the coast of Canada, the coast of Nova Scotia mainly, a great province with great fishermen.

The squid try to get up that coast every year on July 1. Every July 1, Cuba, U.S.S.R. and other nations have the highway, the 401 of the squid, blocked off with nets assigned by the Government of Canada inside the 200-mile zone. The fishermen of Nova Scotia want that squid inshore for their fish. For the first time in Canadian history this year, this summer, in Sydney Bite, an area just outside Sydney, I suppose northeast or north north by east from Sydney to Newfoundland, that is the way the fishing zone was. Belgium was allowed to fish there this year. We have all those fishermen in P.E.I., New Brunswick, Quebec and Nova Scotia trying to sell mackerel and cannot sell it, needing mackerel for bait for their lobsters and everything else. This year for the first time in Canadian history in Sydney Bite and all along Nova Scotia, what did we have? We had four Bulgarian factory freezer trawlers catching mackerel. On what kind of a deal? The deal gave them 5,000 tonnes if they turned around and worked at 1,000 tonnes ashore. These are precedents. That is the second way they can get quotas.

There are five ways to get quotas. I am going to have to be quick about this. The third way is by international agreement. Every single fisherman in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Quebec is demanding more tuna licences. There is no problem getting a tuna licence in Canada. All that is needed is a Japanese boat. Japan this year licensed 25 of their vessels in Halifax to fish tuna. They had a higher bi-catch of bluefin than we had total quota on the Virgin Rocks. That is by international agreement.

Then there are special agreements. We cannot get a capelin licence. I would be arrested if I went down and fished capelin. Any member of Parliament would, any Canadian would. There is a freeze on groundfish licences in 2J, 3K, 3L and 3Ps right now. Not a person, not even a fisherman, can get a groundfish licence if he does not have one. I cannot get a capelin licence but the Soviet Union this year by this special arrangement were not only given 32,000 tonnes of capelin in 3N and 3-O off the east coast and 21,000 tonnes in 3K off the northeast coast, but they were given an additional 50,000 tonnes. That is 100,000 tonnes. That is 200 million pounds inside Canada's 200-mile zone.

Here we are today talking about increasing penalties to Canadians for bringing in fish.

Madam Speaker, I can see that you want me to sit down.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and the Criminal Code.

It was interesting to hear the previous speaker from the Liberal side make comments about one of my predecessors, the Hon. Judge Stuart Leggatt who was a distinguished member of this Chamber and was a very well-known and well-respected British Columbian. I am proud to follow after him and after Pauline Jewett in the riding of New Westminster.

Amendments to the Fisheries Act are urgently needed and long overdue. In the past, penalty and enforcement provisions were sadly lacking. Fisheries is a very important industry in my province of British Columbia and Bill C-74 is a step towards protecting fisheries in B.C., as it does increase fines for those fishing illegally or those who contaminate our fish habitat. It strengthens the Department of Fisheries and Oceans' ability to collect data and broadens the investigative powers of fisheries officers.

I know of the hard and somewhat frustrating work of fisheries officers in enforcement and how frustrated they have been in the past when the enforcement mechanisms have not been properly used. Several clauses in this bill do address that matter. Of what use is legislation if there is no mechanism to enforce it?

We know that toothless legislation has often been tabled by this government, so we are pleased to see that Bill C-74 does have some strength. I only hope that it will be enforced. It is not just simply a matter of policing.

The changes also help in the collection of data. We all know that effective data is very necessary in the management of our fishing resources. This bill will improve data collection. We will have better records of the species of fish that are caught. They must now be given to a fisheries officer on request.

We are entering a new era with a different approach. Canadians want to approach our environment in a responsible manner. The people who make their livelihood from our seas and rivers are no exception. They have often been at the forefront in demanding effective environmental controls, because they know that without them the resources will not be there for future workers, and in fact, for themselves.

They also understand that the collection of data is important. Unfortunately, for many of the people who work on the seas and rivers this will be somewhat of an additional burden. We know that the fishing industry has been under a heavy burden lately.

There have been trade disputes that have been decided in favour of the U.S. There has been overfishing, as was so dramatically mentioned a few minutes ago. There have been cuts to the unemployment insurance program that have had a detrimental effect on those in the fishing industry. The additional cost may be a significant factor for some of the small fishermen.

My main interests are the clauses that affect protection of fisheries and the environment. This has been of special interest in my own province of British Columbia. Earlier this week we saw the Social Credit minister of the environment resign because he did not have the support of the premier in British Columbia to bring in controls over the pulp industry which is one of the main polluters of the rivers in B.C. Many of us wonder if this is the first statement in the opening of another leadership contest in the province of B.C. in the Social Credit Party. I guess those events will unfold as they might.

Environment has always been a very key concern to British Columbians. Governments at the provincial, federal and even at the municipal level have not been keeping pace with what individuals want, what average British Columbians want, in terms of protection for our environment. We all know and understand that people are leaving government on the issue of a safe and clean environment.

Clause 10 in this bill increases the penalties for harmful alteration, disruption or destruction of fish habitat caused by the carrying on of any work or undertaking. A summary conviction rises from $5,000 to not exceeding $300,000 with subsequent offences carrying that fine or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both. The penalty for the first indictable offence is also increased to a fine not to exceed $1 million or a term not over three years, or both.

We see the maximum penalties being increased, and what we want to see further is that the provisions in this act will be enforced and taken seriously. We know that we have had regulations in place in the past that have not been adhered to. The penalties have not been used to ensure correct fishing methods and sense of caring about our environment.

In the New Democratic Party we say that polluters must pay for the damage they cause, so I am pleased that the government has incorporated two amendments to Bill C-74 for this third reading.

Both of these amendments were presented by my colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. I want to congratulate him for his effective work in the committee and his ability to bring the amendments through to third reading. It will make this bill much more effective.

The first amendment means that the minister must table an annual report on the administration and enforcement of the provisions of the act in relation to fish habitat protection and pollution prevention. A summary of convictions under the act must be given. I only wish, Madam Speaker, that the government had listed the number of non-compliances as well as the number of convictions. We all know that convictions are one thing but there are a lot of situations on the Fraser River and other areas of Canada where there are non-compliances that go on and on and on and people are very frustrated by this. The House is aware of this because of the actions of my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena, who has brought the matter to our attention, that many polluters have not been prosecuted.

The second amendment states that a convicted person must, if the court orders, pay for promoting the proper management and control of fisheries or fish habitat. Originally, fish habitat was not included in Bill C-74 and I am pleased that this oversight has also been corrected.

As I mentioned earlier, this proposed legislation has a very big impact on British Columbia as a whole and it also affects my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby. The Fraser River, which is one of the most important waterways in British Columbia, in fact one of the most important waterways in Canada, runs right through my riding. It is a river that is of historical importance. Settlements in British Columbia were, in the early days, along the Fraser and it remains a very important waterway in our province. The surrounding ecosystems, the fisheries, the fish habitat, and the marshlands are increasingly being hurt and destroyed by pollution. The salmon resource of the Fraser River is symbolic as an indicator of the well-being of that river.

Madam Speaker, the commercial fishery is the fourth largest industry in my province, with a wholesale value of over $800 million in 1987. The recreational fisheries are worth $186 million annually, and are an important component in B.C's third largest industry, which is tourism. The salmon catch makes up over 50 per cent of the commercial wholesale value of all fish products. The salmon fleet is made up of 4,500 vessels and has a shore-worker population, at peak times, of 26,000 people.

Salmon is also the basis for British Columbia's important tidal sports fisheries, worth $86 million annually, and generating 4,000 person-years of employment. The Fraser River system produces more salmon than any other single river system in the entire world. In addition, another 29 fish species reside in the river and 87 more in the estuary.

The Fraser River produces 66 per cent of the total B.C. catch of sockeye salmon. With present development practices, a loss of salmon production in the urban areas will continue and the streams will eventually cease to be productive. Urban development land use practices and technologies must change. All streams must be protected by buffer zones. We have to stop treating the Fraser River as a storm sewer, with effluent coming from our cities right into the Fraser untreated. So many people are concerned about the river but no government has really acted effectively, and all levels of government share responsibility for the condition that the Fraser is in right now.

Our federal caucus of the New Democratic Party established a task force on the Fraser River this year. Part of the mandate of our task force has been to travel through the province to various areas along the Fraser River, and to listen to the people who live, work, recreate, and walk along the banks of the Fraser River and to get the input about their concerns about the Fraser River issues. I was pleased to host one of those meetings in my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby, and I was truly amazed at the expertise that is out there. This expertise comes from people who have been working in the environmental movement, people who have been working on the river as fishermen and fisherwomen, and people who work in the industry along the river. They all share a common thread; they are all concerned about the river and what is happening there.

Madam Speaker, what future is there for the Fraser River? What future is there for the fisheries, for the fish habitat, for controlling pollution, and for the polluters themselves?

The task force on that river that we had and the co-operation that we received from people who were only too happy and willing to share with us their views on what is happening on the Fraser River serves as a prime example for the need to co-operate to get an effective strategy.

We must concentrate on pollution abatement and cleanup. It is possible to clean up our environment. It is possible to clean up the Fraser River through tough standards. Bill C-74 is just one small step along that route. But it is an important step.

I want to urge this government to go further, and to go further with the green plan that we heard about today, so that our children and our children's children will be assured that when they fish on the Fraser River or on the east coast or on the seas of the Pacific, that they will be able to eat the products that they fish.

As a young child I dug for clams and oysters, and we went crabbing and collected seafood every summer off the shores of Vancouver Island. Today, many of those areas are closed to shell fish. You cannot collect the crab and shellfish there any longer.

We must make it clear to polluters through bills such as this one, through enforcement, and through the courts, that it is a serious matter. We must agree that the time for strict legislation is here. Some legislation is in place, but, unfortunately, it has not been enforced effectively.

Urban areas must also look at their impact on the Fraser River and the fisheries in general. Inland water should no longer be treated as sewers. Habitat must be protected. Fish, birds, and other forms of wildlife are entitled to our waterways. We need them. It is high time that we acknowledge that. We can no longer look at our environment in separate parts. Everything in our globe is inter-related.

Bill C-74 is an important first step for our fisheries. As my colleague, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan has said, the increases in penalties will not help unless these penalties are actually imposed. He also noted that other acts have severe penalties. But enforcement has not gone near that amount, because the courts have treated these violations with lesser penalties. If Bill C-74 is to be worth while, there must be a strong emphasis on controlling, surveillance, and enforcement. I am concerned about this because the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is somewhat under-staffed and lacking the number of vessels to carry out proper enforcement.

If fisheries is as important to the government as it is to other Canadians, as it is to the members on this side of the House of Commons, this legislation, when passed, will be given full support.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I think there is a disposition in the House that the two remaining speakers, the hon. member for Labrador, who wishes to have the floor for approximately 10 minutes, and thereafter, I believe, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who wishes to have the floor for 10 minutes as well.

I do not really understand why he would want to speak in view of the fact that members of this party and, I believe, members of the New Democratic Party support the bill.

Perhaps to expedite matters, Madam Speaker, you might want to see the clock extended to approximately 6.10. Thereafter, we could terminate debate and there would be no necessity for us to proceed with any kind of a vote. I think it would pass unanimously.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, my party will agree to that, on the condition that it is not approximate, but that it is exactly at 6.10.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, if I may comment, the reason that I will speak on this debate is because I made a commitment to my colleagues that I would speak on this debate. I intend to keep my word in the arrangements that I make in the House.

Second, I will agree that at 6.10 we will have that vote if my hon. friend from Labrador speaks no more than 10 minutes.

• (1750)

Madam Deputy Speaker: This puts the Chair in a difficult situation. I do not think "yes, if—" is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the Chair not to see the clock until 6.10 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: Precisely.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Precisely.

Agreed and so ordered.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I certainly cannot match the eloquence of my colleague for Gander—Grand Falls. I wish he had not left the Chamber, because I want to say that we have seen an example of something close to the ideal member of Parliament, that is one who is very knowledgeable. There is nobody either in this House or outside who is more knowledgeable than the member for Gander—Grand Falls, a member who has a commitment and a concern.

As I only have 10 minutes, and because the parliamentary secretary is going to speak after I do, perhaps I could simply lay out for him the difficulties that I have, and he can address those difficulties when he speaks.

The difficulty I have is not with the bill itself and not with the increase in penalties. An increase in penalties is fine for those who are breaking the law. There are people breaking the law. There are people who are raping a resource off our shore that is the sole means of livelihood of the people that I represent on the Labrador coast.

The bill does not go far enough. The problem is what is not in the bill. This is a band-aid to stop the haemorrhaging of not only a fishery, but a way of life. There are communities on the coast of Labrador whose sole means of support is the fishery and whose inshore fishery has gone down steadily year after year. The proof of that is the kind of response that the government has had to make. The emergency response is in answer to a failure in the inshore fishery and the fact that inshore fishermen and plant workers have not been able to quality for unemployment insurance—not just one year, but year after year.

Some of those people on my coast have not been able to get even the minimum qualifying period under emergency response. There are 100 people on a list in my office now who still do not qualify for the emergency response. Nobody wants emergency response. Nobody wants to qualify because nobody wants the program in the first place. What they want is some way of making a living. That is the difficulty.

If the inshore fishery has failed—and it has year after year—where will you get the wherewithal to fill those plants to give the fishermen and the plant workers work? Where? The only answer is in the offshore. Yet, the government has refused consistently to give Labrador an offshore quota. Here is a people who are closest to the best resource that we have. The northern cod is the richest, most lucrative, resource that we have off the shores of Labrador. Yet the government has denied the fishermen of Labrador a quota of offshore cod, in spite of the fact that the government policy lists proximity and historic use as fundamental to qualifying for an offshore quota.

These people whom I am talking about are, to a degree, aboriginal. In past years, through giving them an access to an offshore shrimp quota, for example, we have been able to create two co-operatives on that coast. Where the private sector has never gone or worked, we have created two native co-operatives, one in northern Labrador and one in southern Labrador, in which aboriginal people and others are making a go of their plants. A government in the past saw fit to give out those shrimp licences and to use the policy of proximity and historical use which this government refuses to do.

There is no alternative for those communities. The only way that those communities are going to survive is if the people wanted to be moved, which they do not. They could not be moved because there are no alternatives there or elsewhere for them. But there is a possibility of making those communities work if we had the offshore quota.

That is what I want to see. Not simply penalties, but a management system which puts into place a long-term rehabilitation of that resource—not just the rehabilitation of the groundfish.

We also need some democracy in the allocation of quotas, because the allocation of groundfish quotas now in this country is a closed shop. Those people who are in there, the multinational companies who have the quotas now, have the right—as far as I can tell—to those quotas for all eternity. If one happens to be a co-operative on the coast of Labrador, there is absolutely no way to get in.

I understand that the resource has to be managed and I understand that quotas have to be kept in line. But I believe there should be some democracy built into the system whereby people who have not had access to that resource and yet people who are close to it and have historically used it should have some right of even a small quota. The quota that would satisfy the coast of Labrador would not be all that much. We are talking about something like 4,000 or 5,000 tonnes which is peanuts compared to what other large companies use. We have small plants on that coast and it would not take a great deal of fish to fill them.

Then there is the under-utilized species, the species to which my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls has referred to. Those could be allocated to those co-ops as well, and I believe that should be done.

My difficulty with this bill is not the bill itself, not the fact that there are penalties and not the fact that the penalties are going to be increased, but what the government has not done which is to bring in a sound management plan. The government has not built in some democracy to the allocation of quotas. What the government has not done is stand by its own policy of proximity and historical use in the allocation of those quotas. What the government has not done is say to aboriginal people: "You are equal to everybody else. You have equal access to those stocks off your shore."

I hope that when the parliamentary secretary gets up he can address some of these points because I feel they are legitimate. We do not get cable television on the coast of Labrador so nobody sees the House of Commons. None of my people are going to hear what I am saying today. But I hope when he gets up that he addresses those problems because they are important problems. They are important problems not just to the livelihood of a resource, but to the future of people and entire communities. There is no alternative for those people and it is up to the government to come in, not simply with this bill, but a bill that addresses management, quotas, and some democracy in the allocation of those quotas.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I shall try to be brief but, as I promised earlier in the week, I would on behalf of the government make a few comments on this legislation.

I am pleased, despite some of what has gone on in the last three months, that the House is supporting this piece of legislation. I think it is particularly important and it does some things that will be of significance to the fishery in the future.

It has to be recognized that the actions we have taken here in amending the Fisheries Act are just part of a larger effort about which my friend from Hillsborough made a few comments about. It is important to recognize that there has been a concerted effort on behalf of not only the government of this country, but the government of the provinces and the industry as well, to try to address some of the problems we face in the fishery.

With this piece of legislation we increase the fines and the penalties both for fisheries offences and habitat offences. We also provide for the gathering of information that will help us have better knowledge and understanding of the fisheries so we can make better and more secure decisions in the future. It takes away some of the antiquated parts of the legislation and puts in some flexibility.

It is very important to stress that the people who will come into contact with this legislation are people who commit offences against the people next to whom they work, next to whom they live, and who depend on the resource. We are talking about very few people. It is not the lion's share of those who depend on the fishery, and let us keep that in mind.

Most people want to work with the fisheries officers. Most people recognize they have a substantial role to play in conservation. That is important to remember as we deal with penalties for fisheries offences.

We heard a number of things from some excellent witnesses. We had a very good week of very interesting, articulate, and perceptive witnesses. They told us a number of things and I think I summarize fairly, in general terms, when I say, first, hit the violators hard. "Nail them to the cross" was the way one group from British Columbia put it. Have the support of the courts. It is essential that the courts support not only the amendments to the Fisheries Act, but the fisheries officers and the peace officers who bring the charges.

If this House can send a message to the judicial system, I think all of us would agree that that message should be to make the penalties suit the seriousness of the crime. As we heard from witnesses, ensure that the penalties reflect not only the severity of the crime but the enterprise involved, recognizing that a $200 fine to one fisherman is nothing compared to another. Quite clearly, what we heard a lot was to have the fisheries minister use his or her power to lift licences, and to suspend or cancel licences.

As parliamentary secretary, I can tell the House that this Minister of Fisheries intends to do exactly that, because the suspension of a fisheries licence is equally applied. I was very impressed by the number of witnesses who told us to do exactly that.

I would be remiss and, frankly, quite frustrated if I did not respond to a few of the comments made here today. I will do so briefly. I think it is important to note the number of comments, particularly from my friends from Prince Edward Island, and also raised by witnesses, in terms of the department's ability to enforce the regulations, to provide the surveillance and management. It is a very legitimate question.

As we look at offences on both coasts and in the freshwater, as we think about the new quotas we will have to deal with in the next couple of weeks and the new regulations stemming from Hâché and Dunn, it is important.

There are 758 fisheries officers in 248 locations across this country and 17 other agencies can also enforce the Fisheries Act. We also have a number of ships. With the closing of Summerside, all that air surveillance disappears. To replace the DND surveillance we went to private aircraft. For the same money we got more hours. Today, DFO delivers over 7,000 hours of air surveillance at a cost of approximately $12 million. Our observer program is quite extensive and quite well known. We have new funding for surveillance and enforcement; in the Atlantic over $38 million over five years and in the Pacific almost $6 million. I think that is important.

We heard a fair bit about the Fraser River, and I think quite rightly so. Our friends in the New Democratic Party and, indeed, all the people of British Columbia are quite concerned about the Fraser River. I would draw their attention to the comments made in the green plan where quite clearly the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is committed to doubling the amount of salmon in that river. It is going to take a lot of work. The government also recognizes that it will take a co-ordinated approach, using the provincial governments, the support of the stakeholder groups, people who are knowledgeable and anxious and are willing to participate. We will deal with some of the habitat questions and some of the fish questions.

It is an important endeavour and I think it is fair to say that the success of the salmon enhancement programs that we have seen in British Columbia are due for credit, and that is because there has been a shareholder approach. It is not just the federal government throwing money at it. It is the federal government in co-operation with industry, user groups, associations and the provincial government. That is why we have such a fruitful and productive salmon fishery on the west coast, and hopefully we can see some of that on the east coast in the future.

On the question of live cod, I would have to pursue this question with my colleague from Vancouver. We may be talking about a different kind of cod than my friend from Labrador and I know.

Mention was made about cutting ACOA. ACOA's money was reprofiled. My friend from Charlottetown said the government does not pay any attention to regional development because it cut ACOA. This government introduced ACOA. This government introduced $1.05 billion for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency If we want to reprofile that, it has to be done, the money is still there. But, the commitment came from this government and is maintained.

First of all, I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Kent speak. Quite often we forget the situation in the freshwater fishery.

Twice during the month of November I was in Europe. It sounds glorious and marvellous, but I made eight or nine presentations a day, Madam Speaker,—I had a few days off, I recognize—with one whole day in French, and for me that can be a bit of a challenge, particularly in Paris, both in the National Assembly and at the Palais du Luxembourg where the Senate is, and at the Brussels meeting with European parliamentarians and a number of other people. I will not go into it, but it included media and groups from all over.

I led a group of members of Parliament from the Liberals. Unfortunately, our New Democrat colleagues could not join us. I know they would have if they could.

The message that I brought on behalf of my colleagues and supported by my colleagues was that Europe and the European community should meet its commitments under the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. The management system was set up by the users of the resources of the Northwest Atlantic following the imposition of the 200–mile economic zone by the Law of the Sea Conference.

That organization should be the basis for managing that resource along the principles of sustainable development.

In 1977, the Law of the Sea put the 200–mile limit in place. We, as a coastal state, made a commitment that in recognition that we manage what is inside as part of our obligation, we will allow countries to come and fish for fish we do not take.

For instance, cod in 2G and 2H. I hope I can find it. Unfortunately, I do not have it here. The cod that we heard about from my hon. friend opposite, Canadians have not caught.

One example I can give is the quota for turbot in 1989 in 2G and 2H, 11,000 tonnes. Do you know what we caught, Madam Speaker? Turbot, by the way is Greenland halibut. Canadians caught 18 tonnes of it either by choice or incapacity and capability of doing it.

Yes, we allow foreigners to come in, but the key there also is that we have NAFO, which I will not go into. We are short of time, and I want to get on.

The message that we had to all of them was that the European community should recognize its responsibility, manage the resource properly and get back in and comply with NAFO.

When my friend opposite from Gander—Grand Falls stands up and talks about 12,965 tonnes distributed off the Flemish Cap to a variety of European countries, then goes to Europe with me and our colleagues, tells the Europeans to comply with NAFO, then comes back here and complains about the quota given to the Europeans under NAFO, what am I to think?

It sounds great as we stand here and shake and shift. All his colleagues stand up and congratulate him, but if we are going to get the Europeans to deal with it, we have to be reasonable, responsible and insistent in the message that we send.

WE cannot stand on their home turf and tell them to comply with NAFO and then come back here and stand in front of a television and complain about NAFO.

Madam Speaker, I will sit down because I think you will find that we may be able to have the opportunity to have the vote on this question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-346, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce in the House today a Private Members Bill which seeks to repeal subsection 13(5) of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

This subsection is discriminatory to rural route carriers in that it prevents them from the enjoyment of rights by excluding them from the employee status as provided for in the Canada Labour Code.

These route carriers provide a most valuable service to 1.2 million households in Canada by providing vital communication and contact to the people in rural and often isolated communities. I believe it is unacceptable that rural route carriers, whose hours after long and hard work, who often in our northern climate face the most treacherous of conditions, should be denied the most basic employee rights.

I therefore submit this bill in the hope that the House, in its wisdom and concern for justice, see fit to repeal an unjust and unjustifiable provision of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a large number of petitions that I had hoped to present today but, in view of the fact that speeches with regard to a special motion will be taking place fairly soon, I wish to lay upon the table three petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

They are signed by residents from the province of Nova Scotia, namely, the city of Halifax and surrounding areas. These residents petition the Government of Canada in their opposition to the goods and services tax, in particular as that tax applies to books, magazines and newspapers. All petitioners on these three petitions call upon the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax as it is an impediment to small business as well as to Canadian consumers.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of residents of the great city of Kamloops. These petitioners point out their opposition to the government's goods and services tax, particularly pointing out that it is a very regressive tax in that it imposes the same tax on rich and poor alike. They also point out the fact that on a number of occasions the Liberal senators actually had opportunities to defeat the GST, but chose not to.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a whole pile of petitions signed by residents in my riding of Ottawa Centre in opposition to the GST on everything, including in particular books and magazines.

I also have other petitions signed by residents of Oshawa, Don Mills, Scarborough, Mississauga, and Toronto, as well as from all over Ontario. All these people oppose the goods and services tax. They call upon the government to abolish this tax, to withdraw this terrible legislation as it relates to books and magazines.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present to the House of Commons concerning violence against women and recognizing it as a serious Canadian societal problem.

The undersigned petitioners wish to have the House acknowledge their request that each year on December 6 there be an annual national day of remembrance in honour of the 14 women murdered in Montreal on December 6, 1989.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present some 20 petitions signed by hundreds of Canadians at the Norfolk County Fair and the Caledonia Fair in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk. The petitioners call upon the government to get rid of the goods and services tax.

These petitions are just a few of the millions of signatures of Canadians from all across the country and call upon the government to get rid of the goods and services tax.

FISHERIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today on a matter that is a multicultural issue as well as an economic issue that affects in particular the Chinese community in British Columbia and perhaps other parts of Canada as well.

It concerns the dwindling stocks of live rock codfish which is a commodity of high cultural and economic value to Asian Canadians. It also serves many tourists and is a staple fresh food that is always in demand by families in restaurants.

People are very concerned that the sports fishery is overfishing this type of fish in that there is a very limited season for the Chinese community. They ask that the federal government change its policies and overcome the negligence toward the live rock cod fishery so that it will be available on a year-round basis to some 200,000 Canadians of Chinese descent who live throughout the lower mainland. They want to ensure that a year-round supply of live rock cod is available.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present today concerning the GST. Inasmuch as it is possible that this will be rammed through the Senate against all the practices that have been in play there for a number of years, I feel it is imperative that these voices be heard one more time. Once again, the plea goes out to this government; please rescind this very unfair tax it is imposing upon the citizens of Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to table a petition which joins the petitions of thousands of other Canadians protesting the GST and, in particular, protesting the government actions both here and in the other place in ramming the GST down the throats of Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous Canadians, many from the beautiful city of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, who object to the goods and services tax and particularly its application to books.

They would be appalled at the actions of the government puppet in the chair of the other place who is seeking to ram this tax down the throats of Canadians.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise and present to this House a number of petitions with respect to GST. There are hundreds of names in these particular petitions. Literally hundreds of thousands and into the millions of Canadians have signed petitions opposing the goods and services tax.

In this particular case, these petitioners indicate in the recital to this particular petition that the Conservative government has imposed since 1984 at least 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadians. They also point out that since September 1984, when this government came to office, the manufacturers' sales tax has been increased by this government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. Now the Conservative government wants to impose the goods and services tax.

These petitioners call on the government to rescind this regressive and unfair tax. I am sure that all these petitioners would be appalled and ashamed at the thuggery in the Senate by Conservative senators who in an illegal fashion are trying to ram the GST through.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition in opposition to the GST. It points out the hypocrisy of the government in increasing the FST by 50 per cent so that it can be replaced with a much higher than necessary tax on goods and services.

If these petitioners could, I know they would also be objecting to the breaking of the rules in the Senate to ram this through.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 392 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 392 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return.

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (for the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee: such Members on the part of the House of Commons to be designated upon report of the Striking Committee no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion, which report shall be deemed concurred in upon presentation;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the Committee have the power, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed available by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the House of Commons is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen are authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, five Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose the establishment of a Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and Senate on the constitutional amending process.

I wish at the same time to table a discussion paper that examines the current amending formulae, identifies some problems in their operation and sets out for consideration by all members of Parliament a number of options for substantial reform.

Recent events have demonstrated that our present amending process is not adequate to ensure that Canada's Constitution can meet the challenges of the 21st century.

The initiative taken today by the government fulfils a commitment made last June, that before we try again to amend the Constitution we must find a better process to do it.

Amid the heat of Meech Lake and all the debate that surrounded it, there was a strong consensus on one thing: that we must find a better way to change the fundamental law of our land. Canadians want to be involved in the process of constitutional change. We in Parliament have an overriding responsibility to preserve this magnificent country. I know that members of this House of Commons and members of Parliament will do their utmost to ensure that Canada is preserved and enhanced for decades and generations and generations to come.

Mr. Mulroney: Canadian citizenship brings extraordinary benefits to us all, whatever language we speak and wherever we happen to live. We have built on the northern half of this continent one of the most civil countries in the world. Our system of justice, which guarantees equality before the law, is widely respected around the world.

With a population of only 26 million people, we have overcome what is in many instances a very forbidding climate and geography to build the seventh largest economy in the industrialized world and the eighth largest economy in the entire world. This is a remarkable accomplishment for a small nation which has become one of the great trading nations of the entire world, 30 per cent of whose national wealth depends on our capacity to trade successfully into international markets.

While many countries struggle just to put bread on the table for their citizens, Canadians continue to enjoy, despite our economic problems, a broad range of social services and one of the best standards of living in the world.

Canada enjoys substantial international influence and respect as a middle power. We are the only country that is a member of the G–7, of the Commonwealth, and of the Sommet de la francophonie. Indeed Canada was a founding member of the Commonwealth and of the Sommet de la francophonie. I think that the Commonwealth and the Sommet de la francophonie reflect both our opportunities and the cultural and linguistic realities of Canada. It is a tribute to all members of the House that both of these very important international organizations are soundly supported by members of all parties. Canada has moved along, and those are things we have accomplished together.

Millions of people all over the world are lining up today to come to Canada because successive generations of Canadians have succeeded in building not a perfect society, God knows, but an open, democratic, peaceful, and very prosperous country. That is what we now have, and that is what we risk losing.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before you is an assembly of legislators, men and women who have a duty to adopt laws to ensure the unity and prosperity of our country. But above all, we are trustees of the hopes and aspirations of our fellow citizens. Our responsibility is to give Canadians a Constitution that reflects pride in their history and confidence in the future.

[English]

The Special Joint Committee will consult broadly with Canadians on the process for amending the Constitution of Canada. In particular, the committee will be asked to consult with Canadians on the role of the Canadian public in the process, on the effectiveness of the existing process for securing constitutional amendments, on alternatives to the current process. To fulfil its mandate, the committee will have the power to travel and hold public hearings across Canada.

The government has prepared a discussion paper entitled Amending the Constitution of Canada to assist public discussion of this important matter. The document reviews how the current process has operated since 1982 and is designed to stimulate discussion of key questions including public participation and alternatives to improve the framework that we now have.

If we are to devise a better process, a number of questions are simply going to have to be addressed very bluntly. At what stage in the process does it make sense for the public to involve itself: at the very outset, once agreement in principle has been reached among governments or, later, when agreement has been reached on the legal text of a proposed amendment?

How should groups or involved citizens, who now under the Constitution have no formal role in the amending process but who quite properly see themselves as very important stakeholders, seek to be involved in an effective and productive way?

Are the current time periods for adoption of amendments to the Canadian Constitution too long, considering that over the periods allowed elections can and do occur, governments can and do change and extraneous issues may intrude so as to derail the ratification process itself? How long can a country keep going with a process that is clearly beyond in many ways the capacity of human beings to deal with effectively?

Governments do change and always will change. We have 11 of them in Canada that are tied into the amending process. In the normal course of events one sees this happen on a regular basis. This is a fundamental, important and very practical problem.

Should an agreement formally signed by first ministers for tabling in a legislature be considered a confidence measure on which governments can or should fall? It seems to me that is a very important question which should be considered.

The paper also discusses various alternatives to the current legislative model of constitutional reform. For example, the decision-making role of legislators could be shared with or transferred to Canadians across the nation expressing themselves through a referendum.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Or Canadians might be called upon, for example, to select delegates to play a decisive role in proposing amendments or in ratifying amendments in a constituent assembly.

As the Australian experience has demonstrated, referenda can be used for constitutional amendment in a parliamentary federal system. Obviously all members of the House would have not only observations but serious questions in regard to this procedure itself. Some of them I think would probably be, if Canada decided to go that route, what sort of a majority would be needed for an amendment proposal to pass: a simple national majority; a national majority including a majority in a majority of provinces, such as some of the provisions we now have; a national majority with a majority in Quebec on certain issues or in other regions on others?

With respect to a constituent assembly model, a number of important questions automatically arise. Should there be equality of representation of the provinces, representation on the basis of population, or a compromise between the two? What should be the procedure within the constituent assembly for reaching decisions? Should its decisions be binding, or could its decisions then be altered by a subsequent meeting of the same body or a new body to which it allegedly reports? Should they be put to the people in a referendum? Or, should they be recommendations for consideration by first ministers and possible action through the legislative model itself?

These are all important questions but fundamentally I believe they stem from one basic challenge. Can we in this House of Commons make this Constitution of ours the expression of our profound attachment to Canada and our will to ensure that it becomes more harmonious and more dynamic? That is the challenge.

Can we do better for Canada? Can we make sure that Canada works effectively and well? That is the challenge, and I think the answer to that is yes.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, when I announced the creation of the citizens' forum on November 1, I said that it is time to consider making reforms to our system that are "bold, far-reaching and unprecedented if need be". This government is committed to modernizing Canada's Constitution.

The citizens' forum is a new way of going about this process that will help identify what kind of country Canadians want. Typically, like anything new in this country, it attracts a certain amount of criticism. But my guess is that when Commissioner Spicer and his colleagues report, having spoken to the people who were left out in the past, after they talk to ordinary Canadians across the country, I think the results they will bring forward are going to be infinitely more beneficial than opinions of constitutional scholars and lawyers. We have heard enough from them in this country and not enough from ordinary citizens.

Mr. Mulroney: The citizens' forum will give western Canadians an opportunity to articulate their genuine frustrations with a system of government that seems remote and unresponsive to their needs. That applies in many cases doubly to citizens of the north.

It will ask Canadians in far-flung regions how best they believe they can influence the decision-making process to ensure that it functions in a more equitable manner. It will allow all Canadians to discuss the relationship between Quebec and the rest of the country, and the accommodations required in today's Canada for the needs of both linguistic minorities and majorities to be respected.

The impact of regionalism and of multiculturalism on Canadian unity and economic development will also be examined. There was a time and not so long ago, perhaps a decade ago, where the articulation of programs of multiculturalism was hailed as tremendous answer to many of our problems. Yet, now members of those very communities are suggesting to Parliament that there is probably a better way to do it and this must be examined. It is no longer a shibboleth or a slogan that there are real problems that emerge from policies devised in Ottawa that do not always meet the needs of large multicultural communities.

Clearly this government and governments before us and many members of Parliament have been talking too much and not listening enough. We must correct this fundamental deficiency and this government, and I know all members of Parliament will do precisely that.

Some hon. members: hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The forum will facilitate a dialogue between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians to discuss how the aspirations of Canada's first peoples can be met within the Canadian Constitution. Canadians are also being invited to consider what is best done by governments and what is best done by individual Canadians themselves. The citizens' forum will very probably stimulate discussion on the questions that underlie all of these issues: how to ensure that this country's institutions, particularly Parliament, designed in the 19th century, will be more responsive to the needs of Canadians in the 21st, at the same time whether the division of responsibilities among the federal and provincial governments needs to be changed.

Some answers will begin to emerge as genuine dialogue is initiated across Canada, as reports come in from the parliamentary committees established in New Brunswick, Alberta and Quebec, and of course by hearings initiated by private groups as well as by this committee that will be set up by the House of Commons today.

In light of recent experience, we must also consider how we can go about developing the kind of Constitution Canadians want. Some argue that the best way to achieve meaningful reform is to start from scratch by dismantling our entire system of federalism as we know it today. As I said in Montreal 10 days ago, it seems to me rather obvious that nothing at all can be gained from the attempt to destroy a political system that is reasonably efficient and respectful of identities, and that has, over 123 years, produced some rather remarkable results.

Rather, I think we have everything to gain by working together, members of all parties, business and labour, provinces and municipalities, recognizing that we have before us an enormous challenge to our national well-being. We have everything to gain by working together to improve and modernize our present arrangements.

Mr. Speaker, many Quebecers, in particular, find it difficult to understand how the Constitution, patriated 10 years ago,—the document that should have embodied their desire to flourish within Canada—instead enshrines their exclusion from the constitutional fold.

Because of the unfortunate events that led to the death of Meech, some would have us believe the only way to escape the status quo is to go back to square one and start again from scratch.

For my part, I say the country does not have to be dismantled in order to be later rebuilt. Let's not lose sight of the substance by chasing shadows.

There is another way, a better way, Mr. Speaker, to accommodate the need for fundamental change: it involves building on our strengths and improving our present system to adapt it to today's economic, political and cultural realities.

[English]

As I said in this House on November 1, "I believe that if it takes major changes to hold this country together, Canadians want those changes made. I believe if it takes a new process to achieve those changes, Canadians want a new process designed" and that is precisely what we are in the process ourselves of beginning to do today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: As the discussion paper explains, modifying the current procedure through consensus and agreed practices is not the only solution possible. Nothing in the mandate of the proposed special joint committee precludes an examination of alternatives to the current formulae, nor, indeed, alternative ways of bringing about changes to them.

Never again should our Constitution be seen as an obstacle to achieving our great destiny—not in Quebec or in any other region.

Our fundamental document must accurately express who we are and, above all, clearly affirm what we aspire to become. That is the challenge we face.

Let us not be afraid to change our Constitution, but let us have the highest respect for what it should affirm and protect—the land of our ancestors and country of our children.

Together with all those who have placed their trust in us, I propose today that we find ways to meet the demands of a world undergoing swift and deep change.

With respect for what others have sincerely wanted our Constitution to be, but with an awareness of its imperfections and a determination to make it an instrument of unity rather than a source of discord, let us give Canada the possibility of amending its Constitution, in a manner consistent with our history and the needs for our future.

How, Mr. Speaker? All around us we can see in what direction other countries are moving. Look at Europe—at England and France—the mother countries of many of us.

A new, politically integrated and economically united Europe as Chancellor Kohl said recently and I repeat, a Europe where political integration and economic union will be complete. Those were the words Chancellor Kohl used.

But this new Europe is already in the making: in 1992, 340 million Europeans will form a common market; in 1994, Europe will have one central bank; and by 1999, they plan to have a common currency.

Mr. Speaker, Europe is irreversibly headed towards a new form of federalism. We must ask ourselves why this is so. The driving force behind this extraordinary movement in Europe is the French Republic. President Mitterrand himself is one of the great architects of European union and economic and political integration. The President of the French Republic has become the great architect of this political and economic integration. Why? Because the French, the British, the Spaniards, the Italians, the Germans—Europeans in general—consider it the political system most capable of ensuring respect for linguistic and cultural diversity, economic development and social justice.

The road Europeans are about to take is one that Canadians have already travelled: we have had a common market since 1867; we have a common currency since 1870; and we have a central bank since 1934. Why would we swim against the tide of history by abandoning our federal system while Europeans are discovering what we already enjoy?

About 10 days ago on television, we saw a dramatic illustration of this yearning for closer links when French miners shook hands with English miners, 500 metres under the English Channel. England is now joined to France. That is not merely a symbol. It is the most concrete and conclusive proof that the future belongs to those who unite.

In this House, I represent an electoral district in Quebec. To justify their desire to undo the country, some people in Quebec propose an eventual association with Canada, without any guarantee at all. To them I say: We already have an association, and we will make it even more productive and flexible than it is now, for the benefit of all Quebecers and Canadians—for the benefit of this great country of ours.

Let us all build and not bulldoze. Let's renovate and not raze. It is obvious that our constitutional amending process has not worked to our advantage. Everybody knows that. But we all know something else, something that wells up from our history and that we share as citizens of this magnificent country.

Both the idea of Canada and the ideal of Canada are precious, are of enormous value, and continue to live in the minds and hearts of all Canadians.

The spirit of Canada was not developed as a result of the bringing about of some constitutional document. Canada was not secured by a series of documents pasted together in London or Paris, or anywhere else. Canada already lived in the hearts of aboriginal parents who conveyed to their children an appreciation of the beauty of their natural environment thousands of years ago.

Canada was a dream shimmering on the ocean's horizon when Cartier and Champlain brought the French language and culture to North America. The English settlers, the Irish, and the Scots did not come here to make constitutional amendments. They came here to build a nation where their children could grow in freedom and prosperity and peace. They built better than anybody ever dreamed. The result of their sacrifice, their vision, and their courage was Canada. They did that and it is up to us to maintain it and improve upon it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Generation upon generation of immigrants were drawn here by this dream from every single country on the face of the earth.

We in the House of Commons are the sons and daughters of those men and women who have given us one of the most beautiful and prosperous, and one of the most free countries in the world.

It is now up to us to live up to that dream and to build a country that they would have wanted us to build for our children.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in both official languages, a discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled: Amending the Constitution of Canada.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to provide my party's response this motion to appoint a special committee to inquire and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada.

While the Liberal Party intends to be extremely supportive of this joint committee, we have rather serious concerns and misgivings that I want to point out. I shall be focusing upon the fact that we think this particular committee should have been set up some time ago. In fact, a number of people will wonder if it should not have been set up rather than the Spicer commission. But I will let Canadians judge that.

We are concerned as well about the focus on the amending formula which we believe may be too narrow. We think that the critical question is really the division of powers among the various levels of government.

[Translation]

The constitutional amendment formula is obviously a very important element, but as far as we are concerned the key, the most important question is the sharing of powers.

[English]

Let me share with my hon. colleagues some of the concerns and misgivings that we have as a party.

• (1150)

There is another committee that has been appointed. There is already much confusion out there in the country. We fear that this will add to that confused state. Why is that? Well, there is the Spicer commission that is looking at the direction that Canadians want Canada to take.

There is the Bélanger–Campeau commission that is looking at the direction that they feel Quebecers want Quebec to take. Alberta has a commission. New Brunswick has a commission. Manitoba has a commission.

We are informed that the Assembly of First Nations has a commission because it does not have confidence in the various commissions that have been set up to date. I am told today that two unions have each now set up a new commission, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the National Union of Provincial Government Employees.

[Translation]

Although the Prime Minister gave a clear explanation about this new committee and raised a number of major issues, it could lead to confusion because I think there are so many similar endeavours now taking place in Canada. People will ask why a new commission, why a new committee? Where will that lead us? Just what will that accomplish?

[English]

Many of you will know that the Bélanger–Campeau commission is seen as a well-organized group of people who are actually listening. It is certainly highly visible and, whether or not one likes what it is doing, we have to recognize that it is working extremely well in getting the opinions of various people from the province with respect to the directions that they want to take.

Interestingly enough, to date, only Jean Chrétien, Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada—and the only leader of a national party to do so—will be making a presentation to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

[Translation]

I am extremely proud of this initiative on the part of the leader of my party and I commend him for that.

[English]

In looking at the Spicer commission, we recognize that it has received, to be kind, less than positive reviews. One journalist has called it useless. Another has described it as out of control and disorganized. There are many other descriptors that I could use. One newspaper headline reads: "Citizens Forum Becoming a Joke".

I want to quote what the Leader of the Opposition said with respect to this particular commission. He has identified the critical issue when he said about the Spicer commission that "if it does not get to work soon with a full complement of members, it is going to lose credibility and that would be too bad because—we felt it was a way of making up for a real gap in the previous Constitution discussion, that is, giving Canadians a chance to be heard."

I think that that is in fact the issue with respect to the Spicer commission. It has been set up, but certainly to date, it has been short of accomplishments.

[Translation]

I am glad that two persons have now been appointed to fill the forum's two vacant seats. Unfortunately the reports I have had seem to indicate that one of the commissioners has yet to take active participation in the work of this forum which might prove to be very important for Canada.

[English]

The question that we need to raise is why has the government decided to set up a special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. First and foremost—and we have to be very honest about this—this committee is a response to criticism. There is no question about it. It is a response to the Bélanger-Campeau commission in Quebec which I have identified as working particularly well. I also noted that the Spicer commission was not working effectively yet. I hope it finally gets its act together.

It is also a response to the Prime Minister's failure with respect to the constitutional process and the Meech Lake Accord. If he had been successful we would not be having such a joint committee right now.

That begs another question. Why did the Prime Minister fail? Canadians were wondering what the objectives of his initiative really were. We all wanted to ensure that Quebec was brought into the constitutional fold and that it would be a signatory to that particular document. As Canadians, we wanted that. Most Canadians wanted that.

Because of the lack of credibility of the Prime Minister with respect to a number of promises that he has made, people were wondering whether or not there were other objectives. That started to affect the process in a very negative way.

It was also a flawed process. There have been comments from every part of Canada from virtually every group. We do not have to go through the "dark night and 12 men behind closed doors" routine again. It was not an adequate process. Canadians felt left out. Because they felt left out, they became extremely suspicious of what was happening.

There could have been meaningful, public consultations on the Meech Lake Accord, but the government contended that it was a seamless web that could not be undone. I recognize that there were some consultations, but the problem is that once you say that it is a seamless web and that it cannot be undone, you are in a sense contradicting yourself. People say: "What is the use? This is a charade. This is not a sincere attempt to try to find out what Canadians are thinking."

There should have been more meaningful consultations along the way whenever a new step had been reached. There should have been continuing consultation, and it did not happen.

I will give an example of what occurred after supposedly having had a seamless web and after supposedly being unable to change whatever was necessary. As time ran out and as the Prime Minister and his government became concerned, suddenly the government changed its tune. It said that it might, in fact, accept a companion accord. In fact, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that it set up the Charest committee. It came out with its report but, for the most part, its recommendations were ignored.

Then, and even later, as we were on the precipice and in spite of having said there was a three-year deadline that could not in fact be ignored, the Prime Minister and his government shifted again. They thought that they should have a referral to the Supreme Court of Canada to see whether or not the time line could be extended.

[Translation]

I believe I have just shown quite clearly that the Prime Minister and his government have known failure in the constitutional process. The committee is urging the House to appoint today is a reaction to that failure, a reaction to a lack of sensitiveness towards Canadians, a reaction designed to reset the sights, if that is possible. I sincerely hope it is not too late.

[English]

It was really the Prime Minister, through a lack of sensitivity and through an inappropriate process, who killed Meech Lake and what could have been salvaged from it. For example, many constitutional experts say that three out of five amendments could have been passed with the 7-50 formula, that is, seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population saying yes. Those were immigration, distinct society, and opting out of federal programs with full compensation which is something that can happen now. We all know that that 7-50 formula could have given us those particular requests that Quebec wanted. Only two of the amendment would have required unanimity. They were the provincial role in the appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and a veto for Quebec on constitutional amendments.

By virtue of packaging the Accord in this particular way, the Prime Minister set up an objective that was virtually impossible to reach. He rolled the dice too late, and Canada lost.

[Translation]

He put the bar too high and missed, and that is unfortunate. It is unfortunate for Canada and for all Canadians.

[English]

I want to talk briefly about the amending formula. Many of you will know that there are presently two concurrent amending formulae for the Constitution of Canada. One requires, as I indicated just a moment ago, seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the population to support certain proposals. In these cases there is a three-year deadline.

• (1200)

The division of powers to which I have referred, and which is to me the most significant challenge that we have before us right now, can in fact be changed by virtue of the 7-50 formula, that is, seven province agreeing and that they have 50 per cent of the population.

Yes, there are some matters that require unanimity and they have no time limit, such as the changing of the amending formula and clearly, we should be looking at that.

One of the reasons that Meech Lake failed is because this amending formula that the Prime Minister proposed had no real significant mechanism for public input. There were obviously some discussions. There was in fact some input, but the process of input was flawed. People along the way felt that the deal was made. It was a seamless web that could not be undone. They felt left out. They felt as if they were being had.

Let us stress that there is nothing in the 7-50 formula or in the formula proposed in the Meech Lake Accord that would not have permitted the Prime Minister and his government from having a significant, detailed, ongoing public input for all Canadians from throughout the whole nation.

I think it is important when we talk about the 7-50 formula to take just a moment to try to understand where it came from. Many members will recall that the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, felt that he could, as Prime Minister, patriate the Constitution. We will recall as well, that he was supported by premiers Davis of Ontario and Hatfield of New Brunswick. However, eight premiers of those other eight provinces opposed this patriation in this way and proposed this 7-50 formula which Mr. Trudeau accepted.

[Translation]

In my opinion, it is extremely important to understand that the 7/50 formula is not perfect. Very few are, but this one, nevertheless, contains some positive elements. It is obvious that this formula does not adequately meet the aspirations of Quebec men and women. I suggest it was not the formula per se, but the way it was used which caused the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. Consultations were inadequate. They should have been ongoing. There was also the government's uncompromising attitude towards changes suggested by the Liberal Party as well as a great many organizations from all parts of Canada.

[English]

This Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, which my colleagues and I hope will be extremely successful, is getting off to a shaky start. One newspaper columnist has called this committee "Mulroney's new illusion". He goes on to say: "It is entertaining a dangerous illusion to imagine that a committee created in desperation will succeed where for so long all of the specialists have failed", and all of the previous efforts over the last 30 or more years have failed.

As I have indicated, this committee has a narrow focus. It deals primarily with the amending formula. It could in fact lead us, unfortunately, into error because that is not the major question. It is an important question, but not the major one. To us, it is the division of powers, looking at what each level of government can do that we must in fact tackle. The focus of the committee should be on the sharing and the redistribution of powers. It must be because that is the challenge, the reform of federal institutions, such as the reform of Parliament, clearly the Senate, no doubt the House of Commons could come in for some reform, as well as possibly the Supreme Court of Canada.

[Translation]

As a party, we insisted on the sharing of powers, not only on the constitutional amending formula, because we felt it was truly the key element, the number one challenge today for our country.

[English]

Let me talk about shared powers. Members will know that there are clear powers for the federal government, and as well, clear powers for the provincial and municipal governments. In fact, these powers for the national government are clearly defined in the Constitution Act, 1867. Let me give just a few examples.

There is very little debate about defence, currency and postal services. These are all in the national government's mandate, if you wish, they are in the federal jurisdiction. Here are some examples of some which are in the provincial jurisdiction: the laws governing property rights, municipal institutions, local works, regulating the issuance of local licences, the creation of municipal infrastructures, etc. There are, however, many areas where the lines have become blurred and therein lies the challenge, therein lie the difficulties, and therein lies the need for debate, discussion, and study.

In the area of health, the federal government makes a large contribution to the health of Canadians through the provinces and imposes, and justifiably so, certain standards and criteria that need to be met and adhered to. There is a significant decrease in the contribution, I might say, by the federal government to health and education. In education, there is still a substantial contribution, as it should be, but because there is a contribution from the federal government and because education is a provincial constitutional responsibility, there is some blurring, some confusion, some difficulty. The area of culture is another such challenge.

Aboriginal rights, while primarily federal, still have some implications for the provincial and municipal infrastructures. Immigration, again this is a blurred area and one that needs to be sorted out. We have international trade, communications, and the list goes on.

[Translation]

Concerning shared powers, I believe that what is of prime importance for me and my colleagues is to understand that some powers belong exclusively to the national government. Other powers belong to the provinces while others of course belong to the municipalities. In some areas, it is perfectly clear. For instance, National Defence belongs unquestionably to the federal government. On the other hand, all legislation dealing with property rights mainly belong to the provinces. On the other hand, there are some areas where the lines have become blurred, such as health, education, culture, native rights, immigration, trade and communication which should be examined to determine exactly who must assume responsibility.

[English]

Again I repeat, and I want to accentuate, the real issue is not the amending formula. It is one issue, it is an important issue. The real issue is shared power. I have tried to capture that element, that message, with the following question: how can the various levels of government best reorganize so that they best respond to the needs of all Canadians, wherever they live in this great country. That is the real issue. This commission ought to have such a mandate.

[Translation]

What level of government can better fulfill the needs of all Canadians whether they live in this or that province, or in either of the Territories? What jurisdiction can better meet the needs of our fellow citizens? We feel this is where the challenge lies. We are now faced with major difficulties everywhere in Canada.

[English]

In summary, let me offer the following: The Liberal Party is willing to support the government's motion to create a special joint Senate-Commons committee to consult with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada. We are supportive of this motion, in principle. However, we do have certain concerns and misgivings. We support this resolution because we are actually trying to help in a non-partisan way the Prime Minister to get out of this difficulty, this mess that he has created, because we truly want to work co-operatively to help Canada and Canadians.

• (1210)

We in the Liberal Party are willing to put aside partisan politics to work for the future of Canada. We are indeed, my hon. colleague, and I would hope that other hon. colleagues representing other formations politiques would be willing to do the same.

Some of the shortfalls of the mandate of the proposed committee are, as I indicated——much too narrow a mandate. I suggest we should look into the amending formula and that this process should give rise to a number of other questions, but I feel nevertheless that shared powers is truly the key issue.

Why do we support this government's decision to create such a committee? It is very simple. We are trying to help in a co-operative and non-partisan way the Prime Minister to get out of this constitutional mess that he has created and we also do want to help the Canadian people. We are willing to work all together for the future of Canada. There is no other reason.

But let us not forget that if, in the end, the Canadian people, whether Natives, Francophones, Anglophones, new Canadians, do not feel they really belong in this great country, if they feel that they cannot participate fully in the decision-making process, in the economic, social, cultural and linguistic life our society, if each region does not feel fully integrated, we will have failed.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that we are debating this motion today. I know that it was the government's intention to avoid having this motion debated and that the Liberal Party was willing as well to forego a debate on this issue. But with this proposed committee we are talking about the Constitution of Canada. Parliament must be involved. Canadians must be involved and Canadians must be kept informed. My party is committed to these principles and that is why we forced this debate today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, we oppose the government's motion for several reasons. Let me say at the outset that opposition to this motion is not opposition to constitutional renewal. Quite the contrary. We are opposed to this motion because we want substantial, meaningful constitutional initiatives. The proposed committee offers a one-dimensional response to a profound national crisis. It is an incomplete answer to a large and complex issue. The issue, the question, is what kind of Canada do we want to create and how do we create it?

This committee is being formed to discuss how we can get there, but nothing about where we want to go. We should begin by identifying some of those basic principles for a nation with a vision, a nation that knows where it wants to go.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: My vision and my party's vision for this nation is based on the principles of a commitment to social justice, a recognition that we have a responsibility to care for each other.

Our principles are based on a recognition of the value of diversity, that the Canadian nation will not be built on homogeneity, but true respect and celebration of our many cultural communities, of Canada's first nations, on francophone and anglophone linguistic groups.

Therefore, there must be a recognition in our Constitution of collective rights and collective responsibilities. As well, we have individual rights under the charter. We have to look to what makes us collectively a nation. If there is to be equality for all Canadians, we must ensure that the rights of groups and communities are respected. That may require different constitutional arrangements with different groups, whether those groups be aboriginal people or Quebec. Real equality comes from acknowledging diversity within one nation, and through that we will find a common bond.

From these basic principles we can move to really building a constitution. Canadians are looking for real meaningful constitutional renewal. They are looking for a constitution that reflects the reality of Canada, the reality of Canada as it is as we move into the year 2000. Canadians are looking for a constitution that meets the needs of aboriginal people, of women, of minorities, of Quebec, of the north, and of the regions of this country from coast to coast to coast.

This proposed committee will address only some of these issues. It will look at a narrow aspect of the Constitution. Its deliberations can easily be ignored by the government and will be ignored, if we look at the past record of this government. We oppose this motion, not because we do not care about Canada's future but because we do care about Canada's future.

Canadians know where New Democrats stand. We stand for one Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to the Arctic Ocean. We stand for one Canada that celebrates its diversity, that brings people together in a commitment to creating a caring and a just nation for everyone.

There is little evidence to justify any faith or trust in this government's commitment to building a constitution through an open and democratic process. Let us look at the record.

First, there was the agreement at Meech Lake in 1987: 10 premiers and the Prime Minister drawing out a map for the future of Canada without talking or listening to the people who would have to use that map, the people who would have to follow its directions.

How was this map presented to Canadians? The Prime Minister said that not a word could be changed, not a comma could be changed. Throughout the debate he polarized Canadians by saying that anyone who expressed concerns about the accord, anyone who raised options to what was in the accord, had to be anti-Quebec. It was a divisive strategy. It was a destructive strategy for this country. If I may say so, it is one of the most destructive things that this Prime Minister and this government have done in this country, and that is why we are now at the point that we are at in 1990.

And what about the process that followed these events? A committee on Meech Lake was established, a committee that sat for a month, never left Ottawa and had very few opportunities to listen to what Canadians had to say. The Senate held numerous hearings. The ensuing recommendations were ignored.

When it realized it should listen to Canadians, the government finally appointed the Charest Committee. Our party and many members of this House took the committee seriously. We worked very hard to try and find solutions and reach a compromise.

Although it had little time, the committee tried to listen to what the people had to say.

[English]

The Charest committee did find a compromise upon which all three parties of this House agreed. What did the government do with that report? It ignored it. It ignored it like it has ignored all the recommendations coming from public hearings, whether those public hearings be on trade, GST, green plan or the Constitution. This government has public hearings. It hears, but it does not listen to Canadians.

• (1220)

Ms. McLaughlin: The Charest committee was ignored. Then, true to form, the Prime Minister called together the premiers for one more back-room, closed door session, and Canadians were forced to live with the consequences.

The Meech Lake process failed, and the price of that failure has been a high one, with growing alienation in Quebec, in the west, among the aboriginal people of Canada, and indeed among all Canadians.

What lessons has the government learned from the failure of this process? Has it learned that Canadians have to be involved in every step of the process? Has it learned that Parliament has to be involved?

Let us look at the government's two most recent initiatives.

[Translation]

First, we have the Citizen's Forum on the Future of Canada, the Spicer Commission. The words "future of Canada" sound wonderful, Mr. Speaker, and if given a broad mandate, the Citizen's forum could be a very worthwhile exercise.

However, we are not really sure what the forum's mandate is. There is a lot of confusion about this, Mr. Speaker, because once again, the Prime Minister made a decision without consulting Parliament, without consulting the leaders of the opposition parties and without consulting members of this House. In fact, as events unfold, it is becoming clear that even members of the commission do not know the forum's mandate.

The Spicer Commission could have had a clear and realistic mandate if there had been consultations and if there had been a commitment. It may be possible to accomplish something, Mr. Speaker, at least I hope so. The New Democratic Party will do everything it can to make this work, and we urge the government to do the same.

[English]

Today we have this proposed joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the amending formula to the Constitution. Once again no consultation: no consultation from the Prime Minister with the leaders of the opposition, no involvement of this House in looking at long-term efforts on the Constitution. A discussion paper tabled after the Prime Minister spoke, not shared with the parties before when this motion was being presented, is unacceptable. It is the same old process in the same old way. It must change if we are going to save this country.

Ms. McLaughlin: Each time since June 23, that an initiative has been put forward by this government, we say to ourselves: "Has the Prime Minister learned anything from past mistakes?" Evidently not, Mr. Speaker, and this is sad. Not in a partisan way; it is sad for Canada. We have to learn from our history. That is what the constitutional debate is all about now. We have to learn from our mistakes. They are clear and before us. But why does it not happen? That is the question Canadians need an answer to.

To have a discussion paper upon which a committee is to be formed not even presented to members of the opposition before the debate is inexcusable. It is arrogant and, as I say, it continues the same old process in the same old way. It is unacceptable. That is exactly why we wanted a debate on this motion today. That is why we simply refuse to rubber stamp this committee.

We also have a strong belief that this committee is too narrowly defined. The issue of the amending formula is an important one. As the member for Yukon, I certainly do not have to be reminded about what a unanimity provision in the amending formula on the future creation of provinces means to my home territory. I understand the importance. My party understands the importance of the amending formula.

The fundamental question here is whether this committee addresses the real issue. We say it does not. What Canada needs to know is not just how we are going to get there but where we are going.

It is also a question of priorities. What about aboriginal issues? Members of the government have said that any progress on constitutional issues regarding aboriginal people will have to wait until the conclusion of the Spicer commission. Aboriginal people are saying—and we are saying it—why do aboriginal people have to wait while for some reason this committee can go ahead and travel across Canada?

Given the broken promises of the government to aboriginal people, given the events of the summer, given that, as we speak, thousands of aboriginal people throughout the country live in poor housing conditions and have no chance of employment, I would suggest that aboriginal Canadians cannot wait. Has the Prime Minister learned nothing from the summer of 1990? If any committee should be travelling across this country now, it should be one on aboriginal affairs trying to deal with the very complex situations of first nations across this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: What I am saying here today is that the constitutional debate that takes place should be both more immediately relevant and broader in scope than that envisioned by this proposed joint committee.

[Translation]

My party, as you know, has made numerous concrete proposals in this regard. We proposed the establishment of a constituent assembly. We asked that a Standing Committee on the Constitution be set up by the House of Commons, and renew that request today. If we have standing committees on transport and on agriculture, we can also have a committee on the Constitution, i.e. on the country's future. Such a form would allow broader discussion of the constitution, in particular of an amending formula. In short, a standing committee would allow us to examine the Constitution as a whole, instead of doing so in piecemeal fashion, as the motion put forward today by the government seems to be intended to do.

[English]

In conclusion, what I am saying and my party is saying is that it is not enough to strike a committee and travel around the country to discuss the amending formula, no matter how important that amending formula is, because Canada is not just about an amending formula; it is about people living together. We have to get to the heart of the matter; we have to talk about Canada itself.

When we talk about Canada, let us talk about national institutions, something this government seems determined to destroy. Let us talk about universal social programs, something else this government is obviously determined to let go. Let us talk about an economy that serves Canadian families throughout this country. Let us talk about a vision for Canada. Rather than look to an individual or an elite for that vision, let us look to the Canadian people: aboriginal people and women, people from the regions across the country, from Quebec; farmers, environmentalists, and minority groups. The vision is there. It is a vision of diversity within this country, and of acknowledging diversity within one nation.

Leadership is about bringing those visions together, and that is what we in this party intend to do.

We must work together to renew Canada, to give to our nation a new sense of direction and a new sense of purpose. We have a nation like no other and an opportunity that few on this planet have to build a society of people living together, sharing with each other, caring for each other, and celebrating the richness of our common humanity.

• (1230)

The responsibility we are charged with as members of Parliament is to bring Canadians together, to find solutions to our conflicts and to build for the future.

I want to propose, today, an amendment to the government motion, recognizing that the Speaker will need to make a ruling on this. I propose this amendment because I feel that through this we could fulfil our responsibilities to the Canadian people, to really address all of the issues.

Therefore I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"a standing committee of the House of Commons be appointed to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon all matters related to the Constitution, including the amending formula".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has received the motion in amendment moved by the hon. member for Yukon and will take it under advisement.

Ten minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Shefford.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the last three speeches, I had the distinct impression there was a lot being recycled here. About ten years ago I heard a speech in which the Prime Minister at the time used exactly the same terms. Three years ago, when I heard the Prime Minister of Canada talk about Meech Lake, it was the same speech, the same terms, the same old song. And when I hear hon. members repeat those same platitudes, I have to say we are very, very skeptical.

We are convinced this committee is doomed to failure. Mr. Speaker, when your house is on fire, it's too late to worry about the plumbing! To think they can reestablish a consensus in this country through an amending formula, Mr. Speaker, is utopian. It's a diversion, and it's a waste of time. They would have Canadians believe that what is basically wrong with this country is the amending formula mechanism. This paper isn't even up to the standards of Political Science 101. Any student could have written a better paper than this. The text simply dishes up old nostrums that have been around for ages: the referendum model and the constituent assembly model.

Mr. Speaker, for many years, political observers have longed for this kind of process. However, we all know it is not part of Canada's tradition and that the present amending formula, which requires unanimity, will never be amended to allow for these alternatives.

No wonder the Prime Minister is panicking. Every time he makes a speech at a fundraiser, he has to announce a new committee. Thank goodness there aren't too many fundraisers right now, Mr. Speaker!

I think this initiative is worthy of a minor "Impro" league. He started with his so-called Spicer Commission—which is a big farce, even English Canada doesn't take it seriously, while it is completely ignored in Quebec—and now, he has just created a committee on plumbing. If any questions are asked, he might be willing to create a third committee on the division of powers and upon further questioning, he would probably appoint a fourth, fifth and even sixth committee.

Mr. Speaker, the truth is that all these committees will not prevent Quebec from going ahead. Those who look at the world through rose-coloured glasses and think it will be business as usual are wrong. I may remind the Prime Minister that in his speeches before the demise of Meech Lake, he himself referred to the last chance, the last opportunity. Today, in his attempt to resurrect old political science papers, the Prime Minister is deluding himself.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to accept the motion by the New Democratic Party which is more honest, in my opinion, because it is more open, while the position of the leader of this party is also far more realistic.

Mr. Speaker, this committee will never be able to come to grips with reality. It will be useless.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hamilton East on a point of order.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, we have ten minutes to ask questions to the leader of the New Democratic Party. She wants to take the opportunity to make a speech. Fine. I want to make one too, but this is a question period. So, she should give others a chance to ask questions too. After all, we are more directly concerned by this issue than she is.

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond briefly to the previous speaker's comments simply by saying that despite our differences I am sure that no one in the Conservative Party, in the Liberal Party, or in the New Democratic Party feels that debating Canada is a waste of time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the leader of the New Democratic Party a question. I must say that I found that she missed a tremendous opportunity in her speech. I found it remarkable that she began with partisan shots, unable to put the country ahead of party. It is simply not true that the Liberals opposed this debate. The fact is there is all-party agreement to have a one-day debate and the leader might well have reflected that.

She stated very clearly that her party stands for one Canada. That is a truly remarkable statement to those of us who fought the 1988 election, when her party in Quebec came out with a vision that was clearly at odds with the rest of the country. It is certainly a remarkable statement for those of us who saw the by-election of Laurier—Sainte-Marie where her candidate, in order to garner votes in that election, turned her back on Canada and the leader of the New Democratic Party did not denounce her. It is certainly a surprise to those of us in Quebec who have heard countless times the member for Chambly take a position which is clearly at odds with the members of the rest of her party. My question to the leader is, she may stand for one Canada, why does she not tell that to the members of her party in the province of Quebec?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I am the leader of the New Democratic Party. I speak for the New Democratic Party. I stand in support of the member for Chambly who speaks with conviction as a Quebecer for Quebec interests within this party and for a united Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, you will permit some skepticism on our side. I was watching television about a month ago when the leader of the New Democratic Party said the Constitution was not a problem, the Constitution was not an issue, that what we should be looking at is strictly the economy. I am happy to see she now understands that the Constitution is very critical to the future of this country.

If in fact she speaks as the leader of the New Democratic Party, why is she afraid to speak before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and to tell the people of Quebec exactly what her party thinks on this issue?

[Translation]

Why is she not prepared to go before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and state her position on the Constitution instead of sending the member for Chambly. He is for sovereignty–association, but she is not. Why does she refuse to make a presentation?

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I am accountable to my party. I am accountable to the people of Canada. I am not accountable to the Liberal opposition.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: However, I will say that both in Quebec and outside of Quebec I have spoken about our party's constitutional policy. I will continue to do so.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for the NDP says we touched a nerve. Indeed it does touch a nerve when the leader of her party claims that they are the people who are speaking for Canada. However, she does not have the courage to go into the province of Quebec to speak about the federalist position of her party before the Bélanger–Campeau commission, but she is prepared to send the member for Chambly who is clearly saying one thing in English and another thing in French. One of the criticisms we have had of the government over this debate has been that the Prime Minister and the government have said one thing to English Canadians and another thing to Canadians in the French language.

There is one party and one leader who are prepared to say the same thing in both languages. It is the Liberal Party and it is the Liberal leader who has the courage to go before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and tell Quebecers and Canadians about his hopes and dreams for Canada.

[Translation]

I find incredible and insulting that the government leader and the leader of the New Democratic Party refuse to state their constitutional policy for Canada.

Mr. Duhamel: They do not have one. They are afraid!

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, we are considering today a motion to establish a Special Joint Committee of the House to inquire and report upon the process for amending the Constitution, including alternatives to the present formula and other ways of changing it.

Mr. Speaker, certainly the amending formula is one of the contributing factors that lead to the Constitutional deadlock, but it is not the only one. The process itself was brought to a standstill because the Prime Minister refused to work as hard outside of Quebec as he did to sell the Meech Lake Accord to the people of Quebec. What he did is do a good job selling Meech Lake to Quebecers, but he did not say a thing about it outside of Quebec.

I know because I represent an anglophone riding outside of Quebec. Brian Mulroney and his gang did not come to Hamilton to explain what Meech Lake was about. Instead, they stressed upon the people of Quebec that to reject the Accord was to reject Quebec. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I did not reject Meech Lake. Nor did I reject Quebec.

My constituents have no understanding of what the Meech Lake Accord was. Some of those who were against the Accord do not want the separation of Quebec. They want Quebec to remain within Canada. After the failure of Meech, I think that we will now come to realize, with the work of the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and the recognition of the people outside of Quebec, that the situation is serious. We have finally reached the point where Canada must welcome Quebec within the Canadian family.

Mr. Lapierre: Too late!

[English]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I know my friend, Jean Lapierre, knows how much I bled in the Liberal caucus over the issue of Meech Lake. I want to tell him, and through him to Quebecers, and through them to Canadians, that the people outside Quebec who rejected Meech Lake did not want to reject the people of Quebec. For the Conservative Party of Brian Mulroney, who for three years travelled into the province of Quebec telling Quebecers, "A vote against Meech is a vote against you", and for the members of the Bloc Quebecois, who want to facilitate the separation of Quebec from Canada by telling Quebecers, "The rest of Canada does not care", I say to them, you are wrong. The rest of Canada wants to make a home for Quebec within the Canadian family. If we do not, if we fail in this initiative, and I dare say with the proposal of the government we are heading for failure, it is not only the federal Parliament of Canada that will pay the price but it is the country of Canada.

To have a Canada without Quebec, to have a Canada without one of the founding people who have contributed economically, socially, culturally, linguistically to the very fabric of our nation, that is to have no Canada at all. Perhaps there are a lot of Canadians with blinders on. I believe some of those Canadians were in my own party and I said so. However, the time has come to take those blinders off and recognize that not only do we have a country that is worth saving, we have a very special part of that country, indeed, a unique and distinct part of that country, known as Quebec, which must be made to feel at home again in the Canadian family.

How many Quebecers looked at the rejection of Meech as Canada's last chance to say no to Quebec? We have had another chance. Unfortunately, with the federal process which is being launched, not only by this particular committee but by the Spicer Commission, we are frittering away precious time in which the future of our country hangs in the balance.

After refusing to testify before the Commission on the political and constitutional future of Quebec, the Prime Minister actually believes that his initiatives here in Parliament will help Canadians meet the constitutional challenge. After refusing to recognize the main constitutional problem we must deal with in the near future, the Prime Minister thinks he is proposing adequate solutions. He does not understand the problem, and he is proposing the wrong solutions. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can solutions be effective if the problem is ill-defined?

On November 30, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister whether the Prime Minister was going to appear publicly before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. We already know he made several statements behind closed doors and we also know that the closed door process no longer works. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the Deputy Prime Minister answered no, saying that he failed to see why the Prime Minister should appear before the various commissions involved in studies and inquiries on the future of Canada. For shame, Mr. Speaker! The Prime Minister himself will not appear before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission on the future of Quebec! With or without the Prime Minister of Canada, Quebec's self-determination will have a major impact on Canada's self-determination. If Quebec decides to go its own way at the end of March, Canadians will lose a great deal, Mr. Speaker. Canadians outside Quebec have the most to lose if the Prime Minister is not prepared to speak for a united Canada before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

I believe the Prime Minister should acknowledge that national unity is his responsibility. Let's not fool ourselves, Mr. Speaker. Whether we like it or not, by reflecting on its own political and constitutional future, Quebec is actually determining Canada's future. With all due respect for the other provinces, I think we must admit that Quebec and Quebecers are the best informed on constitutional matters. It is not the first time they are dealing with these questions. We could even say the Constitution is a national sport in Quebec, and as with hockey, there are a number of well-trained teams, expert coaches, commentators who are well-informed and a very partisan, well-informed and knowledgeable public. The French in the St. Lawrence valley are past masters in the constitutional arts, and they also have the most experience in this field.

The 1982 Constitution is the seventh political or constitutional regime the French in Canada have known. The French regime, which started with the founding of Quebec in 1608, was followed by the British occupation after the Conquest in 1759, and then the Treaty of Paris in 1763, which ceded French Canada to England. In 1791, the Quebec Act granted the right to speak French, practise the Catholic religion and use the Civil Code. The 1840 Act of Union united Upper Canada and Lower Canada, and in 1867, the British North America Act created Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord, to Francophones, was their eighth constitutional event, and following its demise, may be sure there will be a new eighth constitution for the people of Quebec, with or without Canada. The various constitutional crises we have known so far, Mr. Speaker, arose from the French Canadians' need to have their language and culture recognized and protected.

It would not be going too far to say that the very nature of Canada is determined by the fact that a francophone community and an anglophone community live side by side.

French Canada has always viewed the 1867 confederative pact as a pact between two peoples. This fact must be understood, Mr. Speaker, because it is still an important aspect of the on-going constitutional debate. Canada is a federal country, at the expressed request of French Canadians under the leadership of Georges Étienne Cartier, precisely so that they and the institutions that meet their needs may prosper in this land of America. Georges Étienne Cartier was successful in promoting his vision over the will of John A. Macdonald who wanted Canada to be a unitary state. Had Quebec not insisted there would have been no enduring constitutional debates throughout this century.

Chances are there would have been no amendments in 1982 had it not been for the rise of the independence movement in the Province of Quebec during the 1960s and 1970s. There would have been no Meech Lake had nobody felt the need to bring Quebec back into the constitutional fold. But then, Mr. Speaker, nor would we be confronted with an impending and serious crisis had the Prime Minister and his colleagues done their best to give all Canadians an enlightened explanation on the nature of the Meech Lake Accord. No, he chose instead to remain silent, Mr. Speaker. From the moment the accord was signed in 1987 until the very last minute he buried his head in the sand and let people interpret the arrangement as they saw fit.

So when the situation really turned bad he resorted to blackmail and attempted to manipulate the various parties in the dying minutes. This explains why we are now in this serious predicament.

The Conservatives played the constitutional game like a bunch of amateurs without giving it every consideration it deserved, and now they are taking the same approach with the Spicer commission.

[English]

The reason for the failure of the Meech Lake Accord was that the Prime Minister and the government never went to the rest of Canada to explain the real meaning of the process. Frankly, it played the constitutional game in an amateurish way and it is in the process of doing the same thing again. The Prime Minister said: "I rolled the dice." The Prime Minister said in The Globe and Mail that he created the constitutional crisis so he could force the parties to the table.

I fear that with the Spicer commission and with the parliamentary committee the Prime Minister is about to play constitutional roulette once again with the people of Canada. He is doing that because, instead of having a thoughtful, planned process of open constitutional reform, for five months after the death of Meech he did nothing. Then, he launched the Spicer commission which has been roundly criticized on all sides and which does not even have a full complement of full-time working members.

The constitutional clock for this country is ticking and we have a Prime Minister who is using amateurish approaches to try to solve a very difficult problem. Contrast that with the approach taken by the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

[Translation]

Whether we like it or not, the first challenge will come from Quebec. All political, social and economic actors are now seriously considering Quebec's political and constitutional future, an exercise which is not being done in this House, Mr. Speaker. The opposing teams stand face to face. Experts one after another express their views. Every day the newspapers are full of briefs and comments of every description. People are following the debate very closely. And what is heard is beyond the imagination of any other Canadian who even bothers to listen.

[English]

It is important that I say this in English, Mr. Speaker. The rest of the country has yet to realize that we are on the verge of a constitutional crisis which could result in the end of Canada. I hope that in some small way this debate and even the debate of the Spicer commission and, certainly, the debate being undertaken by the Bélanger–Campeau Commission will send a signal to the rest of Canada that Quebec has waited too long and the rest of Canada must wake up if we are going to be able to save the country in time.

[Translation]

First of all, listen to what Quebec social groups and unions are saying: They already want to leave.

[English]

They are already speaking about what they will do after the beginning of a sovereign Quebec.

Moreover, it is not only unions and social groups who are saying that, Mr. Speaker, but also financial organizations such as the Mouvement Desjardins.

[English]

When a major financial institution of the nature of the Mouvement Desjardins calls for independence, we know that the time for Canada is quickly running out.

Moreover, the Conseil du patronat wants Quebec to be distictive not only through its language, but also through a whole series of other institutions including the Civil Code, the Revenue Department, networks of manpower centres and financial institutions. Others, such as the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, although they would prefer to keep a Canadian money system, are already talking about the possibility of a separate currency for Quebec. Poeple have to listen, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

Listen Canadians, the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, although it would prefer to keep a Canadian money system, is already talking about the possibility of a separate Quebec currency. Time is running out and the Prime Minister does not have the luxury of the years and years of the three-year process of Meech. What he has is time running out on him, with federal initiatives that show little leadership, little planning, and little understanding of how grave the situation is.

An hon. member: It is true!

Ms. Copps: The ideas submitted to the Bélanger–Campeau Commission are each more daring than the next. Many are asking for the Quebec people to decide the issue in a referendum held as soon as possible. This Commission is supposed to table its report at the end of March, which means that the Quebec government would then have definite recommendations available and could act quite expeditiously.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will forgive me for describing in detail the process taking place in Quebec, but I did so because I wanted to compare it with the process here at the federal level.

[English]

I wanted to speak in detail, Mr. Speaker, about the Quebec process because I think we have to contrast that with the absolute lack of leadership and planning to save Canada on the part of this Prime Minister and this government.

The Spicer commission was cobbled together at the last second. The resolution about which we are speaking today was brought about as a response to an immediate political problem of the Prime Minister. Where has he been since June 23, when he knew that the constitutional clock was ticking? Where has he been? Why does the government not expand the terms of reference of this committee to make sure that it deals, not only with the important issue of the amending formula, but also the other questions that Canadians want put on the table?

It is simplistic and naive to suggest that the death of Meech was only a result of the formula of unanimity. The death of Meech was the result of a federal Prime Minister who was unwilling to speak out in the rest of Canada as eloquently and as vociferously as he spoke out in the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I can speak with credibility on this issue because I spoke in the same language, with the same words, in every part of the country and I can tell you that the death of Meech which started the clock ticking for Canada was a direct result of the mismanagement and the amateurish approach of the government. I fear that we are about to repeat the same process with this position.

I pray for Canada, Mr. Speaker. I pray for Canada and I do not care what political party one belongs to, but I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, Canadians should wake up because the clock is ticking. We need a new deal for Canada and we need a new deal for Quebec in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laval–Ouest, very briefly.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member for Hamilton East and I must congratulate her, for she did take a stand for the Meech Lake Accord and supported it. Now, her leader will go to Quebec to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and force down the throat of the Quebecers things they may not be interested to hear.

I would Like the hon. member for Hamilton East to tell me how she will react to Mr. Chrétien's testimony before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I was among those who wanted Mr. Chrétien to go before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission so that he could explain directly to the people of Quebec what his aspirations were for the future of Quebec within Canada. It is a well known fact that he opposed the Meech Lake Accord, but we also know that, during the after–Meech—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1.01 p.m., the House took recess.

PUBLIC SERVICE 2000

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the government's white paper on Public Service 2000 tabled yesterday confirms the concerns of the Liberal Party and Public Service employees that real consultation is not part of the agenda of the government.

The document was prepared without consultation with employee representatives and far from being a discussion paper, it is riddled with dictates like "the government will", "the government has decided", "the government will require". There is no strategy in place for a dialogue. In fact the President of the Treasury Board has sent out mixed messages about whether the paper will even be referred to a special committee as recommended by the public accounts committee.

This is the acid test on whether the government really wants to consult with Canadians or just with corporate Canada. PS 2000 is now under the microscope. The Liberal Party, the Public Service, and Canadians are watching.

AWARD OF EXCELLENCE IN ARCHITECTURE

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): On Tuesday, December 11, Mr. Speaker, I attended a meeting at Mont–Rolland's cultural and community centre. The meeting had been organized to celebrate the fact that Boudrias, Boudreau, St–Jean and Associates, an architectural firm of my riding of Laurentides, has been given a mention for the Ordre des architectes du Quebec Award of Excellence. The firm Boudrias, Boudreau, St–Jean and Associates received this excellence award mention for the quality of their work in renovating and enlarging the cultural and community centre of Mont–Rolland. This very functional building is greatly appreciated by Mayor Gilles Legault, his councillors and the residents of Mont–Rolland.

I want to congratulate Boudrias, Boudreau St-Jean and Associates for their outstanding work, and I commend them for receiving the excellence award mention from the Ordre des architectes du Quebec.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): This weekend, Mr. Speaker, I will be joining more that 5,000 people in Rimouski where, together, we will express our total disagreement over the cut-backs imposed by this government to the CBC, more particularly the savage reductions affecting eastern Quebec television stations.

Mayor Roger Thériault of Baie-Comeau, a community well known to the Prime Minister, I should think, said that these cut-backs are "a low blow which torpedoes the nascent regional conscience".

It is not too late for the Prime Minister to listen to his own electors, Mr. Speaker. These people, and the electors of Rimouski this weekend, as well as those of eastern Quebec and all the other regions of Canada hard hit by these unacceptable and harmful cut-backs are asking that they be rescinded.

The government must rescind these cut-backs immediately, re-instate these essential regional voices, and stop strangling everything that does not originate from major centres.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House today the problems eight villages of the Lower North Shore suffered because of Canada Post's poor delivery service.

For over two months, Mr. Speaker, the residents of the villages of Baie Johan-Beetz, Kégaska, La Romaine, Harrington Harbour, Mutton Bay, La Tabatière, Aylmer Sound and Tête-à-la-Baleine get their mail with delays of up to 10 days in some instances.

That unacceptable situation results from changes made by Canada Post regarding the air transportation of postal matter to the Lower North Shore.

The Lower North Shore had managed to set up a good postal service for itself over the past few years. Then, a decision by the Canada Post Corporation in the spring of 1990 brought radical changes to the transportation and delivery of postal matter, which caused the service deterioration now facing the region.

Mr. Speaker, this situation can no longer be tolerated. Steps must be taken to restore decent postal service for the people of the Lower North Shore.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, once again the Prime Minister has excluded the north from the national forum on Canada's future. Once again the north has been shut out.

The forum's chairman is quoted today as saying he would have preferred to have a northern aboriginal representative appointed. Obviously, the Prime Minister did not agree. Obviously, the Prime Minister has forgotten his pre-election commitment to stop treating the territories like poor cousins.

For this Prime Minister and this government, Canada seems to stop at the 60th parallel. People who live south of 60 are given a voice in the national constitutional soul-searching, but the residents of the far north, those who occupy 40 per cent of Canada's land mass, who make their contribution to this country's sovereignty and prosperity without the services other Canadians take for granted, are continually denied the opportunity to participate in the strengthening of this nation. Northerners are Canadians too. We have something to contribute. The people of the north will not forget that this Prime Minister thinks we have nothing to offer.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the media and opposition parties have been attacking the green plan for being vague and not going far enough.

As one who has been involved with environmental issues for over ten years, I believe the critics are wrong, wrong, wrong. The green plan is a comprehensive agenda for decisive action on the environment with defined targets and schedules, supported by $3 billion in new funding.

Other countries have developed similar plans, including the United Kingdom, France, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands and Australia. Frankly, not one of these countries comes even close to Canada in terms of committed funding, targets and schedules, scope and the extent of public consultation and participation in the formulation process.

If the critics expended more of their energy in constructive pursuits such as becoming full partners in the green plan solution, the common goal of a healthier environment would be reached in less time than any of us have ever imagined.

THALIDOMIDE VICTIMS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, three victims of the drug thalidomide spoke before the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare this morning. The three, representing 72 others like them, asked for monthly assistance based on the severity of disability instead of equal lump sum payments irrespective of severity as chosen by this government.

After 30 years waiting for compensation, desperation has forced these people to bring their case to the United Nations Human Rights Committee. It shames me to say Canada is the only remaining country that has not yet come to the aid of its thalidomide victims despite their obvious need. Thirty per cent cannot find meaningful jobs, and another 30 per cent rely on their families for support. I and the member for London East ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to grant the request of the 75 Canadian thalidomide victims who have waited so patiently for redress. Please meet with them soon for the sake of justice, or do they need to wait for the judgment of the United Nations?

CHILD CARE

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval–Centre): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, 1990, the minister Monique Landry presided at the official opening in my riding of Laval–Centre of the first day care center made available in an office complex in Laval.

The "Génies en herbe G.L." center is an initiative of the engineering firm Gendron Lefebvre, with the support of Édifice G.L., the City of Laval and the Quebec child care services bureau.

Each year, this organization gets generous financial assistance from the government of Canada. The center accomodates 60 children, including 8 newborn, and there is an outdoor playground designed especially for children.

The location and layout of the center allow parents to come and see their child during the day. The community of Laval is grateful to the Gendron Lefebvre firm for this praiseworthy initiative.

RURAL DIGNITY

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth anniversary of the founding of Rural Dignity, a grass roots organization based on the principle that there are three great federal institutions which hold this country and rural communities together: the post office, the CBC and VIA Rail.

There are now thousands of rural Canadians, ably led by organizers like Cynthia Patterson and Barb Bonneau, who are fighting the cuts which threaten their communities and their way of life, like the closure and privatization of 5,200 rural post offices.

At one time the Prime Minister said that Canada is a country of small towns and big dreams. The last six years of population loss, poverty, privatization and lost services have been more like one big nightmare for rural Canadians. Grass roots movements like Rural Dignity Canada prove that rural Canadians are not going to stand by and watch the government gut their communities and their way of life.

There is a warning in this for all government members from rural constituencies; they had better pay attention to what their rural constituents are saying or face the consequences in the next election.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a GST-related fact-finding tour of southern Alberta and Saskatchewan in my capacity as Official Opposition critic for revenue. I met with western Canadians in 17 communities ranging from cities the size of Calgary to towns like Turtleford, Saskatchewan.

• (1410)

I spoke with them on radio talk shows, on the streets, in town halls and in malls. I met with mayors and other local politicians.

I wish to advise the House of three basic facts which I confirmed on my visit. First, western Canadians are overwhelmingly opposed to the GST.

Second, western Canadians are overwhelmingly opposed to the imposition of the tax on January 1, in the face of the clear need to rectify many obvious flaws in the proposed legislation.

Third, western Canadians are overwhelmingly in support of the Liberal senators' fight to defeat or delay the imposition of a tax they view as being forced on them by what many describe as the Mulroney dictatorship.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec we often talk about regional development, and since September 1984, in conjunction with our economic partners in Abitibi, we have managed to get six Community Futures Committees from the Conservative Government.

I have always said to my constituents that these committees provide the perfect vehicle for consultation. The PQ member for Rouyn-Noranda, Mr. Rémy Trudel, who ran as an NDP candidate in Témiscamingue in the last federal election in 1988, agreed not long ago that federal CFC was "the ideal formula for consultation" and "a genuine socio-economic summit".

Mr. Speaker, every community in Abitibi will draw on its strengths to start developing new industries and diversify its economy.

LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in the December 12 edition of La Presse, journalist Mario Fontaine reported, and I quote: "When Jean Chrétien appears before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, he will try to play down his federalist image". The journalist went on to say that the atmosphere at Liberal Party headquarters was very tense.

Along the same lines, backroom adviser Senator Rizzuto said that Mr. Chrétien would be very flexible and indicate that he was receptive to Quebec's aspirations.

Mr. Speaker, I don't know whether to laugh or to cry. What kind of credibility can Quebecers expect from a man who obeyed his mentor, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and condemned the Meech Lake Accord, a man who stated that "Canada is not negotiable", a man whose wonderful promises made in 1980 were soon forgotten in 1982, a man who convinced western Canadians he would put Quebec in its place?

I am sure there are many people who, like me, are waiting for December 21 to hear the Chrétien creed, new style, adapted to its audience and to the circumstances.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this week's nominees for the corporate welfare bum of the week award are: Prairie Oil Royalties Company, which had a profit of $5.1 million in 1989, a bonus of $1.6 million in tax credits, and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: Ranger Oil, with $32.6 million U.S. in profits in 1989, $3 million U.S. in government hand-outs and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: Ranger Oil, with $32.6 million U.S. in profits in 1989, $3 million U.S. in government hand-outs and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: Our last nominee, Northgate Exploration, with $5.3 million profits in 1989, with $1.4 million in government handouts and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: With the gulf crisis driving the prices of oil on a roller coaster ride with Santa Saddam at the wheel, our nominees, along with other oil companies are in for some treats with the consumer, being the Xmas turkey.

For the winner: l'enveloppe, s'il vous plaît, monsieur. The winner is Ranger Oil, our corporate welfare bum of this week. Congratulations to our winner, Ranger Oil. You can be sure that they are not a "Lone Ranger" when it comes to profitable oil pricing.

CANONIZATION OF MARGUERITE D'YOUVILLE

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, Pope John Paul II canonized the first Canadian saint, Marguerite d'Youville, founder of the congregation of the Sisters of Charity.

Today, as they did 250 years ago, the Sisters of Charity help street people, offer assistance to battered wives, provide hospital care, provide shelter for children from troubled families, help teenage mothers, visit the sick, help our schools, and so forth.

My own family can bear witness to the dedication of the Grey Nuns, and the people of my riding are very proud to have the mother house of the Sisters of Charity of Quebec, headed by Sister Yolande Bonner, in their community.

Congratulations to all the members of this order who today continue to uphold the ideals of their founder, Saint Marguerite d'Youville, which are fraternity and justice.

[English]

SOCIALIST AWARDS

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, we have the weekly socialist awards of excellence.

The nominees this week are: one of the Quebec members of the NDP who preaches sovereignty for Quebec while remaining a party member who supposedly favours federalism. Louise O'Neil, NDP candidate in the recent by-election in Laurier—Sainte Marie who, after losing to the Bloc Québécois, decided to end her political charade, leave the NDP and join the separatists.

The envelope, please: And the winner is the New Democratic Party, the party that preaches unity to English Canada while telling its Quebec candidates that preaching separatism is all right as long as one of them gets elected. Hypocrisy runs rampant once again in the NDP.

It is obvious to any thinking person that the only hope for a united Canada is the Liberals under Jean Chrétien.

I call upon every member of the NDP who really cares about Canada to come and join us over here.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is about something that pertains directly to the executive authority of the Prime Minister. Under section 34 of the Constitution, the Prime Minister in effect appoints the Speaker of the Senate.

Yesterday, in what has been called "the worst example of parliamentary dictatorship", the Speaker of the Senate broke the rules of that place in an attempt to force through the GST.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why has the Prime Minister allowed the Speaker of the Senate, his appointee, to carry out these improper actions? Inasmuch as the Prime Minister in the House this morning said that he did not intend to bulldoze Canadians on the Constitution, is it not time he and the government stopped trying to bulldoze Canadians when it comes to the GST?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I ever observed such a disgusting spectacle as the attack the Liberal Senators have made upon the Speaker of the Senate. It is unprecedented, absolutely unprecedented.

I am sorry to note that the Leader of the Opposition associated himself with that, because the Speaker of a House has the authority and responsibility to maintain law and order in a Chamber. It is about time that he has put his foot down. I think he should be applauded and will be applauded by all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Of course I am not sure where the next question is going to. I listened very carefully to the Leader of the Opposition. I listened also to his argument in the preamble that, because it was tied to the appointment by the Prime Minister, the question was appropriate.

I have serious doubts as to whether or not questions ought to be asked in this place that go directly to the heart of proceedings in the other place. I think for the moment that has to be my ruling.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I will abide by the ruling because the Deputy Prime Minister has in effect admitted that the Speaker of the Senate is acting under the instructions of the government and the Prime Minister.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a document from the Department of Finance in which the government admits that the GST is flawed and that it intends to change it in a number of ways.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: If the government is admitting that the GST is flawed, why, instead of trying to bulldoze it through, doesn't the government withdraw the GST, axe the tax, and give all Canadians a break?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has misinterpreted the response to the earlier question that he posed.

• (1420)

Mr. Mazankowski: What I am saying and what is clearly obvious was that the Speaker's ruling in the other place was upheld by a majority of the members. That is consistent with the traditions of the House over there.

It is rather strange that when a challenge was made about a Speaker's ruling and the Liberals would challenge a Speaker's ruling and defeat it, all was well because majority ruled.

What is at issue here is that the majority has changed. It now is a Conservative majority, and that is what the hon. Leader of the Opposition is failing to accept.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister speaks of a majority of senators, but Canadians will not forget that this majority was created when the Prime Minister packed the Senate with a bunch of GST-loving Tories who are ignoring the views of a majority of Canadians who say they do not want the GST.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the amendments suggested in the document of the Department of Finance confirm that the GST includes a number of errors, particularly as it applies to tourists and cab fares. So I ask the minister, since the government finally admits that the GST contains errors, at least in these areas, why does it not mention books as well? Why does it still insist on taxing books? Again, why is the government so intent on taxing books? Why?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the first part of the question of the hon. Leader of the Opposition wherein he takes issue with the actions of the Prime Minister in invoking section 26 of the Constitution, I might just remind him that that action was perfectly legal and it has been upheld by at least three court cases.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the leaky GST amendments, a copy of which I have in hand.

These amendments propose a series of changes to take effect at the same time as the present GST before the Senate is to take effect, on January 1. Is this not proof that the bill is badly flawed? Is this not proof that the Prime Minister and this government should have told the truth to Canadians, that the bill is wrong and should be withdrawn?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been all these months. Both the Minister of Finance and myself, in this House and outside, have indicated that we were listening to Canadians.

We have already made, as the members knows very well, a number of improvements in the operation of the GST. We have done it. We will, as necessary, continue further improvement to the GST when the bill receives Royal Assent.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this is the same government that told us there was only one budget leak. That is how honest this government is.

I would like to ask the following question of the minister who has just replied.

[Translation]

Why did the minister choose not to advise the House when he realized there were major flaws in his legislation? Why did he hide that information from the House? Why does he want to introduce a bill through the back door on Parliament's last sitting day before the Christmas recess? Why did he hide the truth from Canadians.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, never did the government hide the truth. Quite the contrary, and I am amazed that a member who has been in this House for so long, at least for me because I am a relatively new member— Every time a budget is tabled we introduce a number of bills related to the budget, and in turn these are followed by others to make improvements and close loopholes. In the case of this major reform we consulted with Canadians. That is what we have been doing since August 1989, and we will seek every means available to ensure that the tax is as fair, as equitable and as effective as possible.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Clearly the government is intent on ramming through the GST. It is unfortunate that the Liberal senators did not vote against the GST on first reading or on second reading, or we would not be at this point now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said at various times that there are flaws in the GST. The Department of Finance has now released a document saying that the GST does have flaws. Surely it is the government's responsibility to get it right the first time. It obviously could not with this tax. It obviously could not bring in a fair tax system.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister do the right thing now and withdraw the GST?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. Leader of the NDP that we shall do no such thing because this reform is very good reform for the economy of Canada. It will inject in the economy $9 billion, and this is what we are waiting for.

As for technical improvements, she knows as I know that as we go along, as we consult, as we are informed of possible improvements, we bring them on side. What is wrong with that? We are an understanding and attentive government.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is also a government that says to Canadians: "Just trust us".

During the free trade debate there were a lot of promises made about lowered prices and a level playing field. We do not have any of that. The economy is in shambles. There are not more jobs, there are fewer jobs, and now the government says: "Just trust us. We will fix up the GST. Don't worry about it". We are worried about it.

This is the worst tax at the worst time. This government knows it. Experts know it. Canadians know it. Will the Deputy Prime Minister now bring in a fair tax system and withdraw the GST today?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed: 48 countries, among which are the most modern countries in the world, have such a tax.

I know that the opposition parties have had a fixation. They know that taxes are unpopular. They have been attacking this tax with great vigour, but they have been carried away by their own speeches. I am not.

This is a modern reform. It has been called for for 50 years. Committee after committee has recommended it. We are doing it. It is a tough thing. In so doing we are also listening to people and, when we can bring in improvements, we are doing it.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): This government keeps saying, Mr. Speaker, that it is doing a tough thing. What Canadians wish is that it would do the right thing.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the battle opposing the Liberals and the Conservatives in the Senate goes on. This government will just not give up. While the battle goes on, the victims are forgotten. And who are those victims? They are, Mr. Speaker, the million and some unemployed men and women in Canada as well as the small businesses that can no longer manage to survive.

It is time this government recognized it made a mistake. It is time for them to swallow their pride. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Will the Prime Minister finally swallow his pride and withdraw the GST as common sense would dictate?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat to the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party that we will do no such thing because, she can say what she pleases, the GST is an excellent tax and a fair tax. Of all comparable systems, it is the fairest because of the tax credits.

That being said, the hon. member requested that we change our policy. To that I say, as we say in English, the proof is in the pudding. If you look at the interest rates today, you will notice that they are down 15 basis points. They have been going down for several months now. That is our goal and it is achieved through a serious policy designed to control inflationary pressures. These pressures are decreasing. Like all Canadians, we are delighted. The big winner is not the government but the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have always heard that the proof of the pudding was in the eating. Perhaps that is why the government is trying to jam the GST down the throats of Canadians. The draft press release, leaked yesterday, confirms to Canadians that the government has not thought through the GST. On top of the flurry of draft regulations coming from the Department of Finance that have just been sent to tax experts, we now know that the tax needs to be amended even before the bill has been passed through the Senate. This confirms that the government is rushing to get this tax through, in the desperate hope that Canadians will forget before the next election.

• (1430)

Why will the government not admit that it is simply not capable of implementing the GST three and a half weeks from now? Why does it not step back, withdraw the tax, start over, and give Canadians genuine tax reform?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. member that we will be in a position to implement it. We have, in the past, brought forward improvements.

I will repeat, this is a very important reform that covers a lot of ground in the taxation area. There are areas, not necessarily of very great significance, that can be improved. We are working on them. It is a fact that we have been improving it since August and that we will continue, as we do with all tax bills.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, that is cold comfort to the Canadians who still do not really know what it is they are going to have to comply with in three and a half weeks' time.

[Translation]

More specifically, the draft press release proves that the government intends to introduce changes. At his meeting with students from Vancouver, the Prime Minister said that he felt it was too bad the tax was applied to books. Does the government intend to show students that the Prime Minister really believed what he said? Is the government prepared to promise that its bill to amend the GST will also abolish the GST on books?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The hon. member said that Canadians will not know what taxes they will have to pay. I think they know perfectly well. In fact, they said as much in the polls. When we are talking about certain categories of people or businesses, that is another thing altogether. We have to upgrade the system we have, and that is what we are going to do. As for the tax on books, I may remind the hon. member that at the present time we have a federal sales tax imposed across the board, more or less. We are going to remove it, and we will also grant tax credits, so that people who might be penalized by this tax, people on low incomes, will have more money in their pockets than they did before.

Furthermore, by injecting $9 billion into the economy, more people will work, they will have better salaries and they will be able to buy more books.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The issue being decided today is really based on trust. Canadians are asking themselves why should anybody in this country believe the Prime Minister's declaration this morning that he wants to establish a committee of the House of Commons and Senate to repair and to modernize the institutions of Canada when this afternoon his appointee in the Senate, the Speaker of the Senate, is going to cut off debate and ram through the GST?

Doesn't the Prime Minister understand that he who destroys and corrupts our institutions cannot heal those institutions?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would want to put his question with less use of provocative language.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I shall put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister in another way, out of respect for this Speaker in this Chamber.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is the following. How can Canadians take seriously government initiatives to repair, modernize and make relevant our institutions, when this same government has been in the process of destroying institutions in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that the hon. member, who has had a distinguished parliamentary career, would engage in the kind of abusive and unparliamentary reflection that he has just cast on the Speaker in the other place.

I think that he may very well want to rethink that because quite frankly, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, surely what is at issue is that after eight months of consideration in the other place, it is time to make a decision. It is time to call the vote and it is the responsibility of the Speaker to maintain law and order and ensure that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think we will move on. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the Liberals so full of sound and fury signifying nothing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the Liberals fought the GST the way David Peterson fought the free trade agreement, by going to Japan. That is the way the Liberal Senators, who had opportunities to defeat the GST time and time again but did not take those opportunities.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. member that I asked him to put his question. I am going to have to move on if he does not.

Mr. Blaikie: My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Deputy Prime Minister. If the government has admitted, as it has, through what we have come to know from this draft press release and ways and means motion, that the GST bill was flawed, would they not finally do the right thing with respect to the GST, admit there are many other things in it that have to be corrected, withdraw the bill and bring it back to the House so we can have another crack at it.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): No, Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, if the government is willing to correct the things that the minister has indicated he wants to correct, why is it not willing to bring the tax back to the House of Commons so we can look at the inadequacy of the indexing, so we can look at the way it affects families, so that we can look at all the other injustices that this bill institutes, and do something about them?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, our documents pertaining to this tax and the bill itself were in front of this House since 1987 I think. If there were any constructive proposals to come from the other side of the House we would have found out by now.

HARBOURFRONT CORPORATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-73 authorizes the Minister of Public Works to separate the development and program functions of Toronto's Harbourfront Corporation by dissolving the corporation and selling off its assets.

Will the minister tell us what economic factors prompted him to agree to a sales deal that will give three developers, Konvey, Rampart, and Huang and Danczky a $36.4 million benefit, a sweetheart deal, thanks to public funds?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleague opposite to give me the source for those very unimaginative and I would say completely inaccurate figures. As he knows Darcy McKeough, a fine administrator, went over much of the plan of Duncan Allan, an outstanding Ontario civil servant, and we found that the Darcy McKeough proposal was very well accepted in Toronto.

• (1440)

The Toronto mayor, Mr. Eggleton was pleased with it. In fact, many of the media people there congratulated us in getting this unanimous agreement between so many levels of government for such a constructive project.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, clearly the minister is not up to par because a government-financed appraisal reveals the stench that surrounds the deal.

For example, Konvey gives up properties worth $1.2 million in exchange for $6.2 million in benefits. Rampart walks away from a $10.6 million in return for $23.1 million prize. Huang and Danczkey gives up properties worth $6.1 million in return for a $25 million reward.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Volpe: Will the minister move to end this deal, or is he going to be content to let the stench of corruption taint the atmosphere of this deal?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): If the hon. member has any serious concerns or problems with this particular proposal, I think he and his colleagues should sit down with some of the people in the Ontario administration, check with the mayor of Toronto, drop in and see Darcy McKeough and reflect upon the values of real estate in Toronto these days and maybe he will revise his estimates.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. He claims that the Darcy McKeough proposals have been endorsed by the city of Toronto. In fact, on Monday they were rejected by a vote of 16 to one as being totally inadequate. Only the mayor voted in favour of them.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacKay: I never said that.

Mr. Tobin: Tory developers.

Mr. Kaplan: Since when has the Government of Canada departed from the principle of paying fair market value for land that it takes from property owners?

An hon. member: Since Elmer took over.

Mr. Kaplan: The minister for privatization has said in the Toronto media that they did not pay fair market value. He says, "I am not arguing the figure. We paid a premium to get these three buildings off the south side." Why would the government pay a premium instead of fair market value when it has an obvious and full power of expropriation to take the land and not be bullied by developers into giving them premiums like this.

An hon. member: Tory developers.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I want to thank my colleague opposite for his usual penetrating look at the obvious. I never said that the city council endorsed it. I said that Mayor Eggleton was in favour of it.

In terms of abandoning the principles of fair market value, we have not abandoned those principles.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): How can the minister say that they followed fair market value principles when his colleague says they paid a premium? Real estate appraisers who were paid for by the federal taxpayers and hired by the Government of Canada found those figures, to which my colleague referred, that show that instead of paying fair market value, the government has paid $36.4 million more than fair market value.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Kaplan: This is the government's own hired appraiser.

An hon. member: Resign.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I think my colleague's appraisals and his estimates for fair market value have the same relation to reality as Mr. MacEachen's projections for budgets. I think they are very inaccurate.

If the member would look at the present market value for real estate in Toronto, and if he would do a little research for a change, he would find that his figures and the figures of his colleague are in accordance with general Liberal economic and fiscal projections, terribly inflated and not very substantive.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. It relates to the two year old, three volume commissioned survey on West Block asbestos leaked yesterday, which has been hidden in the bowels of his department since December 1988.

The minister and the government is doing a lot of bragging lately about their green plan for the Canadian environment. The principles of the green plan, with all its talk about public information and consultation, ought also to apply to Parliament, MPs and our staff.

To have kept this report secret from the Speaker, from the Board of Internal Economy, from West Block MPs and from parliamentary employees for two years while spokespersons denied any danger was scandalous and unacceptable.

When was the minister made aware of the report and what did he do about it? In view of the fact—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Kristiansen: —that yesterday the minister said he would check and report—

Mr. Speaker: There is a question. I am sure the minister would like to deal with it.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I know that you share my concern at the complete lack of factual information that has just been delivered to the House.

As you and I have discussed today, the administrators of the House of Commons were made aware of this particular report.

Mr. Kristiansen: When? When?

Mr. MacKay: Shortly after it was completed, I say to my colleague from British Columbia.

If my colleague opposite is so concerned about it, as I indicated to my colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond yesterday, I am quite prepared with the consent of the Board of Internal Economy to let him see the report or table it in the House. There is no mystery about it.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the information that we have is that answer is simply not true and not correct.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Order.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member is saying that the answer is not inaccurate. Perhaps the hon. member could clarify his position and put the question.

Mr. Kristiansen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the information that we have, that answer is not accurate.

My supplementary question, in this case is directed to the Minister of Labour. If the Minister of Labour had done his job and proclaimed Parts II and III of the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act, which was passed by this House four and one-half years ago, then our employees would have the right to know and to act, and we would not have this problem.

When will the Minister of Labour do his job as Parliament directed and give our employees the same basic health and safety rights as all other workers in Canada have? Will he have Part III of that act proclaimed now?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, one would believe that the hon. member would know that the proclamation of the act is not the responsibility of the Minister of Labour.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the goods and services tax will be disproportionately brutal on the north. Northerners pay more than those in the south, 40 per cent more, generally.

Now the GST is threatening the economic viability of northern publishing companies which have developed a successful industry by using northern authors and settings. It is clear these concerned northern citizens are in the hands and at the mercy of the government.

Will the acting Minister of Finance recommend that books be exempted from the GST to alleviate the unbearable pressure on publishers and consumers from the north and across Canada?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I would not share the analysis made by my hon. colleague.

Ms. Blondin: You don't live there.

Mr. Loiselle: It is not a fact that such will be the effect of the GST. Obviously, she has been listening to her colleagues. She should listen to us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: As my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has indicated many times, one of the heavy costs of living in the north is transport. The hon. member knows very well that people who bring things to the north have to pay a very heavy federal sales tax, which will be removed after implementation of the GST, hopefully very soon.

Credits will be available to members of certain communities. Notably, Indian communities in the north will have credits while not having to pay as much tax as other Canadians. I think on the whole they will be better off after reform.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear. I have just returned from the Northwest Territories where one of my constituents said to me that northerners this winter will pay $150 to $200 more to have their fuel tanks filled this winter. Try that on for size.

The cost of transportation is not going down. The cost of fur is going down. Unemployment is going up. The cost of living in the north is 40 per cent more than it is in the south.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you, the government fully intends to make changes to the goods and services act. We also know the government intends to tax all goods and services in the north, including transportation services.

Why will the government not exempt northern goods and services that are so vital to northern residents? Why does the minister opposite not take the opportunity to be merciful and listen to northerners who speak the truth?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1450)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it seems we cannot win. When we listen and propose changes, we are accused of making changes.

I fully sympathize with the fact that we are now living in a very difficult environment. We know that. We forecast that in our last budget. We must come out of it as soon as possible. Part of the solution is through the force of our economy and the exporting companies. Many of the companies operating in northern parts of Canada will benefit greatly from this tax, bringing prosperity and more jobs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. In the face of this economy, the real victims are the consumers and small business. Tax experts have said that the launch of this bill is going to be a disaster. There are close to 300,000 to 400,000 small businesses that have not even registered.

In the face of all of the difficulties that are facing consumers and small business, how, in good conscience, can the government proceed when it is overwhelmingly obvious that the negative effects are going to outweigh any positive effects?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to that question. I would like to take this advantage to let the hon. member know that in fact there are over 900,000 businesses that have registered.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jelinek: Registration applications are coming in at over 100,000 a week. We are capable of processing up to 175,000 per week. Added to that, a recent Deloitte & Touche poll concluded that in the retail sector alone—and this is over a month old now—over 80 per cent of retailers were prepared for a January 1 launch.

I can tell the hon. member and this House that we are ready to go January 1. The business community is getting there. It will be there with the services that are being provided by Revenue Canada. We will have a launch on January 1 for the benefit of all Canadians coast to coast.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about the number of businesses that have registered, but the real winners so far are the bigger businesses and also the government.

Studies according to the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses show that consumers and small business are losing confidence and are not advancing with this bill. Why does the minister not address those who are suffering the most?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the reason for this tax change is to assist those who are suffering the most.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: That is why we are moving in this phase of tax reform, for the benefit of those that suffer, in order to make them more competitive and more productive which will, in return, create more jobs and more productivity and a better economy in the country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: Will you socialists keep it down so that we can at least have an exchange here?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could conclude his answer.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member points out the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses' study which is some months old. In fact, I think it is nearly one year old.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: The study that I referred to is a Deloitte & Touche study done for the retail sector which is comprised primarily of very small businesses.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: That study concluded that 60 per cent—Howard, will you shut your trap, please?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beaver River.

GOVERNMENT REVENUES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

The government certainly knows that there is widespread public opposition to increased taxation. People do not mind paying taxes, but they are concerned about tax dollars disappearing into the spending machine of the government.

In light of these concerns, has the government considered establishing a deficit and debt retirement fund to which any excess revenues would be applied?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, since 1984, the government has followed a very clear policy of deficit reduction and expenditure control. We have been very successful transforming a $16 billion operating deficit into a $10 billion surplus. What a performance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: We are looking at all the possible options, including that one. When the minister, my colleague, is here and comes forward with his budget, the hon. member will see what our decisions are.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to this minister.

Is the government prepared to introduce changes to the Income Tax Act, similar to section 110.1, to allow gifts to the Crown which can be applied directly to the deficit or the debt? Or else, second, is it prepared to introduce changes to the Financial Administration Act which will help ensure revenues go to reducing the deficit and not for further spending?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think that we would, of course, want to apply any additional income from our taxation system to deficit reduction. The particular suggestion made by the hon. member will be looked at and I thank her for her suggestion.

FOREST RESOURCES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. Quebec Forestry Minister Albert Côté has inferred several times that the federal Forestry minister was trying to interfere with Quebec's provincial jurisdiction over forest resources.

My question is this: Could the minister give the House the assurance that the agreement proposed by the federal government to Quebec on August 24 respects the areas of jurisdiction of each government in this country?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give my colleague the assurance that the federal government's proposal is aimed first and foremost at co-operation and partnership with all members of the industry, starting with the Government of Quebec.

We have always recognized Quebec's responsibility for proposing and maintaining regular forestry programs. With our next series of agreements, Mr. Speaker, we want, above all, to establish an effective partnership in order to accelerate the process of forest development in Quebec, especially in private woodlands.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Yesterday, he tabled the Public Service 2000 white paper. In his press conference, the minister demurred when asked which committee of the House he will be referring the white paper to. He declined to give any further details.

Will the minister now advise the House which committee he will be referring PS 2000 to, and when we can expect this to happen?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will do precisely what I told the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts I would do when he wrote to me to ask this.

As I was about to enter the House yesterday, I was informed that the NDP did not like the idea of a special committee and that it would prefer a standing committee. I heard other remarks from the Liberal opposition that there are too many committees already.

I have asked the House leader on this side of the House to contact his colleagues to inform me of the desire of the opposition. Then, we will make a decision.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board also stated that he now intends, after going through a task force and a white paper, finally to get into meaningful discussion with the unions involved. Is that a commitment, and what are this minister's plans for communication with the union?

• (1500)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, they are very serious plans indeed. I would like to invite the unions now to be in touch with us. We have made public our intentions. I have told them that we will be prepared to negotiate and discuss with them.

I would also indicate to the hon. member that early in the new year I will put forward a full consultation process which will include, of course, any member who will want to come and state his or her mind on these very important matters. We are talking here of a major change made for Canadians. We have a fantastic civil service in Canada. We need to modernize it and remove the weight of Ottawa from it's back so that it can go on and serve the citizens.

I am determined to do that and I will welcome the contribution of anyone in this House to do that.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue has demonstrated the meaning of the Conservative dictatorship, "My way or no way". The minister is politically blackmailing business across Canada in order to sign up for the government's GST. Sign up—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I know that the hon. member would want to withdraw the word "blackmail". If he indicates that he is doing so, I will let him finish the question.

Mr. Karygiannis: I withdraw, Mr. Speaker. Numerous businesses will suffer across this country. The minister clearly does not understand the meaning of the word democracy.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Does he not finally realize that this tax is flawed? He should withdraw it, go back to the drawing board and start all over again.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to my comments in a speech in Toronto earlier this week where I pointed out quite clearly and categorically to the business community, to those in the minority that have not yet prepared or registered for the GST, that if they do not register for the GST they will not be eligible for an input tax credit. They would not be eligible for the federal sales tax rebate on inventory. They would not be able to receive the up to $1,000 grant for start-up costs for small businesses.

What I am saying and repeating here today is for those businesses that have not yet registered, I think it is good business to do so in anticipation of a January 1 start.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that I have several rulings to make. I think it would be of convenience to all members if we went ahead first with the usual Thursday question. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have the usual question for the government House leader. Can he indicate to the House what the business will be for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and the remainder of next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will continue with the motion to establish the special committee on the amending formula of the Constitution.

Tomorrow, I will be calling for report stage and possibly third reading of a number of bills which are important, though non-controversial, and hopefully they will be dealt with expeditiously: Bill C-63 on race relations, Bill C-68 on Yukon mining, Bill C-72 on the polar commission and Bill C-82 dealing with Quebec harbours.

On Monday, I hope to call for report stage under time allocation Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada bill, and on Tuesday, third and final reading of Bill C-84.

I will be in discussion with House leaders of the other parties with respect to further business for the rest of next week.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order, if I may. Members on this side of the House would like from you, particularly in view of what happened to my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte when he raised a question and then was asked by the Chair to rephrase the question, in which he obliged the Chair and then stood in his place for his customary second question and was thereafter informed by the Chair that he was out of order.

This may have been an inadvertence on the Chair's part, but members on this side, and particularly the hon. member, would like to have a full explanation if not today, perhaps tomorrow, as to what transpired, denying him the opportunity to phrase a second question which we believe on this side was very germane to the discussion which was taking place today.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can settle it now. I do not want to in any way offend the hon. member who is an experienced member of this House but as I heard the question, he was clearly linking the Prime Minister with comments including the word "corruption". I felt that that was out of order. I may not have made it clear that I felt that he should go to his second question and get on with it.

Speaker's Ruling

If I have erred by moving too rapidly I, of course, apologize but that is the explanation I give. I thank the hon. member for asking the question.

PRIVILEGE

BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS—REQUEST FOR RESEARCH FUNDS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Tuesday, November 27, 1990, the hon. member for Shefford raised a question of privilege related to a request he had submitted to the Board of Internal Economy to fund research for his group and to fund the office of the leader of the group. As Chairman of the Board of Internal Economy, I wrote to the hon. member to inform him of the Board's decision.

The hon. member had read the letter into the record and went on to challenge the fairness of the Board's decision, arguing with some vigour that "all hon. members should be treated the same" and that he and his colleagues must have the same rights and privileges as any other member in this House. The hon. member concluded with these words "— I beseech you to reverse your decision and if you refuse, you should at least have the decency to explain why."

These are strong words indeed. It appears to me that in presenting his impassioned case for additional funding for his group, the hon. member for Shefford has implied that the Chair has dealt in a high-handed and unfair manner towards certain members of this House. Furthermore, his words leave the entirely erroneous impression that the independent members in his group are being discriminated against.

As your Speaker, I cannot allow these erroneous impressions to stand unchallenged for they cast doubt on the impartiality of the Chair and risk tarnishing the whole House with the brush of unfairness.

[English]

First, let me state clearly that board decisions are made by the Board of Internal Economy, not by your Speaker. As Speaker, I am the chairman of that board and I preside over the deliberations of members, from all sides of the House, who sit as voting members of the board. These include the Deputy Speaker, the hon. government House leader, the hon. President of the Treasury Board, the House leader of the Official Opposition, the House leader of the New Democratic Party, the chief government Whip, the Whip of the Official Opposition, and the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louise.

[Translation]

The Board considered the request made by the hon. member for Shefford that additional funds be made available to his group for research and for the office of the leader of the group. The Board decided not to make an exception in this case and not to make additional funds available at this time. The Board could have decided differently. For the moment, the decision stands and I can only reaffirm it.

[English]

That being said, however, it is important to note that the decision does not mean that the members in this group are impeded from full participation in the work of the House or that they are being deprived of support necessary to represent their constituencies adequately. The hon. member for Shefford argues that the nine independent members for whom he speaks require additional resources. Each member of this House receives a global budget which covers basic staff salaries, normal operating expenses of a constituency office, and related travel expenses. It is important to note that each of these members, like every other member of the House, enjoys the full flexibility to assign these financial resources as he sees fit. For example, under their global allocation, most members of the House will employ up to five staff persons to whom they assign research or administrative duties either in Ottawa or in the constituency, as they judge appropriate. The global budgets of these nine members taken together total close to $1.5 million.

• (1510)

In addition to the global budget, the House provides each member with a fully funded Ottawa office and coverage of important ancillary costs like telephone, postage, printing and travel. Such then is the level of support that the House of Commons offers to each and every individual duly elected to serve as a member of Parliament. It is in this context that the case of the hon. member for Shefford should be viewed.

[Translation]

One can well understand the reasons the hon. member for Shefford may have for pressing the Board of Internal Economy to recognize himself and his colleagues as an entity and to grant them additional funds accordingly. To date, these efforts have proven unsuccessful, but it is a long and dangerous leap to conclude from there that the basic rights and privileges of those members are somehow being abrogated.

A search of the Debates will show, on the contrary, that the hon. member for Shefford and his colleagues have been extended every courtesy by this House and that the Chair has safeguarded their participation in ways that are fully in keeping with our procedure and practices.

In Question Period the group was recognized for questions immediately on the return of the House in Septembe and have since been recognized most days when they sought to question the government or to make statements pursuant to S.O.31.

[English]

These brief remarks have sought to explain to all hon. members and to the public who are watching the House of Commons funding of an infrastructure supporting the hon. member for Shefford and his colleagues. I trust that they will dispel any incorrect perceptions about the situation, and clarify that the support and funding available to every private member of whatever political persuasion is fully available to members who have identified themselves as the Bloc Quebecois.

[Translation]

There are profound differences of opinion as to the best solution to the political and constitutional dilemmas we now face. The depth of the conviction with which these opinions are held and the very complexity of the issues before us make for a highly volatile situation. The Chair pledges to do its utmost to continue to serve this House in as even-handed and impartial a manner as possible. Meanwhile I ask for the continued co-operation of all hon. members so that, however vigorous and hard-fought our political battles, the work of this place will reflect the seriousness and the civility our constituents have a right to expect.

[English]

I have another ruling.

The hon. member on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to ask you this: If I require some clarification on this point of order, should I request it now or wait until you have given your ruling on the other point of order?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: If I finish the other point of order, it may perhaps resolve some other problems, or at least be a step toward resolving some other problems. I would ask the hon. member to wait.

ANNAPOLIS VALLEY—HANTS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants rose on November 21, 1990 to declare that he was and wanted to be known as and registered in our records as an independent Conservative.

The hon. member for Calgary West intervened to make the point that in the Appendix to Wednesday's Debates members are listed by affiliation to parties recognized under the Canada Elections Act or as Independents, with no other possibilities in terms of that listing.

The Chair then indicated that the matter was the subject of discussion outside the Chamber and expressed the hope that it could be satisfactorily resolved.

Our further discussions on this matter were neither conclusive nor determinant of the issue. Before the Chair could so report back to the House, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants again rose on December 10, 1990 to press for recognition as an independent Conservative.

In his passionate appeal to the House, the hon. member referred us to numerous precedents where members having been elected under one label declared themselves under another affiliation and were so recognized.

He maintained that the political system in this country is based on the election of individuals whose party affiliation is incidental. The hon. member for Calgary West continued to insist that to invent a political affiliation which did not exist under the Canada Elections Act and to request the Parliament of Canada to approve the designation of that political affiliation in its written records when it does not exist as a label one can use in running for election in this country would be a serious mistake.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands submitted that the hon. member for Calgary West was seeking to alter the rules under which we have operated here by reference to changes in the Elections Act made in the 1970s. He concluded that based on precedents it would be entirely proper for the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants to choose his designation and insist that it be inserted in the Wednesday listing as an Appendix to Debates.

The Chair concluded the exchange by asking if any member could advise the Chair if there was any legal impediment against the hon. member calling himself an independent Conservative of the House. None was identified.

The Chair promised to return to the House with a reasoned response and is prepared to do so now.

[Translation]

It is, perhaps, paradoxical that the political affiliation of an hon. member, which is so fundamental to his or her self-definition is, in our official records, given only marginal expression. As far as this House is concerned, a member is designated by political affiliation only in the weekly appendix to Debates, and only in appendices to Journals and the bound volumes of Debates. There are, of course, other applications of these designations as, for example, in the electronic Hansard or in miscellaneous listings of members of the House. However, these applications might be described as derivative in that they depend upon or are drawn from the listing which appears in the weekly appendix to Debates. Therefore, the designation of political affiliation in Debates must be the primary focus.

[English]

With very great respect to those who maintain an opposite view, the Chair must advise that it can find no prescription limiting the designations inserted under political affiliation in the Appendix to Debates to those parties officially recognized as such pursuant to the Canada Elections Act.

The absence of such a limiting prescription must be weighed against the combined weight of our past practice in this regard and our long-standing tradition of respecting the word and legitimate demands to self-definition of individual members.

Having tried to perform this balancing act in the present instance with very great attention and care, the Chair is persuaded to yield to the request of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants and accordingly hereby direct that he be listed as an Independent Conservative in the weekly Appendix to Debates, in the Appendices to the bound volumes of Debates and Journals, and in any documents or circumstances consequential to those Appendices.

I recognize that this was not necessarily a particularly easy decision to make, but I hope that it meets, after the long discussion that took place, with the approval of the members of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, may I say I am extremely disappointed by the answer you gave to the very clear question put by the member for Shefford. In his question he had asked you to justify—

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: There is a long-standing tradition in this House. As the hon. member seems to be doing, it is not in order to comment on a ruling made by the Chair. If the hon. member has a question I will certainly try to answer him here or even in my chambers. After this caveat, he may continue.

Mr. Plamondon: I will ask my question, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to refer to the beginning of the questions of the hon. member for Shefford when he said "—please, at least have the decency to justify—". In the response you gave there was no justification for the fact that, for example, a group of Social Credit—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I regret very much having to interrupt the hon. member. It is true that the hon. member for Shefford used very strong language. I took that at the time because, as I said in my judgment, —my colleague the hon. member for Shefford made an impassioned speech.

[English]

If the hon. member will read carefully what I have just said, it is abundantly clear that the board made a decision. The board made that decision. All I can say on that is that it made that decision today. It might make another decision on another day, but it is not for the Chair to give the reasons that the board may or may not be prepared to give. That is the situation. The application went to the board. The board has made the decision and for now, as I said, —that is the situation of all members of the group.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, if you would allow me 30 seconds it would be enough to complete my remarks. I am not going to make a 15-minute speech. I am simply saying that on page 5 of your text it says "the rights and privileges of members are being abrogated". Well this answer breaches my rights as member of a group, if I compare it with answers given to the Social Credit Party which had only six members in 1979.

Mr. Speaker: Please, I fully appreciate the point of the hon. member, but we are having an argument. At the conclusion of the argument my responsibility is to make a ruling. The House now has that ruling. Should the hon. member wish to pursue the matter he has every opportunity to rise in the House during the oral question period and direct a question to the representative of the Board of Internal Economy.

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Just a point I would like to clear up, Mr. Speaker. Since you say in your ruling that there cannot be an exception this time, I would like to know an exception to what?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: When I said that, what I meant and what I think is clear if one reads the text is that the board has made no ruling that would give any funding to one particular bloc outside the traditional parties. Clearly, if one looks carefully at my ruling, the board might do something else at another time.

If the hon. members wish to pursue with members of the board or through a question in the House to the representative of the board who is charged under our rules to answer for the board, then of course that is their privilege.

I think the Chair has exercised considerable patience in this matter. I would certainly ask the hon. members to read carefully the judgment, because I think they will find that the answers are there. When hon. members read it they should remember that the Chair by itself cannot intrude into the workings of the board, nor would it be proper for me to comment thereon.

What I have explained to the hon. members is that if the board does not wish to give additional funds to a group within the Chamber, that is the board's decision. If the House wishes to overrule the board, that is enough.

Out of respect for objections which are about to be raised in the House—and I know they are coming—I think hon. members will have to accept the judgment. If they wish to raise it again at another time or in another way, please use enough inventiveness to not be challenging the judgment in its particular form.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, not in connection with your first ruling, but with your second. Since you have recognized that our hon. friend has the right to be designated as he wishes, could you tell us if we should formally advise the House of our intention to be designated as members of the Bloc québécois? Could you tell us exactly what is the procedure in this respect?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the application of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, it would be immediate. I am sure that hon. members might wish to avoir une discussion avec la Table.

Sometimes the Chair has to ask for the co-operation of hon. members. I really think on this issue hon. members are abusing the patience of the whole House. I will move on to Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of Mr. Andre's motion to appoint a Special Joint Committee to inquire and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has now had an opportunity to consider whether the amendment moved this morning by the Hon. Member for Yukon was in order. The purpose of the main motion is to create a Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate with the limited mandate of mainly looking into the Canadian Constitution Amending Formula.

The purpose of the amendment introduced by the Hon. Member for Yukon is to widen the mandate to include all matters affecting the Constitution, and, if adopted, the Standing Orders of the House would as a result be changed because the amendment also seeks to create a new Standing Committee.

In my humble opinion, the amendment introduced by the Hon. Member for Yukon extends beyond the scope of the main motion and by widening the committee's mandate, becomes a substantive motion which requires advanced notice and calls for a debate of its own as a main motion.

I refer my hon. colleagues to Speaker Lamoureux's ruling of September 26, 1967, and February 23, 1968. Citation 437(2) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, will further explain this ruling. I appreciate the graciousness of the House in allowing me a few moments to ponder this question of procedure.

Resuming debate. The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada has the floor.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today in support of the motion before us to establish a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on the constitutional amending process.

If there is one item upon which I believe we can agree in this House, it is that a better way must be found to amend the Constitution. This became particularly clear during the Meech Lake process.

As the Prime Minister said in his address to the nation on June 23, 1990, after the failure of the accord:

It is essential that we find a better way to amend the Constitution "to reconcile the need for public participation and open democratic process with the legal requirements now in the Constitution".

[Translation]

Discussions surrounding the Meech Lake Accord made us realize that people see the main aspects of constitutional reform in many different ways. That is why the Prime Minister established the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future on November 1, so that we could have a consensus on the fundamental values and aspirations of the Canadian people which we must take into consideration during our constitutional reform.

• (1530)

The Special Joint Committee and the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future complement each other, Mr. Speaker. Both will give Canadians the opportunity to take part in Canada's constitutional changes.

[English]

Canada's search for an appropriate amending formula began long ago and has a rich and varied history.

The British North America Act of 1867 did not provide a formal amending procedure and when Canada achieved de facto independence from the United Kingdom in 1926 with the publication of the Balfour report, there was no agreement in Canada on a formula to amend the Constitution.

The power to amend our Constitution was left, therefore, with the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and in the intervening years up to 1982, a number of amendments to our Constitution were achieved by this route—the transfer of provincial jurisdiction over unemployment insurance to Parliament in 1940 and the sharing of provincial jurisdiction respecting old age pensions in 1951, to name only a few.

However, it was never satisfactory to Canadians that we had to go out of the country to amend our Constitution and during the 1920s and 1930s, the search for a domestic amending formula was on in earnest.

[Translation]

Following the release of the Balfour report, an attempt was made for the first time in 1927 to solve that problem at a meeting attended by representatives of the central government and the provinces.

The participants studied a proposal put forward by the then Minister of Justice, M. Ernest Lapointe, recommending that the Constitution be patriated and that a special amending procedure be added.

However, as with many previous attempts, negotiations on a new amending formula failed.

[English]

One constant question that permeated all discussions on this matter throughout history was how to combine the elements of stability and flexibility in an amending formula that would permit patriation of the Constitution from Britain.

In the numerous attempts to secure agreement on an amending formula, on only two occasions were the Prime Minister and premiers able to reach unanimous agreement in principle in an amending formula as part of a patriation proposal. They were the Fulton–Favreau formula in 1964 and the Victoria amending formula of 1971.

For that reason, it is interesting to examine these two formulae in a little more detail.

The Fulton–Favreau formula was drafted in the form of an act in 1964 and, like many previous proposals put forward at federal–provincial conferences, it was highly complex.

[Translation]

Any constitutional amendment would have been made by legislation of the Parliament of Canada and the approval of provincial legislatures would have been required in many areas.

Unanimous consent was required on certain matters, particularly the division of powers. Otherwise, there were different degrees of flexibility depending on the subject of the amendment.

Contrary to the Fulton–Favreau process, the 1971 amending formula suggested in Victoria was relatively simple. It was quite different from all other amending formulas in that no constitutional amendment would have required unanimous consent by all provincial legislatures.

[English]

Amendments to key areas of the Constitution, including the distribution of powers and matters excepted from the exclusive power of Parliament, would have been made with the consent of Parliament and the consent of the legislatures of two Atlantic provinces, of Quebec, of Ontario and of two western provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population of the western provinces.

Amendments applying to one or more, but not all, of the provinces could be made with the consent of Parliament and the legislatures involved.

Amendments to the Constitution would have taken the form of a proclamation of the Governor General rather than an act of Parliament.

Finally, provision was made for Parliament and the legislatures each to exercise certain exclusive powers of amendment.

The Victoria formula abandoned the full rigidity of the specially-protected elements of the Fulton-Favreau formula and introduced the notion of regional protection.

In the end, of course,—

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: If this government thinks that the appointment of this committee is so important, how come we do not have a quorum, Mr. Speaker?

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see a quorum. I might add that the Chair and not the hon. member should check and decide whether we have a quorum. Debate. The hon. Minister of Justice has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised to hear you say that only the Chair can call a quorum. As far as I know, any member can do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You stated earlier that there was no quorum. However, what you just said is closer to what is considered proper in our Standing Orders. The hon. minister of Justice has the floor.

[English]

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Victoria formula abandoned the full rigidity of the specially protected elements of the Fulton-Favreau formula and introduced the notion of regional protection.

In the end, of course, neither formula was adopted and it was not until 1982 that a made-in-Canada amending formula was finally placed in the Constitution as part of the 1982 Constitution Act.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the 1982 Act was imperfect because Quebec was excluded from the agreement. The consequences of this exclusion are now history. We are still trying to find an appropriate amending procedure, that is a procedure with a reasonable degree of stability and flexibility.

This procedure should allow the people to participate and particularly allow Canadians to reach their constitutional goals.

[English]

As the Prime Minister said in his November 3 speech in Mont Ste-Anne:

> If it takes major changes to hold this country together, Canada wants these changes made—(and) if it takes a new process to achieve these changes, Canadians want a new process designed.

Canadians want to be able to achieve their constitutional aspirations. They do not want to have their dreams for this country blocked by an inadequate and inflexible procedure.

Hon. members, parliamentarians, play an important role in the constitutional process. If the process is not working, it is important that we consult with Canadians to find better ways of attaining our constitutional objectives.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I call on all members to support this motion in order to give Canada the Constitution its needs now that we are getting close to the twenty-first century.

[English]

I would just conclude by saying that in the current amending formula, the Parliament of Canada has a crucial role to play in implementing constitutional change. Therefore, it seems to me highly appropriate that an examination of that process, in light of its failure recently, should be made—

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret having to interrupt the minister, but the hon. member for Hull–Aylmer is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: We have been called to maintain a quorum in the House, Mr. Speaker. I notice that the government members are not present. Is that committee important or not? Could you please check if we have a quorum?

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see that we have a quorum. The hon. Minister of Justice still has the floor.

[English]

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to conclude by saying that given the role of Parliament in constitutional amendment according to the current provisions of the Constitution, that it is highly appropriate that the Parliament of Canada take the leadership in trying to determine a process that would respond to the concerns that have been raised by the people of Canada. Parliament must try to develop proposals that hopefully can gain the broader support of the other participants in constitutional amendment in this country and therefore, make the change of the Constitution in Canada and the development of the constitutional process something in which all Canadians can take pride and feel their involvement in.

I would, Mr. Speaker, on that note, urge the support of all members of this House of the motion before them and their support for the initiation of what I think is going to be one of the most important processes that any member of this Parliament could engage in in the course of a political career, a process that is absolutely essential to the preservation of Canada's future as a united and prosperous country.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I was one of the members last spring who spent a lot of time on the special committee of the House looking at the Meech Lake Accord. Our caucus and other caucuses as well spent a lot of time looking at the recommendations we made under the very able chairmanship of the hon. member for Sherbrooke. Unfortunately, the day after those recommendations were made, they were put aside by the powers that be in the government.

What I want to know from the Minister of Justice is, what guarantee can she give us at this time, once this committee is struck, that the government will pay attention to recommendations that that committee may make? We had a unanimous report of the House of Commons by members of all three parties, and I think we had a consensus of what Canadians wanted in terms of the Meech Lake Accord, yet, that report was ignored by the government. What assurance do we have from the Minister of Justice that come next summer, if once again we have a committee report that is unanimous and reflects what people in this country are saying, that report is not going to be ignored?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is correct to say that the work done by that committee was ignored by the government.

Mr. Lapierre: It was worthless.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I do not think it was worthless at all. In fact, I think it was an extraordinarily important exercise and I can congratulate everyone who was involved in it.

The problem at that time was that we were engaged in the process of constitutional change under the rules that came to us with patriation in 1982, which was at the denouement of a time frame that was determinative of the ability of the will of the First Ministers who had originally signed on to bring the agreement into force. That was hardly the ideal kind of circumstance into which to examine and evaluate the broader question of constitutional reform and how it might be brought into place. It was also, of course, not the case that the subject matter which the committee dealt with was the broad process. It was an attempt to try to see if in the context of the Meech Lake Accord some agreements or some provisions could be recommended that might possibly salvage the accord.

As the hon. member will recall, on June 9, 1990, an agreement was reached by First Ministers. Much of the work of the Charest commission in which the hon. member participated was part of the environment in which that agreement was reached and, as they say, the rest is history. I do not see anything to be valued or anything to be gained by rehashing that.

I think it is precisely because we have lived through that time—and that parliamentary committee's activity was part of a process of trying to bring about constitutional change—that we can see the problems in the process. I think there is no group of people who are more profoundly aware of the difficulties we faced in that process than members of Parliament and, because the Parliament of Canada is one of the chief actors in the current amending formula, I think leadership must come from the Parliament of Canada, which is both Houses of the federal government.

The hon. member's experience and that of many other people in that House would be enormously valuable. There is no guarantee that recommendations made by a joint committee will ultimately find their way into the Constitution. We do not have in the Parliament of Canada the unilateral right to change the Constitution. But before we can even begin to address that question, the question of process has to be addressed. So the recommendation of the committee is obviously going to be terribly important. What will happen to it after that is not solely within the hands of the House, but I can give the hon. member my assurance that I personally am deeply committed to seeing this process succeed, and I am very confident that the results of that committee's deliberation will be of inestimable value. I cannot think of a better process, whether it is with private consultations, or whatever. Notwithstanding that the people in justice like to arrogate the law unto themselves, I cannot think of a better forum in which to come up with recommendations that are both legally sound and sensitive to the human and political realities of Canada. I think the hon. member has an enormous amount to contribute, and I can give him my commitment that I will be most interested, and I believe the government will be very interested and will make as much use of the results of the committee as it is possible to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, after having heard the minister's speech, I wonder if she sincerely believes that Quebeckers will fall for such a diversion. We had the Charest Committee which watered down the Meech Lake Accord. The five requests were minimal, and yet they were rejected by English Canada. The Charest Committee was set up, and its report was shelved. The Spicer Commission was set up, and now another committee is being set up.

Are we taken for fools or what? Only fools would believe that striking a committe will do little more than buy time. Will the Quebecers in this government lend themselves to that musical chairs game for the sake of visibility, to be seen once in a while on television and defend the interests of Quebecers in committees that will end up concluding just the opposite of what the Bélanger–Campeau Commission concluded? How can a central government be expected to decide by way of referendum whether a province is to remain or not a part of Canada? Come now! If Newfoundland decided to leave, do you think that holding a referendum in the rest of Canada would prevent Newfoundland from leaving? Would a referendum held across Canada cancel out one held in Quebec? Be serious!

There are two founding nations in this country, one of which is pondering over its membership in this great big Canadian family. This kind of committee will travel across Canada, lull people, buy time and create a diversion. Would it not be wiser to allow the province of Quebec and its people to calmly think about its future without all these committees? Such committees are only good to buy time, in the hope of seeing the Quebecers, the francophone people of Quebec, be put to sleep again so that they will behave like the sheep they once were and swallow false promises like the ones made to them about the repatriation of the Constitution by all provincial premiers of Canada and Prime Minister Trudeau at the time of the referendum.

We had been promised that the Constitution would be repatriated. In the end, with such a committee, the Constitution was repatriated omitting one of the founding nations, that is to say Quebec. And we are to believe that the new committee will provide the answer to the problem, as we did after the 1980 referendum, and be put to sleep again. We have come this far and the failure of Meech provided the motivation the people of Quebec needed to decide to take their destiny in their own hands, without the help of any committee. Such committees are nothing but a masquerade in democracy, when, in fact, the answer is very simple: two sovereign nations with a monetary union.

[English]

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is, of course, entitled to his own view which he expresses in the House with considerable force. I am not sure that he speaks for all Quebecers when he makes that statement.

The important point is to have a process that allows people, not simply to express their views, but to begin to develop and formulate their views. That is why, as part of the process for establishing this joint committee of the House and Senate, the government has tabled a discussion document which sets out the history of constitutional amendment in the country and poses some of the possible options that members may wish to consider as a starting point, as opposed to an answer.

The joint House-Senate committee to examine the amending process of the Constitution is complementary to what has become known as the Spicer committee, the Citizen's Forum. The Citizen's Forum is designed to ask Canadians to have a dialogue with one another about what kind of country they want and the role of the official members of the commission is to gather those insights, to stimulate the discussion, and then to bring to the Government of Canada, and also to this House, a report on the state of the nation.

It is a unique and very valuable process that involves all Canadians and not simply the traditional elites who have, for most of our history, monopolized the discussion of constitutional change. I think the process is important.

I would take exception with the implications that the hon. member stated because I come from a province that did support the Meech Lake Accord. I strongly supported the Meech Lake Accord and I supported it when I was a member of the provincial legislature in British Columbia, before I had any conception whatsoever that I would be foolish enough to subject myself to the amount of travel required to come to Ottawa.

I have a passionate commitment to the survival of the country and to the respect for the rights of Quebecers and their ability to find their place in the sun. I am deeply hopeful that it will be possible in this country to find a process of constitutional change and a process of accommodation that will enable us to protect that existence.

Frankly, I believe that the wonders and beauties of my province, British Columbia, are part of the patrimony of every young Quebecer and I would say that anyone who wished to deny young Quebecers that patrimony is going to have to answer them very strongly.

Therefore I believe that this process will contribute to the efforts of many Canadians to preserve what we believe is something quite extraordinary in the context of the countries of the world and to preserve it in a way that all Canadians will be able to fulfil themselves and be true to themselves. This is a very important step in that direction.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this government motion to set up a special joint committee to examine the formula for amendment to the Constitution is, I am afraid to say, just another desperate, cynical move by the Prime Minister to correct somehow all the damage done by the failure of the Meech Accord. That failure, I might say, resulted from the stubborn inflexibility of the federal government and the government of Quebec.

The core provisions of the Meech Accord could have been saved if the Prime Minister had acted sooner in dealing with the proposed amendments, especially the proposals of the Charest committee report.

But, no, the Prime Minister and the government ignored all attempts to amend the Meech Accord. They kept rolling the dice and waited until the eleventh hour until that date when the Premier of New Brunswick, Premier McKenna, made proposals for a companion resolution in an attempt to break the deadlock that had developed with respect to the Meech Accord. It was an attempt by the Premier of New Brunswick to have the best part of the Meech Accord, the core provisions, go through.

Time and again, attempts were made in the House to amend the Meech Accord so that it would be acceptable on a broader basis in the county. This party, the Liberal Party, put forward nine amendments on two occasions when that proposal was before the House, but they were turned down systematically by the government. I believe other opposition parties did the same thing.

As I say, finally, at the eleventh hour, the Prime Minister decided to set up the Charest committee to examine possible methods of breaking that log-jam, based on the proposals made by Premier McKenna. The Charest committee did its very best and put out a report, but it was too late in the day due to the three-year deadline for accepting amendments to the Constitution which is in the present amendment formula. I will deal with that in a minute.

The present amendment formula, which was adopted in the Constitution of 1982, requires that an amendment be agreed to by seven out of the 10 provinces, representing 50 per cent of the population of Canada, plus the House of Commons and Senate of this Parliament. It also requires that when an amendment is initiated, either in a province or at the federal level in Parliament, that the required number of provinces must adhere within a three-year deadline from the date of the first proposal of an amendment in one of the houses of a province or of the federal government.

Because a lot of people did not know, I want to point out that most of the Meech Lake Accord—a good three-quarters of it—could have been accepted under the seven out of 10 amendment formula. Only three provisions in the Meech Accord required unanimous consent. The general amendment formula of 1982 was seven out of 10 provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population, but there were certain measures that required unanimous consent—

Mr. Corbeil: Name them.

Mr. Allmand: Name them? One was the amendment formula itself, one was the amendments to the Supreme Court, and I forget the third one.

Mr. Corbeil: What was the main one?

Mr. Allmand: Well, I don't know. What was the main one?

Mr. Corbeil: Quebec integration into the Constitution.

Mr. Allmand: No, no. The hon. member does not know the Meech Accord, himself. The Meech Accord dealt with the distinct society. The distinct society provision did not require that, if that is what he is talking about. The distinct society provision only required seven out of 10 provinces to agree to that particular proposal. It did not require unanimous agreement.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, eight out of 10 provinces agreed to all of the Meech Accord. Two did not. Two, at the last minute, were left opposing but, even then, I think Manitoba would have come on-side, if we had not run out of time and if the Prime Minister had not waited until the last minute, rolling the dice, as he said he had done.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: If the Prime Minister had taken the measures that he took late in the day, if he had taken those in January or February and set up the Charest committee at that time, then—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there are some members in this House who do not have much respect for democracy. They are shouting from their seats because they do not like to hear what is being said. Even the members in this party over here, who participated in this ridiculous charade that took place at the time, only moved afterwards.

The point is that at the last minute the Prime Minister set up the Charest committee and then ignored its advice. If he had done that at an earlier date, the five core provisions proposed by the government of Quebec would have been accepted.

What was the amendment formula before 1982? I have just described the amendment formula of 1982. Well, before 1982, of course, there was no specific amendment formula. The Constitution of 1867, which was a statute of the British Parliament, did not provide for an amendment formula. Amendments were made by an address of the Parliament of Canada to the British Parliament requesting an amendment. But a constitutional convention had grown up whereby the federal government did not make such an address unless there was unanimous consent of all the provinces. That was a very inflexible amendment formula and it was very difficult to obtain amendments to the Canadian Constitution which was basically the British North America Act of 1867.

Mr. Lapierre: I rise a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: I would like to help my colleague. There was never unanimous consent for the rapatriation of our Constitution. Consequently, the British formula was not that demanding. A large consensus because—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Shefford, but that is not a point of order. It is debate. The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if the hon member would listen, I pointed out that there had been a constitutional convention, not a constitutional law, prior to 1982 that the federal government would not make an address for an amendment to the British Parliament unless there was unanimity. That was not written into law, but in fact it was the constitutional Convention of the day and, up until 1982, that was the practice that was followed.

It was extremely inflexible and that was why there had been many attempts to obtain a more flexible and more reasonable amendment formula. It was attempted with the Fulton-Favreau formula. It was attempted at Victoria. It was attempted in the late 1970s. Finally, in 1982, an amendment formula was approved.

What is interesting is that the hon. member for Shefford said it was approved against the agreement of Quebec. I must remind the House that the formula that was agreed to—the formula that is now in the Constitution—was agreed to by the Premier of Quebec with seven other provinces. Those were the eight provinces that agreed to that amending formula, contrary to the proposal that had been put forward by Prime Minister Trudeau and supported by Premier Davis of Ontario and Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick.

• (1600)

The Prime Minister of Canada, with New Brunswick and Ontario, had provided a formula with a veto power for Quebec. The eight other provinces got together and came up with what is now the amendment formula and proposed this. Finally, the Prime Minister of Canada agreed to it. I think that has to be clear on the record. In any case, we finally did get an amendment formula in 1982.

As I answered to the Minister of Labour, the amendment formula itself could only be amended by unanimous agreement of all the provinces and the federal government. It cannot be amended by the seven out of ten formula.

In discussing how we can change the amendment formula, we must keep in mind that we will require the agreement of every province in Canada, the House of Commons and the Senate.

For a moment, I want to refer to the formula that was tentatively agreed to at Victoria in 1971, known as the Victoria formula. This was the preferred formula of Prime Minister Trudeau and the Liberal Party.

According to this formula, Quebec would have had a veto, Ontario would have had a veto, two Atlantic provinces out of four had to agree to the amendment. If there were not two, that would be a veto from Atlantic Canada. Two western provinces had to agree to the amendment, representing 50 per cent of the population of the western provinces.

Under that formula known as the Victoria formula, Quebec would have had a veto power, but no, that was rejected. Mr. Bourassa first accepted that, went back to Quebec and faced with a lot of controversy in his province, turned down the Victoria formula plus other measures that were included in the Victoria proposals for constitutional change.

Mr. Corbeil: He never accepted that. That's wrong.

Mr. Allmand: The Fulton-Favreau formula of 1964 was somewhat similar to the formula that we have today, but it left to unanimous agreement a large number of constitutional items, including the division of powers. Under the Fulton-Favreau formula for constitutional change, you needed unanimous agreement to change anything to do with the distribution of powers. Other things could have been changed by a two-thirds of provinces with 50 per cent of population. In any case, the Fulton-Favreau formula was never accepted.

With respect to the establishment of this committee, yes, this party is willing to support the establishment of a committee to examine how we can better amend the Constitution, but we think that that cannot be the only matter to be considered by that special joint committee.

It is impossible to sit down and discuss how to change our Constitution without at the same time considering other important constitutional matters, including the division of powers and the Senate. I would say as well the place of aboriginal peoples in this country. It is a shame. It is a bit of a scandal that that has gone on so long and not being able to agree to the true place of our aboriginal peoples in this country.

In the Constitution agreement of 1982, it was provided that there would be three First Ministers' Conferences on aboriginal self government. Those three conferences were held. Not much headway was made. A fourth such conference was held after the Conservatives came to power in 1984.

Another matter that I would suggest has to be dealt with at one time or another is our basic language rights. While the Constitution agreement of 1982 has some good provisions with respect to language rights in it, there is a need for more change to provide greater equality, greater equity for English and French speaking minorities across this country.

In particular, I would hope that some day section 59 of the Constitution agreement of 1982 would be abrogated because section 59 puts certain restrictions on the use of English in the Province of Quebec, restrictions which are not imposed on French language minorities in other parts of the country. I must say, Mr. Speaker, I voted against that provision in 1982.

In considering proposals for constitutional change before this committee, I do not think the committee should be too uptight or too reticent to consider measures that are sometimes referred to as distinct for Quebec or special for Quebec.

I voted for the Meech Lake Accord. I had accepted it, even though I would have preferred that it be amended. It did not bother me that we had a provision in our Constitution that Quebec was distinct, because it has been in effect distinct for a long time. It is the only province with the civil law.

Arrangements have been made over the years for it to have its own pension plan different than the Canada Pension Plan. There were special arrangements for immigration, student loans, tax collection and so on. These have not hurt the Confederation. This could not be done on a wide scale basis, but to take into account very special needs of Quebec language and culture and other matters that are close to Quebec's heart, I think that we have to consider these and put them in the Constitution in one way or another so that it is fair for all provinces.

As I say, it will not be something new. It was done since 1867. If you want to be serious about this, it was done from the time of the Quebec Act in 1774.

There are, of course, other studies going on at the present time with respect to constitutional change, and that is why at the very beginning of my remarks I accused the Prime Minister of a bit of ad hockery, of desperation in setting up yet again another forum for constitutional change.

A few weeks ago he set up the Spicer commission, or the people's forum to listen to Canadians with respect to the future of this country on constitutional change. Already two members of that special commission have resigned, and two new ones have been appointed.

All this demonstrates that the Prime Minister did not give much attention to this in the first place. These things were set up quickly. The terms of reference were set up quickly. Not enough instruction was given to the chairman, and not enough information was given to members of the commission before they accepted to sit with this very special commission.

This commission is already under way. We have the Bélanger-Campeau commission which is sitting in Quebec. The provinces of Alberta, New Brunswick and Manitoba have also set up commissions with respect to constitutional change, and so has the Assembly of First Nations.

Next Monday, the leader of this Party, Mr. Chrétien, will appear before the Bélanger-Campeau commission to put before them a comprehensive approach to constitutional reform for Canadian unity and for federalism.

I must remind this House and members of the public that the Liberal Party of Canada was the first party, as a matter of fact, to accept the five basic proposals put forward by Mr. Bourassa in 1985 for constitutional change for adherence to the Constitution.

Later, those five proposals were put into a format known as the Meech and then the Langevin Accord. At that time, there was an addition of other measures which were not present when Mr. Bourassa made his original five proposals.

I have stated—it is well known—that Mr. Chrétien, the leader of the Liberal Party will appear before the Bélanger–Campeau commission on Monday and will be the only leader of any political party to appear before that commission to stand up for Canada, the federal system and Canadian unity. He will be the only leader to speak for Canada before that very important commission.

In conclusion, let me say that from 1970 to 1972 I sat as a member of the last Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate with respect to the Constitution. I have the report here, The Constitution of Canada: Final Report, 1972 which was a very comprehensive study.

We spent two years going to towns and cities, large and small, in this country listening to Canadians with respect to the Constitution. We at that time supported and backed the Victoria formula as the best formula for constitutional amendment. I think what is important is that leadership has to be shown if we are to truly unite this country once again and turn back the tide of separatism on all sides.

Quebec was not rejected at the time of the Meech Lake Accord. Eight provinces were in favour of Quebec's proposals. The perception was an unfortunate one coming out of the fact that the Meech Lake Accord failed. Certain resolutions at Sault Ste. Marie and other municipalities gave the impression that Quebec was not wanted. I want to say that Quebec is dearly wanted. There is a great appreciation in this country for Quebec's language and culture. thousands of children all over this country are doing immersion in French. Both parts of Canada would be great losers if this country were to divide.

What we need is leadership. What we need is hope. I hope that this committee, although it has certain limitations, will be able to provide us with some of that hope and some of that unity.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask some questions of the hon. member with regard to the north. We have been feeling rather left out as northerners and as aboriginal people. I do not think that is a surprising statement because, as we heard earlier, yesterday the north and aboriginal people were ignored once again in terms of the Spicer commission, the Citizens' Forum on the Future of Canada.

I just wonder what hope do we have because right now under the amending formula, although in the past there has always been bilateral negotiations between the Government of Canada and any territory wanting to become a province, under the amending formula that is a change. With all of those roadblocks in the way, how can we be assured that our desires, our aspirations will be recognized in any form, allowing for this present government's attitude in ignoring the wishes of the aboriginal people as well as northerners?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, historically new territories were admitted to the Confederation by a simple vote of the territorial assembly and the federal Parliament. This was the case with respect to Newfoundland in the late forties. It was also the case with respect to the other provinces at a much earlier period. One was to presume that if one day the Yukon and the Northwest Territories were to become full provinces, they would do that through a decision taken in their own legislative assemblies and in this Parliament.

However, since the Constitution of 1982 it became a case where they required seven out of ten provinces with 50 per cent of the population to accept a new province. Then with the Meech Accord it was recommended to be even more stringent.

Finally, we in the Liberal Party presented an amendment to the Meech Accord to permit the admission of the northern territories on a basis that was somewhat similar to what had taken place historically, on a one–to–one basis.

That was one issue which was difficult to understand because it was never part of the five proposals put forward by Mr. Bourassa for adhesion to the Canadian Constitution. In the five proposals that he made, he never mentioned at all what would be required for the acceptance of new provinces, especially provinces from the north. However, once the Meech Accord was published, the Langevin accord was published, we saw that that was in there. When we tried to amend it, we could not understand why the federal government and Quebec would have been so intransigent in not agreeing to something more reasonable when it had not been the basis of their proposal in the first place.

I would hope that there would not only be a fair amendment formula for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in any new constitutional amendment formula, but that also there would be greater recognition in the Constitution for aboriginal rights and for aboriginal self-government.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words on the resolution before the House today. It calls upon Parliament to create a special joint committee to study the amending formula, which in reality is the whole process of amending our Constitution. They take us into the area of a constituent assembly, constitutional conventions, the wisdom or lack thereof of a referendum to determine the Constitution of this country, as well as technical things like how many provinces or what majority in the House of Commons it may take to amend the Constitution of Canada.

I want to be very direct with the few concerns that I have about the internal process of constitutional change among the parties in this House. I have been through the process now about three times: in the joint committee back in 1980-1981 for patriation of the Charter of Rights, in the joint committee on the Meech Lake Accord in July and August 1987 and, more recently, last spring on what we call the Charest committee of the House of Commons looking at the modification of the Meech Lake Accord.

One of the concerns I have is that the Prime Minister has to be more forthright and more direct with the other parties in the House when it comes to forming a committee, sharing information, and trying to achieve what we all want in this House with a few exceptions, which is a strong, united Canada recognizing all of our diversities and differences.

When this committee was to be struck there was no phone call to the Leader of the New Democratic Party or, to the best of my knowledge, to the Leader of the Liberal Party, or to my friends in the Bloc Quebecois or anybody. There was no call. There was no consultation with the critics on the opposition side. It was the same when the Spicer citizens' forum was struck. There was no consultation.

[Translation]

In Quebec, Mr. Speaker, when Premier Bourassa decided to appoint the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, he had many consultations with Opposition Leader Jacques Parizeau. They met several times and there were consultations between the Liberal Party and the Parti québécois concerning the two co-chairmen of the commission. Consultations went on over several days. It was the same thing in the other two or three provinces where they established commissions or committees on the Constitution, Mr. Speaker.

But here in this House there was not even a phone call from the Prime Minister to the Leader of the Opposition or to the hon. member for the Yukon concerning the appointment of the chairman of this commission. Perhaps Mr. Spicer was the appropriate choice, perhaps not. But since we are dealing with the Constitution of Canada, now is not the time to show partisanship, because in principle this issue ought to unite the political parties and the Canadian population. But there was no consultation between the Prime Minister and the other members of the House.

[English]

I would have thought after the problems around the process of the Meech Lake Accord that the Prime Minister would have done that. We had today, for example, the tabling of a discussion paper about what is going to be referred to this special joint committee. Once again, that was not shared with the opposition before the decision was made to strike this particular committee.

I say to the Prime Minister that if we want to make this work, and we had better make this work, it is easier to happen if the Prime Minister and the minister responsible were to treat this in a more non-partisan way, in a more apolitical way. It would be better for this House and better in terms of the spirit of constitution making in this country.

It is very important that we get on with this work. In our party we would like to see this committee look at more than just the process. The process is extremely important, and it has to be looked at before we can implement the content. I know that we know that, but it seems to me to be more important and more relevant if this committee had a mandate that looked not only at the process but also the content of what people want in terms of constitutional change. We can deal with both.

Once we report, especially if we have the unanimous report of the three major parties in this House, it is important that the Prime Minister of this country make a commitment that he will use it as the basis of any consultation that he undertakes on behalf of the Government of Canada on constitutional change. That did not happen last June after the special study on the Meech Lake Accord, chaired by the member for Sherbrooke. Those are important things in terms of the internal process of how we operate here in this House.

It is very important that we ask who speaks for Canada in this debate. Quebec is doing what Quebec is doing with the Bélanger–Campeau Commission. Manitoba is striking a special committee. There is one in Alberta. There is one in Nova Scotia. There may be others like it in Ontario, very shortly.

In terms of Canada it is important that this Parliament has a position that stands up for and defends this country. It is very important that be done. When we draft a constitution it is important that that constitution be the constitution of the people that represents the people of this country. It is not a constitution that represents only politicians and governments of this country or premiers or prime ministers.

That was the fundamental problem with the process around the Meech Lake Accord. I do not blame the Prime Minister of Canada entirely for that. The amending formula was inherited from 1981, through the then negotiations led by then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. This time, in what I consider the Canada round, we must come up with a more democratic way to amend our Constitution. We must look very seriously at the option of constituent assemblies or perhaps constitutional conventions across this country where people are gathered to write their own constitution.

If we look back at the original union of this country, we see that it was more than the politicians who were involved back in the 1800s. In Philadelphia, in the United States, it had a constituent assembly, although not a very broadly based one, where the states all sent a number of delegates to negotiate on their behalf. Once it came up with what it thought was the Constitution of the United States, it went back to the various states and had vigorous debates in the various assemblies. One by one, they approved the Constitution of what became the United States of America. We must broaden that process.

We will have failed this country if we do not make a recommendation from that committee that broadens it into one form or other of a constituent assembly or constitutional conventions at some part of the process.

We must also have mandatory public hearings. We have done this fairly well in this House, but it is often after the fact. We did not have public hearings before the drafting of the accord that we call the Meech Lake Accord. We had public hearings after the drafting of the accord, and those public hearings did not travel with a committee across the country. We stayed here in Ottawa and had people come to us, rather than us go to the people, which is the wrong way around.

I hope we have learned that the Constitution belongs to the people of this country. We start with the people of this country in various parts of Canada. We build a constitution for them, with them, every single step of the way.

In that Canada of the future we have to recognize that we are a diverse country. We must build a country that is built on co-operative federalism if it is to survive. We have to recognize the uniqueness and the differences of the province of Quebec and enshrine those differences in a constitution.

Most Canadians are in agreement that Quebec is unique and different in terms of culture, language, education, communication, and immigration. It should be looked at differently in the province of Quebec. That must be accommodated, as we must accommodate the differences and the uniqueness of our first nations, the aboriginal peoples of this country, in their evolution toward self-government and in the recognition of their distinct languages and distinct cultures as well. Those are two things which make this country unique and different.

[Translation]

The belle province of Quebec is different, what with its distinct society and the reality of the French language. Laws are different in the Province of Quebec. Culture, the Catholic religion, a lot of things are different.

[English]

As well as the differences with our aboriginal people. In addition, we have linguistic duality in terms of making sure we protect the linguistic minorities and help them to grow.

I see the minister across the way from Montreal who is responsible for the Official Languages Act and is a spokesperson in many ways within government for the English minority in the province of Quebec. It is also important that we have roughly one million francophones outside Quebec who need some more constitutional guarantees if this country is to stay together.

In addition, we have to make sure that we have some flexibility in this country for the other provinces as well. I do not share Clyde Wells' point of view that every province must be treated with absolute equality. I do not share that point of view, for there are legitimate differences not only in Quebec but in the other provinces as well. I see the member for Beaver River here. Her province of Alberta has some different arrangements with the federal government from what we have in Saskatchewan. I will give two examples of what I mean.

The family allowance legislation applies universally in this country for eight provinces. The two exceptions are the province of Alberta and the province of Quebec, with different arrangements with Ottawa in terms of how family allowances are delivered in those two provinces. And so be it. There are some slightly different arrangements. That is Canada. That is part of our flexibility.

Another example is the collection of taxes in this country. One province, the province of Quebec, collects its own personal income tax. Three provinces collect their own corporate income tax. Quebec and Ontario have done so for a long time. In 1981 the province of Alberta decided to do the same thing so it collects its own corporate income tax. That is what we have, a co-jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments in many areas of Canada. If we can have that kind of accommodation, that is good for this country in terms of recognizing our diversity and differences and, instead of letting those differences divide us, having those differences unite us and flower in this country and make it all to better Canada. I think that is within the realm of reality.

I remember very well when I was a university student listening, with admiration, to the talk in this country about co-operative federalism by then Prime Minister Lester Pearson and opposition leaders like Tommy Douglas and Robert Stanfield. They talked about co-operative federalism, recognizing our differences and building on those differences and building on that diversity, and using that to unite this country into a country which has many cultures, two great languages, and the first nations, aboriginal people.

That is what we must do. We must come up with a way of making those accommodations and building that national consensus because, if we do not do that, it is bye-bye to this country.

[Translation]

And the hon. member is right, this is good-bye Canada.

It is really tragic in this debate that we have had some rigidity from people like Clyde Wells on one side and the Prime Minister on the other side. I think a great number of Canadians were looking for an accommodation and looking for a compromise.

I am very concerned about this country, about the future of Canada. I think the government is destroying Canada. It is destroying this country, not only in terms of constitutional change but also in terms of the national institutions of Canada such as the CBC, the post office, VIA Rail and the trade deal with the United States. Instead of trying to strengthen and build the links from east to west and north in this country, it is building more and more links between the north and the south, into the United States, and importing into Canada more values from the United States of America.

Those things are hurting this country. Those things are Balkanizing Canada. The government had better wake up and smell the coffee in terms of that reality. We have never had a federal government and a federal Prime Minister who have been so unpopular as they are today. They are unpopular because of the way they have handled the Constitution, because of the GST and the divisiveness of that tax, because of the trade deal, and because of what they are doing to our national institutions.

It is about time that someone started to speak for Canada in this country. It should be the Parliament of Canada, this institution, that speaks for Canada.

When we look at the prospects today, they have probably never been as dim for this country, so it is about time we get our act together as federal parliamentarians and start standing up for what is good about Canada and pulling ourselves together rather than tearing us apart. It is easy to take cheap shots at so and so and such and such a party. There are differences in every federal political party in this country. I have my Liberal friend from Newfoundland saying look at so and so in the NDP. Look at all the people in the Liberal Party. There are all kinds of Liberals that have diverse views. There are many Liberals in Mr. Bourassa's government who have all kinds of diverse views.

• (1630)

A lot of people in the Liberal Party of Mr. Bourassa are in favour of Quebec sovereignty or of Quebec independence yet they stay in the Liberal Party.

[English]

If we are going to start playing those kinds of games and having the federalists in this country divide off one against the other and fight off one against the other and making a partisan issue out of the future of Canada, then there is not much future for this country. I say that to my friend of the Liberal Party from Newfoundland.

In conclusion, we have to stand up for this country. For me Canada is not on the table, is not negotiable, is not for sale. This country must stand together. The way to unite and keep it one country is to recognize our diversity, our uniqueness and to build on that diversity and that uniqueness and make this an even greater country in the years that lie ahead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Western Arctic—Land Claims; the hon. member for Surrey North—Medicare; the hon. member for Malpeque—Financial Institutions.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to thank the hon. member for his comments and ask him a question or two.

I notice in my travels across the country that there is enormous confusion. Last spring when we were going through the pain of the Meech Lake Accord, the Charest commission was set up and people wondered what that was going to accomplish. It came and it peaked and since then it has disappeared completely.

At the beginning of November the Spicer commission was set up, and I think people are wondering what it is going to accomplish. Now, just a matter of weeks later, we see the Prime Minister announcing that there is going to be a joint Senate and Commons committee to try to determine the amending formula.

I think people right across the country are asking, what is to be accomplished by all these things? The hon. member has clearly brought that to the forefront, that people are definitely concerned and there is an enormous amount of confusion across the country.

People are feeling adrift about our constitutional situation. I believe that not only are people right across the country concerned, but I am wondering perhaps if the government itself is adrift in its own idea of constitutional matters, not knowing exactly which way to turn, and of course fearing that it will maybe widen the divisions within its own caucus.

I was wondering about this discussion paper, was it shared even with the Tory members? The hon. member mentioned that it was not shared with the opposition. I wonder if this was a surprise announcement perhaps at a fund raising dinner recently by the Prime Minister. Was his own caucus aware of it? Did they have a chance to discuss it fully and know what was in it, or was the Prime Minister acting unilaterally in coming forward with this?

I would be interested in hearing the hon. member's comments on that.

Finally, I would like to ask the hon. member his feeling about Section 41 of the Constitution of Canada where it says that:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

In other words, for any amendment we would need unanimous consent. I will just direct my hon. friend to that section in the Constitution.

I was wondering and would really appreciate his comments in light of the First Ministers' conference in Ottawa in June which we witnessed. I would be interested to ask his comments about the need for unanimous consent by all the provinces in Canada. We saw it was disastrous and we are still going through the pain of the death throes of Meech Lake that we saw in June. I would like to understand his viewpoints on how the Prime Minister and the government of this country think that we would come up with unanimous consent again in light of Section 41 of the charter?

Mr. Nystrom: The first issue is a discussion paper, Mr. Speaker. I cannot speak for government members of the House. I assume they did not see the discussion paper either. It would be quite an insult to members of the opposition if it were shown to the government members and not the opposition members. I assume they did not see it, but how do I know?

In terms of Section 41 of the Constitution, there are three ways to amend our Constitution. That is one of the ways. That comes from the patriation of 1981. Section 41 says that in order to amend our Constitution for things like the office of the Queen, the Governor General, federal institutions, the use of the French and English languages, we need the unanimous consent of all the provinces and the federal Parliament which is the House of Commons and the Senate. This is one thing we should take a look at. We could have more flexibility in amending the Constitution.

I do not have any pat answers for that. It was spelled out back in 1981. I was a member of that committee. These were the important national institutions. It was important that Alberta, Saskatchewan or Quebec would approve before we could change an important institution like the Supreme Court of Canada, or the monarchy, or the Governor General or the Senate. There is a real problem with that, but there are also some good arguments for it. Hopefully, we can look at some ways—whoever is on that committee—to make that a bit more flexible. I see that as one of the purposes of this committee being struck today.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I think that Quebec's political sovereignty is in the best interests of Quebec and of Canada. The purpose of this committee, again, is to create a diversion, it is an expedient.

I believe that Quebec's political sovereignty seems, unless of course Quebec would give up taking on its full distinct character and specificity—which would be unthinkable—the ultimate choice determined by history and strengthened by two irreconcilable visions of Canada. Quebec's political sovereignty has become the logical choice, in the best interests of Quebec and the rest of Canada, Mr. Speaker, because of the cleavage concerning Quebec's status within the Canadian Confederation. There is a lack of understanding about the very philosophy of the main constitutional changes to be considered. There is the systematic refusal from the English-speaking majority of Canada to recognize Quebec with special status and to give this province the necessary powers to promote and protect its specificity. There is, Mr. Speaker, the gradual weakening of Canada's provinces.

An hon. member: Come to the point!

Mr. Rocheleau: I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that some of my colleagues would like to object. I will simply refer to the Charest committee which was created last spring by this same government. I will remind you, Mr. Speaker of the Citizens' Forum which was established lately, again by the same government, by the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney. There is also, Mr. Speaker, the committee we want to create today. This is simply a device, Mr. Speaker, intended to create a diversion. It is an expedient on the part of the government and I think we cannot go on being part of Canada It is just a matter of time, Mr. Speaker. We have to wait for the Bélanger-Campeau Commission to table its report at the end of March and we will see that Quebec wants to be the master of its own future, that it wants its sovereignty.

We have nothing against English Canada, and I think that if Quebec attains full sovereignty, we will then be able to talk—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for York South—Weston is rising on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You will have noticed that there are several other members who wish to ask questions of the previous speaker. The present member speaking is not being fair in allowing sufficient time for others to ask questions. I am sure he wants to act as fairly as we act with them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So I would ask the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer to briefly conclude his remarks since other members want to speak on this issue.

• (1640)

Mr. Rocheleau: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my good friend from Saskatchewan a question, because they are also distinct from Quebec over there, also distinct from Alberta.

I would like the last hon. member to tell me if the people from his province want to be deceived again by the federal government, by the Prime Minister, with the establisment of this new committee rather than wait for the results of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all for the independence of Quebec. I do not favour at all an independent Saskatchewan or Newfoundland or any other Canadian province for that matter. I am for an independent and sovereign Canada. However, I can understand the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. But I am not a Quebecer. I am Canadian and I want our country to stay together. We need Quebec to have a great Canada, a different Canada.

An hon. member: Yes, to pay taxes!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against this proposal from the Mulroney governement. We have moved an amendment to discuss the process of amending the Canadian Constitution and the amending formula itself. I sat on the committee that was chaired by the hon. member for Sherbrooke and we made many propositions but they were ignored by the Prime Minister of Canada.

I asked the Minister of Justice a question because now that those new propositions were made to us we want to know if those propositions—

Will these recommendations be taken by the Government of Canada and used as its position when it bargains on the Constitution? I am being very brief because I want one or two Liberal questions if possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The period for questions and comments has now ended. I am sorry, but the period is over. The member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I think all members know that my colleague has been waiting to ask the member about the policy differences between the leader of the New Democratic Party and Mr. Edmonston. I think if we ask for unanimous consent, the House might grant it so we can ask that question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no consent. Debate resumes. The member for Nunatsiaq.

On a point of order the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I just wish to indicate, and let the record show, that it was the Bloc Quebecois that denied the opportunity to this House to continue asking questions on this important issue.

Mr. Plamondon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I hardly accept my colleague's comment, as it was he who interrupted my colleague from Hull—Aylmer as he was just starting to speak. Had he not interrupted him, he would have had enough time to ask his question.

An hon. member: Of course.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I request the cooperation of members on both sides of the House. Messages have been exchanged from one side to the other. I recognize the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, the amending formula is a very important one for northerners. I want to use my time today to express the concerns of northerners with the current amending formula and recent and ongoing attempts to change it. I also want to touch on the issue of territorial attendance and participation at federal-provincial constitutional conferences and similar federal-provincial meetings.

I would hope that governments in this country have learned from the events of the past three years that constitutional changes cannot be made in this country without the full participation and involvement of all the people. I used the word "participation" deliberately. Asking people for their views with no intention of listening to them is a recipe for failure.

We have been left out, excluded and forgotten once too often. We will not allow it to happen again and we can take some comfort from the support ordinary Canadians have given to us during the last constitutional round.

We span four time zones, Mr. Speaker, and sit, if you look at a map, on top of six provinces: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec. The area of the territories is basically what was left after the other provinces were carved out.

The physical distances are enormous. The distance between Baffin Island, the most eastern part of my riding, and Yellowknife, the capital of the Northwest Territories, on a map is similar to the distance between Quebec City and Edmonton.

Greater than the physical distances within the territories are the psychological and political distances between the territories and the federal and provincial governments of the country. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories have a constitutional status which is unique in the country. Most of the time, because we are not provinces yet, the north is simply forgotten in major, national decision making.

We are very much part of the national psyche. Yes, everyone acknowledges that Canada is a northern country, but we are not allowed to participate in the constitutional development of the country.

There are 52,000 people in the Northwest Territories and 25,000 people in the Yukon. That is a small population, less than the population of the city of Ottawa, but in a democracy, size is not a determinant of political voice.

The fundamental principle of democracy is one person, one vote. But in constitutional negotiations, the most essential and primary discussions, the northern territories do not have a voice. We elect representatives to our territorial legislatures, just as provincial voters elect their representatives to their legislative assemblies. At the constitutional table, provincial voters are represented by their premiers who have a vote at that table. The voters of the territories do not have a voice at that constitutional table. Our elected leaders are not allowed to vote. We are told that the federal government is our voice and that the federal government will look after our concerns.

I want to make something clear to the House. The federal government does not and cannot speak for northerners at the constitutional table. We have seen the evidence of that in the last round of constitutional talks. During the last minute negotiations at Meech Lake, our territorial government leaders were allowed to speak for 10 minutes to the federal and provincial premiers and were then politely asked to leave. "Thank you for your time, but we do not have time for you." That is basically what they were told.

There is no accountability in such a situation. Another basic principle of democracy is the accountability of the elected representation of the people to the people who elected them. The federal government is simply not accountable to the people of the territories and, hence, cannot represent us.

Like other Canadians, we deserve to have our own accountable representative at the constitutional table. No other part of the country is denied a voice at the constitutional table like we are. As I said earlier, the recent practice has been to invite the leaders of the territories to some meetings, not all. The invitation is at the discretion of the Prime Minister who is supposed to be representing us because they will not allow our territorial leaders.

If the northern government leaders are invited, they are shown into the meeting room, permitted to make a statement, and ushered out again. This situation is unacceptable. It is demeaning, and it is insulting.

Under the Constitution Act, 1982, the Governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon were assured of participation at constitutional conferences when an agenda item directly affected the territories. The 1983 constitutional amendment also assured them of participation in constitutional conferences dealing with aboriginal issues.

In 1983, 1985, and 1987, the territories were invited to the constitutional table. At constitutional officials' meetings held between 1983 and 1987, representatives of the territories were full participants.

The territorial governments also attended some annual premiers' meetings but were excluded from the crucial August, 1986 Edmonton Premiers' Conference on the Economy. That conference dealt with Quebec's constitutional demands and it was at that conference that the premiers agreed to make Quebec's demands the constitutional priority.

The territories were told at the time, however, that the discussions did not affect them and they were not allowed to participate in—

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I remind the governement that if this bill is so important, why is it that again we do not have a quorum in the House? This is the third time!

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see that we do have a quorum. The hon. member for Nunatsiaq may continue his presentation.

[English]

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the hon. member considers it a very important—

Mr. Corbeil: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Minister of Labour on a point of order.

Mr. Corbeil: I just want to ask you if it is in the code of ethics of this House for an hon. member to disappear behind the curtain immediately after having requested that the quorum be checked. If he is interested in having a quorum, he should remain in his place to make sure that it is the case instead of wasting the time of the House.

Mr. Lapierre: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. You are perfectly aware that it is the responsibility of the government to maintain a quorum in this House. Obviously, there has been much negligence on the part of the government and the Minister of Labour has reason to be annoyed because his colleagues do not think that this debate is important. But if some hon. members ask to call quorum, it is out of respect for

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but once again, messages have been sent and received. Now I give the hon. member for Nunatsiaq the opportunity to address his colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Anawak: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the hon. member who raised that phoney objection was probably not very interested or he would not keep telling us about the lack of quorum.

The territories were subsequently shut out of the Meech Lake and Langevin Block meetings. In September, 1988, the current Prime Minister admitted that the territorial leaders had been treated like the poor cousins of Confederation. He pledged to change this situation, but that promise was made just before the last election was called and, of course, like so many other of the Prime Minister's promises, it has not been kept.

The north is remembered, it seems, when we have something the rest of Canada wants—our resources, for example. We are not a storehouse to be plundered. But that is how we have been treated. We do not get any royalties from the development of our natural resources. How many Canadians and how many members of the House know that? All the royalties flow out of the territories.

And now, the environment. Protecting the environment has become an essential component of the government's agenda because of public opinion and pressure. The new focus on the Arctic environment, we feel, has not sprung from a deep concern within the government, but rather from the pressure of ordinary concerned Canadians.

Because of our small population and our limited tax base, we are financially dependent on the federal government and we do not fully control our destinies. Over the past couple of decades, through a process of devolution, we have been taking over more and more of the powers exercised for us by the federal government. Except for the control and management of our natural resources, the territorial governments function essentially in the same way as provincial governments, but we are not yet provinces.

Provincehood is not just around the corner. It will be several more years before either the Yukon or the Northwest Territories are prepared to become provinces, and the Yukon will probably achieve provincehood first. In the Northwest Territories, we are discussing the division of our territory into two territories. The eastern territory will be known as Nunavut.

Although all of this is some time away, this is to show that we have constitutional aspirations and objectives. We do not want to be cut off at the pass, and we do not want the door shut in our face. We do not want our options to be limited. We want to make our decisions out of a full range of choices, the same choices other regions of the country had before they became provinces.

We are not asking for anything more than anyone else had in the country. We are asking simply for the same treatment.

When the various regions of the country became provinces, they did so in a bilateral agreement with the federal government. Saskatchewan, for example, and Newfoundland negotiated on a bilateral basis with the federal government. No other province in the country had a role in that decision. The matter was negotiated and agreed to by only the region concerned and the federal government. That was the way new provinces were created in this country until 1982.

In 1982, the new amending formula changed that practice. Under the new amending formula, the creation of provinces suddenly was subject to the agreement of seven out of 10 provinces having 50 per cent of the Canadian population.

The seven plus 50 rule was a dramatic departure from the historical practice. The territories saw their constitutional aspirations being limited. Another concern was the fact that changes could be made to territorial boundaries with the consent of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population. No voice was given to the territories regarding future changes to their borders. Boundaries of existing provinces could be extended into the north without any consultation with the Northwest Territories.

The north protested. The entire legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories flew to Ottawa to express their concerns through the government.

A year later some progress was made. In the 1983 constitutional conference, the federal government, nine provincial premiers, the leaders of four national aboriginal organizations, and the leaders of the two territorial governments signed the constitutional accord. That 1983 constitutional accord contained an agenda of issues which all the participants had agreed to discuss at future constitutional meetings.

The amending formula issues identified by the territories—namely, the creation of new provinces and the extension of provincial boundaries into the territories—were on that agenda for future constitutional discussions. That agenda, Mr. Speaker, remains unfinished. Although there were two more aboriginal constitutional conferences after 1983, one in 1985 and one in 1987, these issues were not discussed. The federal government had changed and aboriginal self-government had become the primary focus of discussions.

The amending formula's impact on the territories was left outstanding, despite the first ministers' commitment to deal with it.

The amending formula contained in the Meech Lake Accord made the situation even worse for the two territories. Under Meech Lake, unanimity was required for the creation of new provinces and every province would have a veto over whether the territories would become provinces.

The Meech Lake amending formula allowed the extension northward of existing provincial boundaries upon the unanimous consent of the provinces and Parliament.

These decisions were made without consultation with the territories. These decisions were made behind closed doors at meetings to which the territorial leaders had not been invited. When the territorial leaders asked to participate, they were denied the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, the unanimity amending formula in the Meech Lake Accord set back the constitutional progress of the territories. Not only were we set back, we were held back. Meech Lake entrenched the colonial status of the northern territories. Meech Lake made the territories perpetual colonies.

What northerners objected to in Meech Lake was the additional powers every province in the country gained over our destiny, at our expense, while we were denied a voice.

I want also to point out to hon. members that, despite northern concerns about the two aspects of the 1982 amending formula, northerners also achieved something under that formula. The 1983 constitutional conference I referred to earlier achieved agreement on constitutional amendments affecting aboriginal peoples. That constitutional conference, chaired by the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, resulted in constitutional amendments dealing with aboriginal rights.

Attached to the 1983 constitutional accord on aboriginal rights was a schedule, a motion for a resolution to authorize the Governor General to issue a proclamation amending the Constitution of Canada.

Under the amending formula of 7 plus 50, resolutions were introduced in the legislative assemblies of the provinces and the Parliament of Canada to amend the Constitution of Canada. These resolutions were passed by the provincial legislative assemblies and the House of Commons and were proclaimed by the Governor General in June 1984.

Northerners were pleased with those amendments. Northerners had fought hard for those amendments. Northerners had a large role in the achievement of those amendments.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have much to contribute. But we continue to be denied the opportunity to do so. Northerners were excluded from the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. There were no northerners appointed in the initial round of appointments. The Prime Minister could have corrected this by appointing someone from the north to fill at least one of the two recent vacancies created on that forum. The north once again has been made to feel like outsiders looking in. Mr. Speaker, you cannot build a nation if you let some people in and leave others out. You cannot have a whole and healthy nation if you have insiders and outsiders.

Let us do things right this time. Let all parts of this great country bring their wisdom and experience to the table, allow all peoples of this nation to participate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made on Wednesday, December 12, 1990, the debate on the motion now before the House is deemed completed.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

TROPICAL RAIN FORESTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should develop a rainforest policy with specific guidelines ensuring that Canada will not finance, directly or indirectly, any development activities which may destroy or degrade tropical rainforests.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak to my motion with regard to our world's very fragile rain forests, their continued destruction, Canada's involvement in that process and some suggestions as to how the Government of Canada can prevent the continued destruction of our world's precious rain forests.

I have said many times when talking of environmental issues—and yesterday in this House in speaking to the government's green plan which it has brought in, which we all agree is a very vague paper presented to the Canadian public, that in many ways is toothless—that when it comes to discussing environmental issues, environment is one issue that knows no political borders.

If we pollute oceans, if we destroy rain forests, the effects of that degradation is felt, not just outside of the borders of Canada, but it is experienced and felt by Canadians as well. It influences our well-being as Canadians. Environmental destruction, wherever it occurs in the world, eventually affects the life and the lifestyle of others and Canadians.

When we talk about environmental destruction affecting our lifestyle, we have to realize that there can be negative effects to our lifestyle in terms of our own health degradation. But also, we have to recognize that it is our lifestyle here in Canada which contributes to so much of the environmental degradation that occurs in the world. Certainly, that is the fact when it comes to the destruction of our world's tropical rain forests.

It was felt just a few years ago that tropical rain forests were disappearing from the face of the earth at the rate of 11 million hectares a year. In fact, evidence today suggests that we are losing our tropical rain forests at almost twice that rate. At least 16 to 20 million hectares of tropical rain forest are lost every year.

One of the problems that contributes to this is the fact that Canada and other developed nations around the world are major importers of tropical hardwoods. Europe and Japan dominate the world's consumption of tropical hardwoods, but Canada imports tropical hardwoods to the extent of $120 million annually. Our primary imports of tropical hardwoods consist of plywoods and other wood-fabricated products, used in the construction industry and furniture-making industry. In Canada, our main source of imported tropical hardwoods is Indonesia. Indonesia and Malaysia alone account for more than half of hardwood log exports in the world. Throughout my comments I will give specific examples of the impact of the destruction of tropical rain forests.

The state of Sarawak in East Malaysia has the highest rate of logging in the world. Seven square kilometres of tropical rain forest are lost every day. At this rate, within seven to eight years, the rain forest of Sarawak will be logged out completely. Not only is this devastating to an enormously important ecological system, but also it brings about the result of destroying the homes of native persons who depend for their survival on eking out an existence in tropical rain forests.

Timber extraction methods currently used are 99 per cent unsustainable. Even selected and selective felling, in which only a few desirable species are extracted from tropical rain forests, happen to destroy up to 70 per cent of any forest. To date, the only people who are able to successfully harvest tropical hardwoods from rain forests are indigenous peoples, rubber tappers and, in Brazil, the nut gatherers who have demonstrated how to extract rain forest products without destroying the ecosystem at the same time.

It has been shown that tropical rain forests in their natural state are more valuable to this world than their destruction for the timber products which we purchase in the developed world.

One of the environmental non-government organizations in Canada which has been very sensitive to global environmental issues is Probe International. It was just a few weeks ago that I received from them one of their Probe Alert announcements that talked about Cameroon rain forests which are currently under siege. What is happening in the Cameroon at the present moment is that the World Bank and the African Development Bank are busy preparing forestry loans for the African Republic of Cameroon. The loans will open the flood gates, as the Alert bulletin says, "to commercial exploitation of the country's remaining primary rain forests." These ancient forests are among the richest in the world in terms of diversity of plant and animal species and are the home of pygmy peoples, hunters and gathers, whose survival and cultural identity are intertwined with their environment.

Cameroon, like much of Africa, has lost vast areas of savannah woodland to export crops such as coffee and cocoa. Another reason why rain forests have been so enormously destroyed world-wide is to cut down the timber, first for sale overseas, and also to produce export crops to bring income to poor countries.

• (1710)

Logging in Cameroon, which got under way on a commercial scale about 15 years ago, has already devoured nearly half the country's tropical forests, notably in the coastal and central regions.

Today, no primary rain forest remains in the central region. If the World Bank and the African Development Bank get their way, Cameroon's rain forests will disappear like its neighbours'.

The Cameroon government, with enormous international debt problems, is desperate for foreign exchange earnings. It is looking to its untapped southern rain forests for solutions. The label is used: "sustainable management"; but it has been shown that when logging is done on a commercial scale, the methods are not sustainable.

Logging leads to mass deforestation. It does not sustain the rain forest's ecosystem as the experts promised. Furthermore, logging roads inevitably open up the rain forest to colonization, agricultural settlement and cultivation which the land cannot support.

The very construction of roads to haul out logs from these areas creates enormous destruction to the ecosystems in the area.

Canada is a signee and a contributor to the UN International Tropical Timber Organization. This organization was set up in order to try to preserve tropical rain forests. But to date, few measures have been taken that have been effective. The organization is generally considered by environmental groups to be toothless. Canada has played, and continues to play a role in the destruction of tropical rain forests through our importation of tropical hardwoods.

Canada must look at all of its policies internationally to see how we can improve our record. A Brazilian by the name of Jose Lutzenberger, a leading environmentalist and the winner of the 1988 Right Livelihood Award, speaking in Toronto of November of 1987 said: "Rain forest destruction has been called the biggest biological holocaust in the history of life. The resulting loss of biodiversity will affect the entire ecological system on which humanity depends, leading to consequences depressingly similar to those expected from a nuclear winter."

We have many benefits that derive from tropical rain forests which are not well appreciated. Tropical rain forests provide important environmental services such as the prevention of soil erosion and the protecting of watersheds.

Rain forest plants provide valuable medicinal extracts in the fight against leukaemia, cancer and other diseases, not to mention the traditional yield of spices, canon, dyes, pesticides, fibres, nuts, fruit, vegetable oil, waxes, gums and rubber worth billions of dollars.

We have yet to really research and explore all of the benefits that rain forests provide to us as Canadians, and to everybody as citizens of the world. However, we are beginning to understand somewhat, but not completely, the destructive impact of cutting down tropical rain forests.

The clearing and burning of huge areas of Amazonian rain forest has contributed to the greenhouse effect and possibly to the thinning of ozone layers. Rain forest destruction once again threatens the livelihood and possibly the very survival of 200 million people world wide. In Brazil alone, the native population living in the Amazonian rain forest has fallen from 1 million in 1900 to under 200,000 today. The reckless destruction of people's homeland is not only environmentally irresponsible. It also violates the International Bill of Rights.

Rain forests are being destroyed for a variety of economic reasons, but often these economic reasons are supported by inappropriate government policies. Canada itself is a culprit of that. Many of the so-called development projects, for example, that have been located in tropical rain forests have been environmental disasters and social tragedies. For example, the Balbina Dam in Brazil flooded 2,400 square kilometres of pristine tropical rain forests and forced one-third of the Waimiri-Atroari Indians from their homeland. Yet not one kilowatt of electricity will be generated from this dam because surveying errors have made it impossible to fill the reservoir with sufficient water.

There are many ways that Canada can improve the record. We are a member of the World Bank and other multilateral development banks which finance so many of the development projects that destroy tropical rain forests. We must bear responsibility for the global problem as it exists. We could have policies that would prevent us from importing into this country tropical hardwoods, for example. Austria is one country in the world that has such policies in place. Australia is considering such a policy.

In other countries at other levels of government, municipalities for example, are putting in place by-laws prohibiting the use of lumber in government contracts. In West Germany, 30 local councils as well as the West German government have voted to stop using rain forest lumber. Forty per cent of Holland's municipalities has the same by-laws in place.

It is important when Canada contributes to development projects internationally that environmental assessments are done prior to funding being put out in support of projects. This should be a factor in all of our CIDA funded projects, but it should also be a factor in the development banks that are supported with funding from Canada.

There are many different areas and policies at which Canada can look. I think it is important that Canada call together a conference of environmental NGOs that would work with bureaucrats and politicians to work out government policies here in Canada which would lead to the preservation of tropical rain forests instead of their destruction.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, this is not simply for the survival of native peoples in Third World countries who must have a voice in the kinds of projects that are supported and take place in their countries. It is also for the benefit and welfare of Canadian citizens as well as other global citizens.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, the question of tropical rainforests brought to our attention by the hon. member for Northumberland is a crucial one that has concerned the Government of Canada for some time. Of the numerous threats to our environment, the degradation and destruction of rainforests is the one that has received the most attention by the international community because of its global scope.

Mr. Speaker, forests cover almost one third of emerged land and they support life to a great extent on our planet. They provide humanity with building materials, food, fodder, numerous medicinal plants and, most importantly wood for cooking and heating.

Forests also play an essential role in the environment: they protect soil from wind and water erosion; they reduce flooding risks by absorbing excess water; they purify the air by producing oxygen; they absorb humidity; and they provide shelter for humans and animals.

• (1720)

The consequences of the increasing elimination of the forest cover are very serious. The ground erosion causes a decrease in soil productivity; the loss of firewood sources reduces energy supplies; the threat of extinction of about half of the vegetal and animal species, including several medicinal strains, leads to a reduction of the genetic make-up. The tree loss reduces the forest's capacity to temper the planet's climate by recycling moisture, thus producing a climatic change.

While it is a global phenomenon, Mr. Speaker, the situation is even worse in the tropics where economic and demographic pressures are compelling the people to develop and transform forest areas in order to use them for mainly farming, domestic and commercial purposes. These abusive practices are impeding sustainable development of forests and contribute to depletion of forest capital.

According to experts, demand for wood products from a rapidly growing population, unbridled settling of forest areas, cutting of firewood and industrial development cause the loss of 17 million hectares of tropical rainforests each year. Some 32 hectares of rainforests are destroyed every minute. On a global level, the annual loss of tropical rainforests is equal to three times the area of Nova Scotia.

As regards public assistance for international development, Canada has taken various initiatives to assist in the preservation of these precious forest resources. Since its creation in 1968, the Canadian International Development Agency, which administers 75 per cent of the Official Development Assistance Program, has recognized the importance of forestry in development matters, by supporting numerous programs and projects related to forests.

Throughout the years, developing countries in Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbeans received CIDA assistance to make an inventory of their forest resources and set up forestry institutions.

Lately, forestry activities of CIDA took a broader dimension, thanks to a better understanding of the diversified function of forests as a source of food, lumber and firewood and for soil conservation and climate regulation. In most cases, the local people participate in those projects. CIDA spends about $100 million a year in the forestry area.

Because forestry has a global dimension, world cooperation is essential in order to take up the challenges developing tropical countries are facing. Canada takes an active part in this area.

In 1985, the forestry and conservation sector of CIDA cooperated closely with the World Resources Institute, UN organizations and the World Bank in order to develop and implement the tropical forest plan, which is the most important international cooperation initiative to this day in forestry.

That plan is a framework for action with an emphasis on a coordinated approach through which many donor countries can cooperate in order to solve the tropical forest crisis. Both that framework and the CIDA program concentrate on a better use of the land, promote the development of an environmentally sound forest industry, a more efficient use of firewood, the conservation of tropical forest ecosystems and help institutions set up sustainable forest development programs.

Because it involves an international effort, the program can mobilize more resources than any individual country acting on its own. Since the program began, the influx of financial resources to the forestry sector increased by 17 per cent.

From the beginning, Canada has closely participated to the activities undertaken under the program and has provided leadership to expert teams from Canada and from across the world in Peru, Guyana, Zaire and Rwanda, in order to study the needs of these countries in the forestry sector.

Mr. Speaker, the people's participation is essential to forest conservation and management. The local population will take part in tree planting, pruning and cutting activities and can also support forestry institutions and their staff either by teaching or studying in these institutions.

For example, community participation is ensuring the success of the broad-leaf forests development project that CIDA is implementing in Honduras. In the forest villages of the north coast of the country, local populations are replanting trees on small lots in order to create a supply of firewood and are learning new methods of soil conservation to increase their agricultural production. These methods contribute to higher living standards. The project is therefore a success since it addresses at the same time the problems of degradation of tropical forests, forest management and rural poverty.

In another Latin American country, Peru, CIDA has contributed to the implementation of a graduate program in forestry at La Molina University located in the capital, Lima. Part of that institutional reinforcement program included the training of seven Peruvian students in Canada. To protect the ecosystem that the rainforest represents, it is necessary, among other things, to create national and regional reserves by improving planning and management as well as genetic resources conservation.

In Brazil, in the tropical rain forests of the Amazon, CIDA plans to provide technical equipment and training as part of a conservation project. A region will be chosen where the forest is managed by the population and where activities such as picking Brazil nuts are done without cutting down trees.

In Southeast Asia, where certain type of forests are also threatened, the Centre for the Development of Tree Seeds ASEAN–CANADA, whose administrative headquarters are located in Thailand, helps increase the tree seeds supply required for the implementation of the reforestation programs of the Association of South East Asian Nations and for the protection of the gene pool.

Mr. Speaker, we have to face facts: there are industries which depend on the forest. The marketing of forest products is also an essential activity for many developing countries. The industry can prosper only if forests are protected and preserved, and populations will protect and preserve forests inasmuch as their commercial and economic value is recognized.

In North-East China for instance, a CIDA project seeks, within the framework of a comprehensive plan to integrate different aspects of forest management, to increase and make better use of scarce forestry ressources. One of the goals is to improve tree planting and management methods, protect forests against insects and disease, and introduce better and more environment friendly harvesting techniques.

From an energy standpoint, statistics indicate that 80 per cent of all firewood collected in the Third World is used for cooking and heating, but this source of energy is becoming rapidly depleted.

In the hills of Nepal, where firewood is the sole source of energy for 94 per cent of the population, deforestation has led to serious shortages and massive erosion. CIDA is helping the Nepalese government increase supplies of firewood through the Karnali-Bheri integrated rural development project. Tree planting and soil conservation have helped to slow down deforestation and increase energy supplies in Nepalese mountain communities.

During that time, it was noted in Zaire that firewood shortages were due to the use of open fireplaces that let heat dissipate. Due to diminishing supplies of wood, a more efficient solution was required. That is why CIDA cooperates with the Centre for Energy and Wood Technologies to convince the population to consume 30 to 50 per cent less wood. So far, more than a hundred craftsmen have been trained to build ovens, on a commercial basis, and approximately 900 housewives have been trained to build their own improved oven.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the Government of Canada is sparing no effort to contribute to the protection of tropical rain forests through our Official Development Assistance programs.

The problem of degradation and gradual disappearance of tropical rain forests must be addressed at its source that is by the people controlling this precious resource. It is in that perspective that Canada supports the efforts to reinforce the institutions of developing countries that are working at the conservation and management of forest resources, through various public education programs and the implementation of sustainable forest management.

The Canadian government's concerns are thus as great on the international level as they are on the domestic level in relation to our planet's forest resources.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by complimenting my colleague for Northumberland and state that I welcome the opportunity to speak to this motion.

The hon. member has crafted a very skilful motion. It does incorporate the merging between the environment and the economy, and the financing that is necessary to save the rain forests, the policy which she is urging Canada to adopt.

This motion also gives me an opportunity to focus on the very important principle that has to be established at the outset; that our global environmental security is not possible without economic justice for the people who are involved.

I also want to point out that the concern about the rain forest extends far beyond the concern for trees. It is a timely motion as well because we have in our news today the trial of the murder of one Chico Mendez in Brazil. Chico Mendez's death was the worst kind of human rights violation. He does not have a life any more. He was an environmentalist working to try to maintain the integrity of the Brazilian rain forest.

We have today in the news that one of the accused has confessed to the murder. It seems to be a way to cover up who really is responsible for the murder. There are allusions that it will be right up to the highest level in the Brazilian government.

What we are talking about in this motion gives us an ability to focus on the very pervasive concern there is: rain forest, money, human rights violations, and international debt.

I also had the opportunity earlier this fall of meeting Mutang Tuo who is a native of Sarawak in Borneo. He came to talk about the need to preserve the rain forest in his country. I was quite moved, having listened to him, because it is his home.

David Suzuki was before our caucus yesterday. He made it very clear that we in the northern countries do not seem to have a real depth of understanding that there are biological limits, that we are biological creatures, and that air, water and soil do not respect human boundaries. Mutang Tuo did.

When we talk about the destruction of the rain forests, it is not just trees we are talking about, it is indigenous peoples. Rain forest destruction is a major contributor to global warming. As a member of the parliamentary committee on the environment which has been examining the phenomenon of global warming and the threat to our global survival that that presents, this rain forest destruction is very real to me.

Rain forest destruction also reduces natural diversity, wiping out countless species before their potential uses in medicine, agriculture and industry are even discovered.

As Mutang Tuo very graphically demonstrated to me, it is also about the destruction of forest dwellers—human beings. This is not just in Sarawak. It is happening all around the world. It is happening in Malaysia, Indonesia, Cameroon, Zaire, Peru, Colombia and Brazil.

Canada contributes to this problem. This is why this motion is so cleverly crafted. Although we do not import a lot of tropical wood, we are a contributor in a kind of back-door approach through the international financial institutions. Canadians have to realize, and I hope that those who are watching this evening will take note, that Canada does contribute to the deforestation of the tropical rain forests. Probe International has done a lot of work in getting us to understand this.

In the Cameroons a loan from the World Bank will primarily be used to finance the infrastructure for commercial logging in 3.5 million hectares of rain forest. No environmental assessment is required because of the sort of back-door approach that the World Bank is taking on it.

Another actor in this problem in the Cameroons is the African Development Bank. Here is where the Canadian connection is quite clear. Canada is a member of the African Development Bank and last year gave $130 million to it. The African Development Bank is quietly preparing even bigger loans through the World Bank to help Cameroon devour its rain forest.

What we have to understand is that Cameroon does not have a lot of flexibility in how it addresses its financial problems. It is an underdeveloped country. Canada should be using its role in the international financial institutions, through the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund—our finance minister is a director of the International Monetary Fund—to ensure through that very direct mechanism that Canada does not contribute to the destruction of the tropical rain forests in Cameroon, Malaysia, Indonesia, Sarawak, Peru and Colombia because we are all going to pay if that rain forest is destroyed.

We are going to be paying, not just in the cost of human rights violations—that is, as human beings we feel for people who are hurt, we feel for the people who are moved off their land and out of their way of life—but also because the destruction of the tropical rain forest is a very real threat to our global environment. This is the issue that is going to be before us over the coming decades, if we have that long.

The Global Conference on Debt and Adjustment recommended that Canada's directors on the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank work to solve this problem. I think we have to be very conscious that Canada has an important role. We are one of the G-7 countries.

I want to alert people out there that they have a role to play in this as well. I am not optimistic that Canada is going to take the right approach. I am not optimistic for two major reasons, which are very real to me as a parliamentarian who has been here for just over two years. I participated on the international debt report for the external affairs and international trade committee. The government response to that report, called, "Securing our Global Future", was very disappointing. The government does not seem to have a grasp of the urgency of the international debt problem and the link to the rain forests.

The second reason I am not very optimistic is because recently, just this past Tuesday in fact, the government's green plan has come out and we see once again a sort of inability on the part of the government to understand the urgency of linking the global environment to our own security. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by asking those people who are out there, those Canadians who care about the global environment, to get in touch with your member of Parliament and make sure that he or she is aware of Canada's role in the destruction of rain forests and tell them to stop.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon. I would like to express appreciation to my colleague, who lives in Ottawa, who has graciously permitted me to speak first so that I can depart this lovely community for an even lovelier part of Canada, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the initiative of the hon. member for Northumberland in raising one of the most serious and urgent issues on the public agenda for consideration by this House. No subject is more Canadian than forests and no place is more appropriate for the discussion of forest issues than the Parliament of Canada.

The member's concern is well founded. We depend on forests, perhaps in more ways than we have yet learned to count, not just as a source of product and jobs, although these considerations are of vital importance to Canadians. Forests are, as we have rather belatedly come to see, a vital and vulnerable part of the life support system that allows us to exist on this planet. All around the world, trees meet human needs for lumber, paper, food, and medicine; they shelter our fields and homes; they yield fodder for our livestock; they will fuel the fires to cook half of the world's meals today; and, beyond this, awareness has finally dawned that forests are active players in the very process of life. They hold back deserts, they stabilize hillsides, they regulate run-off, clean the air, and shelter countless life forms.

So I share the member's concern because the global forest is under assault and it is in jeopardy. Once it covered most of the planet, now less than a third of the earth is forested. Recent statistics from the food and agricultural organization of the United Nations indicate that the problem is even worse than we thought. Figures announced by the food and agricultural organization in June suggest that the rate of tropical deforestation actually rose by about 70 per cent during the 1980s to the point where some 17 million hectares of tropical forests are being lost every year. Half of Africa's forests are already gone. Much of Central America grows more barren every day. In China and in India, one-third of the world's population puts immense pressure on just one-twentieth of the world's trees.

Can the process be stopped? The evidence up to now is discouraging. We have failed for centuries to replace the trees we use because of short-term thinking, lack of vision, and wrong-headed attitudes. Quite literally, we haven't been able to see the forest for the trees.

But the process has to be stopped or we will degrade our planet and impoverish our children's future. The answer, the solution to deforestation is complex and it is difficult. It has many facets and it will take a lot of effort on many fronts.

Key parts of the answer lie in other areas seemingly unconnected with forestry. Most fundamental, for example, we need to bring the population explosion under control because even a perfect forest program, worldwide, cannot cope with exponential population growth. Experience reveals to us that the only sure way to lower birth rates is to overcome poverty. So the first step in protecting the world's forests is through broad, generalized development programs in such fields as health, food, education, and job creation, with the bulk of the benefits going to the poorest people.

The environmental movement can make a big contribution by helping us to become responsible consumers. The forestry profession which is going through a revolution in its thinking needs to explore and develop whole new areas such as agriforestry and social forestry so that it can make an even more profound contribution. But the member for Northumberland is right in believing there is legislation or regulatory aspect to the solution which means a role that governments, parliamentarians, and international organizations must play if they are to be part of the answer. However, I am afraid that I am not at all certain that the approach she advocates is necessary or even helpful.

The member asks that the government develop a rain forest policy with guidelines to prevent Canada from financing projects that might destroy or degrade tropical rain forests. The intent is beyond reproach, but the effect might be somewhat different.

In one sense, the member's proposal is an unnecessary duplication of what already exists. As many members know, for some years now—since 1986—projects being considered for funding by the Canadian International Development Agency have been systematically reviewed, as part of the normal approval process, for their impact on the environment which very notably includes their effect on tropical forests.

The essence of the member's proposal is, in fact, already an integral part of government policy and indeed of the strategy for Canada's official development assistance as tabled here in 1988 by the Minister of External Relations and International Development.

Not only are bilateral projects analyzed for their environmental impact, but Canada has also been a leader in the effort to review such impacts caused by the World Bank's lending practices, particularly in regard to tropical forests.

Major reforms have, in fact, been made to meet those concerns. During 1990, the World Bank released guidelines for the environmental assessment of all its major projects in January and, in September, it issued its first annual environmental report. Just last month, it produced a specific paper on forestry lending policy. Admittedly, it is late in the day, but the changes are coming.

I feel that M-398 essentially duplicates what has already been achieved. True enough, it goes a bit further, but that could in reality prove a weakness, rather than a strength. There are times when a situation is not simple, when, for instance, a project that would destroy 100 trees will in the end save thousands of trees by providing alternative sources of energy. There are times, particularly in multilateral affairs, when it is better to be involved in the action and in a position to influence decisions, rather than sitting on the sidelines with clean hands but no say.

Rigidly applied, M-398 could be a strait-jacket, a ban on Canadian participation in anything that involves cutting trees in tropical rain forests, and I do not think that that would be helpful at all.

In fact, I feel that we need to move a giant step ahead in the way we think about economics and the environment in this post Brundtland era. When it began to dawn on us, back in the 1960s and 1970s, that there seemed to be a conflict in economic growth and the health of our natural environment, this new awareness from the Brundtland days represented an important step forward in our development thinking.

It was only the first step, and it is time now to make another major advance in the quality and the sophistication of our concepts by absorbing the wisdom offered in the Brundtland report and making it an internal part of our attitudes and our thought processes.

That historic report, the most important document of the 1980s, told us how much damage we are doing and advocated the principle of sustainable development. It did not stop there. It took us another step along the road by arguing very persuasively that the conflict between ecology and economics is an illusion or, at most, a short term effect, and that in the final analysis, there is no conflict because good environmentalism is good economics and vice versa.

I make this point because I think the member's proposal misses the relevance to the tropical forest of this lesson from Brundtland.

Tropical rain forests are more likely to be preserved and looked after if their owners, the people of the developing countries, see them as a source of wealth and benefits, as a valuable asset that must be protected. That implies some degree of use and exploitation. Sustainable development, certainly, but development nonetheless.

A moment ago, I acknowledged that the member is basically right in feeling that some kind of regulatory approach is needed as part of the solution to the rain forest problem. But we cannot chop nature up, and put it in little compartments. Everything affects everything else.

Tropical rain forest depletion is closely linked to such profound issues as global warming and the loss of biological diversity here on our planet. The best way to deal with this is not piecemeal and single-handedly through an isolated ban on Canadian aid funding. That would be a fragmentary and futile approach.

The best way to tackle this issue, and the only way that can really work, is by playing a vigorous role in working out an internal solution and an international solution, one that has the active support of all the players, one that rallies global resources and authorities to deal with a global problem, one that is fully worked out and carefully elaborated, so that it can take into account the endless complexities, and make the interconnections with other related moves that are under way. That is the approach which we advocate. That is the approach which must be taken.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the colleague who has just finished speaking is about to take off for New Brunswick. Having heard what he has to say about what great progress we are making and how wonderfully we are doing in environmental assessments of development projects, I think I should give him a pile of reading to take with him on that airplane. He might come back on Monday a little bit better informed, with a little more understanding of the depth and breadth of these issues.

Some projects do have a direct impact on tropical rain forests. The industrial development forestry project in Peru, mentioned by a previous speaker, extended a $17 million line of credit to Peruvian timber companies to buy Canadian lumber extraction and sawmilling equipment for logging in the jungles of the Amazon. The project also involved $9 million for forestry training and technical assistance. Nevertheless, virtually all commercial logging activities in the rain forest have been proven to cause permanent environmental damage.

We certainly have a long way to go in making our overseas development aid policies more consistent with the words we say about the environment but are far from practising or integrating into our decision making and policies in government programs.

I want to restate a fundamental principle that came out of the Brundtland Commission. It is that we have no economy, healthy or otherwise, without an abundance of environmental resources. Without energy, we do not feed and drive our industry. Without raw materials as resources, we have nothing from which to manufacture. If we deplete our forests, we have nothing to cut down and to sustain the benefit that healthy, thriving forests, properly harvested, can provide perpetually.

There was a third corner-stone of the Brundtland Commission that seldom gets mentioned. We talk about the economy and we talk about the environment and we talk as if we have to balance them and trade one off against the other. That misses the essential message which is that we have to integrate them because, without protecting one, we cannot protect the other.

The third corner-stone is equity. We will not solve the world's environmental problems, whether it be rain forests, global warming, ozone depletion, or anything else, until we address the fundamental problems of a world that is divided between a small proportion of its population who consumes the vast majority of its wealth and resources, and a very large population who lives on minuscule scraps from that very abundant table that we, in the developed countries, are fortunate to have.

We are not going to solve our environmental problems, as my colleague who introduced this motion said, until we deal with the problems of international debt. It is a shame and a disgrace that we in the northern countries receive more money from the poorest people on this earth than goes from our countries to theirs. That set-up is so debilitating that there is no way those countries can get out of the cycle of poverty and population explosion.

Some members may wonder why I am addressing the issue of poverty when we are talking about rain forests. The simple fact is that world-wide the single greatest cause of environmental degradation is poverty. It is a population explosion which is based on infant mortality which can be reversed dramatically simply by improving the literacy of women. Yet, we insist on huge megaprojects that support our industries when we go to try to help in the Third World.

That is why I am talking about poverty. We strip the resources from the poorest part of the world. We make our profits on them and we send virtually nothing of these profits back to the poorest parts of the world. We are engaged, and we, Canada—not the United States, not Britain, not Japan, not West Germany, but we, Canada—are engaged in an economic colonialism that is more devastating than the last century's colonialism when countries were occupied and run from within. We can sit back in our nice comfortable homes and never even have to see the populations, the cultures, and the ecosystems that we are destroying to enjoy our comfort.

Some of the members have spoken about CIDA, but it goes far beyond CIDA. The Export Development Corporation, the trade facilitation offices, and the whole network of agencies that I am only starting to find out about, which support and subsidize trade with billions of Canadian dollars every year, have no requirement to meet any kinds of environmental standards. We take millions of dollars from the taxpayers of Canada to support the export of coal-fired generating systems. When are we going to ask ourselves how we can use those billions of dollars every year to try to export technology and products that are helpful, that will allow the Third World countries to start sharing some of the wealth of this planet and some of the comfort it offers, without doing the destructive damage to the planet that we have done?

I am looking at the green plan. I read it in great detail and then I went back through it today particularly looking for things relevant to this debate. It does nothing to address the whole role of Canada in the international economy and how we are feeding our industries, our jobs, and our wealth off the poverty, the degradation, and the depletion of other people's rights to a decent and fair quality of life. This has nothing about the rain forests of the world. It has nothing about our own old growth forests. It has very wishy-washy policies with very few things in the way of specifics and timetables on how we are going to better manage our own forests.

After nearly two years and $6 million spent on consultation, is this the best we can do when it comes to an invaluable and irreplacable resource of the world?

Mr. Speaker, I see the time for debate is ending, and I urge all members. They know the rules perfectly well. If they want Canada to address the rain forests, all they have to do is not stand up and speak again after I sit down.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have but a minute or two to address what is a very important issue and I would like to take that minute to say two things.

First, I would like to say to the member who moved the motion that we on the government side very much share her concerns with respect to the state of the rain forest. We are very conscious of the fact that there is a tremendous connection between economic conditions in the Third World and Fourth World and with the state of the rain forest.

I have had the opportunity to visit Ethiopia during the course of the last 12 months. Although the conditions are not those which most people would associate with that of the rain forest, I did see that there was a very real emphasis on the part of CIDA in ensuring that the type of development policies we had in place were as environmentally friendly as they could possibly be.

• (1800)

I think, Mr. Speaker, you are suggesting to me that my time has expired. Perhaps I could have the opportunity on another day to discuss the issue at a greater length, the sort of length which it deserves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MEDICARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure who is here to respond.

I want to go over some of the questions that I raised earlier in the House concerning the financing of medicare and the crisis that has arisen in the country. The crisis is twofold: One is very fast escalating health care costs and at the same time reduction of government payments, particularly federal transfer payments.

In the federal transfer payments it used to be 50–50 until the Liberal government in 1977 brought in the block funding. At that point it was to increase at the level of the GNP plus the rise in population.

Of course the Liberals then brought in the famous six and five which limited the growth. In 1986, the Conservatives brought in the first of a number of budget restraint measures that reduced it to GNP, minus 2 per cent.

Last year there was a further reduction in which they brought in a freeze for 1990–91 and 1991–92, and then it was to increase at the rate of GNP minus 3 per cent.

We now have a number of provinces, led by Mel Couvelier, the Minister of Finance in B.C. and by Mr. Remillard and Mr. Coté of the Quebec government, which are demanding that they be allowed to bring in user fees and extra billing.

Over the last week I have been very pleased with the stand taken by both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare who have risen repeatedly in this House and have said that they will uphold the Canada Health Act. They will uphold all of the five principles that are set out in the Canada Health Act. Also, they will not permit any province to institute user fees or extra billing. I was most pleased with that answer, as were most Canadians.

However, when we have asked the government what it is going to do when it is no longer transferring any cash to the provinces for medicare, so that its only leverage in which it can force the provinces to comply is gone, what then?

That is not some distant time. It has been calculated that the federal government will not be transferring any cash to Quebec by 1995; to Ontario by 1997 or 1998. In fact, I was advised in a meeting I had with the new minister of health for Ontario, their calculations indicate that it may be even sooner. Of course, it depends on the moneys raised from tax points. With the downturn in the economy, that is a little bit unpredictable.

I guess all Canadians are starting to say that the federal government is not going out of the health care and medicare field with an announcement, but with a whimper. It will simply be reducing its cash transfers to the province so that within the next 10 years it will not be giving any money to any province. The government will simply wimp out. It will have no leverage in which it can insist on national standards. Then the provinces will be able to introduce measures that will Americanize our health care system.

I have three questions that I would like addressed. There has been some debate as to when those cut–off dates are going to be. Can the government confirm the date that the three biggest provinces, Ontario, Quebec and B.C., will no longer receive cash transfers under medicare? It has been said and federal government documents claim it is 1995 for Quebec and Ontario is supposed to be 1997 or 1998. When is that point under the current budget restrictions that were introduced in 1986 and last year?

Second, once there are no more cash transfers, how is the government going to enforce the Canada Health Act? It has no leverage. What can it do?

Third, because of escalating costs, is the government now prepared to use what remaining spending power it has to try to assist provinces in innovative methods of delivery of health care so that all of the health care costs can be brought into the most efficient and effective health care system. Without that all of us know that ultimately down the road there is going to be a real crisis. We must manage our health care system efficiently, effectively and without it becoming such a high cost that the country cannot afford it.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend spouts a lot of nonsense and he knows it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated time after time, after time that the national health system in Canada is supported by this government and is in absolutely no danger. In fact, I would like to refer the hon. member to pages 16097 and 16098 of Hansard for December 3, 1990, where the minister addressed the hon. member's question about changes to the federal health legislation, as the hon. member no doubt remembers.

Mr. Karpoff: What's he going to do when he's not transferring the money?

Mrs. Dobbie: Year in and year out Canadians, when they are asked their opinion about the health care system, have expressed a high degree of satisfaction with health care and this is very significant in itself. Perhaps even more revealing of Canadians' commitment to their health care system are the results of a recently reported opinion survey that was carried out across 10 nations. Among the countries that had national health care systems, satisfaction with the system was the highest in Canada. Most Canadians surveyed regarded the system to be fundamentally sound and 95 per cent disagreed that there were such problems that complete rebuilding of the system was needed.

What is it about Canada's health care system that elicits such commitment and pride from Canadians? I believe that hon. members like my friend across the way will agree that it is the uniqueness of our system and its basic philosophy that our citizens' health and access to quality care should not depend upon their financial means. This has been the guiding principle of health care in Canada since the 1950s and it is just as true today.

Just over six years ago the House unanimously passed the Canada Health Act. This is the act which embodies principles which are admired by Canadians and praised by many other countries around the world. It is a publicly administered system which operates on a non-profit basis, with comprehensive coverage for medically-necessary hospital and physician services, universal coverage for all Canadian residents, coverage that is portable and reasonable access to care without financial barriers. Extra billing and user charges are contrary to the principles of reasonable access and such direct patient charges are discouraged.

In the Canada Health Act this government is opposed to such patient charges, both in principle and in practice. That should answer the hon. member's question.

Extra billing and other user charges have been shown to deter the least advantaged Canadians from seeking necessary health care. Three years ago, in April 1987 direct charges to patients were eliminated in Canada under this government's direction.

Suggestions by the hon. members opposite that our government is anything less than totally committed both to the letter and the spirit of the Canada Health Act are irresponsible, inaccurate and misleading. We are fully committed to the principles of the Canada Health Act.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period on November 1, I asked the Minister of State for Finance what specific action he was going to take regarding the criticisms of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions concerning that particular office.

These criticisms were made that week by the Auditor General in his 1990 report. The Auditor General said of the superintendent's office that it was not doing everything possible to ensure that it could sound the alarm in time to prevent a financial institution from going under. So I asked the Minister of State for Finance what he was going to do about it and he brushed off my question and actually said that I was drawing conclusions.

I was not drawing conclusions because that question was based on facts taken right out of the Auditor General's report. I invite the minister to read that report.

In my supplementary I asked the same question, that is, what was the minister going to do about the Auditor General's complaints. Again, I got a vague answer. So I am here again tonight to try to get a satisfactory answer to these concerns. This is a very important question because, as we are aware, it is absolutely essential that we ensure the soundness of our financial institutions. I know that many Canadians have heard the shocking details surrounding the American Savings and Loans scandal where over one-half trillion dollars in taxpayers' money was lost. I think the latest estimate is something like $600 billion.

Certainly Canada has not been without its bank and trust company failures. People may remember the Principal Group and Canadian Commercial Bank failures in the west, the Greymac-Seaway Trust failures in Ontario, or they may be aware of the difficulties facing Standard Trust today in Ontario. I am sure that the taxpayers do not need to be reminded of these events. When the Canadian Commercial Bank experienced difficulties in 1985, for example, taxpayers spent approximately $125 million on a rescue package for the company, which went under anyway.

We as legislators have a duty to see that no more taxpayers' money is lost through the failure of one of our financial institutions. We have a responsibility to protect the people who place their money and their trust in these institutions and we have a responsibility to ensure the soundness and the stability of financial institutions and, indeed, of our financial system as a whole.

Really, the issue before us is the one that, tonight, is the same as I brought in on November 1, that in the 1990 report, the Auditor General said that the Superintendent's office had improvements to make in a number of areas. I want to list just three of these. They do not always write down their findings after inspecting a bank, a trust, or an insurance company and, in some cases, no files were kept; they are not fully using their new computer system which could greatly improve the effectiveness of the office; and, if they are inspecting a trust company, for example, which is owned by a commercial parent corporation, they do not have access to the books of that parent company, even though the parent's financial health could pose a threat to the trust subsidiary. While this last problem should be eliminated by proposed government legislation, this government's incredible slowness in bringing in the legislation may have put at least one trust company solvency at risk.

I know that my time is just about up, but I want to ask again what this government is doing about the problems cited by the Auditor General so that Canada will have the most secure financial system in the world.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be here to answer the question about how we protect people who hold interest in our financial institutions.

The hon. member will be glad to know that the primary objective of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is to protect the interest of depositors and to protect the interest also of policyholders by ensuring the soundness of financial institutions and the stability of the Canadian financial system.

Through a comprehensive framework the office monitors and examines supervised institutions for compliance with applicable legislation, related regulations and guidelines, and it gathers information about the operations of institutions for use in developing sound regulatory policies and assessing strengths and weaknesses in the financial system.

In respect of life and property insurance companies there has been for some time an early warning system in place with respect to deposit taking institutions under federal jurisdiction. The Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has developed a framework which identifies problems as they may exist in financial institutions.

Action is taken on such matters through discussion with senior management of the institution. The regulatory policy sector of that office identifies trends of problems that might be surfacing, and these matters are drawn to the attention of the examiners.

The Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has studied the Auditor General's report, and it agrees generally with the recommendations that have been made. In Mr. MacKenzie's response he noted that work is well under way to complete implementation in most cases. In other areas he has incorporated the Auditor General's recommendations into his planning documents.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is also concerned about possible financial problems of member institutions. Therefore CDIC is working on standards aimed at promoting sound business and financial practices. If sound corporate governances, practices and standards are in place and followed by member institutions, the incidence of problems should be reduced for the benefit of all concerned.

The federal government has brought forward new legislation which was tabled on September 27. This legislation includes a new power for the superintendent to require controlling owners of financial institutions to furnish information. As well, comprehensive self-dealing rules and a new director's policy are also proposed. These measures supplement the actions which were taken in 1987 aimed at strengthening the supervisory system.

Finally, the House finance committee has already begun its study of Bill C–83, and we are bringing forward the rest of the legislative package as soon as possible.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are three report stage motions in amendment to Bill C-63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, standing on the Notice Paper in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1 and 3 are in order and will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2 is out of order. It seeks to introduce provisions requiring a widespread disclosure of information and even distributing criminal sanctions against defaulters. It is well beyond the scope of this bill and the Chair cannot permit the motion to come before the House. In this regard, I will refer hon. members to Citation 778 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition.

[Translation]

I will now put motion No. 1 to the House.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 29 to 33 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"facilitate elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination throughout Canada by the development, sharing and application of knowledge and expertise in order to contribute to racial harmony in Canada by."

• (1010 )

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that at least two of the proposed amendments were accepted. I hope they will be acceptable to the government as well.

Motion No. 1 has to do with the very purpose of this Canadian Race Relations Foundation. It is something that we debated very extensively in committee. Indeed, there were many witnesses, including the Japanese Canadian Association and if I recall correctly, the Congress of Black Women were particularly adamant that in the purposes of this bill there must be specific reference to the main purpose of establishing this foundation, which is to eliminate racism in Canada and all forms of racial discrimination throughout Canada.

I know from discussion in committee and from the minister's response that this certainly was the intent, but in the present wording of the purposes and goals, it is far too wishy-washy, if I may use that expression, and refers just to the development, sharing and application of knowledge of expertise. We are very much afraid if this is not spelled out more specifically as the purpose being to eliminate racism that we will have a foundation that is largely a rather passive research institution, an academic kind of institution. That is not what people are asking for.

We have had an escalation of racism in Canada, I regret to say. We have really a very serious situation. This foundation is one of the most important steps of the government and it is a considerable investment hopefully to have a strong movement to make changes in Canada. Therefore, Motion No. 1 is an amendment to add the phrase that the purpose of the institution is to "facilitate elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination throughout Canada—" I hope very much that the government will accept this amendment.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to take a moment and thank the members of the legislative committee for their very dedicated efforts. Certainly they have brought forward on behalf of the many witnesses who appeared some very constructive suggestions that I believe and know have strengthened the bill.

My own impression is that this particular motion really adds nothing further to what we already have. Indeed, trying to contribute to racial harmony in Canada already causes some new discussion and new dilemma. As far as I am concerned, I am thankful that we did hear all the witnesses, that we did work very closely together, members on all sides of this House, in strengthening the bill.

However, I do not feel that this adds anything and, therefore, cannot accept this suggestion. I heard the member say that she is very pleased with the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and would hope that that would indicate that we could see an early approval, so that we can get on and actually have the foundation in place in Toronto and begin to do the work it was intended to do.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, as a member on the committee, I thank the minister for his acknowledgement of some serious work done by committee members.

One of the elements of that serious work is reflected in this motion. Not only is it important for this Parliament to consider the principle of the bill itself but to provide the kinds of directions and purposes that give focus to the activity of the foundation.

Otherwise it will be a foundation in name only, in generic, philosophical principles that no one can dispute. However, in terms of its practicability and its ability to deliver something to Canadians, it will be absolutely worthless.

This motion addresses itself to the intention to provide some direction, to provide some purpose, and to give a sense of meaning to some of the work that must be done. We must keep in mind that none of that is going to be of enormous weight, inasmuch as the operations of the foundation will be generally funded by a fund of $24 million. If we also keep in mind that fund managers tell us that we can draw a maximum of 5 per cent from such fund in order to maintain the fund, quite frankly we are going to be providing very little toward the elimination of discrimination and racial discrimination, unless we put in the bill something specific that gives direction both to the board of directors and to the executive director.

Unfortunately the minister has to note, even in trying to promote racial harmony and racial co–operation in this country, that there seems to be a resistance. However, this Parliament owes it to all Canadians to be much stronger than that resistance, that reaction to initiatives that are positive and worth while for all Canadians.

We support this motion. It enhances the bill and gives it that purpose which it sorely lacks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 (Ms. Mitchell) negatived.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C–63 be amended in clause 6 by striking out line 37 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"siders appropriate, subject to the approval of the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship of the House of Commons."

She said: Mr. Speaker, before I go into the details of this amendment, I would just like to qualify one of the comments that was made by the minister.

While I think it is extremely important, and so does my party, to have a race relations foundation, we want a race relations foundation that has real meaning and is not just something that is going to rubber stamp for the government and be a forum of political recognition or political appointments to the board and so on.

We are not supporting this race relations foundation as the government has proposed it. We have worked very hard, along with the other opposition party and along with witnesses, to try to get major changes. I am very disturbed that the minister refused Motion No. 1, which we have just been debating.

Motion No. 3 in my view is not nearly comprehensive enough to make the major change that is needed in the structure of this foundation. We tried in committee to persuade the minister, as did witnesses, that this new foundation must operate as a step detached from government. It must be a separate agency. It must be able at times to criticize government and certainly to press the government to make administrative and legislative changes that are necessary to help in the elimination of racism in Canada.

In committee we proposed that there be a more independent board, rather than a board appointed by the minister, in other words political appointees he would choose, with some consultation with groups, but groups of his choosing. We have seen that he has very strong likes and dislikes in groups that come to him about ethnocultural matters.

We have proposed that there should be an independent board and that nominees for that board should come from the whole community of ethnocultural groups and groups concerned with race relations and intercultural relations.

We asked that there be a procedure—and I think it would be an important model for other similar kinds of institutions—for these communities of organizations to put forward nominations for board members, and that the minister then take these nominations and present them to cabinet. In this way it would be far more democratic and we would ensure much greater credibility of the board of directors.

The minister refused this request in committee and he also refused to change the method of appointment of the executive director of the new foundation. It seems incredible that a board of directors of an agency, in this case the Race Relations Foundation, would not have the power to choose and hire its executive director, the senior staff person who would be carrying out its policy. That is exactly what has happened. The minister again refused to change the act. Under the present act, the executive director is appointed by cabinet. He or she will not be hired by the board of directors. Again it will be a political appointment recommended by the minister and appointed by cabinet.

This is a ridiculous way for what should be an independent organization to operate. It only says to us that the minister does not want this foundation to be independent, that he wants to keep it under his control. Certainly most of the witnesses who appeared at committee objected very strongly to that.

Indeed I was speaking just last week to representatives of the National Council of Japanese Canadians who were the instigators of this foundation. It was part of the redress settlement for Japanese Canadians who suffered many injustices during World War II. They felt very strongly also that this foundation should be independent of government and therefore should have a board that is not simply a board of political appointees.

As I say, the minister turned down this request in committee. We were very serious in trying to approach this in a non-partisan way, because we really want this foundation to work in an effective way. Since he turned it down and since we cannot reintroduce that motion in the House today, Motion No. 3 is somewhat of a compromise.

We appeal again to the minister to give more credibility to this board. He may not intend to make it a vehicle for political appointments, but that is the perception that will be out there. That is the danger in the present structure.

In order to have a monitoring effect, we are proposing in Motion No. 3 that Bill C-63 be amended to state that the minister's recommendations and the proposed appointments by cabinet should be subject to the approval of the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship of the House of Commons. Granted, it is dominated by government members, if it ever meets, which I regret to say it has not been doing. Certainly this would give cause for it to meet. It is dominated by government members, but it would give an all-party group the power, in co-operation perhaps with community groups, to take a look at who the minister is nominating. It would give far more credibility to the nominees who are being proposed.

I would strongly recommend that the minister accept this proposed motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member of the other opposition party who can never remember my party's name. It happens to be the party that led most of the opposition to this bill. That party is the Liberal Party, and we have two questions about this motion.

[English]

The motion should address itself, in its intent, to the function of committee. In our legislative committee we tried to point out that there is a very important component of this foundation which should call into question the viability of parliamentary committees. If we are to establish a foundation with a board of directors solely responsible to the Governor General in Council and an executive director with only one source of responsibility and accountability, that is to the Governor General in Council again, it calls into question the credibility and legitimacy of all of the operations of such a foundation.

By suggesting that perhaps that accountability should also be transferred over to a standing committee of the House of Commons, we would then have access to a direct pipeline to the deliberations of this Parliament, both to sensitize Parliament and to return to the intentions with respect to that foundation.

One of the most important questions is: How do we finance some of the philosophies the minister says this foundation addresses? It might be instructive to point out to everyone here, even my colleague in the other opposition party—

An hon. member: The real opposition.

Mr. Volpe: That which is dormant, yes, I agree.

For example, while we are applying some moneys to this foundation to the tune of $24 million, $12 million of which is coming from the Japanese Redress Foundation, we are taking away some moneys from heritage language studies. Those are activities which enhance the co-ordination, integration and harmonization of peoples in our country.

What did they do? They attacked a very viable and very effective method of creating racial and social harmony in this country, for example, one that served in the city of Toronto alone 100,000 young boys and girls. It addressed a total of 1,000 teachers on those subjects. It leveraged other activities in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and other areas around the country. They took away $16 million to do what? They will finance something such as this, at a time when all heritage language-type programs together, in total, are exactly .015 per cent of government finances or government expenditures. That is one and a half hundredths of 1 per cent. Now they are going to establish a foundation, and its board of directors and executive director will have only one source of accountability, and that is to the Governor General in Council.

Canadians need to be empowered. They need to have an understanding that their voices are heard. They need to know that the moneys they put toward the financing of this country serve their needs and their interests. We cannot do it by separating the function of the board, the executive director, from the people itself.

This motion deserves some support. We are happy to give it, even though it comes from a dormant third party.

[Translation]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the hon. member's suggestion with respect to this motion.

[English]

This motion calls for substantial change in established practice. Since 1985 all Governor in Council appointments are open to review by a standing committee of Parliament, which can call for review of any Governor in Council appointment.

Ms. Mitchell: What about the CRTC appointments?

Mr. Weiner: Listen, you might learn something; for once.

This motion contradicts the principle of ministerial accountability for Governor in Council appointments. These are serious machinery of government issues. This motion would change established practice by making the Commons Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship ultimately responsible for appointments to the foundation. We therefore reject the motion.

[English]

Mr. Weiner moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today it is my privilege to begin third reading debate on Bill C–63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

This legislation articulates more than the technical workings of a government initiative. It expresses our national commitment to multiculturalism and to greater cross–cultural understanding among Canadians.

We are a people unlike any other. We inhabit an immense land, one–sixteenth of the earth's terrain. As vast and as limitless as our land is the diversity of the Canadian people. But it is not our diversity alone that makes us unique. It is our ability to recognize and even welcome our different cultures and backgrounds. It is our belief that in this vast territory of ours there is enough room for everyone.

We have declared Canada to be a multicultural nation and in so doing we have helped to define the Canadian identity itself. Multiculturalism is at the heart of who we are. It represents a confident vision of ourselves and of our future together. It is a progressive force in the ongoing process of building a strong, dynamic and unified country.

That is the essential message of multiculturalism today: unity within our diversity, political unity within our cultural diversity.

The true source of our unity resides in the thoughts and beliefs of the Canadian people, in the honourable and timeless ideals that have guided our development and shaped the lives of every Canadian, past and present. It is difficult to pin down and express the values that have inspired Canadians through the generations. But they are reflected in the kind of society we have created for ourselves; our democratic way of life that encourages a plurality of views and perceptions; our judicial system where equality and justice are a promise made to every Canadian man and woman; our social system that seeks to assist the disadvantaged in our society; our belief in the free enterprise system as a means of achieving national prosperity.

These are some of the values that set us apart. They are the foundation of our hope for Canada and for our future together. All of us want a better life for our children and for our children's children. We all want to build safer communities free from social problems like family violence and drug abuse. Each of us has a vested interest in ensuring that our health care, our educational system and our economy are prepared to meet today's challenges.

The finest hope that we can have for our country is that it will support and lead the human struggle for equality; that all our citizens will have the opportunity to lead productive lives, free from the destructive forces of racism and racial discrimination.

Will that day come? We know it will not come as the result of a single initiative or one sweeping act of Parliament. It is the sum total of our actions as Canadians that will allow us to move forward and to achieve our ideals.

Today in this House I believe that we are making progress towards that goal. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation is a foundation for and about people. It represents a significant development in Canada's evolution as a multicultural nation.

As the legislation outlines, the foundation will promote the development, sharing and application of knowledge and expertise that will contribute to eliminating racism and all forms of racial discrimination across Canada. That is a challenging mandate, but one for which Canadians recognize the need.

The legislative committee on Bill C–63, which listened to a broad range of groups, institutions and individuals, concluded that there is widespread support for the establishment of the foundation.

I want to take this opportunity to again thank members of the legislative committee, whose efforts have brought us to where we are today. I know there are other members in this House who have contributed in a positive way to this bill. To them, I express my thanks also.

We must continue to match goodwill with action. Within Canada today there is a growing need for reliable research and new race relations resources. The race relations foundation will meet that need. The best expertise in the country will be used and developed by the foundation, along with a comprehensive information bank, accessible to all Canadians.

The foundation will be of direct benefit to people working on the front lines. It will serve community groups, policy makers, business and labour organizations, researchers, private and public institutions, as well as interested Canadians.

By using the foundation's research and services, the initiative of educators, advocates, managers and decision–makers will be more focused and effective.

It will be a valuable resource for government also, by providing informed and objective information on race relations issues.

[Translation]

The foundation is not intended to replace special interest community groups and organizations or to impinge on their legitimate role in defending human rights.

Although the foundation will be based in Toronto, its mandate as the Canadian Race Relations Foundation will be national in scope. The legislation provides that the foundation and its services will be open to all Canadians.

[English]

The foundation will be a sound investment in our future. As such, it must start operating with a solid funding base.

The federal government is establishing an endowment fund of $24 million. Half of that amount will be contributed on behalf of the Japanese Canadian community, in commemoration of the injustices suffered by Japanese Canadians during and after the Second World War.

The foundation will also be incorporated federally as a charitable organization, in order to enhance its fund–raising potential.

The over–all responsibility of the foundation is one shared by all Canadians, to overcome racism and racial discrimination in our midst. The foundation will provide a national focus for this effort. By gathering expertise and knowledge from across the country, we will be able to share and use all existing Canadian expertise. In this way, we will be able to find creative solutions to the problem of racism.

The race relations foundation is an expression of the hope and determination of Canadians to realize a multicultural vision for this country. It is a symbol of our unity of purpose and of our shared citizenship values.

Yesterday's decision by the Supreme Court that upholds the constitutionality of the Criminal Code's anti–hate law can only serve to underline further both the importance of that vision and the work this foundation will undertake.

We know this foundation will not create magical solutions. It will not solve the problem of racism and racial discrimination in Canada, but it will contribute to our efforts to find new answers. It will be good for Canada.

Hon. members, I ask for your continued support in the passage of Bill C–63. If our work in establishing this foundation unlocks even one door, if it improves the life of even one Canadian who would have otherwise known only discrimination, then it will surely have been worth all the effort.

• (1040)

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister with great interest. I rise on behalf of the Liberal Party to say a few words on Bill C-63.

It is very important that a foundation such as this be set up. We on this side are in agreement with the principle of this bill. We do, however, have certain concerns about the implementation and the ability of the foundation to function given the constraints of the bill.

Canada is a rapidly growing country. We are opening our doors to more immigration. The Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that we are almost doubling the number of immigrants we admitted in the past. We are attracting immigrants from a different source than in the past. In the 1960s and 1970s, immigrants from Europe were attracted to Canada. We are now attracting immigrants from Third World countries such as Sri Lanka, India, Pakistan and South America.

The new visible minorities coming here are more prone to abuse from mainstream every-day Canadians. It is not unusual when walking down the main streets of Canada to hear slogans and slurs aimed at these minorities, often by community members. It is very important that we reach out and teach Canadians that as we progress to the year 2000 we need to be tolerant of each other.

As we grow more tolerant of each other, we will learn to live with each other. It is very important that this foundation function, but as it will not have a free hand and will be very closely tied to the government, I have doubts about its ability to function. Yes, it is there on paper and, yes, it will function, but will it support the new immigrants? Will it enhance their everyday life? I feel the constraints imposed on this foundation might not allow it to fulfil its objective.

The problems we have are many. First, I have a problem believing that the same government which decimates the heritage language program, which was designed to promote harmony and unity within Canada by allowing Canadians to learn the languages and cultures of various homelands, and then says that it wishes to do the same thing with a foundation that is not mandated to even come close to offering the same service.

As my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence said, the heritage languages funding from this government is very minimal, yet we have a minister who says: "No more. We are going to do away with it". What is the signal it sends out to the ethnic communities of this country? Does it send a signal that it is supporting their work? Does it send a signal that yes, we want to promote race relations? No, Mr. Speaker, it sends quite the opposite. It sends a signal out that it would like them to come to Canada, it would like them to bring their different heritages, but it does not support them.

The minister was brave enough to stand up and respond to the pressure from his colleagues, the backbenchers of the Conservative Party, who are feeling pressure from some of their constituents, especially the backbenchers from the west. We can see clearly that the pressure comes from the new party, the Reform Party, whose platform is more or less based on white supremacy in Canada. So the members of the Conservative Party who are trying to hold on to their seats in the west forced the minister to take such an position, which was a great change.

Second, I believe that the level of funding for this foundation is so low as to be laughable, $24 million. That is not even a drop in the bucket. What is $24 million going to contribute to such a foundation?

I see the minister is nodding and I thank him for agreeing with me.

Mr. Volpe: Look at the money the guys at Harbourfront are getting in that sweetheart deal.

Mr. Karygiannis: There you go. My hon. colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence refers to the sweetheart deal in Harbourfront.

It is very laughable to think that $24 million is going to be entrenched in order for us to project in the year 2000, in order for us to say to the new minorities that are coming to Canada: "We are going to have harmony. We are going to have equality. We are going to be tolerant of each other".

This $24 million is so laughable, it is incredible. I see the minister nodding his head and I want to thank him for agreeing with me, but that is not enough. I would have foreseen perhaps twice or three times the amount. The government that is spending money left, right, and centre so carelessly could have found it in its heart to allow a few more bucks.

It is very important that we have a budget which is operational. Its yearly operating budget will probably be less than $3 million. Out of this will come the salaries and expenses of the staff. I see the minister nodding his head. He knows what it is like to fly in a director from one coast to another. Five to ten trips a year, and the money is gone. Then there are the rents in downtown Toronto where the minister is proposing to put this foundation.

Ms. Mitchell: Put it in Winnipeg.

Mr. Karygiannis: The critic from the dormant third party says to put it in Winnipeg. I would like to point out that the hotbed of ethnic relations and newcomers is mostly in Montreal and Toronto.

It will be in Toronto, which is in the central part of Canada. I want to congratulate the minister for choosing my home town. It will serve the western part of the country: Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatchewan, and Winnipeg. It will also act as a liaison to the east. Toronto is going to be the hotbed of race relations to come.

However, it is limiting because of the funds. It is a small drop in the bucket and it will not be able to function. By the time one picks up the phone to call Vancouver, with a three-hour time difference, at the peak time, the funds will be gone. When all the expenses are taken out, the money that will be left over for the program and core funding will be such a small amount as to make the entire foundation a useless shell. I find this totally unacceptable.

I see the minister nodding his head that we need more money. It is interesting that the minister is in the House and he agrees with that. I know that even as members of Parliament we have such constraints running within budget that sometimes we do have a separate office, beside the constituency office, in order to operate. Some members or some ministers might.

I also have the problem with the interference that the minister responsible would be able to cause in the running of the foundation. Clause 15(3) states that the deputy to the minister be advised of all meetings and shall be able to attend all meetings of the board. Also, Clause 5(1) of the bill states that the foundation must undertake to conduct research studies, reports and other documents that the minister requests. I question this. The minister has a department. He can do all these things through them. Why would we tell the foundation to do extra? Is it that we want to use it for other things? Is it that we want to use it to promote the governing party? Is it that we want to use it for political hand-outs? We have seen the government clearly use foundations and hand-out contracts.

Ms. Mitchell: What about the Liberals?

Mr. Karygiannis: It is interesting that the NDP talks about the Liberals. May I point out to the NDP that, in Ontario when it was just elected, Bob White flew right into the Skydome. Before you start talking about the Liberals and what the Liberals did, look in your own back yard.

These clauses give the minister a great impact on the direction taken by this organization and could lead to it becoming nothing more than a mouthpiece for government policy. It could lead to the assumption that the foundation is more of a political organization than one of a proactive association for the needs of the furtherance of race relations.

This is very important as we head into the 21st century. As we are inviting more groups of visible minorities to come to Canada, it is important that this foundation is allowed to function properly. With $24 million, it is going to be nothing but a tokenship of "we have it here, we are trying to bring everybody together". I see the minister nodding his head that he agrees with me that, first, this will not be acceptable. Second, it will not be able to work. Third, we will need more funding.

It is also interesting to note that the minister said it is a charitable organization and can also fund raise. Are we going to try to use the $3 million that we will have yearly in order to raise funds and send out letters? Or, are we going to give it a real mandate and say: "You can work. You can do what you were set out to do"? If that is the case, then we need more funds for this. We need more funds in order to make it a viable tool to bring all the races right across the country together.

There are countries where the groups within it, the same countrymen, cannot live with each other. I would like to point out that we can learn lessons from Pakistan. In Pakistan, there is an Islamic republic in which there are three different sects of Islam, two being the Sunnis and the Ahmadis. The Sunnis outlawed the Ahmadis, telling them that they are not Muslims, that they cannot walk the streets and say greetings in the Islamic religion. If they do, they will be put in jail.

This foundation, I hope, will act as a means and a tool for those people from different lands who come over bringing hatred with them. From Sri Lanka, there are the Tamils and the Sinhalese. From Pakistan, there are the Ahmadis and the Sunnis. From many other countries there are different divisions. From India, there are the Hindus and the Sikhs. When they come here, they tend to bring their conflicts to this country.

This foundation will also have to act as a means and a vehicle for the hatreds that are brought over to be forgotten. It is very important when we come to Canada that, first and foremost, we pay allegiance to this country. Second, we must educate those people who are coming over to live in this country that we must live in harmony.

The funds that are available will not allow the foundation do that. The funds that are available for this foundation will act only as a means and a vehicle for the government of the day to put out its policies. It will act only as a vehicle for the government of the day, which today is formed by the Conservative Party, to place into position people who are supporting it. Probably, it will put as president of the foundation somebody who raised funds for the government. We saw clearly what happened in the other place.

Mr. Volpe: Not another Tory hack.

Mr. Karygiannis: My hon. colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence says: "Not another Tory hack".

We saw clearly what happened in the Senate. The Speaker of the other place was promoted and put there by the government. What did he do? He more or less closed debate. We have the GST that passed through.

I say to the minister across the way, and I hope that he takes this to heart, that all the appointments that will be made will be very neutral. I cannot tell if the minister is agreeable to carry it through or not. The government will probably appoint another Tory hack which is incredible.

I remember the Prime Minister saying, in 1984: "We are going to place every living, breathing Tory". We are going to have another Tory appointment to this board. We realize that the Tories did such a bad job with multiculturalism that now they are trying to come back and do a little bit of vote-buying. Well, it ain't going to work.

We have seen in the recent past a great rise in the number of racially-motivated attacks on ethnic minorities in Canada, a trend which will only increase unless the government takes seriously the impact that the large influx of new Canadians is having upon Canadian society.

We know that this proposal would act only as a shell. It will be nothing but a big bag of wind.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to debate at third reading Bill C-63, an act to establish a race relations foundation in Canada. I expect that we will finish third reading today and that this bill will, very shortly, go into law and, hopefully, the foundation will be established in the very near future.

However, as I have said many times, I truly and very sincerely regret that we did not have acceptance from the government, particularly from the minister, to strengthen this bill. We tried very hard in the spirit of non-partisanship to propose positive amendments which would have helped to strengthen this bill and, specifically, would have made it very clear at the outset that this foundation has as its major purpose the elimination of racial discrimination and racism.

I would like to thank all of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Unfortunately, there were many, many, more who wanted to appear but we did not have agreement with government members to hear more than 10 witnesses. They were from across Canada, but there were many others. I apologize to people who would have liked to have appeared that there was not the opportunity for them to do so. We do thank them, and we thank them for their submission as well.

The establishment of a race relations foundation is a very important component of the redress settlement which was a government commitment to Canadians of Japanese origin who suffered from racial discrimination and displacement during World War II. I would like to join today with my colleagues in paying tribute to these Canadians and to the elders who are no longer with us who suffered so much during this period in our history.

I know that most Canadians feel that this was a very disgraceful period and I commend the government for achieving redress. It helps all of us to wipe out some of the shame of the injustices that Japanese Canadians suffered. They were Canadians, many of them born here in Canada. I pay tribute to these Canadians and particularly to the Japanese Canadian Citizens Association. By having this redress and by putting the facts into the history of Canada, our children will learn about these injustices. They will also learn that as Canadians we condemn these injustices and we put our money where our mouths are, through redress.

One of the results, of course, of the redress is the fact that half of the $24 million which is committed as capital for the foundation came from the—

SEASON'S GREETINGS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, the holiday season is around the corner, and soon we will be starting a new year, full fo hope and promise.

I want to take this opportunity to wish all Canadians, my colleagues and especially my constituents, a Christmas full of peace and love. May the New Year bring you health and happiness and may you succeed in every endeavour.

During this time of family celebrations it is good to renew the bonds of friendship that the current pace of modern life prevents us from savouring as often as we would like.

I hope you will take advantage of this opportunity to get together with your relatives and friends, so that you will be able to start the new year, with fresh reserves of energy and optimism.

Personally, I shall continue to defend the interests of my constituents and to consider it a privilege to represent them here in Ottawa.

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, due to this government's lack of funding, CBC has been forced to use its dwindling resources to produce only news and information, eliminating all extra activities. Unfortunately, this includes such extra activities as telethons.

The lack of support that this government has provided to CBC has placed in jeopardy the future of the Izaak Walton Killam Hospital for Sick Children's telethon.

The IWK Hospital for Sick Children is the only paediatric hospital that serves Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The loss of this telethon will be devastating for the service that this hospital provides to the maritimes as it raised $3.5 million last year.

This government's lack of support for CBC is having deep-reaching effects in our communities across the country. I call on the government to look into this matter to ensure that these telethons will not become another victim of this government's cutbacks.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the National Transportation Agency of Canada announced on December 5 that a refusal by Ontario Express to transport Mr. William Hoch because of his disability constituted undue interference with his ability to travel. The complainant, a paraplegic, was denied access to the aircraft, a Jetstream 31, because he was unable to get on the plane without assistance.

In September 1990, the NTA ordered the carrier to make its airline accessible to disabled persons. In response to this order, as of November 26, 1990, Partenaire canadien agreed to drop its policy of denying access to certain disabled individuals, thus making its airline accessible to all.

FAMINE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, events in the Persian Gulf are diverting world attention away from major famines looming in Africa.

This week the United Nations confirmed what relief and development NGOs have been saying for some time, that over 10 million people face imminent starvation in Africa. At least 5 million people face starvation in Sudan alone. The food and agricultural organizations say that a major and immediate relief effort is required to avert large-scale food shortages and human suffering in the coming months.

The FAO is calling for $1.3 million tonnes of food aid if disaster is to be avoided in the Sudan. In West Africa, countless continue to die from hunger and lack of medical attention as the result of the bloody civil war which has torn Liberia apart. Again, the UN and other agencies indicated this week that food and medicine are needed immediately if a disaster is to be avoided. These are only two of the distressed areas in Africa.

I call upon the government to take immediate steps to provide additional emergency aid to those parts of Africa where lives are in serious risk.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, Focus on Inputs is an association of some 10,000 prairie farmers who seek to reduce agricultural input costs. These farmers through Focus on Inputs are contributing over $1 million of their own funds to establish a pilot plant to determine if generic glyphosate, a herbicide, can be made economically on the prairies.

Western Economic Diversification yesterday announced a repayable contribution of $750,000 to assist Focus on Inputs with this pilot project which fits in well with the objectives of Western Economic Diversification by encouraging new production and import replacement.

If the production of generic low-cost glyphosate is feasible in western Canada and leads to a commercial scale operation there would be significant benefits to farmers and prairie agriculture through reduced input costs, increased chem fallow and soil conservation practices and better weed control.

We salute Focus on Inputs and Western Economic Diversification for getting together in partnership on this very important project for the betterment of western agriculture.

JUSTICE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak of a travesty of justice. I speak of the plight of David Milgaard who has spent the last 21 years of his life in prison for a crime he did not commit. Yet for the last two years the Department of Justice has been sitting on an application to reopen his case.

The facts are overwhelming. One of the main witnesses now admits that he had lied at the trial. Dr. Ferris, a well-known forensic pathologist, has stated: "I have no reasonable doubt that the evidence presented at the trial failed to link David Milgaard with the offence and that in fact could be reasonably considered to exclude him from being the perpetrator of the murder". Investigators have also identified the person who is most likely the true killer.

But rather than review these conclusive reports, rather than appreciate the agony and trauma of the Milgaard family, the Minister of Justice has refused to act.

I am sure the House will join me in asking the minister to reopen the case. Too many years have been wasted and a human life irreparably affected. The time to act is now.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I have here a copy of a letter dated December 6 written by the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta and addressed to Ms. Joy Langan, MP for Mission—Coquitlam, regarding the statement made by the member for Mission—Coquitlam on December 6 which included the following:

> Across the country are those who would like to deny the reality of violence against women. The Speaker of the legislature in Alberta refused to allow any remembrance of the event. He said it would not be an appropriate observation for the Legislative Assembly of Alberta.

I go on to quote:

> Unfortunately this statement is not only totally untrue and misleading but also contains selective references from a memorandum of mine to a member of the Alberta Legislature for Edmonton Avonmore, Marie Laing, released without my knowledge and consent.

Ms. Langan had requested that 14 roses be placed in the Legislative Assembly of Alberta by way of remembrance. Both correspondence from Ms. Langan and the Speaker were sent to Joy Langan so that she would not in fact take any comments out of context.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. I apologize.

CANONIZATION OF MARGUERITE D'YOUVILLE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, there was great rejoicing in many churches throughout the world last Sunday and perhaps particularly in many cities, towns, and villages in Canada, and certainly in the federal constituency of St. Boniface, as Sister Marguerite d'Youville was canonized by Pope John Paul II.

Let me quote a short excerpt from His Holiness' remarks on this historical event:

> For the first time in history a woman of Canadian birth is inscribed among the Saints whom the church has raised to the glory of the altar.

[Translation]

Although we are all very proud of the fact that this brand new saint is a Canadian, we are especially proud of her accomplishments. She founded the Congregation of the Sisters of Charity, later known as the Grey Nuns. From the outset, the Grey Nuns looked after the needs of the poor, providing shelter, food, and clothing, and cared for the sick and handicapped. This excellent work continues today in such places as St. Boniface, where the Grey Nuns are still involved in the St. Boniface Hospital which they founded.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, we applaud yesterday's decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which overturned the Alberta Court of Appeal's ruling in the Keegstra case. Canadians value freedom of speech but do not want our society poisoned by hatred and racism. The court confirmed this by deciding the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not allow the right to promote hatred against identifiable groups of Canadians.

Some suggest that minorities may be hurt more than others by this decision, but no one has the right to promote hatred. Lawyer Doug Christie's statement that western Canadians have a different view of free speech is particularly offensive. The court decision clears the way for a similar decision in the New Brunswick Malcolm Ross case.

• (1110)

The Supreme Court has spoken. Now the government must demonstrate its commitment to eliminate racism by strengthening hate propaganda to prohibit distribution of racist paraphernalia by enforcing mandatory affirmative action in the Multiculturalism Act. It must provide adequate funding for the Human Rights Commission and must make the elimination of racism a primary goal of the new race relations foundation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, finally, after 50 years of discussion but inaction, Canadians are going to have a federal sales tax system that will no longer be outdated, inefficient, unfair, and unreliable.

Out with the MST and in with the GST. Why will the GST be good for Canadians? The GST will replace a tax system that is estimated to lose annually $9 billion in revenue and jobs for Canadians. The GST will stop penalizing our Canadian manufacturers, which, under the present system, have been at a competitive disadvantage in world markets as exporters and importers. The GST will be fairer than the current system because it provides refundable tax credits for low and modest-income Canadians.

The 8.7 million families and individuals earning less than $30,000 annually will benefit because they will receive a credit cheque four times a year.

By next week the first cheques will be sent to those 8.7 million families and individuals before the GST goes into effect on January 1, 1990.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. The hon. member's time has expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am here to tell you about the GST that stole Christmas. In fact, the tax man cometh.

The greatest parliamentary fraud in the history of Canada was perpetrated on the taxpayers last night. The second greatest fraud is that Canadians are going to save money as a result of this initiative.

Let's look at one specific area, the brewing industry. One would argue that since the FST is gone, we should save money in that particular area. Not only has the federal government slapped a 45 per cent increase on excise taxes, the effect of the GST on beer will mean an increase of 73 per cent in federal government revenues across this country.

In one week, I have collected 600 signatures from my riding. I can tell you that Canadians do not want a 76 per cent increase in federal taxes on beer. If that is the kind of savings that Michael Wilson is bragging about, I say to Michael Wilson and the GST, a pox on both your houses.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, the federal government places a high priority on our agricultural food industry.

Since 1984 the federal government has spent $22 billion in support of the Canadian agriculture industry. As well, on November 23 Agriculture Canada tabled supplementary estimates seeking parliamentary approval for $316 million for the fiscal year 1990-91 to assist farmers hard hit by depressed commodity prices and dwindling markets.

Farmers, as well as consumers, realize that the future of the agri-food industry may rest on the success of the negotiations between the federal and provincial governments on the GRIP and NISA proposals, the long-term safety net insurance and stabilization programs. This government's record clearly demonstrates our commitment to the farming community and its future economic success

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians I want to thank my Liberal colleagues in the other place for fighting the good fight against the GST.

They and they alone stood in the Senate against this government, clearly out of control and out of touch with Canadians, and stood to fight on behalf of 80 per cent of Canadians who oppose the GST.

They alone fought for the protection of our parliamentary rules and traditions as the Conservatives chose to trample over the rights of parliamentarians and the laws of this country in a desperate attempt to save a dying agenda.

To the Liberal senators, we owe them a profound debt of gratitude.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, now that the cruel, brutal, mean, unfair and disastrous goods and services tax is a reality, let all Canadians know that such is the case because the Conservatives introduced the legislation and the Liberal senators allowed it to become a reality.

The Liberals in the Senate had the majority and could have defeated the GST when leave was sought to introduce the GST, when the vote was taken at first reading stage, and when the vote occurred at second reading.

The Liberals also had the majority and could have defeated the GST when it was in committee during April, May, June, July, August, September, and October.

Madam Speaker, let all Canadians know that if the GST is a reality today, it is because the Conservatives forced the legislation through the House of Commons and the Liberals allowed it to pass in the Senate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Last night, in a flagrant violation of parliamentary procedure, the artificial Conservative majority in the Senate forced though the GST, the most unpopular, the most unwanted tax in Canadian history.

Speaking about the GST, the President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said: "It is going to be extremely messy".

Given the views of so many business people, given the views of the overwhelming majority of Canadians who say they do not want this tax, I ask the government if it will take this one last chance, listen to reason, and not have the GST given Royal Assent today so that it will not be imposed on the backs of Canadians.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I told this House that at that time there were over 900,000 businesses that had registered and prepared for an implementation date on January 1. I am glad to announce today that, as we sit here in this Chamber, we are quickly approaching the 1 million mark of registrants in the business community.

We have systems and technology in place to be able to go through and process all the forthcoming registrations. We expect between 1.2 million and 1.4 million businesses to register at the end of the day.

Revenue Canada has been preparing, at the advice of the Auditor General, for the last 18 months precisely for this period of time. As of this morning in a press conference I made it very clear that we intend not to work against members of the business community who have not yet registered, but with them by providing them with the tools, by providing them the information, by providing them the necessary assistance to make it as smooth and as easy for the change from the federal sales tax to the GST on January 1.

Therefore there is no question in our minds that the GST is to go ahead on January 1 in relatively as smooth a fashion as possible.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, Canadian business people and Canadians generally simply do not believe this minister and this government.

Today, Statistics Canada reported that the rate of inflation is 5 per cent. This government has said that its GST will add 1.3 percentage points to the rate of inflation, an increase of more than 20 per cent above the current rate.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: Will the government assure Canadians that it will not respond to the inflation caused by its own GST by having interest rates go up? If this happens it will push the economy even further into recession than it is already.

Better still, will the government take this one last chance, listen to reason and not have the GST given Royal Assent, so it will not come into force at all? Will it take this one last opportunity to show it has the interest of Canadians at heart?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it is a fact that the CPI rose to 5 per sent in November. It is up from 4.8 per cent in October. If we were to exclude food and energy—and energy is the major factor—we would be at 4.2 per cent in November, virtually the same as October at 4.3 per cent. It is indeed going up and, as we have said, it is very important to contain these inflationary pressures. This is what we are trying to do. The GST, as we have agreed, will of course cause a one-time increase of 1.25 per cent or 1.5 per cent over a period of time. The governor of the bank has indicated that in his mind this could easily be fitted in.

It is a one-time increase, but we have to maintain the discipline at the same time and make sure that these pressures go down. We have been successful. We saw the bank rate go down this week by 15 basis points, basically two points over the last four months. We are heading in the right direction.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board speaks about a one-time increase in inflation. If this government were serious about inflation, it would agree with me when I say that this one-time increase due to the GST is one time too many and not talk about discipline, which is a hidden signal that this government wants interest rates to go up again.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if the government will not come to its senses and prevent the GST from receiving Royal Assent today, when will the minister at least table the amendments the government is suggesting to lessen the impact of this tax? More specifically, when does he intend to lessen the impact of this tax by exempting books and periodicals?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has covered a great deal of ground with his question. I suppose if I took the trouble to respond to every single point, hon. members would think I was taking far too long.

He says that we want interest rates to go up. That is entirely false. We want interest rates to go down. This is necessary and essential for our industry, for our economy and for all Canadians. We want interest rates to go down but we also want them to stay down. With an overly generous money supply policy, inflation might resume, and in fact today, according to the latest reports, the Consumer Price Index has gone up from 4.8 per cent to 5 per cent. So we must maintain a policy of consistently and constantly monitoring these movements.

As for the GST, the Leader of the Opposition refers only to certain aspects. In fact, he zeroed in on one particular aspect. However, the GST will also have extremely positive effects on the economy, something the opposition has never acknowledged, which includes removing the burden of a disastrous tax that has prevented our small businesses from being competitive.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This morning in St. John's, Newfoundland, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans abdicated his responsibility for the fisheries in Canada. He ignored the Harris report and the Dunn report which called for cuts in total allowable catch to conserve and preserve fish stocks for future generations. He set a three-year quota that is too high. He ignored the total collapse of the cod stock in the gulf region. He indicated absolutely nothing would be done to stop the continued overfishing by European fleets off Canada's 200-mile limit.

I want to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Given that cuts are continuing in Canada, given that thousands of fishermen and plant workers are being displaced by low catches, stocks that are absolutely shattered, why is Canada accepting the fact that the Europeans who caught 70,000 metric tonnes of fish last year, far too much fish, are announcing that they are going to catch 70,000 metric tonnes this year in the face of our conservation measures? Will the minister redirect some of his Rambo-like tendencies to the Europeans and save our fish?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we do not accept that practice by the Europeans, not at all. We are very disappointed at the recommendations of quota levels that have come from the technical committee of the community, and it is coming before commissioners of the European Community.

We are intervening with those commissioners directly to indicate to them that not only would those higher quotas recommended by the committee not be in the interests of fishing anywhere because of their effects upon depleting stocks, but neither would they be consistent with the tone of the discussions that have occurred between Canadian ministers and representatives of the European Community over the last several months.

We are making those representations now, and we hope to be able to have some success in causing the European Community to recognize that not only do they have a bilateral obligation to Canada, they have an overriding obligation to ensure that their practices do not destroy basic fish stocks which are of fundamental importance to us, and indeed of interest to them.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, in the last six years thousands of fishing families have been displaced. Thousands of fishing families have had their livelihood, their homes, and their communities shattered. For six years we have heard the same buzz words: disappointed, intervening, can't understand it, nasty, naughty tone, diplomacy. For six years nothing has happened.

Whether or not the destruction of the cod stocks on the east coast of Canada is a national issue, it is a question of Canadian sovereignty and is in the national interest. Will the nation respond to preserve the fishing communities of eastern Canada and respond now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, of course it is a national responsibility and a matter of profound national concern.

The member asked me a question as to whether it is a matter of national concern. I told him it was. He then said the answer to the specific question he asked is something he knows already. If he knows it already, why does he detain the House of Commons asking questions, the answers to which he already knows?

Mr. Tobin: What are you going to do, Joe?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): With regard to what we are going to continue to do, I have just told the hon. member who is perhaps more interested in making a dramatic Rambo-like case on the floor of the House than he is in having a resolution to this problem—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I have just told the him that what we are going to do is make it very clear to the commissioners of the European Community that the recommendations they have received with respect to quotas are not acceptable to Canada and are not consistent with the representations that they have given to us in meetings between Canadian ministers and commissioners of the European Community.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Once again we have seen the inflation rate go up. Consumers are now going to be hit with a 7 per cent tax on everything from books to funerals to hamburgers, whatever Canadians are going to buy or whatever service they are going to get, because this government insisted on ramming through a tax at the worst time in our economic history caused by policies of this government.

What the government has said is that the inflation rate will go up by 1.3 per cent. The minister said that this can be fitted in. Other economists say the inflation will go up from 3 per cent to 4 per cent. What this government's economic policies have done is create over a million unemployed in this country.

When will the government bring in some economic policies that will really address this difficult situation and get Canadians back to work instead of destroying the economy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, from time to time we hear in this House very conflicting views. When we explain to the hon. Leader of the NDP that interest rates are high because there are inflationary pressures, she rushes to tell us that it is not the case. When they are there, she wants us to reverse our policy.

We are intending to maintain the course of a sound economic policy because it has worked in the past. We are the party that has provided the highest rate of growth of jobs in Canada ever. We intend to continue this road of prosperity once we have settled the problem that arises from a transition to record growth from slower growth. We are doing that now, and I think that it is working. Interest rates are coming down, and I think this will help everybody.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak to the minister about contradictory messages. On the one hand, the government stands day after day and says that its main goal is to fight inflation. It has to keep those interest rates high that are killing businesses, killing farmers, making it impossible for consumers to buy anything. The government says: "Our main task is to fight inflation". Today it is asking for Royal Assent on a measure to ram through the GST, which is going to add to inflation, and it expects Canadians to buy it. Canadians are not stupid, Madam Speaker. The government also said that the manufacturers' sales tax was a silent killer of jobs. It seems to me the government has put the most noisy killer of jobs in place, the trade deal and the GST.

I want to ask the government how many more jobs does Canada have to lose before this government comes to its senses?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, one of the very great qualities of the GST is precisely that it helps businesses and helps create jobs. The hon. member does not seem to understand that we have presently built into the cost of all our products in Canada a very destructive tax, the federal sales tax, which makes it so that a huge country like Canada, with a small population, which needs to export more than anybody else, is the only clumsy country that maintains this system. We are changing it to allow all of our businesses and our companies to compete, both at home and outside. This is a modern reform and this is the bill which will receive Royal sanction today.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I presume that this is the same modern reform that has cost 165,000 Canadians their jobs since the trade deal came in.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, hundreds of thousands of businesses did not register for the GST; hundreds of thousands of businesses did not buy the material they need to comply with the Bill. Business is not ready and neither is the government. The government is still working on the regulations concerning the GST.

There is confusion everywhere. My question is this: What will the government do to put an end to that confusion?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, if there is any confusion anywhere, it is between the ears of the hon. member who just asked the question. I repeat what I said in answer to an earlier question, and that is that close to one million businesses have already registered and prepared.

Let me quote a Deloitte-Touche independent study done on the retail sector over a month ago. The majority of the retail sector is comprised of small businesses. According to the independent Deloitte-Touche study, 60 per cent supported the GST in the retail sector, 89 per cent understood the legislation and 82 per cent had prepared, at that time, for the implementation of the GST on January 1.

It is true that there are still between 100,000 to 300,000 businesses which have yet to register. We have an outreach program, a pro-active program, that is reaching out to those businesses in a fair, tolerant and co-operative manner. We will be working, not against those businesses but beside them, to make the system as easy, as beneficial, and as simple for them to comply with as possible.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister will have other occasions to answer the same question.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it follows along the line of questioning of my colleague, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, to which the minister said that we are going to do nothing more than we have done, for the last six years, and that is whining and complaining to the Europeans. When is the government going to show some guts? When is it going to impose Canadian quotas that adequately reflect conservation measures? When is it going to follow the advice of its own officials and set Canadian quotas that are meaningful, to preserve the most important resource that we have?

Second, when are we going to show some guts with the Europeans? If the minister wants to know what to do, he should answer this question: why does the minister not now unilaterally extend jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, because we are the only coastal state in the world that does not have jurisdiction to the end of our continental shelf? Will the minister do that?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as you know and as my colleagues know, the minister is in the maritimes today to announce the new multi-year program which will set the levels of groundfish that will be harvested in the region. The minister has struck—I think he is announcing it even as we speak—a balance that is responsible and proper considering the conservation needs and the economic imperatives in the region.

The minister will be back in the House on Monday to answer all of the questions on the details of the plan that he has announced.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): My supplementary, Madam Speaker, is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. There is one member of cabinet who has some compassion, some knowledge and some understanding in this House.

I want to ask her this. The question is very clear. The Government of Canada allows Europeans to overfish the cod stocks. The Europeans are allowed to fish outside the 200-mile limit and inside the 200-mile limit. The Government of Canada refuses, on the other hand, to give native co-ops and aboriginal people on the coast of Labrador access to northern cod in spite of the fact that the minister's own industrial adjustment committee recommended that this is the only alternative to preserve the jobs in those plants. Will the minister demand of the Minister of Fisheries that he accede to the recommendation of her own industrial adjustment committee and allocate a supply of northern cod to native aboriginal co-ops on the coast of Labrador? Will she do that?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, certainly the report from the IAS committee on the coastal problems in Labrador is something that we take very seriously in our department. We are always careful to accommodate the recommendations as far as we can.

I have been working closely with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on a package of measures that we hope will help people on the coast of Newfoundland and in other areas. I am always prepared to discuss with him potential solutions that are raised by the hon. member and I am certainly prepared to do so again.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I am hoping that she has something new to report today in the David Milgaard case. This case has been dragging on and on and on. People are frustrated, nerves are on edge. I do not know whether the minister is aware of it, but Milgaard himself is taking it very hard. He has spent many days in recent weeks in prison hospital.

Is the minister aware of this? Is she aware of the frustration? I want to know whether the Minister of Justice can give us a report today.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, no I cannot.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I am very disappointed. It is typical of this minister's stonewalling. I want to make it very clear to this House. This minister has said over and over that if the Milgaard family would only stop giving new information and new arguments, her department could come to a decision. She knows very well that the Milgaard family has not provided any new information, any new arguments since summer. She does not have an excuse. It is time for her to make a decision.

I want to know from this minister. Give us a commitment, give us a promise as to when she is going to face her responsibility and make a decision.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, it is regrettably the case than when the hon. member rises in this House he creates no traffic jam on the high road.

I take my responsibilities to review cases under section 690 of the Criminal Code with great seriousness.

Mr. Harvard: How many years?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member knows that I have never made the statement that he attributes to me.

Mr. Harvard: You have made it many times.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harvard: You are the minister of excuses.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member was offered the courtesy of being listened to. I would say that the hon. minister deserves the same. The hon. minister has the floor.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I have never made the statements the hon. member attributes to me, on the contrary. First of all I have never made reference to information put forward by the Milgaard family. I have referred to Mr. Milgaard's counsel who has carried the case.

• (1140 )

I have indicated on a number of occasions in this House that I am not prepared to see the case dealt with until Mr. Milgaard's counsel has, in fact, had the opportunity to bring forward as many submissions as he wishes to.

Over and over in this House, I have said that that is the policy of the department. I am advised by Mr. Milgaard's counsel that they have completed their submissions. The last interaction between Mr. Milgaard's counsel and the Department of Justice was a discussion on October 1 of this year.

The case is complex, and the advisory process is continuing. When it is complete, I will exercise my very serious responsibility under section 690 of the Criminal Code and make a decision based on the highest principles of justice and fairness.

I believe that is what I owe to all parties concerned, and most particularly to the system of justice in Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, last week the CBC shut down its local broadcasting in Windsor. This week, as this memo from the Ontario Minister of the Environment indicates, CBC staff is discussing moving PCBs from Toronto to store at that Windsor TV site.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: My question is to the Minister of the Environment. Will he see to it that the Windsor TV is not turned into a PCB storage site at the very time the community is working as hard as it possibly can to get government to recognize the need for local broadcasting once more in our community?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague knows full well our commitment to eliminate all federal controlled PCBs by 1996. I will be happy to look into this specific case and give him a very specific answer in the next few days.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, this is a case of adding dangerous insult to the massive injury which has already taken place in my community.

What I want to suggest to the minister is that this memo says very clearly that complaints have already been made. "The Windsor office of Environment Ontario was told by Environment Canada that any requests for improvements to the site would not be enforced. They laughed at us".

I want to ask the Minister of the Environment how he can possibly justify an attitude like that on the part of the federal Ministry of the Environment to complaints, concerns and statements that have been made by the provincial ministry of the environment in my city of Windsor? What is he going to do to protect our TV station for the future?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, perhaps with a little less emotion, I would like to answer my colleague and say that I have already undertaken to look into this specific case very directly and answer him.

If he has any written material that I would benefit from, I would appreciate getting it from him.

PENSIONS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Today, a group of former wives of armed forces personnel gave up on getting any justice out of this government. They are going to court to stop the injustice of military spouses of 30 to 35 years getting no pension at all and even being deemed to be dead, thereby denying them a pension.

Is taking the government to court the only way these women can get justice? Is this the only way they can get the government to admit that separated women are not dead?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would tell the hon. member that this is a question that we are presently looking at.

We are looking at it very actively. We are working on the over–all problem of superannuation. These aspects are also included in it, and I am sure that fairly soon we will be able to report to her about it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, five years ago the government forced private pension plans to conform with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but it refuses the same justice for its own employees.

Thousands of women live in poverty because since 1984 the government has sat on this legislation and given Treasury Board absolute discretion over whether or not women get a pension.

Will the minister stop this farce now and, with the full and speedy co–operation of the Liberal Party, will he bring in a bill that gives fair pensions to these women in time for Christmas?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. lady has raised a very serious issue and she knows that this government cares about that. She knows that I care about that and I am working on a particular government action with regard to this.

Since I have arrived at Treasury Board, I have made many gestures to indicate to her that I usually deliver on what I promise. I will come forward with some plan of action from the government on that particular aspect fairly soon, in the new year.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Revenue.

On October 29, I asked the minister about his department's practice of reassessing the disability deduction of disabled Canadians. Not only are these disabled Canadians being told they no longer apply for the disability deduction, but the government is asking them to repay the amounts they have already been granted, plus interest. Surely, the minister has to agree that this is a barbaric practice. I have written to the minister and have talked to him about this.

Can the minister now tell us what he is going to do to stop this vicious practice against disabled Canadians?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, it is true that the hon. member and I have had discussions on this matter. It is true, as well, that I have looked into the matter and have asked my officials to study it as clearly as they possibly could.

It is also true, to confirm what I told the hon. member on the floor of the House last month, I believe, that the policy, in as far as Revenue Canada is concerned in this respect, has not changed from the previous policy which even the former government, of which he was a member, operated under at that time. It is the same policy today as it was in the past.

Having said that, we are in the process of reviewing the situation to try to see how more compassionate we can be with the reassessment procedure because we want to take every possible step and effort to be as fair and compassionate with disabled people as with any other Canadians across the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, with due respect to the minister, there have been changes in this practice. The department is canceling this disability deduction without even giving these people the benefit of the medical examination.

Surely the minister can also see the stress that he is causing to these people with disabilities when they have to worry about paying this money back to the government, money which the government had approved to them in the first place.

Why is the government persecuting these people? These people deserve to be treated as more than just a file.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I do not accept for a moment that we are persecuting these people or any other people across the country through the tax system.

It is also not correct on the hon. member's part to say that there are no medical examinations in the reassessment. In fact, there are medical examinations that take place by professional MDs, approved by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

As a result of the hon. member bringing this matter to my attention, previously and today, I repeat what I have just finished saying. That is, I have directed my officials to look into the situation to try to improve a system that has been place for a very long time, even under the leadership of the government which the hon. member represented.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the acting Minister of Finance, who knows that medical services are exempt under the GST, but that medical practitioners have to pay GST on approximately half of their business input costs. Under the GST, medical practitioners are not able to claim a rebate of those input costs, nor in most cases are they able to pass on the incremental costs.

• (1150)

Now that the nonsense in the other place is over, will the minister examine this situation and will he consider reviewing it insofar as to allow medical practitioners to claim a rebate of the tax paid on the input costs in their medical practices?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I would like to remind him and the House that physicians currently pay a very substantial amount of direct federal sales tax on office equipment and supplies, such as computers, office furniture, medical equipment and telecommunication services. These taxes will be removed.

The government's objective in developing its policy in the health care field was to ensure that Canadians do not pay GST on basic medical services. This objective is met in Bill C–62. There is no GST on services of physicians, hospital care, and prescribed medical devices. So, they will not pay GST on their inputs, as they are presently paying the FST now.

THE SENATE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question concluded with an interesting concept that suggested that the nonsense was over in the other place.

My supplementary question is this: Will the government, now that the GST is through, finally bring in a motion to finally abolish the Senate?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I suppose part of the question, Madam Speaker, is whether, with the best will in the world, one can protect the Senate against the grotesque behaviour by some of its members, particularly on the Liberal side last night.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister, the former Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister-in-waiting.

The current office-holder of the Prime Minister's Office made the statement three years ago that there would be massive adjustments available to those who lost jobs through the free trade agreement. He then appointed the deGrandpré commission that recommended a $3 billion budget be established for readjustment payments and training for those workers.

One hundred and sixty-five thousand workers have lost their jobs. They are now facing a very bleak Christmas. Three years have gone by.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell me what the government intends to do to make good the promise that the Prime Minister made to provide retraining and assistance to those people who were replaced in those jobs?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am amazed at the question because the hon. member and his party did not support the $800 million that we are putting into retraining under Bill C-21. That is exactly what it is directed at, regardless of whether or not the need for training comes from free trade.

Training is a high priority with workers. It is a high priority with employers in Canada as they look to globalization of trade in the future. It is something that we are taking a lead on with business and with labour in terms of the programs that are being put into place.

I think the hon. member should be congratulating us on the kinds of breakthroughs that we have established for training in the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I would thank the new Acting Prime Minister for her answer. The reality is that no such transfer payments took place. As a matter of fact, the $800 million the minister speaks about was taken from other programs. No new $3 billion was created and, furthermore, $3 billion was cut from unemployment insurance by the government.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Barrett: It is a bleak Christmas for those people.

Is it Scrooge over there, or is it a sense of fairness? What is the government going to do for those people this Christmas who have had their lives ruined by the free trade agreement and the fact that it has not kept its promise? Fess up and do something for those people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I had the unfortunate experience of living in British Columbia while the hon. member was premier.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. McDougall: Let me just tell you what we have done for the economy and the prospects for the workforce in that province.

We have added by way of our new programming additional programming for Community Futures, additional programming for the long-term unemployed, additional programming for older workers and additional programming for social assistance recipients. Just hang on to your hat, Madam Speaker, and watch it all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HARBOURFRONT CORPORATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Public Works did not provide satisfactory answers to questions posed by the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence and the hon. member for York Centre.

I remind the same minister that the councillors of the City of Toronto have made it very clear that leasing the land versus selling it would make Harbourfront self-sustaining and still provide the benefits for the taxpayers who own it.

Why is the minister abandoning the people of Toronto in favour of the developers, when these same people are the hardest hit by the recession, which I might add is caused by his own government?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I welcome this question because at least it is not prefaced by the kinds of wildly inaccurate figures that were put on record in the House yesterday.

As my colleague knows, this particular concept for Harbourfront was, in effect, interrupted a year ago by the then Liberal government of Ontario. Since that time there have been negotiations that have been looked upon with great favour by Duncan Allan, who at that time was acting for David Peterson, and by the mayor of Toronto.

Any of these disputes involving the values of property, or the concepts of leasing can very well be provided for the hon. member, but I should remind him that the object of this is to give the waterfront back to the people of Toronto, to fund proper programs, and to do it in a far more business-like and expeditious way than was formerly possible.

I suggest to him as well that nothing has been abandoned. Nothing has been perverted or anything else. If he wishes more information, I would be glad to give it to him. So would other people who could provide him with the kind of detail that he obviously needs.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): The minister is still skating around the real issue which is the swap scandal of the land. My supplementary question is to the same minister.

On Wednesday in the House, I asked the Minister of the Environment what his so-called green plan was going to do to clean up the Toronto beaches. The minister did not give me an answer.

Will the Minister of Public Works reconsider this Harbourfront land swap scandal, recommended by the Tory hand-picked liquidator, Darcy McKeough, and commit instead that $36.4 million to clean up our Toronto beaches?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): What Mr. Darcy McKeough, a very distinguished Ontarian, did was largely to ratify and to modify to some extent, what the Liberal government of Ontario then recommended, as well as agree with David Crombie, another expert in this area.

There is no scandal. There are no difficulties. The figures that were put on the record yesterday by some of his colleagues are completely inaccurate, as anyone can understand if they would just take time to look at it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. He is aware, I am sure, that in dealing with matters of the environment we can no longer afford to say that this is a provincial matter or that this is a municipal matter. We are all in this together.

The minister knows that a good deal of the pollution in our water systems is caused by the inadequate treatment of sewage from municipalities.

How much of the $3 billion provided in the green plan over the next five years will be available to municipalities? How much will there be to help them improve sewage treatment facilities which are among the main causes of the deterioration of our water quality in Canada? How much?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first, we have a significant amount of money to provide for better water and sewage treatment under federal jurisdiction on native reserves. With respect to the municipalities, I believe the municipalities are creatures of the provinces. We want to respect the jurisdictional lines. We will certainly encourage the municipalities and the provinces to do the job they have to do on their side.

• (1200)

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Agriculture, but I will direct it to the Minister of the Environment.

A serious problem exists in southern Ontario along the Sydenham River basin which drains over half a million acres of the best farmland in North America, while thousands of tonnes of agricultural chemicals and fertilizers violate the Sydenham every year.

Will the Minister of the Environment consider as part of the green plan the $3 million commitment the Deputy Prime Minister made to this project when he visited my riding in 1988?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the problem that my colleague opposite raises is a problem that exists in many communities across this country. We are already undertaking discussions with farm organizations. We want to get to the root of it. We want to make sure that farmers throughout the country will be able to participate fully in dealing with environmental problems that we know of through that kind of situation.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. Last week the government announced a program on northern tax benefits. As a result of that program, some communities which have no road access whatsoever are not even going to receive the 50 per cent northern tax benefit.

I again ask the government: Will it allow an appeal process for those communities that have been affected by the government decision to ensure that it is not just a decision by bureaucrats and by the cabinet, but that it does allow public participation so those communities can make their case and explain why they deserve a northern tax benefit?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I think we understand well the preoccupation of the hon. member, Madam Speaker. The decision we have taken comes at the end of a long process where there has been a lot of consultation throughout by experts. We will stand by our decision.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege. I see someone else rising now, but I have not received notice of it. I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

PRIVILEGE

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING PERSIAN GULF

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to raise a question of privilege which again goes to the fundamental right of Parliament to be the first court of public information from this government.

On Monday, during the course of the proceedings in the standing committee on external affairs, the minister mentioned that he had submitted a letter to the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Baker, containing various proposals on behalf of the Canadian government. At that time I specifically requested of the minister that he would table the report and make it public, so we knew exactly what would be in the report and we could respond at the committee and in Parliament. The minister categorically refused.

On Wednesday night it was drawn to my attention that during a CBC report, the contents of that letter had been given to a CBC reporter who had enumerated point by point the contents of that letter. Once again, it was clear that the government considers it more important to give its information to a CBC reporter than to members of Parliament.

I consider that to be a real derogation of the rights of Parliament and it is indicative of the general disdain with which the government holds this House.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, on that alleged question of privilege, the hon. member is alleging that there has been the publication of a letter which has not been published. It has not been published to the committee. It has not been published to him. It has not been published to anyone.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It was given to a CBC reporter.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It was not. The hon. member is making an accusation that I categorically deny. It is false.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Who's the leak in your office?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I understand, Madam Speaker, that when the Liberal Party has no policy, as it has no policy either on the gulf or on support for the United Nations, then it has to indulge in this kind of misleading position in the House of Commons.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You know what our policy is. Our policy is against your policy, that is what it is.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): There we are, Madam Speaker. He and this party of great principle say their policy is against our policy.

Our policy is in support of the United Nations. The Liberal Party says—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened very carefully to the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. This obviously arises from the work of the committee. It is my understanding that there was no formal motion made in committee for that document to be made available.

I think the hon. member would have another avenue if he wants to pursue that line of thought rather than make it a question of privilege, which I do not think it is at this moment.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, just a few minutes ago in Question Period, we heard the Minister of Public Works refer to figures introduced by myself in the House yesterday as being wildly exaggerated and completely unfounded.

For the instruction of this House, I want to give an indication of just where those figures came from. They came directly from a report made by the Harbourfront Corporation, which is directly responsible to the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is very difficult for me at this time to let the hon. member go on.

It is not a question of privilege, but a question of debate.

An hon. member: It is not debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: For one member to say he or she does not agree with another member's statement is not something very uncommon in this House.

I do not think that members' privileges are abused any time one member disagrees with another. I do not see it as a question of privilege at this time.

I will hear the hon. member further if he has something else to bring forward.

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I feel that my privileges were abused inasmuch as I gave very specific references yesterday. I even cited a source. Today, I was told that they were in fact lies. They are not such. They come from an appraisal by an independent source, funded by government finances.

If the minister will just take a look at the board, the corporation that is responsible to him, he will see the same sources and come and give this Parliament the facts that we need to have.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): On the same point, Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has made a very clear reference.

The issue at stake here is germane to the entire debate. The minister of the Crown can take time away from the House to allege that the hon. member is incorrect, and is using false figures on a very important issue.

I think it is germane to the debate we are talking about. I believe that there is a case here of privilege.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that at least the hon. member should be able to have a "late show" on it to debate the issue.

I would suggest that today he be at least allowed to bring that point into debate or to use the "late show" as soon as possible.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think what is happening now is what we call a dispute as to facts. I do not think there is really a question of privilege.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—PRESENTATION OF EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the Eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[English]

The eighth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is one of major historic significance to the House of Commons for it is the first time in parliamentary history, since the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in August 1989, that the Public Accounts Committee has considered and concluded on the denial of access to information by the government to the office of the Auditor General.

The Public Accounts Committee considers the denial of access to ministerial travel receipts by the government to the office of the Auditor General to be a most serious infringement of the rights of the Auditor General as it in effect limits the Auditor General's ability to fulfil his statutory responsibility under the Auditor General Act. Such a denial of access to information, in your committee's view, undermines and weakens the financial process by which the House of Commons can hold ministers accountable for their travel expenditures, sets a very untimely and dangerous precedent and erodes Parliament's control of the public purse.

Madam Speaker, the Public Accounts Committee strongly supports the principle of audit as a critical function in the parliamentary accountability process. For, without audit, how can members of Parliament be assured that all expenditures by ministers are spent in accordance with parliamentary authority? Your committee, Madam Speaker, recommends that the government consider allowing the Auditor General of Canada access to ministerial travel documents to the extent that he can discharge his statutory duties by means of an authority and attest audit of the accounts of Canada under the Auditor General Act.

I want to thank all members of the Public Accounts Committee of this House for their constructive and forthright input relating to this report. Madam Speaker, your committee has requested a response in writing from the President of the Treasury Board by March 31, 1991.

BILL C-260—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement), with amendment.

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the members of that committee, who acted with such alacrity and dispatch. We had our organizing meeting just three days ago and were able to move this right through to report today.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present two petitions, signed by residents of the city of Toronto. Both of these petitions have numerous signatures and concern the goods and services tax and the unfair, unjust, and really quite wicked application of that tax to books and to the printed word.

Canada is going to become one of the very few countries in the world that taxes the printed word in this way, if this particular bill receives Royal Assent, and I note that it passed, lamentably, in the Senate last evening. I know, in presenting this petition, that it calls upon Parliament to reject this bill. Parliament has three constituent parts: this House, the other place, and the Governor General.

I urge the government to advise His Excellency, the Governor General, to refuse to give Royal Assent to this bill so that the wishes of these petitioners could be complied with in that regard.

FISHERIES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition to this House.

This petition deals with the issue of drift-net fishing in the Pacific. It draws attention to the real ecological disaster that is occurring in the Pacific with drift-net fishing, particularly from Japanese, Korean and Taiwanese fishing fleets.

It calls on the government to use every possible measure to deal with this disaster including, if necessary, economic sanctions against the countries that are offending.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise once again and it is with a sad heart. After thousands and thousands of petitions this government has refused to listen to people who feel that their democratic, cultural, educational and literary skills are being impacted negatively by the goods and services tax. I would implore you to call upon the Governor General to refuse to agree to the goods and services tax on books.

The people of Halifax and across this land from as far as the Vancouver Island call on this government to reconsider a very negative and hurtful tax on the literacy of this society.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition protesting the tax on books. The government should reconsider its intention to tax books, especially during this International Year of Literacy.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to lay upon the table four petitions from people as far away as Kentville, Halifax, Dartmouth, Truro, Tatamagouche, and other communities throughout the province of Nova Scotia.

All petitioners, in view of what took place yesterday in the upper chamber, call upon the Government of Canada to advise His Excellency the Governor General to withdraw the provisions of the goods and services tax, in particular as it applies to books, newspapers and magazines.

It should be duly noted that this tax, if proceeded with on January 1, 1991, will have extreme negative effects on Canadian consumers across the country as well as on small and medium sized-business.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of some concerned Canadian citizens.

I would like to make specific reference to the publishing industry in the north which is aggrieved about the GST being imposed. It has made a valiant effort in developing an industry in publishing using northern authors and settings. Now that is going to be threatened with the 7 per cent GST, because it already operates under a very high overhead.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition on behalf of Canadians to exempt the books from tax.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Question No. 393 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 393 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Question No. 393—Mr. McGuire:

Return tabled.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weiner that Bill C–63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Vancouver East has 15 minutes remaining.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before Question Period I was speaking about the Japanese redress and paying tribute particularly to the National Association of Japanese Canadians.

The race relations foundation, as we know, will have $24 million committed as capital for an endowment fund. I am sure it will be very short of funds, particularly for initial operation, even though there will be some start–up funds transferred from the race relations directorate.

• (1220 )

We are very concerned that these funds may be far too limited to do an effective job. New Democrats support the establishment of a race relations foundation and therefore we must support this bill even though we are very disappointed that our amendments to strengthen the bill were not accepted.

We worked very hard on these in committee and I will not take time to repeat the details. The political rigidity of the minister is very disappointing to us and I am sure to groups across the country. The main purpose and thrust of the bill must be to eliminate racism. We do not want a passive research centre located in some ivory tower in the middle of downtown Toronto that is going to be inaccessible to native people and others across this country who are the victims of discrimination and racism.

We also feel that the foundation should be based on sound analysis. It should not just document examples and put out educational materials. It must analyse the causes of racism in order to develop and recommend positive strategies to eliminate discrimination, to change attitudes in our society, and to help create improved legislation that will ensure equal opportunities for all Canadians.

We also hope very much that the government will take steps before the foundation is established to deal with the question of redress for Chinese Canadians regarding discriminatory legislation in the past such as the Chinese head tax and the Exclusion Act. We would like to see this done before the remaining elderly survivors leave us.

We deplore the escalating racism in our society and have spoken many times against these acts. I will mention just a few: the racism in our justice system and law enforcement agencies which lead particularly to injustices against native people, and the systemic discrimination that still exists in our own Public Service exemplified by the cases of Dr. Ben–Tahir, Dr. Chander Grover and others.

Canadians were sickened last summer by the over–racist attitudes when effigies of native people were burned. We saw this on television and also saw people throwing stones at native women, children and elders.

For 200 years black people in Nova Scotia have lacked equal opportunities. In B.C. there is a chronic outcry against Asian immigrants. Racist fears are often fanned by media stereotyping.

This government inflamed racism across the country by refusing for many months to change policies to allow Sikhs who join the RCMP to wear turbans, until it was finally forced to do so as a result of the charter.

I can cite many more examples but unfortunately there is not time. There are many examples in our history and these we must not forget. I hope the foundation would document these so that school children and all other Canadians will be much less complacent and more aware of the need for positive intercultural relations and the elimination of racism.

There is no question that we need a race relations foundation, but it must be a catalyst for change. It must promote better understanding of where the problems exist. It must put pressure on the government to improve legislation such as the employment equity bill which should be mandatory. It must challenge racist attitudes and stereotypes in society and promote positive intercultural relations.

We have a number of concerns which I would like to recommend to the new board of the foundation and the staff it hires. We hope that this new board will be accountable to the community and regret that it was not structured to always ensure that.

The foundation must be accessible to users to be effective.

We oppose Toronto as a location because it is too isolated from other parts of Canada. Also because, being probably the most multicultural community in Canada, there are probably many resources there. It would be nice to have a centre in all parts of Canada including Toronto.

However, that is where it is going to be. We must recommend strongly to the foundation that it operate in a decentralized way with an outpost in the Atlantic region; in the prairies, particularly in Winnipeg so that it will have some relevance for aboriginal people; and in British Columbia where the concerns of Asian communities, in particular, are uppermost. French language services must be available, especially in Quebec.

Perhaps this kind of outreach can be done by hiring decentralized workers operating out of local facilities, but it must be done. We urge the foundation to consult all organizations concerned with racism and intercultural relations as a first step, in order to solicit their views and concerns, to determine their priorities, and to find out what they are doing.

We anticipate that some of the following urgent issues will require analysis in the beginning; analysis of the causes of racism and solutions that will be formulated and hopefully advocated by the foundation.

First, systemic racism and discrimination in government and public institutions, with solutions for more effective means to eliminate discrimination against visible minorities. Second we want racism and stereotyping in the media analysed, with solutions for changing attitudes and methods of reporting on the part of journalists and others to promote positive race relations.

We want discrimination in the justice system and law enforcement systems of Canada analysed, with solutions to change attitudes and practices of judges, police and even governments.

We want an analysis of organizations and movements, which we have seen on the increase in Canada, that promote hatred and racism, with solutions to curtail hate propaganda. We are pleased with yesterday's decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the Keegstra case.

Public myths and misinformation which promote discrimination regarding immigrants and immigration is another priority and requires, solutions to promote positive public education and change attitudes. I know there are many more concerns that we could list, and there will be very limited resources, as the minister himself has acknowledged, to deal with these effectively.

It is evident that one of the first priorities must be for all of us, including the government, to help to find new sources of funding to develop a computerized data base that will be essential to put out publications, and to make sure that they are serving all of Canada, not just metropolitan Toronto. I do not have anything against Toronto, but I would have loved to have seen this foundation in Vancouver, as I mentioned in committee.

The foundation must not be just a passive research centre. It must analyse the causes of racism and actively promote positive changes in governments and in our broader society. This is a very difficult thing. It is difficult to change attitudes. We must ensure that this foundation has the resources and the kind of staff and board that will really bring about changes that will allow all citizens of Canada to be treated equally and have the opportunity to work and live without discrimination. This is a very tall order. We know that more funding will be needed.

However, I do not want to extend the debate too long. In the interests of getting this bill through today we are just putting up one speaker. We have expressed many views on this in the past and will continue to work in any positive way we can to support an effective foundation.

We wish the foundation every success in this most important task of changing attitudes, eliminating racism and discrimination, and promoting positive intercultural relations in Canada.

• (1230 )

This is one of the very important tools we hope will help to make Canada a country that recognizes and treats all people equally, regardless of their race or country of origin.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too want to add my views with respect to this bill.

Having served on the legislative committee that deliberated the merits and demerits of the bill, I think it is appropriate for us to think for a moment about the kind of bill that we are going to put through this House.

I would like to concentrate on a couple of aspects of the bill itself. For one thing, we can accept the principle of having a race relations foundation. I do not think anybody in this House or elsewhere can be against this principle.

If we are going to be for something, we need the mechanisms, resources, accessibility and the means whereby we can at least achieve the objectives outlined in those principles. And so, what have we?

All of the witnesses before the committee said that this foundation cannot be allowed to be a passive resource centre. The only way to ensure that it would not be that would be to give the foundation, or at least its executive director—and I use the words of one of the witnesses—some sort of subpoena powers in order to ferret out information that would be appropriate for decision making.

As my colleagues have pointed out, it is absolutely useless to have a foundation that is going to gather information on race relations in one city and not in others, especially when all we are doing is collecting a library.

The University of Toronto, like many other universities throughout the country, already has vast resources of material available for the general public. We had witnesses who came from St. John's, Newfoundland as well as from as far west as Victoria, B.C. who have the same kind of resources.

All we are doing is allocating more of the passive research type of resources for a foundation. We are not giving any powers to this foundation or to its director to ferret out information that is important for integration and that relates, for example, to employment practices both in the public sector, which is extremely important if we are going to demonstrate leadership, and in the private sector, especially among the larger employers.

If we are not going to have access to that kind of information, how in heaven's name are we going to engage in the promotion of multicultural ethic and inter-racial harmony? If we do not have the material before us that would give us the opportunity to analyze the status at which we find the various levels of Canadian society, how can we make a decision on the appropriateness of any initiatives we might begin?

Once we begin, what do we do? Where do we go? Do we have any enforcement mechanisms? Do we have any monitoring mechanisms? Do we have any means whereby we analyze what is happening on jobs for job discrimination or social integration or for what is happening in the Public Service?

Have we found the means by which this foundation is going to do its very best to succeed where other policies have failed? Let me give just one example, Mr. Speaker. Under Secretary of State, there is already $7 million in the budget. I think those were the figures that were given to us by department officials before the committee. There was $7 million last year for race relations.

That sounds like an impressive figure. It is not an indifferent figure, but the foundation's total operating budget will come from a $24 million fund, at the very best. If the real rate of return is 11 per cent per annum, we are not going to get much more than $3 million per annum. However, we will not be able to take out 11 per cent.

The very best we are going to be able to take out is about 5 per cent, so we are looking at an operating budget of just over $1 million. What in heaven's name are we going to accomplish with $1 million in terms of race relations, harmony, co-operation and integration? If we are truly serious about doing something, how do we ensure that the 40 per cent of Canadians who do not have origins which are English or French are integrated into the other two mainstreams? We have to put money where our mouth is.

We have heard a lot of good philosophy about multiculturalism. We have heard a lot of good ideas about where we are going in this country. I notice I have awakened one of the members way off in the deep recesses of the corner and I am going to ask him a question or two concerning this debate as well, Mr. Speaker. He comes from a part of the country that, as the minister said earlier on in the day, is challenging the very principles that the minister enunciated as being germane and central to the government's philosophy or policy of multiculturalism.

If we truly believe in racial integration in a multicultural society, we might do better than we did last year in our public accounts where of the total amount of money spent on multicultural programs, running the whole gamut of heritage language, cultural programs and any other variety of recreational or social activities that do not fall under any other umbrella other than those that we would normally attribute to ethnoculturally different Canada.

How much money did we put into those activities? Well, I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. Of the total budget of Canada, a grand total of .076 per cent was spent on multiculturalism. We have a party developing in western Canada, the Reform Party. One plank of its platform is getting rid of multiculturalism because it costs too much.

What do we do as a Parliament, as a country, as a government? We stand in this House and say that we have to be sensitive to these kinds of movements and we have to respond. Then we cut the funds for multiculturalism which, as I said earlier, was .076 per cent of all money spent in Canada. It seems to be the target of all our cuts. As I said earlier on an amendment moved by a colleague, heritage language receives a grand total—I was generous and gave it a grand total of $21 million last year and we have received cuts. That $21 million as a percentage of all government expenditures is a mere .015 per cent.

But when the government had to cut the deficit, where did it go? It went to heritage language programs. When we come back into this House the government has the unmitigated gall, despite the very high-flown principles enunciated by my colleague the minister opposite, to say that it is doing something for multiculturalism, doing something to bring this country together again.

The Prime Minister said in the House yesterday that we have to heal the wounds that tear this country apart. How do we do that when we do not have the resources to heal those wounds? Well, if the resources and mechanisms are not provided, the opportunity to bring people together is lost. Do we have to create a fund that comes at the expense of other programs in the same area?

Mr. Speaker, those of us who want to have a more harmonious development of peoples look with great admiration at Secretary of State policies that said we were going to spend $226 million last year for the promotion of official languages, both English and French, throughout the country. It is an admirable effort. It means that the Government of Canada is really serious about turning this into a bilingual country. Those of us who make an effort to learn a second, third, or fourth language applaud these kinds of efforts because they are backed up by dollars. If we believe in something we should get behind it, put our resources behind it. If we do not believe in it, at least shut up.

That $226 million is a substantial amount of money. About nine million Canadians who would have access to a mere $21 million, which is the figure I gave a few moments ago with respect to heritage language programs, in order to maintain a sense of dignity and self-worth while they integrate themselves into the mainstream can hardly be impressed by the government's desire to cut and then establish a race relations foundation that has the same sort of high-flown principles without the basis and resources to carry them out.

I did not want to elaborate too much on it because it is important for us to understand that there are no resources behind this idea. It therefore remains simply an idea, something that is empty.

On the subject of emptiness, one can get absolutely enraged as a parliamentarian when one sees what is happening in Toronto at Harbourfront, for example. I have pointed out figures that come from a government appraisal of some of the land deals that have been swapped so that the government can privatize some cultural programs and some other activities. $36.4 million is going into the hands of three developers.

We could have done so much with that government money. Those are public funds that could have been put towards either heritage language or race relations. $36.4 million. We are scrounging around for a measly $24 million to establish a fund. One does not know whether to laugh or to cry at this initiative.

I had occasion to be in Vancouver and met with groups of people who were involved in racial integration on a daily basis. They do it through language. They do it through social and recreational activities. They bring people of different origins, from different linguistic groups, religious groups, racial groups together.

I do not know how it happened but they decided to finally get up the courage to protest the cuts in heritage languages. They gave me the petitions they had gathered, petitions that have been ruled completely out of order. But for those people who come from B.C., at least I can give them an indication that there are several thousand people who objected to those cuts and who felt there was no one to hear them.

If we are going to be talking about a race relations foundation, I think we would do well if we listened for a moment to our own rhetoric. We say, here is an institution that epitimizes the best in democracy. If we understand what we mean by democracy, it means little more than empowerment.

If we empower the citizens of this country to participate in the decisions of this government and Parliament, then we have to put resources behind it. Those resources are not there. Not only that, we do not even have the regulatory mechanisms to make this a viable foundation.

All of those people from those communities who want to be a vital and vibrant part of Canada and its mainstream regret the weaknesses in this bill.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved: that Bill C–72 be concurred in at the report stage.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. members: Now.

[English]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C–72, as amended, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have before us for third reading Bill C–72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission.

A little over a year ago, on November 24, 1989, during the Prime Minister's visit to the Soviet Union, he announced that the Canadian Polar Commission would be established. This announcement was made in recognition of the need in Canada for a more focused and integrated approach in order to maintain and improve polar knowledge.

The Prime Minister has continuously acted on his commitment to enhance Canada's role in the international forum. The establishment of the Canadian Polar Commission is a culmination of this leadership in advancing Canada's role in circumpolar and scientific affairs.

Based on a concern for the state of polar research in Canada, as well as the rapidly changing nature of polar science, two studies were commissioned by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The first, Canada and Polar Science, a report produced by an expert study group, was released in 1987. It strongly recommended the creation of a Canadian Polar Commission. A subsequent report released in 1988, The Shield of Achilles, by Professor Thomas Symons, studied the feasibility of establishing a commission and once again recommended its creation.

It is clear that a polar community as geographically dispersed and institutionally buried as Canada's requires a co–ordinated system to provide access to information on the Arctic and better serve the Canadian public.

The decision to create a Canadian Polar Commission was the result of extensive consultations and discussions with territorial governments, aboriginal people, private enterprise, research institutes and universities. It is very important to note that it had been their continued support and active involvement that has brought us to where we are to date in the establishment of this commission.

I would now like to highlight some of the specific purposes the commission will pursue that have been established. The commission will monitor the state of knowledge about the polar regions in Canada and elsewhere. In response to concerns raised by the legislative committee on Bill C–72, this term "knowledge" is now specifically defined to include traditional and aboriginal knowledge.

The Canadian Polar Commission will promote development of such knowledge by co–operating with organizations, institutions, and associations, both private and public, national and international, in the determination of scientific and other priorities.

The commission will also encourage Canadian organizations, institutions, and associations, both private and public, to support the development and dissemination of polar knowledge and it will provide information about polar research and Canadian organization.

Moreover, increased access to polar knowledge will, in accordance with Canada's foreign policy, enhance Canada's international profile as a circumpolar nation by fostering international co–operation and by increasing international attention on the Canadian Arctic. It will address such issues as resource development, legal and jurisdictional questions, security concerns, and global environmental problems including the greenhouse effect, the depletion of the ozone layer, and water and airborne contaminants in northern regions.

The commission is not intended to be a funding body for basic scientific research, nor is it expected to carry out such activity. The two reports I mentioned before strongly recommended against this since Canada already has such institutions.

• (1250 )

The creation of the Canadian Polar Commission will lead to the development of a comprehensive Canadian polar information system which will build upon and be linked to currently existing government, academic, and industrial scientific data, information and biographic systems. It will also be compatible with the international polar–related information systems.

The commission will provide support for the publication of studies on polar subjects, as well as recognize achievements and contributions in polar matters. It will initiate, sponsor, and support conferences, seminars, and meetings. In this way it will give prominence to scientific research and its application in Canada's polar regions.

During these times of fiscal responsibility, funding for scientific research obviously cannot be lavish. But the commission will bring a greater focus and efficiency to the diverse and dispersed Canadian polar research community and will link research efforts more effectively.

The Canadian Polar Commission will receive core government funding of approximately $1 million annually, but it will be encouraged to seek non-government support for its endeavours through cost-recovery initiatives, such as information services or by entering into contractual agreements to study particular polar problems and/or issues. The commission can also receive additional funding through donations and bequests.

The activities of the commission will be managed by a board of directors consisting of up to 12 members, including a chair person and two vice-chairpersons. It will be appointed by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and will serve term appointments of three years.

Persons appointed to the board of directors must have knowledge that will assist the commission in the furtherance of its purpose and membership will include northerners and will reflect the ethnic, linguistic, and regional diversities of Canada's polar region.

Amendments made by the legislative committee to clauses 13 and 14 of the bill allow the commission to establish such offices in Canada as the board considers necessary for the furtherance of the commission's purpose. Keeping in mind that the commission has a mandate to promote polar knowledge within federal ministries, national granting councils, and other national bodies, clause 14(1) stipulates that one office of the commission must be in the national capital region. To enable the commission to maintain close constant contact with the full spectrum of interests represented in the north, clause 14(2) stipulates that at least one other office must be established in a place north of 60 degrees north latitude.

Under clause 5 of the legislation, the commission can exercise powers to initiate a wide variety of activities to address its purpose.

The commission's legislative mandate will be primarily that of an advisory body. The commission will provide advice to the Canadian government at a senior level and will be responsible for periodically reviewing the needs and progress of polar research in Canada, for recommending steps to be taken by the federal government to improve the relevance and effectiveness of Canadian polar research, and for facilitating international and domestic liaison and co-operation in polar research.

It is expected that the commission will report on these matters to Parliament through the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The commission may, however, be asked from time to time to investigate specific problems or issues in the polar regions at the request of the government.

In conclusion, I would like to thank all the members of the legislative committee who worked together to improve Bill C-72, the legislation that is before us. I know that they share with me the sense of how important this commission will be and what it can achieve.

This bill is a significant step toward enhancing Canada's future as a northern and polar country, and as a leading member of the circumpolar community of nations. It also ensures that this commission will be dynamic and responsive to northern issues as they emerge.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker it is my pleasure to be able to speak to Bill C-72. I hope that, in years to come, Bill C-72 will be a reflection of what I see the Arctic as portraying.

Bill C-72 will perhaps express itself in the eventuality of having the Arctic as a peace zone and eventually having the development of a world-class centre for excellent environmental studies in the north and perhaps even the development of a university of the north where we could specialize in such things as cold weather climate technology.

With the creation of the polar commission, we could also work in the area of winter city studies and also further the efforts to date in the whole area of traditional knowledge.

Another area that will be expressed through the efforts of a polar commission would be cultural studies in the area of languages and the arts, which is very important to the people of the north.

As the member for the Western Arctic I am pleased to speak on this long awaited bill to establish a polar commission. In my previous work as assistant deputy minister to the Government of the Northwest Territories, I attended the first meetings to explore the idea of a polar commission. I had the opportunity to share with the people who were behind the establishment of a polar commission, Dr. Fred Roots and Dr. Symons.

Having said that, there have been efforts of many who will go unnoticed in an effort to establish a polar commission. I want to take the opportunity to say that their efforts are much appreciated, specifically people like Walter Slipckenko, who is responsible for circumpolar matter especially as it relates to the Soviet Union and their exchange.

Since I have become a member of Parliament and travelled extensively across the country, I have noticed that for most Canadians the Arctic remains an enigma. I have realized that knowledge and appreciation of the range of northern policy issues is limited to a small minority of Canadian public.

Over the past 30 years the Arctic has experienced substantial changes, many brought about by activities in foreign regions, including the foreign north. All of these activities are having increasing influences in the Canadian north. For example, there are resource exploration and industrial development in foreign circumpolar regions with their attendant environment disturbances and impacts; atmospheric and oceanic pollution, including climatic change because of world-wide pollution; the depletion of marine stocks; international social, economic, and political developments including greater native participation in government; and the formation of international native organizations, such as the Inuit Circumpolar Conference, the World Council of Indigenous People, and Indigenous Survival International.

Specifically, in looking at the developments taking place, Greenland, with its Home Rule and its devolution of powers, is having an effect on what is happening in other parts of the world. In Alaska, there is the implementation of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, the movement toward tribal sovereignty which affects native people throughout the world, the recent United States Arctic Science Policy initiatives, the International Porcupine Caribou Agreement, and the possible developments in the Arctic National Wildlife Range. In the Soviet Union, there is the offshore oil and gas development with the possibility of sales of offshore equipment, and there is air pollution occurring in a number of their large industrial centres. Of course, this air pollution is occurring all over the world.

Whether the issue is military, strategic, political-economic, environmental, or some combination of all these, new ways of thinking about the regions are required if national and international policies are to meet the gathering challenge of change.

International Arctic science co-operation extends back 100 years to the creation in 1879 of the International Polar Commission which led to the International Polar Year of 1882-83. Eleven nations, including all polar nations, sponsored 14 polar research expeditions. In 1932-33, the second International Geophysical Year was initiated, with scientific investigations in both polar regions. In 1958, the Scientific Committee on Antarctic Research was created as a scientific committee of the International Council of Scientific Union.

A series of different types of scientific activities with Arctic components have taken place which can be grouped under seven extended categories: first, large co-ordinated regional or circumpolar single programs, such as the polar segment of the International Magnetosphere study; second, Arctic components of complex and highly organized world-wide or global research programs, such as POLEX; third, scientifically focused wide-ranging programs to explore new concepts, gather data or compare phenomena such as the Arctic Ice Dynamics Joint Experiment conducted in the Beaufort Sea from 1969 to 1976; fourth, programs for collaboration by a number of researchers or agencies in one area or for taking advantage of an outstanding opportunity will benefit many others; fifth, studies that are so sophisticated and so expensive that no one country can provide the expertise or facilities so that international collaboration is essential, such as the Marginal Ice Zone Experiment and the Greenland Ice Sheet Program; sixth, programs designed to facilitate the sharing and exchange of experience and knowledge or to compare the results of similar studies, such as the 1984 Canada–U.S.S.R. Arctic Science Program; seventh, programs designed to combine data or information from several sources into a common format or synthesis that can be useful to many countries, such as the Bathometric Map of the Arctic Ocean produced in the General Bathometric Chart of the Oceans series.

I would like to go on to the whole issue of bilateral agreements. The initiative to develop a co–operative ethic with our northern allies began in earnest with Lester B. Pearson when he visited the Soviet Union as Secretary of State for External Affairs in October, 1955.

The following is a sequence of main developments concerned with Arctic co–operation with the Soviet Union. I think this is a particularly interesting area to go into in that it is reflective of what is happening these days. The walls between countries are coming down, the barriers are coming down both politically and in a sense from a defence perspective. I think it is interesting that here we have in a zone, which I hope one day will be a peace zone, a nuclear–free zone, that we are developing a polar commission that will express itself in a number of activities that will bring even more freedom and sharing among circumpolar allies.

Canada, prior to the 1989 agreement, was involved in three bilateral agreements with the Soviets dealing with environmental, cultural and scientific arrangements.

First, in 1983 the agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Denmark for co–operation relating to the marine environment which covers ships and offshore pollution under which research and other areas is possible was established. The second is the Canada–United States Agreement on Arctic Co–operation which generally agrees to facilitate navigation by ice–breakers in Arctic waters and which provides for the sharing of research information in order to enhance the understanding of the marine environment. The third is the Protocol of Canadian–Soviet Consultation on the development of a program of scientific and technical co–operation in the Arctic and in the north which was signed in 1984 and renegotiated on February 26, 1987, and which has become known as the Canada–U.S.S.R Arctic Science Exchange Program and provides for the development of a program of scientific and technical co–operation in the Arctic and in the north.

I would like to speak about the Canada–U.S.S.R. Arctic Science Exchange Program as I feel that it has demonstrated real northern co–operation between Canada and the Soviet Union. The Government of the Northwest Territories record of circumpolar relations dates back to the early 1970s.

At that time the head of the government, Steward Hodgson, went to Greenland and in 1971 to the Soviet Union with the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Jean Chrétien. Dick Hill, who founded the research lab in Inuvik and Walter Slipchenko, who is now Director of Circumpolar Affairs for the Government of the Northwest Territories, were also along. It was the start of what became a series of formal and informal exchanges between officials, local residents, and business people.

These exchanges have demonstrated to northerners that the people of circumpolar countries share common problems, be they social, economic, cultural, scientific or technical. On many occasions there is greater commonality or understanding between ourselves than northerners have with national central agencies in Ottawa.

This leads me to the discussion of Bill C–72 and the several points I want to review. The bill proposes that the headquarters of the Canadian Polar Commission be located in the nation's capital region and that one regional office be located north of the 60th parallel. When the Prime Minister announced the establishment of a commission last November in Moscow, he stated that one of the regional offices would be in Quebec City. I wholly support that in that I feel the headquarters should be located in the north. That was the amendment which we put forward and which was defeated. There is no reason why we should not have the polar commission located north of 60.

In a time when we have recession in full swing, in a time when we have the high overhead that we have, there is always the pull to withdraw regional offices first. What we need is a commitment to have this particular headquarters north of 60 in that it gives it the credibility that it is just not another Arctic club where the name polar is used but, in fact, it is out of its location. This was our objection and this was something about which we were sad because the government would not agree to have the headquarters actually north of 60.

My position is that polar issues should be studied in polar regions. I am extremely concerned that this may become one more Arctic club, none of which are based in the Arctic. The people I have consulted on this matter have told me, frankly, that we must avoid the general game of the old boys club and, if there is one thing I have learned since I have come to Ottawa, it is that you really have to put forward a strong case on a regional basis to be heard.

The north has the infrastructure to house the Canadian Polar Commission. There is a science institute in both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon and, as well, both territories have Arctic colleges. There are federal agencies in both northern capitals which manage the environment, fisheries, geological surveys, energy, mines, and resources. The GNWT is responsible for forestry, housing, public works, and construction in the Arctic. There are research labs in Inuvik, Igloolik, and Iqualuit. We have a consortium of experts in the scientific community in the north who have worked there for years and have contributed. I would guess that they are some of the outstanding scientific people in Canada and they would contribute to the polar commission. They would help us build those circumpolar alliances and that would bring down the walls even more for more freedom and sharing with our circumpolar neighbours.

There are so many possibilities in having the north being the centre for the Canadian Polar Commission, in which case the National Capital Region could locate one of the regional branches. It is about time this government started to break up the central bureaucracy and spread the resources around the country. The United States has focused its northern studies out of the University of Alaska, in the northern region. The Science City of the Soviet Union is in Siberia in Nora Sabers. Its Permafrost Research Centre is in the Yakuts region which is very remote.

The directors of the commission is another issue that we took to task and on which we put forward an amendment. We wanted 50 per cent of the directors to be from north of 60 if it is going to be a polar commission, and that was defeated. I do not believe that there was any tangible reason, any viable reason, for defeating that amendment. If you have a South American region or a South American institution, you get predominantly South Americans on the committee because they have the expertise and the knowledge. There are northern residents with doctorate degrees in geology, geography, and communications, and many who have tremendous experience with the polar land, the environment, and the polar peoples. We wanted those people on the commission but that was defeated. We wanted to have the highest lines of reporting to the government on this one.

In addition, the bill states that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will be responsible for the commission. Again, the people with whom I consulted agreed that there needs to be discussion on this point. Is an institute with global, external, and international responsibilities, best directed by a minister who does not participate in the inner cabinet? I believe, because of the circumpolar implications of this bill, that we need the absolute highest authority if it is to be recognized and be credible because it is going to be begging for international co-operation and recognition. We need the highest lines of authority to be expressed in whom this commission reports to.

The authority of the commission will be legitimate, depending on the budget allocated to it. If they are not the kind of allocations that are required, what you will have is a commission in name only, not in what it can actually do. We cannot depend on anything but legislative commitment, so we wanted that.

Never before has the need for Arctic co-operation been so pressing. Never before has the need to learn and to develop global solutions to Arctic problems been so great.

From an environmental perspective, to many Canadians the Arctic has always symbolized all that is good; clean water, clean air, majestic landscapes, an abundance of wildlife resources, fish stocks and a richness in underdeveloped mineral and petroleum resources.

Let me present you with a truer picture. In the early years, chicken pox, measles, the flu, and other European diseases imported to the Arctic by explorers just about decimated our northern population. Later on, it was starvation. Today, it is AIDS, Arctic contaminants, and trying to cope with the anxieties created by advanced cruise missile testing, low-level military exercise, the possibility of nuclear-powered submarines and the European boycott of trapped furs, the decimation of our traditional economy of hunting and trapping.

The true north strong and free? People in the Northwest Territories would like to think so. But maybe that is not the case anymore. Maybe the polar commission gives us a small door or window of opportunity to be able to achieve these goals to which we aspire. Maybe we can be the true north strong and free, and maybe the rest of Canada can help us with that, but only if they commit the resources and the political will in expressing exactly in those amendments we put forward to have 50 per cent of the membership of the commission being residents of north of 60, to have the headquarters located in the region and to give very, very specific concern and care to the fact that we want traditional knowledge to play a huge part in the polar commission.

Let me ask a few questions, Mr. Speaker. What if levels of airborne toxic chemicals carried to the Arctic from other areas of the northern hemisphere increase to the point where contamination of the northern food chain forces our population to abandon its traditional dependence on country foods? This is one way in which people manage their budgets in an area where the cost of living is 40 per cent higher than anywhere else in Canada. When all else fails, people go back to the land and hunt and trap. They supplement their diet with country foods. You cannot do this if the food chain is contaminated with pollution.

What if a cultural lifestyle that dates back one thousand years or more is destroyed by the anti-trapping movement? It has been. The trappers of the north will tell you that this is a tough year for trappers. Canadians will know that their commitments can only be expressed in a statement that I made years ago, that fur built this country. This is how this country was created.

What if the guidance system on the cruise missile breaks down shortly after being launched over the Beaufort Sea and it crashes on Main Street, Inuvik? That is a possibility. It has happened before. Trappers have found parts of satellites with contaminated elements in them in the Arctic areas.

What if the United States is asked to test a cruise missile along a corridor originating in northern Ontario and terminating a couple of hundred miles north of Ottawa? Would the decision to allow the tests have been the same?

What if you do not have freedom from anxieties? Is it still possible to have global peace and security? Can anyone out there relieve Arctic anxieties by explaining the probabilities, the technicalities and the scientific theories to a population that speaks eight different native languages, none of which have the appropriate word equivalences and a whole different psychology with which to deal?

There is a tendency to overlook the people who live there, to forget they have strong opinions and beliefs and an abundant capability of managing their own affairs.

The Northwest Territories is the homeland for a native majority that considers the land a sacred trust. That has been and always will be for the aboriginal people, and where any developments must take serious consideration of that reality.

Equally important, it is a place of residence for people who are determined to exercise control over their land. It is a home to people who want to decide their own political and constitutional futures rather than having them shaped by someone else in a distant national capital by other premiers and the Prime Minister at a First Ministers' Conference through such instruments as the Meech Lake Accord which definitely left us and our Yukon neighbours out of the process, even though we cover 40 per cent of the Canadian land mass.

It leads me to conclude that the time has come to make our voices heard in a manner that will prompt national and international political leadership to respond to the issue of Arctic peace and security referred to by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in Murmansk in October, 1987, when he proposed a conference of sub-arctic states to co-ordinate research in the Arctic, including co-operative arrangements in polar scientific, environmental and economic endeavours with Canada and other western countries.

At the same time he proposed that the Warsaw Pact and NATO begin consultations on scaling down militarization and restricting naval and air force activity in the Baltic, Greenland, Norwegian and North Seas. "Such actions", he said, "could lead to demilitarizing the top of the world", and, as I stated before, turn the Arctic into a zone of peace.

For these reasons I support the principle of Bill C–72. I believe, however, that we need to discuss the logistics, but I want to conclude with the essence of what makes the Polar Commission so important.

Arctic nations share many common problems which require research and scientific data from other regions. Arctic research is difficult and costly, but the results are vitally important nationally, internationally, and particularly to the northern people, the native people who are the majority. Arctic science requires the financial and scientific support, not only of polar but also of non–polar nations. Environmental and social concerns have emerged as among the most important Arctic issues today. Social and political developments in the Arctic regions have altered the demand for knowledge and exchange of information.

I feel strongly that this polar commission is a step forward, not only for science but for the northern people. I am certain that our circumpolar contacts will continue to increase because of the new commission.

I want to say, for Canada and for the people of the north, I hope that the Polar Commission will be a small window of opportunity to achieve peace and freedom and to bring down all those walls that obstruct us from dealing with each other as human beings.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on behalf of my party in support of Bill C–72, which would create the Canadian Polar Commission.

The structure of the legislation adheres rather closely to the recommendations of the previous studies which examine the feasibility of this commission, most particularly The Shield of Achilles.

One of the elements that interests me about that latter study by Dr. Symonds was that, in spite of the tendency to emphasize scientific knowledge with respect to the work of this commission, he is quite careful to point out that the breadth of knowledge that is to be treated by this commission should extend beyond the merely scientific. It should extend to include the kind of historic observations that the peoples of the north have made about the north, which give them a more powerful understanding of the north, even in scientific terms, than could be provided in a brief period of time of conventional scientific study.

In that context, I want to state my admiration for the picture that was developed by the hon. member for the Western Arctic. In her speech she provided an inkling of the kind of knowledge, sensitivity, and indeed love, for the delicate character of the north that few in the rest of the country have an opportunity to share, being preoccupied, as we are, with our own regions and our own preoccupations. The hon. member comes to her knowledge by virtue of her indigenous roots and the sense of historical context from which she derives.

It is equally possible that someone can leave an area, such as that in which I live, and come very quickly to the realization that the north is important. It offers a livelihood which is in balance historically with the environment, an environment that reflects a very delicate ecology, as the hon. member has pointed out an ecology that if it is to be respected is going to require the co–operation of all who share a circumpolar presence.

My leader is one who has adopted the north, or perhaps it would be preferable to say that the north has adopted her emotionally, psychologically, and in terms of her commitment. She shares with equal strength the commitment to this bill and to the north which it expresses.

The bill represents a response to opportunity and responsibility, opportunity that has been too long delayed in its exploitation, in a country that having a true north could have, as it could have done in so many other contexts, developed its own niche in terms of scientific and other kinds of research in the development of a broad scope of knowledge in an area of the world that not many other nations have an opportunity to examine; both in terms of the achievement of pure knowledge and in terms of finding the opportunities that are available in science and technology, in environmental management and so on, that could have provided us with leadership in respect to the rest of the world.

We have then another example of what has happened in Canada for too long. That is the failure to provide the kind of thrust and momentum in scientific research generally; scientific research that on the one hand can create jobs and can create economic growth, scientific research that shall demonstrate the limits of that kind of development, scientific research that would ensure the maintenance of the balance so delicately structured in the north, and knowledge that would allow us in the rest of Canada to have an opportunity to learn, so that when we think of Canada we are not thinking of a part of it but all of it.

The bill also responds to responsibility, responsibility that goes beyond our immediate opportunities and our immediate possession of a portion of the north, a responsibility that recognizes that as an ecosystem we do not govern it all, nor does anyone else, and that all who share a circumpolar existence must not compete for opportunities to exploit it at its expense, but must co–operate to enhance our knowledge of the north, to monitor the knowledge that has been created, to stimulate new science, and to ensure there is an appropriate diffusion of all the knowledge that can be gleaned from there so that all can share in it and protect that delicate, beautiful area of the world, even now threatened from great distances by even tiny amounts of pollutants that can be tolerated here but which can be so disturbing there.

By and large this is a good bill. It does what should have been done, and it does it reasonably well.

There are of course some concerns, and the member for the Western Arctic has cited those. We share in common our concern about the inevitable presumption that all that is good and has value somehow must derive from some portion of central Canada, in this case Ottawa, designated as the place of the principal office.

I cannot understand that. I cannot understand it in any other terms except the preoccupation as is too usual in this part of the nation, in this place, that if there is to be focus, if there is to be leadership, if there is supposed to be real understanding and co–ordination, that somehow it must be here.

I think it most regrettable that the government rejected amendments that would have provided the appropriate location of the principal office in the north. It is something that at least one office will be in the north. We must also be disturbed, although it was argued by the parliamentary secretary that in spite of a lack of specification there would be appropriate representation reflecting the population of the north on the board of directors. It seems to me that it would have been much more satisfying and symbolically significant if the government had accepted, as we tried to get it to accept, that a minimum of half of the board of directors should be from the north, but it ignored that.

There was the possibility of circumventing the problems of rejection of this amendment by ensuring that, as in other similar commissions and institutes, the structure of nominations to the board would have been such that all three parties would have had to approve the nominees, thus eliminating the unnecessary implication of partisan considerations and perhaps patronage in the appointments, and instead had an opportunity to ensure that there was going to be no compromise on appropriate representation on that board of directors.

That is all by the board now. We are going to have the polar commission. It is a significant step forward. It recognizes the need. It recognizes the realities that we must confront. So we cannot but join with the official opposition and the government in applauding this piece of legislation with which we will not burden too long a discussion because we want it completed today. That is our mission to say: "Let's get it done today as quickly as possible".

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be speaking on this third and final debate on Bill C–72, the Canadian Polar Commission Act.

The bill before us today is a little better than the bill that was introduced last June, as a result of amendments made in the legislative committee. It is still not as good as we would like, or as it could have been, or should have been. I will touch on these defects a little later, but at first I want to elaborate on the background of the legislation.

Bill C–72 will create a corporation to be called the Canadian Polar Commission. Its purpose is to promote and disseminate information and knowledge throughout the polar regions of the world. It will monitor, encourage, and support the development of knowledge about polar regions in Canada and elsewhere. For the most part it will not conduct its own research, although it may do some. Rather its primary function is to co-ordinate and facilitate the research activities of others in Canada.

It will help develop a comprehensive Canadian polar information system. It will foster international co-operation and attention to polar issues. It is meant to enhance Canada's international profile as a circumpolar nation.

There was a general consensus among interested parties that Canada needs a polar commission.

• (1330)

The need for a polar commission is due to the current lack of co-ordination among Canadian research activities on polar issues and the need to provide a focal point for these efforts. There is much research being undertaken, but it is being done by a number of very different organizations sponsored by different interests and for a variety of purposes. There is not enough sharing of information between all the players and there is not enough support being given to the polar research community.

In September, 1985, the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development established a working group to study the feasibility and advisability of establishing a national polar institute in Canada.

The report of this working group entitled "Canada and Polar Science" was released publicly in March of 1987. It recommended then the establishment of a Canadian polar commission.

The subsequent Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development commissioned a follow-up report on the mandate, structure, composition, accountability, activities, budget and location of such a commission. Known as The Shield of Achilles: The Report of the Canadian Polar Research Commission Study", this study was completed in May of 1988.

Both of these reports confirmed the existence of serious problems respecting polar research in Canada. Both reports identified a need for a more co-ordinated, integrated system of research, science and knowledge.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Polar Commission we are approving today has been announced at least three times over the past few years. In 1988, the government announced the establishment of the Canadian Polar Research Commission. On November 24, 1989, the Prime Minister announced the establishment of this commission. The Prime Minister's press release outlined the mandate and structure of the commission and identified the location of its offices. The Prime Minister's announcement was virtually identical to the recommendations in The Shield of Achilles report.

On May 25, 1990, the Canadian Polar Commission was announced again, when Bill C-72 was tabled in the House of Commons by the current Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

After so many announcements, we are happy to see this long-awaited project finally come to fruition. We hope that it will not take so long to get the commission actually established and working.

The commission will be managed by a board of directors consisting of up to 12 members, including a chairperson and two vice-chairpersons. The directors are to be appointed by the Governor in Council under recommendation of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They will serve term appointments of three years. Members—and I stress this—must have knowledge related to the commission's work and should reflect the ethnic, linguistic and regional diversity of Canada's polar regions.

In our view, the quality of these commissioners will be a critical factor in the credibility and the integrity of the commission. I want to make the following recommendation to the government, which we have done through amendments, but I will do so once again. At least half—and we are being generous by asking for half—and preferably a majority of the 12 commissioners should come from north of 60, and aboriginal people must be well represented.

We proposed such an amendment to the bill in committee, and it was rejected by the government members.

We are disappointed that the government did not place the location of the commission's head office in northern Canada. The original bill, as introduced in June, actually placed the head office in Ottawa, and suggested a regional office in the north.

On this side of the House we recommended the reverse. It makes no sense to have a polar commission which is meant to focus attention on the north, with a head office in Ottawa. I proposed an amendment in committee to put the head office in the north, and a regional office in Ottawa. Unfortunately, the government did not accept that amendment.

Instead the government introduced its own amendment which would leave the location of the commission's offices to the discretion of the commissioners.

I can take some comfort from the fact that the government backed off the Ottawa head office location, but I regret that it would not agree to put that head office in the north. I am very pleased that the government has accepted this.

I am sure that they really had no choice but to accept it. It is the recognition of aboriginal knowledge in this bill. We were advised by the government in committee that the use of this word, in addition to the term "science" was meant to incorporate aboriginal knowledge. "The recognition was implicit," they said.

We wanted the recognition to be explicit. We wanted the recognition to be clear. I, therefore, moved an amendment in committee that defines "knowledge" to include traditional and aboriginal knowledge. That amendment was accepted by the government and passed in committee. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the members of the committee for their support.

I believe that for the first time in legislation, northern and aboriginal people now have their intimate understanding and awareness of their environment, and the wildlife recognized and affirmed.

We have had difficulties in the past with scientific and biological research. Much activity has gone on without our participation and involvement.

There have been conflicts between the traditional knowledge of aboriginal people and the scientific data bases of non-aboriginal researchers. In the second reading debate on this bill, I mentioned a past conflict over the counting of a caribou herd in the Keewatin, and an ongoing dispute over beluga whales in the Baffin region.

We hope that this polar commission will help to avoid these problems by fully involving northern and aboriginal people in the ongoing and future research into our region.

We canvassed a great number of organizations, aboriginal and non-aboriginal, on the concept of a polar commission. All were very supportive.

Some concerns were expressed, however, concerning the mandate of the commission. It was thought, for example, that the commission should be able to advise the government at any time, and not just when requested, as the bill is currently written. In committee, I moved an amendment which would have given the commission the freedom to advise the government at any time, but that amendment was rejected by the government.

We still have some concerns about the adequacy of the commission's budget, and about its independence from the government. We regret that the government did not seem to want to hear from any witnesses on this legislation. We were told that we would risk losing this bill if we took the time to hear from interested organizations.

None of the groups we talked to wanted to take the chance of losing this bill, so we moved forward, but I still believe the committee could have benefited from the comments of those directly involved in northern issues research.

In conclusion, our members on this side of the House support this bill. It is an initiative which is long overdue.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-68, an act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1340 )

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cadieux (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because I understand there is agreement on this piece of legislation. We know that there have been some technical amendments proposed in two different areas.

I want to thank the legislative committee which considered the bill and received presentations from various interests. I want to express my appreciation for the contribution of the committee which did all of this work. I also want to commend the members of the committee for their time, their input, and for their co-operation in ensuring this bill's prompt review. I hope that we can deal with this piece of legislation very rapidly.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to be very brief but you must also realize that we do have some comments on this bill. I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak at third reading stage of Bill C-68.

When I spoke at second reading I indicated, on behalf of my party, the Official Opposition, my support for this bill but with some reservations. We support this bill because it corrects an oversight, a negligence of the government. We support the corrective steps in this bill which strengthen the protection of lands withdrawn in the Yukon for the purpose of lands claims settlements.

We continue to regret the negligence of the government which had the unfortunate effect of infringing on the aboriginal rights of the Yukon Indian people and, in particular, those represented by the Kluane Tribal Council. We continue to caution the government that it must take its constitutional trust responsibilities toward aboriginal peoples much more seriously.

The government initially wanted to pass this bill, in all stages, on a single day. We insisted that it should go to a legislative committee so that groups affected by the legislation would have an opportunity to express their views and recommend any changes they thought were necessary.

This was a very useful exercise, as the government will agree because, after hearing witnesses, the government brought forward amendments to its own legislation. It is interesting that the amendments introduced by the government responded to concerns expressed by the mining industry and prospectors. The government did not bring forward any amendments to respond to the concerns of the Yukon Indian people.

I would like to take a few moments to communicate to this House what the Kluane Tribal Council and the Council for Yukon Indians had to say about this bill in committee. They reminded committee members that the need for this bill arose out of a failure of a federal Order in Council which was supposed to protect a portion of the unsurrendered homelands of the Kluane Tribal Council from mineral staking. I want to describe to this House the history and background of the bill and the issues we are dealing with today.

For the past several years, Mr. Speaker, the government has, from time to time and for various public purposes, including the settlement of aboriginal land claims, withdrawn various parcels of land in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories from this position.

As hon. members know, all of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are the subject of land claims negotiations with aboriginal peoples. These aboriginal people negotiating these claims have long been concerned about the alienation by third parties of lands which they are claiming while negotiations are ongoing.

The federal government has, in response to these concerns, ordered the freezing or withdrawal of certain lands designated by aboriginal claimants from disposition, pending settlement of the particular land claim under negotiation. The withdrawal of these lands has removed the possibility of third-party interest being created in such lands, at least for the duration of the withdrawal order.

Negotiations between the aboriginal people and the government determine which lands will be withdrawn. There is a general criteria which describes lands which cannot be withdrawn; such lands are lands which are already privately owned. In each land claim area there are more specific criteria used by the federal government in the decision-making, but these criteria are not public nor are they made available to the aboriginal claimants.

In the Yukon, the Council for Yukon Indians has been negotiating a land claims agreement since 1973, and in March, 1989, negotiators for the Government of Canada and the Council for Yukon Indians ratified an agreement in principle.

Several parcels of land have been withdrawn for Yukon Indians pending final settlement of their land claims. Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act permits governments to designate and withdraw from dispositions certain parcels of land.

In addition, Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act permits the Governor in Council to prohibit entry on certain lands for the purpose of locating a claim or prospecting for gold or other precious minerals or stones. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act contains no provision to withdraw lands or prohibit mining on certain lands. However, Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act does provide for exceptions to the general right to acquire mineral rights.

It has been the position of the government that a withdrawal made under Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act should be considered a reservation within the meaning of Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. The government's position, however, was challenged in court by an individual prospector. The prospector had staked 265 mineral claims in an area withdrawn for settlements of the Kluane Tribal Council land claims. These claims were refused by the mining recorder because they were staked on lands withdrawn for the settlement of the Indian land claims.

The prospector brought the matter to Federal Court on July 12, 1988. On February 12, 1990, a judgment in favour of the prospector was handed down. The judgment was based on the fact that subsection 3(3) of the Territorial Lands Act states that "nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the operation of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, the Yukon Placer Mining Act, the Dominion Water Power Act, or the National Parks Act". The judge decided therefore that any withdrawal orders made pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act could not have an effect on the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. In other words, he said that claim staking under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act could not be curtailed by orders pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act. The judge ordered that mining recorder to accept the prospector's claims.

The day after the court decision, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced in the House that the government would be introducing legislation to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. He also announced that legislation would be retroactive to February 13, the date of his announcement.

On March 9, 1990, Bill C-68 was introduced. This bill amends two pieces of legislation, the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. It will clarify and confirm the government's right to prohibit mineral claims staking on certain lands which may be required for the settlement of aboriginal land claims by specifying this purpose in both of these acts. The changes are essentially technical changes, and as I mentioned earlier, they are retroactive to February 13, 1990.

This bill closes a loophole in the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which allowed a prospector to stake mineral claims on lands selected by the Kluane Tribal Council and withdrawn by the government for the settlement of their claim. It provides for a greater certainty in the Yukon Placer Mining Act. As such, it is an improvement on the current situation pending a final court determination.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government on March 7 filed an appeal on the February 12 court decision with the Federal Court of Appeals.

There are no strong objections to the remedy provided by this bill. The mining associations of the Yukon are generally concerned about the amount of land which has been withdrawn, but support the land claims settlement process and the bill because it provides for great uncertainty for the industry.

The CYI concluded, however, after reviewing Bill C–68, that it does not go far enough in terms of protection which is to be provided to the unsurrendered lands of the Kluane Tribal Council and the other Yukon first nations. Their primary recommendations to the committee was to amend Bill C–68 so as to prevent staking or mining on the unsurrendered land of the Yukon First Nations until such time as their claims to those lands have been settled, or they have otherwise expressly consented to such staking or mining.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my office did try to frame an amendment between the time the committee had finished with the bill and this debate today to respond to that concern expressed by the Yukon Indians. We were told by legal counsel, however, that our amendment would be out of order because it went beyond the scope of this bill.

Unfortunately, this bill is not constructed in a way that permitted us to strengthen the position of the Yukon First Nations. We regret that, and we wish we could have done more to protect the rights of the Yukon Indians. We recognize that the bill before us at least takes a step in that direction.

In conclusion, we support this bill because it closes the loopholes the government was not aware of. It corrects a mistake caused by the government's negligence. It is an improvement on the present situation but, I stress, it does not go far enough to protect the unsurrendered aboriginal lands from third–party alienation.

Aboriginal people involved in land claims negotiations continue to see their lands alienated, despite the fact that no settlement of their claim has been reached. This occurs in the Yukon, in the Northwest Territories, and in British Columbia. Revisions to the land claims policy are needed to better protect aboriginal interests, rights, and titles.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I had a long speech to give on this Bill C–68, but my hon. friend from Nunatsiaq has laid it out for the House very thoroughly and comprehensively. I feel I now have to emphasize only two or three points that he made at the very end of his presentation.

I would like to congratulate him in terms of laying out the history of this whole issue, and also to acknowledge the fact that much was done in committee in a very co–operative way to advance the situation that existed in the Yukon. As my hon. friend from Nunatsiaq has indicated, there are still some problems with this bill.

The fact that the Kluane Tribal Council and the Council of Yukon Indians maintain that this bill does not go far enough in protecting their unsurrendered lands in their continuing negotiations over land claims, is something that we, as members, ought not to take lightly.

We are pleased in terms of the progress that it has shown, not only in terms of the land claims settlement in the Yukon, but also the progress shown in this bill. It is also important to acknowledge the fact that these outstanding issues and concerns remain.

Both the tribal council and the Council of Yukon Indians wanted Bill C–68 amended to prevent staking and mining on their unsurrendered lands until the land claims are settled, or they have given consent for this type of activity. The Council of Yukon Indians maintains that our Canadian constitution requires the land claims be settled before their homelands are opened up for use by others. I recall that a legal opinion by Tom Berger supports this claim that the Council of Yukon Indians makes.

Perhaps I can give a moment or two or background in the time remaining. When the British North America Act established the Dominion of Canada back in 1867, the Yukon First Nation land was not part of Canada.

Canada wanted to acquire Rupert's Land in the northwestern territory in order to extend Canada to the Arctic Ocean. The conditions, Mr. Speaker, that you probably will recall as a student of history, as well as constitutional history, set up by the Senate and the House of Commons in 1867, said the homelands transferred "—will be considered and settled in conformity with the equitable principles which have uniformly governed the British Crown in the dealings with the aborigines". Does that not sum it up, Mr. Speaker, clearly for all of us?

This was accomplished through various treaties which allotted lands for settlement by non-natives. This existed until the Klondike Gold Rush, from which time to the present, the Council of Yukon Indians says represents a breach by the government in allowing lands to be used, and if I may say abused, as well, while no attempts were made to settle claims on the unsurrendered lands. Natives claim that Canada is not honouring its constitutional duties to natives in the Yukon because unsurrendered lands are not being protected.

As well, the Council of Yukon Indians, does not wish to reverse development, just to freeze it, until land claims can be settled in order to prevent alienations in the future.

I would refer to the the claims staked by the miner, Mr. Halferdahl, in an area that was desired by the native people. The miner was able to retain these because of a loophole in the Territorial Lands Act. He took these claims to court, as my hon. colleague has already pointed out, and his position was upheld. The point is that if Bill C-68 was made retroactive to 1987, he would lose his claims and would have to be compensated according to the government. Fair enough. If he keeps his claims by virtue of Bill C-68 being effective in February 1990, will the government compensate the Council of Yukon Indians? I think this is a critical question now that we must pursue.

The Council of Yukon Indians has said that it has been involved in negotiations for compensation for many, many years while this particular miner has only been involved briefly and yet the government is prepared to offer compensation to him.

While we in the New Democratic Party support Bill C-68, let us all acknowledge that much work remains to be done and we look forward to the appropriate committee and those interested members of the House to continue with their interest in this issue in terms of improving it even more in the future.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved that Bill C-332, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for seconding my motion to allow it to be presented.

This particular bill enables young people 16 years and over to vote in federal elections. I might say that I think all of us have had innumerable experiences as we have met young people in our careers as parliamentarians and recognized and acknowledged the fact that many young people, age 16, 17, and perhaps even a lot younger than that, are quite capable of making a judgment when it comes to who ought to represent them in the Parliament of Canada, which political party, which political persuasion if you like, the kind of person. I hope one day that we can expand this so 16-year olds will also have the opportunity perhaps to elect senators and be senators, to represent a more democratic approach to political decision-making in our country.

I want to make my case by first of all acknowledging the discussions I have had with groups of young people, particularly in a formal sense, from Cariboo University College, from Brocklehurst Secondary School, Norkam Secondary, Kam High, Westsyde Secondary, Barriere Secondary, Clearwater Secondary, Chase Secondary, Logan Lake Secondary, as well as a whole host of junior high schools. Also, on a number of occasions with the more senior years in elementary school where we discussed what age would be appropriate in terms of people voting in general elections. After these discussions and recognizing the understanding that young people today have of international affairs and national affairs, the understanding of the legislative process, it is with no hesitation that I say that I believe it is appropriate that we change legislation to empower those youngsters who are 16 and 17 years of age to be able to vote in our general elections.

The reasons for this are many. At age 16 young people are able to join the Armed Forces of Canada. I believe if we say to a young man or young woman that at age 16 with parental consent you are able to join the Armed Forces of Canada and go off to represent Canada in perhaps, unfortunately, places of conflict, they ought also to have the right to decide on those people who will represent them in the nation's Parliament.

At age 16 young people are able to get married legally, again with parental consent, but marriage and the responsibilities of marriage surely indicate that at that age people are capable of taking on the responsibilities of very serious decision-making.

Of course, at age 16 young people are able to drive vehicles, high powered cars, and take the responsibility of driving safely and manoeuvring an automobile down our crowded highways. Surely with that responsibility, we can assume that young people have the ability to make very thoughtful decisions in terms of those representing them in Parliament.

We also recognize that many young people aged 16 are working full time, or part time at least, as a result of supporting themselves through their senior level of school. As a result, they are subject to the minimum wage. At age 16 the minimum wage becomes effective. Again we recognize that particular age of change in a young person's life.

We also recognize that as these young people work, they need a full time or part time job, they are contributing to the unemployment insurance plan. They are paying their taxes if their incomes are of a particular level and contributing to society in a regular way.

I might say also that many young people take on responsibilities now that I am impressed with. I almost consider it to be awesome in terms of the way they approach their studies, the way they are involved in community groups and organizations and make contributions in very serious ways.

I have sat with friends of my sons and discussed national political issues only to be moved after hearing the extent to which these young people are aware of issues and how they are able to articulate their concerns, maturity, thoughtfulness and wisdom of the views that they hold. They are not necessarily always the same as my own.

I recognize that people view a particular item or an issue—nationally, internationally, even locally—with different biases. As a result, they have different views. But I have always been impressed with their ability to analyse.

It is fair to say that these days, as a result of the sophisticated educational programs, of the communications systems that enable young people to be instantaneously informed about issues around the globe, these young people are quite capable of deciding, if they wish, who ought to represent them in the nation's Parliament.

Some people react by saying: "These people are simply too young to make a decision. They are too inexperienced. They just do not have the background". I hate to say this, but not too many years ago people made those same claims about native people. It is almost one of our national disgraces when we think that it was only back in the 1950s when native people were permitted to vote. Again, a very dark mark on Canadian history.

If you look back at the debates of that time, people were saying: "Do native people have the information, experience and the background to make an intelligent decision?" Well, of course, they did and to even think about it and question it now would be an embarrassment.

Not too many years ago, on May 24, 1918, the decision was made to give women the vote. When you look back at those debates and those discussions, it was the same thing: "Are women able to make a serious decision?".

When we think back now, it is laughable to even think that those discussions took place.

When people scoff at or reject the idea outright that young people aged 16 and 17 are incapable of making a decision, let us remember that these same young people are capable of making decisions in terms of participating in the Armed Forces, participating as drivers on our highways, participating meaningfully in the workplace or entering into a state of matrimony.

For those reasons, Madam Speaker, I submit to you that we ought to consider changes to legislation in order to provide young people aged 16 and 17 an opportunity to vote in national elections. I can hardly pass without making the observation that, in all of the discussions I have had with young people who are interested in the state of affairs of the day, and I will acknowledge that many are not, young people do not lay awake night after night worrying about our trade with Bolivia or many of the other items that we concern ourselves with in this House, but many do. The fact is that many young people do take the issues before us and our national political agenda very seriously.

I must say that the times I have spent in discussions, either with clubs in schools or universities and informal and formal organizations across the country, these people are—and I am hesitant to say it but I think it is very true—much more informed than many people who are participating in the electoral process. I often wonder what it is that motivates people to cast ballots in certain directions. I think we probably are not as bad as the United States, but we see sort of creeping into our electoral system reasons for casting political decisions that are somewhat suspect in terms of their intellectual weight and wisdom.

However, it is time that we provide an opportunity for these young people ages 16 and 17 to vote. That is not saying that we require every person at age 16 to vote because many are not interested and perhaps do not feel an inclination to participate in the electoral process. But for those increasing numbers who do, who recognize that the decisions made in the House of Commons of Canada will have a profound effect on their lives, and I do not have to go any further than to refer to what we will do later today, that is the final stage of the implementation of the 7 per cent goods and services tax—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: I recognize that my Conservative friends applaud the tax. They think this is a good idea. But I think when young people realize that every video they rent, every cassette they purchase, every time they get a haircut or go to the local movie theatre, buy hockey tickets, or whatever, they will pay a 7 per cent tax to the Mulroney government. Obviously, it will have a profound effect on their lives. If a young person works and spends hundreds and even thousands of dollars during the year, they will have to add a 7 per cent extra tax now to this federal government as a result of the goods and services tax that has been imposed on Canadians. This will have a very special impact on the lives of Canadian young people.

Whether you look at the tax system as it affects young people and the educational policy of the federal government in terms of their futures, colleges, universities and technical and vocational schools, whether you consider the support or lack of support by the federal government in terms of research and development, in terms of economic development, when you look at regional development programs and whether they create more jobs or result in job loss, these are all issues that most young people are very concerned about.

Post-secondary education. When you look, Mr. Speaker, at what the government is doing in terms of post-secondary education, this is a major implication for the young people of today. When you look at fiscal policy, monetary policy, foreign policy, social policy, they all directly affect the lives of our young people. They have a very serious vested interest in the future because they are going to live the rest of their lives there. For that reason, I believe it is appropriate that all of us recognize the value of this bill. It is something that I and my party have recommended to the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform, a Royal commission that toured the country earlier this year seeking input from various groups and political parties on necessary changes, and I am proud to say that it was the federal New Democratic Party that made this recommendation that when the changes to the electoral laws are drafted, consideration be given to have age 16 as the year where Canadians would be eligible to vote in federal elections.

I look forward to the support from my colleagues in the House of Commons from the Liberal Party, as well as the Progressive Conservative Party, and look forward to the day when we provide the opportunity for young people to be empowered so that they are involved in a serious meaningful way in deciding on the next federal government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know that my speech will probably be interrupted by a number of knocks on the door later on, when we are asked to— I don't want to be rude and ask the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, when he comes from the Senate, to wait a minute—we have been waiting for quite some time—nor would I want the newspapers to report tomorrow that a masterful speech by the hon. member for Beauharnois was interrupted by a member of the Senate.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, since we are talking about the right to vote, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to one country in particular, Haiti, which next Sunday, will exercise its right to vote. I worked as chairman of the Commission of Inquiry on Haiti with my colleagues from Windsor—St. Clair, Papineau—Saint-Michel and Chicoutimi, and our friend Léo Duguay, who is no longer with us. I therefore want to wish Haiti good luck. I have visited the country and travelled there at least three times, and I know that to them it is extremely important. While we are discussing lowering the voting age from 18 to 16, they are anxious to exercise their franchise undisturbed, for once.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the motion presented by the hon. member for Kamloops concerning Bill C-332, whose purpose is to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Elections constitute the foundation of our political system and our democracy. It is the way we choose our governments and express the values that influence our public decision-making. That is why the right to vote is so important. I would first like to give a short history of the right to vote in Canada and then explain why the present voting age is 18.

In our first elections, which date back to the 18th century, the vote was limited to male property holders. From 1867 to 1920, the federal franchise was often manipulated in a blatantly partisan fashion by the political parties.

Until 1884, the federal franchise was based on provincial laws and included a property qualification, thus depriving large sections of the population of the right to vote.

During World War I, Canada adopted the War Time Elections Act and the Military Voters Act in 1917. These measures enfranchised members of the Canadian Armed Forces and their female relatives, while disenfranchising conscientious objectors and British subjects naturalized after 1902 who were born in an enemy country or habitually spoke an enemy language. We have come a long way since then.

In 1918, women were first granted the right to vote federally.

In 1920, Parliament adopted legislation establishing the right to vote across the country and thus constituting the foundation of our present system. In 1948, the last statutory disenfranchisement of Asians was removed. The federal franchise was extended to the Inuit in 1950 and to status Indians in 1960.

It is now 1990. Canada has matured as a democracy and as a nation. Under our Constitution, Mr. Speaker, Canada now has a virtually universal franchise. All Canadian citizens 18 years of age and older are eligible to vote. The only exceptions are federal judges, inmates of prisons and mental institutions, and any person disqualified for corrupt or illegal electoral practices. These exceptions are specified in the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Speaker, the present voting age is 18. It was lowered from 21 to 18 in 1970, and I think we should look at the reasons why changes were made at the time and see whether they put a new perspective on today's debate.

Voting rights for young people were a major legislative concern in many countries at the end of the 1960s.

In the Throne Speech on October 23, 1969, why the voting age was lowered. And I quote:

> A disturbing element in many countries of the world has been the rising tide of unrest, particularly among young people. It has expressed itself in many ways, in public debate, in peaceful protest and sometimes in violence. Our profound disapproval of the excesses must not blind us to deeply felt and legitimate aspirations. Many citizens in our own country believe that they are entitled to assume greater responsability for the destiny of our society. Such demands, insofar as they do not > conflict with the general welfare, are the expression of a truly democratic ideal. They must be satisfied if our society is to attain its goals of peace and justice.

• (1420)

This was taken from the Throne Speech read on October 23, 1969.

A look at the debate on lowering the voting age as reported in Hansard shows that the proposal was very well received in the House of Commons. In 1970, it was felt that lowering the voting age from 21 to 18 was both appropriate and inevitable. This meant that 1,200,000 young people would have the right to vote.

At the time, it was felt that these were students who were well informed, interested and intelligent, and very much concerned about the problems and injustice of this world. Courses in civics, political science and related disciplines were becoming increasingly widespread.

Many people expressed the view that these young people would have a major impact on Canadian governments and their policies, an impact that would be very beneficial to the Parliament of Canada and the entire country.

There were other reasons for this initiative, Madam Speaker. First of all, it was the logical outcome of a process that had been going on for quite some time, especially since the last World War when 18 year-olds had been given technical and often dangerous jobs. Originally, the right to vote was very restricted, in one way or another, and for many years it was considered a privilege of the elite. The age of 21 was considered the age of maturity. In 1970, however, circumstances changed considerably. The decision to lower the voting age reflected a desire to channel the enthusiasm and energy of young people and get them interested in the country's politics, the theory being that out of boredom they might otherwise create a disturbance and get involved in reckless and often subversive activities.

Mr. Mazankowski was also very much in favour of lowering the voting age to 18. On November 3, 1969, at page 427 in Hansard he said:

> We hear suggestions from our youth that political parties are irrelevant. They want more than mere participation at the polls at election time. They are looking for, a meaningful sense of participation. We in the various political parties all say that the future of our parties depends on the involvement of youth. But what are we doing to encourage the youth of this country to become more active in political affairs? I hope possession of the franchise will instil in them a real sense of enthusiasm for the building of this country; God bless us, there is a great deal to be done. I am sure it will lead to much the same enthusiasm as many of us experienced in our election campaigns last year.

The feeling in 1970 was that by lowering the electoral age of majority, the government was attracting young people to the centres of decision.

Madam Speaker, at the time parliamentarians were almost unanimous in their support for lowering the voting age from 21 to 18. Most people felt that 18 year-olds were well educated, socially responsible and capable of making their own political decisions.

It is clear that the voting age was lowered for two main reasons: 18-year-olds were considered to be sufficiently mature to take part in our electoral system, and it was also clear that young people between the ages of 18 and 21 were demanding a bigger say in the government's decision-making process.

Personally, Madam Speaker, and these will be my final comments, I think 18 is the right age to have the right to vote.

I don't have the impression society has changed to the extent that we should give young people between the ages of 16 and 18 the right to vote. And I don't think young people under 18 are demanding the right to vote.

Madam Speaker, I think the Canada Elections Act should remain unchanged and should not be amended to set the voting age below 18.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to take part in the debate this afternoon. The previous speaker certainly made a major contribution to this debate. The hon. member for Kamloops who presented the bill expressed an idea that may be new but is nevertheless in the general interest. I am proud to support his bill and I also want to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond East who seconded the motion for second reading of the bill presented by the hon. member for Kamloops.

[English]

As election reform critic for this party, I had the opportunity to appear before the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing in connection with its study of the electoral laws of Canada.

In the course of our party's presentation, in which I was a participant before that Royal commission, I was asked a question about lowering the age to age 16. I believe the New Democratic Party had been before the commission just before and had proposed the idea embodied in the bill that has been introduced since by the hon. member for Kamloops. I was asked my opinion of it, and I gave my opinion then.

I will give it again to this House. I am not opposed to reducing the voting age. It just seemed to me there was not a hue and cry in Canada for a reduction in the voting age. If the consensus in the population is that we should leave the voting age at age 18 and not lower it, then I would go along with that.

I said that quite deliberately before the commission. I am repeating my own words because I know the hon. member for Kamloops was not there to hear them. He may find these new. In my view the Canada Elections Act is probably the most public act of any in Canada, except the Constitution of course. In so far as Canadians are concerned, it is the act they feel most close to in terms of interest in it and the way it applies to them. During the course of every election campaign thousands and thousands of Canadians become aware of some provision or another of the Elections Act. It touches our lives very directly. It may only be at specified intervals, every four or five years, but the fact is it does touch our lives at those times in a most direct way. Canadians have a very real interest in the Canada Elections Act and feel more possessive, I suggest, toward that act than almost any other that has been adopted or could be adopted in this Parliament.

For that reason, public input on this issue is vital. The royal commission is doing studies. The royal commission, I am sure, will be conducting some surveys in determining what Canadians feel about various aspects of the electoral law. I look forward to reading those surveys and to seeing the studies that are conducted by the commission before finally making up my mind on this issue. I believe this issue will be before Parliament, not just in the form of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops but in a comprehensive bill to amend the Canada Elections Act which I believe will be forthcoming from the Royal commission. At that time, if the commission proposes a voting age of any number, I am sure that there will be a committee of this House studying the matter, returning to this House and asking us to approve or not the change in the voting age.

I hope that the hon. member for Kamloops, should this bill not have been passed by the time the Royal commission report comes to Parliament, would propose his amendment again at that stage so that we could discuss it and make a decision on it. It is important that the elected representatives of people make a decision, having heard the views of their constituents and of the public. I certainly would be interested in hearing those views. I would welcome correspondence on the issue at any time.

My impression—and I stress that it is an impression—is that there is not much clamour for a reduction of the age from 18 to any other age, be it 16, younger or older. There is general satisfaction with the age of 18 as is currently the case in the law.

I was interested to look back at the Debates when the voting age was lowered. When I was 18 years of age, I could not vote. I had to wait until I was 21, which dates me somewhat. I believe it was 1970 that the voting age was lowered to 18 from 21. There was a debate in this House about the act at that time. I ran across a quotation which was against lowering of the age, and it was a view that did not prevail. I want to quote it because it was a very distinguished member of Parliament who was a neighbour of mine. He was the member for Frontenac—Lennox—Addington. His successor in this House would be the hon. member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington. Mr. Alkenbrack was the member at that time. He made a speech on this very subject. I would like to quote from his speech at page 7461 of Hansard for May 28, 1970:

> I am opposed, however, to lowering the age limit to 18 for those who stand for public office. I do not agree we have to go that far to show our young people that we are with them and that we think it is time for them to become active in government. No man or woman who has just reached the age of 18 has had a chance to receive either a full education or an appreciable degree of practical experience.

• (1430)

I do not necessarily share the views of the hon. member who spoke, but it is obvious that the people of Canada, by and large, shared that view. I do not believe an 18 year-old has yet been elected to hold a position in this House, although we have had some fairly young members, none have been that young. Although the age has been lowered—

Mr. Malone: I was.

Mr. Milliken: Is the hon. member suggesting he was 18 when he was elected? I find it hard to believe. I did not realize he had been here so long.

Mr. Malone: In the last election.

Mr. Milliken: In the last election? There was one who was 18 who was elected? The hon. member is trying to suggest he was 18 in the last election. I appreciate that and I wish it were so for all of us. It is not quite the fact.

Given that, I think that the public at large makes some choice in deciding who will represent the public in Parliament. The preference seems to be for persons who are older than 18. There have been 21 year-olds elected, I am aware of that and there were some in the sixties. But it is unusual to have them as young as 18 years of age.

The other thing that was interesting going back in that debate in 1970 was to find out why the age of majority was put where it was, at age 21 at that time. It has been lowered to age 18 since.

I came across an interesting quotation in the debate at page 7399 of Hansard on May 27, 1970. The member who was speaking quoted from Holdsworth's "History of English Law". The quotation is from that. It is not really from the Hansard of that date but the speaker on that occasion used it. I would like to read the short section:

> In Roman law young people were divided, like Gaul, into three parts. First, there was infantia which was ultimately fixed as under 7—it is perhaps ironical that it is this word whose descendant has come to be used in our law for everyone under 21—

Of course, that has been changed by statute to 18.

> Roman historians state that the barbarians reckoned their young were old enough to carry arms and be counted as grown up at 15. And 15 became the general age of majority in Britain and northern Europe during the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries, though not specifically linked with fighting ability. But by the time of the Norman Conquest there was a change of emphasis. The role of the mounted knight became more and more important, the armour heavier and heavier and the horses more enormous as time went on. By the time of Magna Carta the age for those holding in knight service had been raised to 21 and there is strong authority for the view that this was directly linked with the ability to hold up a heavy suit of armour and lift a lance or sword at the same time.

Perhaps that is an explanation of how we got to 21. Perhaps hearing that explanation our legislators in 1970 decided that 18 was a more appropriate age. In any event, that is the age we now have.

The hon. member for Kamloops and the members of his party have evidently, in convention, voted to lower the age to 16. I know this is party policy. I assume it was adopted at a convention.

The hon. member has introduced this bill. I am pleased to support it in principle at second reading in order to allow for the matter to be studied in committee in this House where I hope the committee could review the provisions, hear from the public, and ultimately recommend the bill back to the House or not, with or without changes. I am happy to assist in seeing that the bill go to committee. I believe it is one that should be studied and then, if we choose to deal with it in a different way at third reading, we can each make up our own mind, having heard the evidence and having looked at the views of the people of Canada who, I think, will have something to say on this important subject. Those are a few thoughts on the matter.

I should add one more caveat about the Royal commission. The hon. member for Kamloops has this bill to amend the Canada Elections Act before this House. I also have introduced a substantial bill to amend the Canada Elections Act in a more comprehensive way. I have urged the government to accede to a request to refer all of these bills to a committee for study so that we can make a significant number of amendments to the existing Canada Elections Act, in order to have it in shape for the next election.

I have stated before and I will state again my concern that the Royal commission is not going to report in time to allow this House to deal with its report and make the changes to the Canada Elections Act that are necessary, if we are to run another election properly in Canada. I believe that, notwithstanding the very good intention of the Royal commission we, in this House, need to take the Canada Elections Act very seriously, look at it in a serious way and effect changes to it on a prompt basis, if we are going to be able to run an election in this country without having the courts make the decisions that should be made in this House and in this Parliament.

So I urge hon. members to look through the Order Paper, study the 10 or so bills that have been introduced to amend this act, and see if agreement could not be achieved to refer those bills to a committee for study and to see if we could not get unanimous agreement among members of the House to adopt those bills as a means of effecting a reform of our electoral law.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, every once in a while when Canadians have come to the conclusion that this place cannot get any more foolish, that this House of Commons cannot get any more silly, when no member anywhere in the Parliament of Canada can come up with a more ridiculous idea, along comes the member of the New Democratic Party and saves us all from that notion that there is no bottom.

What we have before us today is the proposal that we lower the voting age to 16. The argument put forward was that there are capable people at age 16 who know how to vote. I want to say to the hon. member for Kamloops: He is absolutely right.

But, having said that he is absolutely right, exactly the same argument can be made for 15 year-olds, 14 year-olds, 13 year-olds, 12 year-olds, and 10 year-olds. There are, here and there, though in diminishing numbers, people of lower and lower ages who have the capacity to make the intellectual judgments about the running of the country and who are every bit as capable as an adult. But I submit that is not the question. One of the roots of the question here is whether or not we have a right, in this society, to make arbitrary judgments. We make arbitrary judgments in many things. We make arbitrary judgments in respect of our driving patterns and our driving laws in this country.

If the NDP would admit for a moment that we should remove those, then we would take down the stop signs which, arbitrarily, tell people at an intersection that they have to stop, look both ways, and then proceed. It is absolutely arbitrary in North America and in much of Europe today that you drive on the right-hand side of the road. We cannot justify that it is better to drive on the right-hand side than the left-hand side.

So the question really comes to, why do we have a voting age that is defined in any process at all. I think most Canadians would start from the presumption that you have to, in a free and democratic society as is granted by the Charter of Rights but within the reason of democratic capacity to put some judgment to it, not allow everybody from birth to vote. That simply means that you would then have a situation where the adult in that family would bear more influence if they had more children because they would exercise their vote through their children.

When we come to these questions as to whether or not young people ought to be able to vote under a certain age, it seems to me that it is appropriate to ask the question: what was the first principle of Parliament? The first principle of Parliament, some 730 years ago, was to control the King's purse. From the first principle, it has remained the most important principle every since. The most important reason why we assemble here is to control the expenditures of Parliament. That is what Parliament is about. It is about controlling public expenditures. There is no principle more important than that.

The truth of the matter is, in today's society, persons age 16 by law are not supposed to be obtaining permanent work. Yes, they get part-time work and they will work in some places with some dominance such as McDonald's fast food outlets, but they are unable to enter into contract. It seems to me that, at an age where they cannot enter into marriage of their own judgment, cannot enter into contract, cannot take on permanent work, that it is not the kind of life experience that then allows them to come to Parliament or to vote in Parliament for the question of asking the process: "Should I or should I not be able to make a judgment vis-à-vis the question of the public accounts of Canada?"

This silly idea of lowering the age simply because we know some people who are capable begs the question as to how far down do we go. Like the hon. member for Kamloops, I too could name those people in equal numbers to him. I do not know where we would stop but

I know of 10 year-olds whose capacity to comprehend Parliament astounds me and for which I give them tremendous credit.

Is Canada better if we open up that process? Is there not also to be viewed a notion that democracy itself is to be so cherished and so privileged that there may well be a benefit from the waiting period and that we come to a level of maturity, understanding, experience, and economic relationships before we are able to exercise our right to vote and to influence our country?

Surely, it seems that if we lower—and for the same reasons that the hon. member for Kamloops said today, I could lower it another year next year—I do not know how low we could go, but I think we could go a long way down and still justify it on the same basis. Is this notion of the vote to have no criteria attached or no privilege? The best judgments might well come from those who have had to observe and experience for a while before exercising their franchise.

I might say, as an aside, if I were to give the hon. member for Kamloops an award—as the hon. member for Nickel Belt would do—for the most foolish idea of the year, the first runner-up would be the Reform Party who I would presume would want to have the voting age raised to age 65.

We talk about this arbitrariness in, for example, driving cars or consuming alcohol. In my province of Alberta, the legal age for the consumption of alcohol is 18. In the province we are in at this moment, Ontario, it is 19. Those are two arbitrary ages and they are different. We know that there are persons who probably could consume modest amounts of alcohol at younger ages without harm, and there are some of them at the age of 53 years, or some other age, who may not be able to consume alcohol, wherever they may be, or ought not, or should not, and never will be able to.

We make those arbitrary decisions in life. We make them about entering into contract.

There are persons who are 18 years of age who should not enter into contract. We say they can because they are 18. There is no other reason. They lose their shirt and everything. It may very well be that, if they had waited until the age 30, they would still have lost their shirts.

There are historical examples of people who entered into business when they were 14. E.B. Eddy, who started across the river here, is one Canadian example. At 14 years of age he entered into the business world. Sir John A. Macdonald was a lawyer when he was 16 years of age. Nevertheless we take society as we see it in the broad overview.

I want to come to another aspect of this question which I think should cause us to pause and reflect. What is the value of youth? What is the value of being a child? Is there not to be a period in our lives when we are carefree, when we have fun, and when we can take life from the imagery and imagination of being youthful, doing those kinds of things ought to be set aside for the purpose of children. They ought not to bear the burden of the workplace. They ought not to bear the burden of raising incomes. They ought not to bear the burden of having to vote or run for public office.

I submit for all the arguments that the hon. member for Kamloops used today to have the voting age go down, the same argument would be just as valid for 15 and 14 year-olds, perhaps even for 12 or 10 years of age. But somewhere along that line we encroach on something more important. We encroach on childhood, young adolescence, and on that period where there ought to be a time for not bearing the burden of the adult world. I submit the development of a human body is as important to protect as is the extension of rights that they ought to vote.

Give children the chance to have time to play. They grow up too fast now. Physical relations are too soon now. Alcohol consumption is too soon now. Why go one step further to ask that they now bear the burden of public office when they can bear in just two years later at the next election. Eighteen years is not a long time to wait to be granted for life the chance to run for public office, to vote, and to take part.

No one is doubting their capacity or their ability. It simply is a better approach to say: "Let them be children as long as they might".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, this afternoon I would also like to speak to the important tonic raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. Of course, it sounds good to say we will set the voting age at 16 instead of 18.

I remember—it seems it was only yesterday—when we were eligible to vote at 21. Most members of this House will recall that they all voted for the first time at the age of 21.

In the 70s, the voting age was lowered to 18. I have noticed, and I am not saying this is due to the fact that the voting age was lowered to 18, that we have had a number of problems since then which I intend to address here. Since the 1970s, parents seem to have shown progressively less interest in their children.

We often hear people say: "You are 18 now, so pick up your things and go and live your own life". This may be due to the fact that at that age they are now considered to be adults. Before, we used to hear this when a young person turned 21. They use to say: "At 21 you can stand on your own two feet, so go out and live on your own". Now this is being said to 18 year-olds. And across Canada, we see all the problems that young people are having. I very much agree with what the previous speaker said: Why do we want to take away the right of our young people to be young? I think that at 16, young people want to be young. They do not want to have more responsibilities than they can handle. At 16 they want to enjoy their youth.

My son is 20, and when he was eligible to vote, at 18—his first time was in 1988—he told me: "I am proud to have this responsibility but I think it is a little too soon". He said: "I may be privileged in having parents who helped me over the years to find out about the history of my country". He didn't necessarily learn all this in school. We told him about the history of our country. In any case, he felt better prepared than some of the kids in his group. He often told me: "Dad, lots of kids at my school went to vote, and they didn't even know why they were voting or who they were voting for". They had not yet developed an interest in government. They didn't realize what being eligible to vote was all about. In fact, it is a major, fundamental responsibility.

When I look at the way parents react and how they perceive their relationship with their children, I wonder whether we should really encourage this trend so that soon, parents will be saying: You are 16? Good. You are eligible to vote, so you can leave home and stand on your own two feet. I am not so sure a 16-year-old would be able to stand on his own two feet and make his way through life and support himself. That just isn't so. I never believed that and I still do not. I do not think we, as parliamentarians, have the right to take away from our youngsters the right to be young and to have time to mature and to develop their personality.

It seems the hon. member's proposal comes in response to demands made by young people. There are young people in my riding, 15 and 16 year-olds, who are extremely mature. But they are the minority. And where do we find these young people? In all political organizations across the country, whether they are NDP, Liberal or Conservative. They come and they start learning how democracy works. They learn to work within the electoral process in a riding. They gradually form an opinion on how a country should be administered and governed. But they get this opportunity at the age of 12, 13, 14, 15 or 16. I agree that as they get more involved in the political process, they become increasingly anxious to vote. Well, they are eligible to vote at 18. People say: "Sure, but they can drive a car at 16".

I am still not convinced that letting a young man or a young girl of 16 get behind the wheel of an automobile is the best decision we could make in our lives. I am not sure that young people of that age are all very mature. I am not saying that they are all immature, but I am not convinced they all have the same level of maturity. Maybe 1 out of 100 or 10 out of 100 are mature enough to be allowed behind the wheel of an automobile. A car is just as dangerous as a firearm if you don't know how to use it. However, we cannot say yes to some and no to others. I am not convinced it was a very good idea to give them the right to drive at this age.

I remember that when the voting age was lowered to 18, people said that if they were old enough to vote, they were also old enough to have a pint in a tavern. So, naturally, the drinking age was also lowered from 21 to 18. I remember distinctly that I had my first beer in a public place at 21 years of age. If you were caught drinking under age then, you would get into serious trouble with the police, but mostly with your parents.

At 18, it's all right. You are capable of voting and you are capable of controlling your drinking. At 16, I am not so sure people are mature enough to assess their drinking capacity and keep it within reasonable limits as we say. I am not convinced.

I have hardly a minute left, Madam Speaker, so I will conclude by saying that the idea is interesting and that many of our young people of 16 or 17 are indeed mature enough to vote wisely, but not to assume all the other responsibilities associated with that right. With a decision like this we, parliamentarians, would deprive a lot of our young people of two years of their youth, two years which they could enjoy freely without all these new responsibilities. The right to vote is the most important right given to an individual in Canada, and that right must be assumed.

I remember the first time I was told: "Mr. Ferland, you will be voting at such a place". When I entered the booth the first time to mark my ballot, I was quite nervous. It was a big responsibility. I did not spoil my ballot. I made my choice and I knew very well what the consequences were. Why impose such pressures on our young people? I think they have enough pressures as it is, in our society, without adding this new burden two years too soon.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into this debate for a couple of minutes. I think that the issue before us is an issue that has obviously been one debated simply not in the House, but across the country. In fact I can remember as a 16–year–old myself taking a look at this issue and thinking it was an important issue and that I was mature and therefore I should have the right to vote and that I, as a young and responsible member of society, ought to have an opportunity to express my opinion on who should lead the country. I do not think I was unique in that.

I can remember several of my friends at the time being quite excited at the prospect of being able to vote at a younger age. Of course at that time it was very much tied to the question of the consumption and purchase of alcohol. At that time in the province of Alberta, one had to be 21 years of age in order to buy alcohol. Of course, many a 16 year old to 19 year old very much felt that that was the kind of thing they should be entitled to do. We would get into these long and great philosophical discussions about the importance of the issue.

I in fact believe that this issue is important enough that I move:

Private Members' Business

That this House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of the second reading stage of government Bill C–332, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Milliken: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. The item under consideration is not a government order. The standing order that my colleague has referred to permits him to move that the government business under consideration be considered after the adjournment, but it does not allow for Private Members' Business to be extended in this way. I submit therefore that his motion is out of order, since this particular bill is not a government bill. It is Private Members' Business.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, first, I think my friend is not accurate. I am a private member, the same as are other members of this House. We have an opportunity to participate in a debate such as this one. This is an important issue in which a number of members of the House would like to participate. It is very clear that in fact the situation would allow members to rise to participate in this debate and to extend the sitting of this House to allow that participation.

In fact, what we see is an issue that is important to a number of Canadians. Madam Speaker, my hon. friend from Kamloops has picked an issue. He has put that into the draw. He felt that issue was important enough to warrant his time and the time of the House. In fact, that is what happened. The issue was drawn.

• (1500)

There were a number of members rising when I rose to speak. My colleague from Surrey—White Rock was rising to speak as well. So, you can see, Madam Speaker, that there are several people who are keenly interested in this bill. I think we should have an opportunity to continue at second reading.

It is very clear that if we look at the whole issue you will find that this is not a unique request. In fact, there is a precedent established by my hon. friend's colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. On another issue during Private Members' Business at another time, the hon. member rose to request that this House have an opportunity to continue the debate on the issue that was before the House in Private Members' Business at that time.

If my memory serves me correctly, in fact what happened is that there were not 15 members rising to dispose of the motion. As a result, the debate did continue on for some time and a number of members were able to then put their opinions on the record. As a result of that, ultimately the House came to divide.

My memory fails me as to the particular issue, but you will find that in this circumstance, and as you know, there were members rising. There were members who wanted to participate in this debate. I do not believe that we are involved in anything unique here. I think we have every right to move this motion. We have every right to request that this House not see the clock for the next little while to allow two or three other members who would like to make an intervention have every right and every opportunity to participate in this debate. It is important to all of us who are elected to this House, because this question has much more significance to us, because it—

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On the same point of order? The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Ferland: Very briefly, Madam Speaker. I am amazed that my colleague from Kingston and the Islands would hesitate to extend the debate, for he was in favour of this motion. I doubt that my colleague from Kamloops would also refuse his consent since this is his motion.

Madam Speaker, a number of my colleagues in the House want to speak to this important motion concerning the young people of this country. I am really amazed to see that my colleague from Kingston and the Islands does not want to extend the debate, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member seems to be getting into debate right now.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, what we are doing is highly out of order. Standing Order 26(1) makes it perfectly clear that what is going on now is unacceptable, and I suggest, Madam Speaker, that you call it three o'clock immediately.

Mr. Hughes: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, and following up on the points that were made by my colleague from northwestern Alberta, I believe that there are several members here who would like to speak to this very important issue. I am one. The member has legitimately put forth the intention and the interest in that proceeding. On that basis, I just want to let you know that there are other members here who have speeches prepared and are prepared to proceed. I just want to bring that to your attention.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, you did recognize me to speak on this subject at about four minutes to the hour, so I think you understand that I was prepared and willing and wanting to speak on this motion.

It does seem strange to me that the members opposite who now want to call it three o'clock are the same members who usually complain that there is not enough debate.

Here we are giving them an opportunity to debate an issue that obviously is of some interest to our colleague from Kamloops.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member.

Reading Standing Order 26(1), it does say: "except during Private Members' Business." This motion can be moved, but not during Private Members' Business.

Standing Order 24(3) tells us the time of adjournment of the House.

I am in the hands of the House. Should the House give unanimous consent for this debate to go on as long as the hon. members want it to, I am quite prepared to extend the sitting.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I do not think this is a matter of consent.

I think that we have very clearly on our records in this House of Commons the right, as was established not by members sitting on the government side or even members sitting in the Official Opposition, but in fact by a member who had sat in the very party of the hon. member for Kamloops. He in fact moved this, and it was accepted by this House.

I would ask that, at a very minimum, before you make a ruling, Madam Speaker, what you would do is take the time to look up that precedent. It is very crucial. We do not want to do anything that is contrary to the rules. Far from that. In fact, it is very important to us that we go by the precedents that have been established in this House.

As I said, to help the Chair, I want to indicate to the Chair that it was a motion moved, I believe, by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. I guess the thing that I find really surprising is that the hon. member for Kamloops, whose bill we are debating here at the moment, is not jumping up to his feet to support me.

It is his bill. We want to support him in it. We want to be with him, talk to him about it, encourage him and maybe even look at some amendments. It is very crucial.

Mr. Friesen: There was a precedent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There was a precedent.

When the Standing Orders were rewritten, the fact that during Private Members' Business it cannot be done was added at that time. Unfortunately, it is in our new rules and I cannot at this time do anything else.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I did not hear. You said they changed the rules.

An hon. member: It is three o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On June 3, 1987, a prohibition was adopted against moving motions under Standing Order 26 during Private Members' Business.

Some hon. members: It is three o'clock.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, the House by unanimous consent at all times can do what the House chooses to do. On other occasions, a division is required so the expressed intent and the will of the majority of the members in the House can prevail. Given the present argument that has been going on about whether or not the House should continue, my colleague has tempted to use a specific part of our rules of order.

I would like to move that this House continue this sitting this day until a majority of the members of the House agree with an adjournment motion put by a minister of the Crown.

I would like to present that motion, seconded by—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member. Such a motion would require a 48–hour notice. I think the hon. member knows that. The motion is not receivable. It would require a 48–hour notice.

Is there unanimous consent for this debate to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being no unanimous consent I must say that the time allocated for the consideration of Private Members' Business has expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being three o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at one o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.12 p.m.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

GOVERNMENT PRIORITY

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider means of ensuring that regional development remains a priority in all decisions to be made by the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity today to debate my motion on regional development. I know that this question has been addressed in the past on numerous occasions, but it seems that it will have to be debated over and over again for the regions of this country actually to see any benefits.

It is especially important now because the regions of this country feel a sense of alienation like never before. Whether it is in western Canada, in the north, in northern Ontario, in northern or eastern Quebec or in Atlantic Canada, these regions have one thing in common. They feel that their government in Ottawa has forgotten about them, and they feel that Ottawa does not care. This is a tragedy.

This is what is slowly killing the heart of our country. Whatever I can do to contribute to reversing this disastrous trend, I will gladly do. This situation has become particularly critical with the Conservative administration.

This government, as we all know, is running the country like a corporation, putting principles like corporate profits and good balance sheets ahead of the interests of people. It is not even doing that well.

As Atlantic Canadians have always known, when the national government operates purely on economic efficiency principles the regions are bound to suffer. The centrepiece, the raison d'être of the Conservative government's two mandates, is the so-called free trade agreement. With this agreement, Canada is now in a position where it cannot make regional development a priority. It cannot do that because the FTA is basically a bill of rights for the corporate giants, and their objectives become the priorities of this government without questioning.

• (1310)

What the corporate giants basically want, besides free access to our natural resources, is the creation of a level playing field which would use the American standard as a model. Therefore, on behalf of corporate America, the Conservative government is presently well on its way to changing Canadian standards to bring them down to those of the U.S.

This means that our social programs are being destroyed one by one and that anything considered a subsidy by corporate America is being dismantled. The federal government's financial involvement in creating the circumstances which will enhance regional development is considered a subsidy by corporate America.

Even though the Prime Minister had vowed that free trade would not hurt the regions and that regional equality would be one of the benefits of the deal, there is convincing evidence that his heartless, big business oriented agenda is a betrayal of the Canadian concept of regional equality.

I would like to summarize the main consequences of this so-called free trade agreement on Atlantic Canada. When most of the country was well out of the 1982 recession, Atlantic Canada was still struggling. Instead of helping our region, the present government has made it worse. Many Atlantic Canadians believe that this situation is the result of vengeance by the Tory government and the Prime Minister, in particular, toward the citizens of this country who had the foresight to vote Liberal in the last election. Something that has really put our development in jeopardy has been the dismantling of our transportation system.

Mr. Belsher: Can you say that with a straight face?

Mr. Dionne: Yes, with a very straight face, and I could wipe the grin off yours too, maybe before this is over.

Privatization, deregulation and cuts in subsidies have sadly diminished our ability to transport people and goods in and out of Atlantic Canada, creating a situation where continuing development becomes extremely difficult.

The air transport companies are now in private hands. They operate wherever they choose, which is where the bigger profits are, and as a consequence smaller communities are losing an essential means of transportation or are left with second-class service. And the worst is yet to come.

Rail transportation is also under attack. We have witnessed the decimation of VIA Rail. On top of losing 447 jobs, maritimers now have only one Atlantic train, a combination of the Ocean and the Atlantic, from Halifax to Montreal six times weekly. We also lost the Halifax-Yarmouth run, the Halifax-Sydney, the Halifax-Port Hawkesbury, the Moncton-Campbellton-Edmunston, the Halifax-Moncton-Saint John routes. Moreover, we lost a bus route on to Prince Edward Island that links the province to VIA at Moncton.

By failing to promote an efficient rail transportation system the Tories are putting additional pressure on our roads, which will need major improvements since more truck traffic is evident on all of the highways in this country. The subsidies to railways for moving export grain and flour to eastern ports were also cancelled. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission estimates that $14.4 million in activity will be lost to the region because of the termination of the At and East program. Should both Atlantic grain elevators be unable to continue their operations, which is likely, the resulting negative impact would be somewhere in the vicinity of $34.3 million.

The decision made by this government following the free trade agreement has resulted in the crippling of our transportation system which needed improvement and without which sustainable development for our region becomes impossible.

One good idea that this government has put in place, I must say, is ACOA. The good thing about this agency was that it was set up in the region. It was staffed by people of the region, and these people were making decisions on something that they knew.

Originally, the ACOA budget was $1.05 billion for five years, an humble investment but an investment nevertheless. The problem is that the Tory government found a way to turn a good thing into a bad one. The Prime Minister has a real talent for that.

With its incentive right wing agenda, it decided to spread the amount over seven years instead of five, which means a cut of 28 per cent. One of the consequences of these cuts is that ACOA officials have to deal with too many cases at the same time, which does not permit the proper counselling to allow success to happen as quickly as it should. People are becoming more and disillusioned with the program and are losing faith, which is a sad commentary on this government's record.

The Conservative government has also signed co-operation agreements with the Atlantic provinces. The agreements replace the economic regional development agreements that were put in place by the Liberal government. The result for Atlantic Canada is a loss of more than $300 million. We could surely use that amount of development in these tough times. We need it badly to build an economic structure without which we will never be able to contribute positively to the wealth of the country.

The Conservative government is also cutting transfer payments to the Atlantic Canada. This means cuts to medicare and post-secondary education, which is totally unacceptable. There has been $17.7 million cut this year and $37 million will be cut next year. This is what Tories call progress.

On top of that, with its fiscal and monetary policies designed to suppress inflation concentrated in southern Ontario by high interest rates and an artificially high dollar which again come directly from the free trade deal, the Tory government has been killing jobs at an alarming pace in Atlantic Canada and in the rest of the country.

This is without mentioning the closing down of rural post offices, the cuts to CBC, to Radio-Canada, the mismanagement of the fisheries, and the delay in the Hibernia project.

Once the table is set for an economic and social disaster, what does the government do? It cuts our unemployment insurance program. Approximately 77,500 Atlantic Canadians will see a net loss in UI benefits this year. This could not have come at a worse time. Unemployment insurance has always been seen as a means for the federal government to achieve rough equality across the country and buffer sections of the regions experiencing hardship.

What is totally unacceptable once again is that corporate America believes our federal government's support of the UI program constitutes a subsidy and therefore presents an unfair advantage to Canadian companies and employers. The Tory government decided to lower our standards to U.S. levels. Now the total cost of the program will be borne by employees and employers and those who will suffer are the people and the regions of this country. Atlantic Canada will be especially hard hit.

• (1320)

I could go on talking about the mess which the Tory government, acting on behalf of the interests of corporate America, has inflicted on Atlantic Canada. What we have to do now is think of solutions. Are there any? I believe there are. Yes, there is a solution but only if there is political will.

Let us take a quick look at what the parties are offering as solutions. There seems to be a consensus that an effective regional development policy is vital for Canada. Unfortunately, however, no one seems to agree on how to accomplish this goal, primarily because no one seems to agree on what an effective regional development policy should be.

Let us take a look at the views that have been expressed in this House. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that examination of the varying approaches to regional development will reveal the strength of the Liberal Party's perspective.

The NDP has made it clear that it disagrees with current government policy on regional development. It is argued that we should go back to the way things were, when we had the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It is argued that we must have a holistic approach to regional development. In order to develop such an approach, the NDP calls for the creation of a standing committee and a specific government department to deal with regional development. This department's mandate would cover the whole gambit of economic development in a certain region. For example, transportation, fisheries and economic development would be looked at as a whole rather than in isolation.

On this basis, the NDP has expressed its dissatisfaction with the government's decentralized approach to regional development. The creation of ACOA, for example, has been criticized. It is argued that its power and its mandate are far too limited and that the interests of Atlantic Canada would perhaps best be served if there was a department set up in Ottawa.

The Conservatives, on the other hand, defend their policies by saying that ACOA is effective precisely because it is centred in Atlantic Canada where Atlantic Canadians can play a leading role in determining what it does and how it functions. Moreover, they point out that even though the ACOA headquarters is located in Moncton, there are regional offices in each of the provincial capitals as well as Ottawa.

There are valid points made by both the New Democrats and even by the Conservatives. However, there are numerous misleading and, permit me to say, false statements as well. The view of the Liberal Party is based on a combination of the valid points and the elimination of the false ones. The NDP approach to regional development is regressive. The Conservative approach is corporatist. There seems to be a consensus that an effective regional development policy is vital for Canada. Unfortunately, however, no one seems to agree on how to accomplish this goal primarily because no one seems to agree on what an effective regional development policy should be.

Let us take a look at the views that have been expressed in the House. I am convinced that examination of the varying approaches to regional development will reveal the strength of the Liberal Party's perspective.

The NDP has made it clear that it disagrees with current government policy on regional development. It is argued that we should go back to the way things were before.

On this basis, the NDP expressed its dissatisfaction with the government's decentralized approach to regional development. The creation of ACOA, for example, has been criticized.

The Conservatives, on the other hand, defend their policies by saying that ACOA is effective precisely because it is centred in Atlantic Canada where Atlantic Canadians can play a lead role in determining what it does and how it functions. Moreover, they point out that even though the ACOA headquarters is located in Moncton, as I said earlier, there are regional offices.

The Liberals believe that if Canada is to be competitive, it is essential that regional development policies and public investment decisions be a fundamental part of national economic policy. We believe that this country needs the advantages to be gained from strong regional economies.

We believe that economic growth in the next two decades will be highly focused on knowledge and service-based activities. Industries will depend for their success upon an educated and productive labour force and upon cost-effective communications systems for the transfer of data and new knowledge. There will be no need to restrict these industries to the industrial heartland of Canada. Quality of life, communication services, personal transportation and information processing facilities will be dominant factors in determining where business in the future prospers.

We believe that the Canadian government can create the conditions that can attract knowledge-based and resource-based industries to slow growth areas of Canada, such as Atlantic Canada. In other words, we believe that it is possible to do the opposite of what is being done today by this Tory government.

Well-planned public investments can stimulate private sector investments. We want to direct public investment to slow growth areas. Atlantic Canada, in particular, still requires strong investment to develop further its basic infrastructure. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government not only can intervene, but must intervene to achieve that end which will enable Atlantic Canada to eventually become a contributor to our national wealth.

Some hon. members: Time.

Mr. Dionne: Our leader, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, has already demonstrated this kind of leadership when as President of the Treasury Board in the mid 1970s, he put together a comprehensive government decentralization program—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I will ask the hon. member to wind up his speech, because his time is up.

[English]

Mr. Dionne: Thirty seconds, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Thirty seconds.

Mr. Dionne: Thank you. Our leader, the Hon. Jean Chrétien has already demonstrated the kind of leadership when he was President of the Treasury Board. More than 10,000 jobs were created. That can be done all over again.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the short time that we have today to comment on the motion of this hon. member, I think it is important to put some information on the record and talk about what I think we can do in this country for regional development.

The motion is one that we can support, but I suspect that because of the way it is written the hon. member was perhaps being devious. He expects the government members to rise and support this motion as well.

Mr. Dionne: I am not expecting anything from the government.

Mr. Gardiner: He is not expecting anything from the government. Well, I suppose, it is what we have come to expect of the Conservatives.

He made some comments that bear some attention. What he was starting to get at was the whole question of hit and miss of regional development that we have had so far in this country under both the Liberals and the Conservatives. I would like to comment on some of the general programs of the government that act as regional development and some of the specific regional development initiatives that governments have taken. I would like to comment on the number of key agreements to date where the government clearly has failed.

• (1330)

Let us take a look at one of the general ways of regional development, VIA Rail. There is no question that all Canadians know that this current government, and the previous government under the Liberals, have not provided the leadership necessary to see that we develop a full-fledged, well run and well maintained VIA Rail network across the country.

The hon. member spoke about his leader when he was in office. What I remember when the Liberals were in office was how they cut up VIA Rail in the same way the Conservatives have done. The member also talked about the importance of developing an education policy that ensures the workers in our industries and workplaces develop the skills and technical ability necessary to compete in the world today. One of the ways to do that is through post-secondary education.

It is important to point out that for all the support hon. members have given post-secondary education, there is a very serious concern in provinces where, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, under the Liberals' six and five program, it took away the ruling that any federal transfer funds on health and post-secondary education had to be spent on that. Now we have to rely on trust.

I asked the Secretary of State if he could tell us whether federal funds meant for health and post-secondary education are being spent on that in the province of British Columbia. The minister would have to trust us that it is. It is an example of some of the ways in which the previous Liberal government allowed some of the provinces—and the allegations have been made in British Columbia—to spend money meant for health and education to pave highways. That is not the kind of regional development policy that we want in this country.

As well, let us take a look at some of the specific programs aimed at regional development. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the primary resources of this land have made us rich and wealthy. I suggest to you that in a number of specific areas such as our farms, fish and forests—the three *f*s if you like—this government has failed when it comes to a number of specific initiatives.

I have spoken about one a number of times in the House. The forest agreements are very specific initiatives between the federal and provincial governments to ensure that we do the replanting and research that is necessary. By using these agreements, the two levels of government can talk about the need to develop proper environmental policy when it relates to our forests.

What do we have? We are expecting the government to consider means of ensuring that regional development remains a priority. How high a priority have the forest agreements been in western Canada? As you probably know, the forest agreements in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba expired March 31, 1989. The agreement in British Columbia expired on March 31, 1990. Based on what the provincial forestry minister said about verbal commitments for new funding in the green plan, as you know, there are no specifics whatsoever in the green plan relating to providing the necessary funds to forestry in British Columbia.

So as I said at the beginning, it has been very much a hit and miss approach to regional development across the country. Just this morning in Halifax, where the latest mess is taking place, there was an announcement of another co-operation agreement being signed in that province. Again, we have a forest agreement that expired in 1989. It was renewed for two years. It is now coming up for renewal on March 31, 1991 and where are we? It is really hit and miss with each particular program. It certainly is hit and miss depending on the part of the country that you live in with this government and its policy on regional development.

We are hopeful I suppose, but we are wondering about the major emphasis of this new agreement signed this morning. It is really looking at, in a sense, getting into the incentives game that can often be very difficult for provinces and areas when they start bidding against each other. What generally happens is that the standards get lower and lower and we do not end up with the kind of policy in place that really should be there. We have had hit and miss when it comes to the forest agreements.

We have certainly had a miss to date, at least in British Columbia where, in a recent letter I received from the Minister of Agriculture, he said that the agricultural subagreement under the economic agreement with British Columbia has been basically put on hold while they try to resolve a host of other problems. In fact the Minister of Agriculture suggested:

> My Department does not have an identified source of funds or vehicle for agricultural development programming to replace ARDSA, if it is not included as a priority under the ERDA.

That is the economic regional development agreement. If that is not a miss, Mr. Speaker, you tell me one. That letter is about agriculture in British Columbia, saying that the agreements are really not there.

We have to develop a regional development policy in this country. We need to put the country's resources back on track, as my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan is doing, with his getting VIA Rail back on track policy. That is a general tool of regional development.

We need a policy that ensures we get on with these agreements. We do not need to hide behind a bunch of announcements trying to spin them out over the next two and a half years when this government thinks it may finally put together a regional development policy.

We support the motion. It is a vague one. I guess it is a Liberal regional development vague plan. Because of that, I think there is an opening for the government to support this motion. I know it will do that. I hope and trust that it has the best intentions at heart. We are not sure about that though, if we look at the track record. Let us hope we get a better one.

I am convinced that with the policies we have developed, after the next election campaign, the New Democrats will have the regional development policy for this country.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the global economy has embraced a rapidly changing new order in recent years. Industrially and commercially, the essential characteristic of this new order is market globalization or the internationalization of business. For an extremely large and underpopulated country such as ours, this presents a number of challenges which are basic to the preservation of our standard of living, our social programs and our systems of values.

For Canada, and for Quebec in particular, this wave of economic change, although risky, presents novel opportunities for development and prosperity which should be explored.

In the last six years, our economic actions have been predicated entirely upon one fundamental goal: to ensure that all regions of Canada benefit from the emerging new economic order. From the start, we devised a long–range action plan that would enable us to reach this objective.

The problems of Quebec are related to a number of phenomena, such as the emergence of a new industrial order, market globalization, the increased role of competition in international trade and the increasingly vital roles played by research, development and staff training in opening up and maintaining markets. It is essential that these data be taken into account in any regional development policy.

Mr Speaker, for six years now, Quebec has recorded steady economic growth that has allowed it to make strides in the modernization of its industrial base. A good deal still remains to be done, however, before this modernization is completed.

Regional development problems in Quebec, moreover, must take into account one fundamental fact, namely, the dual nature of Quebec's economy. On the one hand, the central regions of the province consist essentially in urban areas comprising 85 percent of the province's population; the economies of these regions are centred on the secondary and tertiary sectors. On the other hand, the resource regions of Quebec cover more than 90 percent of the province's territory, yet are home to less than 15 percent of the population. The economy of these resource regions is centred essentially on the primary sector and the exploitation of natural resources such as forest, mineral and fisheries resources.

Mr. Speaker, we signed with the Quebec government a master agreement on regional development which takes into account this duality and the different needs of the central and resource regions of Quebec. Let us take a closer look at the different needs of these regions.

In the central regions, such as greater Montreal, the Quebec City region, the Eastern Townships, the Bois–Francs region and the Outaouais, the economy is more diversified and more developed. Traditional sectors remain active here, but they have been eclipsed in importance by new sectors. We must now accelerate the modernization of production facilities and take steps to ensure that companies swiftly incorporate advanced technologies that will make them more productive, efficient and competitive in order that they may carve out market niches for themselves.

It is clear, in this context, that the economy of the greater Montreal region faces a number of special needs. Because this region is in direct competition with other major North American cities, and nearly half the population of Quebec resides within its boundaries, the economy of the Montreal region has a direct influence on the development of other regions in the province. It is therefore essential that the establishment and maintenance of modern economic sectors be stimulated in this region, since such sectors generate sustainable, quality jobs as well as considerable activity in other related sectors.

In recent years, the Montreal region has made significant advances in dynamic and forward–looking sectors. Aeronautics, for example, is strongly represented in the region by companies such as Bombardier, Pratt & Whitney, Bell Helicopter as well as Spar Aerospace, which has been commissioned to build RADARSAT, the first remote sensing satellite to be designed and built entirely in Canada. The decision to locate the Canadian Space Agency within the region, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, will undoubtedly help to generate considerable local economic activity in the fields of aeronautics and telecommunications.

Montreal also developed a network a big and small businesses specialized in microelectronics, informatics, software development and the manufacture of printed circuits.

Other job–producing economic sectors have maintained their presence in the greater Montreal region. These include pharmaceuticals, biotechnology and consulting engineering (with such giants as Lavallin and SNC).

All of these sectors require advanced technologies and considerable value added. They provide quality jobs, and their export potential is high. It is vital that the Montreal economy rely more and more on these forward–looking sectors.

Of course, the various levels of government are prepared to do their share, set up programs and coordinate efforts in this direction. It is nevertheless clear that business must make an immediate commitment to the research and development inherent in economic development.

It is all the more essential, Mr. Speaker, that we devote efforts to our resource regions, considering that their industrial base lacks diversification and is often threatened, that these regions are located far away from major urban centres and that unemployment is definitely higher in these regions than in urban areas.

Initiatives have therefore been taken to turn our natural resources to good account by enhancing management and conservation with a view to sustainable development. The technical and professional skills of labour must also be improved.

For example, in the logging, pulp and paper and lumber industries, we are working with the Quebec government for the improvement of timber management, the construction of new access roads to these resources and above all reforestation, which is essential to sustainable development.

We also allocated funds for the diversification of regional enterprises, and for development programs in the agri–food and agriculture sectors.

In response to the need for modernization of production equipment we have set up a series of programs. Thus, the federal government's concerted Enterprise Development Program and Manufacturing Productivity Improvement Program are designed specifically to support small businesses engaging in equipment modernization and industrial diversification projects.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, it is most essential that everyone understand the challenges and the development possibilities involved, that objectives be mutually agreed upon and that everyone work towards the same end. For its part, the government will continue to allocate resources as judiciously as possible, and will also continue to inform Quebec businesses about how best to benefit from the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

For those who do not speak Inuktitut, I will continue in English.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to speak to the motion of my colleague from Miramichi on regional development.

I commend my colleague, the hon. member for Miramichi, for his motion and for keeping the issue of regional development alive. In his region and in mine, a continued strong federal presence and commitment to economic development is critical. In the north, we have seen, over the past couple of years, a declining commitment.

For example, the federal government has cut back its fiscal transfers to the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In 1984, the previous Liberal government had negotiated five-year formula funding agreements with the two territorial governments.

In the renegotiation of these agreements last year, the current federal government changed that formula. It reduced it so the two territories will receive less funding over the next five years than they would have received under the original formula. Specifically, the Northwest Territories will receive about $110 million less over the next five years. The Yukon government will receive about $80 million less.

In addition to these cutbacks, both territories are still waiting for renewal of the northern economic development agreements. They are now in the process of negotiations. I hope the government of the Northwest Territories will be successful in coming to a conclusion that is preferable for the Northwest Territories.

In 1984, the Yukon and the federal government signed a five-year economic development agreement worth $26.4 million. That general agreement and the subsidiary agreements negotiated under it, expired in March 1989. Almost two years later, we still do not have a new economic development agreement with the Yukon. It is true that the federal government has provided some interim funding to the Yukon government to carry on some activities, but not all the previously funded components received interim funding.

In the Northwest Territories, the picture is similar. In 1987, a four-year economic development agreement worth $38.3 million was signed. Two of the six subsidiary agreements negotiated under that general agreement expired last March. One of them, the tourism sub-agreement, received some interim funding.

The other four sub-agreements expire this coming March. For both of the territories, renewed economic development agreements are necessary for territorial economic growth.

• (1350)

In the Northwest Territories, the government is looking for a more flexible program which can be utilized in less developed areas and communities and which has less emphasis on profitability. We are anxiously awaiting announcements from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning renewed economic development agreements with both territories and we will be looking, as well, for adequate funding in these agreements.

The north continues to be extremely concerned about the effects of the goods and services tax on both northern consumers and businesses. With the highest cost of living in the country, the goods and services tax is going to affect the northern territories more adversely than anywhere else. I say this especially for the eastern Arctic, the area that I represent, where the cost of living in the area can be about two and a half times higher than that in the city of Ottawa. A litre of milk might cost $5 compared to $1 and some cents for a litre of milk in Ottawa. So, Mr. Speaker, I think we have to convince this government that it has to do as much as it can for regional and northern development.

For the past couple of years, I and other northerners have been telling the finance minister that the GST is going to do us more harm than good. The finance minister stubbornly continues to insist that we will benefit, despite evidence to the contrary. The finance minister maintains that the north will be better off with the goods and services tax. I can point out that resource development might be better off—I say "might" with a question mark—under the GST, but the average person living in Pond Inlet, Coppermine, Pelly Bay or Grise Fiord will not be better off because the purchasing power of that individual will be a lot less and certainly the purchasing power for groceries will be a lot less because of having to pay 7 per cent tax on other goods which presently are not taxed under the MST.

The most recent confirmation of the negative impact of the GST on the north has been pointed out in a report by Ernst and Young, management consultants. This report was made public earlier this month by the Ontario government. It is a report that was commissioned by the provincial and territorial ministers responsible for economic development in the north. I will quote a few excerpts from this report for the benefit of hon. members and for anyone from the finance minister's office who may be listening.

As it is typical of the minister, in replying to my question on this issue in the House a couple of weeks ago, he picked out the only positive aspect of this report and quoted it verbatim to the House when I asked him a question about this report. On the negative side, I quote: "Small business, in all sectors, will be hit by high compliance costs which will be particularly onerous in the north, due to the lack of professional advisory services".

Arts and crafts is an important industry to the residents of the eastern Arctic. This report says that these activities, and I quote: "—will be negatively affected by the goods and services tax, since original works of art have been exempt from the FST but will be subject to the GST. The cost of transporting the art to southern markets will also bear GST, even where the artist can select to be exempt, as a result of having sales of less than $30,000 per year".

I would just like to read one more quote: "Municipalities, universities, hospitals and schools in the north will bear higher over all costs under the GST. Rebates for these institutions are to be based on a single national calculation of the increase in the tax burden associated with sales tax reform. However, because local mark-ups and transport costs did not bear FST, the FST content of institutional purchase in the north had been lower than in the south. The rebates will therefore not be sufficient to compensate for the additional tax burden under the GST. "

I would like to take this opportunity to support the motion of my colleague for Miramichi on regional development.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate today and say a few words with regard to regional development. It is a priority of this government. The results are coming through loud and clear.

I also want to say a few words with regard to the Western Diversification Fund that was announced in 1987. The act was passed in 1988, allocating $1.2 billion to the four western provinces. The head office is in Edmonton, but there are satellite offices within each province.

The government has adopted a regional approach that reflects the special circumstances, the needs, the uniqueness, the strength and even indeed the weaknesses of certain areas.

Western Canadians know that we live with a very volatile resource base where oil, gas and agriculture unfortunately are not stable commodities but tend to have peaks and valleys. The Western Diversification program has been extremely successful. It is one that I have worked with quite a bit.

Over 1,866 regular projects have been approved, representing about $542 million since inception. I also want to say that the assistance is not being used to bail out or shore up businesses that are in trouble. It is not used to modernize plants nor expand existing businesses, but it works to promote diversification. That was its main policy in the form of new products, new technologies, new techniques, new markets and import replacements for western Canada.

They have also supported 16 systemic projects representing about $52 million. One that I would like to refer to is the Centre for Frontier Engineering Research, CFER. It has just sent out a special issue with regard to the opening of its project. It was an $18 million project in Edmonton la st May 28.

This certainly shows co-operation where the federal government worked in co-operation with the provincial government and private enterprise to see this become a reality.

I feel not only has this been extremely beneficial but the other aspect about WD is that 80 per cent of the commitments are repayable. WD gives a helping hand. It gives people a kick-start. We do not have hand-out programs.

The other thing that was interesting in the Speech from the Throne in 1989 was the government's procurement policy. They were told to direct themselves toward regional considerations. In the last couple of years western Canada has received three or four major contracts. One had to do with the Department of Transport's CAATS contract for $380 million. It was awarded to Hughes Aircraft Canada which will open offices in Calgary and Vancouver. The contract was $380 million with spin-offs of over $500 million across Canada.

Also, there was a contract awarded to Computing Devices Canada for over $1 billion from the Department of National Defence. These people are going to open a head office in Calgary. Eighty per cent of that $1 billion will certainly go into the western part of Canada.

In conclusion, I have to say that the ACOA head office in Moncton with $1.05 billion, FEDNOR headquartered in Sault Ste. Marie with $60 million over five years and Western Diversification with the $1.2 billion, have certainly served to diversify. No longer do people sitting in Ottawa make the decisions. It is people in the regions making decisions for the regions and their needs. Diversification is very important.

• (1400 )

We are always open to amendments, to improvement, and to ways to do the job better. This is one area that has really been successful. The motion being discussed today is really a non-starter. We are in there. We are doing it. Regional diversification is a priority with this government and always will be.

Mr. Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Last October, in Gaspe, Mr. Speaker, Conservative members in the House of Commons who are the strength of Quebecers in Ottawa adopted a resolution asking the federal government to remove from the Canada Health Act all impediments preventing user's fees and other charges. Senator Roch Bolduc, who personally worked with a dozen Conservative Quebecers on a number of federal health system reform projects stated that these are leftovers from the 1950s put there by the very people who are responsible for our bankruptcy, meaning the officials who worked under the Liberal government.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Marc-Yvan Côté, who is a driving force, will certainly carry out the necessary reform of the Quebec health care and social services.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the B.C. Central Credit Union published a report outlining the foreign control of our forest industry. The report's results are of serious concern. Foreign corporations now control just over 43 per cent of industry assets according to this study.

This foreign control is aided and abetted by this government's free trade and softwood lumber tariff policies. This foreign control of our main industry raises serious questions about the future of our forest communities and our ability to have our forests managed in the best environmental manner.

The Minister of Forestry should launch an immediate investigation into the growing foreign control of our forest industry, and he should do it before this government allows all of our resources to be turned over and controlled by U.S. multinational corporations.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE MGR. ALBERTUS MARTIN

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): With the passing of Monsignor Albertus Martin, Mr. Speaker, the people of the Nicolet diocese and the rest of Quebec certainly have lost one of the greatest builders and defenders of the Church in Quebec.

Monsignor Martin was a scholar and a world-class canon law specialist. He had been thoroughly involved in the reforms suggested by Vatican II. He was endowed with a remarkable intelligence and was recognized as a man of exceptional apostolic dedication. His administrative and leadership skills led him to found the Nicolet Seminary, rebuild the Nicolet cathedral following its destruction and give a sound financial basis to each of those parishes.

A very accessible man, he knew how to round up his flock following a disaster, whether a fire, a death, a sickness or the loss of a job. He left behind him apostolic accomplishments beyond compare. His simplicty, dedication, hard work, honesty, generosity, kindness and class made him really a man of God.

Monsignor Martin used to quote St. Paul often. Thinking of him, I wish to quote St. Paul. In his Epistle to the Galatians, he wrote: "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance". This certainly describes perfectly Monsignor Martin's heritage. Monsignor Martin, farewell and thank you!

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in its report last week the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology of the House of Commons made the simple statement that the economic well-being of Canadians depended on science and technology.

If we want jobs in Canada we have to add value to products and services through science and technology and the skills of Canadians, not just scientists and technologists but the men and women who work on the shop floor across this country.

This is a simple message which to now has not been understood by the Conservative government. A newspaper headline on the weekend read: "PM Shatters Dreams of Top Canadian Scientists". The headline is wrong. It should read: "PM Shatters Dreams of all Canadians".

This government has damaged Canada's R and D capacity, cut support for industrial research and development, cut transfer payments for post-secondary education, and cut funds for training.

Can we hope for a death-bed conversion from this government, or is it too late to reverse a disastrous record?

NATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is now the holiday season and it is incumbent upon us to promote the spirit of giving and caring for our brothers and sisters. Yet it is a tragic fact that many of our nation's first peoples live in overcrowded homes, often without water and sewage facilities.

Can aboriginal children receive the education they need when they return each night to a crowded house? Can they return to school fresh and ready to learn after trying to sleep with many others in these same rooms? Can seniors expect to retain good health? Can expectant mothers hope to provide proper care in such conditions?

This is a good time for the government to make its New Year's resolution to the native peoples of Canada. This government must commit itself to alleviating the problem of substandard housing.

For many natives housing has improved, but not for all. I think it only fitting that we in this House do what we can to help the native people improve housing conditions in their communities.

SKI NORQUAY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, on December 15, I was pleased to be a part of the official opening of the extension of Ski Norquay, located in beautiful Banff National Park.

I am sure all colleagues will want to join with me in sending congratulations to the management and staff of this resort. The new ski runs on Wishbone and Skyline Ridge will provide good skiing and much challenge to people not only from the Banff area but from all of Canada and the world.

Tourism is such a major player in Canada's economy, we should take every opportunity to promote ventures like Ski Norquay and all tourist facilities throughout Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on August 31 of this year, the Minister of Employment and Immigration eliminated the self-exile category for east Europeans wishing to immigrate to Canada.

At the same time the minister imposed a 40 per cent slowdown in the processing of these applications already in the system. The result has been a three to four-year delay for the outcome of these applications. The delay is causing a financial burden on government and undue hardship on applicants and Canadian sponsors.

I would like to urge the minister, first, to lift all the restrictions for the final disposition for Canadian consulates; second, remove the 40 per cent slowdown of processing; third, give high priority to all self-exile applications; and, fourth, allow work permit authorizations for those applicants already in Canada awaiting the final decision.

These proposed changes will not create a need for a change in regulations, only a change in policy, which is firmly in the minister's power.

In the spirit of Christmas, I ask the minister to implement these four recommendations before the House rises for the winter break.

THE LATE CARL NICKLE

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a former member of this House, Mr. Carl Nickle, who passed away in Calgary last week at the age of 76.

Carl Nickle served as the member of Parliament for the ridings of Calgary West and Calgary South respectively from 1951 to 1957, using this place as a forum to promote the interests of western Canada passionately.

The son of oilman Sam Nickle, Carl was raised and educated in Calgary where he founded both the Daily Oil Bulletin and the Canadian Oil Register before going on to establish his own oil company, Conventures Ltd.

Nickle's achievements were certainly not confined to the oil industry. He served with the Canadian army from 1939 to 1948 where he achieved the rank of lieutenant. An avid coin collector, he became a prominent philanthropist, underwriting the Nickle Art Museum at the University of Calgary and playing a key role in the creation of the Nickle family foundation, which provides scholarships to students and cultural groups.

Carl Nickle was an exceptional parliamentarian, a distinguished Canadian, and a friend.

To his wife, Diana, and their family, I extend sincere condolences.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, when Canada Post shut down public counter services at Postal Station A in Sudbury, it promised more accessible service and said that privatization would give us this.

• (1410 )

At 12.45 on Monday, December 10, one of its privatized outlets ran out of stamps. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? In the middle of the Christmas rush, it ran out of stamps.

At other privatized postal outlets patrons were forced to wait in long lines because they just did not have the personnel to serve them more quickly. Yet one block down the street at the commercial outlet they could not serve these people because they are not important enough to Canada Post. We in Sudbury have had enough of being sacrificed by this government for the bottom line at Air Canada, VIA Rail, CBC, and Canada Post.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House of Commons subcommittee on forestry, I was very pleased today to receive a positive response to our recent report from a large group of national organizations that both individually and collectively expressed their interest in and their support for both the economic and the environmental interests in our forests as expressed by that report.

These organizations included the Canadian Forestry Association, the Canadian Institute of Forestry, the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, the Canadian Federation of Woodlot Owners, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, Wildlife Habitat Canada, the Canadian Nature Federation, Ducks Unlimited Canada, and the Canadian Federation of Professional Foresters.

It is particularly encouraging that these national institutions strongly support our recommendations for the implementation of sustainable development in Canada to begin in our forests and to be accomplished under federal and provincial leadership in a process of partnership with all stake holders in those forests.

The organizations which gathered here today represent a profound and comprehensive expression of the concept of partnership in the management of Canada's forest resources.

CPR TRAINING

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday evening a Canadian Airlines plane travelling from Ottawa to Vancouver was forced to make an emergency landing in Calgary. While on board, the 10-month old son of my constituents, Robert and Taunia Myrah, had stopped breathing. The flight attendants who were untrained in the procedures of cardio-pulmonary resuscitation administered this technique while reading from a manual.

Because emergency medical assistance is not readily available while planes are in the air, it is inconceivable that flight personnel are not required to possess these life saving techniques.

[Translation]

The airlines must assure their passengers that at least one of their flight attendants is trained in these techniques should an emergency come up.

[English]

I offer my sincere condolences to the family of Colton Myrah and recommend that as many Canadians as possible become familiar with the life saving techniques of CPR.

CANADA'S GREEN PLAN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Fraser Valley East are very concerned with environmental issues. The beauty of the valley is often cloaked by ugly clouds of smog blown in from Vancouver. Air quality is not simply a cosmetic concern for the residents of Chilliwack, nor for that matter is the murkiness of the Fraser River a cosmetic concern. Every time we breathe the air or look at the water we are reminded of the pressing need for action.

The green plan for a healthy environment is a plan for action. I have made the minister aware of our concerns. The minister has listened, the minister has considered, and the minister has acted.

Targets are set for the establishment of comprehensive emission controls complete with a monitoring and advisory component. In 1991, the federal government will join with the Government of British Columbia to start development of a Fraser River action plan for the Fraser River and Burrard Inlet. The action plan will focus on restoring the river's fish population meaning clearer and cleaner water.

The green plan will ensure that the fresh is put back into fresh air and that the clean will be put back into clean water. This is definitely good news for residents of the Fraser Valley and indeed all Canadians.

Oral Questions

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, during the Liberal leadership campaign the hon. member for Hamilton East asked: "Where does Jean Chrétien stand on the GST?"

I believe we can still ask the question: Where do the Liberals stand on the GST? Why did the Liberal senators of the national Liberal caucus not oppose the GST legislation when leave was sought to introduce it in the Senate? Why did the Liberal senators and the Liberal caucus not oppose the GST when it was introduced at first reading in the Senate? Why did the Liberal senators and the Liberal caucus not oppose the GST at second reading in the Senate? Why did the Liberal senators and the Liberal caucus not defeat the GST when they had the majority in committee during April, May, June, July, August, September, and October?

For months and months, while the Liberals had the majority in the Senate, they chose not to defeat the GST. Could it be that the Liberal senators did not defeat the GST because they were following orders from their leader, Jean Chrétien?

ILLITERACY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, let us consider the following: in May a Statistics Canada report revealed that the reading skills of 2.9 million Canadians were too limited to allow them to deal with most of the written material they encounter in everyday life. In 1987 the Southam survey found one in four Canadians to be functionally illiterate. These studies help reveal the magnitude of the illiteracy problem which challenges the future development of our country.

As we move to address this problem, our actions must be placed in a larger context. Illiteracy is just one part of the puzzle. Our actions on literacy therefore must be part of a much broader strategy to improve social mobilization and our social welfare system.

Our efforts must be accompanied by actions in areas like training, education, child care, employment equity, and initiatives to address the problem of poverty in this country.

I look forward to our government moving forward on this social policy agenda. Yet at the same time I urge that this be done in a consistent, comprehensive and co–ordinated manner.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week in Corner Brook and Calgary, last night in Rimouski and Windsor, tens and tens of thousands of Canadians rallied to call for the restoration of their CBC local television stations.

In Windsor, Ontario, for example, 10,000 people called for the bringing back of their station, the only Canadian station of any kind in the entire region. People say that without their stations they are less a part of Canada. They are tired of the unravelling of this country due to the decisions of this government.

If this government is truly interested in maintaining the unity of this country, will it restore local CBC television broadcasting right now?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity, just a few hours ago, to discuss these matters with representatives of the people from those areas, not Rimouski in particular, but the North Shore.

The CBC applies the principle of providing symmetrical programming services in all regions of the country. It was forced to close local stations as was Radio–Québec a few years back.

We must bear in mind that Radio–Québec decided in 1986 to close its nine production centers for financial reasons. In 1990, it closed down its Gaspé office. Neither Radio–Québec nor the CBC acted irresponsibly. Both were simply responding to economic pressures which force leaders to make decisions, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what the minister calls symmetry is the amputation of the regions of this country in a way that cuts it up and destroys its unity. That is not symmetry; that is not what the people of this country want.

This is a time when we should be thinking of the needs of those less fortunate than ourselves. Yet, because of the decisions of the CBC approved of by this government, next year there will be no Heart Fund telethon in Ottawa, no Easter Seals telethon in Windsor, no Children's Hospital telethon in Winnipeg.

My question is for the Minister of Communications. Why is the government so heartless, cruel, and insensitive that it supports the decisions of the CBC to eliminate these telethons? If the government has a heart, will the government take steps to ensure that these telethons are broadcast next year and for many years to come? Will the minister give this reassurance to the needy, the crippled, and the poor of the country right now?

• (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CBC has regularly received funding from the government to fulfil its mandate. If you analyse the percentages of government funding allocated to government programs, you will see that the CBC has been privileged in this respect in that its percentages were higher.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this government has a responsibility to provide for sound public administration, especially where the Budget is concerned. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to make sure we have social services across the country next year— One thing is certain, and that is that we will have those services thanks to the policies of this government, and no thanks to the policies of the previous government.

The best way to provide for this country's social, cultural and economic development is to act responsibly when dealing with public funds. That is what the previous government was incapable of doing, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have the previous government to thank for local television programming across the country, and the current government is cutting these programs. That is what is really happening, Mr. Speaker.

On the weekend, 5,000 people expressed their dissatisfaction in Rimouski, and another 10,000 in Windsor, following the shutdown of their CBC tv stations. My question is: Why is the minister depriving the regions of this vital resource? Why does he not he realize how important access to information is for these regions? Why is he isolating them even more from the rest of Canada?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CBC must take into consideration the current economic situation in this country and the environment in which it has to work, bearing in mind the reports and analyses made over the years, from Applebaum–Hébert to Caplan–Sauvageau. The CBC and its administrators are trying to provide the country with a major programming centre and representation in the regions. However, the CBC has responsibilities like the rest of the government and like other broadcasters.

In Quebec, for instance, Radio–Québec had to stop its regional services in 1986, for economic reasons, and again in 1990, for the same reasons.

I think the CBC, like Radio–Québec, is responsible for the public money it spends, and that is the framework within which it operates, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Communications if he truly believes that the maison–mère on Rene Levesque Boulevard inQuebec City can reflect better the whole of eastern Quebec than they can themselves.

The minister has completely removed the face of eastern Quebec from the screen of Radio–Canada, our international and national voice.

Yesterday I joined 5,000 people in common voice in Rimouski when they asked the Prime Minister to re–order government priorities and provide the necessary funds to serve their distinctive voice.

My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Will he make that choice? He has an option. Will he today restore the funding needed to put Radio–Canada back on the map across Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the present government has always acted responsibly in its dealings with the CBC. It has made sure that the percentage of assistance given to the corporation was greater than the amount granted all government programs. When the hon. member for Mount Royal takes part in public meetings, she should not only be mindful of the economic problems of this government but should also remember that the present Prime Minister never threatened to shut down the CBC.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Employment and Immigration). Yesterday in Rimouski, an entire region rose up to condemn the savage cuts at the CBC. The hon. member for Mount Royal was there to defend the region and the jobs that were lost. The Minister of Employment was not. Why did the minister support her government's decision? Will the minister now show her solidarity with her region and her people by defending their jobs? Does the minister have the courage to answer the question? Will she fight to bring the CBC back to eastern Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well it is most unfair to put a question of this type to a colleague whose responsibility does not lie in this area. My colleague, the hon. member for Remouski Temiscauata is not hiding behind the Minister of Communications, but her responsibilities lie elsewhere, Mr. Speaker. It is therefore my responsibility as the federal Minister of Communications to provide for the growth of the CBC, and growth means, first of all, programming. The best way to provide for programming is to put the CBC on a sound economic footing. That is how we can then provide a better service to the regions, including the Gaspé, Windsor, and other regions across Canada. The CBC will be there, in all 10 regions in this country, with two major bridgeheads that will provide programs that reflect our Canadian reality and identity. That is how the CBC will be able to serve Canadians, not with the kind of rhetoric we saw under former Liberal Prime Minister Trudeau, who had only one answer for the CBC-—

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Communications. Last week his parliamentary secretary said that the minister is always available to consult with Canadians. Yet he refused to meet with the president of CBC. He refused to meet with the 2,500 Canadians who rallied in Saskatoon, the 500 who rallied in St. John's, the 5,000 who rallied in Rimouski. He also refused to make himself available to nearly 10,000 people who gathered in Windsor yesterday not just to protest the CBC cuts, but to express the fact that they have to fight to be a part of Canada because of the actions of this government.

If this minister can have a direct line to Lavalin Corporation, why can he not he listen to Canadians who want nothing more than to have a direct line to the rest of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Communications made sure then as it does now that Canadians were consulted through various working groups and commissions of inquiry, from the Applebaum–Hébert Commission to the Caplan–Sauvageau Commission, and now the working group lead by Mr. Girard and Mr. Peters.

All those mechanisms are made available to the Canadian people so that the Canadian broadcasting system can be defined. But there is an economic reality the hon. member is not familiar with, that of an evolving market which ensures our economic as well as our cultural freedom, but also demands to be taken into account. That is precisely what the CBC leaders are doing, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Tell that to the artists and the journalists.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): I guess this minister wants to go down in history as the minister of benign neglect. He has a responsibility. He talks about maintaining culture. Come on down to Windsor. Come down to Windsor where every single day in the week we are dominated and overcome by American culture. Your job is to defend Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the economic situation is difficult. The way to deal with it, however, is not by taking demagogic measures but responsible ones, and that is what this government is doing.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question for the minister is this: has he listened to the voices coming from Rimouski, Saskatoon, Calgary, the French speaking population of Ontario? Has he listened and has he heard the anger? Has he heard the sense that they want to be able to speak to this country? Is he prepared to give them an answer that he will provide help, he will provide support and he will see that this country stays together in the future?

An hon. member: He has not listened to Orillia either, I can tell you.

• (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CBC, Radio-Québec and TV-Ontario of Toronto, like all private or public broacasting companies, like all printed media, all periodicals, and all radio networks in Canada must, like in other countries, take into consideration both the technical evolution and the economic evolution.

We cannot assure the hon. member that one sector among others would be fully protected, Mr. Speaker, because that kind of protection exists only under a communist régime. And we can see now what happens—the total collapse of the entire economic structure.

We in Canada have to be mindful of the market, and it is with that consideration in mind that the CBC management face up to their responsibilities. The government helps to the tune of more than $1 billion, but there is also the advertising side of the issue. Since the CBC does not fully capitalize with respect to advertising, it now has to take that into account and restructure itself.

INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. The afterglow of the free trade deal has resulted in a scorched earth policy for Canadian industry. The latest victims are 470 Stelco workers who are joining 4,500 other Stelco workers already on the unemployment insurance lines. Some estimate the job loss as being as high as 226,000 as a direct result of the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal, and yet the Minister for International Trade is in Washington today negotiating an extension to that deal with Mexico, because he says that there are "no fundamental obstacles".

I would like to ask the Minister of Industry whether he believes the loss of 226,000 jobs does not represent a fundamental obstacle to further negotiations and a further trade agreement.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first of all that it is in the interest of the hon. member for Hamilton East to say that the FTA is responsible for all jobs lost in the country. However, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has said very clearly that there is no way that we could put the difference between the recession and the FTA.

We believe that as much as the economic reality could be better, Canadians will be able to take advantage of the free trade agreement. Once again, I believe that we should do our best to recognize that the free trade agreement has been good for Canada; it is the global economy. I do not necessarily ask the member to understand that now but she will maybe understand in a little while.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry ought not to direct his remarks to me but to the 1,000 men and women who have worked in the furniture-making industry in the province of Quebec and to the 136,000 workers who can no longer find employment in that sector in Quebec because of his policies and that of his government.

I have a question for him because he and his government did promise all workers that there would be recycling programs, but there is none. Is he now prepared to assure the Canadian people that there will not be further negotiations until such time as programs have been implemented to find work for the men and women who have been laid off as a result of the free trade policy of this government.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the answers in French are the same as in English. The free trade agreement has nothing to do with current job losses in Canada. These references to the economic recession—

Again, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that Quebec labour was in favour of the free trade agreement, and Quebec remains supportive of this deal. Mr. Speaker, after the Liberal Party's lengthy filibuster over Bill C–21, my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration finally has the mechanisms she needs to provide Quebec workers with the recycling programs they want.

But as usual my colleague speaks from both sides of her mouth. At the time she should have done everything to help the House adopt the bill designed to help Quebec employers and workers, and things would have been much easier all around, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Last Friday the minister released a new Atlantic management plan that will apply for three years rather than the usual one. Part of that plan includes the introduction of individual boat quotas for the Scotia–Fundy inshore, a system which may cost many fishermen and communities their livelihood if it is put into place.

I ask the minister this. Why is he going to a three-year plan in the Scotia–Fundy area without first doing a comprehensive stock evaluation, as asked for by the fishing people in the area?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the question of the hon. member as to the reason why we have introduced a three-year TAC in Scotia–Fundy is the same reason that we have done it for other parts of the Atlantic region. We are trying to build some stability in that fishery. What the fishermen, what the producers and what the manufacturers have told us is if they could get a longer term view of the fishery, they can do better planning, they can do better marketing. That is the reason why we have gone for this three-year TAC, by putting in the window, that is not carved in stone. If we get biological evidence or scientific evidence that the stock is on the verge of collapse or that it is doing much better, then at that time we shall revise the TACs.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I am sure if he spoke to the industry in the southern end of Nova Scotia, he would know that they would like to have a new evaluation.

My further question concerns the Minister of the Environment's green plan, which was introduced last week. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries is well aware that at page 76 it states:

> Accordingly, in consultation with the fishing industry and the provinces, the Government will put in place a system of Individual Transferable Quotas (ITQs) for various fisheries.

I ask the minister, is this now policy? If so, what fisheries does he plan to privatize further on the east coast?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am struck by that question, privatize. I did not know that the governments of Canada or Nova Scotia, for that matter, or any other were fishing. This belongs to the private sector. I tell the member that these fishermen are entrepreneurs. They are the ones who are harvesting the fish in the Atlantic Ocean.

When she asks me whether this is the policy, she should be aware that the draggermen of her area are the ones to whom we have offered to introduce these Individual Transferable Quotas. They are being implemented right now. They have been asking for it. She should listen to those fishermen more.

TRADE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. The Minister for International Trade is now in Washington talking to U.S. and Mexican representatives regarding trade talks on a U.S.–Canada trade deal with Mexico. From reports, the United States has given Canada until February 1, 1991 to decide whether we will participate. The last time the United States gave Canada an ultimatum we lost 226,000 jobs in just two years of the U.S. trade deal.

I want to ask the government this: what is the response of this government to the latest U.S. ultimatum, yes or no?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member knows, the trade minister is meeting with the United States trade representative and the Mexican representative today. They will be making a decision shortly. By the end of January or early February the three governments should be in a position to announce what the shape of those negotiations will be. I hope these negotiations will help to increase the creation of jobs in Canada just as we have had since December, 1988, with 207,000 jobs created in Canada since the free trade agreement.

• (1440)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, trade deals for Canada based on hope have certainly not proven in the interest of Canadian workers. Two hundred and twenty-six thousand who have lost their jobs know that.

My supplementary is for the minister. This government, despite the job losses, despite the loss to Canadian sovereignty, continues on the same old way of dragging Canada into something and it cannot even prove that the Canada–U.S. trade agreement has been good for Canada. All other statistics say it has not. Yet this government is now considering a deal with Mexico.

Before even considering being a part of these talks, will the minister undertake on behalf of his government a full public assessment of the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal before getting us into another one?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting when a spokesman from that side of the House and from the Liberal Party speak about the trade agreement. They always refer to one section of any country's trade balance and that is the manufacturing sector.

The manufacturing sector of Canada, the manufacturing sector of the United States, the manufacturing sector of Europe, the manufacturing sector of Japan have been declining in relationship to services for the past 20 years. There is nothing new about this. The manufacturing sector is declining.

What is not happening in other countries, and is happening in Canada, is that investment intentions in Canada, investment intentions in capital equipment, investment intentions in plant and equipment, hit record highs last year and they are up this year, 1990, 9.7 per cent over the previous year.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries and concerns the dockside monitoring program.

Last Friday in the management plan announced by the minister he included references to the dockside monitoring program that fishermen want no part of. According to fisheries officials, the program is to be fishermen funded and run by a third party contractor.

Is the minister having this program contracted out to avoid the heat from annoyed fishermen in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the reason why we are introducing the dockside monitoring program, and I really wonder whether the member would understand if I gave him the reason. With a question like that, you have to wonder.

The reason we are introducing a dockside monitoring program—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Of course they like the question, but not the answer.

Mr. Gauthier: Well, give us an answer.

Mr. Valcourt: A good Liberal.

The reason is that the state of the fish stocks in Atlantic Canada is in bad shape. That is because of non-reporting of fish, discarding of fish, dumping of fish at sea—not by bureaucrats, but by fishermen. We want to control the stocks. I was asked earlier by one of the member's colleagues for a better assessment. Well, give us the tools and then we will have a better assessment.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

In the plan announced last Friday, the Minister of Fisheries announced that there would be a mesh size increase in the gulf fishery as well as a 20 per cent cut in groundfish quotas over three years.

When is the minister going to undertake a study of the Gulf fishery, like the Harris and Hâché commissions?

Also, will the minister set up an assistance plan specifically for the fishermen in the Gulf region now?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the best assistance we can give fishermen in Atlantic Canada is making sure that we have proper management measures to ensure the conservation of these stocks.

If the hon. member cares so much for the fishermen, he should endorse the groundfish management plan because it is one that will ensure the conservation of these stocks for present fishermen and the next generation of fishermen in all of Atlantic Canada.

I will thank him for his strong support.

PERSIAN GULF

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. UN Resolution 678 authorizes member states to use force in the gulf after January 15. Talks before that date between Washington and Baghdad are currently non-existent.

Is Canada taking steps today to ensure that the UN Security Council is sponsoring its own peace negotiations before January 15?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is meeting with the NATO foreign ministers today and will be discussing the issue of the gulf.

Certainly it is our position that we would urge Saddam Hussein to quickly come to an agreement on a date to proceed with those meetings which would offer the best prospects for development of a peaceful resolution of this problem in the Middle East.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has certainly been using his good offices to encourage and urge that these meetings take place as quickly as possible so that there be a possibility of a peaceful resolution.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. On Friday, President Bush referred to January 15 as the deadline for Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait.

I would like to repeat a question put to this House before but to which we have as yet an unsatisfactory response. Will the government assure us today that Canadian forces will not participate in any offensive action in the gulf before debate on the issue takes place in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think this issue was thoroughly debated during the last debate that we had with respect to the UN Resolution. Obviously, as the hon. member knows, the position of this government is that our forces are there to support the UN Resolution, to insist on the enforcement of that resolution, and to bring about a peaceful resolution of the dispute in the gulf.

If there is any change in the role of our forces, the government obviously would have to take that into consideration and would certainly advise the members of the opposition parties as quickly as possible.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations. The minister knows that despite strong opposition from the African National Congress and despite very serious state violence in the black townships, the European Community yesterday lifted the ban on new investment in South Africa.

Will Canada maintain our ban on new investment in South Africa until there has been irreversible change in the policy of apartheid in South Africa as defined by the African National Congress and as defined by the South African Council of Churches?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware that these are multilateral sanctions which we approved within the framework of the Commonwealth. We are determined to maintain our present policy until the responsible ministers meet again in March of next year. My hon. friend is also well aware that the Government of Canada sincerely believes that the sanctions must be maintained as long as there is no evidence of irreversible change in the policy of apartheid in South Africa. Such has always been and remains our position for the time being.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the same minister also has to do with the issue of human rights in Africa.

In view of the serious violations of human rights in Zaire, including the killing of students, will the Government of Canada exert pressures so that the Francophone Summit be moved from Zaire, will cancel all assistance and credit to the government of that country and demand the immediate release of all the students currently in Zairian prisons, including Reverend Brother Victore Digekisa, President of the Student Union?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is certainly aware of this government's position concerning the human rights issue. Last week, I personally met the Zairian Minister of Foreign Affairs while on a visit to Canada and so did my colleague Marcel Masse. During our discussions, I conveyed to him the government's concern about the disregard for human rights and the democratic process which seems to be developing in Zaire.

My hon. friend referred to past events. Following the Lubumbashi massacres, I sent for the Zairian ambassador to express to him our very deep concern about these incidents. I had requested at the time that his government should authorize an international inquiry into the Lubumbashi events. We continue to give enornous significance to the human rights issue and the democratic process and we will take the every step necessary in this connection.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. This question is further to the question on regional development in Quebec I asked him on November 7 as to whether three new programs would be announced for the resource regions of Quebec under the 1988 Canada-Quebec agreement.

Everyone in Quebec knows that the federal government is prepared to make such an announcement. Did he hear from the Quebec Minister of Regional Development since November 7?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, indeed, the programs concerning the business reception facilities, support for tourist attractions and infrastructure projects and support for major regional facilities were approved by the Treasury Board of Canada. As a matter of fact, we are now waiting for the required harmonization with the Quebec government to be completed and I expect to be able to make an official announcement in early January 1991.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry.

In its report entitled Forests of Canada—The Federal Role, the House of Commons subcommittee on forestry has recommended development of a national forest inventory and data base as a major priority in any strategy for sustainable forestry development in Canada. Such a system would entail not only perpetual statistical control of trees and timber, but also an integrated and constant analysis of wildlife, mineral deposits, ecological reserves, parklands and all other values of the forest, both economical and environmental.

My question to the minister is as follows: does he share the view of the report that such an integrated inventory system and data base is an essential priority for the future management of Canada's forestry resources and, if so, does he accept the recommendation that the federal government must provide the leadership to establish such a system in partnership with the provinces and other stakeholders?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, not only can I tell my hon. friend that I support this kind of approach, but that we are well under way in co-operation with and under the control of the council of forest ministers in the country to update our data systems and put in place a national data system that would respect the principles that he has enunciated in his report, namely, the need for integrated management and the management of the timber and non-timber assets in our forests. I am pleased to be able to say to my friend that early in the new year, when I am required to make my first report to Parliament, some of these new statistics will be reflected.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the price discovery mechanisms for grains in the marketplace are not working. Due to concentration in the corporate sector and various United States subsidy programs, such as their target prices and deficiency payments and the Export Enhancement Program, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House today, before Christmas, that Canadian grain farmers will not have to carry the burden of these misguided United States actions and will be compensated with reasonable prices for their highest quality grain in the world?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by my colleague deals with the price of grains. You can see how right Canada is to defend, internationally and more particularly at the GATT, the position that the present grain war is nonsense. It is nonsense for Canada and for all countries closely interested.

We believe that if the Europeans could be convinced to water down their wine and display more flexibility, especially at this time—we did receive mildly optimistic reports from our representatives, as the members of this House did from the Standing Committees last week—it is likely that we could build on solid ground in the GATT negociations, starting in January. To support the Canadian farmers who produce high standard wheat, Mr. Speaker, we absolutely need to reach an agreement at the GATT negociations and I can assure you that Canada will not let this chance go by.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that some very prominent Canadian farm leaders marched with the European farmers in Brussels a couple of weeks ago showing support for the EEC position at GATT. Under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the United States must take into account the impact that export subsidies have on Canada.

Will this government use the instruments provided for in this agreement to seek consultations and compensation for losses incurred by the Canadian Wheat Board and by the Canadian farmers for the 1990-91 crop year?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to know that last year, the government had consultations with grain producers across Canada. We had a federal-provincial conference in November in Winnipeg, where we practically reached an agreement on a long-term program.

What Canadian grain producers need, in addition to a GATT agreement that will help them get a fair price on international markets, is a program that provides a safety net at the national level that will help them plan for the future. As far as consultation is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this Canadian government has consulted with farm producers more than any other government. We have nothing to be ashamed of in this respect.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Last week the minister informed the House he would seek clarification from his Quebec counterpart with respect to the $5 fee which would be imposed for some types of emergency room visits.

Has the minister received any clarification or reply? What does the minister think of the $5 fee? Is it or is it not a user fee?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a reply.

What we have done is write to the provincial ministry of health in Quebec to seek more information. It would be appropriate to await the results of a response to that letter before taking a decision as to whether or not it contravenes the provision of the Canada Health Act.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Witnesses who have appeared before the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare for the past year have asked for adequate funding of community health care.

Will the minister commit to the House today that he will exercise more federal leadership and expand the mandate of the Canada Health Act to also include funding of community health care, as reflected in the report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare tabled in this House of Commons six months ago?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has shown considerable leadership in the whole field of health.

We transfer to the provinces each year some $14 billion to assist them in the provision of health services. In addition to that, we have shown leadership in fighting against AIDS, in terms of the fight against tobacco, drug abuse, and a whole range of other issues which affect the health of Canadians.

One thing that we also do, however, is respect the Constitution of Canada. We respect the fact that the delivery of health care services is given to the provinces within the confines of the Canada Health Act. We believe that is an appropriate division of responsibilities.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Now that the Senate has passed the GST, Quebec has already exempted books from this tax and the Prime Minister of Canada promised to consider this a few weeks ago, is the minister prepared to make a formal commitment today that he will amend the goods and services tax legislation to provide an exemption for books? Is the minister prepared to accept the fact that taxing books means imposing ignorance?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong when he makes those comments.

We are not taxing educational services. We are not taxing public—If the hon. member says we are, he should read the legislation.

We are not taxing libraries. These are important elements in the whole battle against illiteracy in this country. My hon. friend realizes that we have not had Royal Assent. That, I expect, will come later today. We have said, with something as major as the goods and services tax legislation, that we will wait a period of time and review the impact that the GST has on various segments of the economy. After that, we will be in a better position to make some decisions.

FORESTRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Last week the Minister of the Environment promised to take steps to halt the clear cutting of timber in Canada's largest national park, Wood Buffalo in northern Alberta.

Since Canadian Forest Products is now cutting 24 hours a day and has given notice of its plans to double the cut, liquidating the largest white spruce forest in Alberta and destroying the trap lines and livelihood of the Little Red River Indian Band, will the Acting Prime Minister ask Canfor today to halt logging immediately? Or, is clear cutting of the national parks part of the green plan?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can indicate that there is a legal agreement between Canfor and the Government of Canada, which was initially entered into by our friends opposite in 1956 and which was renewed in 1982 for a 20-year period. Unfortunately, in that agreement as renewed in 1982, there was no provision for a buy-out opportunity.

This Government of Canada is opposed to the timber harvesting which is going on at the present time. We have indicated a willingness to negotiate with Canfor to secure such a buy-out if that company is willing to enter into negotiations.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING AND REFERENCE OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

FEDERAL REGULATORY PLAN

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I am pleased to table, in both official languages, copies of the 1991 Federal Regulatory Plan.

POINT OF ORDER

PRESENCE OF ASBESTOS IN WEST BLOCK

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last week the Minister of Public Works indicated in the House that he would be making available to all members of the House the report with respect to asbestos in the West Block.

Due to the fact that the report has not yet been translated into both official languages, it is not available for tabling in the House. However, it is available in both the opposition and government lobbies and is available to all members.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we understand the minister's predicament. We agreed that the document be made public outside the House, but it would be going against the Standing Order of this House and against the official languages law to table that today.

Although we requested this morning that it be done in the House, we certainly agree with the minister that it is better to dispose of that issue by tabling it outside the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I fully agree with the opposition House leader's comments. I may refer hon. members to Standing Order 32(4).

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

ENVIRONMENT—SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the Standing Committee on the Environment, which has to do with the provision for publishing a report of the committee if the House happens not to be sitting when we expect to complete our third report on the atmosphere.

BILL C-91—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts, with amendment.

The Minister of National Revenue and his staff did not attend meetings with representatives of the British Columbia government, where the principle, concept and implementation of the Goods and Services Tax was discussed.

DOWNSIZING IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 390—Mr. Bellemare:

Since February 1988, in the Public Service, how many people in the age 50 to 54 category have lost their employment due to downsizing?

S. O. 52

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows:

Since February 1, 1988, 149 employees in the age category 50 to 54 have been laid off from the Public Service. Of this number, 36 have been reappointed to the Public Service.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

PERSIAN GULF

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask for leave, pursuant to Standing Order 52, for an emergency debate on the subject of the Persian Gulf and the situation there.

It arises out of the events of this past weekend. There had been planned meetings between the Secretary of State of the United States and the Foreign Minister of the Government of Iraq. Those meetings this past weekend have been cancelled, leading all observers of the grave situation in the Middle East to a new concern that war will break out in the Middle East shortly after January 15, the deadline established by the United Nations.

These events have added some urgency for this House because of the contemplated recess of the House in a few days. Given the deep concern of Canadians about the possible role of Canadian forces and the need for a commitment from the government before Canadian forces are committed to the situation in Iraq in any offensive capacity, this House must meet and must approve it. It is therefore, in my respectful submission, urgent that this House today deal with the situation as a result of the weekend's events and have a debate on the issue of Canadian participation in offensive action in the gulf and a clear commitment from the government that there will be no such move by the government without clear parliamentary approval.

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Victoria has once again raised an important question, but the Chair feels that the hon. member's request does not meet the criteria for an emergency debate at this time. Consequently, I will have to turn down this very legitimate request by the hon. member for Victoria, for the time being.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, December 6, consideration of Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, as reported (without amendment) from the legislative committee; and the motion of Mr. Langdon (p. 16404).

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I see that members on the government benches are all keyed up, but I suggest they calm down. I was busy with one of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, and I wonder whether you would perhaps refresh my memory and tell me where we are in the proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We were considering motion No. 4A in the name of Mr. Langdon, concerning Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada legislation.

At the time the debate was adjourned, the hon. member for the New Democratic Party had the floor, and since he is absent, I wonder whether another speaker would like to be recognized.

Some hon. members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House is ready for the question.

Shall I dispense with the reading of motion No. 4A?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1510 )

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 4A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 6A

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 9 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 3 the following:

"(a) provisions insuring that the Governor in Council be entitled to appoint one director to the Board of Directors of Petro-Canada;"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is yet another further attempt to see to it that there is some continuing public presence, some continuing reflection of the community and its concerns, as Petro-Canada makes its decisions.

After all, we have a company into which the Canadian people have put tremendous amounts of money. The total amount of taxpayers' money which has gone into this company is something like $4.3 billion in 1990 dollars. Taking inflation into account, that investment amounts to over $6.8 billion.

If we had a sense that this company would be sold for anything close to $6.8 billion and that money was going to come back to the people of Canada, then it might make some logical sense for the public authorities of this country to cut themselves off entirely from Petro-Canada. I still think it would be a serious mistake in terms of our national energy hopes for the future, but one could see the logic.

However, the minister indicated in testimony before committee that he simply did not know how much money would be received for the shares of this company. For instance, my colleague from Edmonton East asked him point blank: "What you are telling me is that the government does not really have a clue. The government simply does not know how much money it will get for the sale of Petro-Canada". I should congratulate the minister on his frankness when he responded by saying: "That is right. We do not know what we are going to get for the sale of Petro-Canada".

The minister was then asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East if there was a price below which the government would not go, but the minister would not name a price. He would not even say that it was the intention of the government to see to it that the taxpayers of this country would recoup the amount for which the company is valued on the books after some fairly slick accounting wizardry had recently reduced taxpayers' equity by $1.8 billion.

We have a company created by the taxpayers of Canada and expanded by the taxpayers of Canada. It was the recipient in present dollar terms of something like $6.8 billion in assistance and investment from the government, yet the government intends to cut its ties completely with this company.

What a total, absolute, abdication of responsibility to the taxpayers of the country, on the part of the future consumers of the country and on the part of the future people of the country who depend on this company for energy supplies.

We have suggested with this amendment that the government would be entitled to appoint one director to Petro-Canada's board, simply one director. We are not talking about government control of that board. We are not talking about a great mass of government bureaucrats. We are talking about a single director, so that there would be a chance for the public interest to be represented in the decision making that takes place in this company.

That director could of course be out-voted. It would be possible for that director to face a situation where he or she puts the public interest first, as cabinet saw it, before the Petro-Canada board and Petro-Canada says no, that it intends to follow the dictates of its bottom line and to seek to make decisions on the basis of what is most profitable for it, and that it is not going to listen.

This is not a suggestion that the director appointed by cabinet would have any extra power or authority, but that director would have the capacity to do two things: first, to convey to Petro-Canada, this company that we as taxpayers have put so much money into, the concerns of the public as reflected through the government of the day and, second, to be through participation on the Petro-Canada board, if not a window on the industry, at least a little peephole or a little chance for the government to have some direct insight into what is taking place with respect to this particular industry.

This is an industry which is crucial to the future of our country. It is crucial for the future of consumers and for the future of manufacturers. It is crucial for the future of resource producers in every part of the country that have to make use of gasoline or motor oil. Yet, if this amendment is not accepted, there will simply be a complete cut between the government which established this company and the company itself. This is not something remarkable or unusual. In many cases of privatization throughout the world, government has maintained the power to appoint at least one director. That director has proved an important communications link between the company and the government, subject of course to rules of confidentiality.

Mr. McDermid: Spy.

Mr. Langdon: The minister suggests that this director would somehow be a spy. That sort of ideological comment on the part of the government just reflects the lack of concern and understanding with respect to the need for a closer relationship, a closer partnership between government and business in this country.

As far as this government is concerned, government is supposed to retire to the back room. People, the community, are supposed to forget about the $6.8 billion which they put into this company and of which they are almost bound to get, at most, half back. If the minister has been listening, he will realize that this is the 1990 value of the $4.3 billion which was originally invested in this company.

Anybody who looks at constant dollar terms as the government statistics do would realize that $6.8 billion in 1990 is the same as $4.3 billion in 1980.

My final point is to make the case as clear, and precise as possible that we are talking about one director. If this government will not accept even one director, I think this government just shows its lack of understanding of the future relationships between business and government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret your time is over. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate the debate this afternoon, I wonder if you would not find that there is unanimous consent to consider the remaining two motions put forward by my hon. colleague from Essex—Windsor to be grouped for the purpose of debate and be voted on separately. This would simply facilitate the afternoon's proceedings. Motions 8A and 12A to—

An hon. member: What page?

Mr. Riis: Hey, a man who has found his place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the proposal of the hon. member for Kamloops?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 8A

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 9 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 3 the following:

"(a) provisions imposing a minimum price for the issuance and selling of shares so that the issuance and sale shall generate six billion seven hundred million dollars;".

Motion No. 12A

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 36 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"more than five per cent of the votes that".

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I will even try not to take my full 10 minutes, but I could not let this particular day and particular bill pass without commenting.

On December 3, 1977 at about one a.m. I became the candidate for the Conservative Party in the riding of Calgary West and ran for the first time in the election of 1979.

An hon. member: And won.

Mr. Hawkes: As a new candidate I felt it was my obligation in preparing to run for election and hopefully to be a member of this place, to spend some of that time in preparation, learning about pieces of public policy that I felt I was not comfortable with, that I did not know enough about.

Certainly in my case, as someone who was raised primarily in the city, agriculture was one of those areas and I spent many hours at it.

But the other was the oil industry. I was born in Calgary and grew up there. Many of my friends and acquaintances worked in one facet or another of the oil industry. Yet when facing the possibility of coming here as a member of Parliament I realized how little I really knew about it and how great the need was to learn more about it. I set about doing that. It would certainly have been easier for me in the city of Calgary than it might have been for members in other communities such as Windsor, to really be able to get people voluntarily to teach me about this industry because Calgary is the capital and Calgary is the centre.

One of the people who was my mentor was a man who was the president and the chairman of the board of a company called Voyageur Petroleum. When we became the government in 1979, he headed a committee on behalf of the government to look into the divestiture of Petro-Canada. They brought forward a report in December of that year which never became public policy because we subsequently lost the vote in the House of Commons and we lost an election.

Why did we, in 1979, and why did I, in the intervening time from December 3, 1977 until running for election in 1979, become so convinced and so persuaded that it was a piece of very bad public policy to create Petro-Canada in the first place, and that it was an even worse piece of public policy to maintain it over all these intervening years.

I have read and listened to speeches that come from the other side. I say to members opposite, by and large, you do not know what you are talking about. You have no sense of reality about the funding and the financing of this corporation and what it did to our nation. It was an ideological decision to create this company in the first place. The cost of it was horrendous.

Prior to my running for office, Petro-Canada had acquired its first two smaller oil companies. The public treasury lost its income tax contribution because the minute they came into Petro-Canada's hands, they had no profit. In fact, the grants that the public, all of a sudden, had to give to those companies exceeded the income tax that it had been getting.

When I listen to the member opposite talk about all of the public money invested in this corporation. We had given up essentially, 15 years of income tax. We know how that compounds in the system and the contribution it would have made to deficit reduction over that entire 15-year period of time. We compounded the problem by giving them until 1984, until we became the government, annual grants of substantial size over and above those that were available to the industry generally, just for this corporation specifically.

In the entire period of time from the creation of this corporation until today, the government has had to borrow money to meet its operating expenses, that is, until the last three years when we have a little bit of money to apply the interest on the public debt.

We are talking about governments that went into the private sector, destroyed private companies by bringing them into Petro-Canada and paying for them with borrowed dollars. Canadians are stuck paying the interest on that public debt. My friend is worried about getting $4 billion back from Petro-Canada when it is worth over $7 billion. I heard him earlier in Question Period saying, "restore the money to the CBC. Give them the $108 million that they are asking for". Give, give, give. If we had even $4 billion, let alone $7.8 billion, would we not having to pay interest on it because it was a reduction of the public debt, $4 billion at 10 per cent, which is below market rates, is $400 million. We could give the CBC four times what it is asking for if that is his priority. But no, he would rather own corner service stations, asphalt, gas tank hoses and little numbers that run up and down. I am talking about the New Democrat who put these motions and just spoke, but it is a speech I have heard from the Liberals a thousand times.

I will tell you what it did to my city. When the government decided, for ideological reasons, that it had to move in this direction, it distorted, almost overnight, the entire labour market of an industry in the upward direction by about 35 per cent. It made all the costs for every oil company in this country on the staffing side at least 30 per cent to 35 per cent higher almost overnight and was a root cause of the runaway inflation in the early 1980s. This was the root cause of a whole lot of suicides and spousal batterings and this kind of stuff, because the government had blinders and said: "We must be involved in the oil industry at any cost and at any price". What advice did it give us? It did this under the rubric that it had this superlative advice that would put the Government of Canada in a position to do something, but what it was in a position to do was to inflate prices.

An hon. member: And the 18 cents went to two bucks.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, since Petro-Canada came on the scene the cost of producing gas and oil in this country has rocketed astronomically and the taxation has rocketed astronomically. That permeates the society, it increases the cost of clothing and food and everything else we use. That is the contribution that Petro-Canada has made.

The only salvation at the end of the line is to go out there and sell those shares, bring the money in, reduce the debt, reduce the costs and make things cheaper for Canadians. That is what it is all about.

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act—Chapter 45; and Bill S-14, an Act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons—Chapter 46.

PRIVILEGE

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I am looking to you for guidance. When the Gentleman Usher of the Back Rod was here, I rose on a point of privilege. Perhaps I was out of order, but being a rookie to this place, I possibly did not know any better.

I am asking the Speaker when it is proper for a member to rise on a point of privilege. When I was rising on a point of privilege, it was a matter very important to me. I am looking for your guidance, Mr. Speaker, as to whether it is proper to rise on a point of privilege, when it is proper and how far democracy can be overlooked.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the hon. member rose, the process had already started. He rose when the Chair was leaving the House to go to the other place. Unfortunately, it was impossible for the Chair to recognize the hon. member at that time, since the procedure for Royal Assent had already started. I felt I could not recognize anyone while we were engaged in this procedure.

[English]

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, I thank you. Perhaps I am trying to set a precedent, but I believe that democracy, and the way that we are elected here, should never be stopped or overlooked.

My point of privilege is that my rights were overlooked. I believe that this House should not have followed the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to the other place as it would result in a breach of privilege of all members of this House.

I base this point on the fact that in neither House of Parliament did the government permit the full process to take place. I would urge that in accepting Bill C-62, as we did, without the—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe I explained why I behaved the way I did. I see no need to discuss this decision, and with respect, I would appreciate the hon. member's co-operation. Perhaps we could resume debate from where we were before the Royal Assent. I want to thank the hon. member for his co-operation.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that I was trying to catch your eye and you did see me. Maybe you did not, but through my eyes I thought that you did see me. The privileges of the members in this democratically-elected House should not be overlooked. The rights of members should always be first and foremost.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member of Standing Order 48:

48(2) Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Orders 54 or 86(2), any Member proposing to raise a question of privilege—

I did not receive notice from the hon. member. I regret that I did not receive notice of your question of privilege. Resuming debate.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, and Motion No. 6A (Mr. Langdon).

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly to Bill C-94 and in particular talk about the amendment moved by the gentleman from Essex—Windsor.

In doing so, let me make a preliminary comment. I am delighted to see the gentleman for Kamloops here in the Chamber because I not only listened with care to what he was saying, but I believe more to the point, watched what he was doing when he was making his final point just a few minutes ago. Indeed, those who were watching the monitors outside of the Chamber would have found the whole exercise very instructive as he went to his one pocket, then the other, to determine what his position ought to be on this particular amendment.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that a week or so ago I talked to this Chamber about what I call my NDP suit, which has a pocket on either side. The NDP in their respective pockets carry various positions on various subjects.

Well today, poor fellow, the hon. member for Kamloops got his pockets all mixed up but eventually got them sorted out. We now know that he is going to vote for the amendment put down by the gentleman for Essex—Windsor, a member of the same party. He is going to vote for the second one put down by the hon. member for Essex-Windsor. There were three in a row. My friend for Kamloops is going to vote for all three of those amendments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if you think that is consistency, I say to you it is and we commend it. If you think it is an accident, I say to you, right again. It was an accident that he went to the left pocket instead of the right. I commend him for that particular accident. You see, he does sit next to me, the very next seat on my left. He stands to my left, and to my right, depending on the mood of the moment.

My friend is getting exercised now, but I mean this kindly. It is too near Christmas to get upset with my friends from British Columbia. We have too much in common to get upset with them.

Mr. McDermid: Name one thing.

Mr. Simmons: The Minister of State for Privatization says name one thing. We are the book-ends in Newfoundland and B.C. which help keep this country together, despite the minister's best efforts to tear it apart. That is one thing we have in common.

An hon. member: Touché.

Mr. Simmons: I say to my friend for Comox—Alberni that my sister-in-law is numbered among his constituents. He had better look after that particular constituent.

Mr. McDermid: Did she vote for him?

Mr. Simmons: I certainly could talk to her on that point. She had that choice or Social Credit, which is no choice at all. She is bright enough to know that having to decide between NDP and Social Credit is not much of a decision to have to make. I think he will agree on that point. Now we have them all excited in the NDP. Anybody who can get the NDP excited ought to get a medal.

I was saying to my friend from British Columbia that we in this party and particularly those who come from Newfoundland are still a bit upset about the jig that the crowd in the NDP danced on Hibernia. If ever anybody needed a suit with several pockets, it was that particular day. When they voted against the bill, they voted Hibernia. Then the member for Yukon went to Newfoundland and made that memorable statement to the press and to the university students. She said: "Because we voted against it does not mean we are against it". Oh no. If you are in the NDP, it does not mean that at all. It could mean you are for it or against it, or both, as the case may be. Do you understand that? It is all very clear. You are either for it, against it, or both. So I took great encouragement a few minutes ago when I found the hon. member for Kamloops actually closing ranks. He is going to vote for all three amendments put down by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. Mr. Speaker, we are making progress in this House. It is getting near Christmas. You can tell just by the mood of the House.

This brings me to the hon. member for Calgary West. That was not only his first speech, but his finest speech, absolutely his finest speech to date. He actually said—and you want to scream out "author"—listen to it: "They don't know what they are talking about". That is original. "They don't know what they are talking about", he said. Well, far be it from me to defend the NDP that I just came that close to maligning, but they do know what they are talking about and so do we, on this particular issue.

I say to my friend, the hon. member for Calgary West, that if he were a little more charitable today, he would recognize that we do know what we are talking about. I believe what he really means is that he does not agree with what we are talking about. He does not agree with what we are saying and that is his right because he has the right to be wrong, and he is dead wrong. He knows what he is talking about when he speaks on PetroCan but he is applying his facts, I submit, with less than real skill because he should read the title of this bill, "an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada". That was what it was intended to be, our national policy instrument in the area of energy. That is what it is, that is what it was, and that is what the government is destroying. The government can put the nicest face on it and make as many accusations as it wants about that big, bad, Liberal regime in its day but it cannot skate around the fact that it is wiping out an important policy instrument at a time when we still need it.

Indeed, I heard the hon. member go on about all the sins that had been visited on the country by this big, bad, Liberal regime. The hon. member blamed Petro-Canada for suicides and for the pulverizing of Calgary. One would think that Calgary did not exist any more. I was in Calgary and it was existing and getting along fine, thank you, despite his gloom and doom scenario. If the hon. member is going to represent Calgary, let him represent it as having a future, not as if he is giving a funeral oration. A great city like Calgary is being maligned by one of its very own members. It is shameful, absolutely shameful. I have three sisters in Calgary. They deserve better representation than that. I am going to send them out with my cousin in Comox—Alberni because people are getting better representation out there than they are getting from that member. I do not agree with what he says but at least he does not misrepresent.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: At least he does not misrepresent. The minister is absolutely right, I should not suggest that the hon. member for Calgary West is misrepresenting. For that I apologize. I got carried away again, as I often do.

When I heard the hon. member talking about what terrible things Petro-Canada visited on this country, such as wiping out a city—which I understand still exists, despite his submission to the contrary—which has caused suicides, it occurred to me that about the only thing that he has not blamed PetroCan for is Noah's fame, as a result of the flood. That is about the only thing he did not cite as being the direct, adverse consequence of this animal, this monster called PetroCan.

It is getting much too near Christmas. These people ought to restrain themselves. If they are going to get up and say irresponsible things in the House, they ought to be required to have their notes read by somebody who knows what he is talking about, before they let loose people like the member for Calgary West who gets up and, with respect, I say to him, makes a complete fool of himself. He knows what he is talking about, yes, but he does not apply his knowledge terribly well in this circumstance.

I see from your signal, Sir, that my time is running out. Let me tell you that I think the hon. member for Essex—Windsor has a brilliant resolution on 6A, so I am going to vote for it. It does not look too brilliant on 8A, so I am going to vote against it. We support what he is saying in 12A. We are for a little more control in terms of foreign ownership, and I can support that particular amendment.

On a final word, let us put this thing in context. This has nothing to do with the minutia or the routine of changing bills. This has to do, however nicely it is couched, with dismantling a country. Whether you are talking about CBC, or post offices or unemployment insurance, this is another nail in the coffin of Canada. This privatization of PetroCan is part of the process that this government undertook back in 1984. It is part of a process of dismantling what was once a great country. There will not be enough left to govern if this crowd stays in office much longer. That is why I like the idea of the man out west, who was reported on the news this weekend. He is starting a campaign to have an election now. I am going to subscribe to his advertising fund. The sooner the better for all concerned, especially Canada.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the last time I stood regarding what we were doing, I think I garbled up a little bit. I would like to seek unanimous consent so that Motions Nos. 8A and 12A be deemed to be moved by the member from Essex—Windsor and grouped with 6A, currently under debate, with an understanding that the vote on 6A would apply to 8A and 12A.

I will simply say that 8A and 12A be deemed to be moved by the member for Essex—Windsor and grouped with 6A, currently under debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House agreed on the motion of the hon. member from Kamloops?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I believe I know which amendments I am supposed to be speaking to. I am probably in favour of all of them, including some of the Liberal ones that are vague, to say the least.

We have had the smugness of the member from Calgary West saying "We know it all and you know nothing," and that is part of the problem with the government. It tells Canadians "You know nothing, let us steer you in the right direction and everything will be fine." We go from smugness to Liberal flippancy. I enjoy the member's speeches but, on such a serious topic, you would not think that he would be just quite so flippant. The Christmas spirit I hope we will all catch, but the flippancy of the topic and of the Christmas spirit is not appropriate.

We New Democrats take this extremely seriously. I honestly thought that in my constituency there would not be a great to-do about the privatization of PetroCan. Nevertheless, we went ahead with the press conference at a PetroCan station in our community, along with 20 other New Democrats. I do not think the Liberals bothered, so this defence of Petro-Canada is a bit of a sham.

Afterward, we received 800 mail-backs of concern from my riding saying: "Please, government, don't sell off PetroCan". Here we are at Christmastime this year. Do you know what we were doing last year? I am sure the members opposite would want to forget. Last year we were talking about clawback, the end of universality in this country as we now know it. At that time it was lost in another debate and many Canadians were not aware of what was going on. Now, I think, they know. Here we are again at Christmastime and the government is doing something unto Canadians which they do not want to happen. In talking about my friend from Kamloops and his pockets and whatever he was trying to depict about my good friend, one has to talk about where the Liberals stand. I suspect that they do stand on the fence. They are getting hit from both sides, and that is very difficult. We understand where this group opposite is; it is on the far right. We understand we are on the left, but the Liberals maintain that middle road. As I say, they get hit from both sides when they do that.

• (1600)

Mr. Gauthier: The Liberals set it up.

Mr. Butland: The Liberals set it up at the behest of the New Democratic Party, absolutely. That is the truth, and the Liberals know it full well. I can tell by their reaction that we have touched a nerve. It was set up at the behest of the New Democratic Party.

The energy critic at that time was the member for Sault Ste. Marie, Cyril Symes, a good man. It was his initiative, along with that of Tommy Douglas. I hope to have a chance to give some education, as opposed to this smugness from the member for Calgary West that they know it all. I suggest he read about Tommy Douglas, and he might know a heck of a lot more than he does now.

With regard to privatization, we are talking Petro-Canada, Air Canada, Canada Post, and VIA Rail. I am wondering if we are talking about CBC. The CBC says it will not be able to fund the viewing of Parliament in the rest of Canada. I am wondering if this is the foot in the door which we brought to the government's attention. Everyone should know that there was an agreement between CBC and the cable companies of this country to get into a partnership where they would share the viewing—

Mr. McDermid: What has this got to do with these amendments?

Mr. Butland: It is related to this privatization. It seems strange that the CBC would make such a sensitive cut and say: "Canadians, you are not going to be able to view Parliament". However, there is an agreement between Cableco and CBC somewhere that may go to the CRTC, and eventually this agreement may come about. I suspect, since CBC cannot afford it, we will be able to privatize it completely. You will be able to avoid the lobby groups, go right into the House and buy yourself an MP, the ones perhaps who are not already bought.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, you do not have to stand. If necessary, I retract that statement.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I may remind hon. members that the debate is still on the three motions in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, Motions Nos. 6A, 8A and 12A. I am sure the hon. member knows better than to digress from the subject before the House today which deals with the legislation to privatize Petro-Canada.

I thank the hon. member for his co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for reminding me of the excellent amendments as proposed by the New Democratic Party and my lukewarm support for most of the vague amendments from the Liberal Party.

I thought what the member for Burin—St. George's touched upon had no relationship whatsoever. He talked about my friend from Comox—Alberni and people all across the country. I too have friends, but I am not going to recite their names. I suspect that mine was more in line with the amendments than that of my colleague from Burin—St. George's.

Mr. Milliken: You are getting into trouble. Maybe you should sit down.

Mr. Butland: No, I am going to continue. These amendments are very appropriate because at least they are offering that last bit of hope to Canadians that there will be a line of communication with Petro-Canada as we once knew it, not as it has developed over the past several years.

They are suggesting: "Let's sell it off. Let's operate it like a private enterprise". Canadian taxpayers have asked me: "If you sell off a private company, don't you get some money back. Where is my dividend? If I have invested $7 billion", or whatever the price tag is "am I not entitled to something back?" I am sure if a corporation divests itself of its ownership the directors say: "Where is my proceeds from the sale?" This is not going to happen.

Petro-Canada had the opportunity to be a leader, to be a public servant. It was in the beginning but gradually it phased out. It was not allowed to show any leadership in areas in which it certainly could have, given the appropriate funding. The director of Petro-Canada said: "If the timing is not right to sell, we won't sell". Let us say that the timing could not be worse. I know the minister would agree with me that the timing could not be worse. Petro-Canada was begun because of the mid-east crisis, and there may be an oil crisis. The timing is inappropriate. It is the wrong time, the wrong price, the wrong decision. If Petro-Canada had taken any kind of public leadership, Canadians would have said: "My goodness, it is different from the other corporations". However it was not allowed to.

I have cited before what is perhaps a very small environmental issue that becomes a major one. In my community I receive calls from constituents and gasoline retailers saying: "What about our waste oil? What do we do with it?" Nobody wants it. Some people say: "I am forced to go out into the forest and dump my waste oil when I change my oil in my vehicle". Why could not Petro-Canada, if it were operating for public benefit and public good, show leadership in that area? It will never be allowed to because profit will now be the sole motivation for the corporation. It will be no different from any other oil multinational. It will be the very same.

The amendments are excellent. They stand on their own merit. Once again I have to say that whoever crafted the Liberal amendments—

Mr. McDermid: We are not on them yet.

Mr. Butland: I think I have to make a point of them. Petro-Canada has to work for the general advantage of Canada, how vague can they be? Ours are very specific and exemplary. I think the House should support them.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise at report stage on this bill because I believe, as I pointed out at the second reading stage, that the mandate of Petro-Canada should be expanded.

Motion No. 6A would provide that the Governor in Council be entitled to appoint one director to the board of Petro-Canada. It is one of the ways that we could achieve some of the things I spoke about at second reading.

I asked the government at that time to expand the mandate of Petro-Canada, not only to reinstate its status as a vehicle for frontier development and exploration which has been virtually at a standstill over the last two years. The number of oil wells drilled and brought into production in Canada last year was the lowest since the 1970s. This year it is only slightly better in spite of increased crude oil prices. The other area I suggested to this government to expand the role of Petro-Canada was the inclusion of alternative and renewable fuels. I suggested that the government should immediately implement a program to ensure that all automotive fuels contain 3.2 per cent oxygen, and that MMT be banned for use in Canada immediately.

This octane enhancer, MMT, has been banned in the United States since 1978. In the words of one our leading neurotoxic scientists, "it is an insidious neurotoxic substance that is taken in through the respiratory system and destroys the cells in the base of the brain". Children whose immune systems are not yet fully developed are particularly susceptible. Canadian children will accumulate the substance in their bodies over a period of years, and the results may not be visible for several years.

This is a case of gross negligence by this government. I submit the government should not privatize this oil company but rather direct it to take the lead by cleaning up its product and developing the plants required to produce the ethanol and provide a blended gasoline which is one part ethanol to nine parts gasoline.

This requirement would utilize five million to eight million bushels of Canadian grains and would be a tremendous boost to the farmers of this nation. This new market would take about 20 per cent of our total grain production. The by-products created could be used by the cattle industry, the dairy industry, fish farms, and as a dried food product for Third World countries for human consumption.

I should point out that the net energy balance of ethanol contains two to four times the energy invested in its manufacture. In fact fuel ethanol is renewable. Its positive net energy balance of up to 80,000 B.t.u. per U.S. gallon is extremely favourable in comparison to gasoline, a fossilized energy source. The net energy content of gasoline is calculated at 110,000 B.t.u. per U.S. gallon, after accounting for a 12 per cent energy subsidy consumed in energy production and refining.

This government has brought in closure on this bill. We do not have a great deal of time or opportunity to debate all the possibilities and opportunities that should be pursued by this Crown corporation.

The so-called green plan tabled last week in this House shows the areas of smog concentration across Canada. These are all concentrated in major urban centres where the congestion of traffic is greatest. The report points out that this smog is the worst in the summer months. Therefore we know that most of it has to come from automotive emissions rather than home or office furnaces or other heating systems.

The report also states that these concentrations are known to have adverse effects on health. Yet the report carefully avoids any identification of one of the worst toxic substances being used. It ignores the fact that there are environmentally friendly alternatives that would cut these carbon dioxide emissions by 10 per cent or more. This is not just a 10 per cent cut in carbon dioxide emissions, but carbon dioxide emissions are also absorbed through the process of photosynthesis or the growing of the plant because as it is growing to produce the grains the plant absorbs carbon dioxide from the air. We have a double-barrelled impact on the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions.

We have the lowering of the carbon dioxide emissions on the one hand. Then, if we were to ban the MMT or methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonate in Canada as they have in the United States, it would also take away that insidious near toxic substance that comes from the exhaust systems of cars, commonly known to chemists as Mn3, and accumulates not only in the atmosphere but in the bodies of the people who breathe it in.

I should point out that this is not the normal type of manganese accumulation that takes place through the digestive system. Our bodies, soil and most growing plants contain manganese, but this Mn3 is taken in through the respiratory system and attacks the cells at the base of the brain. As I mentioned earlier, young children whose immune systems are not yet in place are particularly susceptible.

I am appalled that in the last month and a half five individuals from Newfoundland through to southern Ontario have come to me with health problems they feel may be linked to gasoline additives. I am not convinced at this point that all of it may not be linked to the Mn3 but to other substances including benzene, which is used as an octane enhancer and is carcinogenic in nature. The people who have come to me with these problems pointed out that they worked either in a gas station, at a distribution centre or in the service bay of an automotive dealership and consequently over the years have come down with these ailments. They must be linked somehow to the fuels and to the environment they work in.

I wish to point out one quote from page 44 of the green plan.

> Over the last 20 years, scientists have learned much about the detrimental effects of toxic chemicals. We know that barely detectable amounts of some chemicals have the ability to remain and build up in the tissue of the animals we rely on for food. These "persistent" toxic substances accumulate to a point where they represent a danger to our health.

I see that I am running out of time, but I want to suggest that it is a case of gross negligence to suggest that we should be concerned about the build-up in animals and completely ignore the build-up in citizens of this country. Certainly both go hand in hand. If we are going to be concerned about the build-up in animals we rely on for food, we should also be concerned about the build-up in human bodies, because we have far more humans in the urban concentration around the cities where the smog is worse than we do animals, which are usually out in the countryside grazing in the pastures or eating in barns or feed lots.

I call on the government now to withdraw this bill and give Petro-Canada a new mandate, one that places first and foremost the health of our people including that of our children and grandchildren.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member who just spoke on his speech and his suggestion about the kind of leadership that Petro-Canada could take under appropriate management and direction from the government, if we had a government that was capable of giving the corporation appropriate direction.

Basically what we are doing here is following the dictates of an ideologically right wing party that believes the government should not be involved in anything. For that reason, it wants to dump Petro-Canada and virtually every other Crown corporation that it is involved in.

I was surprised at the member for Calgary West who was talking about the amount of income tax we could get from Petro-Canada. He was talking about the fact that once Petro-Canada was nationalized we were no longer able to receive income tax from it. I challenge the member for Calgary West to tell me about the 100,000 other corporations in this country that are profitable corporations and pay absolutely no income tax at all.

Among those corporations are some of the most profitable oil companies that operate in Canada, basically foreign owned oil companies such as Shell Oil of Canada which in many years has paid absolutely no income tax at all.

I suspect that once Petro-Canada is privatized, given the tax policy of this government, we are not going to see a nickel of income tax coming from Petro-Canada because of the taxation policy of this government that has allowed the rich and powerful to get away with paying absolutely no taxes in this country. There are 100,000 profitable corporations paying absolutely no income tax at all. Petro-Canada is going to be numbered among those, as have Shell Oil and other major oil companies over the years because of Conservative and Liberal tax policies.

The suggestion that once they privatize Petro-Canada we are going to see the income tax flowing from that organization is false and misleading. I am sure the member did not mean to mislead the House. This may have been a belief of his, but it certainly is not borne out by the taxation statistics.

The member for Calgary West also complained about the number of grants that the Government of Canada and the taxpayers of Canada have had to pay to Petro-Canada over the last few years. I can tell the hon. member that grants have gone from this government to oil companies that are not in the public sector. Petro-Canada received very few of those grants. As the hon. member for Burin—St. George's just pointed out, we gave something like $1.8 billion or it might have been $2.1 billion to the Hibernia project. We have given money to projects for getting oil out of the tar sands of northern Alberta. We have given money for heavy oil upgraders on the border between Alberta and Saskatchewan.

This government has been very generous in the grants that it has given to private oil companies. In many cases, those grants have not substantially increased the amount of permanent employment in this country and in many cases those grants have not resulted in any permanent, long-term employment at all in this country. The grants have simply gone to foreign-controlled oil companies and, in many cases, there is a connection between the amount of money flowing outside of our borders, along with the oil that flows outside of our borders to the United States, and the grants made by this government and this Parliament generally end up flowing outside our borders and leaving Canadians with no net benefit from the grants made to those corporations.

That information has been backed up by a number of studies, including studies done by the Auditor General. So the suggestion that grants have been made to Petro-Canada and not to other oil companies is completely false. The vast majority of grants made by this country and this Parliament to oil companies have gone to the private oil companies and in most cases they have delivered no real net benefit, no long lasting benefit. In addition, many of the companies receiving those grants are among the companies listed in the taxation statistics as paying no income tax at all. So it is not a good deal for Canadians.

The oil companies derive other benefits from this government as well. I noticed over the last weekend the Minister of Transport announced that the oil companies are going to receive the generous benefit of not having to double-hull the tankers that they use in Canadian waters. It may be a generous benefit to the oil companies, but to people in my constituency who have seen oil spills on their beaches time after time, and have, in many cases, seen those oil spills cleaned up through the efforts of government tax money and through the volunteer efforts of constituents in my riding, the grant of the relief from the double-hulling of the tankers is not of much benefit to Canadian citizens and certainly not of much benefit to the people of my riding who are going to experience more oil spills, as a result of that decision by the Minister of Transport. Again, this is a decision made by this government that receives a substantial amount of its campaign donations from oil companies. This is a decision made to benefit the oil companies. In spite of the risk of oil spills, in spite of the green plan, and in spite of what this government says about its concern for the environment, this government is not going to require the oil companies to assume the costs of the risks of transporting oil. In fact, this government has said that those oil companies can pass that risk on.

Mr. McDermid: What has this got to do with this amendment. Absolutely nothing.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): It has a substantial amount to do with it. For the member who constantly speaks from his seat, who never stands up in the House to justify his positions, and who is constantly harassing other members in the House, this human wrecking-ball who is responsible for privatization in the cabinet, if he wants to stand up and speak, let him do so, but when other members are on their feet speaking in this House, as is their right, I would appreciate it, Mr. Speaker, if you would tell that member to shut up.

Mr. McDermid: Start telling the truth.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, this member was speaking from his seat a few minutes ago when my colleague, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor was talking about putting a director on the board of PetroCan who would be appointed by Governor in Council. We are not asking that the NDP appoint this director, we are not asking that the Liberals appoint this director. However, if the opposition did it, it would probably be more responsible to the people of Canada. We are saying that the Governor in Council should appoint a director to the board of Petro-Canada once it is privatized.

There is a precedent for this. The member from his seat said, "All you want to do is control the private sector". We are all subject to a certain element of control in this country. We all have to drive our car on the appropriate side of the road and stop at stop signs. Oil companies themselves should be subject to some control, whether it is pollution control or whether it is control relating to labour relations and occupational health and safety.

In Europe, the government and trade unions put representatives on the board of directors so that the policies of companies, the labour policies and government policies can be integrated and can be consistent. We are not saying that the oil companies should not be making a profit. We are saying that oil companies' policies should be consistent with the other policies of the country so that we can develop an integrated approach to the management and the exploration for energy. That is all we are asking.

For this member to crab from his seat and say, "All you want to do is control the private sector", that is absolutely right. We believe that the private sector should be subjected to the same kind of controls that individuals in our society are subjected to, so that we all obey the laws and so that we all operate in a direction that is consistent with what is best for Canada.

I definitely support the idea of the government having a single director on the board of Petro-Canada. I think it is an excellent amendment and I certainly commend it to the House for its support.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to say a few words concerning the three amendments now before the House, the three amendments having been put forward by colleagues in the New Democratic Party. I could not help but listen carefully to the remarks of my colleague in the Liberal opposition, the member for Lambton—Middlesex, in relation to the ethanol issue, an alternative fuel and the hope that Petro-Canada might have had an expanded mandate in this area of alternative fuels.

In my view it is unfortunate that over the long haul we may have, in divesting ourselves of Petro-Canada, given away, sold or privatized a tool that might have addressed the issue of alternative fuels in a manner that is more prompt and more effective than that which the private sector by itself would generate.

Motion No. 6A proposes that the Governor in Council has the right to appoint one director to the board of Petro-Canada. We feel that is not a bad amendment at all. We feel we can support that.

As long as the government controls the shares of Petro-Canada, it is going to be appointing directors. For that phase of the privatization of Petro-Canada, there really is not great difficulty relative to the appointment of directors. As the sale goes on, as we piece off more and more of Petro-Canada, we approach what we could call the grey line—it is not a red line, it is a grey line-where we are not sure whether the big block shareholder has control or not. In some widely-held corporations the control block can involve as little as 10 or 15 per cent of the shares outstanding. So what do we do, the people of Canada, when our government holds, something in the vicinity of 10 or 15 per cent, let us say, of the outstanding shares of Petro-Canada? We have one foot on the dock and one foot on the boat and we may find we no longer have control. We have an interest but we no longer have any representation on the board. This amendment would ensure that the Governor in Council had that right to appoint at least one person to the board.

The amendment, as it is structured, would run past the total divestiture date. It would go on forever. It would be in perpetuity, I suppose, as long as Petro-Canada was around. Given the origins of Petro-Canada I cannot say that would be a bad thing for us or for Petro-Canada.

• (1630)

The other amendment, 12A, proposes that the individual control limit that would be the 10 per cent limit of shareholdings would be reduced to 5 per cent. I would not want to try to guess what the reason for that would be, but I think the reason is that, as I mentioned earlier, the control blocks in some widely held corporations can be constituted by as little as—and I am talking theory here—10 per cent. I think the thrust of the amendment is that the threshold be 5 per cent so that we are very sure that we can catch control blocks and prevent them from maturing.

I was disappointed actually in the remarks of the member for Calgary West when he referred to the fact that Petro-Canada did not earn a profit in its early years. It was not profitable for the taxpayers of the country. I have to point out for the record that we are not in the business of making profits, of running things for profits.

We are in the business of running a country, not for profit, and the acquisition of Petro-Canada was not ideologically driven any more than a divestiture of Petro-Canada is ideologically driven.

There are a lot of countries in this world that have state oil companies and are proud of it. They continue in operation and some of them are thriving. It happens to be the position of this government, whether it is ideologically driven or not—and we can certainly debate that here if we want to—that Petro-Canada should be discarded. We, of course, do not agree with that and it is not easy to stand and try to propose constructive amendments to a bill that you fundamentally disagree with.

Is your heart in it? I suppose your heart is in it, trying to make a bad bill better, but if you agree with divestiture and privatization, this is not a bad bill. It does exactly what the doctor ordered. It sends the thing back out into the private sector. A lot of people expect that those in opposition have an obligation to lie down in front of the freight train and do a Hollywood production. The debate is opposition. It is not grandstanding, it is not a Darryl F. Zanuck Hollywood production that some people in the media would like it to be. It is what is going on right here in debate.

The last amendment proposed is No. 8A, requiring that the sale yield $6.7 billion bottom line. I am afraid that we cannot support that. The idea is fine and it would be nice if we could dictate what the sale would yield, admitting all along that we do not agree with the sale in the first place, but we have to keep in mind that we are selling Petro-Canada—if it is to be sold—in fractions and pieces. You cannot at the beginning create what looks like a master reserve bid. You cannot dictate in the beginning that the sale is going to yield a minimum of x billion dollars all the way through.

That would make the sale, the privatization, rather problematic. Maybe that is part of the thrust of the amendment. Maybe I kind of agree with that too. But if it is going to be sold and if we do not like the deal, let us get on and not destabilize the process and let us not back ourselves into a corner that would impair the process that we adopt in the House here.

Having addressed the three amendments in that way I will defer to the next speaker.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time we have this afternoon to speak to Bill C-84 I would like to put some comments on the record about this bill, what its intentions are, and of course on some of the amendments that are actually being proposed this afternoon.

Before I start I would like to give credit to two colleagues from our caucus who have done a great deal of work on this bill, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor and the hon. member for Edmonton East, my seatmate, who as our energy critic has really led the way with his staff to prepare a lot of the material and information on this bill at a very important time.

If we look at the world Conservative agenda or world-wide conspiracy in their own respective jurisdictions to destroy the country and the institutions many of us have come to believe in and to recognize, I do not think we should forget what this government is doing. As the member from Scarborough mentioned, how do you move good amendments to bad legislation? I want to echo his comments on where that fits in with the agenda that this government is following. Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, on a Monday afternoon for a couple of hours, we get to do our best to convince government members opposite of some of the amendments we propose to their plan to get rid of PetroCan will make it a very difficult thing. It fits with the agenda this government has, be it post offices, VIA Rail and, of course, more recently their attempts to destroy the CBC, some of the institutions that have come to help define what we are in Canada.

I hope when the vote takes place that maybe enough Tories will stay away and some of these amendments will actually pass. These are good amendments and they are trying to improve bad legislation. When you look at the amendments you can actually see that they are very reasonable.

For example, the motion from the New Democrats is asking the cabinet to appoint a member to the board of this newly privatized PetroCan so it may provide a window, or a messenger if you like, to have the opportunity that the Government of Canada would still have in terms of directing the activities of PetroCan, to provide some advice from government and from the public. I think that is very important. I do not know how long the Minister of State for Privatization's political career has been, but I will tell you one thing, we will not appoint him to the board after the next election. I can guarantee that. It is having that window on the operation of PetroCan that will be critical and this is an entirely reasonable amendment.

In fact, the very good notes prepared for our members took a look at what the guru of privatization for most of the members opposite, the former Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Margaret Thatcher, who went on this privatization splurge, did. Even Margaret Thatcher had an appointee from her cabinet on the boards of directors of some of the businesses, the former Crown corporations as we know them here; British Aerospace, Britoil, British Gas, Cable and Wireless and British Telecom. One would think that government would want to do this because once this is done and this bill passes—and we will vote on a lot of these amendments today and there will be another day's debate—what will we get just before Christmas? We will get rid of PetroCan probably once and for all.

During the break, I had a chance to ask some people out on the Sparks Street Mall what they thought, that if we sell PetroCan, can we get it back? I am afraid to report to you that a lot of people just do not think that we could do that again. How will we get control of our oil company again? It will be very difficult to do, if not a costly thing to do.

One other very reasonable provision that we suggested earlier, and unfortunately the Liberals and Conservatives joined to defeat this particular motion, was to call on the government to submit an annual report to Parliament to show exactly where the industrial benefits were happening, where the jobs were being created, what kinds of jobs they were and where the oil was going.

• (1640 )

That would give a chance for the government to say that we were wrong. We were going to give the government the opportunity to come back in a year with an annual report to Parliament saying: "You guys were wrong. Look at all the wonderful things that have happened to this company since we sold it off".

It is a reasonable amendment. This time, unfortunately, the Liberals and Conservatives defeated this amendment. It was good enough for legislation that we dealt with last week, Bill C–74, the Fisheries Act, where we asked that a separate annual report to Parliament be given. In that case it was habitat protection. The government accepted that amendment. So I see no reason in my mind why it should not be able to accept the very straightforward amendment in Bill C–84, the one we are debating today.

I see the other amendment that we brought in as a challenge to the government. If it is going to sell off Petro–Canada, then maybe it should do its best to get a fair return for the taxpayers of Canada. That is why we think it should be asking for a minimum of $6.7 billion. That is the amount of money that the taxpayers of Canada have put into this corporation. That is only a fair return.

I suggest that the government should take us up on our challenge, see if it can do it and then agree to our provisions for an annual report so it can come back to Parliament and tell us that it was successful. The problem, though, is I am not sure we would expect that of this government.

For many communities across the country Petro–Canada has become more than just a gas station. It has become a community store and in many cases it is the only place where you can buy gas. The Tories are just selling off bits and pieces of the country and it's institutions. We have come, as I said earlier, to try and define ourselves.

In wrapping up, Mr. Speaker, if anything has got ten through to Canadians and to the media who have been covering this debate, it has been the work by my colleague for Edmonton East in saying to Parliament and to Canadians: "Why don't we use Petro–Canada as the vehicle to ensure that we have energy conservation in Canada, and use its locations throughout in Canada as a way to promote energy conservation".

Think of all those locations where there would be a store–front opportunity for Canadians from across the country to get easy and handy information and advice on proper car maintenance, running of their vehicles and homes. I could not think of a better thing to do.

At the same time, instead of what we are likely to expect from the Tories in turning the red and white of Petro-Canada to a blue and white, why do we not paint it green and white?

Mr. Butland: Don't tell them.

Mr. Gardiner: If you give the minister an idea like that, you know what he is going to do with it. Why do we not paint the colours green and white; use Petro-Canada as our environmental leading edge in energy conservation. Let us not go about destroying the country like this government is doing. Let us not sell off the valuable assets that we have gained. Let us keep Petro-Canada. I hope the government will come to its senses, withdraw the bill, or at the very least, support some of the very reasonable amendments moved by my colleagues from the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it does not very often happen but I am going to be standing for the first part of my comments in opposition to something my colleague for Sault Ste. Marie said.

Mr. Butland: Shame.

Mr. Fisher: The New Democrat disagrees. The member for Sault Ste. Marie said that the timing was perfect. What he was referring to was that with the economy in the kind of trouble it is, although it could be argued I think that capital is doing very well, thank you—it is the economy that is in bad shape—nevertheless, in the state of the country in which we find ourselves, the d word has now been used. We are now in a depression, it has been admitted to by the government—recession, the r, he has not got to the d word yet. In any event, the inference of the member for Sault Ste. Marie was that it was an inopportune time to sell, that the timing was really bad.

I would submit that that is not the case. From the government's point of view and from the ideological and philosophical point of view and the reasons for which it is actually getting rid of Petro-Canada, the timing is most opportune. When we realize that really what is happening here is the transference of wealth from the people of Canada to the rich friends of the government, then the very best thing that we could possibly do is sell Petro-Canada when it is at its least economically desirable state of affairs.

That is perfectly consistent with the whole philosophical constitution of the Progressive Conservative Party. I would remind my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie, other members of the House and the Canadian public who are listening that I once heard Ted Kennedy say that conservatives get elected by promising the poor they will look after them; the smoke and mirrors where they have to get rid of Petro-Canada, for example, in order to be able to balance the budget or to reduce the national debt or whatever the case may be.

Mr. Speaker, if you are to believe that, with all the things they have privatized up to this point, they would not have to privatize Petro-Canada in order to balance the budget, in order to eradicate the national debt, they would already have done it. The fact of the matter is of course that nothing they have so far privatized has gone, even the slightest iota, toward reducing the deficit or the national debt.

The second part of the quotation is that they get elected by promising the poor they will look after them and by assuring the rich that they will not. That fits in so well with the whole idea that it is an opportune time to be selling Petro-Canada now because they are certainly looking after the rich, as they sell Petro-Canada at a time when the market would indicate that it really is not all that desirable a commodity. If I had money to buy shares in Petro-Canada, which I do not, I assure you that it is just at this time in the economic cycle that I would be doing my very best to get as many shares out of them as I could.

This brings up one of the references to the amendments where we are proposing that the maximum amount of ownership be not 10 per cent as the legislation proposes but rather that it should be 5 per cent. I would suggest that 5 per cent, even in a Canadian context, is rather generous when we understand that in the United States of America they consider 5 per cent ownership of a company to be tantamount to control of a company. They realize that for someone to be able to amass enough capital to be able to own 5 per cent of the shares of a company is very close to being able to control it.

That of course makes no reference at all to the whole idea of privatizing it in the first place or foreign control. We were talking earlier on one of the other amendments where the legislation talks in terms of 25 per cent and we were proposing that it be 1 per cent. In the United States as well, as was alluded to the other day, the same idea prevails where they consider that 5 per cent ownership of the economy in any sense is getting to be dangerous in so far as the sovereignty of the United States is concerned.

We have the double-edged whammy of great amounts of foreign ownership being allowed in Canada and also great amounts, which 10 per cent certainly is, of private ownership as well. The control simply dissolves away from any kind of public participation at all. Amendment 6A refers to the fact that the government ought to have some kind of public control, governmental control and involvement and ought to have some kind of window into the operation of Petro-Canada even after it has been privatized to the extent that a good portion of the assets which are being disposed of will really not accrue to the Canadian public.

• (1650)

As was pointed out earlier, there seems to be some controversy about whether or not you speak and evaluate in terms of the original investment or in terms of the present inflated value of the Canadian dollar. I would suggest that it makes a great deal of sense to speak of it in terms of the $6.7 billion or $8 billion which it ought to be valued at, rather than at the somewhat less value of $1.5 or $2 billion less, that the government seems to think is a fair amount of money to evaluate the company at.

The member for Calgary West made reference to the National Energy Program. I come from the west, Saskatchewan, and we produce a little bit of oil there. We do not produce anywhere near as much as they do in the province of Alberta, but enough to give a resident of Saskatchewan an interest in what is happening within the oil industry. I can remember the uproar that was caused, particularly in Alberta, not so much in Saskatchewan, over the National Energy Program. I can remember the pictures on the news in the evenings of the drilling rigs from Alberta heading south of the border and how all this was described and depicted as being such a tremendously negative thing for the country, and how the National Energy Program had destroyed the province of Alberta. While it is certainly unfortunate that the oil activity in the province of Alberta declined as much as it did, it seems to me that a good portion of the blame attributed to the National Energy Program was really not deserved at all.

If the journalists and the news media in Canada had followed those oil rigs into the United States, they would have seen that they found no work there either. Rather than going down there and continuing drilling, finding all kinds of oil and making billions of dollars—as in the mythology of the oil industry—what in fact happened was that they were parked. I would suggest that the member from Calgary was certainly a long way off base on that.

As far as the lost taxes from Petro-Canada being a Crown corporation over the years, I do not know how much Petro-Canada paid in taxes. I would like to think that the Government of Canada ran Petro-Canada as a responsible corporate citizen. We saw, particularly during the Olympics, with the carrying of the Olympic flame and so on, a great deal of involvement by Petro-Canada in the national community. That is the kind of thing it should have done. Through the years, I would hope that Petro-Canada, as a reliable and desirable corporate citizen, would also have paid the taxes which it ought to have paid.

I would like to take exception to the member for Calgary West's reference to the loss of tax revenue from Petro-Canada. There are a few oil companies in this country. I would hope that Petro-Canada was an exception which made a tremendous amount of profit and paid no taxes at all. The Prairie Oil Royalties Company had a profit of $5.1 million in 1989. It got a bonus of $1.6 million and paid no taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Unless the House agrees, the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened patiently, and maybe sometimes not so patiently, to the debate this afternoon on amendments 6A, 8A and 12A, which the House Leader of the New Democratic Party finally got right. I thank him for doing that because it does expedite the business of the House.

I have listened for quite some time. The NDP are back on their old kick about corporations. One figure that was thrown out this afternoon was that of 100,000 profitable companies not paying taxes in a given year. One thing the New Democratic Party never does is to go back to see how these corporations did the year before or the year before that, whether or not they lost money. That would be terrible if the NDP went back to check to see if they had some legitimate write-offs. Of course, they have legitimate write-offs. Corporations do not avoid tax without having losses or donations to some very good charities.

The hon. member just talked about Petro-Canada dealing with sharing the Olympic Flame and all that that involved. Many private corporations in the energy industry do a tremendous amount for the arts in this country. They do a tremendous amount for artists, writers and so on in this country. The NDP members fail to mention that when they stand up here and rhyme off all these silly statistics that do not mean a hill of beans because they do not give the whole story.

I think the energy industry as a whole has done a tremendous job on the environment and the record speaks for itself. As a matter of fact, it has received national and international awards for the work it has done on the environment.

The members of the New Democratic Party suggest that we should maintain Petro-Canada and use it as a centre for collecting old oil and doing all these other things. What I say to the New Democratic Party is that if that is what it wants to do with stations around the country—and there are many people who have set up businesses to collect old oil and recycle it and are doing a fine job at it—you cannot just take one corporation in a competitive environment, as the hon. member mentioned, one that is competing with other companies and place the onus on that company which places it at a disadvantage to other competitors. If you do that, and place an environmental stipulation on an industry, then do it as a whole so it is competitive for all of them. But do not place one corporation in an uncompetitive position. That is exactly what the New Democratic Party is suggesting.

It is unfair to the corporation, whether it is a Crown corporation competing in the private sector or whether it is one that becomes privatized and therefore has to compete in that same environment; it is a very unfair idea of the New Democratic Party. It would be better to promote an over-all environmental program. That would be more important, and that is exactly what our government is doing with the green plan. The green plan is an environmental program that affects all industries on a fair and equitable basis and speaks to the environment as a whole and does not place the onus on one or two Canadian companies.

The other interesting thing about this is that they are asking us to place the onus on a Canadian company when they are not placing it on foreign companies. That is exactly what the NDP wants to do. It wants to place a Canadian company in unfair competition with foreign interests in this country. That is hogwash.

The other interesting thing about this is that they are asking us to place an onus on a Canadian company when they are not placing it on the foreign companies. That is exactly what they want to do. They want to place a Canadian company in unfair competition with foreign interests in this country. That is hogwash.

I must admit that I digressed a little, but so did they. They agree that in all fairness I had a chance to rebut what they had to say. The first amendment from the New Democratic Party talks to appointing a director on the board of Petro-Canada in perpetuity, forever and ever. Again I ask: why do you not bring forward a proposal that we appoint one board member to Imperial Oil, to Shell and to the other 2,500 energy companies we have in this country? Why does the NDP not suggest that the government appoint a board member to each and every one of them; Canadian, foreign, it does not matter what. Why do you not do that?

I am surprised members of the New Democratic Party did not come forward with that suggestion. That sounds very much like what they would do. That sounds exactly like what they would do. They would like to stick their tentacles into every private corporation board room to see what goes on there. Because they have suspicions about all these board rooms across this country, how terrible they are, we should have an appointee on each and every one of them.

I can tell the House and the people that we as a government will have representatives on the board of directors of Petro-Canada as long as we have shares in Petro-Canada. There will be a mechanism established to appoint members to the board of directors from the Government of Canada as long as we hold shares. I can assure the House and the public of that.

Once we completely divest ourselves of the corporation, however, it will be electing its own board of directors by shareholders, by those Canadians who exercise their rights to vote as shareholders in Petro–Canada. It would be really inappropriate for us to legislate a seat in perpetuity on the board of directors of a privatized Petro–Canada, so we will be voting against that motion.

The next amendment is the NDP accounting procedure. A dollar is not a dollar. A dollar is $1.50 to its members. If in fact we did accounting procedures like members of the New Democratic Party are bringing forward on Petro–Canada, there is not an accountant in Canada agree with their accounting. Even the NDP accountants in this country do not agree with this type of accounting. They do not agree with it whatsoever.

We will be defeating this motion. We are committed to receiving a fair value for the company, a fair value for the taxpayers' dollar that has been spent and which is on our books at $4.3 billion. Even the New Democratic Party can understand—at least I hope it can—that a share is sold when a willing seller is prepared to sell it and a willing buyer is prepared to buy it.

An hon. member: It is called capitalism.

Mr. McDermid: Isn't that awful? It is called capitalism. Can you believe that?

An hon. member: What about profits?

McDermid: I heard them talking about profits. It is terrible. The New Democratic Party does not like either of those things. Isn't that awful? Isn't that terrible?

It is profits that get reinvested and make our economy grow. That is what it is all about. Once the New Democratic Party understands that, maybe it will get somewhere in governing this country. Maybe, sometime.

Turning to the final amendment they have put forward, they are proposing to reduce the percentage of voting shares an individual is permitted to own from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. The current individual ownership provisions are intended to encourage a broad base of ownership in Petro–Canada much like we saw in Air Canada wherein 130,000 Canadians participated in the initial issue and to prevent a single investor or group from obtaining control of the company.

The strength of these provisions lies not only in the 10 per cent limit itself but in the definition of associates, since the limit applies to any one person together with the associates of that person. In this way two or more shareholders are prevented from acting in a way that would circumvent the 10 per cent individual ownership requirements. The argument that they put up that two people would be able to control Petro–Canada is entirely false. We feel that the level of 10 per cent strikes a reasonable balance.

Those are the three amendments that the New Democratic Party has proposed in this particular area, Motions Nos. 6A, 8A, and 12A. We will be voting against these motions.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 15

That Bill C-84 be amended in clause 9 by striking out line 29 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"(e) financing of Petro-Canada or for so long as the Minister holds any voting shares of Petro-Canada, from disposing of any asset of Petro-Canada which the Minister has designated in writing as a strategic asset, where the Minister has published notice of same in The Canada Gazette prior to the completion of any such disposition."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this proposed amendment respecting the bill privatizing Petro-Canada deals with an issue that arose during the debate, the discussions and the hearing of witnesses at committee. It derives from a projection into the future of certain fact sequences which might prove to be a problem for Petro-Canada, for the government, and for the shareholders.

The proposed amendment sets out that the minister—and that would be the minister designated under this particular bill—would have the opportunity to prevent a sale by Petro-Canada of an asset described as a strategic asset.

• (1710)

Why is that important to us? If we look at the reason for having a state oil company in the first place, we see we can define certain national interests that require us to act or take steps as a country and as a nation. In this case the state oil company would take steps on behalf of all of us to protect our vital interests in areas deemed to be of strategic importance.

When I talk about strategic importance or strategic assets or vital interests, I am talking about economic areas of activity engaged in now by Petro-Canada, areas where Canadians and the government have wanted Petro-Canada to be active from the beginning, exploration for domestic oil reserves and distribution of energy commodities in this country.

The difficulty we see arising is one in a future that would not be quite so orderly and planned as what we like to think would mature in the ordinary course. I am talking about a situation that would evolve in the economy and politically around the world. I suppose the current gulf crisis is an example. Although that particular crisis is quite a way offshore, it has affected us here in Canada. It has affected our oil price.

However, in this unseen future I think what I am looking at is a change in circumstances whereupon the people of Canada, from all across the country or from a particular region, would say to this government that in acting for all of us it must take a step in our interest to protect us or to foster the national interest in a particular field of the economy.

I am talking about, for example, maintaining in business a refinery that is strategically located in our national interest in a particular region, in a particular area. I am talking about the sale of particular reserves of crude, and even of a particular type of crude, in a particular area of the country where it would be seen to be in our national interest for that crude not to fall into foreign hands or offshore control. I am also talking about the sale, conveyance or even abandonment of transportation infrastructure by Petro-Canada, which by that point in time will be our former state oil company. We will either still have a percentage interest or even a large interest, but because of the process of divestiture and privatization we will have given up administrative or, practically speaking any role in the running of the company and the decisions it would be making.

As well I am talking about the sale of a pipeline, the abandonment of a pipeline. I noted last week or two weeks ago a projection that the pipeline which runs from southern Ontario to Montreal could be shut down by 1991. Petro-Canada does not have anything to do with that pipeline. However, I am talking about a situation wherein the government is called upon by the electorate to intervene, protect, and stabilize an enterprise like a pipeline to ensure that the people of Montreal, for example, have access to western Canadian crude. I have referred to the refinery, the reserves, the transportation. the infrastructure, and the pipeline. There are perhaps other unforeseen areas where Canadians will demand that their government intervene, protect and stabilize a particular strategic asset.

By placing this amendment in this bill, it will provide notice to Petro-Canada, to its competitors, and to its new shareholders that Canadians still retain the right to intervene if they feel it is in their national interest to do so.

I know that does not sit well in the private sector. I know that a provision like this one will affect to some degree the price of shares, but in the phase of moving from no privately held shares to all privately held shares we have to go through the process where the potential purchaser of shares knows very well that the people of Canada still have an interest in Petro-Canada. Whether that process takes five years or ten years, it is still going to be there for us.

There is no need in this amendment to define what is a strategic asset. Some people may ask: "How can you provide for a right for the minister to force Petro-Canada to retain a strategic asset when you have not defined what it is?" I would maintain that when the minister is called upon to act, he or she would know exactly what that asset was. As long as the government felt that it was an asset disposition which required its intervention, that would be a sufficient reason for intervening. I am sure that that intervention would not be taken lightly.

The amendment provides that notice of same would be published in The Canada Gazette. I am sure as well that there might be offers to the government: "If you are going to prevent us from disposing of it, then perhaps you ought to expropriate it". I do not know whether or not we will get into that kind of situation. It would place us right back to where we were when Petro-Canada was created in the first place, where there was a perceived need for a national oil company that had the means of participating in the marketplace and in the upstream and downstream side. When Petro-Canada was created of course it was the upstream side that was targeted, but it is that national interest the people will wish us to pursue.

That is the reason for the amendment. I believe it fairly describes the situation wherein such intervention would have to be involved, at least in terms of process. I hope the House will support my amendment.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a short time on the amendment being presented by the Official Opposition. We can certainly support this particular amendment. It is a particularly good policy approach, if this government is going to go ahead and get rid of Petro-Canada, sell it off once and for all. It would appear that is what is to happen. It should do an entire review of its assets, equipment, refineries, and pipelines. In particular they should all be surveyed. As the hon. member who just spoke suggested very reasonably, a determination would obviously be made by the Governor in Council, by cabinet, as to which particular parts of the company are strategic. We all know what strategic really means. We know when it comes to oil crises and problems with our national energy supply that we could be faced with that situation now, given the crisis in the gulf. Reference was made to that earlier today in our speeches.

• (1720)

Here we are, turning over an entire infrastructure that the public has paid for, and that we built up to provide an opportunity for a window on the industry and a chance for the Government of Canada to make some money from the oil industry. It has a chance to use Petro-Canada in some innovative leading-edge ways when it comes to the environment.

It is a very reasonable amendment to suggest that the government would take a look at the strategic assets of PetroCan and publish them for comment in the Canada Gazette. This would give people a chance to see what are the strategic assets so that they would then be able to comment on them.

In the Peace district of northern British Columbia, I believe the refinery in Taylor is owned by PetroCan. Who knows what is going to happen to that refinery after this bill is passed? If that refinery was to close it would do damage to the economy of that area and the whole infrastructure of the industry in that particular part of British Columbia.

It is without any hesitation that we can support this amendment. It is only a logical approach to take. I hope that the Government of Canada has some logic and will support this amendment.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I have heard both my colleagues on this amendment. I am somewhat confused about it because they seem to not understand that the Government of Canada has sufficient power in any kind of emergency situation to do whatever it wants.

For the kind of emergency that this amendment is meant to compensate for, this amendment is unnecessary. It is also unnecessary to put obstacles in the way of people buying Petro-Canada. It is unnecessary to make policy decisions for some unforeseen happening down the road. If there is a true emergency, the Government of Canada has all the power to intercede that it can possibly need under any of the emergency measures orders.

This is just one more way in which the opposition parties want to put hedges against what happens with respect to Petro-Canada. There is no real reason for it. It is one more amendment that our party is certainly going to vote against.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, this time I will try to deal directly with the amendments or assets which the minister deems to be strategic. There is a problem with that unless we would change the minister. The strategies of this minister and this government would certainly not be in line with what the Canadian public wants.

For the general advantage of Canada, I am going back to this business of very vague amendments. They are so far-reaching that I think they are very innocuous. The New Democrats can see their way to support them nevertheless. Loath as I am to read, I would like to read just one paragraph where I hope one can get the relationship to the amendments. It is entitled "Loss of Autonomy":

> Selling state economic assets to a foreign MNC may yield real benefits, but it has the necessary result of the nation state losing control of some of its resources. For example, Chile has sold its ownership of vast forest holdings to two New Zealand companies, Carter Holt Holdings and Fletcher Challenge Limited. These firms may have very different approaches to the use of these forests than the Chilean government. When the forests are held by a foreign multinational, harvesting schedules may be tied to the world price for paper or timber. Whereas the Chilean government may have made forestry decisions based on the objectives of maintaining an active presence in the world market, continuing employment levels or managing forest lands for orderly future harvests.

It is an intriguing paper from which I read. It is entitled "Privatization in Developing Countries". I would ask the minister to make note of what is in this document. We certainly are not a developing country. The minister should take note of the safeguards and the concerns that the author puts forward, even if he is speaking of the underdeveloped countries of the world.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to this rather enlightening debate this afternoon. It is really strange to try to figure out the balances on the opposite side of the House.

We are looking at legislation that is really talking about disposing of assets and not disposing of assets. We are talking about whether they are strategic or not strategic. I have heard many people say that the Government of Canada should not be making these decisions and should not be involved in making these decisions. I think that kind of makes sense.

We should privatize Petro-Canada and give it the opportunity to compete on a level playing field. We hear that term often enough and yet we are trying to say that we should keep some hold-backs within it and keep the government involved in the process. I do not think that is what we are here for. I have heard talk about disposing of assets that might be strategic. We can carry this so far and be so silly in this argument that we can be talking about which corner gas station we are going to close at a main intersection, when four of them happen to be owned by PetroCan. That is how ridiculous this whole thing could be.

I do think we have to be fair in this whole situation. We have to put it into the hands of the people who are willing to invest in PetroCan and give them an opportunity to have a fair return from their investment. I think that is exactly what we want to do. We want to be able to sell those shares in a free and open market. That is going to bring revenue to the Government of Canada to replace some of the money that has been spent and continues to siphon into this corporation, over the last number of years. It is very critical that we give investors the opportunity to get some of the dollars back and provide some of those dollars back to the Government of Canada.

Clause 9(1)(d) is intended to reinforce the individual and foreign ownership limit. That does not make it weaker and it does not take away from it, but it is not there to prevent the normal sale of properties, assets or small divisions of the company. It will give Canadians who purchase those shares and get involved in the system the opportunity to get money back, to show a profit. The dirty word, profit, again comes in. But that is what makes this system go. It makes capitalism go. It makes our country go. It makes us profitable. And I think that is very important for everyone. We all want to make a profit, in various ways, whether it is in our own business endeavour, in investment, or in whatever we happen to do. It would make it very difficult for any business to operate properly and to continue to be competitive if it was limited in its ability to buy and sell its assets. Often times, corporations will make strategic plans which will be beneficial to that particular company but will also be beneficial to the company that purchases, so I think that is a very positive step.

It is not the intention of Petro-Canada to stop being an integrated oil company; that is one of its big assets. It is there at the retail level and it is there at the processing level. I think that should be very profitable. It will encourage more people to invest in Petro-Canada. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I will not be supporting Motion No. 15.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 15, standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved Motion No. 23.

That Bill C-84 be amended by adding immediatly after line 44 at page 12 the following new clause:

"18. All undertakings and works constructed by Petro-Canada are, and each of them is declared to be, works or a work for the general advantage of Canada."

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is too bad I have only 10 minutes to speak to this very important amendment. In fact, it concerns a provision in our Constitution, Section 92, which deals with the right of the Parliament of Canada, or rather says that the Parliament of Canada may, on occasion—it has done so many times—declare, before or after their execution, that works, although wholly situate within a province and under its jurisdiction, shall be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the effect of this amendment would be to declare that once privatized, Petro-Canada would have to recognize that what makes us distinct, what brings us together and what keeps us together in this country is that we have declared ourselves to be a people with two official languages.

My purpose in amending Bill C–84 is to confirm that in the future, Petro–Canada will have to comply with the rules that customarily apply to federal institutions with respect to service to the public, language of work and participation of French—and English—speaking Canadians in the administration of the institution.

Mr. Speaker, it has happened many times before that Parliament, on the basis of its declaratory power, declared that it could modify, without the consent of a province or provinces, an area customarily and exclusively under provincial jurisdiction.

I would like to refer to a document by a respected constitutional expert, Senator Gérald Beaudoin, who said the following in a collection of essays for the University of Ottawa Law School, in Part IV on page 279, and I quote: "Declaratory power is exceptional. Nevertheless, Parliament has often used that power, as explained by Ms. André Lajoie in her remarkable book on the subject. She writes: "Parliament has specifically declared to be for the general advantage of Canada: dams, canals, battlefields, railways, companies, grain elevators, jetties, gas pipelines, slides, a piece of legislation, a subway, oil pipelines, bridges, including several international bridges, ditches and tunnels".

Mr. Speaker, declaratory power is nothing new. It has been applied to a number of works and institutions.

In the same text, Ms. Lajoie goes on to say, and I quote: "Declaratory power is applied to the following: company shares, harbour improvements, aqueducts, aircrafts, buses, ferries, basins, drydocks—" and there is quite an extensive list, Mr. Speaker. I will not list them all for lack of time.

That being said, it is my humble opinion that once privatized, PetroCan, our window on the industry, should be bound to the obligation to serve the Canadian people, its shareholders and customers, in the official language of their choice, whether French or English, as long as it is the customer's language.

However, all we find in Bill C–84 is a flawed and weak section, in my opinion, namely section 9(1) which states that the articles of amendment for PetroCan shall contain—these are, word for word, the obligations flowing from this amendment and I will quote the English text, because it is slighty different in French. So, section 9(1) reads as follows:

[English]

> 9.(1) The articles of amendment particularly shall contain
> (e) provisions requiring Petro–Canada to ensure that any member of the public can, in either official language, communicate with and obtain available services from
> (i) its head office, and
> (ii) any of its other offices and facilities, and the head office of any other office or facility of any of its wholly–owned subsidiaries, where Petro–Canada determines that there is significant demand for communications with and services from that office or facility in that language having regard to the public served and the location of the office or facility;

Mr. Speaker, I say it is a weak clause because only the shareholders of a privatized Petro–Canada will have a right to demand and to ask the company to follow those—

Mr. McDermid: No.

Mr. Gauthier: I hear the minister say no. Did I hear the minister say no? If that is so I think he should stand and explain to me how he interprets this clause and how that clause will have the effect of obligating Petro–Canada to serve the Canadian public in both official languages.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the company answers to its shareholders. Therefore only the shareholders of that company will have the right to demand from the directors the answers to their questions.

I deplore the fact that the government has not seen fit to do with Petro–Canada what it did with other Crown corporations, in particular Air Canada when it was privatized.

Mr. McDermid: It's entirely different.

Mr. Gauthier: Oh, I understand the minister saying to me that Air Canada falls under the federal jurisdiction of transport and therefore is subjected to the general rules of safety and security, that language must be used in giving notices to the public and therefore Air Canada is obligated to follow those rules. I say to the minister that that is why I put this amendment which would declare a privatized Petro–Canada, and I would like to read it again:

> 18. All undertakings and works constructed by Petro–Canada are, and each of them is declared to be, works or a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, there is no magic to this amendment. Strictly it makes Petro–Canada a company which will respond in our view, which will act in an active manner toward its clientele and give Canadians in French or English, the services they deserve from this company whenever it is privatized.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a reasonable amendment and should be adopted by the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I think you would find there is unanimous consent for applying the vote on Motion No. 2A to Motions Nos. 6A, 12A, 15, 19, 20, 23 and 32A later on, when we proceed with the votes at the report stage of Bill C–84. The same vote will apply inversely to the adoption motion.

• (1740)

The vote on Motion No. 15A will apply to the vote on Motions Nos. 4A and 8A. After the vote I believe the hon. member for Beaver River will rise on a point of order concerning her vote on only one of the motions. I hope this proposition will have the unanimous agreement of the House.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as much as I followed the point made by my hon. friend, I believe we support it. I will reflect on it for a moment or two, but as far as I can understand, yes, we support the suggestion.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member's fluent French, I am sure I will have no trouble supporting that. As I understood it, it is a vote on each of the amendments and then the government, of course, would be voting for the concurrence motion. We certainly do not have any problem with the proposal as proposed by the hon. member.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the proposition of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Is that agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Agreed and so ordered.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think the timing of this initiative from the government is one of the more curious aspects of this whole debate. We saw that the last oil shocks devastated our national economy in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and here we are again in another situation where the oil companies are using the world situation to their advantage.

This Liberal amendment is worthy of speaking about. The whole privatization of Petro–Canada is an initiative that is one of those more curious aspects of the leadership role of this government.

Petro–Canada had such potential to be used as a national instrument for the betterment of Canadians, for the benefit of environmental policy and for the benefit of taking control of our economy and that potential has never been fulfilled. Now, if the government gets its way, it will never be fulfilled. It will be lost.

The hon. members on the other side of the House talk about we, as social democrats, putting a Canadian company at a disadvantage vis–à–vis foreign controlled companies. Another way of looking at it is that what Petro–Canada could be doing and is not doing, but should be doing, is using its role in the marketplace to the benefit of consumers. I know a number of my constituents who are hurting because of the price of gas going up and up and up, and they are hurting because there are no alternative transportation policies initiated by the government.

We need Petro–Canada to keep those foreign companies honest because we know in our guts that the reason those prices are going up is not necessarily because of decreased supply. We have supply in Canada. It is because they are using the timing of the current crisis regarding the gulf to their own financial advantage. Canadians know this and are going to criticize this government for not using Petro–Canada and not urging Petro–Canada to be used as an instrument of national policy.

It is ironic that we are now debating the privatization or selling off of a national instrument, just another one in a whole string of national instruments to bring Canada together.

We hear a lot of rhetoric about Canadian unity, but when the government has the tools for the job, it sells them off to foreign companies. Once Petro–Canada has been sold off at bargain basement prices, we can never get it back because no succeeding government could afford to get it back. It is one of those ironies as well where this government is selling off not only what we have now, but the potential for leadership.

I read through many of the speeches on Petro–Canada by government members when they were in opposition. They talked about the need for Canada to maintain control over its resources. Petro–Canada is one of those means of maintaining control over its resources. So one wonders whether or not sitting on the other side of the House does something to your head. It sort of swivels it around and makes you see things backward. I hope not because I hope to be sitting on the other side—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, but I am still waiting for her to speak to the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I am sure she will co–operate and stick to the subject of the motion. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Perhaps I should have been more explicit. The amendment is regarding the general advantage of Canada. That is precisely what I am talking about.

I would also like to refer to something the current House leader said. He was the Conservative energy critic when he was in opposition. This is what I am talking about when I say members see things differently when they get to the other side of the House. On February 20, 1979, he said: "I agree with the Leader of the NDP. The corporate purposes of Exxon may not be synonymous with the best interests of Canada".

Well, that is quite an admission, Mr. Speaker. I think that that also states that there are some government members who understand that the best interests of Canada are not going to be served by the privatization of Petro–Canada.

As a member of the parliamentary committee on the environment, I am most concerned about this initiative of the government because nothing is clearer to me than the fact that energy policy is crucial for Canada's role in the future. Energy policy is crucial to the economic development of our country.

When we are talking about a global economy, as the government members are wont to do, they consider that we do not understand that. I instruct them to look at Japan and the kind of growth it has enjoyed. One of the reasons that it has enjoyed the growth that it has is that it has reduced the energy content of a unit of gross domestic product by about 40 per cent. It is estimated that that has given Japan a 5 per cent comparative advantage, just on energy savings alone, against U.S. made products.

This is the kind of potential that this government is selling off in its privatization move. We are not going to be able to have the flexibility to have those kinds of initiatives. I would remind the government members as well that the much touted and very disappointing green plan released last week talked rather circuitously about energy policy. It is crucial for the economic advantage of Canada. This government is losing that vision. It has no sense of vision. It is very short–sighted.

Petro–Canada should be used for the development of alternative energy sources; alternate fuels such as ethanol. Sitting on the environment committee, we have heard a lot of testimony about the dangers of global warming. The danger of this is confronting our world. We know that we have to reduce our dependency on fossil fuels. We know that the dangers of fossil fuel consumption are enormous. The danger of fossil fuel transportation, especially for me coming from a coastal riding where tankers and the dangers of tanker traffic in Saanich and the Gulf Islands area, is only too apparent especially for those of us who had oil wash up on beaches.

• (1750)

A kind of alternate energy such as ethanol could be used, but no, the government members do not want to hear about that. Ethanol comes from plants. Why could we not use Petro–Canada to develop that kind of energy source?

The lack of vision that this government has demonstrated time and time again is tragic. The vision is lacking because what we are talking about here is a selling off of Canadian potential. I am not overstating it. It it is a selling off of a national instrument for the development of policy and it fits in—I see the Minister of State for Privatization across the way—with one of his initiatives; everything has got to be going through the market.

The market has gone beyond him. The market for the future is the eco-business. The kind of initiatives for the future are not the old views of the Minister of State for Privatization, but the new vision where environmentally friendly products are the ones that are going to be the money-makers. They are going to be the growth products for Canada.

But this government says no, "We have got to put our heads in the sand. We have got to get that deficit down. We have got to sell off our assets just like we have done in Canada Post and other initiatives. We have got to get that deficit down and we have got to see the bottom line". Focusing on that bottom line prevents the government from looking forward. It prevents it from having a vision for the future which will lead Canada to a better economy and an environmentally sustainable future.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to that last speech by the hon. member of the socialist party. I notice that she did not touch once on the amendment presented by my friend from Ottawa—Vanier on official languages. I think the NDP is afraid to discuss this subject. Obviously it is. The hon. member did not mention it once, which was rather interesting.

We are debating a well-intentioned amendment that was presented by my friend from Ottawa—Vanier. I want to give the government's side on this because I think it is very important.

Once Petro-Canada ceases to be wholly owned by the Crown, it's business activities fall under provincial jurisdiction. That is the difference between an oil company and an airline company.

When Air Canada was privatized, it still was under federal jurisdiction. When Petro-Canada is privatized, it will come under provincial jurisdiction, just like its competitors.

Parliament has really no constitutional basis to legislate a privatized Petro-Canada directly in respect of language. Application of even a part of the Official Languages Act to a privatized Petro-Canada would put the federal government in the untenable position of regulating an activity over which it has no jurisdiction. That causes us some problems.

The only way it could do this is to specifically override provincial jurisdiction in the manner suggested by Motion No. 23. I am not sure that my hon. friend wants that. I know what he wants. He wants to assure that Petro-Canada maintains its bilingual policies, and so on. That is fair enough. Mr. D'Iberville Fortier made it very clear that Petro-Canada has done extremely well in the use of both official languages. He was very pleased with its performance. There is no reason why it would not carry that on.

However, the government does not believe it is desirable to infringe on provincial territory, nor does it believe that it is necessary to do so in order to ensure Petro-Canada continues to serve the public in both official languages. We have assured that through the section in the bill referring to official languages and through the articles which will be approved for Petro-Canada to ensure that both official languages are used in an appropriate way by Petro-Canada.

The hon. member asked me how the public can complain with regard to the official languages if it was found to be necessary. He is not listening to me right now, but I am trying to explain to him how the ordinary citizen, how he or I, can make a complaint against Petro-Canada if in fact it is felt that it is not doing what it said it would do. It is laid out very clearly in its articles as to what it will do and if a citizen feels it is not following what it said it will do, under the Canada Business Corporations Act the complainant can make a complaint that the company is not abiding by what it said it would do. So, there is an avenue for the public to complain if Petro-Canada is not following the articles laid out as to what it said it would do.

To be quite honest, we wrestled with this. It is something to which we gave a tremendous amount of consideration. I think the hon. member will agree that we all in this House are concerned about official languages and their application. The articles will spell out very clearly what Petro-Canada will do with regard to official languages, and I think the hon. member will be pleased as will the Canadian public.

I also think the member understands that we should not override the constitutional jurisdiction of the provincial governments in this regard. Therefore, we feel that the bill as it stands covers the area of official languages.

We have spoken with Mr. D'Iberville Fortier on this subject. I have had correspondence with him. I explained the situation. He would like to see us override provincial jurisdiction. We do not feel it is proper to do that. Therefore we will vote against this well-intentioned amendment.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment that has been alluded to by the Minister of State for Privatization.

I find it rather ironic that the minister has acknowledged that the concept presented by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is a valid one. He considers it an enlightened one. I certainly support it and it is a very well-intentioned one, as is the normal course of events for the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I would suggest that the hon. member for Brampton ought to listen because I assure him that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier thought of all the questions that he asked, but also he is well aware of what is in the provisions of the Official Languages Act and the ability of that act to be effective in this regard. The hon. member went to great lengths to find the way to ensure what the minister has just said, that he wants to see official languages within the context of the privatized Petro-Canada. If he wants it, why does he not listen to my hon. colleague? If he looks at clause 9 (1)(e), he will recognize that the amendment being suggested by my hon. colleague will enable exactly what the minister indicated he wanted to have happen.

• (1800)

I refer the minister to la quatrieme partie du pouvoir déclaratoire fédéral, because exactly what is called for by this amendment is a declaratory power. As long as Petro-Canada is a Crown corporation there is no question of its obligation to comply with the Official Languages Act. Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, the Commissioner of Official Languages, indicated that it was working very well in the interests of all Canadians. All of us can drive anywhere across this country with a great sense of pride. When we look at the identification and the signage that is outside Petro-Canada stations, we see the Canadian flag. We have a sense of participation and belonging all across Canada. Whenever there is correspondence or a logo that identifies Canada, it is a very vital matter.

As we are busy destroying all the national infrastructure across this land, whether it be VIA Rail, Air Canada or Radio-Canada, it is a serious matter. It is not just the signage; it is also the language in which one can be served. The minister indicated good will and good intent, but he did not seem to find the avenue to apply that intent. My hon. colleague has found that for him.

If the way it is written in the statutes is changed, will Petro-Canada be subject to the same obligations? If so, why has the government—and he seems to indicate that it will be—elected to include 9 (1) (e) since the Official Languages Act already covers language of service. Therefore there must be something there. If it will not, why can we not ensure it? It was put in there. Why was it put it in there? Was it to cover the fact that it was no longer under the Official Languages Act? He as much as said that. He does not want to trample on provincial relations. That is what you said.

It is not a matter of trampling. It is a matter of having a priority. It is a matter of having a vision for Canada. It is a matter of understanding that there are certain issues one makes a choice on which say that we belong to Canada.

Mr. McDermid: What about the Constitution?

Mrs. Finestone: It has nothing to do with the Constitution. If the minister will listen to the translation, I will read to him what it has to say about le pouvoir déclaratoire fédéral.

[Translation]

Knowing that the hon. member does not speak French, I can only hope that he will understand what I am about to say in that language.

The declaratory power is what enables the Parliament of Canada, under section 92(10(c), to change proprio moto, without consent and at the expense of the provincial legislative powers, the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over the local works it has declared to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Incidentally, paragraphs (b) and (d) deal with the nature of this power. It is a special power.

[English]

If one believes in Canada, there are certain areas where one makes priorities, choices, and options.

[Translation]

Although this a special power, Parliament used it extensively, as Mrs. Andrée Lajoie explained in her remarkable book on the subject. She wrote: "Parliament specifically declared to be for the general advantage the dams, canals, battlefields, railways, companies, grain elevators, landings stages, gas pipelines, slides, a piece of legislation, a subway, an oil pipeline, bridges—including several international bridges—trenches and tunnels."

Is is often argued that, and I quote: "The business or company is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada". We will examine the validity of this line in a moment. This line was used to exercice declaratory power regarding the following works, and I quote: "Company shares, harbour improvements, aqueducts, aircraft, buses, benches, basins, drydocks, water falls, docks, motor power, electricity, warehouses, companies involved in lumber, home building, railways, breeding, messengers, transport, terminals, garages, harbours, hotels, mines, mills, ships, works and undertakings—and on and on—of the federal district and later of the region of the national capital, oil refineries, restaurants, saw mills, telegraphs, underwater cables, telephones, theaters, tramways—of Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa and elsewhere—steel mills, brick factories, steel plants, pulp and paper mills, chemical plants, precious metal and gold refineries. This declaratory power enables the federal authority to redistribute unilaterally the legislative powers in a given field.

A distinction has to be made between, and I quote: "declaratory power", "emergency power" and "national reduction". These are three different concepts. We have already examined the first two.

In terms of exercise, that power can only be exercised through legislation. You must pay attention when I say through legislation, for you do not want to include it in legislation because you act as if you did not want to exercise your power in the field of activity at the provincial level. I have just read a list, exhaustive perhaps but it shows that you have taken the wrong road. You had an option, you had a choice but you did not make the right choice.

[English]

This is a government that does not know how to exercise options and choices or how to make an enlightened decision in the interest of all Canadians. Is that not just too bad. Another stubborn minister.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, mother.

Mrs. Finestone: You are welcome. I would not even acknowledge you as my son.

In the interest of national unity, in the interest of national identity, and in the interest of Canadians, I would suggest that this minister, if he would put his ego in his pocket and go and think about it, might see that there is an enlightenment behind the suggestions made by my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. It falls right now at a very nervous and sensitive time in the history of Canada. It would exercise for all of us an enlarged thinking and attitude toward the official languages of Canada and ensure whether one is in Moose Jaw or in Saguenay–Lac–Saint–Jean—

[Translation]

—or in Gaspé, or on the North Shore you can be served in the two official languages of Canada, and it is in that respect that I speak of——national interest of Canada. One should be able to be served in both those languages and it should be within the law, not within the mind and heart of what is in the House.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Every gas station, is that what you are saying?

Mrs. Finestone: I would not mind that at all. That is the way it should be. But the minister would not like that. It might hurt him like the cereal box hurt him with French and English on both sides. He should not be ridiculous.

We do have a few people who have not evolved in their mentality, it is sad to say, on the other side of this House. I wish you, Mr. Speaker, as one of the hon. representatives from the other official languages, and a few of your ministers and backbenchers, would speak to this member and make him see the light of day.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I would like for a few minutes to take the time of the House to comment on amendment no. 23 moved by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I would also like to give some clarification, which I am convinced will reassure the hon. member for Mount Royal, concerning the provision with regard to official languages which is found in Bill C–84.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege to sit on the legislative committee on Bill C–84 and I must say that I paid special attention to clause 9(1)(e), which deals particularly with the issue of bilingualism. The information that I received is to the effect that the provisions of that clause in Bill C–84 apply exclusively to Petro–Canada and not to other oil companies in Canada.

• (1810)

So, I got a very clear answer to the questions I asked to find out whether this clause only applies to Petro–Canada. Only this company must comply, under specific sections of this bill, to certain provisions concerning the two official languages.

Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to have a little decorum, please?

Mr. Gauthier: It is your minister!

Mr. Langlois: My minister and members of the Opposition.

So, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, Petro–Canada is the only oil company in Canada where, when it is privatized and in the hands of Canadian shareholders, there are provisions which compel that corporation to give services in both official languages at its main office and at all its other places of operation where the public asks for services in both official languages.

The hon. member for Mount Royal certainly does not want this House to move amendments to Bill C–84 which will encroach on the rights of the provinces, particularly those of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec already has a code and a legislation on both official languages. I do not think the hon. member for Mount Royal really wants that an amendment to or an article of Bill C–84, respecting the privatization of a Crown corporation, putting it into the hands of Canadian stockholders, to encroach upon the provincial jurisdiction. The minister has been very clear about that a little while ago. To include in Bill C–84 a provision that forces PetroCan to provide services in both official languages is already exceptional.

So, I think the concerns of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and those of the hon. member for Mount Royal have been taken into account since they are already included in the provisions of Bill C–84.

Mr. Speaker, while we recognize, on this side of the House, that the amendment presented by the member for Ottawa—Vanier is well–intentioned, I will presonally vote against it, convinced as I am that the clauses of Bill C–84 are quite reassuring concerning the prospect that, contrary to its competitors who will not be required to implement such measures, Petro–Canada will, once privatized, continue to provide services to Canadian citizens and consumers in both official languages.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that we were dealing with Motion No. 23, that the undertakings and works of Petro–Canada will be considered for the general good of Canada.

I am sorry the minister for privatization got to his feet so quickly to say that no, the government was not going to support this amendment. He referred almost exclusively to the requirement for Canadian works to offer their offices in both official languages. He also indicated that there was concern about interfering in provincial jurisdiction.

I think the government takes a bit of a hypocritical approach to this matter. There are a number of operations in the province of British Columbia, for example, designated as works for the general good of Canada. One of those operations, as the Minister of Transport is aware, is the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. It is a railway that starts in Victoria, in the suburb of Esquimalt on Vancouver Island, and terminates at Courtenay in my riding.

The reason the Minister of Transport is aware of it is that he has an action in court trying to shut down this railway service. One things the Government of British Columbia is proposing is that it take over jurisdiction of this railway and operate it because it begins and ends in British Columbia. It is a British Columbian railway service, especially because of the way it is being treated by the federal government.

An hon. member: Then why are we paying for it?

Mr Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Because you declared it a work for the general good of Canada. It was not done at the insistence of British Columbia. Many times over the last several years the Government of British Columbia has attempted to regain jurisdiction over this railway.

I am not saying that by passing this legislation when there is a crummy government in office one is going to get a well managed operation or responsible regulation of an operation. In fact, the Minister of Transport and his cronies are attempting to drive this railway into the ground.

It is a little hypocritical for the government to say on the one hand that it does not want to declare Petro-Canada a work for the general good of Canada. It interferes with provincial jurisdiction. Then, on the other hand, like a dog in the manger it wants to destroy that railway on Vancouver Island, that little railway that we want to make successful. It wants to retain jurisdiction so it can shut that railway down and drive it into the ground. This is a kind of dog-in-the-manger approach that this government is taking.

Mr. Lewis: Your brother never looked so good.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): And Harvie Andre is looking at a much better House leader.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Harvie Andre is a much better House leader is what I am saying.

An hon. member: Harvie will be surprised.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): There is not really too much to compare between them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I would ask the member to confine himself to the matter at hand.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if those members will stop interrupting and allow debate to proceed in an orderly fashion in this House, I want to say that it does not necessarily help for an institution or a company such as PetroCan to be declared a work for the general good of Canada because of the way the Minister of Transport has been treating the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway in British Columbia.

If he would let the Province of British Columbia assume jurisdiction over that railway then, when the NDP takes over in a very few months, we are going to operate that railway as if it were something of value to the people on Vancouver Island. We are going to promote it. We are going to expand its operations. Really, we have a vision to make sure that railway operates.

On the other hand, there is some justification for having Petro-Canada declared a work for the general good of Canada. This, after all, is a company that trades interprovincially. It has retail outlets in virtually every province in Canada. It trades into the international market by purchasing goods and services from international offshore suppliers. It also sells Canadian products on the international market. There is some justification for this nation-wide company, represented in every province and doing business interprovincially and internationally, to be a declared a work for the general good of Canadians and, for that reason, to be regulated by the Government of Canada and to be within the jurisdiction of this Parliament so that this Parliament can oversee and regulate its operations. There is some justification for that.

Obviously there is no justification for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. I would encourage the Minister of Transport to listen to people in British Columbia who want to tell him to get his hands off it because he is doing nothing but destroying that railway and undermining the transportation network on Vancouver Island. If only we had a competent Minister of Transport federally, we would be looking forward to a better operation there. Unfortunately that is not the case.

I would hope members of the House would be persuaded by the arguments made by the hon. member from Montreal, that PetroCan should be declared a work for the general good of Canadians.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a word on this particular amendment.

Mr. Fisher: Time is up.

Mr. Winegard: I know you would like that. It seems to me that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier really has a choice. If we are going to have one oil company with one set of rules and 2,500 energy companies with different kinds of rules, I think it is unfair to the corporation.

• (1820)

I do not believe the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wants this because my experience with him since I have come into this House is that he really is a remarkably reasonable person. In fact, when I first came to this House as a new member in 1984, I sat just down on the other side and he was very helpful to me.

But what my colleagues in the NDP would like is to have all of the oil companies nationalized and operating in their so-called "good for the government of Canada". They would end up with a lot of people losing money like all the other things they want for the betterment or the good of Canada.

An hon. member: Very good point.

Mr. Winegard: Their operation is if we own it as a government it is bound to lose money and that will be good for Canada. That is what they say: lose money and if you are losing money it will be grand for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the motion of the member for Ottawa—Vanier, while I have tremendous sympathy for what he is trying to do, I think it would be unfair to have one corporation operating under a different set of rules than all of the other energy companies in the country.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly to this motion as well. When we look at the words "for the general advantage of Canada", when we look at the privatization of Petro-Canada, I think what we see is that the base underlying the problems that we have in this country is that we need to get our financial house in order. Probably more than anything else that will speak to the general advantage of Canada.

To many Canadians in western Canada the privatization of Petro-Canada signals the dismantling of the last vestiges of the National Energy Program. Many Canadians have waited six years for this government to privatize Petro-Canada. I believe that the legislative actions of the government demonstrate the much-needed requirement for this reform.

It has taken six years to announce Petro-Canada's privatization, years which included Petro-Canada's buy-out of even more of its competition. It has taken six months to table the bill after the announcement and, of course, now only six days allowed for debate on it.

I support the complete privatization of Petro-Canada. It is one of the policies which the Reform Party of Canada has advocated since our inception. I am pleased to see the initial steps at selling the 15 per cent Treasury shares, but I and the market would be happier if and when the government had taken this opportunity to decide on a definite time frame in which remaining government holdings in Petro-Canada would be disposed of.

Unfortunately the fact that the previous government paid far too much for the assets and shares which were rolled into Petro-Canada means it is unlikely that taxpayers will ever get back their full investment in Petro-Canada. However, the fact that one government made a bad decision does not mean that every government should have to be bound by that bad decision. Again I speak to the motion that we are looking at "the general advantage of Canada", and I think nothing could be more simple and more fair than that.

I believe, as Reform Party members do, that business should be involved in business and that government should be involved in government. Government should be involved in regulating and making priorities for the long-term benefit of society. Today, unfortunately, instead we see government doing what it does best, trying to do everything else. Where has that gotten us, Mr. Speaker? Unfortunately we are $350 billion in debt and the public is unhappy with practically everything that the government does.

When we are looking at the whole idea of this motion about what is best for Canada, what would be for our advantage, unfortunately what we have seen is that instead of the government ensuring that Canada's future is economically sound, many in Canada are concerned with maintaining the institutions of the past whether or not they have been contributors to the Canadian economy and society.

For many people it is unclear exactly what the government was trying to accomplish by starting Petro-Canada. Was it to ensure there was long-term exploration and development of Canadian energy resources? Was it to ensure that the industry was more competitive by buying out its competitors? Should it be to promote energy conservation, as some have suggested here today?

The public can rightly be confused. The politicians are confused over this issue as well. However, despite the confusion, the public can very well look at the size of our debt, the levels of interest payments and ask whether there were, and are, more effective ways perhaps to spend taxpayers' dollars to achieve the government's objective than for the government to spend billions of dollars to purchase a place in the oil and gas industry. This despite the fact that the government may find its private sector industry generally profitable and willing to compete without the government being one of the participants.

The taxpaying public may well ask whether there is a cheaper way to regulate an industry than by owning a company, which invariably becomes a political toy, a place to put old supporters as well paid directors and encouraging policy decisions that are politically expedient but perhaps not economically sound.

Finally, before concluding my thoughts on this particular motion on this bill, I would like to deal with two related issues, one of which is the claim first of all that Canadians already own Petro–Canada, and second, that Canadians will be surrendering control of their industry and economy by selling Petro–Canada, or what is generally called reversing Canadianization of the oil and gas industry which is in the national interest.

To deal with the claim that Canadians already own Petro–Canada, first many will point to the price tag which is in the billions of dollars that the government paid. However, if we look at the debt and interest payments it is very obvious that the Canadian government may have bought Petro–Canada, but it has yet to pay for it. As I have already said, there are cheaper ways to have achieved this objective.

Nevertheless, even though it has yet to be paid for, there are still the claims that Canadians do own Petro–Canada. To this, I ask what do Canadians own exactly? If a taxpayer owns shares in a private oil company such as Imperial Oil, that person owns the right to receive dividends, the right to sell his shares, the right to participate in capital growth. They own the residual value of all the assets and they have the right to elect directors in proportion to the value of their holdings.

When we speak of Canadians owning Petro–Canada, we know they do not own the traditional rights which I have just referred to, at least not directly.

Taxpayers have the obligation to pay for the purchase of Petro–Canada but does Parliament even indirectly exercise stewardship in the operations of Petro–Canada? Today with the government increasingly distant and aloof, most Canadians do not feel as though they in fact do own Petro–Canada. The government might, but Canadians doubt that they own it.

Let me turn to the issue of Canadianization. It is perfectly laudable and understandable that Canadians should wish to be masters in their own home and to have control over their resources and their economic destiny. However, many of these Canadianization policies in tandem with the fiscal priorities which governments have had over the past 20 years have actually had the opposite effect.

The most effective means the government has of ensuring that Canadians are masters in their own home is ensuring that the government's policies, fiscal and monetary, as well as political, aid in ensuring the fundamental strength and vitality of the Canadian economy.

Again speaking to the motion, that is what will be of general advantage to all of Canada. Unfortunately, too much attention has been focused on politically short–run decisions which have added to our deficit and debt and which have hindered Canada's long–run capacity to compete and to be economically the masters in our own house.

I point out the increasing reliance that the federal government's own fiscal shortcomings are met by foreign source financing of our domestic deficit mess. Our reliance at the federal level has increased from 10 per cent to 20 per cent in the last six years, during which time the actual debt has doubled, meaning that at the federal level it has recently increased four times in the past six years.

However, this may be alarming since the facts are that this parallels the early growth that has already occurred in foreign source borrowing at the provincial and municipal levels, and in the private sector because the federal government took advantage of domestic borrowing first, so that our other borrowers have had no choice but to borrow from foreign sources, if they were to borrow at all.

Now the effects on the Canadian economy have been a high and unstable dollar, as well as high interest rates, and on historic spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates. It is perfectly naive to suggest that Canada should arbitrarily set its own interest rate and a little bit misleading to suggest that those high interest rates are merely at such high levels to combat inflation with our heavy reliance on foreign-source borrowing.

As I have said, if those who are truly interested in ensuring that Canada's economic well-being is secure, that Canadians are masters in their own house, they should make sure government policy is consistent with achieving these ends.

The large deficit which the government has been running for years now, and increasing foreign borrowing, has been working opposite to the goal of ensuring that Canadians have control over their own economy.

As to the claim that owning Petro-Canada and the Canadianization of the oil industry is in the national interest, to many western Canadians that phrase, "the national interest', has become almost cynically associated with a particular phrase that we hear also and that is, "Trust me". To many Canadians in the less populated regions of the country, or what has become recently called "outer Canada", it has become increasingly questionable about why it is in the national interest to Canadianize the resource industries of outer Canada, but it is apparently not in the national interest to Canadianize some of the industries of the more populated regions of southern Ontario and southern Quebec or what is called "inner Canada".

• (1830)

I would like to conclude my remarks by saying that at this particular time of Christmas and when we are looking forward with good will and hope for a new year, I would recommend that our politicians make a commitment to reforming certainly the Senate, where legislation on Petro-Canada will have to pass through, and our political institution here in this House so that there is more fairness. I would recommend that we let Parliament support the privatization of Petro-Canada and concentrate on ensuring that Canadians have a strong economy which benefits all Canadians, rather than institutions here and in the other place which provide questionable benefits and incur unaffordable costs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 20

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 12 by adding immediately after line 30 at page 9 the following:

"(2) The Minister shall not refuse to promptly disclose all materially relevant financial information within his control, in connection with any transaction authorized by this Act, to and at the written request of the Auditor General of Canada, on such reasonable conditions as to commercial confidentiality as Petro-Canada shall impose in consultation with the Minister."

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (for Mr. Langdon) moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended by adding immediately after line 44 at page 12 the following new clause:

"18.(1) Each time that Petro-Canada sells or otherwise disposes of ten per cent or more of its shares, it shall submit to Parliament a report indicating the proceeds received by

(1) Petro-Canada

(ii) Her Majesty in Right of Canada, and

(iii) the underwriters of the sale or disposal, pursuant to the sale or disposal.

(2) Every report to Parliament made by Petro-Canada under subsection (1) shall be made by being transmitted to the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons for tabling in those Houses.

(3) Every report laid before Parliament under subsection (2) stands referred to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources of the House of Commons."

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, as we have very few minutes left to complete debate on these amendments, I am going to keep my remarks very short because other members, I am sure, will want to speak to this very important amendment.

As I pointed out earlier, it is sometimes difficult to propose an amendment trying to make a bill better when one disagrees with the principle of the bill or fundamentally opposes it. That is what is happening here.

This particular amendment I happen to take quite a bit of pride in. If we think back five or 10 years, we will recall the number of times that the Auditor General has had to go public, raise his voice and even in one period of time he went to court. He actually went to the courts in an effort to obtain information relative, in this particular case, to the Petro-Canada acquisition. The Auditor General is out there providing constructive comment and guidance as to how we show our public accounts. I think we in the House of Commons have to support the Auditor General in that effort.

Recalling the Auditor General's difficulties in getting information about the Petro-Canada acquisition, there were real reasons and real obstacles to his getting that information. They involved the principle of cabinet confidentiality.

I sit in opposition now, but I know that the events that gave rise to the Auditor General's initiative in this were events that occurred during a period of time that my party was in government. Yet I believe when the Auditor General went to court was when the Conservative government was in power. Both governments held to the same principle that you do not release matters that involve cabinet confidentiality. The reason is that we expect our cabinet ministers to be able to deal honestly and frankly with their advisers in cabinet without fear of having their discussions made public. The fear of that would impair the process of governing. I accept that even though I am in opposition. I would love to know what goes on inside the cabinet room, but I accept the principle.

This amendment does not attack the principle of cabinet confidentiality. What it does is provide a ruling in advance. I will just read the relevant portion that the designated minister who would preside over the privatization shall not refuse to disclose promptly all materially relevant financial information within his control in connection with the privatization transactions. That would be at the written request of the Auditor General—and this is very important—on such reasonable conditions as to commercial confidentiality as Petro-Canada shall impose. As well, that permits Petro-Canada to impose conditions relative to commercial confidentiality which is important to it, I am sure. In this way, both the minister and Petro-Canada are obligated to provide that information to the Auditor General.

I believe that process of providing information is important. I think it provides some sunshine on an area of financial transaction that is not provided for in the act. The Auditor General may have a general mandate, but I know that we in this House have to provide the tools that the Auditor General needs to supervise, even if it is ex post facto, the accounting transactions of the government. I hope that members on both sides of the House will subscribe to this amendment.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I checked my very extensive briefing notes, and rise to make a few comments on the amendments proposed, one by the Official Opposition and one by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. I appreciate the opportunity to allow us to bring that motion forward on the hon. member's behalf.

I have some very extensive notes here and it is a very interesting question. This particular amendment is part of the reasonable package of amendments being proposed to this legislation. We know that if the government is reasonable it will likely support, or we hope it will support, this one.

This amendment simply requires the minister responsible to disclose to the Auditor General information when it is needed or requested by the Auditor General, and as it says in the amendment that reasonable conditions are attached as to the confidentiality of that information.

It is interesting that both the Liberals and the Conservatives in the past, from what I understand of the history of PetroCan and Petrofina, failed to live up to this amendment that they are now proposing. It is interesting to see the little twist perhaps of turning a little bit of Liberal history upside down given their failure to respond in the past.

The second amendment being debated, Motion No. 32A, goes back to previous and similar motions that we moved earlier during debate on the bill, which unfortunately, both the Liberals and the Conservatives voted against. It was a very simple motion at that time that would require an annual report to Parliament to talk about what happened with PetroCan, where it is going, the proceeds, and what have you. It is unfortunate that the Liberals again supported the Conservatives on this proposal. We hope they will support our proposal this time.

• (1840)

The proposal here is a very interesting and unique one, I think, and certainly bears some consideration from the House. I will read it into the record:

> 18.(1) Each time that Petro–Canada sells or otherwise disposes of ten per cent or more of its shares, it shall submit to Parliament a report indicating the proceeds received by
> (i) Petro–Canada,
> (ii) Her Majesty in Right of Canada, and
> (iii) the underwriters of the sale or disposal, pursuant to the sale or disposal.

I think that is very reasonable. It goes on, as you know Mr. Speaker, to report through you to the Speaker of the Senate and to yourself, the Speaker of the House of Commons, and also to refer each report that does come to Parliament to the energy, mines and resources standing committee of the House to review.

Again it gives this Parliament a chance to see exactly what has happened as a result of Bill C–84 and gives yet another challenge that I think the government, certainly this afternoon, has failed to take up, and that is to show exactly what it has done with Petro–Canada, to prove that it is right or we are wrong. This is their chance, and they are passing that chance up. For that we will all be worse off because we will not really know exactly what has happened with these proceeds.

Let us hope it will be the usual news release that we get. At best I suppose that might happen. We have had some experience with this in British Columbia when the then Premier Bill Bennett brought in something called the British Columbia Resources Investment Corporation. Whatever it is called now, and whoever owns it now is sometimes hard to keep track of.

I think that given the debate, given what members in this House have had to say, and given some of the assurances, whatever they may be, from the government members of "Oh, don't worry; everything is going to be fine. Petro–Canada is not going to be bought up by anybody. Everything is going to go along fine", let us give the government a chance to tell this House exactly what the point is. Let us see if it is true to its word and prove its point on that.

I think in that sense it is an excellent amendment worth voting on tonight. As you know we will be moving on to more debate tomorrow, third reading I think it is, on Petro–Canada. Again it is giving us and the people of Canada through this House a chance to see exactly what this government is doing with one of the institutions of Canada. It is only something we hope to expect from this government. Certainly when the New Democrats form the next Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, you can be assured we will account to Parliament and to Canadians when we run their Crown corporations for them.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me a couple of minutes before we vote on these amendments.

We will have covered all the amendments that were brought forward by the opposition party.

First of all let me comment for a moment on the disclosure of information motion. Securities legislation across this country requires a company to issue a prospectus whenever it issues shares to the public. The regulations governing the contents of a prospectus require it to disclose the proceeds and the cost of the issue. It must all be there before it is permitted to go forward.

Funds received by the sale of Petro–Canada, the shares, will be reported in the public accounts which are tabled in Parliament. As we know, we have a debt of $4.3 billion on our books that has to be written off.

Of course the minister will continue to disclose to the Auditor General information that he is required by law to disclose in connection with the Public Accounts of Canada. Those are all covered. So this amendment No. 20 is not necessary.

As far as amendment No. 32 is concerned, the information to be tabled in this proposed report that they are talking about is available from other sources that are required under other existing laws, so inclusion of this provision is redundant and unnecessary.

Security legislation requires a company to issue a prospectus whenever it issues shares to the public. That is well known. When privatization takes place, Petro-Canada will become a widely-held public company subject to all the requirements of a public company. We, of course, will report where the income goes from Petro-Canada as these shares are sold off. Both these motions are totally unnecessary and we will be voting against them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6.45 p.m., pursuant to order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) on Tuesday, December 11, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 20 standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The next question is on Motion No. 32A standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex-Windsor. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion is deferred.

The House will now proceed to the recorded divisions deferred at report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

• (1900)

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The first question is on Motion No. 2A. The result of this vote will apply to Motions Nos. 6A, 12A, 15, 19, 20, 23, and 32A, according to an order made earlier today.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

• (1910 )

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I walked in halfway through your reading of the amendment. Had I been here on time I would have voted with my party.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Flis: I hear a lot of booing, but we do have on our TV monitors whether it is a 30-minute vote or a 15-minute vote. The 15-minute mark should have been on our screens.

However, I am here in time for the other amendments, so I hope that you will count me as voting with my party on the other amendments.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of saving time, I would like to say that my no vote applies to all motions except Motion No. 20. I would vote yea for Motion No. 20.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 6A standing in the name of Mr. Langdon.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

(Division No. 373)

SMALL BUSINESSES

TABLING OF SECOND REPORT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table the second report to Parliament on the state of small business in Canada.

This document provides a reference source on the latest statistics on small business. It provides profiles of outstanding growth oriented firms, discussion of the factors which contributed to their success, and an indication of the wide range of government programs and services which support small business growth.

[Translation]

The title of this document, "Small Business in Canada—Competing Through Growth", reflects our economic situation and indicates how small businesses can respond to new economic challenges. The document shows what is being done by businesses that have satisfactorily adjusted to a new situation. It also contains a list of the many federal services and programs that can help small businesses while they make these adjustments.

PETITIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling today the first of tens of thousands of petitions from the people of Windsor and Essex county who are calling upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to preserve local CBC television broadcasting in Windsor and in other areas deprived of such service by federal government cutbacks and by the decisions of CBC management.

I want to inform the House that we already have over 45,000 names on these petitions, calling for the restoration of local TV broadcasting by the CBC in Windsor.

These petitions will be presented by all the members from Essex county, and I sincerely hope that before too long we will get a favourable response from the government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of people from Hamilton, Thunder Bay, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Calgary, West Germany, Montreal, Cayman Islands, London, Ontario, Saskatoon, and Sioux Lookout.

• (1110 )

An hon. member: It is out of order.

Mr. Riis: Anyway, there are lots of names on this petition. It just shows the interest of people in VIA Rail.

They are joining their Canadian friends where perhaps they have lived at one time or another. They are all pointing out their concerns with the government decision to cut back on VIA Rail service. As we speak new lines are being curtailed in Gaspe, the Smiths Falls area, and other places in Canada.

They are asking the government to reconsider this particular step, pointing out also that passenger rail service is the most environmentally friendly way to move large numbers of people.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, although the next petition is in a sense after the fact, these petitioners were not aware of it when they signed the petition. I suppose the case can still be made that they oppose the goods and services tax.

In spite of the fact that the government has now introduced the tax or is about to on January 1, they still point out a whole set of concerns as to why they oppose the tax. They are asking the government to recognize what this is going to do to the economy of Canada.

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that the whole House is aware or that at least Mr. Speaker is very much aware of the fact that under our Standing Orders petitions must only be signed by residents of Canada.

The difficulty is that I am sure that most members of the House, including myself of course, approve of the signature of everyone trying to oppose cutbacks in VIA Rail.

I wonder how it is that the certificate was issued by the clerk's office or by representatives of the clerk's office as to the possible tabling of a petition that was signed by non-residents. I did notice that the petition was properly certified. I saw the certificate attached to the petition. Nevertheless one has to ask the question how it is that it was certified, given that it does not meet the rules of the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken note of the hon. member's comments, and if necessary, it will check the allegations and report back to the House.

[English]

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table several hundred more names of residents of my particular riding. They are all residents of Canada and citizens of Canada.

They are requesting this government to make a minimum 3.2 per cent oxygen content in gasoline fuel mandatory and to ban methylcyclopentadlenyl manganese tricarbonyl from use in Canada in the gasoline as an octane enhancer.

Ethanol can be produced from corn, wheat, and barley and is a renewable resource. Plants remove carbon dioxides from the atmosphere. There is a very positive energy balance in the fact that up to four times as much energy can be taken from the crop in the way of ethanol than what is used in the manufacture of the product.

Ethanol blended gasoline represents a renewable and secure source of fuel energy and reduces our dependence on declining reserves of fossil fuels.

CANADIAN TRAVEL VISAS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition under Standing Order 36.

Many Canadians have family members in many countries where they are now being denied Canadian travel visas for good faith family visits.

These petitioners call upon the government to introduce measures immediately which will facilitate travel visa issuance to relatives living abroad who, together with their Canadian hosts, wish to arrange good faith family visits to Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I too have a set of signatures on petitions from Windsor and Essex county. Let me assure you that every signature on these petitions is not only Canadian but desperately Canadian in circumstances in which the people very deeply feel that they are being alienated from the rest of Canada by the decisions being taken by government and by the CBC.

The petitioners state that the Canadian Broadcasting television station in Windsor is the only one located in the Windsor–Essex area, an area dominated by U.S. television. The lack of a local newscast deprives Windsor of a view of itself as a part of Canada.

It relies on national and regional broadcasting emanating from Toronto. Even if they carry some Windsor area items from time to time from a Windsor bureau, it not only distorts the character of our region, but of Canada generally.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to preserve local CBC television broadcasting in Windsor and in all other areas deprived of such service by federal government cutbacks and by the decisions of CBC management.

There are 2,500 signatures on this petition. There are 45,000 more already in the process of certification. This indicates the depth and the dimensions of the feelings of the people of Windsor that they not be denied their participation in Canada—

An hon. member: Louder, louder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! According to the Standing Orders, petitions must be presented in concise form, while the reasons must be very brief. I thank the hon. member for his co–operation.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I too rise with petitions with regard to the CBC and the definite negative effect the closing of the Windsor station will have on Essex county and Windsor.

I have 1,200 petitions but as the previous speaker mentioned, there are tens of thousands of people very concerned about the loss of local broadcasting in our area.

They are also concerned about the loss of Canadianism in our area. Through the petition they humbly ask this Parliament to do everything it can in order to restore this local broadcasting, this local system, to the Windsor–Essex county area.

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition today from petitioners who live in Scarborough, Oshawa, Ajax, Markham and Richmond Hill. These petitioners were motivated to sign this petition because they are concerned about the packaging of foods. The content of food is not being disclosed. The protection of the health of the citizens of Canada is affected.

The petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in the pre–packaged foods.

As well, they are calling on the restaurateurs and food retailers to provide to the customers a list of all the food ingredients and additives to prepared foods.

I might add, since these petitions have been put forth, that a number of restaurateurs across Canada are displaying their entire food additives in their restaurant menus. I am very pleased about that.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 399 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

DFO—THINK TANK SESSION

Question No. 399—Mr. Gardiner:

Did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans hold a "think tank" session on November 1 and 2, 1990 and, if so (a) what was the name and organization of (i) each person invited (ii) each person who participated (b) what was the cost of (i) travel (ii) accommodation (iii) other expenses (c) which federal officials attended the meetings and what were their departmental affiliations (d) what was the established criteria upon which the invitations were extended?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today, a long-awaited pleasure I might say, to lead off the third reading debate of Bill C-84 which will authorize the sale of Petro-Canada shares to the public. Allow me first, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to take this opportunity to thank members from all sides of the House who have taken part in the various stages of debate on this bill. In particular, let me thank the members from both sides of the House who were part of the legislative committee on Bill C-84 who I believe carefully and thoughtfully studied the various clauses of the bill.

I appeared twice before the committee and many witnesses appeared and gave testimony. The evidence is overwhelming that the government is on the right track and is doing the right thing in privatizing Petro-Canada.

Opponents of this bill have expressed concerns about Canada's energy security in the context of Bill C-84. These concerns are quite natural and understandable given the recent volatility of world energy markets. I believe that we have been able to demonstrate that Canada's energy security does not depend on continued government ownership of Petro-Canada. The security of supply can be reached in many other ways. The government has the ability to do that. Through all stages of debate on this legislation, the government has been able to give Canadians the assurance that Canadian energy security is not at risk as a result of public participation in the ownership of Petro-Canada.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in addressing the legislative committee, outlined the government's energy policy in words that bear repeating. He said, and I quote:

> —current policy emphasizes primary reliance upon the operation of competitive markets for decisions regarding energy supply, demand, pricing and trade. The government considers that competitive prices provide the most appropriate and effective signals to both investors and consumers. We know, from the experience of the early 1980s, that such a market-oriented approach is far better, both in economic terms and in terms of federal-provincial relations, than policies which emphasize heavy reliance upon regulation and government intervention.

The privatization of Petro-Canada is perfectly consistent with the government's energy policy as stated by the Minister of Energy. I might say that I just returned from the west after pre-budget consultations with a number of interested groups and organizations, two of which were involved dramatically in the energy business. They all have said that the energy industry over the last four years has done a tremendous amount of work in streamlining its operations, getting themselves in shape without the vagaries, if I can use that terminology, of subsidies and offering them this here and that there. They have told me that their capital expenditures for next year are going to increase rather dramatically in exploration and capital costs. That is very good news not only for the west, I might say, although the west would benefit from it the most, but also from ridings such as mine, where I have 52 companies that I have identified within the riding of Brampton that supply the oil patch with needed goods and services. When the energy industry is doing well, all of Canada benefits. I can assure you of that.

A privatized Petro-Canada, strengthened by a new equity infusion, will be able to contribute to Canada's long-term energy security by continuing its ongoing exploration and development activities, thereby increasing the strength of the Canadian oil and gas industry. That is what Bill C-84 is all about; strengthening Petro-Canada so it can get on with the job of doing what it does best and that is exploring for and developing Canada's energy reserves and contributing in a positive way to Canada's future energy security.

Mr. Speaker, I want to quickly reiterate for all members of the House the two main reasons why the government is moving forward with this initiative. First, government ownership of Petro-Canada is no longer required to fill a public policy role.

Second, the company needs an infusion of capital in order to allow it to participate in the exploration and development of Canada's oil and gas reserves. For this reason, the initial public offering will be comprised of treasury shares enabling the company to raise much needed equity.

As I have said on numerous occasions, the privatization of Petro-Canada will be good for the company and good for Canadians. We recognize the important role that Petro-Canada has played in Canadian oil and gas development and the special relationship that the company enjoys with Canadians across this country.

The bill in no way diminishes these two important roles. Neither does it diminish the government's ability to carry out its energy policy, to ensure energy security and to promote environmentally sound practices within the Canadian oil and gas industry.

I must say that the Canadian oil and gas industry has been very understanding and very co-operative and has worked extremely hard in the field of environment and, as a matter of fact, has been recognized by environmental groups for the work that it has done. This, in no way, is going to change that in the importance of environment to all 2,500 to 3,000 energy companies we have in this country. The rules, the regulations, the goals and the aspirations all remain the same and privatizing Petro-Canada is not going to have a negative effect on the environment whatsoever.

As a matter of fact, by privatizing Petro-Canada, by allowing the company to raise equity from individual Canadians rather than relying on taxpayers, we are providing the company with the means to become an even stronger presence in the Canadian oil and gas industry, and we are strengthening the Canadian identity of the company by inviting individuals to buy shares.

I hear the opposition saying that we own it now. Well, I submit that the taxpayers have had all the liabilities and none of the benefits from the company. It is on our books now for $4.3 billion. Therefore, who really does own it? The government lays claim to it but there is a tremendous debt attached to that.

The legislation opens new opportunities for Petro-Canada. With the ability to raise new equity it can get on with that job that it does best, exploring and developing our gas reserves. I think most important, as we saw in the Air Canada privatization, a wide distribution of shares and restriction on their ownership will give Canadians a real and direct interest in the future of the company. These ownership restrictions will also ensure that control of Petro-Canada will remain firmly in Canadian hands.

I have sat through the debate. I listened intently to the opposition claims. There are ideological differences between the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party on this particular issue. The polls I have seen indicate that the majority of Canadians are in favour of privatization of Petro-Canada as long as it is kept in Canadian hands.

I see my hon. friend from Toronto over there shaking his head, indicating no. If he is privy to information that I do not have I would be very happy to see it, but the record shows that security of supply and owning a state oil company does not go hand in hand unless the state oil company owns exclusively all the oil in the country. As a matter of fact, Petro-Canada accounts for only 6 per cent of the upstream activity. The other 3,000 energy companies account for the rest.

So, it is very important to understand that Petro-Canada, although playing a very important role, primarily in marketing because it has 19 per cent of the market in the downstream activities is one of many players in the energy industry. It is time that it it set free so that it can expand without having to come cap in hand to government for funding. Now it can go to the private sector for funding. It can raise it through the normal means of financing these companies similar to its competitors and at the same time remain in Canadian hands.

There are numerous changes being made in this country. If you listen to the opposition day after day after day, they do not want anything changed. They want it all to remain the same. They do not want us to economize. There is not one area of the economy where we have had to economize because of a fiscal situation, and we have had to make cutbacks in many, many areas there is not one area where they have agreed that we should cut back. Not one. Neither the Liberals nor the New Democratic Party. They want it exactly the way it was.

Well, the world is moving very quickly. We have seen changes that no one could have predicted two, three or four years ago. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this government has kept up with those changes and is leading Canada into the 21st Century as a progressive country, not one that is constantly playing catch-up, but one that would be right up there leading in the economies of the world. That is what this is all about. That is what change is all about. We can no longer sit back and ignore these changes that are taking place in the world, as much as the opposition would like to. At least that is what I am hearing from them. Do not cut VIA Rail. It does not matter that people do not ride it, do not cut it. Do not cut the CBC, just give them more money. We give them $1,034,000 now, give them another $110 million. That is their solution to all the problems of the country, to give more, more, more. It does not matter what issue it is. If we are talking about structural changes within our economy, they oppose that. They want to go back to the old ways.

Well, in 1984 the Canadian people made it extremely clear that they did not want to go back to the old ways. They were not happy with the old ways. Change was coming and they needed a group of men and women who could bring that change forward and that is what this government is doing. Some of them are difficult decisions. Some of them cost us dearly in the popularity polls we see published monthly. Tough decisions have to be made and this government and the Prime Minister who leads this government is prepared to make those tough decisions and stick with them because we know in the long-run that they are going to be for the good of the country.

I can even say that former Liberal Cabinet Ministers understand that times change and we have to look at things differently today than we did 15, 16 or 17 years ago when the NDP forced the Liberal government into creating a Crown corporation known as Petro-Canada.

As recently as six weeks ago, the hon. Marc Lalonde, the former minister of energy, a former finance minister and, I guess, a former everything in the former government led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, was interviewed on the Gzowski show as part of a panel. He was there with Rosemary Brown from the New Democratic Party and, I believe Dalton Camp was representing the Progressive Conservative Party. It was a regular round-table that they had discussing what was going on in politics.

One day the subject was the privatization of Petro-Canada. I know my colleague, the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources will refer to this later in the debate today. What he said at that time was: "No, I am not opposed to the privatization of Petro-Canada". His opinion was that Petro-Canada has served its purpose and now it is time to get on with the change that is taking place, that it is not a window on the industry any more. We have organizations within governments now that have the ability to collect all the information necessary to know what is going on in the energy industry.

Rosemary asked him if Petro-Canada was not there to control energy prices. Marc Lalonde said that it was was never envisaged to control prices in this country. That was never one of its mandates. One would think from listening to the New Democratic Party that that was the reason Petro-Canada was there, to control prices. They stand up and say: "Why does Petro-Canada not lower oil prices or gas prices at the pump?" They do not care if it loses money, but say: "We'll prop them up with subsidization from government." That is not the way it should work.

The socialist ideas around the world are being thrown out. Privatization is taking place in every country of the world by governments of every political stripe, including the communists, the socialists, the liberals, and the conservatives.

It is not an ideological thing. It is a common sense thing. The New Democratic Party says: "It's ideological, it's a Conservative bent." It is Conservative philosophy because it works, but it is being adopted by communist countries and by members of Socialist International, to which the New Democratic Party belongs.

One of the interesting things is that a number of these countries are coming to my department for advice on privatization and how they would enact privatization in their countries. We have had them from Australia, New Zealand, and Venezuela. Members of my staff on the privatization side of my department have been in Poland and Czechoslovakia providing advice on privatization. It is happening around the world.

Mexico has privatized something like 260 companies since President Salinas has taken over. He knows it is right. He knows that is the way to go, that governments can no longer pour billions and billions of dollars into these Crown corporations to keep them afloat, and that it is totally irresponsible to the taxpayers of the country.

Privatization is a fact of life. Crown corporations, yes. There are certain Crown corporations we need. I have never denied that. There are certain services of government that must be provided by government. I have never denied that. There are services that the private sector cannot or will not provide that must be provided. Governments have to provide them. That is why many of these Crown corporations came into being, but they have outlived their usefulness.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Name one.

Mr. McDermid: I will give you a prime example. Air Canada was formed as a Crown corporation to provide air transportation for regions of the country that no other company would do. Today, there are other airline companies in the country that are providing that service. A competitive service is there now which was not there when the Crown corporation was formed. That is a prime example of a Crown corporation that was formed to provide a specific purpose. We have outlived that now and it is time for them to fly on their own. They are and they are doing very well, thank you very much. They are happy about it. The employees are happy about it. The corporation is happy about it. The country is still being served and served well. That is a prime example, Mr. Speaker, of what I am talking about.

But I want to get back to Mr. Lalonde. This disturbs the Liberals, I understand that. I understand why the Liberals do not like this because it really hurts them. They want to go back to the old ways. They want to go back to pouring billions of dollars into Crown corporations and propping them up. That is what they want to do.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: They want to control everything. It is the old marionette stuff. That is what the Liberals like to do. They do not believe in the private sector. Oh, they say they do, sure. They say they believe in it, but they know that the public service can do it better. They know that. They say that all the time.

One thing I have to say about the New Democratic Party is that we know where they stand. We do not see too many of them, but we know where they stand. With Grits, we never know. We do not know where they stand. They are against everything, but they do not tell us what they are for. They are against everything over there, except keeping Crown corporations no matter what their state in life is. Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that Mr. Lalonde, in his interview, made it very clear that the time has come for Petro-Canada to be privatized, that it no longer serves a public policy purpose, and that he cannot envisage one for it in the future. Times have changed. He has turned his thinking around. It is unfortunate he is still not on the benches over there, because maybe he could convince his colleagues that the time has come for the privatization of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: Come on, John.

Mr. McDermid: I hear my friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, saying: "Come on, John." We are going to hear a speech today like we have never heard on Petro-Canada. The hon. member will be ranting and raving that we are destroying some great Canadian institution and the crocodile tears will be coming down.

The reason NDP members are upset about it is because they were the ones who blackmailed the Liberals into creating it, back in the early seventies, when our deficits started to take off in the country, irresponsibly. The former Minister of Finance, now the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, was the guy who had to do it. He had to say: "Well, we are going to stay in power, so we are going to give them this and we are going to start running up our deficit." That is how it all started. I want people to remember that.

The time has come for Petro-Canada to be privatized. We have had a good debate on this. We have had to bring in time allocation—

An hon. member: A muzzle.

Mr. McDermid: My friend over there does not sound as if he is muzzled, to me. I have been hearing him yell all day. I do not think he is muzzled at all.

We have had to bring in time allocation on this bill because we tried to get a set amount of time to debate this bill and the opposition was not prepared to co-operate and that is fair ball. I understand that. When we were in opposition, we gave the government a hard time too.

The rules of the House provide that we can bring in time allocation and that is exactly what we did. We have given it a fair debate and we had good hearings in committee. When the committee asked me to appear, I appeared both times I was asked. It cannot be said that we were not forthcoming in committee, we were. We provided the committee with all kinds of information and briefings, well before we debated the bill, as well as any briefings required during the debate on the bill. The committee was well informed about the whole transaction. Mr. Speaker, I must say that we have had a good debate on it.

Petro-Canada's time has come for privatization and I encourage the House to move expeditiously through this stage of debate. We will be voting on it this evening and I look forward to that vote because I believe that the government is doing the right thing in privatizing Petro-Canada. Its time has come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today as the lead-off speaker on behalf of the Official Opposition at third reading stage of the Petro-Canada privatization bill.

It is with a little sadness, on this side of the House, that we embark on this task. It is our last chance to change our minds and to save what was and what could be in the future a valuable Canadian institution which has languished over the last few years as a result of the absence of government leadership.

There are two things that strike me about the way we have begun this privatization. The first is the haste with which the government has addressed this. If we recall, the matter was first placed before the House of Commons on October 1. That was about two and a half months ago. There have been a lot of other bills around the House which have been here a lot longer than two and a half months.

I have only been here since 1988. I could be wrong, but I cannot recall another bill that did not have unanimous approval zipping through this House as quickly as this one has. I think that is unfortunate because, aside from the simple procedure of selling off, we also have a recognition of the issues surrounding the thrust, reasons and policies of privatization. It is long past time when Canadians must begin to address the issue of privatization.

This government has embarked upon a long series of privatizations. I would concede that one privatization by itself would not make a trend or would not make or break the future of this country, and we could live with that. In fact, I would have to concede, as I am sure most members of the House would, that there is the odd enterprise which can be privatized and not materially impair the many other policy goals that the government has and should have. For the record, and so we will know the extent of privatization, I will mention a few by name.

We have had de Havilland, Canadair, Nordion, Route Canada, CN Hotels, Canadian Arsenals Limited, Northern Canada Power Commission and Northern Transportation Company. The sale prices for these are all in the many millions of dollars. I say that only to indicate that there is a large volume of money involved here. It is not simply a sale of a few excess Crown assets such as paper clips and the like. There was Northwest Tel Inc., which is a CN subsidiary; Pêcheries Canada Inc., Teleglobe for half a billion dollars; Terra Nova Telecommunications, another CN subsidiary; Canada Development Corporation, Fishery Products International, Nanisivik Mines Limited and Theratronics International Ltd.

There are other smaller interests which I will not mention, interests that the government acquired by taking as security for loans and financings. The list is a very, very long list and what it should serve to show all of us is that we have not got a simple one-time privatization, but what we have is a long string of dismantling of enterprises which for the most part—not in every case—were put in place to serve Canadians, not just Canadians in Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto but Canadians all over the country.

The way in which this government is proceeding with these privatizations, I fear that we are taking a lot of sand out of the sandbox. When you take sand out of the sandbox and get down to a certain point, the kiddies will not want to play any more. They do not regard it as a sandbox. It is just a box. If the government proceeds on this ideologically-driven—and I maintain it is ideologically driven—course of privatization, it will succeed in selling out, but we will have left for all of us a geographic shell without Canadian presence. That drive to divest Canada of these institutions and corporate enterprises, to me, manifests a bankruptcy in the pursuit of policy.

• (1150)

The government sees that there is no Canadian goal that must be accomplished and therefore sells off the vehicle.

I am a temporary resident of Ottawa in my responsibilities as a member of Parliament and I represent a riding in Scarborough. Canadians living in major cities such as Vancouver, Montreal and Halifax, are surrounded in our urban environment by many, many institutions. You cannot leave your house without tripping over them; sidewalks, sewers and stop signs. But these cities only represent a part of Canada.

There are the people who do not live in the urban areas like Ottawa, who are not surrounded by all of these national institutions like Parliament, like the grandiose city halls. They are working people who do not get a chance to see, participate in, or pursue goals that are related to these Canadian institutions. That is one area where this government has missed the boat. It has forgotten that it must provide to Canadians in every region, not just to the concentrated pocket of voters in urban areas, leadership in institutions, a presence, a reason for feeling for being Canadian.

The Minister has just told the House that Petro-Canada did not serve any public purpose. Well, we all know that is true. The only reason, however, that Petro-Canada did not serve a public policy purpose was because the government took it away in the first place in 1984. It removed it. It publicly required Petro-Canada to pursue profit-oriented enterprise with no public policy mandate, and that is not the reason why Petro-Canada was created in the first place.

It is very easy for the government to say that Petro-Canada does not fulfil a public policy purpose. It could not possibly do so because the government sucked that out of Petro-Canada in 1984.

I have also noticed how the government has changed the semantics of privatization as it pursues its goal of privatization. When the thrust of privatizing began 10 or 20 years ago it was called selling off or divestiture, then it became privatization. But that term has not sanitized it enough, so now we have the euphemistic titles of this and other bills where the process is called public participation.

What would constitute public participation in an enterprise more than a Crown corporation? How could you get any more public than that? Have we gone full circle? Public participation, the way it is discussed in relation to the government's privatization initiatives, means selling shares on the market. That is not the only perspective on public participation that we have in this country, so why the drive to sanitize? Why does the government have to change what it calls it? Well, I submit it is because there are some ugly truths that lie behind divestiture, sell-offs, sell-out, privatization.

We like to call it participation. It is not going to fool anybody. It is not hard to sell off. This is the easiest initiative this government has ever had to undertake. It is really easy for a liquidator to come in and sell off the corporate asset—any asset.

All you do is take it and hold it out in the marketplace for the best price you can get. In fact, you do not even care what price you get because you as a liquidator get a commission. That is what every broker or underwriter obtains when that group participates in a divestiture, a sell-off. I do not knock that. They are doing their work. But boy, is that easy. It is a dead end policy if all we are going to do is sell, sell, sell. Where does it end? I suppose in the end there is nothing left.

Will there be a post office? Why not sell it?

An hon. member: Good idea.

Mr. Lee: My friend opposite says good idea. I am afraid we differ once again. I think a lot of Canadians will differ with the hon. member. However, there is lots of time to discuss, as long as the government does not try to ram it down our throats in another two and a half months.

What will happen to the CBC? Who knows. We will wait for the new agenda. Unfortunately for the government, that Ronald Reagan–Margaret Thatcher neo–Conservative agenda that was there, led by an eminent politician from the United Kingdom who is no longer with us as Prime Minister, is disappearing. I feel that the government has lost its true leader in this. As it embarks on other potential privatizations, it is going to find itself not knowing where it is going. That is when Canadians will take notice.

Everyone in this House knows that the opposition stands in fundamental disagreement with the privatization of Petro–Canada. For that reason, it has been a little tough at committee and in the House being constructive about a sell–off because once it is sold, it is gone. It is not there any more. That makes it tough.

It is also tough to show that you are opposed and then be required to put forward a constructive amendment to make the sell–off better. I do not know if you can make a sell–off better, but a number of members at committee tried to do that. We addressed several issues. I am going to repeat them here so that the record will show the areas of sensitivity that we have to address in the House of Commons and in committee in this particular privatization. Some of these themes pertain to other privatizations as well but these are the Petro–Canada ones.

One of them had to do with the Canadianization policy. That was one of the driving forces that gave rise to Petro–Canada's birth, Canadianization. We in the early days of Petro–Canada were very fearful as Canadians that our petrochemical capability and the energy capability related to that were being managed by non–resident corporations, the seven sisters. We were quite concerned. I remember the time very well. For whatever reason now perhaps we are not so concerned. I do not know why. I am still concerned. In any event, Canadianization was one of the driving reasons. Canadianization is still a policy of this government. The energy minister stated very clearly, very honestly at committee that it was.

If we look at the foreign ownership provision contained in this bill, and there is one, it says that non–Canadians can own up to 25 per cent. It does not say they will own 25 per cent. It says that they can own up to 25 per cent. It is simply logical for me to submit to the House that the Canadianization policy thrust of this government has now just been reduced with reference to Petro–Canada by 25 per cent, potentially. Let us take off a mark in this government's pursuit of its Canadianization policy. It has one strike against it there.

There is a relationship between that provision and the free trade agreement. When this government negotiated the free trade agreement it secured a concession that permitted this government to sell a Canadian enterprise or Crown corporation and to maintain the Canadian ownership. It went to the length of securing that in its negotiation of the free trade agreement. The provision says that once we do privatize—and I am paraphrasing—whatever level of foreign ownership is put in place at that time is the lowest threshold that we can ever impose.

Therefore, hypothetically, if there is a change of heart in relation to this legislation a year or two or three from now, under the free trade agreement, if we stay true to the agreement and if it is fully implemented, we will never be able to require Canadian ownership of greater than 75 per cent. Once we cross this bridge it is finished. We cannot go back. I wanted to bring that to the attention of the House.

We also dealt with the prospect of a piece of Petro–Canada, which under the current provisions could not be greater than 10 per cent, being purchased by a foreign state. I thought it would have been fairly obvious to members in the House and in committee that we would not want a foreign state to own a piece of what was our national oil company. I guess it was too complex to deal with that because the amendments proposed to preclude a foreign state or agency from owning a piece of Petro–Canada were not passed.

We can only hope that we will not as a Parliament have to deal with an issue in the future—and it will be a public issue; it will be a headline in the newspaper—where a foreign government or agency of that government or a state oil company of another government purchases a piece of Petro–Canada because it thinks it has a good marketing opportunity or a good outlet for its oil. I am talking about one of the mid-east oil companies, Venezuela, or our friends in Mexico. Maybe Canadians will not mind. I just feel we should have addressed that in this bill, and we did not.

Dealing with the area of strategic assets, when Petro-Canada is gone we will have sold a vehicle, a tool or a piece of machinery that should have permitted us to address petrochemical energy supply problems in this country. Petro-Canada is a company that has facilities from the east coast to the west coast.

I believe that the legislation should have permitted us to prevent Petro-Canada from selling or disposing of an asset that our government believed was strategic in purpose and objective, at least for as long as the government held shares in Petro-Canada. This would include the disposition, sale, liquidation, bankruptcy, dismantling of means of distribution of petrochemical supply or a refinery or a pipeline, any asset.

I agree that would be a burden on the shareholders of Petro-Canada, but it must be remembered, and the people who buy these shares have to remember where Petro-Canada came from. In that period of transition, from the sale of the first share to the sale of the last share, they know that we in government and they with their private investment have one foot on the dock and one foot on the boat. They know that now, because we are not selling Petro-Canada all at once. We are doing it in segments and tranches over a period that might run up to ten years. We do not know.

In any event, our ability to address the need for retaining strategic assets is not in the bill.

I agree we have had a healthy discussion on official languages. I agree with the minister. In my view and in the view of most of my colleagues, the provisions in the bill dealing with our official languages, French and English, within the Petro-Canada enterprise are not adequately dealt with. The bill provides that Petro-Canada would be the arbiter of how it will dispense its goods and services in both languages. It will decide.

That criteria, that mechanism that is contained in the articles of incorporation and I am a little confused as to how an individual in Canada who is not a shareholder of Petro-Canada, just a consumer, the guy with the chain saw that I referred to earlier, can deal with the issue of official languages in Petro-Canada.

It is no good to say that this is a private corporation, let them do whatever they want. The government has already seen the need to address official languages in the act. It is in the act. I say if you are going to address it, do it right. Do it comprehensively. The recommendations of the Official Languages Commissioner, Mr. Fortier, were rejected.

There was some discussion of another provision dealing with accounting and the Auditor General and it had reasonable debate in committee and in the House. But I am of the view, given the difficulties the Auditor General has had and obstacles he has encountered in obtaining the true financial information regarding the acquisition of Petro-Canada, those obstacles will still be there when he, as part of his responsibilities, pursues, investigates or monitors this particular series of sale transactions. Do not even suggest to me that he will not want to do so. This is the largest privatization, divestiture in Canadian history. Our Auditor General is going to be right there watching it.

The Minister of State for Privatization has told the House that the Auditor General and all of us will have access to the prospectus filed with the various securities commissions around the country. That is true, but the Auditor General is not concerned with the prospectus. The Auditor General will be curious about the movement of the money from the underwriters through to the government and what happens to it after that. I am very sure that if cabinet discussions involving the accounting for those moneys takes place, our Auditor General will not have access because of cabinet confidentiality rules. That is not true. I am speculating, but I have seen problems that the Auditor General has had before. I have no reason to believe that it will be different in the future.

I am not suggesting the government will intentionally try to cover up anything. I am simply saying that our Auditor General needs access, and there were amendments proposed to provide that access subject to commercial confidentiality necessary to protect Petro-Canada.

As the words of the song go, "You don't know what you've got till it's gone". As sure as I am standing here, this issue will come back to haunt us later, after it has gone. This is, practically speaking, an irreversible step.

I noted just a few days ago an article in The Globe and Mail dealing with the shutdown of the pipeline from southern Ontario to Montreal. It said that there was a plan to shut down this pipeline which carries, I understand, conventional light crude in 1991. That is about two weeks away. I suggest that is a very significant matter because, as the headline says, Quebec would depend totally on imported oil after the closing of that pipeline. Petro-Canada does not have anything to do with this particular pipeline. I am not suggesting it does.

However, we have a decision being made in relation to a pipeline which may mean after its shutdown Montreal would be cut off from Canadian sourced crude. The government has yet to express an opinion on it, but I believe that means of delivery of crude is important to Montreal just as Petro-Canada's role in delivering energy supplies in various parts of the country is important to Canadians.

Once it is gone it is gone. Once Petro-Canada decides it wants out of the refining business in a particular location, once the refinery is gone, it goes into the hands of individuals who may shut it down, mothball it, or use it for something else that may not be consistent with our national interest as seen by the National Energy Board.

The government says it has mechanisms in place to deal with energy issues of national importance. I am waiting to see what this institution, or series of institutions such as the National Petroleum Monitoring Agency can do if they can do anything. Are they toothless wonders? I shudder to think that they are simply sham institutions set up to show Canadians that we have this pretence of action. I do not know, but I am skeptical.

The issue of the financing of Petro-Canada came up. Were there any alternatives to going to the private sector? We all know that there were, but Petro-Canada executives were of the view expressed publicly that the private sector, the marketplace for common share security, was where they felt they had to go now and in the future.

They are not the only sources of capital. For equity capital, yes, we have to sell the shares, but we have other institutions in this country that finance themselves otherwise. The two most obvious examples were the monopoly electrical utilities in Quebec and in Ontario. As is already in the record of the debates, these utilities have debts in the $20 billion range.

On the same day as the pipeline issue was in The Globe and Mail there was an article about Ontario Hydro and its financing needs. It did not have a problem going back to the market. Petro-Canada in the first crunch wants about $750 million. Ontario Hydro in 1991 is going to raise $4 billion. Its bonds were very hot, snapped up in the marketplace. In fact, I think it was able to reduce the interest rate a little bit. They were snapped up, $1.25 billion. I think it took a few days or a week but the issues were all snapped up.

I know that Petro-Canada would prefer to have equity capital because it is cheaper. The dividend pay-out might be in the vicinity of 4 or 5 per cent when dividends are payable, whereas debt capital costs in the vicinity of, in the case of the Ontario Hydro rate, 10.25 per cent. In any event, the other financing options included preferred shares, special shares with a guaranteed rate of return plus participation. They could have been sold to the private sector and the control over Petro-Canada as a state oil company could have been maintained. In any event, we are trying to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. We cannot do it.

Just a few moments ago the minister indicated, with reference to a quote of the Hon. Marc Lalonde, that Petro-Canada was never intended to control prices. That is true. No one on this side of the House ever suggested Petro-Canada's role was to control prices. Why does he suggest that that was the case? No one suggested that Petro-Canada was a monopoly and would control prices. It is a player, it is a participant in an oligopolistic petrochemical industry so that we know automatically that Petro-Canada has an influence on price. It does not control price and no one ever said it did. No one ever said it should. It was our window on the price setting mechanism. It was not control. It is unfair of the minister to suggest that that was the intention. He is putting words, intentions, he is attributing these things to the opposition when that just is not true.

Yesterday in debate at report stage, the minister and other members suggested that the birth of Petro–Canada came about because it was ideologically driven. There is some ideology lying behind all of us in this House. We are not stupid. It is not as if we do not have any ideas. Of course, there was some ideology behind Petro–Canada. What did I hear in this House from the opposite side? I heard the minister a few moments ago admitting that there was conservatism, if I can use the term—he used it, small c conservatism—lying behind the drive to privatize. Therefore, the privatization of Petro–Canada is just as ideologically driven as was the move that gave birth to it, if it even was. I am not sure that it was ideology which gave birth to Petro–Canada.

[Translation]

Since the 1984 federal election, the Conservative government has tried to whitewash its actions by using all kinds of euphemisms like divestiture, dismantling, privatization and public participation. And the debate on this bill is no exception.

• (1220)

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that although the Conservatives may try to disguise their privatizations, Canadians like me know perfectly well this is about killing Canadian initiatives that have served Canadian interests well. Openness and integrity are definitely not part of this government's character.

Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney government must take the responsibility for killing Canadian initiatives in the energy sector.

This bill to privatize or divest Petro–Canada makes no sense at all, especially at a time when we are facing a critical energy situation and when a full–blown energy crisis could flare up in the Middle East. This is not the right time to consider selling a fundamental instrument of our energy sector. If the government succeeds in privatizing Petro–Canada, we will lose our window on the industry, an industry now controlled by foreign interests. This means that Canadians will have no presence that will protect and defend our interests in this crucial activity sector.

The big oil multinationals will now be able to call the shots. I fail to see why this government has tried to rush through this legislation. Bill C–84 was introduced on October 1, and after only a few days of debate, the process is now almost finished. I think there are some serious contradictions between this government's policies.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–80 concerning firearms was introduced in June, and today, this bill is nowhere near coming into force.

I tried to discuss this in the legislative committee as well as in the House when I introduced some amendments, but unfortunately, my motions and those of my colleagues were voted down.

Paragraph 9(1)(e) describes the provisions requiring Petro–Canada to ensure that any member of the public can communicate with its head office and obtain available services in either official language, where Petro–Canada determines there is significant demand. The problem is that it is up to them to determine whether there is significant demand or not.

There is no provision for the eventuality that Petro–Canada ignores the provisions in its articles concerning official languages. These provisions, which relate to certain aspects of services in official languages, appear only in the articles, which practically no Canadian will ever see.

And even if a Canadian citizen were acquainted with these provisions and felt that they were not being observed, I wonder whether this Canadian citizen would have any way of making Petro–Canada respect these provisions. The people to whom these articles apply are the corporation's agents. Other Canadians will have no recourse.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, this government's privatization policy is more important than respecting Canada's two official languages and the rights of Canadians in this respect. This was clearly demonstrated by a refusal to consider suggestions made both by the Commissioner of Official Languages and myself and my colleagues, concerning respect for official languages rights.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we do not run Canada for a profit. In fact, we do not run it, but Canadians do not run it for a profit either. Our job is simply to make this country work, to make it live, to give it direction, to give it purpose. That is our job in the House of Commons and that is the job of every Canadian who holds a position of leadership in his or her community.

The step this government is taking in the privatization of Petro–Canada is one of a chain of privatization initiatives and it is one which we believe is irreversible. What Canadians want is a government which cares and feels for Canadians in every region of this country, not just in the urban centres; a government that knows what is necessary in all of the regions to create a country that has a healthy economy and a purpose.

We on this side of the House want to participate in achieving that goal. We believe that the government—

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I do not see a quorum in the House at the moment.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is a quorum. Debate. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I regret the intervention by the hon. member, just as I was reaching the pinnacle of my remarks, the conclusion of my scintillating remarks. As a result, I will resist the temptation to go back to the beginning of the conclusion.

This debate should crystallize the views of Canadians with respect to the continuing policy of this government in divesting, getting out, selling out, privatizing public participation, whatever is meant by that.

• (1230 )

I also cannot abandon this portion of my remarks without noting that the government felt it necessary to introduce and use time allocation at each stage of the bill. The government says—and if I am wrong I am sure government members will correct me—that the reason it had to be done was to catch the marketplace in the spring. That may be true. The government may have wanted to, but I do not think Canadians wanted the government to catch any marketplace. It is regrettable that the debate did not permit many members to address, not just the privatization, but the long sequence of privatizations and the effect they are having on the institution of government in the country and the perception of Canadians that the government is leading in a precise direction that will provide prosperity and unity to all of the country. I urge all members in the House to vote against this bill at third reading.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the Tory minister of state for ideology earlier said that Petro–Canada did not serve any public purpose. Well, this Conservative government does not serve any public purpose at this moment. I only wish that it would go, and go quickly.

In debating this bill at third reading, I have to go back and think about the way it was in 1972–73, in the early seventies, when there was what was called an energy crisis, brought on by the Arab embargo. At that time, there was no Petro–Canada and those who owned the oil industry in the country were predominantly foreign. Ninety per cent of the energy sector of this economy was foreign–owned. In fact, it had all the answers. It had its books and it kept its books close to its chest.

In Canada, we were faced with the problem of the National Energy Board not knowing what the inventories of energy were in the country. The government had no ability to go into the books of the private oil companies to examine what was going on. The oil companies were giving erroneous figures to the government. They were skittish. They would not put any investment into exploration.

At that time, Canadians and the government were concerned about what was called energy self–sufficiency. In fact, the common phrase used was: "Let the eastern so–and–sos freeze in the dark", and it became the language of bumper stickers. We all recall that.

I would say that, at that time, ideology had little to do with the establishment of a national oil company. Petro–Canada was formed at that time, I would say, not so much from ideology, but more from the economics of the situation at the time.

There was a desire on the part of the government of the day, which was a Liberal minority government supported by the NDP, to establish a national oil company and Petro–Canada was formed. If I recall, the Conservatives fought that every inch of the way. They went to the wall opposing it. The man who became Prime Minister shortly after it was formed, the hon. member who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, called it a white elephant at the time, if I recall correctly. In fact, he went down to defeat in 1979. He went down to defeat because he attempted at that time to privatize Petro–Canada. That was one of the causes of his defeat.

Petro–Canada was established and it became an integrated oil company from well–head to gas pump. Canadians began to identify with their oil company. We know that Canadians spent in 1990 some $6.8 billion to build up Petro–Canada.

We have to ask ourselves why we established Petro–Canada? First, we wanted to have a window on the industry. That was the phrase at the time, a window on the industry. We Canadians and the Government of Canada had to have the information. It had to know what was going on in that sector because if any government was to plan economically, it had to have that important information because energy is at the very basis of economic activity.

Second, we wanted to have a leverage point in the energy sector because 90 per cent of that sector was foreign–owned. Petro–Canada was an attempt to start putting Canadians on the scene of ownership in the energy sector.

A third reason was to discipline other oil companies, not to set the price, but to prevent Canadians from being gouged in times of what were called energy crises. In fact, today I suggest that if Petro–Canada was not in the field, the gouging would be even greater than it is right now.

A fourth reason that has become even more apparent today, given that total PR job of a so–called green paper, is a public policy purpose.

Petro–Canada had four reasons and I have to ask myself if those reasons are still valid today in 1990. Do we still need to have a window on the energy sector? Do we still need to have a leverage point in the energy sector? Do we still need to be concerned about disciplining the other oil companies, and do we need to make that a public policy instrument? Yes, now more than ever Petro–Canada justifies its existence as a publicly–owned corporation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rodriguez: What the Conservatives are following is an ideological position. They are ideologically driven. Petro–Canada has become a symbol. What the government is attempting to do to Petro–Canada, if it succeeds with the vote today to dismantle Petro–Canada, is to send a signal to the world that Canada no longer has a government that is a guardian of our national heritage.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: They applaud that.

Mr. Rodriguez: They applaud it. I noticed Tory back–benchers applauding that.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: The message is clear. By getting rid of Petro–Canada, we consume our children's inheritance. We are destroying a symbol of national pride. That is what they are doing.

Second, there is this window on the industry. A considerable amount of knowledge has been gained by the government through its oil company about how that sector works. It has given the government an expertise which it never had before, an expertise that is important and information that is important for any government concerned about planning the economy of the country. Petro–Canada is certainly not a corporate welfare bum. It pays its way.

• (1240)

The other question is the leverage. Selling off Petro–Canada starts moving foreign ownership in the energy sector back up. It will go up to 60 per cent if the government is successful in selling off Petro–Canada.

As for disciplining other oil companies, in my view Petro–Canada has certainly minimized the greed of the oil companies. Every time there is a crisis they move in very quickly and take advantage of the roller–coaster prices and get the benefit of windfall profits. Wait until the books are reported for this year. We will see massive windfall profits that will make the banks look like a kindergarten in the way of profits. Petro–Canada is a brake on those oil companies who are out to gouge Canadians. There is no doubt in my mind.

Then, there is the public policy purpose. If ever there is a time for a national oil company to serve a public policy purpose, now is the time. The government is bereft of any kind of practical, specific environmental strategy. The green plan is simply a public relations exercise.

Petro–Canada can be used in a very practical and specific way with respect to the environment. One, we have suggested that we can use Petro–Canada stations to recycle ozone–depleting CFCs from automobile air–conditioners. Petro–Canada can do that by setting up reclamation centres at its stations. It can recycle used engine oil. It can promote alternative energy resources, for example fuel ethanol from grain. It will give the grain farmers a more solid income base and, of course, there is employment to be gained in that activity. Petro–Canada could be promoting research and development, and commercialization of alternative energy sources, such as solar and wind power.

In other words, Petro–Canada becomes an active participant. It becomes an activist. It plays an activist role in researching and developing these alternate approaches to energy.

Surely, the whole idea is not to keep on consuming non–renewable fossil fuels. Surely, the role of a national energy company, owned by the taxpayers of Canada and built up with their investments, is a legitimate public policy purpose for a national oil company. I believe that that is what Canadians want their oil company to do, not to be so–called sold off after having written down the book value of its assets.

Imagine this. My colleague here knows all about these things. He is a tax lawyer. If I came to him for advice, what would he tell me if I said: "Here, I own this oil company. Energy prices are going up through the ceiling and we are into an energy crisis. Is this the time that I should write down the value of my oil assets?"

An hon. member: It is shameful.

Mr. Rodriguez: He says it is shameful. Of course, it is shameful.

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine not even in any tidy bookkeeping way of getting maximum money? You do not write down the value of your assets when you are holding an asset that is in demand at this point in time. The government is doing that. It wrote it down to $1.8 billion.

I will deal with these Tories in a minute. I will deal with them.

There is another reason for keeping Petro–Canada in public hands. That is because all the profits made by Petro–Canada stay in Canada.

In the 1980s the private oil companies transferred $7 billion of their profits out of this country, $7 billion. The taxpayers of this country spent $6.8 billion in 1990 building this company and the government is prepared to sell it all off. You know something, the taxpayers will not get one penny of that. Not one penny of that will come back into their pockets. All the previous exercises in ideological sell–offs and privatizations have not resulted in one penny coming back into the coffers of Canada because they gave it all back to the companies that were just sold off. We will never see one penny. We are going to sell off our birthright and we are not going to get one penny back.

The next question is a logical one. Why does the NDP oppose this, and is there still a purpose for Petro–Canada? That is the first question.

The next question is an even more important one. Why would the Tories sell off Petro–Canada? Why would they do that? That is the question. Why would they? I suggest to this House and to Canadians watching that the Tories are selling it off because they are locked into an ideology, and that ideology is a corporate agenda. It seems to me that that is what they are doing. Let us face it. Who brought these people into government? Who brought them? Their corporate friends, their big greedy corporate friends. They brought them in here.

Imagine. I want you to imagine it. Here are the Tories after they came to power in 1984 having a banquet, and who do they invite to sit at the table, to draw up at the table? First of all they have their big banker friends. They have the tables near to the head table. Then they have their investment dealers. They are sitting at the table. Then they have their corporate lawyers. They are sitting at the table. They have their chartered accountants. They are sitting at the table. They have the BCNI, the Business Council on National Issues. They are sitting at the table. Their lobbyist friends, the Frank Moores of this world, are sitting at the table. They are eating; they are getting a meal. They are gorging themselves on this meal that is Canada. First, Air Canada—

An hon. member: Is this from the trough?

Mr. Rodriguez: From the trough. The trough is put on the table—first Air Canada, then de Havilland, Petro-Canada. They put them on the table and they say "more!" They have no shame. Their gluttony has no shame. But we all know that gluttony kills more than the sword, brothers and sisters, so repent before you end up in the fires of eternal damnation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rodriguez: See, their consciences do not even bother them. They are not even repentant. What do the people of Canada get at this big table? They get GST crumbs, that is what they get. The crumbs. And even on the crumbs there is a GST.

I see you are giving me the fingers, Mr. Speaker. That is all right. I like to see two. It is when I see one that I worry.

What does the government say? It says Petro-Canada needs cash.

• (1250)

From all that we can discover, the long term debt equity ratio is quite within the acceptable limits for this sector. If Petro-Canada needs money, it can go out and borrow, like other companies do.

This government reduced the book value $1.8 billion. Now, who is going to sell the first tranche of shares? R.B.C. Dominion Securities; it contributed $80,000 to the Tories in the last election. Burns Fry is going to sell them; it contributed $56,919. Gordon Capital, Wood Gundy contributed $68,000. That is a total of $218,000 contributed to the Conservative Party. I guess you have to dance with the ones who brung you.

What do they get for that? They get $37.5 million commissions on the first tranche; a total of $200 million for selling all of Petro-Canada. What do the people of Canada get? Zip-all. Zip-all. I therefore move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be not now read a third time but be referred back to the legislative committee for the purpose of reconsidering clause 9 and for the purpose of adding a new clause which would specify that the bill would come into force on a date five years after its adoption.

Having said that, I hope it carries because this bill should not be passed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will consider the motion to amend put forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. We now proceed to the 10-minute question and comment period.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I thank our colleague for his excellent and entertaining discourse this morning. He expressed to us that the tranche is in the trough and that the government is feeding us crumbs. I do not want to say that his speech was crummy because it was not. It was an excellent speech.

I want to ask our colleague for Nickel Belt about the intentions of the government in this privatization scheme. In the unlikely event that the government is so ill advised that it will not consider the thoughtful amendments of our colleague—and there is always the possibility of that unlikely event. His speech was so excellent that most of us will be moved by it, but nevertheless the proposition still remains that some Tories might not be swayed.

As unlikely as that proposition may be, I want to ask our colleague if he would agree with me that at the very least those charged with the disposition of the share offering should, through some mechanism, compete in order to get that business. This would ensure some fairness and the best possible deal for the taxpayers of Canada.

I say this not because I happen to like the idea of the government privatizing a Crown corporation. But in the event that this government will not understand the right thing to do, will the hon. member agree that the government should ensure that fairness is put in the system so that we do not give the appearance that some might be rewarded just because they happen to be friends of the government?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very good question. I think it is an excellent suggestion. Sums of this size, and given what I have pointed out—I am not a cynical person so I would not suggest that there was a connection between those huge contributions made to the Conservative Party and the fact that they end up with this bonanza and they get all this largesse in their lap.

In a recent article, Lévesque–Beaubien, which is the investment bureau arm of the National Bank in Quebec, complained that it did not get a piece of the action. A guy phones me up. I say: "Look, brother, you did not contribute to those guys, so he is not going to dance with you because you did not bring him". I guess they are going to be wallflowers at this dance. They are not going to be asked to dance. But I think it is an excellent suggestion that whenever these moneys are being paid to agents to do work for the government it should be done on the basis that there should be an open tender and they should bid.

I do not think it should be left up to the government to choose its corporate friends to massage them with millions of dollars. We are not talking about a few hundred dollars, we are talking about a total, when the whole tranche is complete, of $200 million. The whole of Air Canada was sold and the commission was even less than the $37 million on the first tranche of this operation.

So we are not talking about peanuts here and there. It must not only be seen to be fairness in the public business, there must be actual fairness in public business. I think that is very important to keep in mind.

So I thank the hon. member and I agree with the suggestion. I think it is an excellent one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in being able to speak to this particular motion and to respond somewhat to what my friend from Nickel Belt had to say.

He made quite an exercise of rewriting history. I mean, talk about a revisionist, he really did characterize it all the way. He says Petro–Canada was formed because of the embargo of 1972–73. I think we have to go back a little further than that. We have to go back to the election of 1972 and Mr. Trudeau's campaign when the slogan was "The land is strong". That campaign slogan got him a minority government and Mr. David Lewis—Oh, do not leave now, come on, you have to get the correct version of history. Come on, John, stay here.

Then came the New Democratic Party rump over there which thought it had the balance of power. In fact, it probably did because Mr. David Lewis was negotiating with Mr. Trudeau on how the government agenda should develop during that minority government. So Mr. Trudeau naturally wanted his close friends and soul brothers the socialists to work together with him on the government agenda. He met with Mr. David Lewis, that successful labour lawyer from Toronto, all those run down at the heels people in the socialist party. Mr. Lewis is one who did quite well.

He made a deal with Mr. Trudeau and said, "We will co–operate with you but the price is going to be pretty steep. You will have to enact some of our agenda and our agenda is to have a Crown corporation known as Petro–Canada, the window on the industry". It really had little to do with the oil embargo. It had more to do with a few needs that the Liberal government had at the time. Talk about a dependency, we were not so much dependent on the Arabs at that time as Trudeau was of the socialists at the time. That is where the dependency was. It was not an oil dependency, but a political dependency at that time. So, Petro–Canada was born.

My friend says that Petro–Canada pays its way. What a way to pay your way. Does he remember the Canadian ownership tax that the government imposed on the Canadian people? Now there was a cool $1.65 billion handed over to Petro–Canada. Now would not another company in Canada love to have a gift of $1.5 billion just to start out, a little bit of petty cash to start out with. That is the way Petro–Canada pays its way.

Now, he talks about leverage in the sector. We saw the leverage when we had the National Energy Program with 25 per cent back–in provisions. When a company could confiscate the resources of any other company, that is what you call leverage. It had leverage imposed on it by Mr. Trudeau's government. We do not need that kind of leverage in a marketplace.

So my friend has revised history a little bit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, Atlantic Defence Industries Ltd. in Bridgetown, Nova Scotia closed, with the loss of 200 jobs. That combined with the 300 jobs which will be lost when Dominion Textiles closes its plant in Yarmouth, an area that has had a textile plant for over 100 years, shows that something is seriously wrong with the way in which this government funds regional economic projects. Both companies were major recipients of government funding yet were unable to survive.

I call on the minister responsible for ACOA to study the factors that make it difficult for Atlantic companies to compete against central Canadian and American companies. The agency should start by asking these fundamental questions. Why are capital investment costs lower in Ontario and Quebec than in the maritimes? How can these costs be made equal in a way that does not violate the free trade agreement?

We must have programs that will allow our region to retain and expand its share of economic growth in Canada.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE MGR. ALBERTUS MARTIN

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the people of the riding of Drummond were saddened by the news of the death of Mgr. Albertus Martin, who passed away last Sunday. He had been the spiritual leader of the diocese of Nicolet for nearly 40 years.

A highly cultivated and intelligent man, with the class of the most prominent clergymen, Mgr. Albertus Martin compelled recognition at all levels because of his exceptional personality and his humanist approach to the basic problems of this century.

Be it with his flock in his diocese or sitting on Vatican II in Rome, he relentlessly devoted all of his energy and his remarkable scholarship to propagating the Catholic faith. He was renowned not only as a pastor with avant-garde ideas, but also as a great builder and an informed manager.

His death leaves a great empty space, but also the memory of a full life devoted to the advancement and edification of a Church more accessible to the people, a Church in tune with its members and their aspirations for surpassing themselves.

Monsignor Martin, you will not be forgotten!

POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Association of Food Banks released preliminary figures from its 1990 HungerCount showing that half a million Canadians rely on food banks each month, up 30 per cent from last year.

These figures should be especially distressing because this government continues to follow the same policies it has in the past. We can expect another large increase in the HungerCount next year.

What will happen when UI runs out early for thousands of people, thanks to Bill C-21? What will happen when Bill C-69 squeezes money for vital social programs? What will happen to thousands of low income Canadians when the inflationary effect of the GST is felt?

The answer to these questions is that more and more Canadians will sink deeper below the poverty line and more will be forced to rely on food banks to feed themselves and their children.

I urge this government to rethink and reverse these totally unacceptable policies which are forcing low and middle income Canadians deeper into the mire of poverty.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the decision to cut 18 positions and several programs at the CBC in Moncton will hit at the very heart of the Acadian community in my riding. The cancelled shows are Télé–Débat, Spec–Art, La Revue and Bulletin de Nouvelles Dimanche Midi.

[English]

The minister has stated that regional programming would be strengthened by the cuts. In fact CBC cannot maintain minimal levels of programming. Radio–Canada from Moncton services the entire Atlantic region. At a time in our country's history when so many Canadians feel disenfranchised, we can ill afford these cuts.

Acadians need to maintain strong cultural and linguistic links. The dollars saved compare little to the cost of maintaining this heritage.

CBC links our region into the wider information network of Canada. The minister must restore the necessary funding to ensure that minimal regional programming is available.

HOUSING

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, as Christmas approaches, I ask members of this House to remember a family in Edmonton who are living in a substandard house. Let us just call this family the Smiths.

The Smith family is large, needs a five–bedroom home, but cannot find an affordable one, so it rents a draughty nine–year old house with no hot water.

The affordable government subsidized house that would be available is occupied. It is occupied by the New Democratic member of Parliament from Edmonton East. This New Democratic member lives in a five–bedroom government assisted home and pays only $622 per month. His salary is five times that of the Smith family.

This is outrageous. It is scandalous. The New Democratic member for Edmonton East should hang his head in shame.

Mr. Speaker: It is one thing to put forth facts. It is another thing to use language which becomes a personal attack on hon. members during the 60–second statement. I would ask hon. members to restrain themselves from that temptation.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

M. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Lac Malartic, in Abitibi, told me they were bothered by the flashing lights on the CBC transmission tower for Channel 6 in Lac Malartic. Permanent and summer residents whose homes are located near the tower feel that the intensity of the stroboscopic flash is exagerated, considering the amount of air traffic in the region, and that it is a source of visual pollution.

Mr. Speaker, I know the people at the CBC are making the necessary checks to deal with the problem and satisfy local residents.

ASBESTOS FIBRES

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, some opposition members stake their reputation on the fact they have always defended the interests of workers and unions. Recently, they claimed that the presence of asbestos fibres in certain federal buildings in Ottawa was endangering their health at work, and that it might adversely affect certain workers engaged in renovating the buildings.

A team of researchers from several countries, whose findings were published by Harvard University in 1989, does not agree, and I quote: "Average levels of airborne fibres inside buildings where material containing asbestos is found are extremely low, and the health risk as a result of the presence of asbestos in the buildings is minute, both in absolute and relative terms".

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I urge all opposition members who are campaigning against asbestos to look at the scientific evidence that shows that asbestos is not harmful to one's health

LEADER OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Quebec City, after the submission by the Leader of the Liberal Party, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, the federalist option regained lost ground. While the Prime Minister prefers to sit on the sidelines in these debates on the Constitution and national unity, the Leader of the Liberal Party leaps into the fray.

All Canadians saw yesterday that the man who will lead the fight to safeguard and unite our country and defend the rights of all citizens is none other than Mr. Chrétien. Mr. Chrétien roused his audience by calmly analysing the economic, social, cultural and political realities facing our country, including Quebec.

The Liberal Party knows very well that unprecedented changes are about to took place in this young country of ours, and we intend to meet these challenges.

Jean Chrétien wants these reforms to ensure we will have a united Canada, based on co-operation, friendship and pride.

BILL C-43

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remind the House, and especially the Minister of Justice, that the end of the GST debate means a new beginning for the fight against criminalization of abortion.

With Bill C-43 about to resurface on Parliament's agenda, the Minister of Justice should consider this. A new survey released by the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists suggests that her attempts to build credibility with Canadian doctors have failed and have failed badly. Even after the minister's 10-page letter to them trying to alleviate their fears, more physicians than ever—almost half the number now performing abortions—say they will stop that service if it is criminalized by this government.

I therefore call on the Minister of Justice to reaffirm, to restate, to repeat her promise of two months ago not to proclaim Bill C-43 as law until Canadian doctors, in her own words, "feel comfortable with it". Right now they do not.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the CBC president and board for recognizing that we live in times of restraint and that we have to cut the cloth according to the pattern.

• (1410 )

However, I do take issue with certain choices they made in making their cuts. In particular, I urge them to reconsider their decision to cut the unique regional program Land and Sea. No other program more effectively shows the economic and social life of Atlantic Canada.

CBC President Veilleux, in announcing these cuts, said that the CBC would move away from local broadcasting and concentrate on regional and national programs. This makes sense to me. However, surely cutting a program like Land and Sea goes against this guideline.

As for local station cuts, why start with smaller stations in communities with no alternative service? Surely more money would be saved and the objective of leaving local service to the private sector more effectively served by leaving stations in places like Sydney, Corner Brook or Windsor to the last and by cutting first stations in places like Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver where alternative local stations exist.

LEADER OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, fortified by his integrity and his passion for Canada, the hon. Jean Chrétien appeared before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission to talk about the political and economic reality of a sovereign Quebec. Liberals from coast to coast are proud to see a sincere federalist defend the interests of all Canadians, including those who live in Quebec.

[English]

Our leader, the hon. Jean Chrétien, spoke openly and honestly about our history and that of our constitutional accommodations to come. He spoke eloquently of our country, for the well-being of the people matters more than the ambitions of a few.

On behalf of all Liberals, I congratulate and I thank the hon. Jean Chrétien for his courage, his conviction, and his leadership.

Canada needs leadership, eloquence and integrity. In other words, Canada needs Jean Chrétien.

PROJECT HAVEN

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, family violence is a social problem and a serious crime. The federal government has a key role to play in the fight against this plague. Housing is a precious tool in such situations, for it can be a shelter for women and children. This is the kind of assistance offered by the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation through "Project Haven".

To help the 25,000 women and children who are mistreated every year, $22.2 million have been set aside to provide 500 housing units. These funds are available to private non-profit groups and Indian bands seeking to create shelter homes by erecting, renovating or transforming existing buildings.

Mr. Speaker, 178 housing units have been promised. I urge all provinces, municipalities and communities to support this measure. The federal government has done more than its share to assist the victims of family violence and will maintain this policy.

LEADER OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): In the debate over Quebec's sovereignty, many individuals are trying to frighten Quebecers. Mr. Chrétien is one of them. He wrongly maintains that a sovereign Quebec would be in a bad position. He maintains that in a soveriegn province Quebecers will have to cope with their share of the national debt.

Does he mean to say that Quebecers are not now affected by the federal debt? Do they live at the expense of the rest of Canada? I suggest that Jean Chrétien has missed the point altogether. Quebecers already shoulder their heavy share of the deficit and the huge debt. It is precisely because they have no control over mismanagement and waste that they want to be sovereign.

TRAWLER BOUT DE LIGNE

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Again, Mr. Speaker, the residents of the Gaspe area have been saddened by the loss of three young men. The fishing boat Bout de ligne with three people on board, Normand O'Connor and Gino Cotton of Rivière-au-Renard and Roger Reeve of Anse-au-Griffon, made its last radio contact at 1 p.m. on Thursday, December 13. In spite of the valiant efforts of the Coast Guard, the Department of National Defence and a number of commercial fishing vessels we are still without news from our Gaspesian friends who disappeared with their boat.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House will join me in expressing our heart-felt condolences to the relatives of the victims.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we all know that Allan MacEachen is a wily political strategist who gave the impression that he and his Liberal senators and the Liberal caucus were against the goods and services tax. But was he really?

Did he defeat the GST when leave was sought in the Senate to introduce the goods and services legislation? No, he did not. Did he defeat the goods and services tax legislation when it was read a first time? No, he did not, in spite of the fact that the Liberals had a majority in the Senate. Did Allan MacEachen and his majority Liberal colleagues defeat the GST at the second reading stage when the principle of the bill was dealt with? No, they did not. Did Allan MacEachen and his Senate colleagues defeat the goods and services tax when it was in committee for April, May, June, July, August, September and October? No, they did not.

In other words, on numerous occasions the Liberals in the Senate had a majority to defeat the GST but they chose not to. The hon. member for Hamilton East, on April 2 in Winnipeg, said about Mr. Chrétien that perhaps he was implicitly supporting the GST. I suspect she was dead on.

LATVIA

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, as the Christmas season approaches and our thoughts in this Chamber return to our homes and our families, we cannot cease to be aware that murderous tensions exist in our world even as we look upon the season of peace.

In the Baltic states things have worsened considerably in the past few weeks. Nine bombs have exploded in Latvia over the last two weeks, three bombs yesterday alone in Riga, at the Prime Minister's office, the Red Army office and at Communist Party headquarters. Latvian Canadians believe that this is a set-up. They believe it is being done to justify future strong arm tactics by the Soviets.

There has been a request by the Latvian Vice President, Andreas Krastins, for the world to recognize that Latvians are not responsible.

Canada must be a voice for restraint and for peace in Latvia.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Today the federal government's own Superintendent of Bankruptcy reported that more than 6,000 individual Canadians and businesses declared bankruptcy in November, an increase of 59 per cent compared to the same period last year, startling evidence of the serious nature of the recession created by this government.

Why is this government waiting for this recession to get worse and worse? Why will this government not bring in new economic policies right now before another 6,000 Canadians are forced into bankruptcy due to the recession caused by the economic policies of this misguided government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks why we are waiting. We are not waiting. We have brought down interest rates 200 basis points, more than two percentage points, since the early part of the spring of this year. That is designed directly to address the weakness in the economy.

As my hon. friend has heard me say many times in the past, I would like to see interest rates lower. We do have these concerns about inflationary pressures that are causing us to be prudent, to be vigilant about these problems, but our objective, clearly, is to address the problems of weakness in the economy with lower interest rates.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, James Frank, chief economist of the Conference Board said:

> The government kept interest rates too high for too long—Without some relief on the interest rate front, I have major concerns that this recession will turn out to be much more severe than we currently expect.

Why will the Minister of Finance not admit reality in terms of he and his government waiting too long on the interest rate front? This is a serious recession. People are not just being laid off from plants temporarily, the plants are closing permanently.

James Hoicka, an official of the Ontario Ministry of Treasury and Economics said:

> The people being laid off won't be returning, because there isn't any facility to return to.

Where are the adjustment programs the government promised for workers who are losing their jobs due to the free trade deal? Where are the government programs to create new jobs and retrain workers involved in the facilities being closed permanently in our manufacturing sector? Why will this government not do something right now for the workers and their communities right across this country? It is time for the government to act. Why will it not do it?

• (1420)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there have been a number of things going on and, in fact, now that we have Bill C-21 we can do considerably more.

We have increased the budget for work sharing. We have increased the budget for training for UI recipients. The funds we received for training and adjustment programs this year total $1.8 billion and, of that, $181 million is going to social assistance recipients.

I am really surprised to hear the hon. member suggest that there is nothing going on. We have only had since November, when we finally got our bill through the other place. These could have been working a lot sooner if hon. members opposite had taken their responsibilities seriously.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, why will the minister not admit that Bill C–21 cutting unemployment benefits is forcing more and more people on to the welfare rolls of this country? Why will the minister not admit that the money that is supposed to come from the unemployment insurance fund for training, most or all of it will not come until next April?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the past ten months more than 3,700 people or businesses filed for bankruptcy in Quebec, and of that number more than 2,000 did so last month. We have every reason to believe the situation is going from bad to worse. I therefore want to ask the Minister of Finance: How much longer will Canadians have to suffer the disastrous policies of this government? And when will he introduce new policies that will get us out of this economic morass? When?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have acknowledged that the economy is now in a recession. We have reduced interest rates since last spring. There has been a 2 per cent drop in interest rates but it is also very important to reduce inflationary pressures. If those pressures are also reduced, interest rates can then be allowed to go down further.

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. In his usual display of foot and mouth disease, the minister, in commenting yesterday on Canadian participation in the U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement, was quoted as saying: "We have cleared away the underbrush now and we can start to fell the big tree very quickly".

Does the minister really believe that up to 226,000 lost Canadian jobs are mere underbrush and how many more Canadian jobs must fall before the minister comes to his senses?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are not, of course, 226,000 lost jobs, nor anything approaching that figure, as a result of the free trade agreement.

As a matter of fact, there has been a very considerable net increase in jobs in the two years since the free trade agreement went into effect. There is no doubt, however, that in a recessionary climate there has been some loss of jobs due to the recession, not due to the free trade agreement.

With respect to the discussions with Mexico, these are only consultations to determine whether or not we are, and the Americans and the Mexicans are interested in a tripartite negotiation of a possible free trade agreement with Mexico. We have not started any negotiations yet. There is nothing for the hon. member to be alarmed about. When we fell the big trees, I will let her know.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I dare the Minister for International Trade to go to St. John's to tell the fishermen that there are no lost jobs, to go to Hamilton and tell the steel workers that there are no lost jobs, and to go to the west and tell the farmers that there are no lost jobs. You produce the figures. We have produced figures and we want to see your figures.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. He actually had the nerve yesterday to tell the people of Canada that all he is waiting for is approval from the Congress of the United States. The last time I looked it was still the Parliament of Canada that made decisions for this country.

[Translation]

I would like to ask him this question: When will he come to the House to get the approval of the Parliament of Canada and not of the U.S. Congress, to make changes in the free trade agreement or to conclude a free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States? When will he come before Parliament?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot provoke me no matter how shrilly she screams at me. I am going to treat her—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: I am going to treat her with the utmost deference.

Several months ago the hon. member who just asked that question said this with reference to the question of the free trade talks between the U.S. and Mexico. She was appointed as the industry critic in the shadow cabinet, and is certainly in the shadows. She said: "I am not sure that we should become a negotiating partner, but I think we should make sure we know what is going on. If we are not anywhere near the table clearly we are not going to be in a position to monitor that."

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Who said that?

An hon. member: It makes a lot of sense.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member from Toronto, the justice critic I believe, the hon. Kaplan, said Canada should try and get the largest role that we can in the talks to protect our interests. I am simply taking their advice, Mr. Speaker, in these conversations.

I am glad to see that the Liberal Party is supporting us in this attempt and I encourage them to continue to show—

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Over the weekend the United States gave Canada an unrealistic deadline as to whether we would or would not participate in the U.S.–Mexico trade talks.

Yesterday, instead of standing up for Canadian families, instead of standing up for Canadian sovereignty and Canadian workers, the Minister for International Trade gave in to the U.S. ultimatum and said that Canada would be a part of the talks.

The Canada–U.S. trade deal has cost Canadians dearly: 226,000 jobs in two years and double the bankruptcies because of this government's policies. I ask the minister responsible for international trade what is the price that Canada is prepared to pay for participation in the U.S.–Mexico trade talks?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this government is going to see that Canada participates in the world. We know that Canada cannot survive on its own, isolated, with high barriers against trade with just about any other country in the world, including the less well developed countries that the hon. member's party is supposed to support but whom they abandon every time there is an attempt to improve their lot by increasing trade with them. The hon. member's party abandons the less developed countries.

With reference to the discussions yesterday, there have been no ultimatums and no deadlines. Since last September we have been discussing with the United States and Mexico the possibility of a trilateral negotiation for a North American free trade arrangement. Our discussions are about technical matters to ensure that this would not take any longer time, would not be any more difficult than bilateral discussions between the U.S. and Mexico. It is becoming quite obvious that there are no technical reasons why there should be any delay.

I would expect that within the next few weeks there will be a decision by these three countries whether there will be a trilateral negotiation or not, if the U.S. Congress in March or April approves the participation of the United States. That is all that we are doing. We are neither taking ultimatums, making them, or accepting them. We are defending the interests of Canada and its people.

The hon. member should know that the figures she quotes of job losses—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think there is a Canadian today who is going to believe that this government cares about Canadian jobs. It has destroyed more than 200,000 others.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: U.S. officials are quoted as having said that Canada cannot discuss Canadian job losses because it will cause undue delay in the talks. President Bush himself has said that Canada can only participate if we do not cause undue delay. In other words, if we do not raise issues about Canadian workers and Canadian families, we can participate.

The minister says that he is concerned about international workers, about the workers of Mexico. Yet, he says there will be no preconditions to these talks.

Why not, Mr. Speaker? Why not preconditions that Mexican wages, working standards for Mexicans, and environmental standards in Mexico will come up to Canadian standards and not Canadian standards go down?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this would be a new method of international negotiations. You deal with a country and you tell that country that, before you will speak to them or negotiate with them, their wages must equal yours. Where would that have put Canada?

I can remember when the wages of woods worker in Newfoundland in 1959 were $1 an hour. What if other countries had told us they would not negotiate trade agreements with us until we brought our wages up to their wages, whatever they might have been. What a silly suggestion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): How can the hon. lady ask to be taken seriously—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister for International Trade will share those thoughts with the European Common Market which is in fact putting exactly those kinds of terms—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade said in Washington that because of the GATT charter we needed a free trade zone consisting of Mexico, Canada and the United States. A meeting is scheduled on January 15 in Geneva to continue the GATT talks, and I therefore want to ask the minister: Why has this government already dropped the whole idea of GATT?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this country is one of the foremost supporters and exponents of a successful conclusion to the Uruguay Round. As any one of the 107 countries that participated will say, Canada led the way on almost every one of the 15 sectors that was negotiated.

Yesterday, I met for an hour and a half with Mrs. Carla Hills and her deputy, Mr. Jules Katz, to discuss the situation with respect to the Uruguay Round and how we might successfully conclude the Uruguay Round between now and March 1. It is one of our highest priorities.

We will be attending, our officials will be attending in Geneva on June 15. We will be doing a lot more that I can reveal to the House or to anyone else to ensure a successful completion of that round.

One thing is certain. There would be no successful conclusion if the NDP party were in power, either there or anywhere else in trade in the world. We would be isolated behind huge tariff barriers, cowering in our homes, worrying about what the rest of the world was going to do to us.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As he well knows, in the last four months over 60,000 Canadians and businesses have been forced into bankruptcy by the government's economic policies. For each statistic, there is a real story, a story of shattered pride, broken dreams, and wasted promise.

When is this government going to stop treating this mounting human calamity in such a cavalier and statistical fashion, and take action now to stop this mounting economic inhuman carnage that its own economic policies have caused?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of exaggeration in that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It does not help matters to have that type of exaggeration. No one is happy at all about the number of people who are going bankrupt. I should point out to the hon. member that this is not to the same extent as it was in the last recession. But we do have a recession now.

It is a recession that has come about after seven and a half years of very strong growth in the country. It is a natural phenomenon with economies as it is with individuals. They have to slow down after they have been running too hard. That, unfortunately, is the result of what is happening in the economy today.

We are not happy that it is there. We are getting interest rates down to respond to that weakness in the economy. As we become confident that the inflationary pressures are lowered, we will be able to get interest rates down further.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, that answer is certainly going to be cold comfort at this time of the year when thousands of Canadians and thousands of businesses are being thrown out onto the thrash heap by the government.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister responsible for Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As he well knows, with each business bankruptcy tens, hundreds, or even thousands of workers lose their jobs, pension benefits, vacation pay, and back wages because the government has inconsistently failed to amend the Bankruptcy Act to protect the interest of workers across the country.

What Canadian workers need now is not more promises of action sometime in the future on this particular aspect. I challenge the minister to bring in those much needed amendments today, tomorrow, or before Christmas, because Canadian workers can no longer afford to hang by their fingernails waiting for the government to take some type of action.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I should remind my hon. colleague that his party, when it was in office during the recession of 1981–82, failed four times to bring in a new legislation. We do not have any lesson to learn from the people opposite.

We have worked with the whole community in this sector to try to find the right thing to do. We are close to making a decision. As soon as the government has made its decision, it will be announced.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I would like to ask the minister what contingencies he has prepared and what will happen to the 1,700 young Canadians in the Persian Gulf in the event that there is a resort to force on or after January 15. Could he tell us what the plan is, please?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks a question for which he knows that I would not be able to give him a fulsome answer at this time.

Some hon. members: Fulsome.

Mr. McKnight: I can assure the hon. member that contingency plans are in place. They have been in place since the Canadian Forces accepted tasks in the Persian Gulf area.

At this time, their tasks are that of defence. They are doing tasks which they are capable of doing. As for the future, they will be assigned tasks which they are capable of fulfilling.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you are aware and everybody in the House is aware, this is an item of great concern to all Canadians, especially the families of the 1,700 people involved. I do not want to make political hay of this and I appreciate the thrust of the minister's question. Perhaps in the interest of giving some indication of what the options are, we could approach the question another way.

In the event there is a resort to offensive force in mid January, would the Canadian Forces be expected to maintain the economic blockade? Will they be expected to withdraw? Or, will they be involved in the actual offensive action itself? More than anything else, I think the House would like assurance from the minister that Parliament would be reconvened before any decision is taken by the government in this regard.

Mr. Lewis: Will you be here to vote?

Mr. Mifflin: I will be here. Yes, sir.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): I am pleased that my hon. friend said that he would be here. We missed him when we had the last opportunity to vote on this.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1440 )

Mr. McKnight: The member can rest assured that the Canadian forces presently involved in a multinational effort in the Persian Gulf, in recognition of 12 resolutions by the UN Security Council and in recognition of those actions taken and supported by the countries of the world in the condemnation of the action of Iraq, will be assigned tasks which they are capable of fulfilling. They were assigned those tasks from the outset. The rules of engagement have been established. There is no need at this time, in my opinion or in military leadership's opinion, to change the rules of engagement that have been identified.

As I and my colleagues on this side have said, when there is a change in the commitment or a change of significant numbers of Canadian forces involved in the Persian Gulf, Parliament will be consulted at the earliest possible convenience.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture.

As the Minister of Finance will know, the GST will tax international transportation at zero percent. However, a recent interpretation by Revenue Canada states as follows:

> The cleaning, mixing and drying of the grain is considered to constitute further processing with the result that the portion of the journey within Canada to the export terminal is a service of domestic transportation and is subject to GST at 7 per cent.

This means that grain moving from farm gate to the ports of Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Churchill, and Thunder Bay will now be charged GST. This decision is astonishing, considering the existing burden on our grain producers.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if this interpretation is correct and, if so, what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member omits a very important part of the question. When any GST is charged on any services or goods purchased by the farmers in the course of their farm business, they will receive a full credit so that the net tax impact is zero.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. If the farmers are going to get this money back eventually anyway, why on earth would the government want to visit such a bureaucratic nightmare on western Canada, on the farming community, and everyone else who will have to do all this paperwork, only to get the money back in the final analysis probably about a year later?

An hon. member: Bureaucratic Tories.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. member's question omits a very important part of how the GST will work. We have just recently released a list of a number of products on which there will not be any GST charged. The result of this is that the cash flow impact on the farmers is about 25 per cent of what it would be if all of those products would have been charged the GST.

The net effect of the GST replacing the existing federal sales tax is to save farmers right across the country, in the first year, $250 million. That is a major benefit for the farm community.

To put it down into some very easily understood terms, a pickup truck that today costs the farmer $20,000 will cost him $2,000 less as a result of the shift from the federal sales tax to the goods and services tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

RAFFERTY–ALAMEDA DAM PROJECT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and concerns the government's application for an injunction to stop construction of the Rafferty–Alameda dam before a full environmental assessment could be completed.

It was widely reported this week that the judge who turned down the application, a senior partner in a Saskatchewan law firm, was a legal representative of Luscar, a company with a financial interest in the dam's proceeding as quickly as possible.

When did the minister know that the judge hearing the injunction application had been Luscar's legal representative, and what did she do when she found out? If she did nothing, why?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this matter is before the courts and it is not appropriate for me to comment on it in this place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): My question was directed to the minister's responsibility and to whether she took every step possible in the first stage of this case, in this important precedent-setting capacity of the government's ability to protect the environment.

I ask again, when did she know about the judge's representation of Luscar, a firm with a direct interest in the case and what did she do about it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is putting a question relating to certain public comments with respect to a certain judge in a certain case. The hon. Minister of Justice has said that as the matter is still under litigation, she has no intention of remarking further on it. That is her privilege.

I have some difficulty with the question because I am not entirely sure that the Minister of Justice has any particular part in picking a judge when an application is filed in a court. I think perhaps more consideration should be given to the whole issue before the matter is proceeded with further in the House.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands--Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns the 1991 groundfish management plan, specifically cod allocations to the area known as 4VN.

The minister will know that in determining the inshore and offshore allocations for this area, he violated key principles in the Atlantic Groundfish Management Plan. These proposed allocations directly jeopardize fish processing jobs in Petit de Grat, Louisbourg and Canso.

My question is this. Why is the minister breaking his own departmental guidelines to take away employment from these communities?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the winter fishery 4VN is a fishery in which the Gulf fishermen in 4T, which is all the Gulf area, have claimed for over a decade was hurting the fishery in the Gulf.

I had been asked by the Gulf fishermen to simply close down the winter fishery in 4VN. Instead of doing that, because of the severe impact it would have on jobs in Cape Breton and in Prince Edward Island, I decided to attribute a larger portion of the reduction of the 4TV and quota cut. I did that in order not to create in the southern Gulf the same situation and the same problem we have in the northern Gulf of St. Lawrence. I did that to conserve fish and to reduce the heavy harvesting of younger fish in 4VN where, as the hon. member should know, the Gulf stock migrates during the winter to grow. That is the reason why I did it.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands--Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. If the allocation of the cut for 1991 in 4VN is maintained in 1992, the Richmond Fisheries plant may be forced to close. It is the sole employer in Petit-de-Grat. The 375 workers facing lay-off deserve an explanation. Why were the guidelines changed to alter their lifestyle? Does the minister believe that the community is not worth saving?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, my record, as Minister of Fisheries, proves my determination to do a lot to save communities and the hon. member for Canso should know that. I did not hesitate to act.

He sould also mention that--and I would like the Liberal Party to be consistent on this--on the issue of northern cod fishing in Newfoundland, the representations made to me by representatives of his Party are to the effect that I should not touch, I repeat not touch at all, to the inshore fishery. As regards the Gulf area, the Liberal party may be less interested in that area, but nonetheless the inshore fishermen of that area are requesting equal treatment to that of their Newfoundland and Labrador counterparts.

That is why, instead of attributing the full reduction exclusively to deep-sea trawlermen or to inshore fishermen, I split it 50-50 between them so that the inshore fishermen could pursue thier traditional fishing in the Gulf area and have a life instead of vegetating.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about the possibility of a U.S. led military offensive against Iraq soon after January 15, leading to a war with devastating consequences.

Will the minister tell the House precisely what role Canadian troops will play in the event of such a military offensive, and will the minister assure the House that there will be absolutely no change in the role of Canadian troops without a full debate and vote—not consulting, as the minister said today, not advising, as the associate minister said yesterday, but a full debate and vote in this House? Will the minister give the House that assurance?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member has been following the debates that have taken place in this House on two separate occasions, the debates that have taken place in the United Nations since the aggression, since war was declared by Saddam Hussein on August 2 when they attacked Kuwait. I am not sure whether the hon. member has been following the answers that my colleagues and I have given to other members in the House.

The member from Regina should listen because I am sure this is of interest to him. He understands more than some of the other members of his caucus that Canada, supporting the United Nations since its foundation, now has an opportunity with other countries in the world, such as the U.S.S.R., Great Britain, Bangladesh, the United States and France, to bring about a more stable and peaceful world. That is what Canadian troops are doing at this time on behalf of the Canadian people, and that is what Canadian troops will do in the future on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister has refused to give the commitment to Canadians that we have asked for.

Yesterday the NATO foreign ministers, including Canada's foreign minister, appeared to endorse a move to war soon after January 15. We have the evidence of many experts, including the retired chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the United States, William Crowe, who said that if in fact the sanctions will work in 12 to 18 months instead of 6 months, the trade-off of avoiding war with its attendant sacrifices and uncertainties would, in his view, be worth it.

Given that evidence, what concrete steps is Canada taking to ensure that sanctions are given full time to work and that peaceful alternatives, including a regional international peace conference at the appropriate time, will in fact be implemented to avoid the tens of thousands of deaths that would result from a war? What leadership are we taking, as a country, to avoid war and to promote peace?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not met anyone in the House of Commons or anybody in my travels within the Persian Gulf region who wanted war. Every member of this House of Commons, every member of the Canadian Armed Forces, every member whom I have had the opportunity to speak to wants peace.

Canada has been working since the outset to bring about a peaceful solution. The hon. member should know because he travelled there. If sanctions are given time to work, does he believe that there will be any Kuwaiti nation left? He has heard and seen firsthand the torture, the absolute destruction of a country where men are shot on the street, where women are attacked and raped, where the whole of the national well-being of the Kuwaiti people is being destroyed.

Mr. Robinson: What about war?

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member says "What about war?". I bring to his attention what the NATO members said: "We firmly support Resolution 678 and all other relevant resolutions adopted by the Security Council and reiterate our hope that their implementation can be achieved by peaceful means".

HEALTH

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, for the past few days we have heard complaints about the presence of asbestos in federal buildings, and among those who made the complaints were several members of the NDP. However, a study conducted by a number of scientists has shown that the levels of airborne asbestos fibres are not dangerous and that the health risk is very low. All this is typical of the contradictory policies of the New Democrats who, ostensibly to protect the health of some people, are destroying the economy of regions in Canada that have contributed to our economy. That being said, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the government intends to change its policy on the controlled use of asbestos in government buildings.

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, regarding the circumstances on the Hill, as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I cannot respond to that. The Speaker would know that that lies within the Speaker's purview as well as departments that are participating, namely, Public Works and National Health and Welfare.

With respect to the controlled use of asbestos, we recognize that the product is useful, that it must be controlled and handled under a system of regulations for controlled use and, in fact, those regulations have been endorsed internationally, both by the World Health Organization and the international labour organizations.

TRADE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. A distinguished agricultural economist by the name of Dr. Clay Gilson spoke to a group of farmers in my riding. He stated with regard to agricultural trade that this winter will be a winter of tremendous uncertainty and frustration across western Canada, especially for young farmers. I would like to know if the Minister for International Trade can tell this House what his view is with respect to the GATT and what other areas of trade farmers in western Canada can find for their produce if they fail in Europe.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed pleasant to hear that somebody is interested in what is happening with respect to the GATT negotiations and is asking a rational question about it. The situation is that the Secretary General of the GATT, Mr. Dunkel, is now having consultations with some of the main players in the Uruguay Round of the trade negotiations. I met with Mrs. Hills yesterday and Mr. Katz, as I said earlier in the House.

We think there is a reasonable chance that some way through the agricultural impasse can be found, that there will be found to be some flexibility in the position of the Europe Economic Community and in those who, like us, support the Cairns Group and the United States position. Work is continuing to that end. On January 15, there will be a review, in Geneva, of what the present position is. We are going to do everything possible to see that a result is reached on agriculture which will certainly then make it possible for a conclusion to the Round, hopefully during January or February and before March 1, which appears to be the latest date that could be contemplated.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for Canada Post. On March 1, Canada Post proposes massive postal rate increases on newspaper mailings. Rates will skyrocket from as low as five cents per paper to as much as 51 cents, increases as high as 880 per cent. Given that 1991 subscriptions have already been sold, some small publishers stand to lose as much as $20,000. Will the minister intervene now and reverse this outrageous increase?

• (1500 )

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the weekly newspapers will still get the first 1,000 copies delivered free. In terms of the other publications policy, there was a policy on publications announced by my colleague, the Minister of Communications, wherein the subsidies that were provided will be more directly utilized by the Department of Communications to help Canadian publishers and be more specific, more targeted, in terms of benefiting Canadian publishers than the current program which represented a subsidy to everybody including foreign owned publishers.

The rate increases were published in The Canada Gazette. As of a couple of weeks ago I think there were 26 Canadians who expressed concern about those rate increases.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I believe the minister's facts are a little incorrect. When weekly newspapers have to mail outside the areas they are in, they are affected by these 880 per cent increases.

It is a triple unjustified Tory whammy on rural Canada: a 7 per cent GST increase on the written word, a 7 per cent GST increase on postal rates and postal rate increases of 880 per cent. These three initiatives are a vital attack on rural Canada. It is the same type of attack as the CBC.

Will the minister halt this senseless taxation and unfair postal rate increase?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the preamble by the hon. member was shrill, loud, inaccurate, and ridiculous.

The answer to his question is no.

CERTIFICATION OF PETITIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to have such an audience for my question of privilege, but I submitted a number of petitions two months ago, on October 17, having to do with the intention of the government, the Department of National Revenue, to charge parking fees to hundreds of workers at the Winnipeg Taxation Data Centre.

I have waited over two months now for the clerk of petitions to render a judgment on whether or not that petition is acceptable. I submit that that gets in the way of my ability to do my job as a member of Parliament representing those constituents who are concerned about that parking charge.

If the petition is to be judged unacceptable, then surely that judgment could have been made by now and I could have found other ways to bring it to the attention of the House. I have not been able to do that because I have been trying to respect the process, and the process has taken two months.

I feel that my ability to represent those people who are concerned about the parking charge and who object to this unfair charge being levied against them has been violated and has been made difficult.

I would hope that something could be done about it. There is no excuse for taking two months to make a judgment as to the acceptability of a petition so that I could then present it or, if I could not present it, find another way to represent their views.

Mr. Speaker: I will give the matter some consideration and report back.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a Ways and Means motion I wish to table. It will be of interest to those interested in the application of the GST to direct sellers, taxis, and the tourism industry.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table copies of a notice of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act and other legislation respecting the implementation of the goods and services tax, and I ask, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(2), that an Order of the Day be designated for the consideration of the said Ways and Means motion.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order of which I gave you notice during Question Period. I appreciate the comments you provided to me. However, I think it is important to raise it before the House since I believe the sub judice convention should only be used when it is proper to do so and not unfairly used to restrict debate in the House.

I want to quote from Beauchesne's first on the purpose of the sub judice convention to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself. Citation 336(1) of Beauchesne's goes on to state:

> The sub judice convention has been applied consistently in criminal cases.

However citation 337(1) states:

> No settled practice has been developed in relation to civil cases, as the convention has been applied in some cases but not in others.

Citation 337(2) states further:

> In civil cases the convention does not apply until the matter has reached the trial stage.

Of course, in this case the matter is beyond the initial hearing and the initial judgment and is now under appeal.

I also point to Citation 339 of Beauchesne's which reads:

> The Special Committee on the Rights and Immunities of Members recommended that the responsibility of the Speaker during the question period should be minimal as regards the sub judice convention, and that the responsibility should principally rest upon the Member who asks the question and the Minister to whom it is addressed.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I gave careful thought to my question and you were consulted in advance about the nature of the question that was intended to be put. Citation 339 further states:

> However, the Speaker should remain the final arbiter in the matter—

I am raising this question because I think it is quite important that the sub judice convention not be used unduly to restrict debate in the House or to restrict Question Period. I wonder if we could have your ruling on whether in fact this matter is sub judice in a way that limits questions and answers in the House.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West has asked a question, as I mentioned earlier today, with reference to some public reports which suggest that a judge in the Rafferty–Alameda case before being appointed to the bench and while practising law acted for certain clients who are interested in the results of the entire Rafferty–Alameda project. That information has been made public; it is in the public domain.

The hon. member, I know, has been concerned about not trespassing further than a member ought and did make some inquiries through her colleague of me yesterday.

I allowed the first question. The hon. Minister of Justice rose and said the matter is before the courts and she is declining to answer. Whether the Minister of Justice was invoking for her own particular purposes the sub judice rule, I do not know, but I want the hon. member to know that I was not invoking the sub judice rule.

I accept, certainly for the most part and under most circumstances, the quotations that the hon. member for Ottawa West has given me from Beauchesne's. There is a clear distinction of course in criminal matters and in civil matters.

I assure the hon. member and other hon. members that my concern the second time around was not directed to sub judice. My concern was whether or not the minister is in a position as a minister to deal with that particular issue, because it could be said to reflect on the minister's wish or otherwise to direct a case to one judge or another. I have had some time to reflect upon that, and I think that my decision in the first instance in allowing the question to stand was the correct one.

I want to assure the hon. member that my concerns were not turning on sub judice at all. It was turning on another matter which frankly had never come before me before. On reflection I think that the question was appropriate and the hon. member may want to pursue it, but it is also very clear that a minister does not have to answer a question. Whatever reasons the Minister of Justice might have in her own mind for not answering it is of course her own business. The minister does not have to answer whether it is sub judice or whether it is not.

In any event, I thank the hon. member for putting the question. I also appreciate very much the hon. member taking the effort to come to the Speaker beforehand onan issue which could be difficult, but I do want to assure her that I am not in this case applying the sub judice rule.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, just to clarify the situation, as I understand Your Honour's ruling, then, the question put that Your Honour said you thought might be out of order and did not allow the minister to answer was a proper question, and the minister could have answered the question had the minister chosen to do so.

I note the minister invoked the sub judice convention as the reason for refusing to answer the first time which she may or may not do, but as to the propriety on that Your Honour did not comment. Of course we object to the minister using the sub judice convention in that circumstance because we do not think it is a proper use.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. We have heard the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I hope I have made it very clear what my thinking is on the subject.

Remember, it is not for a Speaker to trespass with respect to a minister who chooses not to answer. As long as we understand that, I think we can close that off now.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, as I have given the Speaker notice, I rise to give notice of a question of privilege. The item of privilege arises out of a matter that came before the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General this morning. I believe it pertains to the rights and privileges of all members of the House of Commons.

Because of uncertainty at this time as to the agenda of the House and the agenda of that particular committee, I think it would best serve the needs of the House if my putting of the question of privilege be deferred until a time more appropriate after those uncertainties are cleared up. If that is acceptable to the Speaker, then I would proceed in that fashion.

Mr. Speaker: It may or may not be privilege. In any event, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member sent me a note on this.

I will take this as notice, which is not to indicate that I necessarily think it is privilege. It may well be that events will preclude any necessity to pursue the matter further.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the House took recess, the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley had the floor. Since the hon. member is absent, the Chair will now recognize a member from the other side of the House. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, a short while ago The Ottawa Citizen put very succinctly in 12 words what I think is the whole feeling with respect to Bill C-84 before the House today. It read very simply: "Selling Petro-Canada: wrong time, wrong reason, wrong price, wrong decision". We on this side of the House agree wholeheartedly with that statement.

We heard today, at second reading and in committee, what the sale of Petro-Canada would mean to Canada. We have heard very little about what is Petro-Canada. Let me just emphasize again what this great Canadian corporation really is. It has over 7,000 Canadians working in all of its areas. It has over 3,500 retail outlets where we in this country buy our gas and oil. It holds over 6.9 million hectares of land. It has a production capacity of over 22,000 cubic meters of oil a day and for crude oil and liquid reserves it has a reserve of over 92 billion cubic meters. It has natural gas production of 13.7 million cubic feet per day, and in those reserves in natural gas alone, almost 100 billion cubic meters.

In the year just ending, it had $94 million in profit. Its cash flow, expenditures and reserves, its cash end over its expenditures exceeded $600 million. Its revenue was $4.8 billion. It only has a long-term debt of $1 billion, compared to net assets of over $8.5 billion. Petro-Canada is not only a very healthy, vital company, it is a company that well deserves to stay with the original shareholders for whom it was founded, each and every citizen of this country of ours. Every Canadian should remain a shareholder of Petro-Canada.

Petro-Canada was conceived in 1973 and its genesis came because of the terrible problems we were having in this country to be self-sufficient in oil, particularly with the problems we were experiencing in the Middle East at that time. Those problems then subsided and the world market supply of crude oil and natural gas became constant again, until 1979 when we again experienced another crunch in the oil and gas industry with events in Iran of hostage taking and other events that led up to the problems of 1979-1980.

We now experience the severe problem with respect to the availability of crude oil in our country due to what is happening with Kuwait and Iraq and the world situation, particularly the Middle East.

While some may think these countries are far away from the national scene, every Canadian experiences the problem. It comes home immediately when they get their bill for heating their home every month, or they drive up to the pumps to fill up their cars with gasoline. We all know what the experience of Canadians has been in the last two or three months when gas bills for transportation are in excess of 25 per cent of what they used to be and we see what is happening to the cost of heating homes today.

It would be a tremendous expense to the average household in the country to be without transportation, without gasoline or fuel to heat our homes adequately in this climate of ours.

The mandate given to Petro-Canada when it was created in 1975 provided the Canadian people with the power and the will to exercise control where the country was most vulnerable. What we really tried to do in 1975 was to provide security of supply. Through the creation of Petro-Canada at that time, we wanted to ensure that Canada would always have the security of supply of the vital gas and oil that is so necessary in our country. That was the aim of Petro-Canada at the time; to make Canada independent of any other country in the world and to provide its gas and oil.

• (1520)

It was also created, as we heard from my colleague today, as a window on the industry. We know that the multinational companies which control the oil and gas companies in the world sometimes do not have pricing policies that reflect the needs of a community and of a nation. We thought and expected Petro-Canada to be a window to ensure that the pricing policies for a litre of gas, a gallon of gas or what it cost for a cubic foot of gas to heat our homes, would always reflect something that was tolerable and something with which all Canadians could live. That was another vital reason for the creation of PetroCan.

Another of its three fundamental mandates was to have Canadian control over those vital resources that we in this country need so badly, control over our gas and energy sources.

Those are the three mandates. We had five objectives with those mandates. Petro-Canada was to undertake to explore and develop new sources of energy; to carry out research and development projects relating to all types of fuel; to import, produce, transport, distribute, refine and market hydrocarbons; to produce and distribute and transport other types of fuel, not only for the time when PetroCan was formed in 1975, but for the future availability of whatever energy source we would find.

The fifth objective of PetroCan was to assist Canadian companies, companies other than PetroCan to go into joint ventures, to help finance and provide research funds so that we in this country could be self-sufficient in this vital area that is so necessary to our future economic viability.

In essence, Petro-Canada which was paid for by every Canadian, was intended to look after our national energy interests and the security of our economy in times of crisis as well as in good times. I suggest we failed to do this.

I remember with pride—and I am looking at my friend across the way—the introduction of Petro-Canada in 1975. There was a 2 cent per litre charge put on every litre of gas—

Mr. Epp: I know it because you raised it.

Mr. Comuzzi: It was put on to pay for the cost of acquiring this vital resource and to secure and ensure that we would always be self-reliant in energy in this country.

As taxation goes, it was not a popular tax, but it was something which I think we in western Canada, we in Thunder Bay, we in eastern Canada looked upon with pride because we knew we would never face again the dilemma that we faced in those years of not being able to properly supply our country and our citizens with the necessary ingredients to heat their homes or to run their automobiles.

Given our vast geography and our economy, Petro-Canada, like the CBC, VIA Rail, rural post and Air Canada, which are either in the process of being decimated or privatized by this government, are necessities in Canadian life. How else can we pretend that we can have a united nation without adequate national transportation services, without a strong national communication policy, without a strong federal presence, without the economic tools to shape our future, the ability to ensure that all regions in this country are treated equally, and in regions like I come from, such as northern Ontario, to ensure that the price of gasoline stays at least fairly comparable to those other areas in other parts of the country?

Instead of selling PetroCan, what this government should be doing is giving PetroCan a new national purpose, to find some of the 3.6 billion barrels of light crude oil that we know exist in western Canada, to give it the impetus to go out and explore, to take care of our offshore resources, to make sure that we do define our purpose again in Petro-Canada and to ensure that Canada does become self-sufficient in so far as energy is concerned.

The present Governor General, while he was a member of the cabinet and the predecessor of our present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said that the instruments available to the government, taxes and regulations, are not available or have already been expended or used to their limit. He said, "Retention of Petro-Canada, in some form, is so important and so vital to the future of this country." Unfortunately, this man is no longer part of the government of the day.

This government insists that 75 per cent of Petro-Canada remain in Canadian hands. But as a private corporation in an industry dominated by three mega-giants, two of them controlled by our friends in the United States, will this government have some difficulty in controlling what Petro-Canada will be all about?

If the government proceeds with its plan to privatize Petro-Canada, this vital natural resource-based company, the allegiance of the directors of PetroCan will be solely directed to the benefits of their shareholders and not to the benefit of all Canadians.

Canadians not only need a toehold in this vital industry, they need to be in this vital industry up to their knees. They have to have this overriding advantage as it exists today. PetroCan should continue to exist, with its shareholders being all Canadians.

At this particular period of time in our history, given what is happening in the Middle East, is this the time that we should be considering selling Petro-Canada? I have already listed its assets. It has almost a billion cubic feet of natural gas. It has 92 billion cubic metres of crude oil. All of those reserves are owned by this company and are still in the ground waiting to be harvested. Should we be considering selling PetroCan when these assets are increasing in value on a daily basis? Is it a wise business decision to sell PetroCan today? I say it is not.

Any business in this country whose assets are appreciating on the value as these assets are appreciating today should retain those assets and take advantage of them rather than sell them off at distress prices.

In 1984 this government changed PetroCan's mandate and allowed it to become commercial and operate in a commercial fashion rather than its public policy role. It was given the power to act in its own best interest by writing off assets and operating, in essence, like a private company. It immediately began to operate like a private company. It acquired 1,500 or so outlets immediately, laid off 1,000 people, and started to explore for oil outside of this country, which is far beyond the mandate that PetroCan was given when it was formed in 1975.

Now the government is saying that since Petro-Canada is operating like a private company it might as well become a private company and be privatized.

We believe that PetroCan should have its national objectives reinstated, especially in light of current national conflicts. The biggest losers in the privatization of PetroCan are the existing shareholders, every Canadian who invested in this magnificent, very strong company. The taxpayers of Canada have invested in PetroCan and they should not be short-changed now.

The taxpayer of this country has invested over $4 billion in this company. In the final analysis the shareholder of PetroCan is not given the vital vote, the vote to say whether or not we want to sell this company. The shareholders in any other corporation have the right to make that final vote, except this Crown corporation. They are being deprived of a fundamental right as shareholders of this company.

A privatized Petro-Canada will serve the interests of the shareholder only in search of profits and the search for profits may override all other considerations, including the need for the country to become self-sufficient, to continue energy-efficient ways, and to guarantee the security of supplies, not only for what we need today, but what we need in the future.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, and I draw this to the attention of my friends on the other side, that during the free trade debate one of the fundamental issues in the debate was the selling of Canada's energy to our friends in the United States. That was, and I think I can reiterate it fairly accurately, that we had to continue to sell whatever energy sources and supplies that we had in Canada consistent with what we had supplied to our friends in the United States before and at the same price at which we sold it to them before, regardless of what the price increase was in Canada. Given this agreement that we entered into on January 1, 1989, I am wondering what the wisdom now is of trying to sell this vital resource when we have already committed any future development in our energy policy to our friends in the United States.

The reason for the sale that we are given is that there is a need for a substantial amount of cash to be injected into the company. I think it is $500 million, or something like that. Just using this as a guideline, the value of the resources that this company has in the ground in the two to three months since the Iraq crisis developed has increased. The value of the resources that we have in the ground has increased more than the $500 million that is needed for this company to continue its exploratory work to develop more fields for natural gas and oil.

I do not think that that the fundamental reason for disposing of PetroCan holds water or has any logical consequence to it, given the fact of the increase in value of those reserves that we have in the ground today from the time that PetroCan became an issue, two or three months ago, when the government decided to sell off all of its reserves.

I know my time is drawing short. Let me close my speech by saying what I opened it with and that is the 12 words that best describe the current situation with respect to what PetroCan is all about today. It is a vital, Canadian, healthy, prosperous, energy-conservation company. It owns its assets on behalf of every Canadian in the country.

As The Ottawa Citizen said, to sell PetroCan today is selling this vital resource at the wrong time. This government is selling it for the wrong reason. It certainly is selling this company at the wrong price, given what we have just talked about, with the increase in the price of the reserves in the ground. It is the wrong decision to sell this Crown corporation today, to the detriment of all Canadians and to put our independence, as it relates to energy, at risk by disposing of this company.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us were moved by the depth of knowledge and the commitment of the last speaker to this particular issue.

In his opinion, does he feel that the government is in a mode of selling off only the Crown corporations which are making money for the people of Canada and contributing money to our fiscal system on behalf of all Canadians, corporations which have the potential for doing so in the future, particularly with rising energy prices in the case of Petro-Canada? Is the government just in the process of selling off the winners and keeping the losers for the people of Canada?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Willowdale for that question.

Let me start out by making an analogy of what we have just done in the privatization of Terminal 3 at Pearson International Airport. We all know that for the last several years Pearson International Airport made anywhere between $85 million and $105 million a year. That was money that went into the general levy of Canada as any other taxpayers' money would be placed.

Now, by privatizing and allowing private enterprise to go into Terminal 3, the government took that approximately $100 million profit and allowed a private investor to take $50 million to $60 million directly out of the general treasury and apply it to their own pay-off of Terminal 3 and other things that they would be doing.

That same situation applies with the sale of Petro-Canada to people other than the Canadian taxpayer. I have already gone through the tremendous resources owned by Petro-Canada and I will not go through them again. The government is selling off the resources and the profit of almost $100 million a year to Petro-Canada without any further expense to the Canadian taxpayer. By doing that, the government is depriving the general revenue fund in Canada of that $100 million a year in profits that Petro-Canada has been making for the last several years. It is going to private industry.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I, too, was very pleased to be in the House today when my hon. colleague, the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, was speaking on such an important bill as this.

The hon. member mentioned many important points in his concern over the sale of Petro-Canada, but there is one in particular that I wanted to zero in on. Members will recall that under the free trade agreement the Americans, our U.S. friends and cousins, recognized the importance of energy security in the world today as a very strategic commodity. They ensured that it was one of the main features in the free trade agreement that they would have secured energy for the residents of the United States of America.

When Petro-Canada was established, it was my understanding that one of the reasons for its establishment was that we wished to secure our energy in a world where the market is sometimes up and sometimes down.

Would the hon. member agree with me that under the sale—if this government goes ahead with this bill and sells Petro-Canada—that we are in almost a retrogressive mode, that we are slipping back, and that we are leaving ourselves wide open to a possible shortage of energy in the future?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for asking that question because it is something that perhaps I should have addressed in my initial remarks.

What it does in essence is this. We are going to sell to a private corporation. Petro-Canada will become Petro-Canada Incorporated or Petro-Canada Limited, and it will be owned by the shareholders who buy up the shares. It will be run by a board of directors. It will have its chief executive office such as General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, or any one of those other companies. Or, like Air Canada is today.

What will happen is simply this. It is going to sell its product as a private corporation to whoever will pay the most money for it. That is the essence of business, maximizing one's ability to sell at whatever profits one can. That will simply mean that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but—

[Translation]

Gentlemen, I am sorry but there seem to be two debates going on in the House. The Chair would appreciate your co-operation. You are making it very difficult for me to listen to the hon. member for Thunder-Bay—Nipigon. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu, on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Since there were two debates, Mr. Speaker, you should have given the floor to the more interesting one of the two. I am sure you would have enjoyed it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As an experienced parliamentarian, the hon. member ought to know this was not a point of order. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

• (1540 )

[English]

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, with all of that interception I almost forgot my friend's question.

Let me say that the new company is going to maximize its ability to sell and, if Canadians cannot come up with the price, then we are no longer self-sufficient in our energy requirements in the country. The very fact of us not being self-sufficient puts us in exactly, to use her words, a retrogressive position.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it seems incredible to me, at a time when the profits of this corporation can exceed perhaps 12 per cent of the equity, that the government would consider it sound fiscal management to sell off this company. After all, if it gets perhaps $1 billion for the shares sold, but could be making more than $120 million in terms of dividends, is it not better to keep the dividends and reduce our deficit and our debt that way than to sell it off? To me, with energy prices going up and the prospects for profit in this energy scarce world, this is just stupid fiscal management.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, one of the problems of course relates to the question of the 10 per cent ownership rule, that no one person can own more than 10 per cent of the shares of this company. In the past lawyers have found ways to circumvent these rules in terms of other takeovers. Would the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon care to comment on these two propositions?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for Willowdale for asking those two questions. Perhaps I should answer the second first inasmuch as I have always acquiesced to his being a much better lawyer than I. As he well knows, there are many ways to circumvent the 10 per cent rule in any corporation.

Let me give you an example that is before us today. Just over the weekend we heard about some financier on the west coast of the United States having bought something less than 9.8 per cent or 9.6 per cent of Chrysler Corporation. Now that does not sound like a great deal of ownership in this company. What it has done is that he will find himself on the board of directors and he will exert a lot of control. He has that corporation rather upset inasmuch as they have already had several meetings as reported in the business periodicals in this country.

So, 10 per cent ownership in one corporation by one individual can be a tremendous amount of ownership by one person considering that all of these assets, every one of these assets, are owned today by every Canadian in the country. Whatever this government does, we should retain every one of those assets that has anything to do with the production of energy in Canada. It should be maintained and held for the interest of every Canadian without necessity of going through a directors meeting or shareholders meeting. It is owned by every Canadian today and it should be retained by every Canadian today.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow my friend and colleague opposite, though we might disagree on some views on Petro-Canada. I appreciated his last comments that he felt that the shares should be held by the shareholder. I remind him that under the Financial Administration Act I hold that one share and I appreciate always the confidence that members opposite place in this minister.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the House on the third reading debate on Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada Public Participation Act. As we look at this bill today, there is obviously a difference of opinion between members opposite and the government regarding the thrust and purpose of this bill.

I would think that a number of my Liberal colleagues would see the wisdom of the need to have Petro-Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please!

I apologize for interrupting the hon. Minister.

[Translation]

I would appreciate the co-operation of hon. members, to avoid having several discussions going on at the same time in this House. I am sure I can depend on the kindness and courtesy of my hon. colleagues, and I am sure they will do what is necessary so that we can hear the minister's speech.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to my Liberal friends opposite that access to financial markets for a company such as Petro–Canada is of vital importance at this stage. There is only a limited access to those markets.

I was here in 1975 when Petro–Canada was formed. There were two reasons why it was formed, quite apart from the reasons my hon. friend cited in his address this afternoon.

First, there was the fear we had in the western world following what was referred to as the first oil shock of 1973–74. We in Canada did not have the line–ups at gasoline stations as neighbours to the south experienced, and there is a reason for that relating back to security of supply quite apart from Petro–Canada. Americans experienced that reality and Canadians did not, both before Petro–Canada was formed and after Petro–Canada was formed. So, in terms of Petro–Canada resolving or absolving us from that reality, quite frankly, that was not the issue.

The second issue was political. I think my friend and I have been in public life for some time, whether in Ottawa or back in our home communities. There was at that time also the need for the Liberal government, as we were debating Petro–Canada, to survive politically. I remember in 1972 when I came into this House there was a difference of two seats between the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. In fact, there were 23 votes for two seats. That was the difference at the time.

I remember the meetings that took place behind the curtain between the Liberal minority government of the day and the government in waiting of the day led primarily by my friend and colleague from Winnipeg North, now the honorary clerk sitting at the table, Mr. Knowles. One of the prices for survival at the time was the creation of Petro–Canada. It was born out of that period.

In fact, the controversy with Petro–Canada at that time was not that we needed Petro–Canada. I remember speaking to a couple of my Liberal colleagues at the time who were personally strongly opposed to the creation of Petro–Canada and felt that they were being held hostage by the NDP group in the House at the time who were holding the balance of power. That is the historical reality of when Petro–Canada was formed.

If one looks at the history of Petro–Canada primarily through the 1970s, Petro–Canada was steeped in controversy, not because of its existence, but because it was often operating in the oil markets. Although it was a public sector company, it operated both in terms of acquisitions and in terms of what was then referred to as state–to–state purchases in a very questionable manner.

• (1550 )

I just raised two for the hon. member's reflection. One was the purchase of Petrofina. To this day this government has paid a political price for the manner in which we handled Petrofina. When we came into office we had said that we would like to release the information on Petrofina only to discover that we could not release that information to the Auditor General because previous government and cabinet confidences could not be released. I regret that to this day because I think it was an unfair blemish on a company for which I now, as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, take responsibility. We have not resolved that Petrofina issue in the minds of the public to this day.

I think members opposite, as well as I, feel that our public duty is to give to the people this kind of public information, and we have not been able to do that. I regret that. I wish it could have been different.

Second, Petro–Canada did a state–to–state purchase once with Pemex in Mexico, the Mexican state–owned company. By the way, while they still have Pemex it is interesting to take a look at Mexico to see how that government is changing the role of Pemex in order that it, and Mexico, become more competitive in the oil and gas field. That is for another day.

What happened is that we lost a lot of money when we did that state–to–state purchase with Pemex. That is the oil business. My colleagues around me understand that. We take the highs and we take the lows. That is life, that is business. I understand that and I know my hon. friend opposite understands it. However, because Petro–Canada at that time was in the public arena, where the klieg lights of attention were very clearly focused on it, the question was: "Why did this company make that purchase? Was it because it was so government–directed that in fact it could not respond to the marketplace and protect the shareholders who are the taxpayers of Canada?" That is the history.

I say to my hon. friends opposite that Petro-Canada was considered to be an instrument of government policy. I accept that. However, as has also been stated, in 1985, under the direction of this government, we gave it a commercial mandate. The corporation's current structure and financial situation reflect its early mandate and the path of development which was established at the time.

I think it is important to note that Petro-Canada's future will depend to a great extent on its ability to access the financing needed to take advantage of the opportunities presented for commercial growth. I only see access to capital in a very limited way. Where has Petro-Canada's access to capital been? It is done by votes in this House. That is how it is done; by votes in this House where we ask the taxpayers of Canada to put more money into Petro-Canada. That is one way. That is the way it has been done to the present time.

Second, Petro-Canada can make a profit. This year it made a profit of approximately $86 million. I am pleased that under my stewardship the company is making a profit.

Mr. Peterson: Keep going, Jake. Keep going Jake.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Jim, he knows what he will do in the private sector.

Mr. Epp: I just know that when one looks at that profit picture, relative to capital used to make that profit, there is not one person in this House who would invest on that basis.

Mr. Peterson: So why do you expect Canadians to do it?

Mr. Epp: I will get to that, Jim, and I will want your money too.

That is the second way that we can get money for a company.

Third, we can access the financial market and place Petro-Canada against the test of the marketplace for investment.

In response to my friend from Willowdale, I believe Petro-Canada will be of the type where Canadians will invest in this company.

I have said another thing for a long time, whether I was in opposition or in government, about why foreign ownership in Canada is as high as it is and lower, for instance, in the United States. Maybe this is inappropriate for a cabinet minister, but I have wondered how we can change the tax laws so that blue collar workers, average Canadians, will be able to invest in Canadian industry on the same basis as other higher income Canadians. Why do average income Americans have such a higher percentage of investments in industry in the United States than Canadians have in Canada?

Granted, there are the personal pension plans as well as government pension plans. I understand that. When we consider why there is not more investment in Canadian industry and how Canadians can get a piece of ownership of the country, one of the arguments is to see how we change our tax laws so that average income Canadians make decisions on investments, take the risks and get the benefits of the marketplace. I think we have some lessons to learn in that respect. That is a valid observation when one takes a look at where we can increase ownership in our communities, by Canadians, in Canadian industry.

Going back to Petro-Canada and government policy, we obviously have relied more on competitive markets for decisions regarding energy supply, demand, pricing and trade. We consider that competitive prices provide the most appropriate and effective signals to both investors and consumers. Experience has proven to us as Canadians, that a market-oriented approach is better, both in economic terms and in terms of federal-provincial relations, than policies which emphasize heavy reliance upon regulation and government intervention.

My friend opposite made an interesting point. He said what we had to do was make sure that we had control of the oil and gas sector because it is "a strategic resource". I presume, partly because I come from Prairie Canada, that this is a very important issue for me.

When we joined Confederation there were only three provinces that were not deemed worthy of ownership of natural resources. One was my Province of Manitoba. When we joined in 1870 we were not deemed worthy. In fact, it is only this year that we have had ownership of resources for as long as we did not have ownership of our resources, 60 years.

When Alberta and Saskatchewan joined in 1905 they were placed under the same restriction as Manitoba had been since 1870. I am absolutely convinced, as I look at the National Energy Program, that it was not simply a visceral reaction that I had to the National Energy Program, it was also a reaction to the underlying philosophy that in certain areas of ownership, we the Prairie provinces were not going to act in the national interest.

I think that charge has never been substantiated and I think it is wrong in every one of its terms. We have always acted in the national interest. We have asked for that natural resource to be given the same kind of pricing mechanism, the same kind of market approach as any other commodity. That is what we asked for.

• (1600)

I remember the bumper stickers during the height of the National Energy Program. I do not have to repeat what they said. My colleagues opposite know what they were. Did it help federal–provincial relations? No. Did it help understanding between western Canadians and other Canadians? No. To this day we can still go into some parts of the country and they will remind us of that period. Surely we do not want to go back to that.

I remember in 1979—and maybe I should throw my notes away—the short period of time I was Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and responsible for energy north of 60. I wrote a letter to the then two governments of the territories telling them that as minister I expected them to act as if responsible government had been passed in law. It was known as the Epp letter. It still has not been rescinded to this day. Coming from the Prairies as I do, I had the feeling that people living north of 60 had the same ability to govern themselves as I thought we had south of 60.

I remember a predecessor, a former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, saying to me: "Jake, I think on the constitutional issue you are probably right, but remember on the matter of natural resources, particularly oil and gas, that those resources belong to Ontario". I said to him: "You mean Canada". He said: "No, no. It is our ace in the hole against the west". It is that bottom line that drives me also on this issue of Petro–Canada.

I say to my hon. friends with all the charity I have that it is more than simply a philosophical argument about privatizing a company or not privatizing a company. The real issue is: How do we develop our resources for the benefit of Canada? How do we increase those reserves?

Let us take a look at what our reserves increased after the National Energy Program. Do you know what was happening with our reserves, Mr. Speaker? Obviously there is not going to be cash flow. They will leave it in the ground. That was what was happening.

Today, my hon. friends mentioned the reserves we have in natural gas and oil. Despite the fact that in the western sedimentary basin we are losing according to my last statistics about 1.1 per cent, our production this last 12 months was less than we had projected. We know we have to increase our production in heavy oil. That is why Lloydminster. We know we have to get into the east coast. That is why Hibernia, Terra Nova, Ben Nevis, and hopefully Cohasset–Panuke this year. That is why we did the Vancouver Island pipeline. That is why we changed the energy policy in respect to the National Energy Board that we can get export licences and we can move gas, for instance, into the U.S. northeast, into California, or into the midwest through Emerson. That is why, as I get that cash flow I know I get more energy. That is what has always driven the industry.

I remember opening up Leduc I, not in 1947 but just this last year. It is a museum piece today. There was a gentleman there who had been on Leduc in 1947, a sod buster from Saskatchewan who knew nothing about the oil industry as a young roughneck on that rig in 1947. He knew something about drilling water. He said: "We did it. We brought in a new industry. We did it because we knew we could do it. We didn't need the government behind us, but we knew Canadians would support us".

Petro–Canada is mature enough today with its controls and conditions that I believe it should be privatized. Canadians should invest in it. Canadians should be proud of it. Most of all, through that investment Canadians will ensure their energy resources much more than if it is held in the hands of whatever the name of the energy minister of the day might be.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my friend on what he has just told us about his experience with respect to energy in Canada. Perhaps I could be allowed to make a comment. I am not so sure I have a question, but this is a period for comments and questions. What we have seen in reply to the statements which the energy minister and I have made today is a vital lesson in how this House operates. On both sides of the House the interests of Canadians are always paramount in our minds. Sometimes differences of opinion arise because we have a different methodology as to how we want to achieve the goal, but the goal is always the interests of Canadians. I compliment my friend, the minister, on his observations.

I have another comment to make. I do not know whether it is because the minister has many years on me, but he gave the history of 1975 when he was in this House, sitting on this side, as the Liberals were putting Petro–Canada into operation. I do not know whether he is that much older than I or whether I am just late in getting to the House. However, I am going to give him the benefit of the doubt and say that I was watching in those years as a citizen interested in government. He is a person who is involved in government. We come from the same age brackets, so I will not prolong that.

When the minister was talking about Petrofina the thought came to my mind that just at that time another government of the day, the Government of Ontario led by Premier Bill Davis, acquired Sun Oil. I am wondering if there was not at that particular period of time the same critique that was given with respect to the Liberal acquisition of Petrofina? Could it not have been applied to the Conservative government of the day in Ontario? Perhaps the minister would like to comment on that, with his wealth of knowledge in the historical energy perspective of this country.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is too kind in his words. As I have said before, one of my mentors in this House was a predecessor of his, the hon. Bob Andras. Bob and I were good friends. Obviously his contribution to the country was always something that I looked at, and the manner in which he conducted his responsibilities. He possibly did not get involved in the kind of high level partisanship that from time to time some of us might even decry in this House. If he wants to know the real reason why I had some difficulty criticizing him, it is that he had been in the automobile industry before and I had been as well. They say that fellows who have been selling cars always have a certain affinity afterwards.

Coming back directly to the hon. member's point, yes, there was similar criticism when the Ontario government of the day bought Sun Oil. In fact, if the hon. member goes back, there was also an investment, for example, into Suncor at that time, in the oil sands in northeastern Alberta. There has been some discussion when the federal government removed itself from OSLO. It did the engineering but said that it would not invest further in OSLO. There was some hope that the provincial Government of Ontario would possibly consider investing in OSLO.

It will be interesting to see whether the present Government of Ontario, which believes in public ownership and which I am sure has a lot of money to spend, might consider investing in OSLO. We will wait to see whether or not it will repeat the days of the Davis government in respect to investments in the oil and gas industry in Alberta.

• (1610 )

The other point I have to make is that Canadians were led to believe at the time Petro–Canada was formed that Petro–Canada would "keep the price of gasoline down". I think there was a sincere feeling among many Canadians that this would be the case.

At the time, we had the Seven Sisters and we have now moved to the Three Brothers. In fact Petro–Canada raised the price. The hon. member made that point. It was two cents to start with and it went to four cents a litre. Whether you bought gasoline at whatever service station you paid four cents a litre more, through all those years, for the acquisitions that Petro–Canada was making at the time. It is false that Petro–Canada lowered prices. Maybe the impression left was not correct, but it increased the prices.

The second point concerns pricing. When one looks at pricing today, I have the mechanisms as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, through the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, to do the very things that people thought Petro–Canada should have the ability to do. However, I believe it never had the wherewithal because it was in the marketplace, because it was trying to increase its market share, to be able to exercise that kind of discipline which the PMA is able to do. So, even on that score I do not think Petro–Canada fulfilled or could fulfil some of the roles that some people had expected or hoped it might do.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I was interested very much in the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I just wanted to share with him some of what I have been getting in letters not only from my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt but other places throughout Canada.

I think that people were not just looking at the perception that PetroCan would keep gas prices down, I think they had a real sense of pride in the fact that Canada was a major player in their own destiny, in their own retailing and refining of gasoline products. I think they saw PetroCan maybe getting into other areas, such as the recycling of oil, using the oil profits for research and alternate energy areas. There was this feeling, I think, when PetroCan came in that there was partial ownership instead of control of our oil destiny in the hands of large multinationals. There was a feeling that we as Canadians, as Canadian taxpayers, own this company, control it as Canadians, and that it was designed and directed to serve the best interests of Canadians.

Compliments to the minister if it is to his credit that credit is due that PetroCan is now making $86 million in profits, but people are asking why sell off a company that is working, that is making a profit, at a time in Canada when we are trying to find ways of fighting the deficit and the Canadian debt. Why sell off a profitable corporation that we, as Canadians, have been so proud of for such a short period of time. Why is the government selling this corporation now?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I will try and be brief.

The hon. member makes the point that yes, there were people who were very proud of Petro-Canada. I think they also were able to expand that in the manner in which they advertised when they used the "Share the Flame" concept.

The $86 million that I referred to in terms of profit, though very little relative to capital used, does not come anywhere close to the kind of expansion that Petro-Canada needs in the money markets. We need on the short side, if we are selling short, possibly $400 million minimum and possibly in the area of $500 million to $600 million. So the 86 comes far short, if the kind of mandate that Petro-Canada now has is to be exercised.

The hon. member makes a valid point, in terms of Canadian ownership. I tried to explain at least my own personal views in terms of investment. I would like to see average Canadians invest in Canadian industry and I would like, quite frankly, to see some changes in respect to tax law and the manner in which that might be done.

That is why the provision is in the bill that not more than 25 per cent of this company can be non-Canadian, in fact, it can be 100 per cent Canadian. Even if it was maxed out at 25 per cent non-Canadian, that would change Canadian ownership by about 1.6 per cent, subject to that the oil and gas industry in Canada would have no growth. If there is growth, that 1.6 per cent goes down. I think, in that respect, we have tried to protect as much as possible some of the very issues that the hon. member has mentioned. Where we part company is the value of public ownership versus private ownership.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Guilbeault)—Textile Industry; the hon. member for Halifax (Ms. Clancy)—Air Canada; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—Conventional forces in Europe agreement.

Just before lunch today, the hon. member for Nickel Belt proposed an amendment to the motion for third reading of Bill C-84. The Chair took the proposed amendment under advisement at that time. I am now prepared to rule on its acceptability.

The proposed amendment seeks to refer the bill back to a legislative committee and to instruct that committee to add a new clause to the bill which would specify that the bill come into force on a day five years after its adoption.

I will refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 804 which deals with the types of amendments that can be moved at third reading. It states that amendments:

—should not seek to give a mandatory Instruction to a committee.

As this is what the proposed amendment seeks to do, I must rule it out of order. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully this morning to the speech of the Minister of State for Privatization and listened with equal care to the remarks of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is very interesting that both ministers took us back in history to their recollections of what occurred when Petro–Canada came into being.

It is even more interesting because I held a public forum in my riding last Thursday on the subject of privatization and specifically the subject of Petro–Canada. The people in attendance at the public forum reflected with me on their historical recollections about how it was that Petro–Canada came into being.

At that time I was not fortunate enough to be a member of this House; I was more concerned then with getting through law school. As I recall the circumstances surrounding the creation of Petro–Canada, it was at a time when Canadians suddenly came to the immense realization that we did not control our natural resources. In fact, most of our natural resources, particularly the oil industry, were controlled by multinational corporations based in countries other than Canada.

At the same time as we came to that rather shocking revelation, we also had the first oil embargo by the Arab countries. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that that was the time when President Nixon of the United States promised that there would be complete autonomy in the United States with respect to energy. He lowered the speed limit to 55 miles per hour and did many other dramatic things. We, on this side of the border, were equally concerned that we would be held for ransom by foreign countries. My recollection as an ordinary Canadian was that those were the two factors that propelled us into forming Petro–Canada. I recall that one of the reasons we had the logo of Petro–Canada with its partial Canadian flag was so that we would feel we were doing something Canadian, something to benefit our country and that we were doing something to benefit ourselves every time we filled up at a Petro–Canada station.

• (1620)

I recall many of my friends and relatives saying: "Well, if I have to go to a Petro–Canada station instead of a Sunoco or a Texaco I will do so, because that is going to benefit my country. Every time I fill up I am making an investment for myself because I own Petro–Canada along with 26 million other Canadians who own shares, if you will, through the House of Commons and through the minister".

That is my historical recollection of how Petro–Canada came into being, why it came into being, and the public policies that it served.

I asked myself in considering Bill C–84 what the reasons are for wanting to privatize it now. Both the Minister of State for Privatization and the minister of energy quite clearly gave us two very specific reasons.

The first one is that in their view government ownership is no longer required to fulfil a public policy role. They were both charitable enough to admit that there are two sides, possibly even more to this debate, and that while the Conservative government holds a particular view, the opposition may, quite rightly, hold an opposite view.

I would like to remind this House of some of the reasons for the creation of Petro–Canada: nationalism, pride in Canada, a direct desire to control our energy industry, a direct desire to be free from the potential of being held to ransom by other countries. We created Petro–Canada which is 100 per cent owned by the people of this country. And what was the result of the creation of Petro–Canada? Well, I have tallied some results which I think are rather important.

Canadians contributed to the creation Petro–Canada. We heard the minister talk about the gas tax that was levied in order to help build Petro–Canada. In fact, over time Canadians have contributed $4.3 billion to this company and quite proudly for the most part.

This company now has assets of $6.8 billion. It has a current debt of $1.9 billion, not a bad ratio. It has net earnings in 1989 of $31 million, so the company is profitable. It has retail outlets totalling 3,295. It has four refineries. It employs 6,468 people across this country. It is the second largest integrated oil and gas company in Canada standing only behind Imperial Oil, which of course is controlled by Exxon, which is a foreign corporation. It is the only Canadian–owned enterprise operating coast to coast on a fully integrated basis within the petroleum industry. It has a retail market share of almost 20 per cent. It has the second highest oil reserves of any company in Canada and the second highest gas reserves of any company in Canada, according to Oilweek. It is first, not second, in Canadian net land ownings.

That is what I call a company, and that is what I call an investment by Canadians. In the short time that Petro–Canada has been with us we have had a major competitor in the oil industry. Unfortunately the Tories want to sell this very excellent enterprise out from under us. Why? Because they say it no longer fulfils a public policy role.

A little more history: the Conservatives have hated Petro–Canada virtually since its inception. The former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Joe Clark's personal crusade was to privatize Petro–Canada. Since 1984, when the Conservatives came to power, the government has ignored the public policy role that Petro–Canada could play. It is, of course, no wonder that seven years later, after having ignored the public policy role, it says it is no longer fulfilling the public policy role. The public policy role was not nurtured for seven years of Conservative rule.

I say on the contrary that Petro–Canada can and does fulfil the public policy role.

It is 100 per cent Canadian owned just as it was when it was created and for the very reasons for which it was created. It is a strong voice for all Canadians in the industry. It is profitable and well run. It does do things that the private sector would back out of.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources mentioned one of them. It has backed the Hibernia project in Newfoundland. As we know, private corporations were timid about backing the Hibernia project. So which company was it that was not timid? Which company looked at the public policy and decided that there was necessity for an oil industry on the east coast in Newfoundland? It was Petro–Canada, 100 per cent owned by Canadians, working for Canadians.

Petro–Canada helps to protect us from the vagaries of the marketplace. We are no longer completely subject to to what the oil Sheikhdoms will do.

In my view it provides a public policy buffer to the decisions which might be made by the private sector concerning our national interests.

Decisions with respect to operations of a company that are made in the national interests are more important than decisions made for corporate self–interest, which is profit, profit, profit. One of the reasons Petro–Canada was created was to ensure that if there ever was a conflict between the national interest of all Canadians and the market drive for profit, profit, profit, the national interest would prevail.

Here, I admit we are in the realm of speculation. What might happen if Petro–Canada is sold? We heard the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make the point that he wants Canadians to own a piece of Petro–Canada. He was lamenting the fact that certain tax rules do not permit blue collar workers the kind of access they might otherwise have. Well, the fact of the matter is that all blue collar workers, all white collar workers, all millionaires, all people on welfare, all Canadians already own Petro–Canada. To put it on the market and make us buy it again is the height of folly. We are selling something to ourselves that we already own. To me that does not make a lot of sense.

What is going to happen to the money that is being used to purchase these shares? If that money is being used to buy something we already own, it obviously cannot be used to invest in other markets and other businesses in the marketplace. Therefore, it is going to suck money out of the investment community. Where is that money going to come from if we need more money? Other businesses need that money and if it is not there because somebody has invested in Petro–Canada, where is it going to come from? Perhaps it will come from foreign ownership and we will have come completely full circle, back to a realization that we are not masters in our own home.

Privatization is certainly no guarantee of financial success. We need only look at Air Canada. The Minister of State for Privatization mentioned Air Canada this morning in his remarks. We know that Air Canada was privatized by this government. What have we seen since that privatization? Among other things, we have seen falling profits and the cutting of Air Canada's workforce. Is that what is going to happen with Petro–Canada? If not, its motive is going to be profit, profit, profit, to make sure that does not happen. When there is a conflict between perceived national interest and profit, it will be profit every time in the private sector.

• (1630)

Both ministers also suggested a second reason for privatizing Petro-Canada at this time. It needs money, or at least that is what the chairman of Petro-Canada says. It needs an infusion of capital of $500 million so that it can do some of the projects that it wishes to do.

What kind of projects? It wishes to continue exploration and development, the same kind of exploration and development that it has done since its inception, financed by the people of Canada. Why? Because the people of Canada own Petro-Canada. They have a piece of it already. In any event, it needs that $500 million.

The minister was quite right. Either it comes from the private sector, or it comes from the people of Canada through this House. That is a major philosophical difference between the two sides of the House as to where that money comes from. It does not make sense to me that we should sell ourselves something that we already own in order to get that $500 million. That is the same as saying that we should appropriate it through the House since we already own it, in my view.

I would say that careful and sound business management of this company, showing a profit, as the minister has said—and I applaud him for the fact that it shows a profit—will produce the same results in the long run. Certain things may have to be held off or financed in a creative way, but that is what we call business. That is why businessmen are employed to head companies such as this, to come up with the methods to do it. One of them is not to sell us back what we already own and to give up control of what we need, and that is control in the national interest of the second largest oil company in Canada.

As we have heard, the increases in world prices since the unfortunate events have unfolded in the Persian Gulf have also obviously increased the assets of the reserves, which we know are the second largest held by any company in Canada. Surely, there can be something done there at this time in order to creatively finance to come up with whatever moneys are needed for further capital investment.

I reflect the views I think of my constituents, based on the polling that I have done, the discussions I have had, the letters I have received, and the public forum that I held last Thursday, when I say, as a concerned Canadian, as a member of Parliament, as someone who looked at the history of the development of Petro-Canada from perhaps a different vantage point than someone who was in the House and saw what was going on behind the curtains, as he said—I just saw what was going on in the newspapers and television—this is not the time to sell Petro-Canada. Rather, this is the time to preserve and promote it as a unifying force benefiting all Canadians.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend mentioned a number of times that he feels that the government is selling us back what we already own. I find this a rather extraordinary thought. If I live in a house and I have an enormous mortgage on it, I do not frankly believe that I own that house. I believe that the bank owns it until I have paid for it.

The problem that I see with what he is suggesting is that we are in a situation where we have an enormous debt associated with the acquisition of Petro-Canada. In my view, we do not own anything. All we are doing in selling Petro-Canada is that we are getting this debt off the backs of Canadians.

I would appreciate if he could elaborate or explore this concept a little further and explain to me how he thinks we are buying something that we already own when we have such enormous debt associated with its acquisition.

Mr. Wappel: I thank the hon. member for his question. I think I can explain it using the analogy of the house, but first let us take a look.

What kind of a company do we have? We have a company with present assets of $6.8 billion and a debt of $1.9 billion. Simple mathematics show me that it has some value, in fact a great deal of value.

If we buy a house, pay into that mortgage, and develop an equity over a period of time, we may still have a mortgage and we may very well have paid in a lot of money by way of interest payments, but that property is still ours. The equity in the house is still ours. We still go around saying: "That is my home." We do not say that is Canada Permanent's house because it holds the first mortgage. We say: "That is our house. We own that house, subject to a mortgage."

We have invested $4.3 billion of our own money into building this company that has assets of $6.8 billion. Having invested that money, surely we are entitled over the course of time to reap the benefits of that investment? Apparently not. We are going to privatize it and then, if we wish to continue to have ownership, we will have to buy those shares individually in the marketplace. The people who do not have the income will not be able to buy the shares. Yet, right now, every single Canadian owns a piece of the action. No one will be able to say that when privatization takes place.

Sure, we have paid a lot of money in, but in the meantime, we have developed a company with significant assets. So we do, in fact, own it.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to ask this question of the minister and time did not allow it, so I will ask the question of my colleague from Scarborough West.

We know that the Crown corporation has had many involvements around the world. There are some that have been in countries where human rights violations have occurred. Canada, being a peace-loving country, has always been concerned. It certainly has been to me and to most members of this House. I believe in May a question was asked of the minister with regard to Petro-Canada International, which is the development arm of Petro-Canada.

It has withdrawn from a country called Myanmar because of its serious human rights violations there. Petro-Canada itself continues to operate a $22 million oil-drilling contract. There seems to be a contradiction there. The minister was asked about this and yet responded at that time that he had no intention of asking Petro-Canada to withdraw from Myanmar. Even as recently as September, the Secretary of State for External Affairs outlined his very deep concern for the human rights violations in that country.

I know that this is not a question that probably relates to the sale of Petro-Canada but, as the human rights critic for the opposition party, I am very concerned about this. Has the government asked Petro-Canada to suspend any development with any country that has proven human rights violations? Does the hon. member agree with me that if it has not, it certainly should?

Mr. Wappel: Well, Mr. Speaker, I very much regret the fact that my colleague for Nepean was not able to put that question to the minister after his speech, but perhaps he will have an opportunity to address it.

Yes, I agree that we should be looking at human rights violations and we should be encouraging corporations that are based in Canada to suspend business from those countries which grossly or, indeed, minorly abuse human rights. However, this is a perfect example of what I am talking about. If it is the Government of Canada's objective to promote human rights, what better way to promote it than through a corporation which is owned by the people of Canada and which can manifest the national interest including the preservation of human rights? What kind of control are we going to be able to have over Petro-Canada when it is in the private sector and decides to operate such a refinery in Myanmar?

If it was a corporation with one share held by the minister, as he pointed out, perhaps it would be more possible to attend a board meeting and explain to the board of directors that this is not in the national interests of Canada.

I thank my hon. friend for drawing it to my attention. It is just another reason why we should have control over this company and why it should not be privatized.

Mr. Johnson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It occurs to me that that question would certainly have been more appropriate if directed to the minister. I wonder if there would not be unanimous consent to allow the minister to answer it? I am sure the House would like to hear his answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1640 )

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will try to respect the time that the House has given to me to try to answer the question.

There is no doubt with Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation that when contracts are made at this stage, they are made directly with Petro-Canada. The budget is in the neighbourhood of $52 million a year. I may be out a bit, but it is in that area.

In Myanmar, there was a commercial agreement that was signed and under the auspices of the terms of that commercial agreement it was not seen to be possible to withdraw from that agreement. That is why the answers are in the manner in which I gave them.

It is the plan of the government presently to examine the role of Petro–Canada International and in a new regime, when Petro–Canada itself is privatized, it has been my position, as Minister of Energy, that I think it gave us an opportunity, along with CIDA, to get us involved in high technology areas in the developing world, other than simply food aid. I am not trying to deprecate food aid, but we also had a look at how could we expand the commercial interest of the countries involved. The decisions have not been finalized in Petro–Canada International.

What the hon. member raises is true, whether it is a Crown corporation, such as Petro–Canada, or a privatized Petro–Canada. In a number of countries we have commercial contracts for the purposes of advancing their oil and gas. Governments change. Coups take place, and human rights violations occur. The hon. member is absolutely right.

I find it difficult to see, once a commercial agreement has been signed, how we could then get out of that commercial agreement. The other point that is valid is, prior to those commercial agreements, what kind of evaluations we place into them as we make a decision as to whether or not to finance through Petro–Canada International any activity.

I am well aware of the situation. I am being somewhat cautious in this, but I point out to her, in looking at some work, for example, in a number of countries where we are involved in Latin America, that in a number of those countries human rights violations cases can be made and have been made by various international organizations. For us, however, as Canada, where we are trying to get involved more and more in Latin America, Petro–Canada International has been one of those vehicles.

The balance between the human rights issue and the other issues relating to influence and investment opportunities have to be balanced off, even though I think the hon. member made a valid point about the situation in Myanmar.

Mr. Lee: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Recognizing that the House will terminate debate very shortly, I rise on a matter involving an item unrelated to Bill C–84, but involving Private Members' Business. I understand that if I have the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion, which I have made known to all members by correspondence, that I may introduce it.

I would ask the Speaker if I do have unanimous consent of the House to introduce this Private Members' Business motion dealing with permitting the continuation of Private Members' Business through the sessional adjournment and prorogation which we anticipate will occur. Would the Speaker ask if I have the unanimous consent of the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to move his motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest who has one minute remaining.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, in the one minute I am pleased to stand again with regard to Bill C–84 and the privatization of Petro–Canada.

I think most people here in the House do not realize that when an oil company sells a barrel of oil or an mcs of gas, it has to replace it, and the cost of exploration, the cost of development and production is extremely expensive.

Petro–Canada is now in a financial bind where it needs money to expand and pursue an aggressive oil and gas investment activity. What we are doing here is really untying the apron strings or letting it out into the marketplace where it will be able to access funding and capital.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 4.45 o'clock p.m. pursuant to order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) on Tuesday, December 11, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of third reading of the bill.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved that Bill C–271, an act to amend the Criminal Code (facsimile advertising), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps some members think that today is the adjournment debate as opposed to some other point in time.

I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C–271, an act to amend the Criminal Code, facsimile advertising, commonly known as junk faxes.

The reason I presented this bill is to deal with an emerging problem within the business community and in other sections of society that are using facsimile machines in their places of work. The bill is very specific. It is an amendment to section 426 of the Criminal Code of Canada and it reads as follows:

> Everyone who sends to a person or organization through a telephone network an unrequested facsimile communication advertising for sale or goods any service is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and is liable to a fine not exceeding $200.

What I would like to do is lay out for members in the House some of the background to the problem of junk faxes. Fax machines are not new. They were around in the mid–1970s, very cumbersome, very expensive and out of the reach of most offices and certainly, very slow and very expensive to utilize.

However, since the new generation of faxes were introduced in the mid–1980s there has been an explosion. In 1986 there were only 100,000 such machines in Canada. By the end of 1989 that had grown to 210,000. By the end of this year, that number doubled again to 420,000, and it is estimated by Evans Research Corporation that by the end of 1993 there will be one million facsimile machines in operation in this country. That does not include the proliferation of what is called a fax board in micro computers. That is a computer component that you can plug into your computer that can list as many as 999 telephone numbers which you can utilize to send out an electronic facsimile message in one command.

A La Presse poll shows that 95 per cent of Montreal businesses had fax machines in November 1989 and of the remainder, half planned to buy a fax machine within six months. So it is definitely a growing situation, at least in terms of the machines.

Let me turn to the problem of the junk faxes. Fax advertising is a dream come true for advertisers who can force an unwilling audience to shoulder a substantial burden of their costs. All of us in this House get complaints about junk mail, about those advertising flyers that come to our mailbox unsolicited. Those flyers do not cost the recipient anything, other than aggravation and most times just go into the round filing cabinet. But in terms of junk faxes, anyone can send to you at your place of business or at your home if you have a fax there, a message offering for sale the good or service that particular company wants to sell and you have to pay the cost of printing that flyer. That is the difference.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business in their membership survey in October 1989, asked if there should be regulations protecting the public from advertising by businesses via fax machines. Eighty–one per cent of the respondants said yes; 10 per cent said no; 5 per cent were undecided and 4 per cent had no interest in the issue.

• (1720 )

The Canadian Radio–television and Telecommunications Commission believes it cannot deal with junk faxes because it has no authority over the content of what is carried on telephone lines. That is according to one of their information officers. Also, neither they nor Bell report hearing any complaints on unsolicited fax advertising. I will come back to that in a moment.

In the United States, two states have passed laws banning unsolicited faxes; Maryland and Connecticut. Lobbying, favouring and opposing the law was intense. The Maryland law provides for fines of up to $5,000 for repeat offenders, while the Connecticut law has fines of up to $500, or three months in jail. As well, a U.S. federal panel approved legislation to establish lists of telephone subscribers who do not wish to receive unsolicited messages.

I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that my particular bill calls for only a fine of up to $200 and does not include any kind of incarceration whatsoever.

There is also an environmental angle as opposed to the harassment and the cost angle. One basic tenet of environmentalism and the efficient use of resources is that those who use resources should be the ones to pay for them. Thus there is incentive to conserve and to use paper products more efficiently.

Unsolicited facsimile advertising shifts the cost of resource–use, paper, electricity and mechanical wear and tear, away from advertisers, reducing the incentive for efficiency.

Moreover, the end product, almost invariably destined for our overloaded waste disposal system, is chemically treated and cannot be recycled with technology currently in use in Canada.

There are at least two suggestions as to why this bill should not be considered and let me deal with them. The first is that limits on unsolicited fax mail violate free speech. Nobody can force someone to buy a book or newspaper that they do not want and yet this is not seen as a limit on free speech.

This is the one medium requiring the recipient to bear directly a major portion of the cost of advertising. Speaking of freedom and choices, there is no choice for the recipient when junk mail comes through the machine.

The second argument may be that this is a basic tool in modern advertising. Taking it away puts businesses at a competitive disadvantage. On the contrary, it puts them on that level playing field businesses find so attractive. Besides there are some things more important than competitive advantage. This is an issue of equality.

Let me go back to my bill for a moment because there are two key elements in it. One refers to "unrequested facsimile communication". Those of us who have fax machines have them for a reason, to send and receive information.

If we are in the business of communicating with others via fax, we do not want our machines tied up by an unsolicited fax message, selling us something or other, perhaps the menu at the local restaurant, unsolicited. Those machines are important business tools and should not be used frivolously.

The key part is the unrequested part. Manufacturers who wish to use facsimiles to inform customers of new products can make prior arrangements with those companies to receive fax messages dealing with the sale of goods or services. That is all that is required, a courtesy call to the potential recipient to see if they are willing to receive information via facsimile on new products that are available. I think in a lot of cases, people would say yes to selected suppliers.

The other part is the element that says, "advertising for sale any goods or service". That is very specific, very clear. It is not talking about faxing a letter to a minister dealing with a subject matter; not preventing faxing of a letter to a company requesting information, but specifically banning advertising for sale any goods or services.

I think the matter is worthy of study and implementation. I just want to make two final comments. One of the responsibilities of members of the House of Commons is to anticipate problems, to not wait until a problem has developed into an issue; to not wait until there are people pounding on our doors demanding some protection.

Our job is to anticipate, and where we have information to suggest that there is a change in society. We are in an ever–evolving society particularly when it comes to technology. We should anticipate problems and provide the administrators of our law with the tools in order to protect people who are being abused by what is currently legal activity.

I would urge my colleagues in the House of Commons to consider the positive aspects of this bill, to agree to support the motion and refer it to a legislative committee so that we can put on the books a law that protects the owners of facsimile machines from unsolicited junk mail being sent to them at the recipients' expense. I appreciate the opportunity to address my bill and I look forward to the comments of other hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and the members of the House, and I am sure that you will find that there is unanimous consent for this motion dealing with the adjournment of the House for the Christmas recess.

I move:

That, no later than five o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, December 19, 1990 the debate on Government Notice of Motion dated December 17, 1990 in the name of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, regarding winter adjournment, be deemed to have been completed and all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion will be put forthwith and without further debate, provided that each opposition party has had an opportunity to move an amendment or subamendment.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for considering the motion of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall I dispense with reading the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am of course speaking as a private member, as is my right in private members' hour.

Bill C-271 is an act to amend the Criminal Code. It makes it a crime to send advertising by means of a fax machine. It places it in the Criminal Code for the first time and, as I said, makes it a Criminal Code offence. When I heard about this bill this afternoon the first thing I said when I heard that somebody wanted to make it a crime to use a fax machine to sell something, I said, "I bet it is a member of the NDP who is sponsoring that bill", and I was right. I will tell you why I knew immediately that the NDP would be in favour of this.

Mr. Speaker, you show me any ill in society, you show me any nuisance in society, you show me any problem and I will show you a socialist who wants to make it a crime and wants to put it into the Criminal Code. I want to say to members of the NDP and the mover of this bill that you cannot solve all of the world's problems with the Criminal Code. We have to get away from the idea that the Criminal Code is a panacea for all the ills and nuisances that we find in society today. That is why I knew for sure that the NDP would be supporting and moving this bill.

I suggest to them that they look at this problem in its whole context, not take the simplistic view, the band-aid solution, and make it a crime but look at everything. Where in this bill is there any suggestion that we get provincial co-operation? Where is that? There is no reference to that. Where is there any reference for the kind of money that we are going to need to try to solve this problem? There is nothing here. This proposed legislation is completely bankrupt, all it talks about is using the power of the Criminal Code to fix this nuisance. I disagree with that. I say to members of the NDP, go to the root of this problem, go sit down with the people, find out why they have this urge to use facsimile machines for the purposes of advertising, spend some money on it.

An hon. member: It is money and greed.

• (1730 )

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member says that it is money and greed. If it is money and greed that has caused this problem, why do members of the NDP not advocate spending some money to correct the problem? Why do they not talk to some of their friends in the union movement? I bet they would be pretty interested to know about this. Maybe some of them are already aware. Get on the phone to Bob White and say: "Bob, we have a heck of a problem here in Ottawa. Today, people are using facsimile machines to sell greeting cards. Tomorrow it could be automobiles". Then Bob would be worried. The next thing we know, they will be wanting to sell North American cars by facsimile machine. I think they will get his attention then. That is all I can say to the members of the NDP.

The Criminal Code has been with us for 100 years. It can do many things. I say to the hon. member to exhaust every avenue, do everything possible to solve these problems before we resort to legislation.

This is a nuisance. Obviously I disagree with the bill, and I urge the House to turn thumbs down on the suggestion of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this private member's bill dealing with the paper burden and inconvenience that has arisen from the unauthorized use or the overuse of facsimile machines in Canada and perhaps around the world.

I commend the member on his initiative in taking note of a problem area in the business world, one where there have been many complaints. I think it is fair to say that there has been a great deal of waste of facsimile paper. However sympathetic I am to the problem, I see that there are two or three items in the bill that should be addressed here in the House before it continues to committee, if that is to take place.

The first item I would like to address is the issue of the burden of proof, if I may put it that way. This is a Criminal Code amendment. If passed, this will become a criminal law. What it actually requires, if there is to be a conviction, is that a prosecutor or complainant must show beyond a reasonable doubt what is basically a conceptual negative, because the wording refers to everyone who sends an unrequested facsimile communication.

When the prosecutor goes to charge and present the evidence, the prosecutor or the complainant must show that the facsimile was unrequested. It may be alleged in defence that the fax transmission was impliedly or specifically requested. That is a difficult thing for a prosecutor to prove. It is impossible to prove a negative. In most circumstances, at a minimum, it is very difficult and therefore procedurally the challenge on the prosecution to prove this negative should be addressed. There might be another way of stating the burden of proof within the section to preclude that problem.

Another one is that we are dealing with a machine, not a person. The bill suggests that a facsimile must be sent to a person or an organization through a fax machine. Yet, the whole focus of the offence is the receipt by a fax machine. That is a fairly innocuous event. Fax machines are made to receive communications.

It is actually similar to an unsolicited telephone communication. There are telephone solicitation techniques being used now where those doing the solicitation simply program into a computer a pre-recorded message. It runs through the phone bank and makes all the phone calls. The same thing could happen with a fax machine. It is an area that is not easy to address in the criminal law. The fact is that this is not a very good way of advertising. Perhaps if you are advertising fax paper it might be, but because these machines are very impersonal a lot of this stuff is simply trashed upon receipt. An item in this debate that was addressed earlier is that the receipt of this unsolicited material is an annoyance. It might be a waste of paper as well, but it is merely an annoyance. I do not believe it may be something we want to address with the Criminal Code provision. I suspect it is not significant enough that we must resort to the Criminal Code.

For that reason, if the matter is to go on to committee I really think that that issue should receive some scrutiny.

One thing that is not within the bill is a definition of a facsimile transmission. We have to recall, as the hon. member who introduced the bill pointed out, that times are moving quickly technologically and while his proposal to the House is very much in keeping with that, it is an appropriate, timely response to a perceived problem, and we have to always be prepared to do that in this House, I am not so sure that the technology will not pass up and we will have a new generation of communications on our doorstep in another few years.

Therefore, the reference in the bill to facsimile may quickly become outmoded. I recall the House passing an amendment to the Criminal Code dealing with arson a few months ago and we managed to purge from the Criminal Code phrases referring to grain store houses and ammunition arsenals, terms that are just not used any more. I think the committee, if it is to go to committee, must look at the way in which the member has addressed the technology here as facsimile transmission.

Finally, and I am sure the hon. member will agree, there is the possibility of a charter issue here, the issue of free speech. Freedom of expression may cause us to question whether or not we wish to put restrictions on a communications device where an individual could, in error or perhaps in that grey area where you are not sure of the exact intent, send an unrequested facsimile transmission and thereby conceptually impair his or her freedom of expression and freedom of speech.

Having said all of that and tried my very best not to poke so many holes in this that it would collapse under its own weight, I would like to express my general support for the bill in attempting to address this problem. I would be hopeful that the matter could be sent to committee for further study of the issues I have referred to and other issues that the House and other members will likely want to raise.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think if you check with the House you will find unanimous consent to consider that the hour for Private Members' Business will have expired on this one item and that we would move on to the two other items that we have for Private Members' Business at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceed to the consideration of Bill C–260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (with amendment) from the legislative committee.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington) moved that the bill be concurred.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Kempling moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation to the members of the House for allowing Bill C–260 to pass report stage and third reading at this time. ## PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak to a subject that is of particular interest to me, a subject I have already discussed in this House, and I am referring to the textile and clothing industries which are facing three major trade challenges.

First, they must adjust, efficiently and successfully, to the new Canada-U.S. trade system that has been in place since 1989. Second, they must adjust to the uncertain future of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement. And third, these industries will have to adjust to new changes in the tariff on textile products that will be introduced by the federal government to bring Canadian tariff levels more in line with those of our main trading partners.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I may recall that sales generated by the clothing and textile industry are worth respectively $8.5 billion and $5 billion annually in this country. We must also remember that these industries tend to be the most labour-intensive.

I may also recall that under the free trade agreement, Canada and the United States agreed to eliminate, over a ten-year period starting January 1, 1989, all tariffs and other restrictive measures applied at the border. Both countries will, however, apply their tariffs to imports from other countries.

The agreement contains four clauses relating to trade in textile products and clothing which are particularly important. First, rules of origin; second, tariff quotas; third, duty drawbacks; and fourth, duty remissions.

I may also recall that since 1974, trade in textiles and clothing has been regulated by the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles, better known as the Multi-Fibre Arrangement. Under the MFA, Canada has negotiated several bilateral agreements on quotas with certain countries in order to restrict imports of clothing and textile products.

This arrangement, which expires July 1, 1991, is currently the subject of multilateral trade negotiations under GATT. In connection with these multilateral trade negotiations, Canada and the United States have suggested terminating the MFA. Both countries are in favour of global quotas.

Furthermore, the European Economic Community and developing countries are anxious to see a gradual reduction in customs tariffs on textiles.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, on March 22 this year, the federal government announced a tariff rebate program to improve the competitive position of Canada's textile and clothing industries. The program consists of three parts: first, an immediate reduction in tariffs on 13 special fabrics and yarns not manufactured in Canada; second, new duty remission programs; and third, a textile tariff reduction program that would gradually bring these tariffs in line with levels set by other industrialized countries.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's tariff on textiles is substantially higher than in most other industrialized countries. The Canadian industry seems to be adjusting relatively well to free trade with the United States in the present circumstances. However, we must not forget that the exchange rate is still a major factor in maintaining our competitive position.

In fact, our industry will be able to compete with the U.S. as long as the Canadian dollar does not exceed U.S. $0.85 or U.S. $0.86.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, increased investment following the free trade talks reflected a desire to make the textile and clothing industries more competitive. It seems the textile industry stands to benefit more under free trade than the clothing industry.

In fact, the clothing industry is afraid that removal of the duty drawback program in 1994, together with the new double processing rule and low tariff quotas, will have a negative impact on future production.

In the textile industry, Canadian producers are afraid that as tariff barriers are lowered by importing countries, the American textile industry will act as a powerful magnet for future investment.

• (1750)

Others believe that the multilateral tariff reductions in the Uruguay round would not necessarily brighten export opportunities for clothes manufacturers since it might instead make it easier for Europeans to export their goods to this country.

Yet others fear that freer multilateral exchanges might reduce the Free Trade Agreement benefits for Canadian exporters competing on the American market with third world countries, for the United States might very well endorse multilateral tariff reductions. In that case, imports from low-wage countries would increase somewhat. This would lead to the implementation of certain quotas that have not been filled at this time. Now if we assume that lower textile tariffs resulting from the multilateral trade negotiations would be in addition to the tariff reduction proposed by the external trade Canadian tribunal, what might be in store for the textile and clothing industry?

As early as September 1986 at the beginning of the Uruguay round on multilateral trade negotiations, the ministers involved agreed to consider the possibility of integrating the textile and clothing sector under GATT.

Last November 16, a Journal of Commerce article entitled "Textile Management Fearful of Lopsided Agreement" reported that a group of eleven leaders representing seven professional associations and four American fibre, textile and clothing manufacturers wrote to special U.S. trade representative Carla Hills to warn her against the danger of endorsing an extremely lopsided agreement.

Here is how they put it: We simply cannot understand how the United States can be working with Hong Kong to find an acceptable formula with respect to fraud and regulation avoidance in the textile and clothing sector, when manufacturers in this country have participated in major fraudulent shipments.

Mr. Speaker, Europe and Portugal are also concerned that textiles might be adversely affected by a GATT agreement. By deleting the multifibre agreement, are we not removing the only true protection the textile and clothing industry has?

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his continued interest in the textile industry of which many companies are in his riding.

On March 22, 1988, the government announced a three-part program of tariff relief initiatives designed to meet the needs of both the Canadian textile and apparel industries and to strengthen their competitiveness.

The program included tariff reductions on certain specialty fabrics which came into effect in 1988 and 1989; new duty remission programs which came into effect on January 1, 1989; and a plan to reduce textile tariffs, over a 10 year period, to levels comparable to those of other industrialized countries.

On February 6, 1989, the Minister of Finance asked the CITT to provide the government with advice on its plan to reduce textile tariffs bearing in mind a number of factors, including the economic importance of the textile industry; the textile industry's ongoing efforts, through heavy investment and rationalization of production, to enhance its viability and adjust to the international trading environment; and the major changes which will be occurring in Canada's trading arrangements as a result of the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the Uruguay round.

In his request to the CITT, the Minister of Finance asked the tribunal to hear the views of all interested parties before determining the manner in which tariff reductions could best be implemented.

The CITT conducted a very open and transparent study. As the Minister of Finance has already noted in the House, several industry associations and close to 500 firms in the textile, clothing and other downstream industries participated in the year-long inquiry. More than 80 provided testimony during the six weeks of public hearings.

In addition to these representations, tribunal members visited more than 40 companies across the country to get a first-hand view of Canadian production operations and the challenges they face.

The CITT's inquiry gave interested parties every opportunity to make their views known. Since the CITT report was tabled in March of this year there has been ample time for industry to register its objections. The government has received additional comments from both the textile and apparel industries and officials have carefully considered them in their review of the CITT's recommendations. At the request of the textile and apparel industries, the Minister of Finance announced in July that the government's final response to the CITT recommendations will be made in the context of decisions to be taken in the current round of multilateral trade negotiations still under way.

I want to thank the hon. member again for his continued interest in this subject.

AIR CANADA

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when I rose in this House two weeks ago, I had hoped that somehow this government would be able to do something about another disaster that had befallen Atlantic Canadians.

The policies of this government have been less than kind to my region. The abandonment of the fisheries, the economic recession, taxes, taxes, and more taxes—coupled of course with the worst tax of all, the GST—rising unemployment, escalating bankruptcies, record receiverships and even more lay-offs.

When it seemed that nearly all the candles were out in the Atlantic region, the government's policies snuffed out yet more. Air Canada, this government's privatization wonder child, announced that two reservation centres will be closed at the cost of at least 150 jobs in the metropolitan area of Halifax. At that time I asked the Minister of Transport to use his considerable influence with Air Canada's board to revoke its decision to close Air Canada's reservation centre in both the city of Halifax and at the Halifax airport.

The minister replied by saying:

> —Air Canada is now a public corporation. The shares are widely held.
> I think the last thing in the world the shareholders of Air Canada want is the government telling it which reservation counters to keep open and which ones to close.

Mr. Speaker, we are seeing the results of this kind of policy. The government's sell-all mentality has reduced it to a mechanism which seems to only serve Canadians by raising taxes. This of course is a service that Canadians are not too fond of. This government has become little more than a taxation office.

This government has been unable to come forward with direction or vision. It failed with free trade. It has failed with constitutional reform. It failed with protecting women. It has failed with providing child care. It has failed with a toothless environmental plan. Now it has failed with the privatization policy.

Each and every one of these policies has led to the same thing, most particularly in my region of the country, unemployment and higher taxes.

There are Air Canada personnel in Halifax with 16 years experience who have been told that their seniority is marginal, after 16 years of service to an area. We know that the technology is available. We know that the phone calls could be made to anywhere from anywhere. Why do the jobs have to be in Toronto instead of in Halifax?

One of the things, and I heard this discussion in the Halifax airport not too long ago, has to do with the particular regional flavour in the Atlantic. As I heard one person say—and I will not attempt to reproduce the accent but if my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, or one of my colleagues from Newfoundland were here I think you could understand—that if people from their particular areas call up, sometimes an ear that does not come from the Atlantic may have some difficulty in comprehending that this person wants to fly from Gander to Deer Lake, or from Moncton to Charlottetown. They will not understand the particular sensitivities and situations of Atlantic Canadians and that a service that supposedly is set up to care for the public will become much less caring and much less a benefit to the people it is supposed to serve.

We have all had experiences good and bad with airlines. But I remember in particular assistance that I have received from the people in reservations at Air Canada. That is the number you call. I was bringing a sick relative home from a fairly long trip. I reached the Halifax office from my out-of-town departure point, told them what the problem was, said I had no idea how serious the illness was, and those Air Canada personnel handled the situation so that the person who was ill was treated with the greatest kindness. Everything possible was done to ensure her comfort and safety on her way home. Those people were there when we got to the airport, and to this day some of them still ask.

• (1800)

This is a service that rises out of the corporation's involvement in the community, the fact that those people know their clientele and their clientele knows them.

Suddenly, 150 of those people, the ones who have the most direct contact with the public, are being told to move to Toronto, take early retirement, or lose their job. It is unfair. It is not right and it is not something that we in the Atlantic region want to put up with any longer.

Perhaps I was being naive in asking the Minister of Transport to help. Perhaps I was being naive to think that this government cares to create a transportation policy that is meaningful to all regions of the country. Perhaps I am naive to believe that this government really has eyes to see, ears to hear, and a heart to feel the concerns of people who live outside the central core of this country. If it does not hear soon, the voices will be louder and louder, and they will be knocking on the very doors of this Chamber.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for again raising this important question. I am pleased to participate in this debate this evening.

The hon. member raises the issue of cuts in Air Canada's work force in Atlantic Canada. She suggests for some reason that the federal government should get involved in a matter that is the exclusive responsibility of a private sector corporation responsible to its shareholders. How does the hon. member expect the shareholders, management and the employees of Air Canada to respond to the federal government's interference in the day-to-day management of the corporation?

One of the fundamental reasons Air Canada and 15 other Crown corporations have been privatized by this government was so business and commercial decisions such as these could be made by the private sector without the meddling of government and political interference such as that suggested by the hon. member.

The hon. member has suggested that deregulation has been a failure and has impacted on air travel in Atlantic Canada in a negative way. Informed opinion would beg to differ from her. The National Transportation Agency recently reported that in 1989 aviation activity was 20 per cent higher in Atlantic Canada in terms of passengers and air carrier activity than it was in 1985 pre-deregulation. That means more choices for consumers, more options for air carriers, and more business for the transportation, hospitality, tourism and general business community in Atlantic Canada and throughout the country.

The hon. member will recall that the special parliamentary committee examining the Canada-U.S. air services agreement was in Halifax just two weeks ago. During those hearings the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission said that economic deregulation of the aviation industry had benefited the Atlantic region significantly.

The commission reported that deregulation has led to greater frequency of flights, better schedules, more fare options, and superior service with the type of aircraft that are better suited to the short haul nature of the regional market.

The commission told the committee that the Canadian airline industry was second to none in the world and that it wanted Canadian carriers to be able to decide what markets they wanted to serve without having to go back and forth to the government every time they wanted access to a new city in Atlantic Canada and throughout the domestic and Canadian-U.S. markets.

Joseph Randall of Air Nova told the special committee that his company has been tremendously successful under deregulation. He was most enthusiastic about the potential of his airline in a more liberalized Canada-U.S. environment.

Don MacInnes, the Minister of Transportation and Communications for the Government of Nova Scotia, told the committee that deregulation has led to excellent local service with the establishment of Halifax as a regional hub in Atlantic Canada.

The minister said that the limitations on air services between Canada and the United States are a major impediment to tourism and development, particularly the convention industry in Halifax.

The position of the Nova Scotia government is that the aviation industry supports economic development in the Atlantic region and that the better Canada-U.S. air services will benefit Halifax and the rest of the province.

This sentiment was also echoed by Nicholas Carlson, President of the Hotel Association of Metropolitan Halifax, who also urged the government to liberalize the Canada-U.S. air service in order to give a boost to the local tourism and hospitality industry.

So I say to the hon. member, listen to your constituents, listen to the informed voices of Halifax and Nova Scotia who say that the government and its deregulation has benefited Atlantic Canada and deregulation has led to better service, more fair options and more choices for consumers and carriers.

CONVENTIONAL FORCES IN EUROPE AGREEMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on November 19, NATO and the Warsaw Pact concluded an historic agreement to significantly reduce their military weapons in Europe and virtually end the cold war. Under the agreement signed on that day, 54,000 tanks, artillery, aircraft and helicopters on both sides will be destroyed or decommissioned. I must point out that most will be on the side of the Warsaw Pact but, nevertheless, it is a two-sided agreement and it is very significant.

Under that particular treaty it would limit each side to no more than 20,000 tanks, 20,000 artillery pieces, 30,000 armoured combat vehicles, 6,800 combat aircraft and 2,000 attack helicopters in Europe. That may sound like a lot but, as I said, it was a significant reduction in what has been there already for over 40 years, and this agreement brought about the end of the cold war.

As a result of that agreement on November 19, I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs asking him about the impact of this agreement on Canada's military and foreign policy and what plans the government was making for Canada's forces in Europe. Did it have in mind that it should adopt a new role in Europe or should those troops be brought home?

In answer to my question, the Associate Minister of Defence said that Canadian troops, for the most part, would not be affected by the agreement other than the reduction by 1,400 in the number of troops in Europe, but that a new role was possible and that was being studied.

At the same time, I asked the Minister about the 1987 White paper on Defence, a white paper that was drafted at the time of the cold war and was drafted with the cold war scenario in mind. I reminded the Minister that that white paper had never been withdrawn although parts of it, the very controversial part that proposed the acquisition of nuclear submarines for Canada, had been dropped.

My point was that if the defence white paper was developed at a time when the cold war was still under way and has never been withdrawn then it should be withdrawn and the government should come forward with a new white paper that would deal with the threats of today, with the realities of today.

Following that historic agreement, the countries of Europe and North America, the 34 states that make up the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe met in Paris to confirm those agreements and to officially put the cold war to rest and to examine new arrangements for security in Europe. The meeting of the CSCE in Paris was the launching of a new method of collective security and co-operation for all of Europe, including Canada and the United States.

About that conference, it has been said that it attempted to enunciate the principles for peace and prosperity with respect to the future of Europe. It was an attempt to put forward a dream of a European continent free of opposing military alliances, united from one end to the other by its commitment to democracy, economic co-operation and human rights.

In view of all of this, where does Canada stand with respect to the new realities in the world? How is our foreign policy going to change to adopt to this new reality and what about our defence policy? What about our Canadian forces? Where is the new defence white paper and how will it define the role of our defence and military forces with respect to these new challenges.

It appears to me that with respect to these matters the west has been too slow to move in relation to the east.

• (1810 )

President Gorbachev won the Nobel Prize last year for his initiatives and aggressiveness in putting on the table proposals for disarmament and peace. To give them credit, the West responded but sometimes responded too slowly.

Just this very week, we were working on a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs to consider the renewal of the NORAD agreement. The NORAD agreement is an air defence agreement for Canada and the United States against the Soviet Union. One might ask: Why do we need to continue that agreement in light of the historic agreements that were signed in Paris and Vienna in the month of November? We were debating whether it should be renewed for five years. That seemed ridiculous to many of us. We thought that if it was to be renewed, it should only be renewed for a short period of time in order to search for a new type of agreement with the United States to survey the air space of North America, but not a NORAD-type agreement.

One could say the same with respect to the conference to amend the partial test ban treaty which will take place in New York at the United Nations in January. If there is no more cold war, why do we continue to build nuclear weapons? Why do we continue to test nuclear weapons?

In conclusion, let me say that Canadians want answers to these questions. They want leadership in these very important matters of life and death with respect to weapons of mass destruction. They are fed up with more rhetoric and drift. I hope tonight the parliamentary secretary will give me some answers.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the subject of the Canadian commitment to Europe. I would like to begin by stating that Canada remains fully committed to collective security through the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Canada will continue to contribute to the alliance as long as the need exists.

There are many who would suggest that the time has come to move our forces out of Europe. As hon. members are aware, we recently announced that we would be reducing our presence in Europe by some 1,400 personnel as part of the over-all reduction in the numbers of the Canadian forces due to defence budget cuts announced in February 1990.

The decrease in the level of threat in Europe has allowed us this opportunity, and a number of our allies have made similar reductions. However, I wish to emphasize that this in no way affects the continuing commitment of Canada or any of our allies to NATO and to collective security in Europe. Any change in our existing commitments to NATO will be carried out in harmony with our allies and in support of the current arms control negotiations.

Canada welcomes the signing of the CFE Treaty. Canada will play an active role in verifying the CFE agreement. A Canadian military verification organization has been established to deal with all aspects of the treaty. This verification regime could well become the most enduring element of a CFE treaty and the cornerstone of a new European military security framework.

Regarding the need for a defence review that incorporates all the changes now taking place, let me emphasize that a defence review is a forward looking exercise that attempts to set out Canada's defence needs in the 1990s and beyond. The review, which we hope to have completed by the spring, will take account of current operations as they apply to the future of the Canadian forces in Canada and abroad.

Therefore I am certain all members of this House can appreciate that the sudden withdrawal of all allied troops from Europe would be disruptive to the cohesion of the NATO alliance. This cohesion is essential as we enter the next stages of arms negotiations and reductions. More important, however, there is much uncertainty in many European countries as they adopt new democratic models. A stable NATO alliance can help greatly in this delicate transition period.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemend to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.16 p.m.
