COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

STRIKING—PRESENTATION OF FIFTY-FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the Fifty-Fifth Report of the Striking Committee, in both official languages. This report concerns the membership of legislative committees and, pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), shall be deemed adopted upon presentation.

BILL C-82—PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-82, an Act to amend an Act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto, without amendments.

ENVIRONMENT—FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Environment.

I should report to members of the House that I believe the difficulties which have existed have been overcome and that we anticipate the minister appearing before the committee at four o'clock next Tuesday afternoon.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops who are well known environmentalists.

The petitioners point out the fact that the most environmentally friendly way of travel is by passenger rail. They as the government to reconsider the decision to curtail a number of VIA Rail routes and to invest in this environmentally friendly way of transportation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On an unrelated matter, Mr. Speaker, it is my honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition again on behalf of a number of British Columbians who oppose the government's goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that a recent referendum in the city of Vancouver found that 85 per cent of those participating in the referendum oppose the goods and services tax and are asking the government to listen to Canadians, respond to the wishes of Canadians, heed the concerns of the small business community, in particular, and back off the GST.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition in which residents of Val d'Or and Barraute, in the Abitibi area, call upon the Government of Canada to scrap the so-called Hill project that would spend $68 million on building an underground parking garage and shopping mall under the Parliament Buildings, and ask the government to recognize the need to preserve the site and historic character of the Parliament Buildings and Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, your petitioners also ask that members of Parliament continue to park outside in the spaces behind the Parliament Buildings, like factory workers do in this country, and they maintain that the Government of Canada has more important priorities than building an underground shopping mall on Parliament Hill.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I join with many colleagues on this side of the House to condemn the putting in place of the goods and services tax.

I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by Canadians from across Ontario and, more specifically, from my riding of Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold.

This ignoble bill is possibly going to be read into effect before the end of this year, but we as Canadians will be paying the price for it for many years to come. Once again we ask the government to reconsider and to kill this bill.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of rising in the House to present a petition on behalf of residents of Tahsis, British Columbia.

Virtually every resident of Tahsis has signed this petition, urging the government to reinstate the northern and isolated area tax benefits. Tahsis is a single industry community which is in desperate economic shape.

If the government were to provide the northern and isolated area tax benefits, it would be of immeasurable help.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the obligation or the duty this morning to table five petitions dealing with the government's intention of imposing a tax on all goods and services purchased by Canadians.

The people who have signed this petition claim that the government has increased the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent over the last six years, that it will now impose a 7 per cent tax on all goods and services which will be hidden, that the imposition of this goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians, and that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business.

I could go on, but I will just say that these people ask Parliament, plead with Parliament, pray that we do not proceed with this very bad tax.

The British had its poll tax, and we know what happened to Madam Thatcher. This government has its GST tax, and we know what is happening to this government.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition in which the undersigned residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically citizens from the town of Manitouwadge, respectively requesting the federal government to reject the task force report on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

If the report were adopted by this government, it would be another blow to the residents of Cochrane—Superior. The loss of $5 million in revenue to northerners would seriously impair the efforts of the people to improve the quality of life in their remote areas.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I have the honour and the privilege to submit seven petitions today pursuant to Standing Order 36, wherein the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax.

In their petition they make specific reference to the goods and services tax which is planned to be implemented with regard to books, particularly those petitioners in the province of Ontario as well as those elsewhere across this country.

Like the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I remind members of the House that Britain had the poll tax and we know what happened to Madam Thatcher. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if this GST goes through the same will occur in Canada as occurred in Britain.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present two petitions under Standing Order 36.

The first one is signed by a large number of Canadians from many different parts of the country, including British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, and Ontario. The petitioners join many other Canadians who have signed petitions calling for an end to low-level flight training in Canada. They support the Innu of Labrador and the Assembly of First Nations in that request. These people also ask Canada to redirect its NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal population to regain control of their lands and livelihood and to promote sustainable development for all Canadians.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, this petition which I have the honour to present was signed by virtually every resident of the community of Pine House in my constituency in northern Saskatchewan.

These petitioners, as well as millions of other Canadians, are calling on the government to reconsider its goods and services tax. They point out that this burden will fall heaviest on those who can least afford to pay, particularly those in northern areas of our country.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to submit petitions from the people of Saskatchewan who take exception to the fact that the GST will be applied to reading material.

They state, and correctly so, that books, magazines, and newspapers are free from tax in this country. Now the government is going to be subjecting these materials to the GST. Reading material has always been a foundation of the democratic process.

The petitioners move to reaffirm historic principles embodied in the tax free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate of the GST legislation and regulations as they apply to books, magazines and newspapers.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions containing some 300 names, the first of literally thousands. Residents in southwestern Ontario are demanding that the government ban the use of methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, a gasoline additive; the manganese part of which is an insidious neuro-toxic substance which attacks the brain cells, particularly in young children whose immune systems are not fully developed.

We ask the government to move immediately to ban this substance and replace it with environmentally friendly ethanol as an octane enhancer in the gasoline of Canada.

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to present a number of petitions. These petitions are signed by members of my family, relatives and some of my friends and neighbours from the village of Sarsfield, in Ontario, where I live. They are all unanimous in their opposition to the GST proposed by the Conservative government. They ask that the GST be withdrawn before the government loses its Prime Minister because of a tax measure, like what happened in England.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of tabling a petition in the House signed by numerous residents of the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who, like those put forward by my honourable and distinguished colleague, are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These people recite that the tax will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment. They and all other Canadians have more than enough of that already without the additional impositions that the goods and services tax will make on them. They call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and present petitions in the House of Commons. About 300 petitioners, over 200 of them from my city of Nepean and the city of Ottawa, the rest being from Oxbow, Shaunavon, and Silton all in Saskatchewan. They are protesting the imposition of the goods and services tax on books and reading.

This is the first time in Canada that this has ever been done. These petitioners call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): On November 19 Your Honour commented on the House order to the aboriginal affairs committee on the Oka matter.

The committee meeting last night would indicate that the committee, for whatever reason, is incapacitated and unable to deal expeditiously with the House order.

I wonder if Your Honour might ask the members of each party sitting on that committee to meet informally with the Speaker to explain how they intend to go about carrying out the wishes of this House.

I wonder if Your Honour might also review the minutes of that meeting to determine whether the expertise of your office and yourself might be of assistance in launching this very important inquiry, that really cost Canadian taxpayers $60 million and tied up one third of the Canadian army.

The matter is important for every member of this House. I know that Your Honour at this point might want to be appraised of the situation in a formal way and offer whatever service that might assist the committee to carry out the wishes of the House.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I had a brief note passed to me earlier this morning about the events of yesterday. I understand there are a series of motions that have been prepared by different members of the committee.

I also understand that there was a tendency on the part of the opposition yesterday, which perhaps could be characterized as a filibuster, so that they were only able to deal with one of the motions that was available to them.

There are some other motions that might settle the situation if members would talk a little less and get on with the job of voting. I think then we might very satisfactorily come to a resolution and get on with the inquiry. The opposition has to bear some of the responsibility for their decision to deal with their motions only, and not be willing to deal with motions presented by other members.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, a number of days ago I had the opportunity of talking about this issue privately with the Speaker for a few brief moments after the issue was raised in the House of Commons.

Might I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition brought forward by our colleague this morning is an important one. Although committees generally operate with their own mandate, it is not true of a special committee. A special committee operates quite otherwise and it can only operate on the premise that it is a creature of the House, and not that it has its own mandate under section 108 because it does not apply to those special committees.

Therefore, I think it is incumbent on the House to ensure that its directions are followed. Of course you, Sir, are the servant of this House and one on whom we count in order to ensure that those things happen.

I refer to Beauchesne's citation 621, as well as Standing Order 116 of this House to back up the claim that I am making. Perhaps the best way to ensure that the House order is followed would be for Mr. Speaker to have an informal meeting, which was mentioned by our colleague from the New Democratic Party. In this way we will not delay the House unduly this morning, or any other time for that matter and get the committee to do what the House has ordered because the committee does not have the choice to do anything otherwise. That is quite clear in both Beauchesne's citation 621 and the Standing Orders of our House.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am slightly confused by that presentation. At page 16 of last Wednesday's Hansard you will find a list of special committees. It does not include any committee dealing with Oka or any issue of native affairs.

We are dealing with a standing committee of the House, which has all of the powers that apply to standing committees according to our Standing Orders, plus a reference to that committee from the House.

It is a bit premature to conclude that anything about that standing committee as being different to any other committee. Any of the standing committees of the House can be charged by the House with a specific responsibility at any time. It is my understanding that they are taking the responsibility which was handed them—relating to the Oka situation—very seriously indeed. They are trying to develop an approach and a pattern that will be truly productive in terms of providing the House with good, solid advice for the future. That is what they are after.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we are anxious to get on with the business of the House.

I would like to emphasize what my hon. colleague raised earlier. No one is impugning motives. It is an important committee. The work is extremely important. There is $60 plus million of taxpayers' money and about one-third of the Canadian army involved in one way or another. It is a major issue to consider. It would appear for whatever set of reasons that the committee's work is not functioning as it ought.

Mr. Speaker, you mentioned, in your comments of November 19, on page 15393 of Hansard, that "I", meaning yourself, "of course assume, having said that, that the committee is working". The point being made this morning is that it would appear that the committee has ground to a halt and is unable to proceed. I do not think this is a major problem. I think it needs to have further discussion. We are asking, Mr. Speaker, if you could not facilitate that discussion to ensure that it takes place.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has been very patient in hearing the submissions. We know what the general procedural law is, and the strictures against the Speaker interfering where the Speaker ought not to be.

From what I hear there is disagreement in the committee as to a motion or certain motions that have been proposed. I also hear from the government side, as the hon. member for Calgary West has asserted, that the committee is dealing with the matter. It is not closed. The committee has not walked away from the House order of reference.

The better thing to do at the moment would be to continue the discussions within the committee and perhaps that will resolve the matter.

It is fair to say that the issue, which I think is accepted on all parts of the House, is an important issue. Members on both sides, I think, are in agreement that it is. It is also an issue which has been placed with the committee as a consequence of a consent order of this House. There does not seem to be any argument about the importance of this issue. There seems to be still some disagreement as to how to deal with it. I would hope that those disagreements could be worked out as soon as possible.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief.

I would like to remind the House that Standing Order 621, subsection (2) says very clearly:

> A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the Order of Reference.

This issue has been referred to that committee. The debates in committee as to whether or not the committee should follow the order of reference of the House is out of order. That debate itself should not, and cannot, take place in that committee and it is. That is the contention this morning, the fact that the committee is debating whether or not it should follow what we, as a House, have ordered. It does not and cannot have that mandate, according to our rules. That is the other point I wanted to make.

I refer to Beauchesne's 621, the fifth edition, in order to remind the House and the Speaker of that particular rule.

Mr. Hawkes: I think perhaps the deputy House leader on the other side misspoke himself slightly. There is no rule 621. In the latter part, he said it was a citation from Beauchesne's. In fact, we have only 159 rules, which some days seems like quite a lot, and others may be not quite enough.

The committee is trying to move through a series of motions to set their agenda and set the work pattern to meet the terms of reference of the House of Commons.

There was a motion yesterday which was defeated. There are other motions on the table that need to be discussed and then decided upon. Then they will be able to get on with their work. That is all we are dealing with.

• (1130 )

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has brought a matter to the Chair and to the Chamber. It is clear that there is some disagreement in the committee, but I have to accept the assertion of the hon. member for Calgary West that the committee is trying to deal with that matter. I think as long as that is going on, that is where the discussion here today should end.

I am mindful of the citations which the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has raised and the comments of the hon. member for Calgary West, but I am looking primarily at the comments raised by our colleague from British Columbia, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River. What he has in effect said—although it came as a point of privilege, it is more probably a point of order—is that he is asking the Chair if there is some way the Chair could help to facilitate the ongoing work of the committee. I think that is the very calm and reasoned way that the hon. member put the matter to the House.

It just might be that, because we have had this discussion, it might in itself help facilitate the working of the committee. The hon. member for Calgary West, who is the Whip for the government, seems to be of the view that the matter can be resolved. I think that at least for today that is where we should leave it.

I hope the hon. members can make the committee work, because, as I said before, it is seized of an order from this House, which was a consent order, and there was complete agreement in it. As both sides of the House have clearly indicated, it is a matter of very great concern to the House and to the country.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BILL C-80

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

That a Special Committee of the House of Commons be appointed to study the subject matter of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof;

That the said Special Committee shall have all the powers of a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order 108(1); and

That the said Special Committee be composed of eight members, to be recommended by the Striking Committee.

Mr. Waddell: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, and it is this. There is a motion by the government to refer Bill C-80, the proposed gun control legislation, to a committee for pre-study. There is also on the Order Paper Bill C-80 itself, as a government bill, for second reading, which is approval in principle.

On behalf of my party, I say to the minister we are prepared to put up one speaker on Bill C-80. We will deal with the real thing, the bill. I cannot speak for the Liberal Party, but I noticed before that the Liberal Party was prepared to proceed with the matter. We could proceed with the government bill, refer it to committee, and then any amendments or any witnesses can be heard in the committee.

I know the minister has committed herself. She said right after the massacre at the École Polytechnique in Montreal last December 6 that she was committed to improving gun control legislation in the country. The government did bring down a bill, which is this Bill C-80. I want to say to the minister on behalf of my party that we are prepared to deal with the bill. We can deal with it today and we can get it into committee so we can study the real bill in committee.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, there is total confusion in the government in regard to this very important and serious matter.

Members will recall that we have Bill C-80 which deals with the gun control legislation. We also have Motion No. 13 which dates back to June 20, 1990. I guess the government was getting cold feet at that time and wanted to refer the whole thing to a committee during the summer. It never proceeded with that motion, of course.

Now we have another motion tabled 48 hours ago which calls for a standing committee, or a committee with standing committee powers, composed of eight members. So, we have three items: a bill and two motions.

The Projected Order of Business today called for the bill to be called at 11 o'clock. That is second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof. We find now the government has changed its view and is going to call the motion.

We do not order Business of the House. The government does that. What we are trying to find out is exactly what is in the government's mind here. If it wants to debate a motion that sends the subject matter of gun control to a committee, because it cannot handle it, because its legislation is faulty, or because it cannot take the heat on the issue, then I think the House must know. If the government proceeds with the motion, then we will all know that what it is trying to do is pawn off the issue to a standing committee of the House.

However, it cannot call Motion No. 13 any more, Madam Speaker, if it calls this Motion No. 23 today. I hope it will give us an undertaking that it will not call the principle of this whole issue, that is Bill C-80. If it did that, we would have a committee looking at the subject matter and we would have the House of Commons looking at the principle of the bill.

I have a difficult situation here to resolve, Madam Speaker. If the government gives me the undertaking that it will not call the bill, then fine, it can proceed with the motion. However, if it is going to give the committee to be struck the object of the bill, that is the whole subject matter, to study if Motion No. 23 is adopted, then it cannot, in my view, have it both ways. It must give us an undertaking that its bill is dead. Therefore, it will not be called back to the House and it will be withdrawn.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I would just like to follow up on what my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam and the member for Ottawa—Vanier have said.

This is a very peculiar situation. As the member for Ottawa-Vanier said, the government brought forward a motion on June 20 to have a pre-study on this question of gun control. Then on June 26 it brought forward Bill C-80, the bill to deal with this question of gun control. It has been sitting without action until the present time.

Yesterday, the government brought forward a second motion where it wants to refer the matter to a special committee. The Order Paper this morning stated that we were going to be dealing with second reading of Bill C-80. Now, we are back to Motion No. 23.

The government wants to kill its own legislation. It wants to refer it to a special committee which will not be able to finish studying the bill, and have it printed and translated until well into the new year. It is not going to be able to bring forward the legislation before the government's own intention to prorogue the House.

This is absolutely unprecedented. It is absolutely unnecessary. It is incredible that the government would make such a botch of its own procedure and destroy what is basically a fair bill. It is perhaps not perfect, but it is a bill that can be amended at second reading and in committee, and one which the House wants to get on with.

As the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has said, we are prepared to give swift passage on second reading to get the bill to committee, so we can hear the views of all concerned, instead of delaying it and, as the government wants to do, killing it.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I have been a party to some of the discussions that have gone on in a second-hand way in terms of the justice committee and in a direct way in terms of House leaders' meetings.

I think it is wise for the House to recall the reality that cabinet moved very swiftly in the spring to present the House with a bill prior to the summer recess so that there could be input for all members of Parliament of all parties in all parts of the country as to whether or not the proposition was going to get the job done.

That, Madam Speaker, was accompanied by a motion to refer the subject matter of the bill, in a pre-study sense, to the justice committee so that that committee could have the resources, in terms of research and help from the House of Commons, to conduct in a more formal way that examination during the summer. That would have passed in a moment with the concurrence of all members of the House or even with the three parties. It was not forthcoming.

An hon. member: Don't let the facts get in your way. You never did before.

Mr. Hawkes: The government would have preferred to have that committee up and running during the summer, but there was no way to get concurrence.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, it would be useful to the Chair if hon. members would allow the Chair what is being said on the floor. That courtesy was given to my left, and I think it should be given to my right.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

There was a suggestion made at a steering committee of the justice committee, with representatives from all parties present, close to two weeks ago that the justice committee set up a subcommittee for the purpose of studying the subject matter of this bill so it could get on with the job of calling witnesses and making public presentation from knowledgeable people about what is right and what is wrong with this bill.

The opposition indicated that it felt that the workload of the justice committee was such—

An hon. member: That is not true.

Mr. Hawkes: —that it could not handle this assignment in this particular timeframe. Therefore, the government has created a new motion, Motion No. 23, which will set up a special committee of the House.

We will be able to identify eight members of the House who will make it a priority to get on with the business in a formal way of receiving public input from knowledgeable Canadians about what is right and what is wrong with this bill. We hope we can then get on with the process quickly—if we could come to a concurrence in this House—with a piece of legislation that will get the job done the way that Canadians want the job done.

All that is happening is that we keep getting blocked by the opposition.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hawkes: Every time we try to create action on this situation to get on with the protection of Canadian society, we get blocked by the opposition.

We could put it to a test this moment. I make an offer to the members on the other side that we simply accept, without debate or amendment, Motion No. 23 right this instant which sets up the special committee and we will get on with the job. We would then be in a position, if the opposition wanted, to debate for the balance of the day second reading on Bill C-80. Let us pass the motion without debate or amendment so that the action is in place and then get on with the issue of debate in terms of the bill.

There is a proposition that accomplishes what I believe Canadians want to accomplish. It is on the table, and all it takes is unanimous consent of this Chamber to adopt this motion right now. I would ask you, Madam Speaker, to ask for that unanimous consent.

Mr. Allmand: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. What total incompetence and disorganization.

First, we look at the Order Paper for today, Thursday, November 22, and the order listed is Bill C-80. When we arrive at the House, we then find we are asked to debate Motion No. 23, which is to refer the subject matter of Bill C-80 to a special committee.

Now, the House leader of the government is asking us to approve Motion No. 23 without debate, but he says we can debate Bill C-80 at second reading after that is done. I might ask, for what purpose, if we have already referred the subject matter to a special committee without debate. Does this mean that we are going to proceed with the debate on second reading of Bill C-80 and then have a vote?

The reason the government is not proceeding with the second reading of Bill C-80 is that it has now lost the political will to proceed with that bill. It knows it cannot even win a vote from its own caucus on the bill.

The minister went to the École Polytechnique in April where she received 25 boxes of petitions containing 500 names. She promised legislation before the end of May. We never got the bill until the end of June. Now, they are so confused over there, they do not know what the hell they are doing. They are incompetent and disorganized.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are now discussing the possibility of putting this motion to the House. I would not want us to get into debating the subject matter, talking about petitions being or not being written on the subject.

On the same point of order, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I raised the point of order and the government's acting House leader got up and made an offer.

I see the Minister of Justice sitting there, silent. I just say that I offered on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we would put the bill through today, in principle. That is second reading of the bill.

We have heard from the Liberal critic who offered the same thing. So we have a case of the opposition offering to put forward the gun control bill, and we have the government apparently filibustering its own bill.

The minister is sitting there, quiet and gutless. She has, in fact, lost control of her own bill to the gun control lobby. That is very tragic.

I see the member for Calgary West. I say to the government again that we are prepared to offer that we deal with second reading in principle of the bill, rather than this motion. The bill can go to committee and it can be studied in committee.

I think that is a pretty good offer. This will be the first time I have ever seen a government turn down an offer to pass its own legislation. Could we please hear the reply from the member, preferably from the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Russell MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I refer to what the deputy House leader has said about what is right and what is wrong. What is right is proceeding with second reading of Bill C-80. What is wrong is the way this government is managing its legislation.

I would like to correct the member who was not at the meeting of the Standing Committee of Justice and Solicitor General. He was not there. He misquoted a meeting he did not even attend.

The chairman proposed a pre-study Bill C-80. I would ask the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam to speak for himself, but as far as I was concerned there was not going to be any pre-study. There was not going to be anything but second reading on Bill C-80. If the government was to withdraw Bill C-80, then it would have to take responsibility for that. But under no circumstances was anything going to proceed except second reading of Bill C-80 as far as this party was concerned.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, if I may be helpful in this debate. I think that the message we want to convey to Canadians is that this is a most important issue with which this House wants to deal.

The government has already put, and the Clerk has already read the Order of the Day, for today. It is Motion No. 23. I would recommend to the government that it withdraw that motion at this time, give us notice that it will withdraw the motion and go to second reading of that bill. We will then co-operate with the government, but we need to have some direction from this government as to what it wants to do in terms of procedure. They propose: We will dispose. We cannot dispose of something when it is so flim-flam and so confused.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I do not understand the difficulty in terms of clarity. We are very clear. By calling Motion No. 23, we are setting up a special committee of the House with the powers of a standing committee, the investigatory powers, the budgetary underpinning and everything else to thoroughly investigate the issue of gun control.

What the opposition is asking for is the House to pass at second reading Bill C-80, which would restrict the legislative committee. The legislative committee does not have the mandate to look into the entire situation. It is bound by the principles inherent in Bill C-80 itself.

Mr. Gauthier: Are they good?

Mr. Hawkes: Those principles may be right or they may be wrong. Certainly members from all three parties are on both sides of that issue. Some believe the principles are correct. Some believe the principles are flawed.

Mr. Gauthier: Put it to a vote.

Mr. Hawkes: The only way, Madam Speaker, for this House to be satisfied about a good, solid recommendation for the future for gun control of this country is to have a committee with the powers of a standing committee, rather than a legislative committee so that the entire situation can be assessed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think I have heard all that is needed to be heard at this time.

Mr. Waddell: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order. Is it on the same point of order? I think we have heard all sides on this one. The government has called for Motion No. 23. The government has the right to do so. The only thing that the Chair can do right now is put the motion to the House and let us debate it.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, it is a further point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a further point of order. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

• (1150 )

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I understand what you are saying, but I want further clarification to end the point. The hon. member for Calgary West is now saying that the government wants to propose the motion to send the subject matter of gun control to the committee so there will be a broader look at the whole subject matter, rather than just the narrow look that he claims is contained in Bill C–80. This is the first time the hon. member has said this, so that is his position now.

My question then, and further to this point of order, is what then will happen to Bill C–80?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to answer, but my feeling is that the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is really now debating the motion which I am about to put to the House.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, what I find completely unacceptable is that the hon. member for Calgary West stood up and said that this bill had to go to a special committee and not a legislative committee. Under the rules of the House, when a bill passes second reading, it goes to a legislative committee. The hon. member is saying that a legislative committee is not suitable to deal with the government's own legislation which the government has brought before the House.

What the hon. member is doing is condemning his own proposed legislation, yet leaving the proposed legislation on the Order Paper. It is a complete mish–mash. This government is a disgrace. This government does not know what it is doing; it is against its own legislation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If we are to be into debate, I will recognize the minister. On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend leading off the debate on this motion. I wonder if I could put a question, through you, to the Minister of Justice. Since we are going to start on this rather creative course to deal with a very important matter, normally the government's first speaker would receive an immunity in terms of questions and comments. I want to ask my good friend, the Minister of Justice, whether she would agree to at least a 10–minute question and comment period at the end of her presentation.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, let us proceed with the normal course of events, unless we have unanimity in the Chamber to accept this motion. You have not asked whether there is unanimous consent to simply accept the motion and then move to second reading debate.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, may I plead with the minister to give us an occasion to ask her a few questions in this House. We have had a bill, before committee, pertaining to young offenders on which she has refused to appear to answer questions of members of Parliament. We are just asking her now: will she please answer questions dealing with this important proposed legislation on this very important subject matter? Ten minutes is not much.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, as I understand it, to depart from the normal rules of procedure would require the unanimous consent of the House. What the member for Kamloops should have asked for was the unanimous consent of the House to have a question period following the minister's speech. Had he asked for unanimous consent, I would have denied it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I guess that settles the argument.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to finally enter the debate on this motion. I look forward to the appropriate procedural opportunities to discuss this with members of the House at the committee hearings. I think that is the appropriate occasion to do that. What I want to do is to put on the record a number of propositions and discuss to some degree what it is I would like the committee to deal with.

I have been wanting to get this legislation into a committee since before we rose for the summer because, as members of this House and I think of the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and others who have served in this House for a very long time will know, this is probably one of the most contentious subject matters with which Parliament will ever deal. My colleagues, who go back to 1978 when the previous package of gun control legislation came before this House, have told me that it was, without question, the most contentious issue that the House ever dealt with and in terms of their own ridings whether people were for or against the legislation. It roused an enormous amount of public controversy and interest.

That is why, on our side of the House, there is not a disposition to have a very quick second reading debate because on all sides of the issue on this side of the House members want to—

Mr. Waddell: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I wonder if the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam could even consider in his wildest dreams offering the same kind of courtesy that he is regularly granted from me in the course of debate in this House. I am minister and he is my critic and I think we have a responsibility to try and debate the issues in this House—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to call the House to order. I am sure the hon. member for Port Moody-Coquitlam will eventually talk on this motion and he will want to be given the courtesy of speaking quietly. He will please allow the minister to do the same. The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is really interesting that what the hon. member calls shameless, or shameful and gutless, is in fact the essence of democracy because when we have issues in this society that are highly divisive, it is important to ensure that we move forward with support of the public and, more important, with the understanding of the public.

I have spent a lot of time since the tabling of Bill C-80 and even before talking to people in Canada who are concerned about the question of gun control, and listening to them. What we need is a process that will move this legislation ahead. I have been wanting to get into a committee, a public process, since before the bill was tabled, and certainly since the bill was tabled.

Mr. Waddell: You offered us a bill.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about offering a bill. The point is that the members on this side of the House regard this as one of the most important issues they will deal with and they want to have a full second reading debate. They all want to get their views on the principle of this bill on the record. It is not, in their view, a subject of legislation that should have a perfunctory nod of the head, go through a committee process, and come back for third reading when it is too late to discuss the philosophy of the bill. Third reading debate is generally a slow debate.

It is because of my respect for their concerns and my concern to move the legislation ahead and get it into a timely public process that this motion has come forward.

Mr. Waddell: You are killing the bill.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): We are not killing the bill, Madam Speaker.

So, Madam Speaker, I want to have the opportunity today to explain what it is I would like the committee to address. I think it is, as I say, one of the most important issues we will deal with in the House during this session, an issue absolutely fundamental to the question of public safety in this country.

I have met, as I say, with people across this country on the issue, not just the students at Ecole Polytechnique who, as the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce pointed out, did present me with their petition of 500,000 signatures. I might say about the students at Ecole Polytechnique that in attempting to make some kind of sense out of the tragedy which they experienced, it was very deeply moving to be there. My first career was as a university professor. There is something about being in the company of these young people, young students, who are the future of our country. I guess at my stage in life, I am touched by their youth, seeing them trying to make some kind of sense out of the tragedy they experienced. I was struck by the very sensible, pragmatic, reasoned way in which they tackled a very otherwise emotional issue, the extent to which they, in fact, met with people in Canadian society who are interested in using firearms for sporting and hunting purposes and how their recommendations to me were very much influenced by a sense of fairness and a recognition that in Canada there are people who use firearms in responsible, law-abiding ways. That is why their brief to me and their meeting with me was so helpful. They really did attempt to look at the broad issue of policy.

It is important that Canadians have an opportunity to discuss this issue and to have input into a parliamentary committee that will come back and recommend.

I am very confident about Bill C-80. I think that the committee process will reconfirm what we are attempting to do with Bill C-80, in fact the package that I have put forward because the package is more than just Bill C-80.

I also think it is terribly important that where we have contentious issues there be an opportunity for public participation. In this issue as in no others, I think there are people who want to have the opportunity to speak. I have been frustrated at the lack of a public process.

We may in fact complete second reading before the House rises. I think it is unlikely that we would have the opportunity to bring it back for third reading and a final disposition, which is why I do not want to delay any longer. The last time this subject matter was before this House, interestingly enough it was brought forward by one of my predecessors as member for Vancouver Centre, who at that time was the Liberal Minister of Justice, Mr. Ron Basford.

An hon. member: He lost his seat over it.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member says: "He lost his seat over it". It is a contentious issue.

I think Bill C-80 is an excellent one but, for those who will remember, the last time it was before this House it took 70 days to deal with that legislation after a quite extensive public process.

I want to get this legislation through in the most timely way possible, and that is why I do not want to wait for a long second reading debate to get it out in a public process. If we complete second reading on this before the House rises, that is fine.

My colleagues have advised me that they want to participate in second reading debate, but they are uncomfortable with a perfunctory second reading debate. It is too important an issue. If there ever was an issue on which the members of this House want to discuss the philosophy of legislation, want to have their views on the bill recorded, it is this one, and they will do so.

I welcome the opportunity, in the course of debating this motion, to outline for members of the House some of the elements in the government's bill to amend the Criminal Code gun control provisions and why I think it is so important to have these before the public for discussion.

I believe that the measures contained in this bill will significantly enhance the existing gun control system in Canada.

It is a very important occasion for me, and I would like to take the opportunity to thank my colleagues in this House for their valuable suggestions and contributions to the development of this package.

I might say that contrary to the assertions of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, first of all, after the very tragic events at École Polytechnique last December I was not in fact the Minister of Justice, so I did not make the comments that he attributed to me. However, the development of this package long predates that. My predecessor as Minister of Justice, after those tragic events, pulled the package back for a further review because he recognized that in light of those events it was perhaps important to make sure that the package was as responsive as possible.

When I was appointed Minister of Justice at the end of February, because this was to be my legislation I wanted to give it a thorough review as well and in fact made some changes to the package before it was brought forward. But the genesis of this package of legislative changes quite considerably predates the events at École Polytechnique. That is why, there having been a considerable amount of consultation and input by colleagues in this House, I am anxious to move forward in the most timely way.

The legislation has been improved by representations made by members of this House through the discussion that has surrounded private members' bills, by proposals of members, and by proposals made on behalf of constituents.

Madam Speaker, notwithstanding the unfortunate and tragic incident at the Université de Montréal last December, and the recent events at Akwesasne, Kahnewake and Kahnesatake, all of the evidence suggests that the current legislation has been effective in reducing the number of deaths and injuries from firearms in Canada since it was enacted in 1978.

I believe, however, that there is still room for improvement. The measures I have introduced will effectively combine with the existing law and address the very real concerns of all Canadians about public safety and the place of firearms in our society. Canadians are very concerned about violence and the misuse of firearms.

I am convinced that the combined effect of the enforcement of the existing law, the amendments I am proposing, and non-legislative measures such as the implementation of firearms safety education programs, will significantly reduce firearms incidents and increase public confidence in the law.

I challenge Canada's firearms community to assist us in building public confidence that firearms have a legitimate place in Canada and that they will be owned and used safely.

I know that all members of this House share my belief that Canada's firearms community is prepared to support a balanced program to encourage the responsible ownership and use of firearms and to protect the safety of all Canadians.

Public safety is everyone's responsibility and we must all work together to preserve it.

[English]

Bill C-80 is part of a larger package of proposed changes to Canada's gun control system. It is because of that larger package that the context of a special committee is appropriate to look at it, rather than a committee that is confined to the terms of the actual legislative draft.

Many of the existing elements of the system are based on regulatory measures or Order in Council powers based on legislative authority. Others are based strictly on statutory provisions. Bill C-80 will continue this two-track approach.

It makes a number of changes to the Criminal Code itself, but many significant changes will be made by regulations or Orders in Council based on either the existing law or the proposed amendments.

I have received a great many representations from firearms owners who feel that regulations or Orders in Council are an attempt to circumvent the normal review of Parliament.

As hon. members of this House will understand, the purpose of regulations and Orders in Council is to enable Parliament to delegate authority in areas where frequent or urgent changes may have to be made in a time frame that will not permit normal parliamentary scrutiny.

The provisions allowing the Governor in Council to designate prohibited and restricted weapons by order, for example, enable the government to respond quickly and effectively to new devices that come on to the world market. Using this power, it is possible to prohibit importation and possession before large numbers have entered the country.

Many of the provisions that cause members of the firearms community the greatest concern are actually proposed regulations for Order in Council provisions. As I suggested, it would perhaps be out of the framework of discussion of Bill C-80 itself because they are not in the bill itself.

This is because the provisions that deal with the status of specific firearms must do so in a very detailed and specific manner. Such language is not well suited to statutory provisions.

I must emphasize that there is no hidden agenda. It is not our intention to enact overly restrictive measures, either by Order in Council or by amending the statute itself. Nor is it our intention to bring in the various supplementary measures without giving Canada's firearms owners a fair and reasonable opportunity to review them and make their views known. I would point out that it has been very much the policy of this government to make our regulatory process as fair as possible to give ample prior warning to members of the Canadian public to allow their input. In this way we have in many ways revolutionized that process since 1984.

It is also important that there not be a blithe assumption on the part of Parliament of the wisdom of always giving the Governor in Council a blank cheque. The concerns raised by firearms owners about the use of regulatory power are interesting ones and force us to reconsider some of our what I call legislative reflexes. It is always the instinct of legislative drafters to attempt to give to the executive the broadest possible discretion. But where there are issues and subjects of legislation that are contentious, it may in fact be more appropriate for Parliament to be as explicit as possible in legislation in order that those who are affected by these regulations are confident and feel comfortable with them.

That is one of the issues that I would like the committee to look at: the extent to which perhaps some of the things that I am proposing to do by regulation could perhaps be incorporated in legislation. What we must do is not be arrogant about the use of the regulatory power of Orders in Council and listen genuinely to people who are of the concern that perhaps orders will be made without taking into account their views.

There is a perception in part of the country, for example, that gun control is an issue that is an urban–rural split and the fear that regulations will be made by urban people. I am not sure that is true. In fact it is my observation that there is an enormous effort made to be sensitive.

If further review by Parliament would give some sense of security and confidence to people who are affected by these regulations, then I would not want to make a strenuous argument on behalf of the right of the Governor in Council to make these regulations if it was not necessary. I would like to have a system in place that people are confident of and feel comfortable about.

That is a very appropriate subject for the special committee that we seek to have created by this motion to deal with, to look at the balance of how we use the very extraordinary powers that we have as government. I really hope to get some sensitive and well thought out advice from the committee on that subject.

For example, one of the most contentious proposals, the size limits for cartridge magazines, is not contained in the bill. It depends on the expansion of one of the existing Order in Council provisions made by the amendments. Once the necessary power is placed in the statute, Orders in Council must still be developed and evaluated before they are enacted.

The provision in Bill C–80 is the provision which would allow the Governor in Council to designate certain devices as prohibited weapons. The power already exists to designate weapons, in other words those that are self–contained. Devices would be those which are accessories or parts of a weapon, and high powered cartridge magazines are what we are looking at.

The proposal to prohibit or restrict specific types of military or paramilitary guns by Order in Council does not depend on the amendments at all. That statutory power is there now in the Criminal Code. The Governor in Council already has the power to enact such orders under existing legislation, provided that the firearms involved are not commonly used for hunting or sporting purposes in Canada.

I would like to reassure the legitimate gun owners of Canada that it is not our intention to use any of these powers to prohibit or confiscate large numbers of commonly used firearms. Every attempt will be made to keep the firearms community informed about proposed changes to the law and to obtain their views before changes take effect.

I might just mention with respect to my proposal concerning magazines and cartridges that we consulted broadly with the sporting and hunting community and were advised that our proposals for a limit of five for long guns and ten for handguns was appropriate.

I am now advised that there is another category of competition shooting where people use registered firearms. These are people who are working within the firearms system in Canada. They are known to the authorities. These are not people who are outside the law but who use firearms that have built-in magazines of perhaps 12 or 15 cartridge capacity. These are Brownings or Colt 45s, and there is a certain kind of competition shooting that uses that.

It is precisely to get the input of the firearms owning community into the proposals I put forward that I want this before the committee, a committee with the broadest possible mandate. Our desire is not to harass people who are doing perfectly lawful activities and, as I say, who have firearms.

Those who are registered and in the system have never traditionally been a problem in Canada, barring the concern we have that such firearms not be stolen. There are provisions in Bill C-80 to make more stringent requirements for storage and satisfying those storage capabilities for people who are private owners of restricted firearms as opposed to the gun sellers.

This is the kind of thing I would like to get input into. It has been a source of frustration for me that I have been doing consultation but I have not had a process in place, broadly based, and with the opportunity of advice from members of Parliament on how this should be done.

The measures contained in Bill C-80 itself will improve many aspects of Canada's gun control system. I believe they will reduce the accidental misuse of guns. They will help to keep firearms out of the hands of those who should not have them or who might use them for criminal purposes. They will encourage the responsible ownership and use of guns by all Canadians.

I believe that these measures, with strong support, will help alleviate the personal sense of fear and vulnerability that many people experience in today's society. One of the most poignant insights that was made in the brief to me by the students at École polytechnique was the notion that freedom from the stress of the presence of unregulated firearms or high powered firearms in society is a right of people. People have a right to live free of that kind of stress and pressure. That is why we have an obligation to put into place a system of firearms regulation that addresses that concern.

Madam Speaker, one major focus of the legislation is a number of measures intended to place effective limits on certain types of high firepower or military-type firearms.

High firepower military type guns were a concern before the Montreal shootings and concern has greatly increased since then. They have been used repeatedly and in many countries to commit terrible acts of mass murder.

Just last week a man armed with a Chinese version of the AK-47 assault rifle shot 16 people in a small town in New Zealand, killing 13 of them. The standard magazine for such a rifle holds 30 shots.

Our police officers and soldiers were confronted with a veritable arsenal of these weapons during the disputes at Kahnawake and Kahnesatake this summer.

Many Canadians have shown sympathy for some of the Mohawks' claims, Mr. Speaker, but the use of violence or military weapons to achieve them is another matter.

I share the view of all Canadians that the use of such weapons for any such purpose is totally unacceptable.

[English]

Earlier this year the Federation of Canadian Municipalities unanimously endorsed a resolution calling for the prohibition of military and paramilitary weapons, and I have received some 100 municipal resolutions and petitions demanding the same thing.

I have also met with representatives of the students, as I said, at the University of Montreal to receive their petition which included the signatures of over half a million Canadians.

I was impressed by the presentation, and all of us should share the concerns that effective action must be taken against high firepower guns in Canada.

Since Canada prohibited fully automatic firearms in 1978, there has been an increase in the traffic of fully automatics which has been altered to semi-automatic mode. These guns are dangerous because they have large ammunition capacities and military designs, and because they can be converted back to machine guns.

This bill will make fully automatic firearms that have been converted to semi-automatic prohibited weapons. They will also, I might add, make such conversion a criminal offence.

These firearms have been a source of growing concern, particularly over the last decade, and prohibiting them will put a stop to their importation into Canada.

The package includes a provision that would permit genuine gun collectors who already have these weapons to keep them, subject to strict limits on transfers. The RCMP will create a special registration category to track these guns and ensure that they are subject to effective controls.

The effect of these measures will be to place a ceiling on a number of these weapons and their owners in Canada. Eventually, as owners dispose of their guns, this number will be reduced and the guns will be taken out of circulation.

My colleague, the hon. Mr. Jelinek, who is responsible for Canada customs, has made it clear that these weapons will be stopped at the border, and he has already done so on the authority of several recent court cases involving the legal status of these guns.

I further intend to deal with other para-military or high firepower firearms, many of them semi-automatic, by developing criteria to distinguish between these guns and firearms commonly used for hunting or civilian sporting purposes in this country.

These distinctions would be developed to enable the government to declare specific types of firearms prohibited weapons or restricted weapons using Order in Council powers that are already contained in the Criminal Code. I believe that these standards will make it clear to everyone in Canada which types of firearms are acceptable in Canadian society and which are not. I believe that we can, and should, develop clear standards that will enable us to make this distinction.

A number of criteria have already been identified, and I hope to be in a position to begin preparing specific Orders in Council soon. I will also refer this matter and some proposed criteria to the new Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms for their consideration.

Dealing effectively with these firearms will give voice to the belief of Canadians that firearms which are exclusively designed for warfare have no socially acceptable purpose in this country.

[English]

The amendments will also permit the government to prohibit cartridge magazines that have unacceptably large capacities, if they can be used in semi-automatic firearms.

There are many semi-automatic firearms in Canada that have found legitimate use for both hunting and target shooting in the hands of responsible gun owners. It is the addition of a large capacity cartridge magazine to one of these guns that can transform it from a hunting rifle into an assault weapon, capable of the tragic mayhem seen in Montreal, Stockton California, Hungerford England, or just last week in New Zealand.

Clearly, some degree of restriction on this kind of firepower is called for, and the proposed size limits for cartridge magazines will allow the government to set up effective limits with a minimum of interference for those who have legitimate uses for the guns themselves.

A 30-shot magazine is not necessary for either hunting or target shooting.

At the time I introduced this bill, I proposed some specific limits for magazine capacities. As I have said, I had proposed limits of 10 shots for handgun magazines and five shots for centrefire semi-automatic rifles and shotguns.

Since that time, I have received a number of representations from members of the firearms community suggesting that there may be legitimate uses for a few types of magazines that exceed the limits I had proposed.

I am willing to listen to suggestions for change, and I am aware of the need for some degree of flexibility in preparing these restrictions.

Indeed, Madam Speaker, that is one reason for using Orders in Council to set the limits instead of the amendments themselves.

• (1220 )

I anticipate that the committee hearings into the bill will consider this matter in some detail and will receive input from those who have interest in the outcome. That is why I am very much looking forward to receiving the committee report.

The bill also contains measures that will make it possible to tighten the process for screening firearms owners.

[English]

Canadians who wish to obtain guns must first have a firearms acquisition certificate, or FAC. Several of the new measures will take concrete action to improve the screening of those who want to obtain these certificates.

The new stricter screening measures will require a minimum 28-day waiting period before the issuance of the FAC. It will require applicants to provide the names of two references who can furnish information to local firearms officers. It will require the new FAC document to include a photograph of the holder to prevent use by unauthorized persons.

I am also convinced of the need to encourage a high standard for the responsible ownership and safe use of firearms. Therefore, I intend, with provincial co-operation, to make it mandatory for all FAC applicants to pass a firearms safety course or test. These courses are already provided for in the Criminal Code, but were never proclaimed in force. They were part of a package of amendments introduced in 1978.

I am now prepared to take immediate initiative to remove the obstacles that prevented them from being implemented sooner.

[Translation]

The implementation of this measure will extend the scope of these programs to all parts of Canada and to all classes of firearms owners and users, and we are prepared to work with the provinces in launching them.

We are also prepared to contribute to the important development and start-up costs for this project.

[English]

We are also prepared to contribute to the important development and start-up costs for this project, as I said. We will be developing national standards and curricula for the programs that ensure knowledge of the law, the responsibilities of firearms ownership and safe practices for using and storing guns.

I also want to ensure that the new measures will be as close to self-financing as possible. The current FAC fee has been unchanged since the law was last amended in 1978, and falls far below the actual costs incurred by even the current screening process. The amendments will place the authority to set the future of FAC fees in regulatory provisions.

We do not believe that high costs should be used to deter legitimate gun owners, but we are committed to maintaining cost recovery in the future. This will permit further adjustments without amending the Criminal Code.

The new FAC fee will be set at $50 for a certificate that is valid for five years. This should bring the new programs close to complete cost recovery by the end of the initial five year period.

I believe that it is important to involve all interested Canadians in developing a more effective firearms control program. For this reason, I am establishing the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms to draw together a broad range of expertise and interest in the field of firearms and gun control, and to represent the widest possible range of views.

I have been receiving nominations for this body throughout the summer and I expect to be able to announce a number of appointments in the very near future. This new advisory council will give Canadians with many perspectives on the role of firearms in society a real voice in the development of new gun control laws and policies.

The council will be asked to consider some of the most difficult issues raised by the screening of gun owners and the guns themselves. They will be asked, for example, to consider the role of medical or psychiatric information in the FAC screening process. We need to know whether it is possible to identify persons such as Marc Lépine beforehand. We also need to know what sort of information to look for.

There are also difficult questions of confidentiality and access to information that must be addressed. Is the safety of the public better protected by preserving the confidentiality of psychiatric treatment, or by ensuring that information is disclosed to the police.

The advisory council will also be asked, first of all, to consider the questions relating to the use of safety training programs for FAC applicants. What should be taught? Who should teach it? Should the same thing be taught to all applicants or should the subject matter reflect the use for which the person wants the gun?

Perhaps the most valuable role of the council, Madam Speaker, is that it will serve to bring Canadians with a wide range of views on firearms together into a single forum. This will ensure that issues are considered fairly and thoroughly, and that the interests of all Canadians are taken into account in the development of new policies.

I want to just emphasize again that the first mandate of the committee will be to bring to me a blueprint for the implementation of the training provisions that have been in the Criminal Code since 1978. I am sure that members of the previous government will recognize that it is a complex matter to implement these provisions and will require a considerable amount of federal–provincial co–operation.

I believe that bringing those training provisions into place will be a very important part of creating a climate of public trust. Those very many Canadians, who are uncomfortable with the presence of firearms in our society, will have the confidence of knowing that those who purchase firearms in Canada have satisfied a requirement of competence and training, and that they have been vetted much more carefully by those who issue the firearms purchasing authorization.

As I said, I would like the committee to look into even a more stringent form of vetting. We have discussed this before. I do not want to hold up the legislation pending a resolution to that issue because I think it is more complex and raises, as I have said before, some interesting privacy and charter considerations.

I have spoken to the House about changes to two of the three major elements of Canada's gun control system: the screening of those who own guns and restrictions on the guns themselves.

The third element is the use of offences and sentences to deter the criminal misuse of guns. I have heard the views of many Canadians, especially members of Canada law–abiding, responsible firearms community, on the question of deterrence. They are of the view that responsible citizens are being asked to pay the price of maintaining public safety while criminals go unpunished. They are concerned that too much emphasis is placed on crime prevention and not enough on deterrence or punishment.

I believe that the present Criminal Code measures provide for adequate deterrence and punishment, but I share the concerns that these provisions are not always applied as perhaps they should be. As the hon. members of this House will understand, criminal law enforcement, prosecution and sentencing for firearms offences are matters left with the provincial authorities and the judiciary under the Criminal Code.

I will, on behalf of the Government of Canada, undertake to urge my provincial counterparts to do everything in their power to ensure that firearms charges are laid in appropriate circumstances, that they are prosecuted vigorously and that appropriate sentences are sought.

I further intend to make every effort to inform Canadians about the changes in the law and the role of our existing gun control system. Steps will be taken to make this information as available as possible, especially to firearms owners and users.

A communications, public legal education, and information package will be assembled and disseminated over the coming months, leading up to the implementation of the new measures.

I am also discussing with my provincial counterparts the options for a general firearms amnesty program that would coincide with the proclamation of the new measures.

[English]

This would be intended to encourage Canadians to dispose of unwanted guns safely, to register handguns and other restricted firearms and to allow those who have guns that may be affected by the new changes to clarify their status without fear of prosecution.

I hope to be in a position to announce the details of this amnesty program in the very near future.

Madam Speaker, I hear grumbling from the other side of the House. There is a legislative basis in Bill C–80 to provide for an amnesty for that new category of firearms which is being designated as prohibited weapons. I hate to think that the hon. member would actually listen to what I am saying to get a clarification. These will be designated as prohibited weapons under Bill C–80, but in terms of a broader amnesty, lack the statutory authority. That may be a recommendation of the special committee, that such an authority be put in the Criminal Code on a general basis.

As I have indicated previously, such amnesties can be put in place any time by provincial or local authorities. They very much depend upon the ability of those authorities to deal with the logistics of such an amnesty; in other words, to have the person power available to administer the program and have the storage facilities to store safely what may be an unanticipated quantity, or find it difficult to determine in advance firearms that may be turned in by the public.

I would like, in terms of the amnesty that I promote, one in conjunction with the implementation of our legislation because I think it is an opportunity to combine such a program with a broad public education campaign to make Canadians aware of the new regime, their responsibilities under it and the extent to which it addresses their concerns. If it is the view of the committee that such a broad power ought to be incorporated into the Criminal Code, I would be very interested to get their recommendations.

There is a growing concern over the role of firearms in all parts of Canadian society, particularly in the wake of the Montreal tragedy and other incidents in recent months.

[Translation]

Our present system has greatly reduced the threat of firearms in Canada, but the situation in the last decade has changed and this government has an obligation to respond. We have a duty to restrict opportunities for the careless and criminal misuse of guns as far as it is possible for us to do so.

• (1230)

It is for all of these reasons that I ask the House to support this motion in order to put in place a process to respond to those public concerns in the most timely and effective way and ultimately to support these legislative proposals.

I think I have stated very clearly the reasons why the particular breadth of the firearms package that I have put forward. Those provisions which are outside the strict terms of Bill C-80 and the kinds of concerns that Canadians have raised on this issue make this a subject matter uniquely suited to the kind of treatment that is envisaged in this order.

I hope that we will be able to move ahead on second reading of this bill. As I have said, my colleagues on this side of the House are very keen to make it a full second reading debate, not a truncated one.

I also recognize the very real possibility that the bill would not be concluded with even if we proceeded with second reading debate today by the time the House rises. I am very anxious that this subject be given full public consultation, not simply as a way of getting input on the measures that I proposed, but as an opportunity to inform Canadians about what we are proposing and perhaps to counter some of the misperceptions that Canadians have about the level of gun control in Canada.

Research on public opinion shows that the view of Canadians on the level of violent crime in Canada, for example, is that it is at a much higher level than it in fact is. The fact that many Canadians watch a great deal of American television leads them very frequently to be of the view that the kind of gun control legislation—or the absence of gun control legislation—that prevails in the United States prevails here.

This is really an issue which ought to be quite non-partisan. In fact, the Liberal government in 1978 showed a great deal of courage in tackling this very difficult issue. It was built on a legislative tradition that began, I think, in 1892. I believe handguns were restricted in the 1930s and 1978 was a major change. The fact that the training provisions were not proclaimed does not mean that they were not good provisions. It is very comforting to have them already in the code and now be able to consider whether this is the time and whether we have the opportunity to implement them, notwithstanding the problems of jurisdictional differences and making sure that people in remote areas have the same access to meet the criteria, et cetera.

It is a very important opportunity to inform Canadians of where we are now and of the fact that we do have in Canada a very good system of gun control legislation, and that what we are proposing is a fine-tuning, an improvement, and a response to some of the concerns that have been raised by people on all sides of the issue. Some of the proposals in Bill C-80 in fact address concerns of the firearms-owning community about some of the red tape and inconveniences that they face in using firearms for what are otherwise legal and accepted uses.

It is a very important opportunity to put this issue before the Canadian public to reassure them that we have in fact in place a good system of gun control legislation and that we wish to make it better. We can also focus attention on something which I see particularly in my own city of Vancouver. It is a large urban area with a port where we have a drug trade and a lot of crime. Very often these crimes are accompanied by the use of firearms and many of those firearms that are used are firearms that are prohibited under the Criminal Code. They are firearms that are not readily available to the public whereas the perception that is given to Canadians is that anyone can go and buy these guns. That is not the case and we do face a very serious question of law enforcement. I hope the committee may want to make some comments about the question of penalties, et cetera, and whether we in fact have a regime in place that meets the needs of Canadians.

On that note, I will conclude my lengthy introduction to debate on this motion with the very sincere plea that the House will respond to this motion to get a public process in place to address what may be one of the most serious and most contentious issues that the House will be asked to deal with in this session.

I have said to people across the country on all sides of the issue that my goal is to have a regime of gun control legislation that enables those great many Canadians who are uncomfortable with firearms to be confident that those who have them are using them correctly, that there is a process of vetting, and that they are competent to use them. That other group of Canadians wish to use firearms for sporting and hunting purposes, which are a longstanding part of our culture, and I will not even get into the question of our aboriginal people who have hunting rights protected by treaty, for example. Those Canadians who wish to use firearms in a law-abiding and responsible way will be able to do so with confidence as well.

That is the most we can ask of a legislative framework—a sense of balance and a sense of sensitivity that enables us to proceed as a civilized society with a concern for public security and a respect for all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a very short serious question, which I think could advance the debate, that I would like to put to the minister.

I know the member for Halifax said that he would not agree to a question, but I am wondering if he would reconsider. I could put a very short question to the minister which I think would help in the debate. I ask for agreement to put the question to the minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? Will the hon. minister agree to respond to one question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, the question is this. In the comprehensive package of measures that the minister announced on June 26, there are many items that are not in Bill C-80, as she admitted.

However, the motion before us today simply refers the matters in Bill C-80 to the committee. Would the minister give us an assurance that, as far as she is concerned, the committee could look at all the measures that she put forward on June 26 and not simply the measures in the bill? I think that is her intention, but I would like to make it absolutely clear. I would hate to see the committee bog down on some strict rule of interpretation that we could only look at the bill and not her entire package.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, yes, I would be very pleased to give that assurance to the hon. member.

My understanding was that this wording would encompass that. That is certainly the intention on this side of the House because it is a comprehensive package. I do think it is an important opportunity.

The hon. member who asked the question is a veteran of the previous engagement with this subject in the House, and will recognize how important it is to look at it from all aspects. Yes, I am looking forward to a comprehensive response from the committee on all aspects of the package that I have put forward. That is my anticipation of what I understand this means, and we support this motion.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, you will be surely forgiving if we seem cynical about the motives of the minister and the government.

The minister says that she is serious and that her party looks upon this as one of the most important issues to come before this House in this Parliament, but the government is obviously not treating it as a serious measure.

The minister, as she admitted herself, received the petition from the students in Montreal. She brought forward a motion on June 20 to put this in a pre-study. Then she brought forward the bill on June 26. Nothing was done on the bill. This is the first day of debate on the whole question of gun control since June 26. This is following yesterday when we were told that there was going to be a second motion. Then, last night, we were told that, no, we were going to proceed with second reading of Bill C-80. Then this morning, after the second reading of Bill C-80 was stated on the Order Paper, we were told that, no, we were going to go ahead with Motion No. 23, asking ask for a special committee study on this question.

If this is a serious issue to the government, why has it treated this issue so cavalierly? Why has it delayed in bringing this motion before the House? The bill to privatize Petro-Canada, Bill C-84, was introduced around the same time. That was brought forward as soon as we came back. That has almost finished committee hearings. Yet, we have not had even second reading on this bill. It is obvious that the government was serious about privatizing Petro-Canada but it is not serious on getting new gun control legislation.

For the minister to say that this is a serious issue with the government, it is really stretching the point of the true belief of the government. She says hopefully that Bill C-80 will yet come to second reading. We have made the offer.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I offered to pass it today.

Mr. MacLellan: Good, that is great. This is going to be really something. We will have two committees at the same time studying the same question. That is going to be peachy-keen. Talk about a boondoggle. The government is digging a deeper hole for itself by the minute.

The minister said that she hoped that second reading will come. The member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and myself offered to put this through second reading today so that it could get to a committee. The government turned that down. Now the minister wants to bring this to second reading, presumably, to have it before a committee and yet we have the special committee which is starting before second reading.

Obviously, the minister is not going to have a speech at second reading because she read it today. In her speech she defended Bill C-80, yet she is now in the process of killing Bill C-80. That is exactly what is going to happen.

We all know the worst kept secret in Ottawa is that the government wants to prorogue. Of course, it wants to prorogue. It wants to get the Opposition out of the House of Commons. It does not want any flak. The problem with the government is that it is so bad that Question Periods are backed up for both parties until some time in February. The fact is, if it did everything right, that there would still be enough material for Question Period into March. But the government wants to prorogue.

Let us look at this situation, this special committee. If the special committee is set up, we have to advertise it. We have to set up the committee. We have to give people a chance to prepare their presentations. Presumably, the very earliest that this special committee could report back would be probably the end of January. It must prepare the report. The committee's report must be translated before it can actually be tabled in the House. We are talking mid-February before this committee could finish, presumably, at the earliest.

Is the minister prepared then to give us the undertaking that we will go through second reading, report stage, third reading and introduction into the Senate before the House prorogues? I think not. I would be interested to hear whether or not the minister will give us that undertaking. If not, then it is obvious that what the government is doing is trying to kill this bill.

The minister has not given any terms of the committee or when she expects the committee to report back. She has not given us any undertaking that there is going to be passage of a bill on gun control, be it C–80 or whatever, before the House prorogues.

What has happened is that she has complaints from people in her party who do not like the bill. The government has thrown its hands in the air. It has backed away completely from the subject and said that it is turning it over to a special committee. Let them grapple with the subject. It has backed away. It cannot handle it. That is what it is saying. It is saying it cannot handle it.

Perspective members of the committee should be flattered that the government is saying that it cannot deal with this, that it does not know how to deal with it, and it wants the committee to deal with it. The government is in fact turning over the legislative authority to a special committee. It is saying that it does not want to deal with this particular subject. I think it is incredible that the government has taken this position.

The minister herself said: "—if second reading takes place before the adjournment." There is no intention of the government to have second reading on this bill. We have waited two months and still this is the first day we have had to deal with this very important subject.

The minister also said that Bill C–80 was part of a bigger package. She had proposals in her release on June 26 of other matters, yet, they were not included in Bill C–80.

It is a very, very sad trick that the government is playing on the people of Canada in this very important issue, not to deal with it and to back away from it as it is doing. The minister makes some pretension, as did the hon. member for Calgary West, that this is a more complicated subject. It says that, even though it has been introduced and all other legislation goes to a legislative committee, this bill should go to a special committee. Why should this bill go to a special committee when all legislation goes to a legislative committee? Why can possible amendments not be introduced at a legislative committee? There is no reason at all, other than the fact that the government does not want to proceed.

Certainly, there have been complaints about Bill C–80. There is no question. No one would say that Bill C–80 is perfect.

How many people would say that any legislation that comes through this House is perfect? How many members of Parliament agree on every piece of legislation that is more than three sections long? How many? Very few.

That is the reason for a legislative committee, to hear witnesses, complaints and to get ideas from all concerned on a possible subject, on particular legislation.

Bill C–80 is no different than any other piece of legislation. In fact, Bill C–80 is a better bill than Bill C–58, which is another one of the member's bills, which is an unmitigated disaster. At least with Bill C–80, we can do something with it. We can make the amendments in the legislative committee.

With Bill C–58, it involves almost rewriting the whole bill.

This is an important subject. On that point, the minister is correct. As an important subject, it should be dealt with as quickly as possible.

I am not going to go into the problems of the 14 innocent women who were killed in Montreal and the problem that that created. That will be dealt with by my colleague from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. I will say that the person who committed that atrocity was an abused child.

If we are looking to the question of prohibiting and stopping killings of this kind in this country, then we have got to do more. This government has got to do more in addressing the problems of youth who are abused, mistreated and who have not had the benefit that we would not like to see young people in this country receive.

Until the government recognizes the need for treatment and rehabilitation of young people who commit crimes, to take them off the streets, to deal with them, to work with them until they get on the right track, this government is not going to be addressing the problem.

There has been a lot of unanimity on Bill C–80. A lot of the groups which object to some of the control mechanisms in this bill, some of the rifle associations, some of the people who hunt and some of the people who deal in guns a lot agree that there is a great deal in this bill that should receive complete agreement across this country.

The fact that there should be firearms acquisition certificates is agreed to by all groups, even the supporters of changes to this bill who want to have a more widespread utilization and not as much control of the use of firearms. They agree that this is a good thing.

In fact, gun clubs have been advocating these kinds of courses for years. When the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce was in cabinet actually advocated—it is there, it is passed—that firearms acquisition certificates be issued only after a course or an exam.

It has been there. It just has not received Royal Assent. It has never been brought in. All we need to do is to give Royal Assent to that particular provision. It has not been done.

There is also the fact that the firearms acquisition certificates should be preceded by a course or a certified examination. No one disagrees with the minister on that. In fact, everyone agrees that a certificate should have a picture of the person who is licensed on the certificate. There is no disagreement with that whatsoever.

There is no disagreement that a waiting period should exist for the period from the time that the person applies for a firearms acquisition certification until the time the certificate is actually granted.

The minister, in the legislation, recommends 28 days. Maybe it is 28 days. All people who are gun proponents say is: "If it is 28 days, be absolutely sure that you are going to use the 28 days and that you are not just taking an arbitrary figure." A very reasonable request.

I think that is something that will have to be studied and I think perhaps we could fine tune that in a legislative committee, or as the minister suggests, in a special committee.

There is also general agreement that before the certificate be issued, there should also be an inspection of the storage facilities where the guns are going to be located. A very realistic request.

This is advocated by people who are gun users and are hunters. They realize that these safety requirements are very important. In this country, there are approximately 1,400 deaths by firearms a year.

Of the 1,400, 1,100 are suicides. Approximately 15 per cent of deaths by firearms are actually homicides. The fact that we have a safe place to store guns is very important. It may not mean a lot to some people, but when you look at that statistic, it is very important.

I agree with the minister that our gun control legislation in the past has been helpful because only 15 per cent of our deaths by arms are homicides. It shows that the gun control legislation in the past has been working.

I also agree with the minister that it is time for some changes in this because things have changed dramatically in the last couple of years. For example, in 1989, in one year the total number of violent crimes among adults increased by 7.9 per cent. Among young people, the violent crimes in this country from 1988 to 1989 increased 20 per cent, for an average nationally of 9.3 per cent. That is a significant increase and not a very good indication of where we are going as regard to our attitude toward violence in this country.

This is why we have, particularly with the young people, to be able to deal with this question, to look at treatment. We have to spend money on that. There is no question about that. I ask the minister to come before the committee on Bill C–58 and to discuss this question because it is very important if we are to deal with the whole question of violence in this country.

We are not going to outlaw guns. It is not even feasible to consider that. There are six million guns in Canada, and there are approximately 10,000 outlets where guns are sold, so guns are going to remain.

What we want to do is have a law which will serve the country in the best possible way, taking into consideration people who would abuse gun laws and commit crimes. We must also take into consideration those who use guns for sport and recreation, and who pose no threat, but who through their common sense and stability have actually increased the awareness of good gun control and good gun usage in this country.

We have to be able to restrict guns to people who cannot possibly handle the responsibility. We have to be able to weed out, wherever we possibly can, people who are unable psychologically to deal with the responsibility of having a gun.

We have to deal with the benefit and the over-all responsibility as parliamentarians in bringing before Parliament and into passage gun control laws which are going to be in the best interests of the people of Canada.

People in Canada are just becoming aware of the increase in violent crimes. A recent poll by the government's own pollster, Decima, has stated that people in Canada are becoming more concerned about the increasing rate of violence in this country.

If we are to address that concern, we have to come forward with gun control and we need to have perception. The government has to provide the perception that it is seriously interested in bringing forward good legislation as quickly as possible, and not to delay, as has been the case up until now, when dealing with this very important question.

We have, of course, to fully address the question of fully and semi-automatic automatic weapons, as well as the people who would convert those semi-automatics to fully automatic. I think that Bill C-80 deals with that. It also provides a good penalty for those who would convert the weapons in that way.

Bill C-80 is not perfect, but it is basically on the right track. This is why we, in this party, object to the fact that Bill C-80 may not see the light of day. That is wrong. The minister will have to admit, if she is to be straightforward with this House, that this special committee is going to take a long time. We have lost very valuable time. We cannot continue to lose this valuable time.

We have to look at putting in every possible means of acting in the best interest of the people in this country. I hope that the government will reconsider, proceed with second reading of Bill C-80, withdraw this motion, and we in our party will certainly agree to passage of second reading today. I feel that is in the best interest of everyone.

We can deal with the committee. If the government will give the undertaking not to prorogue until after we deal with the second reading committee stage and perhaps report stage, but certainly third reading, as well as introduction in the Senate, which we hope would give quick passage to the bill, we can have this bill passed into law by the time the government prorogues and starts a second session. It is of vital interest.

Although we disagree with this motion on the basis that I have stated, it being counterproductive to this party's interest in gun control, I would still like to make an amendment to the motion for the consideration by this House. I move:

> That the motion be amended by changing the final period to a semi-colon, and by adding after the semi-colon, the following:
> and that the said special committee make its final report to the House no later than February 15, 1991.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being no questions or comments, I will recognize the next speaker. I imagine it would be a member from the hon. member's party.

May I call it one o'clock and then allow the hon. member to start after Question Period?

Mr. Waddell: Am I allowed to speak now, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No more.

Mr. Waddell: I will just take one minute.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is one o'clock p.m.

It being one o'clock, I now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL DRUG AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, November 18 to November 21 has been proclaimed National Drug Awareness Week.

This week is being used to draw attention to the tragic economic and social costs of alcohol abuse and other drug problems. Organizers also hope to encourage individuals in communities to co-operate to solve these problems.

This kind of individual and community involvement is critical to eliminating drug and alcohol abuse, and it looks as though it may be working.

A recent survey by Addiction Services in Prince Edward Island shows a decrease in drug and alcohol use among Island high school students. We still face significant challenges in this area, but the kind of positive feedback found in this survey shows that we seem to be making progress.

I want to commend all individuals, organizations and communities that are working to make drug awareness a success this week and throughout the year.

BILL C-80

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval-Centre): Among other things, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-80 will provide better control over gun owners and the way firearms are used. This kind of legislation has become imperative.

Indeed another massacre took place earlier this month in a small New Zealand village where a mentally unstable man wielding an AK-47 assault rifle shot and killed 13 people and wounded 16 others.

This tragedy is one more like the incident involving Montreal polytechnical school students or the rampage in Stockton, California, where an individual—again armed with an AK-47 assault rifle—walked into a school yard where he killed six children and injured 30 more. Or again in the village of Hungerford in England where a disturbed man firing an AK-47 assault rifle killed 15 people and wounded 15 others.

Hardly a year ago we thought we were safe from massacres such as these.

As a society we have to pass appropriate legislation to strengthen control over gun ownership and use. We must endeavour as well to educate people on dangers involved in the unchecked firearm proliferation and the attendant violence.

Mr. Speaker, protecting the priceless value of human life is our responsibility.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, is the GST credit fairly allocated?

Jean McGrath of Nanaimo has an income of $10,240 and a payment of $68.37. She has friends with higher incomes and higher payments. She says that is not fair.

Mrs. Buckingham of Lantzville writes that her disabled son's income is $8,046 and his payment is $57.40. Another son has an income $10,098 higher and his payment is $15.10 more. She says that is not fair.

It gets better. In each of these cases the payment grows with income up to a total income of $24,355. Then the payments start decreasing. However, a person with an income of $1 per year gets $47.50, exactly the same as one with an income of $26,355.

It is fairness as practised by the Tory government. It is fairness as accepted by the Liberals as they allow the GST legislation to pass through the Senate.

RAINY RIVER BAND

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today to provide evidence of this government's failure to address its inadequate specific land claims policy properly.

The Rainy River Band located in my riding submitted a Statement of Claim in 1983. The claim seeks damages and land compensation, as well as a declaration that the surrenders by the six reserves involved were illegal.

From 1983 to 1985 the band, Canada, and the province of Ontario held meetings to discuss the land claims process and to review historical evidence. Since 1985 Ontario and the band have continued to hold discussions without Canada's participation.

The Minister of Indian Affairs told me in July 1990 that he was awaiting advice from the Department of Justice on whether the band's response establishes the grounds for entering into negotiations under the specific land claims policy.

More than eight years have elapsed since the Rainy River Band began its work on this claim. How much longer will it have to wait: 10, 20 or 30 years? When will we hear about the details to speed up the process?

I suggest the minister speed up this process before the Human Rights Commission slams him and his government further.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Admitedly, Mr. Speaker, self-imposed budget restraints will create difficulties for me, but I must do my share because the federal government is strongly committed to cut down its own expenditures.

My riding of Abitibi covers 553,837 square kilometres and is located 425 kilometres from Ottawa. Between September 1984 and March 31, 1990 my travel expenses in Abitibi and elsewhere in Canada amounted to $180,804, or $32,382 a year on average.

Mr. Speaker, if I did use the 64 points of my air travel budget—Ottawa to Northern Abitibi round trips, and assuming I had the time to travel that much—I would be spending $2,500 each time, which amounts to $160,000 a year.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the Fonds Biocapital, offspring of the FTQ's Fonds de solidarité, has appealed to the public to invest $8 million in research and development through a Corporation for the Development of Quebec Business. It is the largest CDQB ever established in Quebec and will finance four companies that are starting out in the biomedical field, namely, Médi-Force-RD, Canaster-RD, Polychol and Lipopharm.

To be successful in these undertakings, the government must be able to count on the full support of the private sector and the general public. This is absolutely essential.

Once again, the FTQ's Fonds de solidarité has shown leadership and demonstrated that it is aware of the need to involve all economic partners in these industries of the future that will ensure that Canada will continue to play a leading role on the international scene in the years to come.

In the past, Quebecers have shown that they can deliver the goods, and I am sure this project will be another brilliant success.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, arts and cultural organizations across Canada await the grim details from this government regarding yet another round of cuts to their already inadequate budgets.

Even as the CBC, the Canada Council and the Canadian Council of Arts plead for adequate funding, they will now have to pay for this government's foreign policy.

The news comes from a government that did not consult with these agencies about the cuts and did not consult Parliament or the people of Canada about the wisdom of sending Canadian men and women to a potential war.

Arts and culture in Canada are already crippled by a made-in-Canada recession, consistent underfunding, and the proposed GST. Why is this government once again punishing our cultural industries and their important contributions to our Canadian way of life?

The very fabric of this land—our national unity and our cultural identity—is being rent asunder while our Secretary of State for External Affairs, G. I. Joe, dreams of becoming Saddam Hussein's worst nightmare.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN-CLAUDE MALÉPART

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to commemorate the fact that our former colleague, Jean-Claude Malépart, died nearly a year ago. I wanted to say a few words in his memory today because I know that Jean-Claude and his social conscience, his awareness of the needs of senior citizens and his enormous energy as a member of this House, left a gap on these benches that has proved difficult to fill. I know that his family, his widow and his friends, want to continue Jean-Claude Malépart's work in the riding and at the centre he founded for the poor and the elderly.

I think it is particularly appropriate to remember him because every day we should be mindful of the fact that the neediest are also those who will probably suffer most as a result of legislation we pass in this House. I think it is also appropriate because it is clear in these eventful times for a Quebecer, Jean-Claude Malépart, who had his heart in the right place, would probably be sitting with us on the Bloc Québécois benches. I also want you to remember him because we all miss Jean-Claude very much.

SOCIALIST AWARDS OF EXCELLENCE

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of this House and Canadians in general the weekly socialist awards of excellence. The nominees are:

First, in British Columbia it is a standard practice for those following the NDP doctrine always to stand up for the little guy, except of course when the little guy is a small printer who this B.C. resident owes money to.

Second, in Ontario it is a common practice for NDP self-appointed champions of the underprivileged and homeless to continue to live in housing subsidized by the taxpayers of Canada, yet receive a benefits package worth some $100,000 per year.

Third, an NDPer in Alberta who follows the example of the Ontario NDPers and also continues to slurp at the trough of public housing while making four times the average Canadian salary.

And the winner is: The envelope, please.

The person from British Columbia who, when discovering that the shield of special legal privileges would not protect his ample hide, decided finally to pay off his debts so that the tactics that were tried to avoid paying what he owed would not come to light.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Now, Mr. Speaker, for the real awards.

Today our nominees for corporate welfare bum of the week are: first, Xerox Canada, with $75 million in profits in 1988 and zero taxes paid; second, American Barrick Resources Corporation, with $30.5 million in profits, American dollars, and no taxes paid in Canada; and, last but not least, our new kid on the block is Amex Bank of Canada that went into business on Canada Day in 1990 and had profits in 1989 in the United States of $23 billion.

Now for the winner. The envelope, please.

Thank you very much. The winner is Amex Bank of Canada. Congratulations to this American non-bank bank that has proven once again that it pays to have friends in high places.

In exchange for assisting the Conservatives on the free trade agreement, Amex received its reward in the form of full bank status in Canada, with the privileges of the Schedule I banks.

American Express has proved its motto, that when it comes to getting a good deal and a special deal from Michael Wilson, don't leave home without it.

GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday in Queen's Park, the New Democratic Party once again showed it is tailor-made for the opposition benches where it excels in high-flown speeches and promises of largesse.

Faced with the pressures of government, the NDP has suddenly become vague and evasive about its commitments. Franco-Ontarians will not easily forget last Tuesday's Throne Speech, when Bob Rae's government refused to make Ontario a bilingual province. In addition, this Throne Speech did not contain a single commitment to Franco-Ontarians. What an about-face, what a betrayal of Ontario's Francophones who were promised so much during the last campaign!

And to add insult to injury, Bob Rae argued that the time was not ripe. What lack of leadership, what lack of courage and political will! Franco-Ontarians will not forget this slap in the face, and Bob Rae may rest assured they will keep up the pressure until they get what is rightfully theirs.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

BILL C-21

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago, the Minister of Employment and Immigration urged this House to pass Bill C-21. In fact, she warned us that any delay in the passage of this bill would keep in limbo about $800 million that were to be spent on training programs.

[English]

In case the minister has yet to notice, the bill has been passed. Why is she not producing the money? When will it be made available? Why the threats? Did the minister not have the time to prepare for the passing of the bill?

Projects and training programs are being held up, not only in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur, but across the country. Bill C-21 has been passed, but where is the money? The minister should come through on her promise and put the $800 million in the programs today.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, early in December the GATT talks will resume, and these talks will be very important for our farmers.

The Canadian position protects supply management programs that control imports and thus support national farm product production and marketing programs. The Canadian position has not changed since the beginning of the GATT talks, and this position will be maintained. Canada intends to pursue its efforts to have article XI clarified and reinforced, and I am convinced that our representatives at the talks will act in the interests of all Canadian farmers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, in just over five weeks the GST will come into effect, having a major impact on consumer prices. Some prices will go up. Others will go down. It is important that consumers know in advance what to expect.

The government is playing a role in educating consumers, but what we need is a more co-operative effort between the public and private sectors.

I rise today to congratulate the Retail Council of Canada for developing a series of brochures detailing exactly how the GST will apply to prices in each province. This is an example of responsible corporate citizenry, and every member of the House should congratulate the council for these nine million brochures. They will help make the GST more understandable, and wipe out some of the misinformation and apprehension now in the marketplace.

We all have a role to play; governments, business and consumers, if Canada is to modernize its tax system and build its economy. We have too many walls and not enough bridges between these groups. Today I congratulate the council on helping find a better way.

THE MEDIA

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, November 17, Mediawatch awarded its merit award recognizing improvement in the portrayal of women in the media. This year, the prize was awarded to Raymonde Provencher, a Radio-Québec journalist, for her three-part series entitled "Femmes en péril".

Mr. Speaker, it is only too easy sometimes for the media to succumb to the temptation of treating women as objects. Therefore, it is all the more important to recognize media productions that go against the mainstream of portraying women as objects.

I wish also to point out the work of Mediawatch to promote public awareness to the problem of the portrayal of women.

Thanks to such initiatives, it may one day no longer be necessary to praise those who portray women as reasonnable and regular people.

PUBLIC SERVICE 2000

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, Public Service 2000 would alter the face of an institution which has served Canadians with dedication and excellence for years. While true reform can be healthy, it is unacceptable that the government wants to make sweeping changes without fully consulting those who will be most affected, all Public Service employees.

Public Service unions feel that senior management, Treasury Board, and Privy Council offices are controlling the entire process, and that the concerns and ideas of frontline workers are being ignored. Morale among Public Service employees is low. Why is the government no taking advantage of this invaluable source of experience and innovation if it really wants effective reform?

The government is trying to stifle debate by silencing the potentially powerful voice of frontline Public Service employees. Our Public Service has a history of excellence and dedication to Canadians. To propose any change, much less radical change, to this institution without consulting all Public Service employees is not only a cruel exercise of power, it is counter productive.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the United Kingdom, dozens of government MPs have deserted Mrs. Margaret Thatcher because she would not listen to Britons, she would not listen to her own MPs nor even her own cabinet. She persisted in imposing a devastatingly unfair tax.

Here in Canada, government MPs are quitting or are being forced out of the Conservative government caucus for many of the same reasons. In fact, only 4 per cent of Canadians think that the policies of the government have helped the economy.

When will this government drop the "my way or no way" approach that has brought about the political demise of Mrs. Margaret Thatcher? When will the government drop the GST and bring in new economic and tax policies that will help Canadians get out of the mess created by the economic policies of this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising to hear that question from the Leader of the Opposition. I thought that Canada was an independent, sovereign country with its own political system and its own political institutions. Is he suggesting that we revert back to the old way of doing things? I would have thought that, even in spite of his 30 years' service, he would be more modernistic in his approach than that.

The fact of the matter is that the economic agenda which is enshrined as a part of government policy was articulated in 1984, in the economic statement of 1985 and again in the election campaign of 1988. It clearly outlines the structural changes that need to be implemented. It requires that Canada be competitive in a globalized marketplace. What we are trying to do is put in place the kind of programs and policies that will prepare Canada to be a full participant in a modern globalized economy.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the policies which the minister talked about have created the first made in Canada recession, according to the Conference Board of Canada. In these times of recession the President of the Treasury Board is about to announce substantial cuts in government assistance, allegedly to finance the military operations of Canada in the Persian Gulf.

• (1420)

Can the President of the Treasury Board assure Canadians today that these cuts will be no more than is actually necessary to finance these military operations. Will he assure Canadians that these cuts will not be carried out at the expense of less advantaged Canadians and regions that, in this time of recession, need the help and the assistance of government, more than ever?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Leader of the Opposition that I will be introducing supplementary estimates tomorrow at 12 o'clock and he will have all the information he wants.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the President of the Treasury Board confirm today that the cost of having our forces in the Persian Gulf is $3 million a month and not the $50 million a month which officials have been suggesting is the case to journalists and others in the country?

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the Treasury Board refuses to assure Canadians that the cuts he announced will not affect the programs they depend on the most. I ask the minister, the President of the Treasury Board—and I am referring to Health and Welfare Canada—how he can assure the Canadian people that the quality of our health services and medical research will not be affected by those cuts?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat to the opposition leader, in the other official language, that I do intend to table at noon tomorrow Estimates that will reflect the responsible decisions this government always takes.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. He will no doubt be aware that yesterday's bankruptcy figures confirmed Canadians' worst fears: the largest number of bankruptcies in the history of Canada. The government must know that the GST will be the final nail in the Canadian economic coffin. The poll tax crushed the iron lady. The GST will kill this government. Will the Prime Minister not learn from Margaret Thatcher's mistake and today kill the GST?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, over the past 50 years there have been four royal commissions and numerous committee reports, including one from the Senate of Canada chaired by the Hon. Allan MacEachen, which recommended that this country get rid of the antiquated manufacturers' sales tax and bring in a modern sales tax, a consumption tax, like the goods and services tax. That has been the recommendation for over 50 years.

No other previous government had the guts to do it. We may understand today why they did not have the guts to do it, but they did not have the guts to do it. It is a necessary change. It was campaigned on in the election of 1988. The answer is: "No, we will not stop the goods and services tax. No, it is not going to defeat the government". If the hon. member came to her senses, she would take a walk down the hall and convince her friends to pass the goods and services tax so that business communities of Canada can get on with the job.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister no doubt will be aware that the current GST bill is so badly drafted that the Department of Finance is already working on retroactive amendments which they intend to introduce shortly after January of next year.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm to the House that there is currently a list of retroactive amendments being drawn up by the Department of Finance and will he in fact table those amendments today so all Canadians can see how flawed this GST bill is and will he withdraw the GST?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I guess I did not say it slowly enough the first time. No, we will not withdraw the goods and services tax. It is necessary for the economic well-being of this country. We have not said that. Outside organizations have said that. Any number of them have, including the Retail Council of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and I can go on and on. As a matter of fact, 17 of them appeared recently before the Senate and made a very strong recommendation that the Senate pass the goods and services tax immediately, so that they can get on with the business of creating employment and wealth in this country. The goods and services tax is going to make it fairer for them to do business in this country and throughout the world. That is what this is all about, making us more competitive and creating jobs. Let's get on with it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me just say: first, Margaret Thatcher, next Brian Mulroney.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Several departments confirmed that they are required to cut their expenses. The government claims this is made necessary by the additional expenses related to sending troops to the Gulf. Here is my question. How much are the operations in the Persian Gulf costing Canada? The government must be candid about this.

An hon. member: Impossible!

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have always attempted to tell the truth and so has the government, and if the hon. member would do the same, we would get along a lot better. I can confirm for the hon. member that the truth will be out tomorrow when my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, presents the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are worried that this government is going to use the gulf crisis as an excuse for damaging cutbacks which will hurt people right across this country. As the CLC has pointed out, the government will gain—

An hon. member: The CLC?

Mr. Langdon: Yes, the CLC has pointed out that the government will gain at least $1 billion in extra revenue from the gas price increases which the gulf crisis has caused.

I want to ask the government, first, if it is prepared to see that this extra income, which it will receive from these gas price increases, goes to pay for the costs of our action in the gulf and, second, will the government make a commitment to see to it that the Auditor General gives us a fair accounting, as quickly as possible, of what our real expenses in the gulf are for this military intervention?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be more comforted if the member and his party would be supportive of the actions that have been taken by this government to bring about peace and stability in the world.

The actions taken by this government provide for the men and women who serve the people of Canada in the task in which they are involved. If the member and his party would make a commitment to assure us of their support in providing the necessary equipment and the necessary sustainability for those men and women who are serving that member and all members in the House of Commons and the people of Canada.

HOUSING

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board.

The minister will know that this type of budgetary adjustment has ramifications much closer to home. Many are worried that in the non-profit and co-op housing sector, there will be cuts made. At a time when the metro Toronto Homebuilders' Association is reporting 72 per cent unemployment, more than 55,000 people out of work in the normal course of home construction, which is more than enough to fill the Skydome, is the minister prepared to explain why his choice is to do his budgetary matters in this way, even though it might put more than 55,000 people out of work and deny those who need reasonable, affordable housing a chance to have it?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is getting over-exercised about something which will be made clear tomorrow. I can only repeat that tomorrow, at noon, I will be tabling Supplementary Estimates (B) and he will have all the answers. Then he can possibly discuss them with us.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for Indian and Northern Affairs, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Canadian Human Rights Commissioner released a scathing condemnation of the government's aboriginal policies. Is the minister prepared to admit the failure of this department and announce new policies to address the serious circumstances facing aboriginal peoples in Canada today?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, indeed the points brought forward by Mr. Yalden yesterday were addressed by the Prime Minister in the House on September 25 when he announced the new approach and the new relationship with Indian people in the country.

An hon. member: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I will still address the Deputy Prime Minister. The government has failed in its fiduciary responsibilities to aboriginal Canadians.

Considering that Mr. Yalden recommends that the paternalistic and patronizing Indian Affairs department be dismantled, will the government take his advice and announce plans for a full scale inquiry, totally devoted to aboriginal issues?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the hon. member across whether or not that indeed is her party's position, to abolish the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The department acknowledged a long time ago the need to change the paternalistic approach of the Indian Act and of the department.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Particularly under that government.

Mrs. Martin: Yes, under that government.

We have been working towards that. Today, 70 per cent of the funding that goes to our aboriginal peoples in the country is administered by the aboriginal people, not by the Department of Indian Affairs.

An hon. member: Right on.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In the last week in my riding, in one week, one manufacturing plant moved to the United States, one company closed, one plant went into receivership, three companies announced lay-offs, and one company is winding down its operations. That is 330 jobs lost. There are several hundred part-time jobs gone and 120 workers laid off.

Will the minister change the free trade agreement in the agri-food industry? Will he change Tory financial policies and stop punishing Canadians with high interest rates and high dollar?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the solution probably lies not in changing the free trade agreement, but in changing the member.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: I can get up in the House and read—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Is this a beer garden or is it the House of Commons?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: I can get up, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Beer gardens are more orderly.

Mr. Crosbie: When I look across the aisle I see the answer is obvious. It is a beer garden.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister has the answer that is being sought.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I can get up and read a list of expansions of companies. For example, Polysar Rubber Corporation is spending $120 million at Sarnia—not far from the hon. member's area—over three years to modernize and improve environmental standards in its business.

B.F. Goodrich (Canada) Incorporated is expanding its Niagara Falls polyvinyl chloride plant. It is the start of a major capacity expansion which will double its polymerization capacity at the plant cost of $75 million. I could go on and on.

An hon. member: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, there is no compassion, no fairness, and no concern for Canadians.

In my riding, Tory policies have hit 600 jobs in one foul swoop this week. There were nine at Heinz Corporation; 20 at Peterson; 95 at Omsteads, with 120 more on December 7; 60 at Hunt Wesson; 87 at Nabisco; and 40 at Allegretti.

When will this meaningful plan come forward, instead of nonsense rhetoric and condemnation put-down? Why will the government not come up with meaningful policies?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, no amount of theatrics proves anything.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: In Cambridge, Ontario, for example, the first production of household trash-compactors rolled off the assembly line at the Inglis plant on September 19. I suggest the hon. member had better watch out or he will be compacted with the rest of the trash.

Oral Questions

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in her capacity as Attorney General for Canada.

She has indicated that she intends to appeal in the case of Elizabeth Weir, the New Brunswick NDP Leader, against the Attorney General of Canada and the judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench which ordered the creation of an extra Commons seat for New Brunswick. The minister will be aware that there will be a long delay in appealing to the New Brunswick Court of Appeal. She will also be aware that under the Supreme Court of Canada Act, with her consent and with consent of the parties, they can go directly to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In view of the fact that I have here a letter from the solicitors for Elizabeth Weir who have agreed to go directly to the Supreme Court of Canada, will the minister, in the interest of justice, fairness and clearing up these matters, agree now to take this case directly to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will agree to give the case and the issue considerable attention and to make the very best possible decision.

There are the other issues with respect to the appointment of the senators that are before the courts. It is not clear how quickly the Supreme Court of Canada could hear the case and if in fact the procedure outlined by the hon. member would be the most expeditious to get all of the importance elements and issues before the court. But I am giving it careful consideration and will announce my plan of action as soon as possible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that. I can tell her that I have checked the docket of the Supreme Court and it is free now. Perhaps she might consider that.

If a higher court upholds the judgment of the trial judge in New Brunswick, would the minister not agree as well that there would be a cloud over all the laws that this very House has passed since the appointment of the GST senators? Would the minister then look at this and give her commitment that, before the B.C. case goes ahead on December 17 and before the Ontario case is appealed, she takes all three cases, as Mrs. Weir has agreed, directly to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that makes it very difficult to discuss this issue in a sensible, rational way are the death-defying leaps in logic of the hon. member in interpreting the significance of the judgment of the New Brunswick court.

Whatever the ultimate decision with respect to what flows from section 51A of the Constitution Act, there is absolutely no legal basis for suggesting that the decisions either of this House or of the Senate would be under any kind of cloud. I wish the hon. member would do credit to our shared profession and stop making those ridiculous interpretations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PERSIAN GULF

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are worried with regard to resolving the Middle East crisis. Members of the Gulf Western Alliance, such as Germany, France and the Soviet Union, request patience allowing time for UN-supported sanctions to bite. Today, Canada is not seen as a member of this group, nor as actively pursuing our traditional role as a negotiator for a peaceful resolution to the conflict.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us today why we are pursuing the war option in the gulf, instead of the peace option?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously has not been following what has been happening both in the United Nations and in the discussions that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have had with counterparts while in Europe.

• (1440)

The Government of Canada has been pursuing consistently, through the United Nations and through every other option, a peaceful and diplomatic settlement to the Gulf situation.

As the hon. member referred to the U.S.S.R., I would like to read to her press reports of Mr. Gorbachev's comments while he was in Paris. He said: "The most important thing is we have to act. We have to be resolute and firm. There is a need for a meeting of the Security Council without delay to discuss the situation and take a decision. The situation continues to be dangerous. We cannot just leave things the way it is without giving them closer attention. Therefore, we have concluded that the Security Council should act without delay."

Those are exactly Canada's feelings. I am pleased that they are shared by so many leaders in the world.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the perception is not that Canada is pursuing the peace option.

It has been recorded that the Gulf operation is costing $50 million a month and that this figure could quadruple if hostilities break out. In a recessionary period certain cutbacks are not acceptable.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure us today that the burden of these costs will not be borne through cutbacks in funding to nationally recognized essential services, such as health and welfare, security, and communications?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know the time for the Liberal caucus meeting has passed, but the hon. member should confer with her House leader, the hon. member for Windsor West. She has said there is an allegation of $50 million a month cost. Just prior to her statement, her House leader said $3 million. Maybe they could join and come out with a medium or some balance of the answer.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, child care is exempt from the GST. However, the centres that offer care are consequently not eligible for GST rebates on, for example, toys, cleaning supplies, and of course books. It is just another example of the insanity of this tax.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister relieve the anxiety of Canadian child care centres, nation wide, and will he today undertake to axe the tax?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should realize that moving to a broader based tax gives benefits to many areas which previously would have been paying the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax. In the long run, the change from a manufacturers' sales tax to a broader based value-added tax is going to make our industries more competitive.

There are areas for zero rated products that will benefit as well. There are areas where input tax is not included which will release $9 billion of new economic activity and will benefit all Canadians as a result.

On top of that, the change will make Canadian manufacturers, producers, and exporters more competitive, thereby benefitting all Canadians as a result.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I apologize if the hon. minister did not understand my question.

As bad as the GST is, if child care services were placed—and I will say this very slowly—in the zero per cent category instead of the tax exempt category, the centres could at least get a rebate on their supplies.

If the minister will not axe the tax, will he at least be sensible and change child care status—I will repeat it again—from tax exempt to zero per cent? Clear?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, every time one of the opposition members gets up on the GST, they take out of context one little element of the GST.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: The bottom line in the hon. member's province is that every man, woman and child is paying over $700 per year in federal sales tax. That is true right across the country. On top of that, in her province, once the GST comes in there will be a reduction by some $10 billion of tax being paid by people from her province.

On top of that, low and modest income Canadians are going to be getting GST credits.

The hon. member, if she is honest with herself, knows that this is a long overdue tax which will benefit the people of her province and all people across the country.

OKA

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The Conservative government and the Conservative members of the aboriginal affairs committee have done everything possible to prevent that committee from investigating into the affairs at Oka.

The Conservative member for Delta, on the other hand, has proposed that this matter be investigated by a commission similar to the Dubin commission that investigated into the use of drugs in sports.

Will the Minister of Justice agree that this is an excellent suggestion and order a judicial inquiry into the affairs at Oka this summer, as the NDP has called for time and time again?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, to the same minister.

Canadian taxpayers have paid $16 million in relation to that crisis at Oka with no debate in this House. The government refuses to co-operate with an inquiry.

Will the minister indicate to this House when the government is going to stop covering up this issue and get on with an effective judicial inquiry into this matter?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, unless I am gravely mistaken, that issue was in fact debated very fully in front of this House in a motion, which if I am not mistaken is still before this House.

The standing committees of the House of Commons have control over their own agendas. There is enormous leeway and scope for members of this House of Commons to be involved in such a discussion or inquiry, and I invite the hon. member to take that opportunity.

HOUSING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Housing. It concerns a very tough situation with respect to new housing construction in Canada's most populated city.

As luck would have it, it follows up on the concerns of the hon. member for Oshawa.

The number of housing starts in metropolitan Toronto this year has dropped by more than half. Employment in the industry is down by 71 per cent. The value of building permits has fallen by over $1 billion.

My question to the minister is simply this: How can we house people in the Toronto area when new housing construction has ground to a halt at the same time as 60,000 people a year are flocking to the city? Is the minister concerned about this? What steps would the government contemplate to keep this industry alive?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons for the situation with home building in the metropolitan Toronto area.

One of the main reasons is the fact that for the last several years, Toronto home builders have been concentrating on building very expensive homes for the move-up market rather than concentrating on homes for first time home buyers.

Actually, the vice-president of the Toronto Home Builders was quoted last week as saying that new home sales last month hit their highest level in a year. It hit the highest monthly total since last November.

He went on to say that modest detached homes and basic housing with few bells and whistles actually dominated the market in October, and that what the industry needs is municipal help in clearing some of the rezoning hurdles in order to put land on the market.

The federal government's housing agency, CMHC, has a rezoning application currently before the town of Vaughan. I hope it will get on with rezoning the land so that we can help the situation there.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Forestry.

A few weeks ago, senior federal officials were successful in reducing Quebec's softwood lumber export surtax from 8 per cent to 6 per cent effective immediately, and subsequently reduced to 3 per cent next year.

Can the minister indicate to this House and to the lumber manufacturers of northern Ontario why he could not negotiate such a deal for the province of Ontario?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is true, as my hon. friend points out, that officials of the federal government assisted with an initiative of the province of Quebec to negotiate a reduction in the countervail tax to be self-imposed from 15 per cent to 3 per cent in another year. This is an initiative that was launched by the province of Quebec and provides an avenue that is available to every other province to launch. I would assume that my hon. friend would encourage the province of Ontario to look at a similar initiative.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, considering that two more saw mills shut down because of the softwood lumber surtax and high interest rates which result in thousands of Northern Ontario workers being laid off, it has become imperative that senior federal government officials get together with their Ontario provincial counterparts with a view to developing a strategy and cancelling the agreement.

Can the minister tell the House what representations he made to Cabinet to abolish this tax which is driving the Northern Ontario industry into the ground?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to tell my hon. friend that the revenue from the tax accrues to the province of Ontario, as it does to every province where the product is produced.

The industry, together with the provincial governments, has launched an initiative. It is my understanding that the province of Ontario has reluctantly agreed to participate, which will hopefully result in the termination of the tax altogether.

I would like to tell my hon. friend as well that the difficulties that the industry is facing right now have in the main to do with the decline in our major markets, particularly in the United States. Perhaps the exchange rate is another serious problem. Nevertheless I will take the hon. member's comments into account as will my friend, the Minister for International Trade, and work with the province of Ontario to alleviate the problem.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State for Agriculture.

The minister has remained on the sidelines while supply management has been attacked by editorial boards, foreign governments and misinformed consumer groups. Why has the minister responsible for consumers and for farmers remained so silent on this issue? Will he tell Canadian consumers today, in this House, that they are not paying too much for the supply managed products?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it would be very interesting to know where the Liberal Party stands on supply management, if it is in favour of it or if it is against it.

This government supports all Canadian farmers across the country, those who are under supply management and those are working on the export market. That is where the government of Canada stands and will stand for a long time.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party stands right behind Canadian farmers and supply management.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speller: This is just the latest attack on supply management in the past few weeks. All the while this minister has done nothing while people take pot-shots at supply management. I ask the minister, is his vow of silence self-imposed or has he been instructed to do so by his Conservative colleagues?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the record of this government speaks for itself and we need not take lessons from anyone.

This was supposed to be a government which upheld the interests of farm and dairy producers, yet it did not even have the courage to maintain a long-term dairy policy at the time we took office. You had left the issue pending for five years. The first thing we did was to implement a long-term dairy policy to defend Canadians farm producers and consumers. As a matter of record, dairy products rose barely 5 per cent in recent years while the cost of living went up 17 per cent.

I am not worried, Mr. Speaker, and the agricultural producers know this government supports them.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday at the Belanger-Campeau hearings in Quebec City, a Montreal economist, Pierre Fortin, who has worked for both the federal government and the provincial government in Quebec, said that the Bank of Canada is now working on a possible scenario for monetary union with an independent Quebec and that the Department of Finance is working on scenarios to divide up the debt between Canada and an independent Quebec.

I would have thought the federal government might have found it more worthwhile trying to work on plans that unify this country instead of contemplating separation.

That being the case, can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that these studies are going on, how extensive they are, and what the role is of the Prime Minister's office.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, obviously, by the hon. member's question, he has come to a conclusion before he has heard the answer.

If the hon. member remembers back to November 1, the Prime Minister told the House that this government is committed to a strong and united Canada, one which is great enough to ensure Quebec its full place. I can inform the hon. member that no such studies are taking place.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I spoke with the economist in question, Mr. Pierre Fortin, this morning. He confirmed that indeed those studies are taking place.

In light of that conversation, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he will make a statement in the House to tell us what studies are taking place, what plans the government is now contemplating and why it cannot be more forthright and honest with the people of this country over what is a very sensitive issue about the future of Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the last time I checked, Pierre Fortin was a representative of the Association of Quebec Economists. He was not with the Bank of Canada, or working for the Department of Finance.

My answer to the first question sticks. There are no such studies.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who confessed this morning being totally helpless on the immigration issue and a possible Canada–Quebec agreement. I wish to touch upon another area of her jurisdiction, namely, that of vocational training. She has received a letter from the Quebec Minister of Manpower to the effect that the $350 million she will be saving through the unemployment insurance tax reform on the backs of the Quebec unemployed should normally be used to support vocational training. Would the minister agree to transfer these $350 million to the Quebec Government which has exclusive jurisdiction in the area of vocational training?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that vocational training is a shared responsibility between the two levels of government. I have indeed received Mr. Bourbeau's letter, but the figures quoted therein pertaining to the amounts involved in vocational training and unemployment insurance benefits respectively are not clear. In Quebec, there are other expenses associated with training and unemployment insurance, and I do not agree with him concerning the payments.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In other words, for the second time today, the minister has turned a deaf ear to Quebec's quite legitimate request. Under what constitutional authority can she claim to have legislative power in the area of education, since vocational training and education are one and the same, and on what basis does she feel she is empowered to appoint a national commission on vocational training against the province's will? Under what authority could she use such powers which are beyond the federal government's exclusive powers?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Last Spring, Mr. Speaker, there were negotiations between the provinces and the federal government concerning bilateral and multilateral agreements in the area of training, and Quebec was one of the provinces which signed the agreement. It was their idea that there should be an agreement to benefit the Province of Quebec. It was the Province of Quebec that was the one at the time which conducted the negotiations for all the provinces and not only for Quebec. The Quebec Government signed it.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Two recent developments have cast doubts on the successful completion of the GATT Uruguay Round. The European Community refuses to lower its massive agricultural subsidies. More recently, the United States has said that with regard to trade in services it prefers to deal outside the GATT.

Will the minister tell the House whether these two developments are linked? Is the Canadian government seeking to encourage concessions from the European Community in agriculture in return for U.S. concessions on trade in services?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we have a serious question at least at the end of Question Period.

The position is that these developments are not linked. As the Cairns Group has made clear again today in a statement just issued in Europe, in Geneva, the European Community offer on agriculture is unacceptable as an outcome of the round.

It has offered only modest and ill-defined reductions in internal subsidies by 1996, from what is an historically high base in 1986. Those reductions would not apply equally across agricultural products.

It is not offering substantial reductions in border protection, nor assured increases in market access. In fact it is seeking increased protection in some levels. Nor is it offering any specific commitments to cut its export subsidies which are today ravaging agricultural markets. Therefore the present European Community offer is not a satisfactory basis for negotiation.

With respect to services, there will be no agreement in services unless the United States proves itself to be more flexible in the services negotiation, but a good result there will be very helpful for all countries, certainly including Canada.

POINT OF ORDER

CORRECTION OF ANSWER

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make a correction to an answer that I gave to a question earlier in Question Period.

In the answer in respect of the change in the tax system across the country from the federal sales tax to the GST, particularly as it relates to the province of Nova Scotia, I pointed out that there would be a savings of $10 billion to the people of Nova Scotia. In fact I meant to say it would be a savings of $10 million.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): As is customary, Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Government House Leader as I do every Thursday what legislation he intends to call for consideration by the House over the next few days, namely, Friday, Monday and Tuesday.

While I am on my feet, Madam Speaker—

[English]

Given the announcement that the Supplementary Estimates will be tabled tomorrow by the President of the Treasury Board and given that these estimates will be tabled at twelve o'clock, in the interest of open government and in the interest of accountable government, especially, I wonder if we could find, Madam Speaker, unanimous consent to have those estimates tabled at ten o'clock when the House resumes tomorrow morning, instead of at twelve o'clock after Question Period, so that the opposition may have a chance to look at those estimates and maybe question the government on them.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in answer to the first question, tomorrow it is my intention to call Bill C-92, having to do with Northwest Territories laws. Hopefully we can pass that in three stages. I understand there is some acceptability to that suggestion on all sides.

On Monday I would propose to call Bill C-91, Financial Administration Act amendments. Perhaps we could finish second reading debate on that.

On Tuesday I would like to continue report stage of Bill C-40, respecting the Broadcasting Act.

I will be discussing with my colleagues in the opposition parties further business for Wednesday and the rest of next week.

In answer to the second question, of course one knows that the information and knowledge that Canadians gain from this institution is enhanced when there is adequate time to understand, to do the research and the proper background studies to pose questions that are sensible and appropriate.

Providing members of the opposition with the weekend to read the estimates allows them to think about the more substantial issues and come forward on Monday with properly posed questions to which answers will be promptly and fully provided. This is serving the people of Canada in a far superior manner than that suggested by my hon. colleague, the leader of the Liberal Party in the House.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point that was raised by the House leader of the Liberal Party and responded to by the government House leader.

I think it is entirely appropriate that this House have the Supplementary Estimates tabled at ten o'clock. As we saw today during Question Period, every question that we asked in relationship to rumours that are out there were answered with: wait till tomorrow. If we do not move the tabling to ten o'clock tomorrow morning, the answer will be: wait till Monday to ask those questions.

I think it is the responsibility of this House to ensure that the information is out there in a timely fashion so that we can question the government and that over the weekend the people of Canada can decide what exactly it is that the government has done.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I want to suggest to the government House leader that what we are after tomorrow morning is to be able to analyse the information in question and to hold the government accountable, which is the role of this House. It is our duty as members of Parliament to do that.

What we want from the minister is quite clear. He can, if he would like, with our consent, table those documents at 10 a.m. and give us an advance briefing in the morning. Members of Parliament would be very much prepared to have that kind of briefing if the government would offer it. If not, members will be left to conclude that the government would like for the Canadian public to have the weekend to forget about the issue in part, before being accountable to it late Monday afternoon.

Why not get the information tomorrow morning and have the government stand up and be held to account for the actions that it takes? Surely those cuts are not that offensive that the government does not want us to ask questions about them?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the procedure for handling estimates is laid out in the Standing Orders. It provides that the estimates are tabled in the House and then referred to appropriate committees of the House so that careful, responsible, detailed analysis of each and every item can occur.

What we have here are declarations by the opposition, in essence, that the way in which we have careful, full, detailed analysis of government expenditure plans is through Question Period.

Surely anyone who watches this today or any other day would be horrified by the judgment that Question Period is the appropriate vehicle through which careful, thoughtful analysis of government programs or expenditure plans should be made. It clearly is not.

We discussed, I will concede to the opposition, whether it would be appropriate to bring in the estimates on Monday or bring them in on Friday. In fact some of us, myself included, thought that perhaps as an experiment we would see if providing a weekend for some more thoughtful analysis might result in a little less cheap shots, cheap accusations, and the kind of partisan debate that goes on which distorts what is happening and does not serve the people of Canada well.

Work on it over the weekend. Ask some sensible questions on Monday.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I think the government House leader does himself and the House a disservice. He is fully aware that the Standing Orders have always been changed for such matters as the budget, but the Standing Orders have always required that the House obtain unanimous consent in order that the Minister of Finance can deliver his budget at a time when the government wishes, and we do so.

The Supplementary Estimates should be treated in the same manner, because what in effect is happening, especially this year, is that the government is altering in a significant way its budgetary appropriations.

In addition—and I wish the government House Leader would stay—he is fully aware that the government is not allowing some of the standing committees to operate. I use the Standing Committee on Transport as an example.

If the Supplementary Estimates are tabled tomorrow and they are automatically referred to the appropriate standing committees, and if the Standing Committee on Transport is not allowed to meet, how does Parliament have any process to review the government's estimates? We are denied the very reason for our existence, because we are here to supervise the estimates of the government.

Mr. Benjamin: We do not even have a chairman.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, if the government is unwilling to table the estimates in a manner that the opposition can reply, if the government is unwilling to allow committees to operate in such a way that they can review in detail these estimates, then we have to question the intent of the government.

I would also say, not in the way of a threat but in the way of recognizing the way things happen here, that if the government is not willing to co-operate with the opposition it cannot expect us to co-operate with it on other matters.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that by refusing to allow the opposition to raise questions on the tabling of the estimates tomorrow, the government is once again riding roughshod over the opposition in this House.

The Prime Minister and cabinet met and committed Canada to the Persian Gulf without recalling Parliament. Now, when they are bringing in estimates that are supposed to arrange for the payment of that project, they are again refusing this House the right to question the government in Question Period tomorrow.

It is just another example of the dictatorship we are seeing across the floor of the House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my point in connection with the refusal that we are faced with on the part of the government today has to do with the rules under Standing Order 81.

As hon. members know, the final day for dealing with the Supplementary Estimates is December 10. That is the day on which the last supply day of the period must be held. On that day the supply bill will be introduced passing these estimates. They are deemed to be reported at least three days before that day, not less than three sitting days before the final sitting or the last allotted day in the current period.

If the government calls the allotted day of the current period before December 10, three days before that date, whenever that is, these estimates will be deemed back from the committee. They are going to be referred to the committee tomorrow. We know that, but we are not going to be able to ask questions on them tomorrow. They will go to the committees, and sometime next week some of the committees may meet to consider these estimates.

Mr. Gauthier: May.

Mr. Milliken: May. That is the shocking thing. There will be only two weeks left then effectively for the committees of this House to study these Supplementary Estimates.

We have been asking for these estimates to be tabled in this House for weeks and weeks. The government House leader has twiddled his thumbs and done nothing. Now he will be bringing them in tomorrow and does not have the decency to present them to the House at ten o'clock so that we can ask questions on them at eleven o'clock.

He makes up this phoney excuse that we need time to prepare our questions. We are quite capable of preparing questions in an hour, and very sensible questions. He may not like them. We usually make extremely good questions, and the hon. member knows it. It is the ministers who have difficulty giving the answers in this House. That is the problem. We can make up perfectly proper questions by eleven o'clock and be ready to deal with these estimates tomorrow in a fair and reasonable way.

I ask the government House leader to show some reasonable co-operation on this point.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I would like to support my colleagues by saying that the estimates should be tabled tomorrow before Question Period and, if not, maybe the government should do what it has done in the past and table them late tonight in the press gallery like it did with a budget not too long ago.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, the Chair has been quite patient in listening to comments from all sides.

It seems to me that the government House leader has heard what the opposition had to say on the subject, and that the answer which he gave previously is to stand.

I think it would really be better for the House to move on to other business. I notice there is another point of order. I know that the hon. minister has asked to be recognized on a special tribute.

If we want to debate the motion which is now before the House, I think we should proceed.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I listened to your words carefully, and I listened to the words of the minister. He has said no.

The House wants unanimous consent tomorrow to proceed through all three readings of a very important bill. If this government is not prepared to co–operate with the opposition when we want to get information tabled in this House one hour earlier, then Madam Speaker, we will have to consider whether we co–operate to allow legislation to proceed tomorrow through all three readings.

AIR QUALITY IN WEST BLOCK

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my point of order concerns the air quality in the West Block.

I would like to table some documents that I wrote to Mr. Cloutier, the Sergeant–at–Arms in December 1989. I asked for quality control, especially concerning asbestos.

Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Chair to investigate the quality of air in the West Block and in the Wellington Building as well. I am going to table the documents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. This is a question that is being taken very seriously by the Speaker and by members of the House. It will be proceeded with and investigated as it should.

THE LATE ROBERT SIMPSON

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I beg your indulgence, and that of our colleagues, to say a few words in tribute to a former colleague in the House of Commons whose 15 years of service left an indelible mark on our country.

I speak of Robert (Bud) Simpson, member of Parliament for Churchill from 1957 to 1972, who died last week at the age of 80.

Before his death, he had the satisfaction of seeing much of what he had advocated in this House become reality. After winning six elections, he decided not to run for re–election in 1972, when I was first elected to Parliament.

At that time, the name of Bud Simpson meant something to us freshmen who arrived here, because he had charted a course of parliamentary conduct which all of us would have liked to follow.

Like myself, he represented people of a vast and far flung region of our country, larger than many European countries. He was sent to Parliament in 1957 when travel in the riding and in parts of northern Canada were very difficult and required great sacrifice.

The sacrifice he made and the hardship he endured in his travels were shared by his family. He had a profound sense of duty and commitment. In fact, his daughter followed in his footsteps. She served as my constituency secretary for 15 years.

Bud Simpson was a highly principled man as those who know him would attest. He represented his constituency well. He called for airports and landing strips in The Pas, Thompson and throughout the north.

He never let an opportunity go by in this House to remind decision–makers that Churchill was as much a port on an ocean as those on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. He made us mindful of the vigour and the strength of new Canadians as residents in the northern region.

He insisted Canada should not speak of a national broadcasting system until the people in isolated areas and villages also could be part of it. He thought it was unjust for urban dwellers in our country to have colour TV before his people even had black and white television.

He advanced and defended the Roads to Resources concept for the development of infrastructure which it brought to the north. He called for the decentralization of government to the north.

As we all know, Bud Simpson's riding contained 17 Indian reserves, a significant Métis population, and the Inuit of the territories which was then part of Churchill. He represented their interests with passion and compassion here in Ottawa. He asked that a Claims Commission be established and eventually, it was.

He argued for better education, health care and electric power in native homes. He advocated recognition of treaty rights long before recognition was entrenched in the Canadian Constitution.

Equally ahead of his time, Bud Simpson used his last years in this House on what are now known as environmental issues. He called for a national park at Churchill and wildlife reserves on the Nelson River. Even then he warned about the damage of pesticides, mercury pollution and DDT. That was 30 years ago. Bud Simpson would also like us to remember him as one of western Canada's most avid and active participants in the sport of hockey.

Madam Speaker, I know you will want to join me and our colleagues in this House in celebrating perhaps, the life of Bud Simpson and in expressing to his wife, Phyllis, his daughters Jackie and Geri, our most sincere deep sympathy.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I would like to join the hon. minister in paying tribute to Bud Simpson.

He was first elected to this House in 1957, re-elected in 1958, 1962, 1963, 1965 and 1968. That is a very good record.

Coming from the large riding of Churchill, he was often very active in the House of Commons and was obviously a good constituency representative. He also added a great deal to his community. He was president of the Flin Flon Community Club for some time. He was very active in recreation with young people and for some 35 years was very much involved in organized hockey across western Canada.

Today we in the Liberal Party join with others in this House in paying tribute to Bud Simpson. The minister put it very well. It is a time to celebrate his life and to remember that people who go through this House make a great contribution in many different ways to Canada. Bud Simpson was one of those people. We extend sympathy to his wife and four children.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party and as the member from Churchill, I wish to rise and extend my condolences to his family.

I knew Bud Simpson only briefly when he was elected for a number of years and I was still teaching in the community of Thompson. I know that he fought hard for the constituents of the Churchill riding.

As I listened to the issues that were mentioned by the minister I thought, some of those issues are still being fought for today. We are still looking for airports in part of the riding. We still have communities in the remote part of the Churchill riding that Bud Simpson would recognize that still do not have local Manitoba television. They are not in a position to receive television from the province of Manitoba. As a result, they cannot get any local coverage of what is happening in the province in which they live.

The issue of land claims for native people is yet to be resolved. There are still many communities in the riding, especially native communities, and the port of Churchill, that do not have roads going into those communities.

One of the other issues that was raised by the minister is the requirement for adequate hydro service. In many of those communities there is still an ongoing struggle by the people of that region.

Having talked to constituents, they believe that Bud Simpson was a very dedicated man. He worked very hard and he travelled throughout the riding. He was well known, especially in the community of Flin Flon where he resided. He was active in the Community Club, and was a very enthusiastic hockey fan and manager of the Flin Flon Bombers the year they won the Memorial Cup, beating out the community team from Ottawa-Hull in the finals. He will certainly be very much remembered by the people of the Churchill riding.

Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make a personal plea. I would like to point out that, by the peculiar nature of the pension plan that members of the House of Commons have, his widow, whom he married in 1977, after the death of his first wife and to whom he was married for 13 years, will not receive a pension because he married her after he had ceased to be a member of Parliament. I would hope this House, recognizing the injustice that is being done, would take the appropriate steps to ensure that the survivor's benefit is given to his wife because they were together for many years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would ask the House to join me in a moment of silence while we remember our former colleague.

[Editor's Note: The House stood in silence for one minute.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt (Mr. Karygiannis)—Refugees; the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam (Mr. Waddell)—Indian Affairs; the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken)—Bill C-69.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BILL C-80

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) (p. 15566); and the amendment of Mr. MacLellan (p.15584).

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to address this motion. Let me just recap where we are on this matter.

You will recall that we were talking about gun control and, as a reaction to the terrible tragedy on December 6, 1989, almost a year ago, and also after some pressure from other sources, the government brought in Bill C-80, to amend the Criminal Code to stiffen the control of guns in Canada.

This bill was given first reading in the House of Commons, and we were waiting to consider it in principle. Normally what happens is that the bill is tabled, then we have a debate at second reading on the principle of the bill, and then it goes to committee. At committee, we hear from numerous witnesses who make suggestions for changes in the bill, amendments are made, the bill is brought back to the House for third reading and then the bill goes to the Senate and, after Royal Assent, it becomes the law of Canada.

What has happened today is really quite extraordinary. The Minister of Justice stood up in the House and said that she was not going to bring in Bill C-80. She said that instead she would bring in a motion stating that the subject matter of this bill be referred to a committee for pre-study. That is extraordinary. I rose, on behalf of my party, and the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys rose, on behalf of the Liberal party, to say that we were prepared to have a short debate today. We would adopt the government's own bill and send it to committee, but the government refused our offer. The government is in fact filibustering and rejecting its own bill.

Let there be no doubt about it that this represents a major defeat for the new Minister of Justice. She has lost a major battle in cabinet. It means in fact that she has been defeated by the gun lobby.

There is a group of people in Canada that does not like gun control and does not want gun control. They are like the American gun lobby and are now being more and more effective in blocking gun control. That does not include not all people who possess guns. There is also a group—I think the majority—of people in rural areas, in gun clubs and in hunting and fishing clubs, who accept gun control. This is very important. But they want a workable system of gun control that is not too bureaucratic but makes sense, and they have made a number of suggestions as to how that can be done. I will come back to that a little later in my speech.

I found it extraordinary, a sad and humiliating sight, to see this minister rise and in fact filibuster against her own bill by bringing in this ridiculous and farcical motion. What are we doing? We are sending the material to a committee, when we see on the Order Paper that we may later debate Bill C-80. If we pass that, it will go to another committee.

I do not know why the minister just did not say that she lost the battle and does not have support among her colleagues for her bill. I half expected the minister to get up and offer her resignation, but she did not do that. As a matter of fact, she did something worse.

The Minister got up and made reference to her meeting with the university students in Montreal. On April 10, 1990, she was at the engineering school at the École Polytechnique, the place where 14 women were gunned down by Marc Lépine last December. She was given 25 boxes of petitions. Here is an article about it by David Johnston in the Montreal Gazette and a picture. Those petitions bore the names of 516,487 Canadians calling for tougher gun control laws. It is now up to 700,000 people calling for this law and, as she mentioned in her speech today, she took the petitions and said she sympathized with these people. Such hypocrisy, Madam Speaker. Such hypocrisy on behalf of the minister.

Why did she not just tell the truth? Why did she not just go down to Montreal and to the other parts of the country and tell people the truth? If she had been honest, she would have said: "Look, I lost this battle in cabinet. I cannot get the support of the Conservative back bench on this bill and, therefore. I cannot proceed with the bill."

Instead, the government tried to cover it up to try to make it look like it was making progress in this bill. She said: "I am frustrated by the lack of progress in the bill." Well, the government controls the agenda. It could get a Hibernia bill through like that. It got the GST through—at least the House—like that.

The government controls the agenda and she comes forward saying: "I am frustrated at the lack of progress." The government then takes the bill, rejects our support of the bill, and puts a motion to committee that we will examine the substance of this bill. But we will not have voted in principle on the bill.

It is one pure incompetence on the part of the government, and my friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys outlined perfectly how there are two motions and another bill on the Order Paper. There is incompetence here. But, worse than incompetence, there is a lack of political will.

The minister was faced with her first tough problem and she collapsed. I feel very sad for her. I feel very sad for the people she talked to in Montreal and for the 700,000 people who signed that petition.

I had hoped that this minister would be different and a different sort of person than her mentor, the Prime Minister. I thought she might be somewhat more honest and somewhat more straightforward. The first big test comes and she is just a mini-Mulroney. She has taken after the boss. I guess that is the price one has to pay to be in the Prime Minister's favour.

She says she wants her members to speak on this. Well, bring them in and have them speak. We are waiting. Bring them in. We were prepared to let Bill C-80 go through. I find that extraordinary. The opposition offers that the bill will go through in principle and then the government says: "No, no. We want to bring in our members to filibuster our own bill."

I know it is not an easy problem. The minister said that. It is a difficult issue because rural Canada has some difficulties with gun control, but the answer is not to cave in completely. The answer is to take the bill, the real bill, the real stuff, get it into committee, and amend the bill so that it is workable and so that we can have a workable system of gun control.

I challenge the minister to go back to the engineering students in Montreal and tell them: "I copped out on you. I did not have the guts and the political will when it came down to it to really press for my bill. I put a farcical procedure. I sent this thing off to committee where it will disappear, a special committee hearing on to the infinite future. The House will be prorogued and it will be gone."

The minister seems to think that she can bring it back. She has given her opposition a tremendous victory here and it is a real defeat for the minister. I say that sadly because I had hoped better for this minister and I think the country was expecting better.

I just want to give a little bit of the history of firearms control so that we can put it into context. In 1978 the current gun control law was passed in amendment to the Criminal Code by the House of Commons. There were provisions enforcing mandatory firearms training in that bill, and the minister mentioned this, but this has never been enacted to this day. The gun clubs and so on, who have legitimate concerns about gun control, have always said we need courses so that people can get properly trained in using guns. They say if people are trained in the guns for hunting, trapping, and for shooting purposes in gun clubs and so on, then there is no danger. They have always been in favour of that.

Has the minister proclaimed it? No, but she wants to speed it along quickly. She wants to get moving. She has not done this. The government's package says that it will have the program in place by April 1991, that is 13 years after the act passed the House of Commons. A snail would make it look fast on this one.

In January 1989, in Stockton, California, a man with a military hang-up, he claimed, was armed with an AK-47 semi-automatic assault rifle and two pistols. He fired 110 rounds from his rifle, killed five children, and injured 29 others. As a result, the state of California responded to the tragedy by banning the sale, possession, or manufacture of some semi-automatic weapons.

On March 14 last, President Bush announced a suspension of the importation of assault weapons. So, even the Americans, who have a stronger gun control lobby than we have, took some action. The incident provided a new impetus for calls for tougher laws in Canada. That was in January, 1989.

In June 1989, the government announced its intent to introduce in the fall legislation controlling the importation, possession, and sale of semi-automatic and automatic weapons. It got an agreement from the federal-provincial ministers, so it was making progress. Of course, it did not introduce it in the fall of last year.

On December 6, 1989, as we know full well, there was the great tragedy at the École Polytechnique in Montreal where 14 women were gunned down.

On April 19, 1990 a petition was presented to the minister with 516,000 names, and it now has 700,000 names.

On June 27, 1990 the minister introduced Bill C-80. She said: "We're going to push this bill through". She called it a modest proposal. Well, if it is a modest proposal and if she intended to push it through, why is she, in effect, ditching her bill today? Why? It is really incredible. This represents a substantial defeat for the minister. She should consider very seriously whether she can continue being Minister of Justice.

Mrs. Browes: That's nonsense!

Mr. Waddell: It is not nonsense at all. It is a major piece of legislation, a major constituency, and the Tory back bench revolted.

We have a notion of confidence in this Parliament. What confidence means in Parliament is that the Cabinet has the confidence of the House of Commons and has a majority in the House of Commons. A minister must have confidence behind him or her. This minister got up today to speak on a bill and she does not have the confidence of her own party with respect to her own bill. It is extraordinary. It seems to me that should be grounds for considering a resignation.

Now, I do not want to see that. This is a new minister. As I said, a promising minister. She comes from British Columbia. Vancouver is a good place to come from. There is lots of promise there, but this represents a substantial defeat for that minister. I hope that she can somehow bounce back from that.

The government has lost its political will and has caved in to the gun lobby in Canada. I feel sorry for the minister, but that was her choice.

I want to point out something about Bill C-80. People say that Bill C-80 is too difficult or too controversial, although the minister did not say that it could not be passed. Let me just list the problems with Bill C-80. I have a letter I received from the B.C. Wildlife Federation. From my own riding there is The Barnet Marksmen, a publication from Port Moody, B.C. There is a gun range there. There are all kinds of other submissions that have come to MPs. They have seen them all. I have another submission from the Mission and District Rod and Gun Club. Here is a magazine from Alberta, Fishing and hunting, in which the complaints were set forward. Let me just go through some of the difficulties.

People say: "We have problems in rural Canada with the cooling off period on every renewal of a firearms' acquisition certificate. Will we need to keep doing that every time it is renewed? Will that not make it more difficult for us to trap and hunt?" Well, yes, but the way to deal with that is to tighten up the bill and perhaps consider an amendment so that in a renewal there is not a cooling off period by the same person. They could renew it instantly, for example, at the same time that it expires. We could look at better regulations, a better way of dealing with people in rural areas. That is one complaint and one possible amendment or areas of amendment.

Second, they are worried that, under the bill, you have to have guarantors. What is the liability of these guarantors who sign the application form? Well, we could consider that. We could consider some sort of limitation of liability or a better setting of the liability of the guarantors. That could be done by amendment.

Third, people say that five and ten shots in a magazine really limits what they can do. It will be lead to people mutilating their guns. I think we can have a look at that, and if necessary, the government could come up with a program to buy out certain guns. It would cost money, but it could do it if it is really serious about having a workable gun control system.

The fourth area of concern that I have picked out of this is that they are worried about having to get a picture on ID. It is like getting a passport. They have to get people to sign for them and so on. I think we might be able to deal with that in terms of less bureaucratic regulations, less red tape. Maybe there could be different regulations for rural areas as opposed to cities. That would be an intelligent way of dealing with it.

They are worried about the grandfather clause in the bill, that it would not allow the inheritance of some part of a gun collection. Maybe you are to inherit a gun collection, some of which may be semi-automatics and so on. You cannot in fact inherit that. You would have to give that back. There might be ways of dealing with that in the bill.

You will notice that all the legitimate gun clubs and gun people support mandatory firearms training. The Mission people I referred to before clearly set out in their letter to me that they favour a mandatory system and firearms training so that people learn how to use guns.

These are difficulties, but they are not fatal difficulties. A government which really knows how to govern and a minister who really has the political will could have faced this and brought in the bill.

My friend for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has also met with the people in Montreal. I hope and trust that he will be speaking about that later as well as about this notion of political will. I recall a speech he gave in the House some time ago under his private members' bill in which he dealt with some of the arguments. For example, only criminals have guns.

We should be going after criminals, not people who get guns. In fact, two-thirds of homicides in this country are not committed by professional killers. They are committed in families. They are committed by people who in a rage or who are temporarily or permanently insane—not insane in law—but who are deeply uncontrolled and upset; disturbed like Marc Lépine was and others have been. They grab a gun and they use it.

The intent of Bill C-80, as I see from a realistic reading of it, and which everybody agrees with, is that we need a bill that will make people pause before they buy a gun; that the people who get a gun know how to use a gun and are sane. That is what everyone wants.

I do not want to go into the terms of the bill. I have suggested some amendments. Let me conclude by saying that this is a dishonest, disreputable move by the government. This committee is going to be a farce.

One will have to consider whether one should even sit on the committee. Why did the government not have the political will to proceed with the bill, to listen to people in rural and other areas who have legitimate concerns, and amend the bill properly in committee? That would be the best way to do it and that is how we would get the end that we want. We want a system of gun control, but one that is realistic for everyone in the country.

The government and the minister really copped out on this one. I think this represents a substantial defeat in cabinet for the new Minister of Justice.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I have had an opportunity to listen to some of the comments by the hon. member. I am most concerned about some of them which has really moved me to stand today to ask a few questions and to put a few things on the record.

This is an area of gun control which, when legislation was brought forward in the late 1970s, really stimulated a lot of emotional debate. Bill C–80 has also stimulated a great deal of controversy.

Some months ago I made a recommendation that a firearm manufactured as an automatic weapon, converted to a semi-automatic, brought into the country and then very easily converted back to automatic, should be banned from the country. I am very pleased that in this legislation, Bill C–80, concerning military weapons, that has been included as the major point of this bill.

I am concerned that the hon. member would say what he has about putting this to a special committee. I happen to think that it is an excellent idea to have this go to a special committee, that we have an opportunity to discuss it now and not wait until it is past second reading because I had a chance to visit with a number of gun clubs this past summer to discuss some of the details of this of concern.

I have spoken to a number of policemen, including the chief of police for metro Toronto, and they are most concerned about the proliferation of guns in the hands of criminals in metro Toronto. I think that it is an excellent idea to have this sent to a special committee now.

I want to know if the member is at the point that he does not want to listen to anybody out there. He just wants to talk about it here. We think it is a good idea to get to a special committee to talk about this now, listen to the people, and if there are some amendments that need to be made, indeed they will be made.

It is an opportunity to discuss it now.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the member says we do not want to listen to people.

I precisely said that we want to put the government's bill in a committee, listen to witnesses and get evidence. That is the real process.

This is a sham. This is not the real process.

I would like to ask the member: Is she going to tell the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto that she has effectively sabotaged the gun control bill which he favoured? That is exactly what she has done.

What is she going to tell her constituents in Toronto when they ask her why she stopped gun control, even a modest proposal? What is she going to tell them? How does she feel about the first woman Minister of Justice who voted against choice and, second, is unable or unwilling to fulfil her promises to Canadian women who learned last December that it is women who are the greatest victims of lax gun control and violence in our cities in this country?

I would like to know what she is going to say. I think she is going to have a little bit of hard swallowing to do.

Madam Speaker, while I am on my feet, I had inadvertently forgot to introduce this. This sometimes happens when one gets in flight. I forgot to introduce a subamendment to the Liberal amendment. I would ask permission to do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would need unanimous consent for the hon. member to present an amendment to the amendment at this time. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have unanimous consent.

We will continue with questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments made by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. Like my colleague, I felt obliged to rise in the House because what the hon. member said was entirely at odds with the practice of his party, the NDP. Our socialist friends are normally terribly keen on all kinds of committees, but now that this government wants to appoint a committee to study all aspects of the question, the hon. member of the New Democratic Party tells us this would be one committee too many and that it would be a waste of time.

Madam Speaker, when the government makes a decision, those same members tell us, now listen, you are making decisions without consulting the people, without consulting Canadians who want to make their views known. So in the circumstances, it is very difficult to take seriously what was said by the hon. member from Port Moody—Coquitlam because tomorrow he will say the exact opposite about something else.

The Canadian government wishes to consult Canadians because this question is very controversial, for instance, in the riding of Saint-Maurice, and has given rise to three or four different trends. I think it is quite reasonable for the Minister of Justice, who has the full support of members on this side of the House, to proceed in this way.

I cannot say the same for the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, Madam Speaker, who has been a member of this House since 1979 but failed to receive the confidence of his party colleagues at the NDP convention. He was soundly defeated, despite his experience, by someone who was a newcomer to politics.

So before criticizing our confidence in the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam should consider the total lack of confidence displayed by his colleagues and party militants.

Madam Speaker, I think it is very important for us in this situation to realize that Canadian citizens are very much aware the question is not as straightforward as the hon. member for the NDP would have us believe. In concluding, I would like to say that this kind of legislation is not cut and dried. The situation is complex. Hunters are involved, people who collect firearms and, of course, criminals. And there are also our police forces and the Armed Forces. Firearms exist in this country.

The easiest solution would be to abolish them outright, but I don't think we have reached that point yet. I would ask the hon. member for the NDP to give very serious consideration to being an active participant and to decide not to boycott the committee proposed today.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, that is a bit of a cheap shot. In my election campaign I got more votes for less money than all the other candidates of both leadership contests in the last year. That must be worth something.

The Minister of Justice ran for the leadership of the Social Credit Party in British Columbia. I think she came about where I came on the pecking order, and she went on to become the Minister of Justice. That is not too bad.

Furthermore, the hon. member should realize that what we have here is a bill that concerns firearms. Today, we agreed with the Liberal Party to adopt this bill, and it was the government that decided to appoint another committee. I want to ask the hon. member this: What is he going to say to the young women at the École polytechnique in Montreal? He voted against the firearms bill, although he supports the government that tabled the bill. The minister promised students in Montreal a year ago that the government would support this kind of legislation. What is he going to say to the students in Montreal?

[English]

Instead we have another committee. They have rejected their own law. It is a victory for the gun lobby. That is pretty sad, is it not? What is he going to say to these students in Montreal about that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I could say it goes without saying, but in this House it seems that nothing ever goes without saying. I do not accept the conclusions that were arrived at by my hon. predecessor. However, I was very interested in his comments, as I was interested in the comments by the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and the minister earlier this morning.

Every thinking Canadian has to agree with the objective behind this legislation. Every one of us wants a safer, saner society where no one has to fear unduly for their own safety.

I support many of the provisions that are in this bill. I know very well and I have heard first hand that many people have serious concerns.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend, but we are not debating the bill. We are debating a motion to refer to committee. If we were debating the bill, the government would have called the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member shows a little bit of patience, I would imagine that his colleague would make this quite relevant to the motion which is before the House.

Mr. Fee: Madam Speaker, my intention will become very clear very quickly. I know very well that people have concerns. They have been expressed to me, as I am sure they have been to every member of this House. Some of the concerns that have been expressed to us are valid. Some might have been exaggerated because of lack of information or perhaps misunderstanding. However, these concerns deserve to be expressed and deserve to be responded to before we proceed any further with this bill.

I am very pleased for the opportunity, on behalf of some of these individuals and myself, to speak today to the bill and to the motion to refer it. I want to encourage this House to allow the establishment of a committee that will hear from concerned Canadians and responsible firearm users before proceeding any further.

I was also encouraged this morning to hear the reply to the question offered by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce by the minister when she said that the committee would not be restricting itself to the narrow confines of what is included in the bill but can look at the regulations in a broader picture. I feel that is important.

There are many responsible firearms users in Canada who can help us. Many of them were solicited for input prior to the drafting of this legislation. I asked the minister for a list of those consulted, and I have been informed that the previous minister had conducted extensive consultations from July through September of last year. Major firearms interest groups had the opportunity at that time to make submissions outlining concerns and suggestions. Meetings were held with representatives of police departments, the Shooting Federation of Canada, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, Canadian Chiefs of Police, Canadian Sporting Arms and Ammunition Association, the National Firearms Association, and the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association. All these groups were consulted.

Now that we have a legislative package together, I feel they deserve the opportunity to respond. They want as much as we do to ensure the safety of Canadians. They have a vested interest in their sport in promoting the safe use of firearms. They deserve to be involved, and they deserve to be listened to again. I am sure that every member of this House who represents a rural riding has already heard from many of their members.

Since the bill was introduced in June, I have received numerous representations from several constituents. My riding includes a large urban area, the city of Red Deer. It is surrounded by hundreds of square miles of open productive farm land which leads into the foothills of the beautiful Rocky Mountains. It is an area of incredible scenery and beauty. It is also an area of good, natural hunting. It would be an exaggeration to say that absolutely everybody hunts and is involved, but it would be quite accurate to say that everyone knows those who do, and there are a lot of them.

I have received some letters from hunters and gun club members who live in the city, but by far the largest proportion of my mail has been from the rural area: from farmers and ranchers who use firearms for predator control, from legitimate hunters who have pursued their sport safely for many years, and from members of gun clubs and people who pride themselves in the safe handling of firearms.

The fact that the bulk of my mail comes from the rural area illustrates a problem. The problem is the same as we have with many other issues in this House. In this large and diverse country of ours perceptions differ between groups, between cultural groups, between regional groups, and sometimes between linguistic groups. Here I see a difference in perception basically between the rural and urban perspective. Legitimate gun owners are not restricted to rural areas, but there are more of them in the rural area. Problems and abuses with firearms are not restricted to the urban areas, but they occur more often there.

When it comes to drafting legislation, the drafters tend to be the urban folk, those who do not always have the experience they need to understand the rural position. Because of the large rural population of my riding, I have received a great deal of mail. Their concerns have been expressed to me, and I feel it is my duty to represent those concerns both to the minister and to this House.

I appreciate being recognized and allowed to express these concerns this early in the debate on the motion today. I should add that the minister is well aware of my concerns. She does not share all of them, but she has been available and she has listened. I am very conscious of the intense feelings that exist toward the abuse of firearms. I am also aware that there are intense feelings toward the abuse of many substances, such as alcohol, drugs, and anything else that could cause potential disruption in our society.

The minister and this House are under intense pressure to legislate on the matter that is before us today. It is important that the legislation accomplish what is intended. It is important that it be understood and accepted by members of the general population. If it is not understood and accepted, they will not respect it. If there is no respect for the law, people will find a way to avoid it and get around it.

We as a country do not have the resources or the inclination to run a police state. We cannot go into every household in the country to enforce the law. Like all other concerned parliamentarians, I have relayed the concerns and questions that have been given to me to the minister. I know she has met with me and several others who like myself have legitimate concerns with the bill. I also know that she has heard from other people who support complete abolition of firearms.

I understand the difficulties and the questions, but we need to have legitimate, honest, law-abiding owners and users of firearms understand and accept the law if it is to work. It is true that some of the concerns they expressed might be exaggerated, but others are real.

In addition to specific items that I will get into in a few minutes, the major concern that I have heard is the amount of power that this act would give to regulation. People want to know who will be writing those regulations.

Those of us in the House who are more involved in this system and have got to know it, who understand how regulations are drafted, would perhaps have confidence that those regulations will be well balanced and well written.

However there is a lot of mistrust of politicians. Many people are resentful of regulations that are imposed on them to address a problem that they do not see as their own. That is what they see us doing in this case. We are regulating good, honest, law-abiding citizens to prevent a problem that they see happening somewhere else.

This gets more complicated when we state that the power of regulation is going to be delegated to another body. Most people have enough trouble with us, and now they are concerned that some nameless, faceless group of well meaning people who will be given the power to set regulations that will affect their hobby, possibly their employment, and definitely their own legally purchased property.

I will get to some specific examples that my constituents have shared with me. In addition to letters from constituents, I am sure we have all received regular mailings from groups like the National Firearms Association. It is quite interesting that although in one of its recent publications the National Firearms Association says that it was not consulted when the act was drafted, the department says that it did meet with the National Firearms Association in August 1989 prior to drafting the legislation. That fact aside, the legislation has now been drafted and presented, and I think the National Firearms Association does represent people who deserve to be heard.

In reading some of its publications, it tends to be what might be called inflammatory. Perhaps it overstates some things and exaggerates its argument in certain cases. Some people seem to think you have to do that to make a point with politicians.

Debate in this House often leads itself to overstatement and occasionally even exaggeration. When dealing in this House, we have learned to look beyond the overstatement, beyond the exaggeration, and occasionally accept that within the rhetoric and overstatement there is often a grain of reason and a valid point. I think that holds for the National Firearms Association. It has some good suggestions. If we can get beyond some of its rather forceful statements, it is worth listening to.

One interesting fact gleaned from its pages is that members of the organization can get $1 million in liability insurance to cover them while shooting for only $4.50. At first it was just to cover them while shooting at ranges, but their positive experience allowed them to extend it to hunting as well. The fact that they can get that much insurance at that low a premium rate reflects very well on its members as responsible firearms users.

In addition to some of the exaggerated language it uses, I did not like an admonition that it recently gave its members not to write to us as members of Parliaments with comments and suggestions but rather just say that the National Firearms Association spoke for them. I am very thankful that many of my constituents ignored that advice and wrote. After I received the first large batch of letters I, along with several other people, met with the minister to discuss them.

I wrote back to the constituents soliciting some further factual data. I have been very impressed with the response with the exception of one, and I only had one, I guess I would call, belligerent, obnoxious correspondent. The rest replied with very serious, well thought out letters. They gave me specific examples and detailed legitimate concerns.

Included in the consensus I received was one basic one: their concern about the right of Canadians to own and enjoy property. Previously the Government of Canada has legislated rights and freedoms, but we missed what most of my correspondents and I consider to be an essential element.

This Parliament should recognize the right of Canadians to own property. It is not right that a government, or worse yet regulatory body, can declare a legally purchased article restricted and demand that it be surrendered without compensation.

Generally the correspondents all had a problem with the thrust of the bill. Most of them are willing to accept the need for firearms control, but they are not convinced that this bill yet achieves what it is intended to achieve.

One of the people wrote: "Violence and gun control are two separate issues". Several put forth the proposition that the firearms acquisition certificate should be treated like a driver's licence. Safety and competency tests would have to be passed in order to obtain an FAC. We could even have classes of licences.

It was suggested by another that an independent regulatory licence granting body would be better than the present system where it comes down to some arbitrariness on the part of a clerk. This would fit in with the ideas suggested by another writer, that rather than looking at what firearms people should own we should look at who should own firearms.

I rather like the idea of a licence as opposed to the firearms acquisitions certificate. In order to issue a licence, people would have to qualify for it; something similar to a motor vehicle licence today. In this case one would have to qualify for it in order to purchase or handle certain types of firearms. With further experience, one could add on another classification.

I would have no problem with someone retaining a licence unless he or she abused the privilege or there was some reason to revoke it; similar to what happens with our automobile licences. I think it is worth considering and is something, no doubt, that is going to be put forward to the committee.

Just to give a further idea of some of the suggestions that I have received from my constituents, I would like to share a few quotes. One person suggested: "I think you should address in particular areas of compensation for guns that are seized and would suggest that you propose a reinstatement of a collector classification". The minister today commented on that, and I commend her for including a provision to allow genuine gun collectors to keep their collections.

Another one of my writers said: "This bill threatens financially legitimate gun owners. I question whether legislation could deter a determined individual from committing an atrocity".

Another wrote: "Doug, you have to understand that many of us still suffer from the reaction to previous legislation and we fear further firearms legislation. We do not trust any government that tries to limit legitimate freedoms to own and use firearms. It is important that you look not just to complaints, but also at solutions".

Another person wrote: "The key word should be responsibility, not restrictions. Many people today gain their complete knowledge of firearms from televisions and books where guns are depicted as awesome instruments of destruction. Education is a far more progressive approach to take".

Another person wrote: "Range and shooting clubs should be encouraged where new members would be expected to complete an education component before being allowed to participate".

Another one indicated: "My plea is that the government examine the growing roots of violence in all forms in this country and work to minimize it at the starting point".

Among my correspondence there was very little support for limits on magazine capacity. Many felt it would have its greatest effect on antique gun collections, particularly those older models with integral magazines. I had about 12 to 14 different examples of guns that would be restricted or prohibited under the legislation. Many of the correspondents felt that there was no problem putting limits on military, assault or fully automatic weapons. To quote one person: "There is no reason for anyone to own a fully automatic".

There are good features of this bill that will come up in committee discussions, such as a firearms safety course and the national standards that are proposed to ensure that only qualified people can obtain the firearms acquisition certificate.

Most people do not have a problem with a waiting or a cooling off period before getting an FAC. After all, as someone said, the purchase of a firearm should not be a spur of the moment decision.

Other good features that were praised by people in writing is the fact that return of lost firearms could be expedited and the fact that it is going to allow individuals with an FAC to transport a handgun owned by another person, possibly a family member.

I have been critical of the bill. There are things I would like to see improved. I think I am speaking for a large number of legitimate hunters and sport shooters. They understand the problem that we are facing in this country. They understand the concerns, and they understand the objective of the minister and the government. They are even more concerned than many others about the abuse and misuse of firearms.

They have a direct concern with the legislation. They deserve to be heard before we proceed any further. As users, they can offer constructive suggestions. They can help us design training courses.

They can probably suggest better controls for firearms than legislators or bureaucrats. They have expressed concern about what might be lost under the bill. They also have the most to gain by offering constructive suggestions and by helping. By helping, they can enhance their chosen sport and possibly improve our legislation and contribute to a safer country.

Madam Speaker, let's approve this motion. Let's establish the committee and let's listen to Canadians before we proceed any further with this bill.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I want to commend the member for his straightforward remarks on this subject. I found it useful to listen.

Most of us in the House have heard a number of those perspectives earlier. My comment then, going right to the reason for the motion that is in front of the House, is that the government appears to have made an error at some point, likely following the Marc Lépine tragedy in Montreal.

Whatever the reasons, the Minister of Justice appears to have been compelled to come forward with a bill which reflects government policy. It is what the government wants to legislate. Now the government appears to realize that the bill is not a good one, that there are some serious flaws in it.

There is a need for a bill but there are too many flaws in the present one. The bottom line here is if the bill is too bad to continue, and the government does not have the guts to withdraw it, then it must have the need to show that it is taking some action.

Is that not the reason why it is referring the matter to a special committee? Is it not really admitting that it made a mistake here? Is that not why we have to go back to square one and rehash all of these issues? There are many, some addressing the bill and some not addressing the bill.

There is no reference to amnesty here. I just noticed a statistic today from Toronto that this year from January to August 31, the metro Toronto police have seized 1,506 illegal guns. That compares to about 1,200 guns in 1980. That is 6.2 guns per day taken from the streets of Toronto.

There are a lot of issues that are not being addressed by this bill. I would like to ask the member if he would not acknowledge that the government started off on the wrong foot so that we all can start off on the right foot very quickly to address the many needs that this legislation must address.

Mr. Fee: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question.

I do not agree with either of his questions. He said himself that there are a lot of issues that are not addressed by the bill. That was the question raised by his colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce this morning when he asked the minister if the committee was going to be restricted in its hearings to the narrow confines of what is in the bill.

Her answer was no, that it would be given a broader mandate to hear concerns of Canadians relating to the whole issue of the regulations and the bill.

I think the minister is not backing off. If she wanted to, she could quietly let this bill sit in the back corner and not mention it. It would die on the Order Paper eventually. That is not going to happen.

By setting up this committee, Canadians are going to be heard. If the hon. member thinks we are making a mistake by reacting to concerns expressed to the minister, I would suggest that he is wrong. There have been legitimate concerns expressed. There have been questions raised.

In answers to those questions and concerns, the minister and her motion say: "Let's listen to Canadians." I think that is what democracy is all about. Let's hear what Canadians have to say. We are going to end up with a better bill for doing it.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the minister is on the hook because she made a promise to the students at École Polytechnique in April.

She said she would bring forward a bill. She said she would push for extended gun control. December 6 is the anniversary of the massacre, and she knows she will be subject to questions in the House of Commons on why she has not done anything. She is now going to say it was sent for study in committee. It is dishonest and it is pathetic and the students at the École Polytechnique and other Canadians will hold her accountable for that. As I said before, it is the first failure of this minister in her new portfolio.

I want to let the hon. member off the hook by asking him if he would confirm a newspaper report not too long ago which said that 30—I notice the member today said: "Don't take instructions from the parliamentary secretary. He is liable to lead you astray".

Mr. Karygiannis: Get your runs in there.

Mr. Waddell: Get the runs in there. Would he confirm that 30 Conservative MPs have indicated that they would not support the bill? If he cannot confirm the number, could he tell us how many of his colleagues do not support the bill and could he explain his own position, does he or does he not support Bill C-80?

Mr. Fee: Madam Speaker, I am somewhat amused by the question because the most common criticism we are getting at home in the media is that we blindly follow the leader and do not think for ourselves. Now we are being criticized because some other reporter says we are not following blindly.

I cannot confirm how many members over here said they would or would not support it. I said in my speech, if you were listening and I am sure you were, that some serious problems have been expressed to me by a large number of constituents. Yes I have a problem with this bill in its present form. I am very pleased that the minister is going out to listen to Canadians to hear their concerns.

The senseless tragedy that happened last year in Montreal affected all Canadians. It could not help but do so. I am almost tempted to accuse the hon. member of exploiting that but it would be a terrible charge and I do not want to do it. I was going to refer to it in my speech but I do not think we should be drafting regulations and laws specifically as a result of one tragedy. We owe it to those people, and the families of those victims, to come up with a law that is going to be effective in the long term. We would be wrong to push something through hastily rather than make sure it is well thought out and has the support of people who can make sure the law works.

I think it is better to take a couple of extra months, do it properly, and make sure we have support of firearms groups.

There was an amendment introduced today that tried to put a time limit on a committee. I am quite prepared to support that because I do think we have to get ahead with this. We have to get this committee working, we have to get the report in, we have to act on it for the very reasons that have been stated.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I want to make a brief comment and put a question to my hon. colleague. As a member who, quite frankly, could not support the bill as it is presently drafted, I have no hesitation in putting forward a couple of reasons why.

I wish to point out a couple of fairly straightforward things. First, it is the user and not the weapon that is the cause of the damage. Second, it is the criminal element mainly that has access to weapons and will continue to have, regardless of what the law of the land is.

I am a little tired of these nonsensical references to Montreal. There is nothing in this bill, or in any other bill, that could conceivably be brought forward that could guarantee that an incident such as the one in Montreal would not occur. It is fact, Madam Speaker.

I am glad the member for Red Deer has pointed out the concerns of many citizens, especially in the regions of the country. I do not know if this is a Toronto-type bill or not, Madam Speaker, but certainly there are concerns in the country.

I hope that the reference will include some travel to regions of the country outside the major cities. I want to ask my hon. colleague from Red Deer, while I am thanking him for his outstanding contribution to this debate and for pointing out some of the concerns that I and other Canadians have, if he feels that the special committee ought to solicit the opinion of the people in the rural areas, people who own and use firearms in a very regular and lawful basis and who could be very seriously affected by some of the proposed provisions. I wonder if the hon. member would care to comment on the possibility of such a special group travelling.

Mr. Fee: Madam Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, it is not my decision whether the committee travels or not.

I would certainly encourage this House to make sure that it did. I mentioned in my speech, and my hon. colleague just mentioned that there is a difference in perception between rural and urban areas. That goes both ways. I think the committee should get out into rural Canada. We should talk to legitimate, honest, law-abiding firearms associations in the rural areas so that the urban members who sit on the committee can understand where those people are coming from and what their thoughts and feelings are. It is equally important to go into the urban areas so that the rural members have a chance to understand the concerns that are being expressed by those people.

It is also important that we involve the police associations. They have some very serious and legitimate concerns as well. It is important that this committee talk to as many Canadians in as many different locations as possible.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, this Conservative government's actions today to virtually kill their own bill on gun control, that is Bill C-80, is just another example of their excessive weakness and lack of political will. It is also an indication of their extreme incompetency and disorganization.

The government introduced a bill in the month of June to accomplish certain legislative goals. Today it has said that it does not want to proceed with its own bill, but wants to refer the subject matter, that is gun control, to a special committee for study.

Members on the government side have said this is a good thing because we should study the subject. If we had voted on the bill and passed it at second reading, it would have been required to go to a committee where it would have received study. The government could have amended the bill at second reading so it would have gone to the justice committee or a special committee. It need not have gone after the vote on second reading to a legislative committee. That did not happen. The reason it did not happen is because the government has lost the political will to proceed with the bill. It cannot get enough support in its own caucus. It probably cannot get enough support in the cabinet. If it had proceeded with the bill, the bill would have been defeated by their own members perhaps.

People watching this debate today must be very amused. Here we have a bill presented by the Conservative government that has more support from the opposition than it does from the government members. The member from Swift Current who just asked a question admitted that he is opposed to the bill. I know many members on the government side are opposed to their own government's bill. The reason the government is not proceeding with the bill at second reading is because it does not have enough support in its own caucus. The result is that we are going to refer this matter for study to a special committee. Sooner or later, this session will be prorogued and Bill C-80 will die. We will have no bill on gun control, we will have no government legislation and we will have a committee which will come up with a report.

I have been on so many of these committees that study matters where there has been a Conservative majority, and we have had unanimous reports. We have had them in the justice committee, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration and we had them on the external affairs committee.

Just the other day we dealt with the unanimous report from the Standing Committee on External Affairs which recommended certain action by the government on international debt. The government did not accept one recommendation of that committee which had a majority of Conservatives on it. Therefore, the whole matter goes nowhere after months and months of study. That is what is going to happen here and it is a disgrace. It is a disgrace because the momentum which led to this bill was the massacre, almost one year ago, of 14 young women engineering students at the École Polytechnique in Montreal. It was found that a deranged young man by the name of Marc Lépine used a Ruger semi-automatic rifle to kill these women.

What was really horrible about this whole case is that he set the men aside and decided to kill only women. He did it with a gun that was too easily available. The Canadian public recognized that and said that there is something missing in our gun laws and they must be tightened up. How is it a young man like this can easily acquire a semi-automatic Ruger weapon? It is not, by the way, an ordinary semi-automatic. This is an assault weapon that has been used by SWAT teams on police forces. It is not a weapon that is usually used for hunting. It has got an extra powerful apparatus and fires a very deadly bullet. It was that incident which led to a campaign to tighten up our gun laws, with a view to preventing this kind of incident.

The minister herself went down to the École Polytechnique in Montreal in April and she met representatives of the students. They presented her with 25 boxes of petitions containing over 500 names of people who wanted a toughening of the gun legislation. On that occasion, and it was reported in the press, she promised to bring in legislation to meet their demands before the end of May. We did not get it before the end of May.

I put questions in the House asking when the legislation was going to be presented several times. Finally, we got the legislation on June 28, I believe, the last day the House sat before the summer recess.

While the legislation was not perfect and it has some weaknesses, it definitely was a step in the right direction. There are many things in Bill C-80 which I myself had in my own Private Member's bills and motions. For example, the minister has accepted the idea that there must be a mandatory delay between the application for the firearms acquisition certificate and the granting of the firearms acquisition certificate. I had suggested two weeks. She went even further and I congratulate her on that. She went to 28 days.

That is very important because we have had incidents in Canada such as the one in Montreal where a young woman went in in the morning to buy a rifle. She was told by the owner of the sporting goods store that she needed a firearms acquisition certificate. She went to the police station, applied for the firearms acquisition certificate, got it the very same day in the afternoon, went back, bought a gun, and shot her boyfriend.

If there had been a mandatory delay in this particular case, and in many other cases, it would have given the police a bit of time to investigate the situation, as they are supposed to do under the legislation. It would have also provided a cooling off period. Very often, individuals in that situation are under an intense emotional pressure and, if given some time, they will cool down or other things might happen which might prevent the killing or the attack with a gun. Bill C-80 had that provision, that there be a mandatory delay of 28 days.

Bill C-80 also provided for a measure that I had in my Private Member's bill, that the application must be accompanied by two references of people in the community, references with respect to the responsibility of the individual applying, and also it required a photograph. All these things I think were improvements with respect to the screening out of dangerous, imbalanced individuals who might apply for a firearms acquisition certificate in order to obtain a gun.

As I said, the momentum for this bill came as a result of the massacre on December 6, 1989, at the University of Montreal. It appeared that we were going to get some legislation, but now we are not going to get any legislation. We are going to have a study. We will not oppose the study, but I must express my extreme disappointment and my extreme regret. I personally know some of the parents whose daughters were killed in that incident and, I will tell you, they are not going to take this lightly. They are going to consider it a betrayal by the government in carrying out what it had promised to do. This is not radical legislation that the government has presented. It is an improvement on what we have now, but it is not a radical departure.

By the way, on this side we agree that the subject matter of the bill should be studied in committee, but we think it should have been done after a vote on second reading. Once the bill was in committee, then, of course, we would hear witnesses. Perhaps the bill could be modified in some way and made better through amendment in committee, and maybe modified in other respects where certain people had concerns. The bill might be improved in the directions of both public safety and bureaucratic red tape, and so on, about which many hunters and sports shooters are concerned about. The bill could have been improved by a good study in committee after second reading. But what is going to happen is that we are just going to get the study and, likely, nothing at all. I hope that is not the case, but I have great fear that that is what we are going to get.

What is the paranoia suffered by the various gun lobbies in respect of gun controls? We have had gun control in the country since 1892 and it has been continually improved upon over the years. The loopholes in the legislation have been closed. That is what we are attempting to do again, but there is a paranoia suffered by some people. They are in the minority because, every time there is a Gallup poll on the subject, the overwhelming majority of Canadians wants the strict control of the acquisition and use of guns. Even in the prairie provinces, the majority wants stricter controls on guns. But, for one reason or another, the minority, the lobbies, are very active. With their flood of letters, they have upset certain members of Parliament who get flaky and back off from what should be good legislation.

What is this paranoia? Nobody, in any political party that I know of, is suggesting that we should ban all rifles, shotguns, and hunting weapons. We have three classes of weapons in this country. We have prohibited weapons. These are weapons that are banned, outright, such as machine-guns and fully automatic weapons permitted to the police and the Armed Forces, but not to ordinary citizens, and sawed-off shotguns. They are prohibited weapons which cannot be obtained by anybody. I think, everybody agrees with that.

There are restricted weapons which are mainly handguns and revolvers. They are only permitted to individuals if they can show cause, in accordance with the legislation. For example, in the case of a private detective or if there has been an attack on a family, a handgun can be applied for and the police have the discretion in giving the permit necessary for a restricted weapon.

All the others, which I would call regulated, are in the third category. Regulated weapons are the customary long guns, rifles, and shotguns. Until 1978, there was no control over those weapons whatsoever. One could walk into any sporting goods or hardware store and buy a rifle or shotgun, without any screening whatsoever. However, in Canada we found that too many murders were taking place with these long guns. In 1978, we said that, in order to buy a long gun, a shotgun or a rifle, one had to get a firearms acquisition certificate. There was to be a screening process in which one was checked for a criminal record, mental stability, any record of violence in the community, and so on. When there was indication that the individual was not responsible, then the police had the right to refuse the firearms acquisition certificate.

Nobody is suggesting that we should ban, outright, ordinary rifles and shotguns which are used for hunting and sporting purposes. Why should Canadians object to a control over a weapon which is manufactured and designed to kill? I am not talking about pop guns, guns which shoot plastic or rubber bullets, or guns which fire tear-gas. I am talking about rifles and shotguns that are manufactured to kill either animals or individuals. Why is there an objection to having at least the same control over these manufactured objects that we have on automobiles? An automobile is manufactured for transportation but, because it proceeds at great speeds, we have the licensing and the testing of people who want to drive. Nobody can just buy an automobile and drive, without taking a test, passing it, and getting a driver's licence. If someone has a history of reckless and careless driving, their licence is taken away from them. All automobiles must be licensed.

What we are suggesting for guns is not even as serious as with automobiles. Guns are designed and manufactured to kill. Why should people, for their own public safety, object to the simple regulation of these weapons? It is no more complex or bureaucratic than it is for automobiles.

There are other substances that are dangerous as well, which we put controls on. Nobody can sell over the counter certain drugs and pharmaceuticals. They can only be sold by licensed pharmacists in drug stores and a prescription from a doctor is needed to get them.

It is for the public's safety that we are trying to screen out the acquisition of guns by dangerous people.

We hear all the same time-worn arguments against gun control in general. I just heard it expressed on the other side that it is not weapons that kill, it is individuals who kill. Statistics show that it is five times easier to kill with a gun than it is with any other weapon. While it is true that an individual must take the gun and use it, it is much easier to kill with the gun. Again, if one wants to restrict and cut back on the number of murders and homicides with guns, then it should be made more difficult for the irresponsible and those individuals who have criminal backgrounds and so on to get guns.

By the way, there are studies done by the Solicitor General's department which show that in every instance when we have tightened our gun control laws the rate of crime, homicides, and armed robberies with guns has declined. We all know that in the United States there is very little control over guns. If we compare the United States with Canada, in the United States 70 per cent of the homicides are committed with guns. In Canada, only 30 per cent of homicides are committed with guns because it is much more difficult to get a gun in Canada. Furthermore, the rate of murder in the United States is approximately 9 per 100,000, whereas in Canada it is 2.5 per 100,000. We have a much lower rate of crime with guns in Canada because we have tougher gun laws right now. We also have a much lower rate of homicide in Canada than in the United States because guns are difficult to obtain.

We also hear this old argument about banning guns. Nobody is suggesting that we ban guns. We are simply suggesting that we regulate them to make them more difficult to obtain. People argue that if guns are banned then only criminals will have guns. As has already been pointed out in this debate, two-thirds of the homicides in this country are committed by first-time offenders. They are committed by members of the same family or between friends and acquaintances in a state of anxiety, alcoholism, narcotics, or in a severe argument of one kind or another. One party will go out to try to obtain a gun. If he gets it, he kills the other party. Two-thirds of our homicides are that type.

We know that we will not keep guns away from professional killers or organized criminals. They will always be able to get guns, but we can make it more difficult for those husbands who kill their wives, or people like Marc Lépine who are deranged and for some reason or another have a mania against feminism. It is the non-professional killer who commits the majority of the murders in Canada and, if we can make it more difficult for them, we will be doing something. We have accomplished some success in the past by closing some of the gaps in our gun laws, and we can continue to do that.

Before I sit down, I simply want to say that gun laws, of course, are no panacea. They are not going to eliminate totally crimes with guns. They are not going to eliminate totally homicides with guns, but they can substantially reduce crimes with guns, especially with those people who are not professional criminals. That is what we are trying to accomplish. We can do it without unduly interfering with the right of our hunters and sportsmen to carry on their hunting and their sports. It has been done in the past.

I was responsible as Solicitor General for developing and introducing the last gun control legislation in 1978. I switched to another ministry after I prepared the legislation. It was finally passed under a different Solicitor General and Minister of Justice. I can recall at that time all the same arguments that we hear today were thrown up in our face by the different lobby groups in the country, that if we passed the legislation in 1978 it would virtually destroy hunting and sports shooting in the country. But history has shown that to be complete nonsense. Hunting is still a sport.

I am not a hunter and I am not attracted to it. There is still a lot of hunting in the country, especially in the rural and northern areas where there is a long tradition and it is in the culture of these people to hunt. They have not really been interfered with. As I pointed out, we have had gun control legislation since 1892. It has been consistently toughened and tightened and has been done in a way to allow our legitimate hunters and sport shooters to carry on with their sport. As a matter of fact, many Canadians have won Olympic medals in shooting because they have been able to do that.

Madam Speaker, my time is up. I simply want to say this. We would have supported this legislation. Here we are in the opposition giving more support to a government bill than it is itself. It is backing off it. It is sending the matter to study. We hope the study is a success. But we will push hard for legislation to deal with the matter. We do not want to let down those families in Montreal whose daughters were killed and massacred a year ago.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech we heard just now by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the former Solicitor General, who is celebrating his 25th year in Parliament this year. Congratulations are indeed in order, because it is quite an achievement nowadays to have been part of this august assembly for 25 years.

However, I also took this opportunity to rise in the House because there are at least two aspects of the speech made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on which I would like to expand because I do not agree with the implications.

First of all, I would say that like my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was somewhat contradictory in what he said. When the government makes decisions, it is accused of failing to consult the people. When we want to form a special committee to study a question, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce says: The committee is unnecessary. It is just a waste of time.

If the hon. member is so concerned about the efficiency of the operations of this House, perhaps he could speak to the Liberal senators in the other place who have been holding up several bills and obstructing the parliamentary process for nearly a year now.

I am getting to the second point. Hon. members opposite, both the Liberals and the NDP, often complain that rural residents are overlooked by the government, and they make all kinds of grand speeches and give us a lot of rhetoric on the subject. We now have a wonderful and, in fact, extraordinary opportunity, Madam Speaker, to consult rural residents, whose specific concerns differ from those of city dwellers. Why not take advantage of this opportunity?

My third point and, in fact, the gist of my question is: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce referred to Canadian statistics and these will be my concluding remarks that prove that Canada has fewer murders and less violent crime per capita than the United States. However, we must remember that Canada and the United States are two entirely different countries. We cannot compare Los Angeles with Quebec City or New York with Montreal. The bigger the city and the bigger the population, the higher the crime rate, whether or not firearms are allowed. So it is unfair to compare the two.

Whether or not we have legislation—and this is my question—doesn't the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce think we will never be able to prevent people like Marc Lépine from committing this kind of crime, despite the legislation tabled by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce when he was Solicitor General of Canada?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to deal with the three points raised by my hon. colleague. I thank him for his remarks with respect to my 25 years in Parliament.

His first point suggests that we are against consultation because we would prefer to proceed by way of the bill than with this motion. We are not against consultation. I thought I pointed out very clearly in my remarks that we could have debated the bill at second reading, voted on it, passed it at second reading, and then sent it to committee—which has been done for years and years in this House—to either the justice committee, a special committee, or a legislative committee, and then hold hearings.

I agree with him. We should hold hearings. We should hold hearings with city people and with rural people. I am not in disagreement with him. We could have held the hearings by proceeding with second reading first. By proceeding with second reading first, we could have amended the bill. As he knows, if he has participated in legislative committees, you hold hearings, people suggest you amend this article, or that article, and you make amendments. You come back to the House with an amended bill. That could have been the result of the committee hearings.

By proceeding with the bill, you would have kept faith with all those people in this country who want the government to do something about gun control. The government had responded to that demand in the first place by presenting the bill. It was your government that came forward with Bill C-80. I looked at it and said that on the whole, it was a good bill. Now it is your government, having done that, that decides to proceed in a different way. I believe in consultation. It could have been done by voting on the bill at second reading and then proceeding to the hearings as we have done time and again.

I have been here for 25 years. We have done it over and over again that way. It could have been done again. We could have heard rural people and taken into account their views.

With respect to rural people, as I pointed out, we amended this twice in my time in Parliament, in 1968 with the famous Criminal Code omnibus bill, and again in 1978 when we tightened our gun laws. On each occasion people said: "You are going to destroy hunting. You are going to destroy sports shooting". We did not. We brought in amendments and tightened the law.

Can the hon. member say to me now that there is no hunting going on in rural Canada? Yes, there is hunting. They have to get firearms acquisition certificates, and most responsible hunters get them. I would say that almost 90 or 80 per cent—I do not know what the figures are—get automobile licenses because they show they can responsibly drive automobiles. The great majority of hunters show that they are responsible and get their firearms acquisition certificates.

He says it is not right. He says that Canada and the United States are two different countries and we should not compare them. He is right. They are two different countries for such reasons as our attitude to criminal justice. In Canada we have always had an approach which believed in gun controls, whereas in the United States they did not. That is one of the major differences between us which has led to lower rates of crimes with guns in Canada and which has led to lower murder rates. Canada is a safer society—not safe enough, but away safer than the United States. In the city of Toronto, a city with nearly 3 million people, last year they had 50 murders. In Detroit, a city of the same size, they had about 400 or 500 murders. Everybody is carrying a gun in Cleveland, Detroit, Buffalo and these cities.

I agree there is a difference between Canada and the United States and part of the difference is our whole approach to criminal justice.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise with the hon. member by way of comment the suggestion that this government's bill on gun control simply fails to deal with one of the real issues we are concerned with in this country. It pointed out that in 1988 almost the same number of Canadians were murdered by stabbing as by shooting, 167 for one and 169 for the other. One hundred and thirty-eight people were beaten to death. I think there were 22 strangulations.

In the murder rate in 1959 of 657, 80 per cent of the people were killed by somebody they knew, and in about half the cases it was an immediate family member. Quite often it was women murdered by their husbands or their partners with whom they shared a domestic relationship.

This government has cut the funding for the status of women. It has cut the funding for transition houses. It has cut the funding for women's organizations. It has absolutely ignored the case of violence against women in Canada. We have two very important cases in the riding I represent where RCMP officers, after domestic violence where an individual has been charged, have taken the individual back home the next morning to create further violence against the people they have lived with. It is like taking the criminal back to the scene of the crime so they can complete the task.

Crown counsels have failed in the area. It is my understanding there have been 200 charges against individuals for family violence and in that case, only 90 convictions. Of those convictions, often there was a suspended sentence with the agreement that the person not beat up or commit violence against their wife.

I might just finish with the question. What is needed is not per se gun control. We have to get to the bottom of this issue of family violence and violence against women.

Does the hon. member concur that a major failing on the part of the government on this issue is failure to address one of the real issues in this?

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, yes, I do. I think that gun control legislation can be only one element in the prevention of violent crimes in Canada, but we cannot forget about gun control. I pointed out that each time as we tightened out gun laws, we have been able to reduce the rate of crime with guns. So gun laws are important.

The hon. member is absolutely correct that if you stop with simply tightening your gun laws, you are not going to do enough. A lot of the violence is against women by their partners, spouses, or other types of partners, and there are not enough shelters for these women. There are not enough programs to deal with the men who are abusing their wives and their partners. There is a whole realm of social policies that could be advanced and put into operation that would deal with the causes of this violence. We are not doing enough there.

Governments at all levels are not doing enough, so I agree with the hon. member. That having been said, I still believe that we have to do more to control those instruments of violence, the gun, which is used more than any other weapon in killing. Thirty per cent of our homicides in Canada are committed with a gun, but the gun, different than all the others, has as its sole purpose to kill. You can cut bread with a knife, and sometimes it is used for killing, but I would rather have someone chasing me with a knife than with a semi-automatic.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to a subject that I would say is extremely important.

One of my constituents died last year on December 6, 1989, in the course of events that caused emotions to run high, not only among Quebecers but also among Canadians across the country. The events that occurred at the École polytechnique have made people in this country think about the serious consequences of social disruption and psychological trauma in some individuals. In this respect, I may recall the sad case of a young man in Montreal, Marc Lépine, who achieved his unfortunate notoriety in such sad circumstances, and in doing so shocked us all very deeply. Why, Madam Speaker?

Because we tend to think that most people on this planet are reasonable and normal and act with the judgment instilled in them by their parents from childhood. Unfortunately, our society is evolving very rapidly. Not all students in Canada are successful in their endeavours. Today, 30 per cent of our young men and women are incapable of finishing high school.

Madam Speaker, for many young Canadians, this causes problems when they start looking for a job, and as a result, there may be social and psychological problems may be extremely traumatic.

We all judged Marc Lépine very harshly last year, and this House was unanimous in announcing its awareness of a reality for which no short-term solutions can be found. However, that does not mean we should not be concerned.

Madam Speaker, I have always felt that abolishing firearms outright—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the hon. member for Saint-Maurice who, I am sure, would wish to continue his speech at some other time.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ELDERLY AND THE HANDICAPPED

ACCESS TO PUBLIC FACILITIES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take steps to convince the provinces and municipalities to encourage owners of reception halls to provide washrooms on the same floor as the reception facility for the use of the handicapped and the elderly.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise to speak to a motion that was suggested by my constituents. Because of our system, it took several months before we could discuss the motion this evening. Although my riding covers a residential area, I believe it has the largest number of reception halls of any riding in the Montreal area.

On various occasions, when I attended certain events, a number of senior citizens and disabled persons drew my attention to the inconvenience they were exposed to in certain establishments. Some of these have a banquet or reception hall on the second floor, while the washrooms are on the first floor, with no elevator or escalator between the two floors. This creates a serious problem for the elderly and disabled persons who have to go down to the first floor during the event. That is why they asked me to make representations to persuade provincial or municipal governments to adopt regulations that would require these establishments, when construction permits are issued, to provide washrooms and bathrooms on the same floor as the reception hall, or else have an elevator or escalator accessible for the disabled.

Madam Speaker, at the federal level we have the National Building Code, published by the National Research Council, and I have a copy here of certain sections of the latest version, printed in 1990. I noticed that they mention designing barrier-free access, to enable disabled persons to enter a building. They refer to entrances and routes, floors serviced by escalators, equipment controls, areas where a barrier-free route is required, and parking areas for the disabled. There are special provisions for washrooms, for instance. The number of toilets depends on the number of people. The code also specifies the size of rooms, windows, ventilation and plumbing. There are various sections in the National Building Code, but to my knowledge there is nothing in the Code or in our provincial and municipal regulations that could be used to deal with a situation I find unacceptable.

I realize that the owners of these establishments, because of relatively high costs and limited space, have to make the best possible use of the space available, but I feel this is an absolute necessity.

Imagine elderly people who during a banquet or reception have to go downstairs for quite some distance to go to the washroom, and imagine the kind of situation this creates for people in wheelchairs!

I think our National Building Code should be amended accordingly and that the provinces and municipalities should follow suit. Madam Speaker, I hope hon. members will be able to support the motion this evening so that the government can take the necessary action.

I know that my colleague from Winnipeg-North, who is very familiar with this issue, intends to stand up and speak on this motion. If there are others who wish to take part in the debate, they are all welcome to do so. I hope that once the time comes to vote, this motion we will be adopted.

Before concluding and giving the chance to others to speak, I want to add that a recent report—it was tabled in June 1990; as a matter of fact this second report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons was one of the last ones to be tabled—makes six recommendations to make life easier for disabled people. One of them, goes along the same line as my motion. It is recommendation number 5 at page 35 of the report, which reads:

> 5. That the Government of Canada undertake, in cooperation with provincial, territorial and municipal governments, to develop a federal-provincial-municipal plan of action for disabled persons that will ensure ongoing consultations, cooperation and coordinated action. This plan of action should be initiated at the forthcoming meeting of federal and provincial first ministers on the economy.

In closing, Madam Speaker, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, my constituents in Saint-Léonard, especially the elderly and the disabled, have requested on a number of occasions that this issue be resolved. I raise it in this House on their behalf and as the member of Parliament for Saint-Léonard, so that we can take the necessary steps.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all my colleagues who will speak on this subject today and give me their support so that this motion is passed.

[English]

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I wish to respond to the hon. member's motion that the government persuade provincial and municipal governments to encourage reception hall owners to provide more accessible washroom facilities for persons with disabilities.

I can heartily support this motion because I believe it is something that fits in with government policy. This government is constantly striving to improve access for disabled persons to all facilities. I quote the Prime Minister:

> Individuals with disabilities shall be assured access to fundamental elements of daily life that are generally available in the community.

This principle, taken from the Prime Minister's Declaration on the Decade of Disabled Persons, is the principle that guides the Department of Public Works in its continued effort to make barrier–free design a reality in all buildings under its custody.

Madam Speaker, allow me to tell my hon. colleague and other members of the House some of the things Public Works is already doing in this regard. It is the department's policy to ensure that all its facilities are accessible to people who have disabilities. All new buildings are designed so as to be accessible to disabled people. Information and standards on barrier–free design are regularly updated.

This government is committed to improving accessibility. The aim is to make facilities usable by a wide range of people, and we most certainly welcome input from the disabled community to guide us in this endeavour.

In accordance with Treasury Board's revised accessibility policy, Public Works is currently undertaking a five–year plan for making improvements to accessibility. Treasury Board policy on accessibility is unequivocal. Its policy objective clearly states that it will ensure that people with disabilities can gain access to facilities throughout the federal government.

All new government buildings are designed to be accessible to people in wheelchairs. Public Works' barrier–free design standard sets out requirements for door widths, ramp slopes, handrails, and washrooms, among other things.

Of course I realize the hon. member's motion addressed the question of access outside federal responsibility. Nonetheless, this government is not reluctant to confront the matter just because it does not have direct control over access standards outside federal jurisdiction. We are working with other organizations in their efforts to improve accessibility for the disabled.

For example, the government has helped the Canadian Standards Association produce a 13–volume catalogue of building products useful in making buildings accessible. It has supported the CSA in developing a national standard that was published only two months ago in a document entitled Barrier–Free Design. My hon. friend will be pleased to know that Barrier–Free Design is an excellent resource for governments at all levels. It will assist them in creating environments that will meet the needs of all individuals, including persons of disabilities. Yes, in reference to the hon. member's motion, the Barrier–Free Design document includes a section on washrooms. In fact the publication contains 13 pages on these facilities.

Governments at all levels, as well as the private sector, are strongly encouraged to adopt the national standard found in the CSA publication. With that in mind, the National Building Code has been revised to reflect the new CSA standards. Just think, Madam Speaker, how much better it will be if across the country one standard is used by architects, engineers, and others involved in building design.

It would give all of us, and especially persons with disabilities, increased access to a wide range of facilities. This government is determined to see that happen. It is really what National Access Awareness Week is all about.

Madam Speaker, 1990 marked the third year for this grassroots project. It is a most successful partnership. National Access Awareness Week brings together governments at all levels, as well as educators, business, labour, volunteer groups, and organizations of people with disabilities.

We come together and, thanks to the co-ordination, funding and support of the Department of the Secretary of State, we are attracting more community involvement and media attention each year. The week's basic goal remains the same. That goal is to change not only physical barriers but attitudinal barriers as well. That goal is to make Canada accessible to all its citizens.

We are forging partnerships that will do just that. The National Access Awareness Week committee includes 23 national groups and organizations working in every part of Canada on behalf of persons with disabilities. Thousands of Canadians help to plan the innovative activity that made the week such a resounding success.

Hon. members will know that one of the key areas on which the National Access Awareness Week focuses is transportation. Canada has had international recognition for its leadership in transportation.

That global profile is the result of new provisions in the government's 1987 National Transportation Act, which requires carriers and terminal operators for air, rail and ferry services to provide access to travellers with disabilities. As well, the special report on intercity bus accessibility commits the federal, provincial and territorial governments to develop an implementation strategy to increase access in that area.

We are already making progress. Hon. members will know that Transport Canada has funded development of a mechanized lift for intercity buses at a cost of $250,000. The department has also agreed to provide $1.2 million toward purchasing six lift equipped buses. They will be used in a three-year demonstration project in the corridor that takes in Kitchener, Hamilton, Niagara Falls, and Buffalo.

I know that hon. members will be pleased to know that the government is making every effort to ensure that persons with disabilities will not be subjected to an embarrassing loss of dignity when travelling. In that regard, between 1980 and 1988 Transport Canada spent approximately $17 million to improve accessibility at airports.

Parking, curb cuts, washrooms, and water fountains have been improved so they are more easily accessible. Other improvements have included everything from talking signs to aid people with visual impairment, to handrails and access ramps for travellers who have difficulty moving about. Transport Canada has contributed $145,000 toward a joint program with the Ontario government to operate four mini-vans in the Ottawa area. The vans which are operated by two taxi companies, are easily accessible to disabled passengers. This experiment is evaluating the potential of a taxi company as a viable alternative to para-transit services or perhaps as a complementary service.

This government has not overlooked the needs of disabled persons in small urban and rural areas. More than $3 million in grants have been put toward retrofitting 130 vehicles to transport people in smaller communities.

I am sure my hon. colleagues will agree that many persons with disabilities are perfectly capable of driving their own vehicles. This government certainly believes that. Transport Canada will spend nearly $675,000 testing vehicles adapted for drivers with disabilities and will assist them in driver training. This is definitely an appealing option in a disabled person's goal for greater autonomy.

After soliciting the views of more than 1,200 parties with an interest in transportation services for the disabled, the National Transportation Agency has submitted regulations for approval by Governor in Council, which will abolish additional fares for disabled persons travelling by air in Canada.

The agency has determined that some persons with disabilities have no choice but to travel with an assistant. Also, some disabled people require additional seats to accommodate their disability. Initially, the proposed regulations will only apply to aircraft with 30 or more seats.

To measure the impact of these regulations, the agency will review data filed by the carriers annually. At a later date the agency will develop regulations for carriers with fewer than 30 seats. I am sure hon. members will agree that the proposed regulations will make it easier for persons with disabilities to travel throughout Canada.

So, as I am sure my hon. colleagues can see, this government is doing everything in its power to give an equal opportunity to give full access and equal opportunity to persons with disabilities. After all, these are fundamental rights of Canadian citizenship, not privileges to be enjoyed only by the majority. We all experience difficulties in life but Canadians with disabilities are often faced with additional hurdles. We have the power to remove these hurdles and we are committed to removing them.

Governments, industry, community groups and disabled persons' organizations will continue to work together to enable people with disabilities to fully enjoy their rights as citizens. Considerable progress has been made, but there is still much to be done. Together we will do it. We are very pleased to support the motion.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): I am certainly delighted to speak to this Motion 526:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take steps to convince the provinces and municipalities to encourage owners of reception halls to provide washrooms on the same floor as the reception facility for the use of the handicapped and the elderly.

The motion sounds very simple in its request but is very profound in its implications. I congratulate my Liberal colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Leonard for introducing this motion. This is a very important initiative for it addresses a very important group in our society.

Thirteen to fourteen per cent of Canadians do not enjoy the same kind of mobility that most citizens are blessed with. Our society has been designed for the able-bodied.

The Ottawa Citizen recently reported on a project called "Trying on Disability". The project was aimed to raise awareness of what it is like to live in a world built for people who have no trouble getting around. Volunteers in the project who were sent to do their grocery shopping wore yellow swimming goggles with black specks on the glass to see how it felt to have cataracts. They wore slippery surgery gloves on their hands and put diving weights on their arms and legs to experience arthritis. They wore ear plugs to learn what it was like to be hearing impaired.

The reporter, Mr. Jeff Heinrich, wrote on their vivid and revealing experience, and I quote:

> We may look have looked comical, but our impersonations were deadly serious—and what we got was a vision of ourselves in old age, a sobering vision of a difficult life deprived of our basic senses and skills.

• (1720 )

The project illustrated a significant point. Many of our senior citizens face a lot of problems doing ordinary things in our fast-paced society.

It is clear that our population is growing older. It is also clear that we are going to have to take a good look at how we are servicing our senior citizens. I believe that our disabled elderly citizens face too many barriers in our society, and are denied access to essential services and amenities of life.

One important place where disabled seniors face problems is at recreation halls that do not have washroom facilities on the same floor as the reception facility. Seniors who have arthritis in their knees see the stairway as a daunting hurdle. Eventually, these seniors will avoid going to places where they have to climb up the stairs to access the washroom facilities. This means the elderly will miss out on important social and recreational activities.

This is simply unfair. Why should they, in effect, be denied access to a building only because of their disability? Our Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees each of us freedom of movement, freedom of association and many other freedoms that are infringed upon when disabled people cannot attend functions in reception halls that do not have accessible washrooms.

In total, there are 3.2 million disabled people in our country, people who have reduced basic senses and skills. This statistic includes young people who do not have the use of most of their bodies, but who are able to get around in wheelchairs. Again, one of the problems is the stairs.

Reception halls must be equipped with elevators or ramps in order for a person in a wheelchair to get from one floor to the next with dignity and without having to suffer the inconvenience and embarrassment of having to ask others to lift them up and down the stairs.

Disabled people have the same rights as able-bodied people do. They should be able to attend the same functions as we able-bodied can. We should, therefore, strive to encourage that all buildings be made accessible to them by having, at the very least, wheelchair accessible washrooms on every floor.

The government has established explicit guidelines about how to modify buildings to make them accessible to physically handicapped people, but there is no mechanism to ensure the rights of disabled citizens are honoured. There are no sanctions.

When a disabled person's rights are infringed, one recourse is to take the complaint to the Human Rights Commission. But this process is time consuming and emotionally draining. It can be very expensive.

These people do not have to face yet another inconvenience. We should be ensuring that their rights are protected and respected at all times.

I have seen one positive step recently. The committee on human rights and the status of disabled persons recently released a report on the plight of the disabled. I am glad that the Secretary of State accepted the whole report in principle. It supposedly will be used to amend acts like the Canadian Human Rights Act and design federal programs for disabled people.

We should not forget that this government must admit it has also failed in the very issue of accessibility. For example, the Canadian Human Rights Commission examined 32 federal programs this summer around the country to see if they meet barrier free design standards. Very sadly, all 32 failed.

Disabled people do not only face barriers in privately owned reception halls. They face it everywhere, including in federal buildings, buildings that are paid for by our tax money. The government must learn how to act on the issue of accessibility and encourage the private sector to do the same.

This past spring, the United States enacted a very important piece of legislation for its disabled citizens, the Americans with Disabilities Act, which forces employers to accommodate disabled employees unless the employer can prove physical changes to his or her operation would be too expensive or disruptive. Madam Speaker, we should adopt this type of program. There needs to be regulations on the construction of new buildings in Canada.

I realize that modifying buildings to make them accessible is a very costly venture, especially for owners of older, and smaller reception halls. But we must do it.

The government declared its intentions to make Canada accessible to all Canadians a long time ago. It is time to deliver on those promises. An excellent way to start is to convince provinces and municipalities to encourage private owners of reception halls to provide washroom facilities on the same floor.

At the same time, the government must seriously consider the recommendations of the committee on human rights and the status of disabled persons. We must develop goals and effective strategies to make all buildings accessible to everyone. We must enforce these standards.

Many other rights depend on them, including the right to have a reasonable employment.

In conclusion, I would like to say that indeed the hon. member for Saint-Léonard has the foresight and sensitivity in caring for the needs of the disabled and the elderly. He introduced his private member's motion a year ago and the standing committee of our House did present its report this June and in essence supported the intention of my hon. colleague.

I now challenge fellow members to support this particular motion as an important first step to achieving our goal of equality for all Canadians, including the disabled and the elderly.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, last week I received a letter from friend of mine who is in Vancouver. He is a handicapped man. He is in a wheelchair. But he is also the Social Credit member of the legislature from Vancouver—Little Mountain. His name is Doug Mowat. That letter reads as follows. It is addressed to myself and it says:

> Your indication that the entrance to one bathroom in all future social housing will be accessible for persons in wheelchairs as well as walkers is a major breakthrough and demonstrates the strong commitment of your Ministry and the Government of Canada to physically disabled persons.
> Every time you see a person in a wheelchair, you'll know that you made it possible for them to use the bathrooms in C.M.H.C. sponsored buildings! Seriously, we highly commend you for this step. It will not be a costly modification, but one that will mean so very much to both disabled and elderly citizens.

It is signed by Doug Mowat, the member of the Legislative Assembly in British Columbia for Vancouver—Little Mountain.

The modifying of entrances to bathrooms in social housing projects is certainly one way in which we can break down the physical barriers which keep handicapped people and frail, elderly people, for that matter, fully participating in Canadian society.

The motion that was put forward by the hon. member outlines another way in which this can occur, to ensure that the handicapped and elderly people are able to fully participate in social events, family events, community events and all kinds of events and activities.

[Translation]

In the 1990s there is no reason why people should be denied access to these events or feel ill at ease because such facilities are lacking.

[English]

I am very pleased to be able to advise the hon. member that the National Building Code for 1990 has provided significant improvements to ensure that future construction of buildings designed for public events meet the basic needs of those who have mobility problems.

Approximately 300 people, including representatives from the disabled, industry, governments, and of course, users devote their time, free of charge, to this kind of a consultation exercise involving updating the National Building Code.

My own department, the federal housing agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is a part of this process. This year this group, devoting its time free of charge, has seen to it that the National Building Code has been revised so that all regular washrooms in a building to which a barrier-free path of travel is required will be barrier-free to all persons with disabilities. Buildings equipped with elevators must be barrier-free and all washroom facilities in these buildings will be barrier-free. Where several washrooms are provided on a large floor area, not all washrooms need to be barrier-free, provided that a barrier-free washroom is available within 45 meters and the location of that barrier-free washroom is clearly indicated.

A barrier-free washroom is required on the entrance level in buildings less than four storeys which are not equipped with elevators. This requirement will avoid situations where washrooms are located in the basement or on the second floor of a small building which is otherwise accessible.

It is my hope that the provinces and the municipalities will readily adopt these sections of the National Building Code. They are well aware of the changing mix of the population and that governments at all levels must move to meet the increasing demand of a rapidly aging population.

As a society, we have to be very sensitive to the fact that at the moment 10 per cent of the population is 65 years of age or older. By the end of the century, the percentage will have climbed to 13 per cent and, by the year 2031, seniors will account for an estimated 25 per cent, a full one-quarter of the Canadian population. This is a phenomenon that we never faced before and we have got to begin to deal with it now.

Almost one-half, or in fact 46 per cent, of Canadians over the age of 65, 1.2 million people, have some form of either mental or physical disability. That compares with about 13 per cent in the general population. More than 80 per cent of disabled seniors have a mobility or agility disability and a great many of these Canadians are on fixed or low incomes.

[Translation]

The hon. member is right, Madam Speaker. We have to find every possible means to open the doors of community living to seniors and handicapped persons. But it is just as important to redesign their living accommodations.

[English]

You are aware, Madam Speaker, that in 1985 the federal government undertook some consultations with respect to housing policy. At that time the government announced its new directions in housing. There was a complete review of the housing policies and programs. They involved extensive consultations with the provinces with a full range of groups that were active in housing. Among the groups that were consulted at that time included the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled and the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped. Their input at that time was very valuable in the development of the government's new directions in housing. As a result, at least 5 per cent of the units in non-profit and urban native housing programs must be accessible and designed as mobility units.

A mobility unit is one in which space is provided for manoeuvring wheelchairs. The actual number of mobility units in each project is determined by demand. Further adaptations of mobility units can be included in the project costs that are eligible for assistance. Up to 12 per cent additional to the maximum unit price which governs the cost of units in assisted housing is provided for adaptations in the case of non-profit and co-operative housing programs.

Since the changes were made in 1985 in the non-profit and co-operative housing programs, of the 65,400 housing units that have been built since that time, some 9,300 have been designed for the disabled. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation subscribes, of course, to the independent living concept and one of the major steps, during the International Year of the Disabled, in 1981, was to ensure that existing housing becomes more accessible to disabled persons.

During the consultation process, which took place in 1985, groups representing disabled persons criticized the inadequacy of the limited assistance of the $1,500 that was available at that time to make barrier-free, liveability modifications, under the existing Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, or RRAP as we call it. These groups suggested that a separate program for disabled persons should be put into effect.

In response to that, the government introduced a new program to meet the needs of disabled persons who were occupying existing housing, not just for new housing projects. The RRAP for the disabled was first implemented in 1986. It provides financial assistance to the owners of housing accommodation to improve the accessibility of rental and ownership units, occupied or intended for occupancy by disabled persons. The program is geographically universal and there is no age limit on the properties involved.

For home owners, the assistance is in the form of a loan of $10,000, of which $5,000 may be forgiven depending on the income of the applicant. There is full forgiveness at $23,000 of adjusted income, reducing to zero at $33,000. For landlords, as well, there are forgivable loans that are equal to the cost of the modifications, up to a maximum of some $5,000 for each self-contained unit and $25,000 for each bed unit, but the landlord has to enter into a rental agreement and that limits rent increases for five years.

I see, Madam Speaker, that you are giving me the high sign. I want to close by indicating that I applaud the hon. member's motion. I think it reinforces actions that the government has been taking in the last five or six years. I want to assure the hon. member that he has my full support and the government's full support for going forward with more improvements to help disabled, handicapped, elderly or frail people.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the motion introduced on September 27, 1989 by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard concerning easier access for the handicapped.

Ever since it came into office this government has shown outstanding leadership with respect to the integration of handicapped people. It has made concerted efforts to promote the unrestricted participation of disabled Canadians in every activity in the life of our society.

As early as 1985 the Prime Minister made a statement marking the Decade of Disabled Persons and announced a series of principles which were to be the mainstay of his government's policy.

With a view to making all federal buildings readily accessible, the government steers and supports all such initiatives taken by the Department of Public Works.

DPW officials have taken steps to make sure that federal buildings are easily accessible. Indeed all new construction must be in accordance with public works architectural standards.

In addition, specifications on unobstructed structures are updated on a regular basis. Structures specifically mentioned in these regulations include doors, access ramps, ramps generally and washroom facilities.

A visit to Canada's Museum of Fine Arts and to the Canadian Museum of Civilizations will convince you that the standards are respected. Disabled persons experience no problems at all when going through these magnificent buildings which have been adapted to their needs.

But the federal government has gone one step further, acknowledging that we have to help disabled persons to lead a more satisfactory and more productive life within our society.

This is why the government has spared no efforts to make Canadians more aware of the physical obstacles standing in the way of the handicapped. It has been seeking the active co-operation of others—provinces and municipalities especially—to promote similar initiatives from coast to coast.

The Secretary of State was among the many organizations which responded favourably to the call to action. In 1988, the department launched the National Access Awareness Week, a golden opportunity to make Canadians appreciate the kind of obstacles a disabled person faces every day and to urge them to do something to facilitate the active participation of their less fortunate fellow citizens.

The result of co-operation by federal-provincial governments, municipalities, unions, agencies that support the disabled and the private sector, this initiative has also helped spotlight the needs and expectations of these Canadians in the five main areas that are the focus of the week: transportation, housing, the workplace, recreation and education.

This week also initiated the Five-Star Community Award Program, whose purpose is to give Canadian communities an opportunity to show their commitment to integration of the disabled. The program also pays tribute to achievements by municipalities in this area.

The quality of facilities and services made available to persons with a disability in Canada depends largely on municipalities and communities, and the Five-Star Community Award, sponsored by the National Access Awareness Week Committee, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities and the Department of the Secretary of State, offers an incentive to consider how they can improve the quality of life of disabled members of their communities and take the necessary action to achieve that objective.

From year to year, this program has become increasingly popular. In 1990, about 15 municipalities across the country received Star Awards, and for the first time since the program started in 1988, a Five-Star Community Award, the highest award for access awareness, was given to the municipality of Redvers in Saskatchewan, and to Ottawa and Kitchener in Ontario.

In Quebec, a Star Award went to the municipality of Saint-Louis-de-France, which organized a special transportation service covering ten neighbouring municipalities.

Calgary, Alberta, has also received a Star Award. The city has taken a number of steps to guarantee access to its buildings and facilities. In fact, the city has had a parallel transportation system for 19 years.

Actually, the Five-Star Community Award Program is only one of many initiatives taken by this government, in conjunction with its partners, to make this country more accessible to all citizens.

Madam Speaker, I would also like to draw the attention of hon. members to the government's response to the report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons which was tabled not long ago.

In line with its commitment to promoting full and complete integration of disabled persons, the present government intends to act on the committee's recommendations to a very considerable extent.

It will undertake a detailed analysis of federal legislation as it relates to disabled persons; it will conduct a post-censal survey in 1991, to update the national data bank on the disabled; and it will establish a committee of deputy ministers that will be asked to improve co-ordination of federal activities in this area.

Every citizen has a contribution to make to its community and the right to participate in its life. So, whenever we remove obstacles for the handicapped, we increase their potential to make such a contribution and we build up a pool of skills for the benefit of our communities and the general wealth of the nation.

We have recognized that reality, Madam Speaker and that is why this government is determined to pursue its goals with the co-operation of his partners, the provinces and municipalities, in every area under its jurisdiction so as to allow the handicapped the opportunity to become full-fledged citizens.

In conlusion, Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Saint-Léonard who raised this issue which will continue to be a priority for Canadians as a whole and particularly for this government.

[English]

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Saint-Leonard on the resolution he has placed before the House this afternoon and to say to him that the spirit of his resolution is one which we all support. It gives us an opportunity to speak once again about the plight of the handicapped and the disabled in our society and of the steps that we must take to accommodate and help them.

Every member of this House recognizes that the 13 per cent of our population with disabilities, some 3.2 million Canadians, have a long way yet to go before they achieve the same rights to access and participation in the life of our society and country that most of us take for granted.

Nowhere is that more evident than when it comes to the question of economic integration. Persons with disabilities are among the poorest members of our society. Sixty per cent of the disabled in the 1986 census reported incomes under $10,000 per year. Their participation rate in the paid labour force is only slightly above half that of adult Canadians without a disability.

Without economic integration, very few Canadians with disabilities will ever know economic independence. Without that independence, participation in our society or in any society will seldom be realized.

Not so long ago the traditional attitude toward persons with disabilities was to exclude them from the productive sectors of our society because they were thought capable only of dependence. Our laws and our policies were directed in effect to limiting their self reliance with the result that regardless of abilities, they were effectively isolated from the mainstream.

Today, we know better. We know that within the disabled community of Canada, there is a resource of talent and ability that, given the opportunity, can not only improve the lives of persons with disabilities themselves, but also contribute significantly to society's growth and to society's prosperity.

These are the beliefs reflected in the recommendations of the standing committee's report. When the government tabled its response to that response on November 8, my colleague, the Secretary of State wrote in his letter to the chairperson of the committee, the hon. member for Oxford, the government's clear and emphatic acceptance of the committee's recommendations.

Let us look at the standing committee's recommendations and the government's response to them. Recommendation one of the standing committee calls for the Government of Canada to work with the committee, the voluntary sector, the private sector, labour, and with the disabled community itself, to bring forward a national strategy to achieve the economic integration of persons with disabilities.

What was the government's response? In no uncertain terms, the government pledged itself to the objective of economic integration. It pledged that not only would the minister responsible for the disabled work in partnership toward this goal, but that the Ministers of Health and Welfare, Employment and Immigration and Finance would be partners in that work.

Going beyond that, Public Works Canada is another major government department which makes a commitment almost daily on behalf of the disabled. The decade 1983 to 1992 has been termed the decade of disabled persons, so declared by the Prime Minister. We participate the first week of June each year in National Access Awareness Week to underline that commitment. This participation is particularly important, as I have said, to Public Works Canada.

Those of us who are fortunate enough not to be disabled do not usually appreciate the barriers faced by others. We do not have to phone a restaurant beforehand to find out if the door is wide enough for our wheelchair. However, most of us have, at one time or another, tried to find an office hidden in a poorly designed maze of corridors. Laden down with packages or a briefcase, we have tried to open heavy doors. Those occasions should help us to understand the plight of disabled persons.

All of us have a stake in barrier-free design. The rate of disability increases with age, to the point that today two out of every five Canadians aged 65 or more will live to be disabled in some way or another.

It is not only physical barriers that must come down. Ramps are being built, doorways are being widened and employment equity is moving ahead. But there are many other invisible barriers which Public Works Canada and all Canadians are endeavouring to address. These include inadequate understanding of what disabled people can do.

There is a myth that society has an obligation to take care of disabled people. Too often we remain ignorant about their capabilities and hence think only in terms of caring for them. Rather than providing them with opportunities to live their lives in dignity and to fully contribute their skills to society, we make them dependent upon others.

It might be useful for employers to realize that 79 per cent of disabled workers have attendance records equal to, or better than, those of non-disabled employees, or that disabled people have greater job stability and less turnover than non-disabled workers.

We should also remember that a disability does not always present a handicap. Often it means that a disabled person may do something a little differently than a non-disabled person, but with equal success.

We have had some great champions in Canada for the disabled. People like Terry Fox, Steve Fonyo and Rick Hansen have demonstrated that in the Canadian spirit, there are champions, disabled or not.

Public Works Canada, as the nation's largest construction agency, is concerned in that spirit with removing physical barriers to the free movement of persons with disabilities. Indeed, the department has been actively involved in barrier-free design since the 1970s. Since 1982, all new federal government buildings must comply with Public Works Canada's barrier-free design standard. Our newest museums—air, art and civilization—were built according to this standard. Another major program is to make existing buildings accessible. That program is nearly complete.

Items in this standard will include maximum permissible slopes for wheelchair ramps, the prohibition of projections in passageways which would be dangerous to people with visual problems, the development of specifications for accessible parking spaces to be used by disabled persons, and specifications for telephones to be used by hearing-impaired persons.

Recently, Treasury Board revised its policy on accessibility by calling for improvements to be made over the next five years at other federal government facilities besides offices, such as laboratories, hospitals and our national parks. Public Works Canada will be called on to respond to the challenge of making these significant changes and improvements across the country.

The Canadian Standards Association was contracted by Public Works Canada to develop a national building standard for accessibility which we hope will be used by governments and private organizations across the country to accomplish some of the objectives described in the motion of the hon. member for Saint-Léonard.

This standard is very important. It is easy enough to design a doorway wide enough for a wheelchair before a building is built, but not so easy once the building has been constructed. The point is that if a consistent national design standard is in place which recognizes the importance of accessibility, we could eliminate the extra construction costs of having to go back to renovate structures for accessibility afterward.

In closing, Public Works Canada initiatives include the provision of way-finding tools to help people, including the visually impaired, find their way around federal facilities, to construct meeting rooms with specially-designed acoustics for those who cannot hear so well, and especially measures to assist disabled people during an emergency, such as the outbreak of fire.

Public Works Canada has a proud record, not only in barrier-free design but in developing procedures that ensure the security of disabled persons and eliminate barriers to employment.

I believe that Public Works Canada set a standard and an example that speak well and fully to the spirit and to the objectives of this motion.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, how could you forget the riding I come from, Cariboo-Chilcotin. It is the home of Rick Hansen, who comes from my home town of Williams Lake. He attended school with my daughters. He grew up as a normal, healthy, fairly athletic young man. He, of course, did not know what was going to happen to him. In his late teens he was in a tragic automobile accident and became paralysed from his waist down. That young man took a totally new situation and transformed it from one that could have been so tragic into one where he is just starting to build a life with much meaning.

Obviously he is well known now around the world, not just across Canada. Every time I meet him and talk to him, I am thrilled with what he has shown, not only to the handicapped but to the rest of us, can be done when a person either grabs the opportunity or, as in many cases needs to be done when he is offered the opportunity.

I tend to look on people with a handicap in a different way because of my association with Rick Hansen. I do not think of it so much as what we can do for the handicapped. It is a tragedy of the resource that is there, a Canadian resource that we are not fully utilizing.

Everyone recognizes that in many cases there are special efforts that have to be taken if we are going to be using this special resource. It may require modifications to facilities, obviously access to buildings and washroom facilities. Those have to be done. They take money, some thought and consideration.

There are other factors, for example, the normal equipment in a place of work. Let us take the example of an office. One business in my riding in 100 Mile House is quite small but it was determined that it was going to take advantage of this resource and do what it could to fit them into the work scheme. Not only did it have to modify the facilities as I described, but obviously the normal office equipment had to be modified. It took pains to do this on its own.

In many cases special training is required. For example, people without full utilization of their limbs are able with proper training and proper facilities to take advantage of and use computer equipment as effectively as the rest of us.

The office I refer to in 100 Mile House actually has handicapped people using typesetting equipment. After a short period of time they were able not only to do the job as well as someone we think of as not handicapped, but the employers valued them as being superior.

I have been impressed by only a few examples I have seen in my riding, which is a rural riding. We do not tend to have as much exposure to handicapped people as in a larger riding. Therefore, it requires more effort on the part of citizens, businesses, and everyone who lives in these centres to make sure we are taking the effort, that we are opening our eyes to the opportunities that these Canadians deserve, and the resource they provide to our businesses and communities that should be taken advantage of.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

I do want to apologize to the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin. It is the end of a long day, and I drew a blank when it came to remembering his beautiful riding in British Columbia.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

REFUGEES

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I am rising today on a very important issue, especially for the greater metropolitan area of Toronto and for Ontario.

We have a backlog of over 80,000 refugees who have come seeking refuge in our country. Most of them are here because they could not have peace in their own countries. We have close to 44,220 English speaking refugees who we categorize as group four. They arrived before December 31, 1988.

For those members who do not know, the government has four offices in Ontario: Ottawa, London, Toronto, and Mississauga. The workload is extremely heavy, especially in two offices: the one in Toronto, which is called Davisville, and the other in Mississauga. At present the government is trying to find a solution to this problem and it is failing completely. Like I said, there are 44,220 English speaking refugees waiting to be processed. In the Toronto office alone there are 22,000 such cases that the government will have to deal with before September 1991.

I telephoned the department and spoke to department officials. I asked them: "What are you doing?" They said: "We are dealing with English speaking cases. The other ones, we are putting on the back-burner". It is tough luck for someone who has been waiting for four to six years, does not speak English and is not in the group four category, which is mainly people from the Caribbean Islands. Someone from Pakistan, South Africa, South America or the Middle East who does not speak English is going to have to wait.

I have people coming to my office who have been waiting to be reunited with their families for four, six, and eight years. Yet this government is doing nothing else but saying: "Tough luck. We are going to put you on the back-burner".

The Toronto office will be able to handle 7,000 hearings over the next year. That is working full tilt every day, working straight ahead and that is dealing only with English speaking cases.

The minister's officials are overworked. They work late in the evening, on weekends, on long weekend and on holidays. They say: "We are trying to do whatever we can in order to cope." They are human beings and they can see clearly that these other human beings have to be united with their family. They have within them some humanity, but the humanity should be with the minister and her officials.

Clearly the department has failed. It has failed Canadians and it has failed these people who are coming to Canada seeking refuge.

In the summer of 1987, when a boatload of Sikhs landed on the coast, the Prime Minister declared it an emergency and recalled Parliament. These people were doing nothing else but seeking refuge in Canada. We have 80,000 of them in Canada right now. Departmental officials scrapped the old legislation. They said that it was not working. They introduced new legislation which was supposed to clear this backlog by September 1991. Then they extended it to January 1992. This practice or what this department is grossly unfair, especially to the people who do not speak English, the non-English speaking refugees. A lot of them have taken up different methods. They are depressed. They have contemplated committing suicide. A lot of them are saying: "I cannot stand it any more. I am going to go back home." I know cases of Ahmadis refugees from Pakistan who came to this country. I spoke to the minister's officials and warned them that a man was going to leave and go back to Pakistan. Do you believe, Madam Speaker, that they did not react? They could not care less if somebody was going to go back and face uncertainty or prosecution. Clearly they could have moved up his hearing. This man was at his wit's end. He was ready to commit suicide. He had not seen his family for eight years, and he went back. I found out that he ended up in jail as soon as he went back.

It is not only that, but we clearly see from the Auditor General that this department is abysmal. I quote:

> The system was extremely prone to large-scale abuses and became overloaded by a growing number of claims that compounded existing delays.

It continues:

> Changes had either not been implemented or were not operating as intended. The number of claims greatly surpassed the capacity of the system.

The Auditor General clearly states:

> The backlog clearance program will cost more than estimated.

When will this minister finally realize that the system has failed? When will she do something about it? We need results, and we need them today.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand on the reply given by the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration to the member for Scarborough—Agincourt on October 12, 1990.

As of October 26, more than 54 per cent of the backlog of 85,000 cases had been opened and 31 per cent had been decided. The time has now arrived, as everyone knew it would, to begin processing claimants from Caribbean countries. Any suggestion that this or any other group has been singled out for special attention is simply wrong.

Any grouping of claimants from a single language group is made purely for reasons of efficiency. It is not a departure from the principles guiding the backlog process. For example, to maximize operational efficiency, sometimes panel hearings are scheduled according to language based upon the availability of interpreters. If the hon. member wants us to forget about efficiency, he should say so. His party has had a long history in that regard.

Employment and Immigration Canada has given a mandate to clear the refugee claimant backlog within two years. Immigration officials are administering the backlog clearance program in co-operation with independent adjudicators and members of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

These officials must cope with constraints such as adjournments, scheduling problems related to panel hearings, and clients who do not attend scheduled interviews.

Program officials have been making and will continue to make every effort to streamline operations to maximize operational efficiency.

One thing that is being done by these officials is voluntary overtime. They are working very hard to do this. The hon. member and all other members of the House should be joining with me in congratulating them on their good work.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this adjournment debate in reference to the question I put in the House on November 8, 1990 concerning the Oka crisis. I have been badgering away, trying to get the government to reveal what it knows happened in the Oka crisis last summer.

As a country we have become sort of like Bourbon kings were. The Bourbon kings in history were known for people who learn nothing from history. A smart country learns from its past and from its mistakes.

Let's go back to 1970 when the army was called into Quebec. It was under the War Measures Act and the National Defence Act of Canada. I think in retrospect historians are saying now that using the War Measures Act was an over-reaction. In fact having the federal arm lock up innocent Quebec nationalists increased Quebec nationalism rather than decrease it.

• (1810)

What did Parliament do? Parliament came back with a new government, and the government got rid of the War Measures Act, the old Liberal act, and passed a very progressive emergencies act. The emergencies act had provisions for Parliament being consulted when there is a crisis, controls on the armies called out, full reports, debate and so on.

It happened again. It happened in Oka in 1990, 20 years later. What did the government do? It forgot about the Emergency Measures Act. It used the National Defence Act and called in the army.

Right now under the National Defence Act of Canada—and this is what happened last summer—a provincial premier can unilaterally call in the Canadian Army for as long as he wants the army there, and the federal government pays the whole shot: $60 million.

Mr. Milliken: No, no.

Mr. Waddell: Yes, that is right, my friend. The act has been amended. The federal government pays it.

In this case we should go to Quebec and we should say we want $30 million of that back. Better still, we should look at what has happened and what should we be looking for. We need, as I suggested in my question a full inquiry into the Oka matter, not just to make cheap political points but to really learn something from this crisis.

First of all, let me refer to the Sûreté du Québec. Claude Ryan, a Quebec minister, submitted a report to Ottawa. I have a copy of it here. it was two pages and it said nothing really of the breakdown in control over the Sûreté that led to the causes of Oka.

Why did the Sûreté du Québec storm the roadblocks in Oka that caused the death of one officer? Who gave the order? It was tragic circumstances, but we really need to know what happened. This could be important for the future. What if there is another confrontation at James Bay, for example, in the big hydro project that is going to be developed there? We could learn with a full inquiry as to why the Sûreté was called out and why it really messed up.

We also want to know how the federal government was involved? Did it know about this beforehand? Why didn't it take steps to solve this land claim instead of allowing the municipal council to make a golf course when Indians claimed it was their land? Apparently they have a good claim. It is so good the federal government has paid $3 million or $4 million to deal with it. It could have saved $60 million had it done that before.

Finally, turning to the native people as well, where did the warriors get all those guns? How did the warriors get control in Kahnawake and Kanesatake? Maybe we should look into that so that it does not happen again, so that we have a fair and full land claims process in Canada, and so that we can have real justice and democracy for native people in the country.

I think these are lessons that we could learn from Oka. The government has stonewalled mostly all our attempts to have a full inquiry, so much so that in the Indian affairs committee the other day it was blocking out an inquiry. I suggested it in my question that we need a full public inquiry into the affairs at Oka. Why? Because we can learn something as a country from that and we may not make the same mistakes again.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised this issue of a further inquiry into the stand-off at Oka on a number of occasions, but this issue has been referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs. The committee should be allowed to do its work and reach its own decision in its terms of reference.

The need for the type of inquiry called for by the hon. member requires careful consideration. There is no question but that the actions of the Canadian Armed Forces at Oka were in conformity with the law and in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The chief of the defence staff responded to a lawful requisition from the Attorney General pursuant to Part XI of the National Defence Act. The army units involved acted throughout with a commendable degree of professionalism. The inquiry called for under the Act was undertaken by the province, and the resulting report was recently made public by the Secretary of State. In this regard it is also worth noting the Federal Court on two separate occasions has concluded that the actions of the Canadian Armed Forces did not result in any violations of the Charter. In my view it is important to look forward rather than back with regard to the government's relationship with aboriginal people. The events at Oka ended with a minimum of violence.

Rather than examining every detail of these events, we should move forward, building on the agenda outlined by the Prime Minister in his speech to the House on September 25, 1990. In that speech the Prime Minister set out an agenda with four main pillars: land claims, economic and social conditions on reserves, the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments and concerns of Canada's aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canadian life.

The goal for this agenda is to create a new relationship between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians. Its purpose, in my view, is to create a relationship with aboriginal people where Oka-type confrontations will not only be irrelevant but also unthinkable. Much can be achieved by focusing our efforts and energies in proceeding with the government's agenda. Little will be achieved by continuing to look back at the events that are passed and given the government's agenda, need not be repeated.

BILL C-69

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on the third of the brief debates this evening to expand on a question I put to the Minister of Justice last June. It has taken awhile to get on the Adjournment Debate. In fact, when I got the call that it might come up, I had forgotten the question, but I have reviewed it and I now recall the question and the most unsatisfactory answer the government gave on this occasion, which is not unusual.

The question that I put to the minister was, what was the Minister of Justice going to do now that the Court of Appeal of British Columbia had decided that the government had no authority to cap its obligations under the Canada Assistance Plan, as proposed in Bill C-69, which I believe is still before the other place.

The minister indicated that she was just going to appeal this decision. She did not like it and so she was going to appeal it. I submit that what we have here is the government acting in considerable contempt of the law of the country in tearing up and avoiding its obligations with the provinces. These are solemn obligations.

The government has certain taxation powers conceded by the provinces in exchange for payment of certain programs. The Canada Assistance Plan is one of those programs. What the government is seeking to do by Bill C-69—we have had this argument in the House before—is change those programs to the detriment of Canadians and particularly those in three provinces: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

The effect of Bill C-69 is to restrict the rate of growth of federal payments under the Canada Assistance Plan to 5 per cent for both 1991 and 1992 and the restriction applies only to those three provinces.

I may say that I believe this is the first time in Canadian history that the federal government has acted in a discriminatory way in the administration of cost-shared programs with the provinces. Instead of allowing provinces to participate if they choose to do so, it has said that certain provinces will only be allowed to participate so much, or at least to a certain extent. The government will decide which provinces will be the ones that it thinks have too much money and might be able to get a larger share of the pot if they are able to participate in these programs.

In other words, the poorer provinces can have what they want and the judgment as to who is poor and who is rich will rest with the federal government. The others will have to either pay for the program themselves or make do with less if they proceed with it with federal involvement.

I submit that is a bad principle for us to be involved in in federal-provincial relations. This government has claimed consistently that it was out to solve federal-provincial relations in Canada. I submit that it is painfully obvious on all the evidence that it has not only botched that but it has driven wedges into the relations between the provinces and the federal government in this country such as we have never seen in the past.

What is the effect of these cuts?

• (1820 )

The two most devastating cuts affect shelters for battered women, which are partly funded through the Canada Assistance Plan, and the 5 per cent ceiling applied in the three provinces. They will probably result, depending on the province's own financial circumstances, in fewer shelters being built and a freeze on existing services. Child care programs are also funded through the Canada Assistance Plan. This restriction will ensure that fewer child care facilities are built and existing services are frozen or expanded at a less rapid rate. That is a very serious problem particularly when the government pledged child care as one of its principal planks in the 1988 election campaign.

Mr. Nicholson: Ask your friends in the Senate.

Mr. Milliken: The parliamentary secretary says to ask my friends in the Senate. The nerve of him, making a comment like that.

The Senate got that bill about a week before Parliament was dissolved and the bill was not passed in that place. The Prime Minister ranted and raved, as the parliamentary secretary is probably going to do, all across the country and said that the Senate had blocked child care in Canada and that if it was not for the Senate, we would have child care.

That election was two years ago. The Prime Minister could have introduced and had passed a child care bill in the House. He has used closure on almost everything else, and he could have easily had a bill through the House by now, or even a year ago. But, has there been any move by the government to introduce child care into the House? No, all we have had is a cut and the cut is right here in Bill C-69. That is how the government keeps its promises.

Instead of introducing a bill to do what it said it was going to do, and what it said was so vital all through the campaign in 1988, it has introduced a bill that reduces child care in Canada. There is no other explanation for this bill. This is not just a breach of promise. This is not just a case of not fulfilling a promise. This is actually going back on a promise and making conditions worse than they were when it was making the promises of pie in the sky.

The government deceived Canadians. It was one of the many frauds perpetrated on Canadians during the 1988 election. We are now seeing the government's true colours. It wants to slash, slash, slash. It wants to cut programs for Canadians. This is an indication of its desire to reduce Canada's social programs. If this bill is allowed to remain in place, it is known and it is stated by economists that, by the year 2000 or shortly thereafter, there will be no money available under EPF transfers.

That is the other thing Bill C-69 does. It blocks and reduces EPF transfers. By the year 2000, there will be none of these available. Funding for education and health care in Canada will have been abandoned to the provinces insofar as the federal government is concerned. The attitude will be, if the province wants to have these programs in place, the province is going to have to pay. There will no national standards, no national programs.

This is an abandonment and dereliction of duty and I call on the government to respond to the Court of Appeal by agreeing with it and withdrawing this bill before the other place at once.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to place this matter in context. It is useful to restate two questions that the government of British Columbia placed before the Court of Appeal.

The first question was this. Has the Government of Canada any statutory prerogative or contractual authority to limit its obligation under the Canada Assistance Plan and its agreement with the government of British Columbia, dated March 23, 1967, to contribute 50 per cent of the cost to British Columbia of assistance and welfare services? That was the first question.

The second question was this. Do the terms of the agreement of March 23, 1967, between the two governments, the subsequent conduct of the Government of Canada pursuant to the agreement and the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan give rise to a legitimate expectation that the Government of Canada would introduce no bill into Parliament to limit its obligations under the agreement or the act without the consent of British Columbia?

The Court of Appeal answered the first question in the affirmative. The Government of Canada agrees, of course, that its obligations under the Canada Assistance Plan may be altered in the manner proposed in the February budget only by an amendment to the plan. That, of course, is the purpose of clause 2 of Bill C–69.

With respect to the majority opinion of the Court of Appeal in response to question number two, that the consent of British Columbia to an amendment of the plan was required, the Minister of Justice indicated to the House last June 18 that the government would be appealing this decision to the Supreme Court of Canada. I am pleased that that appeal has now been commenced. It will be heard December 11 and 12.

The Minister of Justice also indicated on June 18 that, pending the review and decision by the Supreme Court of Canada, the views of the court of appeal on the Canada Assistance Plan legislation would be respected. That remains the position of the government.

It is evident that the appropriate course of action is not, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands suggested, to withdraw this bill. On the contrary, it is clearly in the interests of controlling the federal budgetary deficit that these portions of Bill C–69, unrelated to the Canada Assistance Plan litigation, be proceeded with expeditiously. That is the course of action that the government will be pursuing. It is wholly consistent with the position announced by the Minister of Justice on June 18.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions on both sides of the House, and I believe you will find that there is consent for the following motion:

That, immediately following the adoption of this motion, these provisions be in force for proceedings in the House this day, notwithstanding any Standing Order:

1. Supplementary Estimates (B) be tabled and referred to various Standing Committees as in the motion of the President of the Treasury Board, without question being put;

2. Orders of the Day be called immediately thereafter, until Statements by Members at 11 o'clock a.m., followed by Oral Questions at 11.15 o'clock a.m.;

3. All Routine Proceedings be called at noon in the usual manner, followed by Government Orders until 2 o'clock p.m., during which time

a) Bill C-92, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, shall be disposed of at all stages, on division, and

b) Government Business No. 23 respecting the appointment of a Special Committee to study the subject-matter of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, and any amendments thereto, shall be disposed of on division;

4. Private Members' Business be called at the usual time;

5. At the completion of the time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business the House suspend to the call of the Chair, for the sole purpose of receiving a message respecting the giving of Royal Assent to Bill C-87, an act to amend the statue law in relation to war veterans, later this day, and that following such Royal Assent, upon return to this Chamber, the Speaker shall adjourn the House until 1 o'clock p.m. Monday, November 26, 1990.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that there have been discussions. I just wanted to make a couple of observations on this motion.

If we accept this motion, we will be forgoing the opportunity to demand that the House divide on the question of referring the estimates to committees. We do this because we are very anxious that committees review these estimates.

Second, we are very concerned about the rejigging of the government's spending plan and want a very thorough and complete committee review of the major elements contained in the supplementary estimates.

Before giving our final consent to this motion, I seek the government's assurance that it will not play games or impede the committees from doing the important work that we will be sending them.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want you and this house to know that there have been no discussions with the group I represent and other independent members. We are anxious to hear the figures the Minister of State (Finance) has for us, but I would not want the Government Leader to construe this as a precedent. If the government Leader and the leader of the Liberal Party think that they can take us for granted, let me tell them this. We will grant consent this once, but next time, please consult. Otherwise, you will not have consent.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Government Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to present his motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, given the exceptional co-operation and our agreement to this process, I wonder if the minister could guarantee that the estimates are available to members of Parliament now and that distribution downstairs has copies of those documents.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I understand that copies will be made available immediately to the House leaders of the various parties and to the spokesmen for the Treasury Board. At the same time 1,000 copies are available for members, and I understand that some of them will be brought to the opposition lobby as of now.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment on the editorial comment of my friend, the House leader of the Liberal Party.

The co-operation exhibited is as a result of yesterday's plaintive pleas by members of the opposition that the estimates be provided at ten o'clock so that they would have fodder for Question Period, rather than at twelve o'clock as we planned.

Being always reasonable and co-operative we have accommodated, at great personal effort on the part of my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board. When we are taking credit for co-operation, I know it slipped the hon. House leader's mind that he did not acknowledge the co-operation he received from this side of the House to the request they made yesterday.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but rise to this great statement. You would not know this, but we just adopted an order of this House in which the opposition gave its undertaking that it would pass Bill C-92 at all stages today and also pass resolution No. 23 today. I think this is exceptional—and I underline exceptional—co-operation with this government that refused yesterday to give us the estimates.

It was in exchange for that, Mr. Speaker, that we got this little bit of concession at 10.15 in the morning.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I will not participate in the cross-fire, but I think the record is clear as to who did what and when.

I have not had a chance to look at the list of the committees to which the estimates will be referred, but one can only assume that the Standing Committee on Transport and the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations are two such committees.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, you are seized with a question of privilege from myself of some time standing, dealing with the fact that these two committees are not able to meet. Because these committees are not currently functioning, I fail to see how, under the circumstances, they can discharge their responsibilities to scrutinize these estimates. I wonder if that may not put in jeopardy the supply process provided for in our Standing Orders.

I would like at this time to give notice that my caucus has concerns about this important issue. We will be seeking an opportunity next week to raise this issue in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order adopted earlier this day, the motion of the President of the Treasury Board is deemed adopted.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-92, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, Bill C-92 is a proposed amendment to the Northwest Territories Act to approve an amendment by the territorial government to its Official Languages Act, to extend the delay for the translation and bilingual printing and publishing of territorial laws.

In 1984 the government of the Northwest Territories reached an agreement with the federal government to make French an official language of territorial legislative and governmental institutions and to provide for government services in French.

The agreement provided that the territorial government would adopt a law on official languages that would be entrenched by federal legislation so that any amendment by the territorial government which would affect rights or services provided therein would require the approval of Parliament.

Under the agreement, the costs of implementing French as an official language have been borne by the federal government. As well, the agreement provided for federal funding of $16 million to the territories for preservation and enhancement of aboriginal languages and services in those languages.

In 1988, Parliament passed the new federal Official Languages Act. The act specifically excluded legislative and governmental institutions of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon from the definition of federal institutions. It also excluded the laws of the territories and the Yukon from the bilingual requirements applying to federal laws.

As contemplated by the 1984 agreement, the act also entrenched in the Northwest Territories Act and the Yukon Act, the respective language ordinances of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Section 45.1 of the Northwest Territories Act, and its counterpart in the Yukon Act require the approval of Parliament for any amendment to the territorial law, except where it provides for additional rights and services in English and in French or the aboriginal languages.

Since January 19, 1990 all new territorial legislation has been introduced and passed in the Territorial Assembly in both English and French. In April 1990 the territorial government amended its official languages ordinance to make six aboriginal languages the official languages of the territories, along with French and English.

The amendment also provided for a number of additional rights and government services in the aboriginal languages.

The April amendment provides, for instance, that the government may prescribe the translation and publication of ordinances in one or more of the aboriginal languages after their enactment in English and French.

As well, by January 1, 1993 territorial government services will be provided in each of the official aboriginal languages where there is significant demand in those languages.

In August 1990 the Minister of Justice of the Northwest Territories wrote to the federal Minister of Justice to seek agreement on an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act to concur in a territorial amendment to the official languages ordinance to extend the time limit for the translation into French and bilingual printing and publishing of previously enacted laws to March 31, 1992. In the letter and in subsequent meetings, Mr. Ballantyne and his officials explained that the need to extend the delay resulted from technical problems in reprinting the revised ordinances and adjusting the regulations accordingly.

I understand a further factor in meeting the deadline has been the difficulty in attracting and keeping qualified legal translators, who are in very short supply in Canada.

The revised ordinances are in final revision and are being sent to the printers, but they cannot be brought into force until the regulations are also ready. Experts from the translation bureau of the Department of the Secretary of State have verified this. They agree that the delay period requested is an appropriate one, in view of the remaining work to be done.

The Minister of Justice of the Northwest Territories has assured us, and other ministers of the territorial government have confirmed, that the delay in bringing their laws into effect in both English and French will not have any impact on the requirement of the territorial law that services in both languages will be available from the territorial government as of January 1, 1991. That was an important factor in the government's decision to seek concurrence by Parliament.

If the concurring amendment to the Northwest Territories is not made, the amendment to the territorial official languages ordinance would be ineffective in extending the delay. By virtue of the official languages ordinance, the consequence would be that virtually all territorial laws would become of no force or effect as of January 1, 1991.

The operation and enforcement of law would be seriously compromised in the territories. We cannot accept responsibility for such a result.

The government of the territories is well on its way to meeting its obligations under the territorial official languages ordinance. It needs a further period to finish the work it has undertaken in revising its laws and regulations, and printing and publishing them in both official languages.

On October 29, 1990 the territorial legislature and the commissioner in council, passed an act to amend the Official Languages Act to extend the deadline for bilingual printing and publishing of previous legislation until March 31, 1992.

Bill C-92, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, would simply demonstrate Parliament's concurrence in that amendment and prevent a potentially serious gap in the operation and the validity of the laws of the Northwest Territories. To avoid such a result, Parliament's concurring, through this amendment, will be required prior to December 31.

I hope all members will recognize the need to act quickly in a non-partisan spirit to meet our responsibilities to the people of the north.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-92, whose purpose is to grant the Northwest Territories an extension of the agreement by which all legislative documents, assembly proceedings and other documents shall be available in both official languages, that is, English and French, by April 1991.

Madam Speaker, we are all familiar with the situation concerning official languages in the Territories, a situation that was described quite satisfactorily by the parliamentary secretary. Section 9 of the Territories' Official Languages Act reads as follows:

[English]

It reads as follows, Madam Speaker: "English and French are the official languages of the Territories and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Legislative Assembly and Government of the Territories".

Article 10 of that same Official Languages Act reads as follows: "Everyone has the right to use English or French in any debates or other proceedings of the Legislative Assembly".

What we are dealing with today is an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act and allow for a second extension to the commitments made by the Northwest Territories to translate and make available legislative documents to the people of the Northwest Territories.

Madam Speaker, I would like to provide some historical background. In 1984, the Government of Canada, represented by Liberal Minister Serge Joyal at the time, and the Government of the Northwest Territories signed an agreement under which the latter undertook to pass legislation making French one of the official languages of the Territories, I repeat, one of the official languages. The Government of Canada promised to pay all costs of establishing and providing French services.

That same month, inspired by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Legislative Assembly of the Territories passed Bill 9, which I just quoted, establishing the official languages of the Northwest Territories. The purpose of this legislation was to make institutional bilingualism—I repeat, institutional—official. For the benefit of those who still have trouble understanding the difference between institutional and individual bilingualism, I may recall that institutional bilingualism means giving Canadians access to institutions in the official language of their choice, either French or English. This applies not only to the legislative body but also to the courts. It is also true—this is very important and I will get back to it later on—that there is some concern about the government services that communities are entitled to receive. That is another matter, but I want to make sure the government understands that, when we agree to a second extension, we also want some firm commitments from this government regarding services in French for the Territories' French-speaking communities.

Madam Speaker, the bill that was intended to make NWT government institutions bilingual by January 1, 1988—and I am still referring to the original legislation passed in 1984—extended the deadline until December 31, 1990, following a number of technical difficulties the NWT government encountered with the translation of acts, ordinances, and so forth.

The deadline was extended to December 31, 1990, and now, a month before the extension expires, we are again asked to extend or postpone the deadline, if you prefer, until April 1, 1992. That is the purpose of Bill C-92.

Madam Speaker, as far as translation is concerned, the NWT government has made considerable progress. I am told all its laws have been translated. The ordinances must now be revised, in French and in English, and printed, while regulations adopted pursuant to these ordinances must be updated.

• (1030)

The Liberal caucus, whose spokesman I am today, acknowledges the good will of the Government of the Northwest Territories and appreciates the request made in its ordinance. Given this request, we support the adoption of this bill at all stages today.

Madam Speaker, naive though I may appear, I should like to comment briefly on the situation in the Northwest Territories as it relates to the official languages.

The legislation adoption process and the implementation of such legislation concerning services to the public at large, particularly to the communities, is essential. For too long now the francophone residents of the Northwest Territories have been completely ignored with respect to dealings which concern them, especially the strong impact on the future of their community, its laws, and government services. For too long now, Madam Speaker, their needs have been decided for them without consultation. The message I would convey to the federal government, responsible as it is for protecting, supporting and promoting national unity, is to act as defender and representative of these minorities before the governments of the Territories so that these governments understand that the francophone communities of the Northwest Territories now ask nothing more than to be consulted and involved when governments open up new services, when governments willingly agree to meet the major needs of the residents of the Northwest Territories, one of our country's main regions.

Madam Speaker, when the House passed the Official Languages Act in June 1988, the government was committed to promote the growth of francophone and anglophone minorities. Again I say francophones and anglophones because they do exist. Some minorities are constantly under the threat of assimilation, and I am referring to francophones outside Quebec. But then again Quebec has an anglophone minority that has the right to be there and to enjoy the services to which it is entitled under the Constitution and the law.

As full-fledged citizens of this country which has two official languages we make the following argument, namely that the existence and survival of these francophone groups in the various provinces and in the Territories are linked to the survival of our country itself, and that we have to protect and support these groups to ensure equality and respect between Canada's two linguistic communities.

If we lose our francophone communities outside Quebec, Madam Speaker, what is the point in having bilingual Territories if no one is there to use the law, if no one is there to benefit from government services? What will be the use of balkanizing into two entities, one speaking only French in Quebec and the other speaking only English outside Quebec? This is why it has become imperative for governments, particularly those which have not progressed as much as the Northwest Territories or New Brunswick, for example, or the federal government, to consider the importance of catching up with others. A year or so ago Alberta and Saskatchewan were the scene of rather trying times when their parliaments or legislative assemblies denied the traditional and constitutional rights of people to have laws in French. Following what I would call very regrettable incidents, we came to realize that certain governments remain quite indifferent to these provisions.

Madam Speaker, bearing this in mind, the Liberal caucus, in addition to expressing its support for the Territories and commending them for the gains made by the francophone community so far, would also remind the federal government of the importance of its commitment to promote and support these communities. To a number of people in the north, and to the NWT francophone community as a whole, services are far more important. The need for services is far more pressing. Services are their main priority.

Translations are fine. To have laws and ordinances translated into French is excellent. However, if there are no services to help these communities live in French in the north, all this won't be much use. It will be a purely symbolic gesture.

That is why we want this government to keep its promise to the NWT francophone community and give it the support it needs, so that it can obtain health and education services from the Territorial government—I won't give the whole list, because hon. members know what I am talking about. I am referring to Section 23 of the Constitution which gives Canadians the right to send their children to the school of their choice, either in English or in French. That is not yet the case everywhere in Canada, and it is now eight years since the Constitution was ratified. There are still a number of provinces where it is impossible for a child to be educated in its mother tongue.

We must make up for lost time, Madam Speaker. In three of our provinces, Canadians still cannot speak before a criminal court in the language of their choice. Three provinces have yet to grant this fundamental right of every Canadian to be able to defend himself in the language of his choice. We still have a long way to go, and I think it is incumbent on these provinces to catch up with the rest of the country.

Madam Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary pointed out, in January 1991, the Government of the Northwest Territories will be under a legal obligation to provide government or institutional services in French and English. It will be under the obligation to provide for the use of both official languages in territorial courts, starting January 1991. But will the NWT Government be able to provide those services by that time? I am told that not everything is in place yet, despite this deadline.

Will this government have the technical capacity to meet these legal requirements? Or will we again have a situation where francophone minorities must resort to court challenges in order to defend their rights?

Madam Speaker, I hope we will not always be in a situation where the minority, which sometimes happens to be the weaker party, has to resort to legal remedies to protect its rights.

I make this point for the benefit of the federal government, because it has the resources. It has the money to assist these groups. As for the political will, as I said before, it is there, in the Northwest Territories. So in fact, the Secretary of State merely has to conclude agreements with the Northwest Territories that would ensure the availability of certain services in French, without putting an additional burden on NWT residents.

Madam Speaker, these are matters that are of considerable concern to NWT francophones. It asked me to beg the government, in the course of this debate, to act on a firm commitment, made when the Official Languages Act was passed nearly two years ago, to help these communities defend their language rights.

Finally, Madam Speaker—and I will try to be brief—like all hon. members I realize that the NWT government had to overcome considerable technical difficulties when faced with the enormous task of having all its statutes translated. As I said earlier, I am told that all the statutes have been translated and all that remains are the ordinances and a few regulations.

We are aware that there are a few problems, despite all the good will. For instance, it is not easy to find translators who are familiar with the requirements of legal and legislative translation. We also realize that funding made available by the federal government should continue to be made available to these communities.

Madam Speaker, considering the good faith shown by the territorial government, we are prepared to give our consent to this provision. In concluding, I would like to say, to the people who think this is a waste of time and money, that we feel this provision for the translation of laws, ordinances, regulations and other texts into French is important if we want this country to remain united.

I deplore the attitude of some people in this country, of the authors and writers and groups that say it is a waste of time. If it is worth having two official languages, as we do, it is worth protecting them across this country to achieve language equity. It is also worthwhile to ensure that these groups, these French or English-speaking communities, wherever they happen to live in this country, have access to government services, laws and ordinances in their own language. As I said earlier, I deplore the negative approach taken by some people to this question. The game is not over yet, however. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that unlike what was said by Mr. Yves Beauchemin, a writer, when he appeared recently before the Commission—

An hon. member: The Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

Mr. Gauthier: I was looking for the quote. In any case, Mr. Beauchemin said recently before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission in Quebec that minorities, that francophones outside Quebec were like a corpse that is still warm.

I would urge Mr. Beauchemin and others of the same persuasion to look beyond their immediate horizons and visit Canada. There are still large groups in this country that want to survive and want this country to survive, and that simply want the majority to give them a measure of equity and exercise some generosity so that we can continue to defend and preserve this country, Canada, that some day, I hope, will be respectful and supportive of both official language groups.

Finally, I would like to say that today, we are prepared to adopt all stages of the bill, including committee of the whole and third reading.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I wish to speak today on this bill. I know that the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier is particularly fond of this subject and that he could speak about it for an hour or two even. I heard his speech.

So, as a gesture of goodwill, we are not going to delay the passing of Bill C–92, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, in order to allow more time for the statutes and orders to be translated into French.

[English]

As I said, Madam Speaker, the bill will provide bilingual services in the north and will extend the time that the federal government has given to the Northwest Territorial government, which is its creature. It is still a territory really. It is really still a creature of the federal government, although some day I hope it will be independent in the sense of being a province.

I am saying this for my friend from the Bloc Québécois who is going to speak after me. I am anxious to hear his speech.

[English]

The original commitment to bilingual services was made in 1985. Given the recent tensions in this country and the Belanger–Campeau commission that my friend from Vanier spoke about, we do not want the federal government to drag its heels in providing minimal services for the francophone community, francophones hors Québec, especially the francophone community where the federal government has jurisdiction and where this Parliament has a special responsibility, and that is in the Northwest Territories.

The federation of NWT francophones wrote to the Secretary of State in late October expressing some serious concern about the fact that promises made about services in the French language were not being kept. We would like to see these technical delays overcome and the promises kept. We do not want any excuses. We want the government to provide these minimum services.

Article 23 of the Constitution provides for parent–controlled schooling to the francophone community in the territories where numbers warrant. It is essential that francophones in the territories now be closely consulted in the implementation of this right in the near future. It is also essential that francophones in the territories now be consulted about government services that must be made available to them in their own language.

It is all very well to translate laws, but you need medical services, legal services and so on. Although I am from British Columbia, I have lived in the east for 11 years. I travel back and forth really, bi–coastal if you like. I have found that just across the river in Quebec, I can get health services, legal services and so on in the English language.

Having said that, I want to point out that French is only 3 per cent of the Northwest Territories. I am proud that I worked for the Berger commission there about 15 years ago. We did the commission then in English and in French. We had hearings all across the country in English, French, Dene, Loucheux, Slavey, Dog Rib and Inuktitut. If I might be permitted to speak a little Inuktitut, I remember when I was a much younger man, I had a beard and they used to call—

—which means sick, sick, the little guy with the beard. Those were great days. I remember the territories and I remember the effort to have other languages.

I see my friend from the bloc Quebecois about to speak, and I will end now. I want to tell him and other people, it is with some difficulty that anglophone members of Parliament from western Canada and other places stand up in this House and advocate francophone rights outside of Quebec. I am sure he realizes that if we adopt his position, and Quebec becomes sovereign, there would not be any anglophone rights outside of Quebec and the new English Canada would be unilingual. I am not saying I would want to see that. I am just saying the reality of it would be that we would be looking at a Quebec which is French and the rest of Canada which is English. There would be no effort like there is here to try to translate laws. That is not a threat. That is a just a statement of reality.

• (1050)

I point out to him—

I point out to my friend that he may perceive things differently, but that this is how Laurier perceived them. So did Henri Bourassa and Pierre Trudeau. He was a member of Trudeau's government. They envisaged a bilingual Canada.

[English]

I will say this in English. It is not so much bilingual, but to respect French and English rights throughout Canada. That is what this is about, and that is why we in the New Democratic Party support it. That means to extend francophone rights, even in this case when it is only 3 per cent of the population, where it is a majority native people.

We see it as a society where we respect language rights. We respect the rights of the two founding people because the way in which this country was created—I like to think of it as a cake, with the bottom being the native people, the base, French and English, and then the new multicultural reality of the present. I am sure he has a different view of a different sort of country. I think what we have fought for for almost 150 years is still worth fighting for. I hope that the translators will get going and the government in the Northwest Territories can provide those services in French.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, after listening to my colleagues' comments on Bill C-62, I must share a few thoughts with you. We are hearing today speeches on what I would call equal Canada. There are speeches on the principles of bilingualism, and generosity. For years, I believed in that legal fiction. I thought that it could become a reality. However, after all those years and after travelling all over the country, we must come to the conclusion that we are deluding ourselves if we think that Canada is bilingual. In everyday life, bilingualism is a reality only for a small elite in Canada, especially in the National Capital Region.

Madam Speaker, I know that you had the opportunity to travel across the country. I heard Premier Clyde Wells give speeches on our bilingual country. Well, I visited bilingual Newfoundland. The truth is that bilingualism is totally non-existant in that part of Canada.

Madam Speaker, I travelled extensively across Canada and I would say that, all in all, one of the few places in which I found bilingual services was airports. That is to say when you do not arrive late, after the bilingual attendant has left. But, in everyday life, there is no bilingualism.

When I hear my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier tell English Canada that to allow laws to be published in bilingual format in the Northwest Territories is a token of unity, I want to warn English Candians that this is a mirage. Indeed, translating the laws of the Northwest Territories will do nothing for promoting the economic, social and cultural development of Quebec.

Of course, we have always been under the impression that it was normal for governments to provide bilingual services, that it was a vested right in a supposedly bilingual country.

But trying to make English Canada believe that bilingualism is the mainstay of national unity and that it will keep this country whole and united is tantamount to perpetuating a monumental fraud! Bilingualism is there only to respect individual rights, not to convey to Quebecers the message that everything is just fine, see how generous we are, doing you this kind of favour! Madam Speaker, that is an optical illusion in the reality of day-to-day life.

It does hurt at times. I went to Winnipeg earlier this week to adress the Federation of Manitoba Municipalities. A man walked up to the microphone and, referring to bilingualism and the official languages legislation, he asked: "My grandson is learning French, why are you giving up?" I replied: "My dear man, I hope your grandson is learning French for his own cultural betterment. I hope your grandson is not learning French just to please me!"

I was not posing as Canada's saviour when I learned English, Madam Speaker, I just wanted to be able to communicate with my English-speaking colleagues, to understand both this country and the United States. I find it very hard to remain still every time I see someone trying to hoodwink the public.

In English Canada we often have the impression that they consider bilingual programs to be a major concession to Quebecers. I say to them: Do not look at it that way! Quebecers who have chosen to be bilingual did so for their own personal enrichment, they wanted to learn someting about another culture, and we hope you take a similar approach. We hope that access to the French language—which is considered as being a privilege—will prove to be the long-sought opportunity to open up onto the rest of the world, for we are all citizens of the international community. But do not delude yourselves into interpreting that as a contribution to national unity.

Madam Speaker, let me tell you that when bilingualism becomes the motive for promoting the principle of nation, we cannot get away from the fact that there are two nations in this country, perhaps even three if we include native people. Therefore we have unilingual nations within a supposedly bilingual judicial structure, and bilingual individuals within a minority. But again I emphasize that we cannot equate granting these services with promoting national unity, and that is because people have been fooling themselves for years and years thinking that this kind of gesture has to be a big favour to francophones. If they believe in bilingual institutions, it is not a favour but a right.

Be that as it may, Madam Speaker, you cannot expect Quebecers to haul down their sovereignty banners simply because there is one more translator in the Northwest Territories! That would be creating an illusion, and then some!

All I can say to our francophone friends outside Quebec is that the best anchor they can have is a sovereign and francophone Quebec which will then be a vibrant society of French language and culture. We will always be open and friendly to those who want to live in French, to those who want to raise and educate their children in French and give them the opportunity to grow up and work in French. When we talk about bilingualism, Madam Speaker, the only truly bilingual city in Canada is Montreal.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the hon. member, who may wish to continue his speech after Oral Question Period.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35 the House will now proceed to Members' Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

HOUSEHOLDERS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, in his Budget on February 20, 1990, the Minister of Finance asked Canadians to tighten their belts. I immediately decided to reduce mailings of parliamentary news letters to my constituents from four to one annually, and I will no longer send 2,000 cards with Christmas and New Year's greetings.

Since September 1984, I have sent 26 householders, which means 822,615 copies, for a total cost of $155,260.45, not including photographic reproduction and mailing costs.

Madam Speaker, I went along with the system at the time, but today, considering the recession, I do not regret my decision to stop sending my constituents their calendars which were usually my last householder of the year.

THE SENATE

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, the Speaker in the other place is at it again. Yesterday, after the Liberals were narrowly defeated by the Tories on their eighth amendment, the Speaker refused to allow an independent senator from Alberta the right, the democratic right to introduce an amendment of his own to the GST legislation.

When will the Prime Minister come to his senses and realize that allowing a complete breakdown in the rules is a very dangerous precedent and must not be allowed to continue?

When will the Prime Minister realize that total anarchy can take place when rules in this place and the other place are not followed?

When will the Prime Minister realize that our institutions cannot take this abuse on the one hand and on the other hand be respected by Canadians?

I say to the Prime Minister that this trampling of our democracy has to stop in the other place now.

HOUSING

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to respond to allegations made by the Canadian co-operative housing federation and set the record straight.

The Co-operative Housing Program is an experimental program covering a period of five years ending on December 31 this year. It was designed by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in co-operation with the Canadian co-operative housing federation. Initially, the federal government, through CMHC, injected $5 million annually—in addition to an additional budget of $5 million—totalling $30 million over a period of five years. The Minister of State (Housing) has fully honoured his commitments.

The Canadian co-operative housing federation had suggested that CMHC use the indexed mortgage loan formula to finance the projects. However, the federation's forecasts did not materialize, which consequently had a negative impact on the number of housing units delivered. We have tried in every way to help the federation reduce unit construction costs, which would have made it possible to build more housing units, but to no avail. Furthermore, we had to raise the annual subsidy cost to $3,000 per unit because of increased operating and capital costs.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, last week, I attended a meeting in Moonbeam, in my riding. Over 150 people took the time to come to that meeting to get some information about the rumors concerning the closing of their post office which has been in existence for 30 years.

Last year, Canada Post could report $149 million in profits which was made at the expenses of small communities. The people at that meeting sent a clear message to the government: Its postal services privatization, or should I say dehumanization, policy is hurting rural Canada. Post offices are the heart of small communities and closing them is an attack against all the traditions attached to them, not to mention the elimination of many jobs. Canadians, wherever they live, have a right to centralized and humanized postal services like those provided in urban communities.

This government left the isolated communities to fend for themselves. Just think of the cuts in transportation.

Mrs. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, tomorrow marks the first anniversary of the unanimous passage of Ed Broadbent's motion calling on Parliament to eradicate child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. Sadly there is no cause for celebration.

In the last year the government has rammed through laws clawing back family allowances and decimating the unemployment insurance system. In the last year it tried to cap federal funds for social services, health care, and education.

Liberals should not sit smugly by. Canadians remember it was the Liberals who imposed the dreaded six and five caps on family allowance. It was the Liberals who froze the child tax exemption for years before the Tories reduced it to a $65 tax credit.

Despite calls for government support for child care in the 1970s, it was the Liberals who did nothing. It was their twins, the Tories, who have failed to bring in a plan.

If the government would expend the same energy it is using to ram through the GST, which will hurt poor children and their families, on providing solutions to poverty, Canadian children might be living better lives.

In the midst of plant closures, lay-offs and a recession—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has now expired.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, perhaps the country has never been as highly politicized as it is at the present time. I have been receiving a lot of letters, as I am sure have other members have, that begin by saying: "This is the first time I have every written to my MP". It is as if we are getting into the bedrock of the Canadian nation.

I think there is reason for this: the protracted free trade debate and the divisiveness of that, the three-year discussions over Meech Lake, the current and continuing debate over the GST, and the changes on the international level, with all their promise and the challenges associated with them.

There is a mood in the country that portends some kind of political realignment. This is very much exacerbated by the emphasis that we continue to place on the things that divide us. We are grinding sand into the gears that make this country work.

I think the time has come for Canadians to begin to emphasize the one thing that does unite all of us in this country, that is, our country and pride in calling ourselves Canadians.

HUNT-WESSON

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, yesterday, we heard the Minister for International Trade give the latest example of Tory government policy on agriculture: throw our farmers to the wolves.

Hunt-Wesson in Kent county is eliminating 60 jobs, but there is the added snowball effect on our farmers.

A tomato farmer from my riding called me. His contracts to sell tomatoes now do not exist. He has no one to sell them to. He has hundreds of thousands of dollars tied up in land and equipment, and now he has nothing.

What is the reason for Hunt-Wesson closing? It is the free trade agreement. The company president says that. Not unions, not politicians.

The parent company will now sell its products from California and Ohio.

This plant has been located in Tilbury since 1956, making it through the tough times before, but not the Tory free trade or their made-in-Canada recession.

This government cannot continue to turn a blind eye to the devastation. On job losses and plant closings, this government cannot say don't worry, that's progress.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, is it any wonder that 60 per cent of Canadians do not believe Jean Chrétien when he says that a Liberal government would kill the goods and services tax? Barely a majority of Liberals, declining group that they are, feel that their leader is being honest when he says he will axe the tax.

Why should they believe him? Mr. Chrétien's colleagues in the Senate did not axe the tax or kill the bill this spring when they had numerous opportunities to do so. They even endorsed the bill in principle.

After all, the GST does benefit big business, including the big businesses that backed Mr. Chrétien's leadership and appointed him to their boards of directors. Jean Chrétien sat on those boards, not the boards of the anti-poverty groups but of companies like Consolidated Bathurst, the Toronto-Dominion Bank and B.C. Forest Products.

Canadians have lost faith in the old style politics represented by Jean Chrétien. They do not believe that a man who benefited so much from the corporate sector will not do the corporate bidding and implement the tax.

On the other hand, I have faith that Canadians—

COLLEGE WEEK

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I rise to remind my colleagues that this is College Week. Post-secondary education is more important today than ever before in our history. Rapid changes in the field of knowledge nowadays impose tremendous challenges for Canadian men and women throughout their entire working life. Our colleges and vocational training institutes give them the skills that enable them to meet those challenges and provide them with numerous career opportunities.

Madam Speaker, post-secondary education is an important investment for the individual and for the entire nation. Colleges and vocational training institutes increase our capacity to meet our common concerns, for instance, in areas such as the environment. Furthermore, they help Canadian men and women acquire the skills that will enable our country to sustain wold competition.

With market globalization, our country's future prosperity depends on our capacity to remain competitive. Therefore, it must promote and make the best of knowledges and skills it provides to our citizens. And in order to achieve that goal, we need a solid post-secondary education system.

Madam Speaker, I know that my colleagues recognize, as I do, the contribution of our colleges and vocational training institutes to the quality—

FRENCH-SPEAKING CANADIANS OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, writer Yves Beauchemin pronouced an indictment against French-speaking communities outside Quebec. Before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, he referred to French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec as "still warm corpses".

The rest of Canada cannot let this go unchallenged, because French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec do not deserve to be put aside, certainly not by a fellow-Canadians-basher. It is sad to see someone, through ignorance or meanness, attempt to belittle people of his own country in promoting his own political beliefs.

I praise editorial writer Adrien Cantin of Le Droit for having set matters straight in his November 22 article.

A word of advice to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission: It would be better to focus on briefs that assert the need to harmonize the efforts of French-speaking minorities of Canada as a whole, Quebec included, in the face of the realities of America.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, this week I received a number of phone calls from business people in my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin. All of them had one thing on their mind: "Let's put an end to uncertainty."

Along with over 700,000 other Canadian businesses, they have made the decision to prepare for the GST, small but real life decisions like employee training, providing customers with sound advice, changing business forms, equipment and supplies, and making strategic inventory decisions.

These are the decisions that must be made in the real world where the uncertainty caused by political games is the deadliest of enemies.

The message is clear: "The impact of a delay in the implementation of the GST is devastating—we strongly urge you to do all in your power to see that the GST is implemented by January 1, 1991."

These people have made business decisions for the future. They need political ones to be made now, not December 31.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the hon. member's time has expired.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise today to draw, with some enthusiasm, a comparison between the Conservative Parties of Britain and Canada.

As hon. members will know, earlier this week Margaret Thatcher's leadership was challenged. Just yesterday, the Iron Lady realized that her policies and waning popularity in the polls would preclude her party from winning the next general election. She did the honourable thing and resigned.

Perhaps the chief thorn in her side is her new poll tax. This tax has Britons up in arms and protesting in the streets, not too unlike the Canadian reaction to the Conservative's GST.

When a government introduces a tax that has the disapproval of over 80 per cent of the population at the same time as it forces the nation into an economic downturn, it is time to reconsider seriously its leadership and ability to govern.

If only the leadership selection process were the same in Canada, I am certain we would see members opposite lining up for the Prime Minister's job.

Given the incredible similarity, perhaps the Prime Minister should follow the lead of his British counterpart and resign.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, this Sunday has been called the international day to end violence against women. This is a timely reminder to our government for three reasons.

First, following the second anniversary of this government's re-election, publicizing the violence issue shows what little, if anything, six years of Tory rule have done to improve the quality of life for Canadian women.

Second, approaching the first anniversary of the Montreal students' massacre, publicizing the violence issue shows how hard this social disease can hit if we do not address it sincerely.

There was much hope when a woman was appointed as Minister of Justice. It is now clear with her mishandling of Bill C-80 that she is giving in to the gun lobby.

Third, coinciding with the 20th anniversary of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, publicizing the violence issue, which the commission did not even touch, shows how far we have come, yet how far we must still go.

Until this government ceases to believe that all women need is a few appointments to high places in Canada, a woman's work will never be done.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I will pose my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

The supplementary estimates tabled today by the President of the Treasury Board show the depth of the incompetence of this government when it comes to managing the economic affairs of this country and the price Canadians are paying for this incompetence. The supplementary estimates show that this government will be spending $2.5 billion to cover the additional costs of its borrowing due to its own high interest rate policies. I ask the President of the Treasury Board, is it not true that this $2.5 billion would not have to be spent if the government had not persisted with this high interest rate policy, which has been doing so much damage to the economy of this country?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the supplementary estimates I tabled this morning indicate, contrary to what he just affirmed, that this government is committed to staying the course.

Mr. Gauthier: High interest rates.

Mr. Loiselle: We have within these estimates $2.5 billion for high interest rates. The Minister of Finance—and this is not new—indicated in September that we were off course. He also indicated that because the economy performed better at the end of last year and early this year, we have additional income. Therefore there is a charge against the deficit of between $1 billion and $1.5 billion.

As for program spending, the hon. Leader of the Opposition forgets to say that we have encountered additional pressures during this year, particularly with the job situation. Instead of passing it on to the deficit, as the Liberals have done over a period of years, putting the finances of this country in jeopardy, we have decided to tighten our belts once more and we have balanced program spending.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board knows that if this government had allowed interest rates to be lowered by only a point and one-half this year, this $2.5 billion could have been saved and there also could have been saved thousands of Canadian jobs, homes, farms and businesses.

Mr. Dick: Inflation would be higher.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): All the President of the Treasury Board has to say to these people who have lost their jobs, farms, homes and businesses, is that they have to stay the course. That is like the Minister of Finance saying that he wants Canadians to die before they go to heaven. People do not want to stay this course.

Mr. Dick: We're doing better than the Liberals.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I ask the President of the Treasury Board, will the government bring about a lowering of interest rates today to save this expenditure of $2.5 billion and save the thousands and thousands of Canadian jobs, homes, farms and businesses that will be lost if this government persists with its misguided economic policies?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, it seems that the Liberals are not learning.

An hon. member: They will never learn.

Mr. Loiselle: They failed to stay the course when they were in power and it led to interest rates of above 20 per cent and very high inflation rates.

He wants interest rates to come down. I would ask him to look at the results of our policy. Interest rates are coming down week after week, and we are very pleased with that. It shows that our policy is working. There is no mystery, and it is not by artificially claiming that one can press a button and interest rates will come down. It is by maintaining the course and preventing the inflationary pressures from being unleashed. This is what we are doing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have had a look at the results of this government's policies and they have said that these policies are wrong. They want these policies stopped before they bring about a total disruption of the Canadian economy.

Madam Speaker, I ask the President of Treasury Board the same question: When will the government recognize that its own policies and very high interest rates are responsible for the deterioration of our economy over the past few months? When will the minister recognize that his own policies will cost Canadian men and women hundreds of thousands of jobs? Is the government willing now to change its policies?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the government is not willing to change its policies, because it feels that they are the right ones, although it knows it will have to pay the price for them. I am sure the Canadian people realize that it is not because the government wants to be popular that it is making these difficult decisions, but because it feels that in the end they will benefit Canada. On the other hand, if there ever was a government in this country which managed to create jobs, it is this one. Following seven years of continuing growth, we want a new growth. At the end of these six years of continuing growth, we were faced with very real inflationary pressures. We must rid the system of these pressures, and the current exchange rates show that we are about to win the war.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, under the pretext of financing the war in the Persian Gulf, today this government is asking Canadians to dip into their pockets for $4.8 billion.

Ninety-three per cent of that money is not going to finance the war. It is going to pay for the fiscal incompetence and the made-in-Canada recession promoted by this government.

Will the government admit its own fiscal incompetence is making Canadians pay so much more money?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, we will not admit that.

The hon. member should make a comparison of interest rates. On August 6, 1981 the Bank of Canada rate was 21.24 per cent. That is when the Liberals were in power; 21.24 per cent. Today they are 12.25 per cent, and they have dropped steadily since May. The prime rate has dropped dramatically in that period of time.

The House leader said that they should drop a point and a half. They have dropped more than a point and a half since May, almost two points since May.

As the inflationary pressures go down, the interest rates will drop. Inflation has been the enemy. The inflationary pressures have eased somewhat, allowing interest rates to fall. They will continue to fall as the inflation pressures ease.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): If the minister wants a lesson in history, he does not have to go back nine or ten years. Let him go back three years when the interest rates in Canada were 7.5 per cent. They are now over 12 per cent. That is as a result of your policies.

Madam Speaker, if the government had listened to us and reduced the interest rates, we could have been spared the recession and we would have saved what it is now asking us to pay for the national debt. Is the government prepared to recognize the failure of its high interest rate policy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we certainly do not accept the statement my hon. friend has just made. I am quite surprised that the official opposition critic should make such a statement as though the government was some sort of a magician which, just by pushing a button, could cause the interest rates to fall.

Interest rates reflect certain demands and realities of the marketplace, and Liberal members are certainly not helping the investment situation by saying constantly that things are going awfully bad. I wish to warn him against constantly making negative and pessimistic statements which do not reflect the reality.

It is true and regrettable that there should be a slowing down, and we must act quickly to help the economy make a fresh start.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The government has just tabled its supplementary estimates and we are looking at $350 million worth of cuts. Who gets cut? Farmers, fishermen, immigrants, the unemployed, environment, aboriginal people, workers, the ill and veterans. Once again, it is those who can afford it the least that pay for the bungling of this government.

In addition, in these supplementary estimates what we see is an expense of $350 million for a war in the gulf, but we see $379 million to implement the GST. Where are the priorities of this government? Why does the government not withdraw the GST and bring back some estimates that help average Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the socialist party is wrong when she singles out farmers, because under the estimates tabled today the agriculture estimates are increasing by $316.6 million. There is some reprofiling of certain programs and projects that can be carried over into the next year, but that should not be seen as a reduction in agriculture expenditures.

We have acknowledged that we will have to support agriculture more, particularly in the grains and oilseeds sector. We are currently working with the provinces in designing a long-term safety net. As well, we are looking at the need for additional income support, which is triggered by the third level of the committee that has been established through federal-provincial co-operation, so I would ask the hon. member to reconsider her allegation that farmers are being cut.

With respect to the GST, we hear constantly from the New Democratic Party the need for a fair and equitable tax system, a tax system that will encourage productivity, enterprise, and competitiveness. That is precisely what the GST is all about. It is about jobs, competitiveness, confidence restoring the economy. That is what we intend to do with the passage of this piece of legislation.

Ms. McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am sure Canadians are going to wonder why it costs more to implement this so-called fair GST than it does to have a war in the gulf.

I would like to ask—

We saw just this morning, with the supplementary estimates, that this government's priorities are absurd. It cuts social services to pay for a tax nobody wants, to pay for a military intervention nobody wants. Why is it always the middle class and the poor who must pay for the errors of this government?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I think that the New Democratic Party leader is wrong when she states such things, since the government has always been very careful in its operations. She must understand that if we really want to protect those who need protection, if we really want to protect our programs, we have to make sure that the country's finances are in good shape. By avoiding to add to the deficit supplementary expenses that Canada must make and by trying to cut operating expenditures instead of program expenditures, we believe we are on the right track. Indeed, that makes the difference between this government and the socialist one opposite which simply wants to keep on adding indefinitely to the deficit without accepting the ultimate responsibility, which is to maintain our programs in the long term.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Almost a year ago this government, along with the other parties in this House, voted unanimously on a motion to end child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. There is no sign in these estimates of what this government plans to do on child poverty. Instead the government plans to spend over $350 million to implement a goods and services tax which is going to hurt those very families, those very children. Yet this government had the nerve to stand up in this House a year ago and say that they would eradicate poverty.

What are the priorities of this government? Instead of declaring war on Canadian taxpayers, why not declare war on poverty? Why not bring in supplements now that will lead to a war to end poverty in this country, as this government promised to do a year ago.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, first, the leader of the New Democratic Party knows very well that over 800,000 people came off the poverty role in the last few years.

I know that the leader is inadvertently misleading the House when she says that it costs some $365 million to implement the GST. She is wrong. A great bulk of that is for social benefits accrued from the GST for GST credits to low and modest-income Canadians. Is the leader of the New Democratic Party saying that we should not be sending out GST credits to low and modest-income Canadians? If she believes in that, she should stand up and say so.

If she wants the credits to go to the low and modest-income Canadians, she should walk across to the other chamber and make sure it passes through the Senate so that we can proceed with the mailing of GST credits to some 8 million low and modest-income Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Defence.

When the Conservatives came to power, the first thing they said was that they were not going to follow the policy of the bad old Liberals. They were going to be champions of National defence. The present Minister of National Health and Welfare, then Minister of National Defence, rode across Canada on his tricycle buying nuclear submarines, Polar 8's, and every other form of technology you can imagine. What did the Conservatives do? They cut the defence budget by $2.7 billion, the most savage attack on defence in Canadian history. Now faced with a crisis, the Conservatives are scrambling to fund programs that they should have had in place for which they promised and raised expectations.

Is it the policy of the Minister of National Defence that the new defence policy in the country is going to be funded by savaging health and welfare and Indian affairs which lost $6 million today?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I find that strange coming from a member of the Liberal Party who was present in the government some few years ago when the Liberal government of the day froze the budget of the Department of National Defence when inflation in Canada was at 14 per cent and when military inflation was about 18 per cent. I find that strange.

The member is asking if the Government of Canada prepared to sustain the men and women who are serving in the Persian Gulf and sustain the military preparedness of Canada at an acceptable level. Yes, the government is. Yes, that is why we have had to bring in supplementary estimates.

The hon. member must know that the additional costs which have been assumed by the department, and for which we have had to come forward with supplementary estimates, could not be planned in any policy. The government did not plan for aid to the civil power this summer. The government could not plan for the Persian Gulf crisis. The hon. member knows that and I am sure he accepts it.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, there is a complete absence of planning altogether. That is the problem. There is no defence policy in the country.

I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Assuming that $350 million covers our costs in the gulf to the end of March, what happens if Canada has to go to war? What happens if Canada is asked to send more planes and more ships to the Persian Gulf? What preparations has the Government of Canada made for that? And, in April, what other social security programs does the Government of Canada intend to cut to pay for its defence program? That is planning.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): I find it strange that one member of the Official Opposition argues that we should not be making these expenditures in support of the men and women who are serving and in support of the military preparedness of Canada, while that member argues that we should be doing more.

What I can inform the hon. member, if he reviews the supplementary estimates, he will find that there is $17 million in these estimates to allow us now to start the contingency planning which may be necessary to sustain the Canadian men and women who are serving their country in the gulf beyond April 1 into the next fiscal year.

I can assure the hon. member that after that, we will have to discuss with colleagues how that will be done. I can assure him that what is necessary to sustain the men and women who are serving Canada and all Canadians will be done. If it is necessary, we will address them.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment.

The President of the Treasury Board announced today direct cuts of $14 million and $24 million on postponed programs, for a total of 38 million dollars to the environment. Furthermore, he announced, within five months, direct cuts in departments, such as National Health and Welfare, Energy, Fisheries and Oceans, Agriculture, which directly affect the environment.

So here is my question: can the minister tell us what these $38 million represent? Can he assure us, which is equally important, or guarantee us that the other $100 million will not negatively impact on the quality of the environment in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the picture in some sort of historical perspective. I would remind the House of Commons and those who are watching that, first, the Department of the Environment received larger than average increases in both of the last two years when it came the time for fiscal funding. In fact, the increases for each of those years were increases of approximately 10 per cent.

Mr. Peterson: Peanuts.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): The hon. member across who speaks of peanuts when he is spending the taxpayers' money is simply displaying that same kind of callous disregard for the Canadian taxpayers now that his party showed in the past when the debt rose far beyond what it had ever been in the country.

In addition, as members will know, the supplementary estimates which are tabled here as well indicated additional support for the Department of the Environment, some $78.3 million. In addition to that, the Minister of the Environment will be announcing early in December to the House and to the country the green plan, which will also provide additional resources to the environment throughout Canada.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, I cannot believe that the hon. parliamentary secretary would raise the green plan, when we all know what is happening to it. The government has shown confusion and terrible weakness in environmental concerns. Rumours abound about the cuts.

Can the minister assure that the green plan is not about to drown in the government's red ink? Can the government assure us that the green plan, as established in the first draft of September, has not suffered dramatic cuts and that they are not reflected here? Will the government assure us that the consultation process will be honoured with the environmental community?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): I can assure you, Madam Speaker, and all interested Canadians, that when it is announced in December the green plan will reflect at that particular time the result of consultations which have taken place across Canada, a process of consultations which was never attempted by any other government in Canadian history.

I will also assure you, Madam Speaker, and the hon. member, that there will be before Canada a long-range systematic plan to address the problems of the environment such that his party and his government never even contemplated when they were in office.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Canadians were told that figures tabled today in the House would clarify the costs associated with the Canadian presence in the Gulf. The supplementary estimates, however, only add to the confusion and contradict other reports.

Can the minister assure Canadians that these costs do not represent an escalation of the Canadian role in the Gulf? Will he further agree, in light of the contradictory information, to request that the Auditor General conduct an immediate and independent review of the cost of our participation in the Gulf?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that, not only are the numbers accurate to the best of our ability, but also that the total cost figures that have been requested for maintaining our presence in the Gulf and for aid to the civil power to the Government of Quebec this summer, has been absorbed within the departmental budget. It is a considerable amount of money.

We have reassigned ship days. We have reassigned flying hours because at this time there is real time training taking place. We have adjusted exercises. At the same time, through the budgets of 1989 and 1990, we have reduced some $820 million of expenditures this year in the Department of National Defence.

We were very close to the line when these two unexpected crises occurred. Because we were not able to meet our defence budget, we had to approach central agencies due to the unanticipated or unbudgeted expenditures. I am sure that he agrees that this is a very logical and reasonable way to assess the problem of today.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, Canadians are spending $1.2 billion to maintain our forces in Europe to support a cold war that officially, and practically speaking, no longer exists.

Why is the government forcing Canadians to cut back in spending on necessary domestic programs? Why has the government not reallocated spending from Europe, instead of forcing Canadians here to bear the burden of the Gulf?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should be aware when he talks about Europe that we are part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We have made adjustments and he asks why we do not make more.

I bring to his attention that the NATO Alliance over the last 40 years has been responsible for the most creative and the most assured way to have a peaceful world by signing the CSCE and the CFE which took place just this weekend in Paris. East and west sat down and came to an agreement to have a more peaceful and more secure world. That, I say to him, is because the NATO Alliance has held firm and strong for the last 40 years.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

The tabling of these documents in the House today proves to everyone that there is a total lack of financial management in the government.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mr. Hopkins: The Prime Minister and his Cabinet met without consultation with Parliament and made the decision to go into the Persian Gulf without knowing how they were going to pay for it. Surely, one goes hand in hand with the other.

Why was the government not as dedicated about providing a financial plan for the Department of National Defence to do its job, as they were to provide for $257 million to prepare for the collection of the most hated tax in Canadian history, the GST?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I draw to the hon. member's attention once again that the Persian Gulf crisis and the aid to the civil power for the Government of Quebec were not able to be planned for.

Mr. Rompkey: That is your first responsibility.

Mr. McKnight: The member from Labrador suggests that is one of our first responsibilities. I suggest to him that no government plans for the additional costs of a crisis which could lead to war.

Responsible governments and democracies, when they make a commitment to bring about a more peaceful and secure world, call upon the people and the government to provide the resources so there will be a more peaceful and secure world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, the government is demonstrating that it has no plan at all. Ever since the government was elected to power in Canada six years ago, the Prime Minister and a series of defence ministers have been standing up in the House and saying, with great rhetoric, that they are going to provide the money for the Department of National Defence so that our Canadian military personnel can do their job. Instead, the government has cut the budgets of the defence department and left it with an empty cupboard. Now they are robbing other departments to pay for the sins of the financial mismanagement of the government.

Why did the government not keep its commitments to Canada's military forces, to Parliament, and to the people of Canada, instead of once again proving that their promises are not worth the paper they are written on? You let the department down. You know it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I cannot help but smile. I am not sure if the hon. member and his party supports the effort of the Canadian government in providing, along with some 28 other nations, a force in the Persian Gulf area. I know that his leader draws upon that. He says it is not something in which we should be involved. I suggest to him that he knows in his heart that it is something in which we should be involved. He knows full well the difference between capital expenditures and operational requirements. If he does not, I would be pleased to provide him a briefing at the Department of National Defence.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, Canadians woke up this morning to find that their government was $4.8 billion short. At the same time that this government is cutting $10,100,000 from the communications budget, it is adding $14,305,000 to advertise and communicate its GST. They are robbing Marcel to pay Mike. Why is the government crippling the CBC and the National Archives, among others, to sell Canadians a tax that they despise?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I am afraid, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member suffers from an acute attack of misunderstanding. I am explaining through supplementary estimates how the money that has already been voted in the budget is going to be spent. I hope she understands that. This is not an increase. This is a method by which I explain to the House, and I ask authority of the House to spend the money that was already voted upon.

If you take the GST, for example, my colleague can explain and I can explain that in front of the committee we explained that there would be transitional costs. Now we have put the numbers together and we have come to the House at the first opportunity to explain them. This is what it is about. It is not additional funds.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, you and I understand that sometimes perhaps the government feels that women have difficulty understanding this, but $257 million extra. That seems extra to me. Mind you, it would take an economist, a mathematician and a wizard to follow the estimates that the hon. minister tabled.

Radio Canada International, for example, does its job of connecting Canada to the international community, connecting Canada to its nationals abroad and in particular, connecting Canadians to their loved ones on duty in the Persian Gulf. In this cut to communications, is Radio Canada International the next to go? Will our military soon have no radio link to those at home because of the minister's mismanagement?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, all government departments and agencies have been called upon to reduce their budgetary requirements for this fiscal year. The communications and culture portfolio's contribution represents the equitable share of these costs and that is what has happened.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, on October 29, the National Transport Agency of Canada decided to remove the requirements relating to requests affecting the frequency, the routes and the cuts in VIA Rail services, these requirements being no longer necessary.

Even if some submissions asked that these requirements be maintained in the case of services in isolated areas, the Agency believes that the minister of Transport has exclusive responsibility over that matter. Here is my question: Will the minister have the last word on the issue of VIA Rail, a Crown corporation, cutting passenger services in isolated areas?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can assure my honourable colleague that I will have the last word. It is my responsibility and not the National Transport Agency's, to make the decision about isolated areas.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister to justify why in the estimates under the Department of Finance the government is planning to spend an extra $14.3 million on advertising the GST and why in the estimates under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs they are going to top up expenditures in the GST information office by an additional $6.5 million.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, as leader of the government in the House today how he can justify spending almost $21 million extra to advertise the GST in this country? How can he justify that?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was a member of the finance committee at the time the GST was being studied. One of the recommendations was to ensure that the people of Canada were well informed on the goods and services tax. That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, it was not our recommendation. It was Blenkarn's recommendation. The minister knows that. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. The government is asking the Canadian people to cut back on all kinds of programs, when it is cutting $25 million out of the department of employment budget to look after the unemployed in this country. How can he justify spending an extra $21 million to advertise the goods and services tax? What are we going to see? More ads on geese flying around this country? The Prime Minister wrapping himself in the Canadian flag? How can he justify that?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the answer is exactly the same. The President of the Treasury Board made it very clear that we have committed certain funds to promote the goods and services tax. We always said we were going to do that. Now we are showing an explanation of that expenditure, that is all. We are showing the Canadian people the expenditures of advertising the goods and services tax, providing accurate information to the Canadian people, which the hon. member does not do.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the government in its news release today announcing total cuts of $350 million worth of essential services to Canadians said: "Adjustments were made to minimize any adverse impact on such things as health and safety".

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Can he truly and honestly say that $9.89 million cuts to the health and welfare budget are safe for the poor, the sick, the elderly and disabled Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I can give the assurance that all essential services will be maintained. What we are trying to do with the bill this morning, Supplementary Estimates, is to ensure program delivery is cost effective. The health and safety of Canadians continues to be our main concern. Social programs will be maintained as announced. Programs for seniors will be maintained. In short, people who need additional assistance from the government will continue to get it today and tomorrow, as they did yesterday.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, how can you maintain that when you have cut $9.89 million?

The government plans to ask for an additional $250 million to help spread informational propaganda for the goods and services tax, yet has the gall to cut the budget for food inspection systems. Which is more important, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, the health and safety of the GST, or the health and safety of Canadians?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that we are not cutting spending for programs. We are not cutting essential services. What we are cutting into—

Mr. Rompkey: You're cutting Indian Affairs by $6 million.

Mr. Jelinek: —is government expenditures and government operations which are not going to affect the people of this country.

He refers to a figure for advertising the GST. Let me tell him that a large chunk of the money tabled today goes toward social elements of the changed tax from the federal sales tax to the GST by sending out GST credits to over 8 million low and modest income Canadians. This government cares about people. That is why this government is cutting government operations in order to assist Canadian people, particularly those with low and modest incomes.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. With net farm incomes in the prairies slated to drop to almost zero in the next two years and world grain prices at such an incredibly low rate, the lowest in history, and government cut-backs of some 40 per cent on farm support programs during the last two years, I wonder why the minister is cutting $10 million out of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. Surely with the price of grain on the world markets and the cut-backs that have already taken place it was not necessary to cut this additional $10 million out of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I share the member's concern about the very difficult situation in which the grains and oilseeds producers find themselves. As he knows, this year we have provided emergency assistance. We have provided for a cash flow enhancement program. We are hopefully in the final stages of negotiating an appropriate agreement with the provinces that will bring about a long-term safety net and stabilization program. With the Western Grain Stabilization Act, it is a statutory piece of legislation. It is based upon that. When less money is contributed by farmers, it automatically reduces the level of exposure by the federal government. It is for that reason that it is included in the estimates. It is really a reflection of the way the legislation works. The hon. member should support that because it was legislation that was originally brought in by the Liberal government.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that if funds are removed from the stabilization fund, there is less money to be paid out during the next two desperate years when net farm income on the prairies is slated to go to zero. It is an incredible time to be cutting support programs.

Since the minister raised the issue of the safety net program, there is great concern in the agriculture community as to whether the government is willing to fund that in a proper way so that the premiums paid by the three participants, the federal government, the provincial governments and the agriculture producers, will be shared on an equal basis.

Is the minister prepared to give a commitment today that when that program is implemented that the federal government is prepared to pay its full 33 per cent and not welsh, as it did on the crop insurance program, where it cut back to only 25 per cent?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that that could be achieved. That is the position that the federal government has taken in going into these negotiations. I think that has broad-based support from the producers. Unfortunately, some provinces do not support that proposal quite as enthusiastically as I am sure the hon. member does.

To refer back to his question with respect to the WGSA, the hon. member should know and should understand that the government has to conform to the legislation. That is precisely what it is doing.

If there are shortfalls, as I have indicated publicly and in the House today, we are triggering the third level of defence mechanism which will analyse the income shortfalls while at the same time moving the income safety net and stabilization program forward. In the process of this, we will take a look at the income situation and try to respond in an appropriate fashion, as we have before.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There will be one question for the hon. member for Oshawa and one question for the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, almost to the day one year ago, this House unanimously passed a motion expressing concerns about child poverty and attempting to eradicate it.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister how he reconciles the support that was shown for that motion less than a year ago today with the continuing cuts that were made in estimates this morning on social programs for Canadian families, the rise in the use of food banks, the lack of child care facilities for young people across Canada and, perhaps the most disturbing estimation that has been made. In The Toronto Star article of September 21, 1990, and I would like to ask the minister to very simply respond to this: "Native Canadian babies have about as much chance of living beyond their first birthdays as do those in Jamaica and Costa Rica, and are at higher risk than babies in Cuba and Singapore." How does he reconcile that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that question was answered by the Minister of National Revenue. I would ask the hon. member to refer to what he has indicated.

With the passage of the GST, some 8 million low-income families will receive tax credits. I am sure the hon. member would welcome that. That would certainly help alleviate the kind of situation to which the hon. member has referred.

Cognizance should be taken of the fact that something like 800,000 people have been taken off the poverty roll since this government came into office.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board.

In today's press release, the President of the Treasury Board said that he would cut $250 million in various programs and services to Canadians in order to get $257 million to "prepare and plan for the goods and services tax."

• (1200 )

What does the minister think is more important, collecting more goods and services tax for the Minister of Finance or delivering services to Canadians?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, at the outset, the hon. member should know that in order to pay for services one has to have a reliable tax system, a fairer and more open tax system, and that is the reason for tax reform.

Second, the hon. member should recall as well that it was the Auditor General, in his 1989 report, who said that this government must prepare—and that was a year and a half ago—for the implementation of the GST and that we had to have new systems, new technology, and newly trained personnel.

That is what we have done, and that is what is reflected in the estimates today.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to five petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

PRESENTATION OF NINETEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the nineteenth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on the production of information video documents pertaining to the procedure of the House.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to table again today petitions that are in accordance with the rules and convey to the government and this House that a tax applied on books is bad and regressive. The petitioners maintain that free dissemination of the printed word is the cornerstone of our democracy, our culture and our education. They point out a literate and productive society must not be unjustly submitted to such taxation.

The petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to reaffirm the principes long embodied in the tax-free status of the printed word and to retain the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Madam Speaker, to tax books is to impose ignorance.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the city of Toronto.

These Canadians are opposed to the imposition of the goods and services tax, in particular the tax on books and the printed word. I am sure they are aware that the Liberal members of the Senate moved an amendment to the bill at third reading to eliminate the tax on these items, but that the greedy Tory majority voted the amendment down and is apparently willing to leave this bill unchanged and tax Canadians in this most unfair and regressive way. This is typical of the government's attitude toward Canadians.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, in opposition to the goods and services tax. This petition is signed by a number of residents from Saltspring Island, Galiano Island, and the Saanich peninsula.

These people are well aware that the goods and services tax is a regressive form of taxation and that real tax reform is much more comprehensive and would include the taxation of wealthy individuals and corporations.

They do not agree with the government's assessment that the goods and services tax is the way to address child poverty, as was stated in the House today.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present to the House a petition on behalf of constituents from my riding of Ottawa Centre and from other places in the city of Ottawa. These petitioners are against applying the GST on books and magazines. They call upon this Parliament to vote against the proposal to tax books and magazines.

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to table a petition signed by thousands of residents of this country from one end of Canada to the other.

They are supporters of rail passenger services. They believe that what the government did nearly a year ago was a step backward when every other country in the world was moving forward on rail passenger services.

They call upon Parliament to reinstate the services immediately. Quite frankly, they want Canada to be put back on track.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with several dozen names of Canadian citizens who complain that the government is imposing a goods and services tax on books, magazines, newspapers, and other printed matter.

They point out that the dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture and education in a literate and productive society, and that the goods and services tax will have a very negative impact on the Canadian citizens in this regard.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and. privilege to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians from Vars and Orleans, in my riding, who call humbly upon this government and this House to rescind immediately the tax on goods and services. I support entirely this excellent petition.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-92, an act respecting the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

• (1210 )

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-92, an act respecting the Northwest Territories Act.

Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Angus: Madam Chairman, I wonder if I might be permitted to put a couple of questions to the parliamentary secretary. We have given notice to the parliamentary secretary of the questions we want to raise with him in order to get a commitment from the government.

Just to point out initially, we believe that there can be no further delay in implementing bilingualism in the Northwest Territories Legislature. This is the second extension, and there will be no further extensions.

The federal government strongly urges the Government of the Northwest Territories to undertake to consult closely with the Northwest Territories francophone community on the question of government services in French, the more important concern at the end of the day than translated laws. There is a good deal of concern among Northwest Territories francophones that this deadline extension is the opening wedge in the retrenchment of bilingualism across the board. The minister should assure the House that all that is happening here is technical problems relating to translation.

Finally, I have another point. I would like the parliamentary secretary to respond to them. The federal government expects the Northwest Territories government to undertake to consult closely with the Northwest Territories francophones on the question of implementing Article 23 of the 1982 Constitution which provides for parent controlled French language schools where numbers warrant.

Could the parliamentary secretary respond to these three points? Then we could move on with this matter.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Chairman, there were three parts to the hon. member's question.

First, we have received assurances from the officials in the Government of the Northwest Territories that there would be no further delay in implementing bilingualism in the Northwest Territories Legislature. Accordingly, we will not be requested to make any further extensions.

Concerning the second question, I would inform the hon. member that the amendment to the new act will not affect the disposition of the Official Languages Act related to the services to the public in French. It should be clear to everyone that this deadline extension only concerns the translation of laws. It is already stipulated that that extension is due to technical reasons.

Specifically in answer to the members's concern, the federal government expects that the Northwest Territories government will continue its consultations with the francophone minority on the questions of governmental services in French.

With respect to the final question, the Secretary of State has offered, by letter to the Government of the Northwest Territories, the support of the federal government to any initiative giving effect to section 23 rights in the Northwest Territories Act. In the Canada–Northwest Territories bilateral agreement on official languages and education the federal government is committed to consult the official language minority on its needs. That is the position of the government, and we will follow through on that.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I note that the questions that were just answered are the same I asked in my speech on second reading but I am satisfied with the government answers. I only want to ask the parliamentary secretary if we could get a copy of the letter he referred to between the Secretary of State and the government of the Northwest Territories to the effect that clause 23 will be supported and promoted by the federal government?

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Chairman, I do not have that with me, but I will undertake to use my best efforts to forward a copy to the hon. member and to the member for the New Democratic Party as well.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

BILL C–80

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The House resumed from Thursday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre):

That a Special Committee of the House of Commons be appointed to study the subject matter of Bill C–80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof;

That the said Special Committee shall have all the powers of a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order 108(1); and

That the said Special Committee be composed of eight members, to be recommended by the Striking Committee.

And on the amendment of Mr. MacLellan:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

"and that the said Special Committee make its final report to the House no later than Friday, February 15, 1991."

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to speak on Motion No. 23. It is my intention to try and explain my views on this issue.

Before we get into that, I would like to mention my disappointment that Bill C-80, the bill that was before the House, was so hurriedly put together in June and because of all the difficulties with it, all the holes in it, that is, it is such a bad bill, that members opposite have decided that they cannot continue with it because it is not even acceptable to government members.

I would like to read Motion No. 23 to the House. It reads as follows:

That a Special Committee of the House of Commons be appointed to study the subject matter of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof;

That the said Special Committee shall have all the powers of a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order 108(1); and

That the said Special Committee be composed of eight members, to be recommended by the Striking Committee.

I find this very difficult to understand. On the one hand we have a bill that supposedly had extensive consultation and had been looked at extensively by the Minister of Justice and her department, and on the other hand, because members opposite do not approve of the bill and find it to be offensive to their constituents and I suggest particularly to rural Canada, the minister has decided to withdraw the bill. If this particular bill had been the subject of wide consultations and the information and the changes in the bill had been put to the Canadian Wildlife Federation, the National Firearms Association and the Ontario Arms Collection Association, members opposite would have realized very quickly that there were difficulties with the bill.

I would like to go through, in chronological order, areas of concern of the bill and also areas of the bill that are acceptable to members like myself who are from rural Canada.

I would like to start with portions of the bill that we find to be very difficult to comprehend. That is the negative aspect of this bill. These are areas that I suggest very strongly the newly formed committee have a mandate to look at. The first area is the belief that changing the sizes of the magazines and clips of particular weapons would enhance and improve the situation. Mass murderers, the criminal element and certain individuals in Canada use certain types of weapons whether they are within the law or not.

If Bill C-80 was to go through, the government would be outlawing over one million clips that are presently being used in Canada. It would also outlaw hundreds of thousands of weapons that are presently being used. These weapons have a built-in magazine. This built-in magazine has more than a five-clip capacity or five-bolt capacity.

I question the wisdom and the reasoning of the Minister of Justice, who presented this piece of legislation. Why does she feel that reducing the size of a clip will stop incidents such as the one that took place in Montreal last year?

Another area that we must look at very seriously is the Firearms Acquisition Certificate which is presently in place. There is a belief that there is a need for two references. I question the reason why one would want to have references, similar to passports, and whether any individual in this country will want to put their name forward to make a social and moral decision on their own. This individual asking to purchase a Firearm Acquisition Certificate and in essence, purchase a gun, is of sound moral and social character.

I do not know how an individual will be able to make that type of recommendation and put his or her name on this certificate. Most gun owners that I know would have great difficulty doing that, because one really cannot, without professional help, make that kind of decision. That is going to make it difficult for many gun owners who are certified and who have gone through the safety course to be able to get the sport rifles that they are looking for.

Another aspect of the bill that I find very difficult in this age of democracy is the ability to change regulations at will by Order in Council. I find that to be very offensive because it does not allow for debate in this House on issues that we, as members of Parliament, really have been put here to debate. Orders in Council on changes of significance to people's lives should always be debated in this House and that deserves to be looked at.

Another aspect is the increase in fees from $10 to $50. It is outrageous to think that we are putting in a category for every single weapon that a Canadian may own. When they resubmit their firearms acquisition certificate renewal they will have to pay $50 for every weapon they own.

Most Canadians who are hunters and sportsmen own a variety of weapons. I suggest that having two, three, four or five weapons of different varieties for different types of sport is going to be very expensive for those individuals if the changes in fees are allowed to go through.

The other change that is very difficult for an individual who is a sportsman to understand is the fact that an applicant must demonstrate a secure place within which to store his or her weapons.

I ask members opposite to explain to me in detail how that will be done because there are millions and millions of Canadians who own weapons. Are we proposing, as this government has with this piece of legislation, to allow some sort of inspector to inspect every home in the land to see if they have secured their weapons and put them in a place where they are stored in a proper manner? Or are we saying that as long as the weapons are locked in a closet or in a particular case, that is perfectly acceptable?

Is the legislation suggesting that we have to purchase a particularly secure case, one built in Canada? Most gun owners have a case worth roughly $2,000. Those particular cases are made of a very durable type of alloy which will not allow individuals to break in very easily. I suggest that that is a good idea for people who can afford it, but most gun owners in Canada do not have the financial ability to purchase such a secure type of case to allow them to store their weapons.

I want to talk a little bit about what is good about the bill. There are some good aspects to this bill. If we had not got into the emotional problems that occur whenever there is some sort of massacre or something that is disgusting to parliamentarians and Canadians as a whole similar to what took place in Montreal last year, we probably would have come forward with some very good legislation.

Although it has not been passed and given Royal Assent, I find it ironic to think that for years and years we have had on the books the ability to force all Canadians who would like to purchase a weapon to go through a hunter and safety course, or a gun safety course of some kind and have some national standard. I think the safety aspects of the bill are a very good idea and should be implemented.

Obviously we would have to take a look at what the regulations and course would entail. These particular courses would give those Canadians who are first-time gun owners an understanding of just what they are purchasing. That is a very positive aspect of the bill and I think we should take a serious look at improving this part of the legislation.

The other aspect of the bill that is very important is the photo ID that would be put on the FACs. That would make it much easier for individuals who are selling weapons to do their job in checking out the moral and social capabilities of persons owning a weapon.

One of the problems with the bill as it relates to the FAC is that it does not stipulate whether the FAC is going to be for all the weapons. Our belief is that it is just going to be for one individual weapon at a time. Therefore, one might need four or five FACs. I think that has to be looked at very seriously.

With regard to how the bill relates to the firearms safety course, the question that has to be raised and will have to be looked at by this committee is, is this for first-time gun owners or are we going back to square one, making every person who owns a gun in the country take the safety course. There are those in Ontario who have gone through a safety program and there are those in other provinces who have not.

Also, we have to take a look at the 28-day cooling off period. Is this essential for those who already have an FAC in hand now, who are already gun owners, and who have already taken the course to which I have referred? Is it necessary to make them wait 28 days in order to get their renewal of an FAC? If they have already been checked out by the authorities, can they not just go in and have it renewed instantly?

The other thing I would like to touch on today is the belief that this is truly a discussion between rural and urban Canada. There are some major problems in urban Canada with the criminal element using weapons to the detriment of society. In an area such as northern Ontario where I come from, our largest town has a population of 10,000. Everybody knows everybody and everyone knows everyone who hunts and fishes and is a sportsman. It is not so easy in an environment such as that to explain to people that, "No, you cannot have a 10-bullet clip any more. You have to have a five-bullet clip because the other will do someone harm. You have to remove five bullets out of the clip." That argument is very difficult to make.

We seriously have to understand that in rural Canada we do not understand some of the difficulties that are taking place and for what urban Canada is asking. If we asked it of just the different cities in the country having difficulty with the criminal element related to the use of assault weapons that are out there, then we could understand that. But we cannot understand saying this simply because there are difficulties in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Halifax, when in the rest of rural Canada there are legitimate gun owners who are very conscientious. They have taken the safety courses, are respectful of the law, and try to maintain the type of respect that I think a gun owner should have.

What I am basically talking about is attitude. There is a fundamental difference in attitude with regard to weapons between people in rural Canada and urban Canada. There is a much larger respect for weapons in rural Canada than there is in urban Canada. The reason for that very simply is because we have grown up with them. It is like suddenly telling an Inuit in the north, where there are no roads, that there is now a road and he is now going to be responsible to drive a car. That individual would have a lot of difficulty with that. That situation is very similar to what we are discussing here.

I am not suggesting for one minute that we cannot improve our gun legislation or that we cannot try, as legislators, to put a stop to the situations that have been taking place. However, for the life of me, I cannot understand how this particular piece of legislation will stop the criminal element and the insane element in our society from doing what they have been doing. The fact remains that those individuals, who are quite prepared to break the laws of society, will not adhere to this legislation any more than they adhered to the legislation currently on the books. It is very important for us to try to differentiate between the two because if we do not then we are reacting purely on emotion and it will not stop the inevitable from happening.

I would like to come to a conclusion and look at some of the aspects that possibly were not entertained in the drafting of Bill C-80. That is the effect of changing laws on the tourism industry.

The semi-automatic guns that we are talking about that are legal at this time are used throughout North America. When and if this piece of legislation ever goes through, it will also restrict those who use them in the United States of America. Those individuals come to Canada to hunt and fish. Now they will be restricted by our laws and, therefore, our tourism industry will also be affected.

Are we to tell an individual coming across the border that he can no longer use a 10-bullet clip. He cannot use a 308 that has a built-in magnum that will allow for more than five shells. There are hundreds of thousands of weapons like that out there now.

Those are serious considerations that have to be looked at in rural Canada. I know they do not affect urban Canada whatsoever, but they do affect the economy of Canada as a whole. I think we have to seriously look at that.

I am very pleased that, in a roundabout way, the minister and the members opposite, whom I know lobbied very heavily on behalf of their own constituents, have asked to have this bill removed and sent back so they can have a true dialogue.

We cannot just get into the emotion of the mass murders that take place. It is very easy for members to stand up and use that as an argument to ban all weapons in Canada. If we are going to use that argument, we will not advance the debate at all as to what is appropriate and what is not appropriate for Canadians.

As a rural Canadian, and as a member who has hunted and owned guns for many years, who has taken safety courses, and who knows that there is a lot more to this than what some members are suggesting, I am very pleased that it is going to go to committee so we can look at it in a very sane way. With some luck, we can put some legislation in place that will have an effect on what we truly would like to do as members of Parliament. That is to try and stop the criminal element in urban centres from breaking the law.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I have a brief comment. I enjoyed the hon. member's speech and he made some very good points. I would like to assure him that we have had the same types of representations in urban areas as he has in rural areas.

One of the things I just want to take the hon. member up on is his terminology. Guns used by individuals, whether they be hunters or gun clubs, or whatever, are firearms. They are not weapons. The hon. member kept referring to them as weapons. I mean weapons are used for defensive purposes and offensive purposes by armed forces or criminals. Then they become weapons. To my way of thinking they are not weapons when they are in the hands of responsible people and there are millions of gun owners in the country who are extremely responsible, very careful, and well trained. I had representation just a week ago from a group of reservists with the Lorne Scots in my particular area who are concerned about the legislation as well and they brought forward some very interesting information.

I was just a little concerned that every time he talked about a firearm he referred to it as a weapon. I do not think firearms are weapons unless they are used by a person as a weapon, not as a hobby or for hunting purposes.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I understand the minister's particular difficulty with the terminology but in my neck of the woods we call them weapons because they are used to hunt and they do kill. They kill animals. Normally, that is what people who go hunting do. They are used for many reasons, one of which is for sport. But for a lot of people in my area, they are used to supplement their income. They are very poor and they hunt moose and deer to fill their freezers. As low-income Canadians, they cannot afford to buy beef on a regular basis, as do some Canadians.

I do not think people opposite and some people from urban Canada understand that that is a very well-known fact in rural Canada. It is not only aboriginals but non-natives also do the same thing. They feel very strongly that this legislation will deter them and make it more difficult for them to put food on the table.

I am not going to argue with the minister as to whether he feels the terminology is incorrect or not. We do not have the same attitude in rural Canada as there is in urban Canada, as it relates to the feeling that a weapon is to kill people and a firearm is for sports. We do not differentiate. It is a very common practice, from the day one is old enough to walk, to go with mom and dad into the bush to shoot partridge, to hunt and enjoy the wilderness. We do not feel that is doing anybody any disservice. It is an enjoyable way to spend our time as northerners and rural people.

If the minister feels that that is not appropriate, I apologize to him for not using urban terminology, but it really means the same thing.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the hon member's comparison of urban and rural people and also the statement that rural people need semi-automatic weapons with very high cartridge capacity in order to hunt.

My brother, who is from Newmarket, Ontario, a small urban city, believes that a deer is not worth eating if it takes more than two shots to kill it. I am wondering whether people in the hon. member's community are shooting deer with 30 shots and eating them.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I understand the member's difficulty with that. I know the member's involvement in this particular piece of legislation and her feelings on the matter. I do not want to get into an emotional debate with her because of her sensitivity on the subject.

The fact remains that, through time and through technology, improvements to weapons take place. That is basically what has happened. It is not different than the car. Would one like to go back to the cars of 1910 or the 1920s and 1930s? I doubt that. That is basically what this legislation is asking us to do. It is asking us to say that a gun is no good because it is high-powered, it is new technology, it has the ability to shoot from 200 or 300 yards away, and it also has the ability to carry 10 or 15 bullets in the clip versus five.

Let me just touch on the fact that some people have difficulty with the size of the clip. There is a very legitimate reason for that. The fact remains that it is very, very expensive to go hunting and people have to understand that. This is not a Saturday afternoon venture, where it costs $10 and one wanders off into the bush. These people buy four-wheel-drive trucks. They buy guns that are worth thousands of dollars. They take time off work to go up north perhaps for a week at a time and, in many cases, they fly long distances.

The guns are built in such a way that there is only one opportunity to have a shot. In a lot of cases, one might only get two, three or four shots, and one is a long way off. If the hon. member thinks that one can get 10 feet away from a deer or a moose and perhaps choke it, then we would really not need any guns. I would just like to tell her that one would be lucky to get 100 yards away from a moose or a deer. Therefore, that is why these guns are built the way they are.

All I want the hon. member to understand is that we have to differentiate between the gun and a person's attitude. What we are really talking about here is the attitude of certain people of the criminal element who are mentally unstable. I understand what the hon. member is saying. I really do want to see us try to improve that aspect of it. However, if she is talking about a legitimate railway worker, mill worker or farmer who has all the credentials to be a legitimate gun owner and will not be able to buy a high-powered firearm, then I think the debate is digressing. If the member thinks that people put 30 rounds of ammunition in a deer, those people are not legitimate gun owners. Those people are not hunters. Those people have a problem. Those individuals are not interested in enhancing the debate and should probably have their guns taken away if they run around shooting 30, 40 or 50 rounds into a particular animal because they probably have an AK-47 in their hands.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to take part in this debate on the motion. I think that what we have to make clear for those who are watching on their television sets is that this is a motion to refer Bill C-80, the gun control legislation, to a special committee.

It is in fact a parliamentary device to withdraw the gun legislation, not as the previous speaker would have indicated, that if we passed this legislation it would go into legislative committee where the fine tuning to which he was referring to could take place. Oh, no. What we are seeing here is a parliamentary device, headed up by the Minister of Justice, to withdraw gun control legislation.

There was much hope when the Minister of Justice was appointed, the first woman Minister of Justice. There was a hope that finally things were going to be different; that she would bring a woman's perspective to her duties as Minister of Justice, a different perspective; and that she would be able to put that perspective on to all legislation that came before the House. Those hopes have been dashed, first will Bill C-43, the abortion legislation, and now with Bill C-80. What this parliamentary device, by putting it before a special committee, shows is that the Minister of Justice is caving in to the gun lobby.

I know the Minister of Justice received a lot of favourable comment when she visited the École Polytechnique in April and met with the students and the faculty who had proposed tough gun legislation. It must be recalled that the tragedy at the École Polytechnique on December 6, 1989, was the impetus, she said, for Bill C-80, which would create stiffer gun control legislation.

As I said, she received favourable comment that finally there was going to be stiff gun control legislation. I think that because she is not doing what was hoped would happen, giving a woman's perspective, I will.

I want to point out some of the statistics that relate to guns and women and the difference between the statistics for men and for women. This is why it is important that a woman's perspective should be brought to this debate. Almost exclusively the problems with guns involve men. Women only own a miniscule percentage of guns in Canada. Men constitute the armed part of our society, do most of the shooting and have the greatest chance of being victimized by a gun.

In addition, every poll taken on the issue in Canada and the United states shows that women are the strongest advocates for strict gun control laws. The following statistics should be noted. Only 77 women killed themselves with firearms against 1,047 men. Those statistics are from 1987. Accidental shooting deaths, this is once again 1987 statistics, were 4 women and 56 men. But women do represent one-third of gun victims classified as homicides. In other words, the only category of statistics where women represent a significant percentage is that of murder victims. I think this explains in part why Canadian women overwhelmingly support tougher gun control laws. Therefore, the Minister of Justice, the first woman Minister of Justice, is sabotaging her own bill by this motion, putting it forth into a special committee and is letting Canadian women down, once again. We have seen the chronology of events from 1978 when the last gun control law was passed in this House of Commons. In that legislation there were provisions enforcing mandatory firearms training. However, here we are in 1990 and those provisions have never been implemented. Who are we to believe when the government says now that it will have a program in place by April 1991?

The women of Canada have lost confidence in this Minister of Justice, who came in with such fanfare to her new role. The tragedy that occurred on December 6, 1989 in Montreal serves notice that there have to be tougher gun control laws. I know in my riding we have the phenomena, because it is close to the American border, of American tourists bringing in handguns in their luggage on coming across the border because that is the way they do things there. It is sort of part of your wardrobe to have a handgun. Well it is not like that here, not yet, not in my riding, although I have heard that there are parts of Canada, particularly in the major urban centres, where firearms and handguns are a major threat. Women are the deficit members of society with regard to handguns.

I would urge that the Minister of Justice forget this special committee, forget the stalling tactics, forget caving into the gun lobby and bring forth this legislation so that it can be debated, it can be fine tuned, and we can talk about the debate between rural Canada and urban Canada in a real legislative committee. The stalling tactic is clear. The government is filibustering its own bill. The Minister of Justice has lost control of her bill because she is caving in to her caucus members.

In conclusion, because of my strong sentiments that strong gun control legislation is imperative, I would like to place a sub-amendment to the Liberal amendment. I move:

That the amendment be amended by deleting the words February 15, 1991, and substituting therefor December 6, 1990.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member. I have to take exception with her comments about the Minister of Justice either abandoning this bill or this subject, or in any way backing away from it. It seems to me this is a perfectly reasonable way to proceed on this matter.

I have talked to a number of Canadians particularly concerned in this area, and indicated to them the truth that, of all the justice related legislation that has gone through this House, certainly in my experience since 1984, none has gone through completely unchanged. When Canadians across Canada make representations to their members of Parliament, as they have on this and other subjects, why is it so unreasonable for us to have a look at what they are telling us?

I agree with the Liberal amendment to this, that the committee report back by February 15 because it seems to me it would give us an opportunity to hear from groups and individuals who are particularly interested in this and have something to say.

I was among those who welcomed the idea that this legislation be placed before Parliament prior to the summer break. I thought it would give an opportunity for people who are particularly concerned in this area to have a look at it over the summer months. It seems to me that would be the time during which they would most likely come together for sporting events, for hunting, and that sort of thing. They would have an opportunity to examine the bill and make representations to their members of Parliament. I indicated to groups that, by all means, I would like to have their input on this, and the government surely would. I think the hon. member should reconsider the amendment that really makes it impossible for this committee to hear from Canadians. There is nothing wrong with hearing what Canadians have to say.

An amendment by the New Democratic Party to have this committee report back December 6 stifles the whole opportunity. What group can get their briefs together and get to Ottawa if they have to report by December 6? This is why I say the Liberal amendment is reasonable, that we report back by February 15 and at that time consider what the special committee has to say and take that into consideration in our deliberations on Bill C-80.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I do not think it should be necessary for me to point out that Bill C-43, the abortion legislation, which received many representations from many people, went through unchanged. So, his argument that this will be brought forth for changes is a little spurious. I would also like to point out that he voted against that legislation as parliamentary secretary. That is my first comment.

I would also like to say once again for those people who are watching that what the government is doing here is using a parliamentary device to pretend it is doing something when, in fact, it is doing nothing. This government will probably go down in parliamentary annals as being masters at that, but it is not lost on the people of Canada. We want strong gun control legislation for the safety of women and men in this country. We want hunters to be able to continue hunting, but the primary motivation of all gun control legislation is the safety of Canadians. It is imperative that this go through expeditiously. I will not withdraw my subamendment.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, in the greater metropolitan Toronto area we have a certain problem with guns. There are two distinct areas, and one of them is in my riding where a young individual was shot in the back of the head at a house party.

I for one believe that we need stronger control of guns and stronger legislation. There are smugglers of elicit drugs that the RCMP and our police forces have to face; they have duties. I hear from my constituents continuously that we need certain legislation brought forward. There is no question in anybody's mind. Some colleagues in this House have referred to hunting. We have to distinguish between hunting and the use of arms within the city.

The use of arms within the city is increasing at an alarming rate. Young offenders started using guns because, if they are under the age of 18 and commit a crime, the maximum penalty they face right now is about three years. The government has been promising changes to the Young Offenders Act for the past year and a half. We are still waiting to see what will be coming forward. We need changes today, because right now guns are way out of proportion.

I would like to put a question to the member. How does she foresee the usage of arms within major cities? What changes should be brought forward, especially to deter gun usage among our young people who know that they will be facing a maximum of three years?

Is the member in agreement that we also need changes to the Young Offenders Act to make sure that the crime committed also reflects the time these young offenders will have to serve? Is she in agreement that if a young offender is found with a gun we need more stringent penalties?

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I have always had a lot of difficulty compartmentalizing things in my life. I tend to see things holistically. I think the question that the hon. member has posed addresses that.

I would also like to point out, in answering him, that perhaps there have to be stiffer penalties. What we are talking about is a symptom of some of the social ills in our cities and elsewhere. There is also the glamour element that pertains to firearms, to guns, on American television programs, that the real power lies in the barrel of a gun. Young people are quite seduced by that image.

As I said at the outset, we have to look at this holistically. Of course there have to be penalties. Some of the kids out there are really scary kids. They are scarred kids. We have got to put up programs to make sure that young offenders and others are not going to fall through the so-called social network which this government seems to be doing such wonderful job in dismantling.

This legislation, Bill C-80, has to be put forth expeditiously in order to provide for the safety of Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a very short question for the hon. member.

She is a member of a party that by its very name claims to be democratic, the New Democratic Party. Yet, she has proposed an amendment to this motion today that has the effect of depriving people who want to make representations on this bill from doing so.

I am at a loss to understand that attitude. I wonder how it is that if she is a member of a party that claims to be democratic, she can deny to the people of Canada the right to make representations on this bill.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I confess to some confusion, because I am trying to figure out the Liberal logic of that question. The Liberal justice critic has been quoted as saying about this so-called democratic committee that it will go nowhere after months and months of study. That is what is going to happen here. It is a disgrace.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on this motion. I am as distressed and upset as I think many of us are with regard to the emotion and, perhaps I would go so far as to say, the manipulation that has tended to surround this issue in the past 12 months.

Canada has always had better gun control legislation than its neighbour to the south. There is no question. However, as our modern society evolves and becomes increasingly more violent, it has become increasingly clear to all of us that more gun control and stiffer gun control legislation is absolutely essential if we are to maintain lawful and safe societies, particularly in our cities.

I say that I stand with some misgivings because there is no question that the events of last December 6 at the École Polytechnique in Montreal were horrific and tragic. They involved the death of 14 young women at the hands of a man who was particularly enraged at young women who broke tradition and entered professions where women were perhaps not so used to being.

The manipulation of these events is something of which none of us should be guilty. In the House on the days immediately following the tragedy there was unity, horror, sorrow, and sympathy for the victims and their families. However, there is no question that in the wake of the events at École Polytechnique came this legislation, this Bill C-80, to make gun control laws in Canada safer and more stringent.

My great difficulty, as it frequently is for those of us on this side of the House, is trying to follow the trail of bread-crumbs set down by the government as to where this bill is going to go. This bill needs to be discussed. It needs to be changed. It is a flawed bill. However, it does—and I will make mention it further along in my remarks—have some things that are absolutely necessary, if we are to maintain an orderly and safe society in this country.

What is the government's agenda on this bill? Is this bill going to come back to this House? Is it ever going to get to a legislative committee? Is it ever going to be law? Somehow the majority of us on this side of the House think that is unlikely. What we think is that the government has decided this bill is unpalatable to a number of its own back-benchers and that the gun control laws it has introduced are too stringent. Consequently it wants a safe place for this bill to die.

With regard to the subamendment of my colleague for Saanich—Gulf Islands, I disagree with her merely on the question of process. If this special committee holds hearings publicly and really does its work, it will consider the questions, concerns and fears about this bill, of what it does or does not do, it will keep this crucially important subject before the Canadian people and put more pressure on the government.

However, I do have the definite feeling that we are going to be back to square one and that this bill, as we know it, will probably disappear from this House, never to return in its current form.

I have to add my remarks to those of members who have spoken before with regard to the Minister of Justice.

There are certain similarities between this bill and the bill that you and I, Madam Speaker, know far too well, which is Bill C-43, the abortion bill. As difficult as it may be within the constraints of parliamentary democracy and within the constraints of our caucus and party loyalties, sometimes we have to stand and say: this is right, this is wrong, this is what I stand for, this is what I believe in.

When it comes to the kinds of recommendations in Bill C-80 that make gun control more of a reality, more of a reality that reflects the reality on the streets of our cities, more of a reality that reflects the reality of women and children who live in fear deal with every day, that is the time for those of us who sincerely believe that these innovations must become law have to stand. Whether we are talking about a Minister of Justice or a back-bencher, wherever we sit in this House of Commons, we have to say that these are changes that must be brought into law.

We know that Canadians are increasingly concerned with violence in our communities. I have risen in this House numerous times since we returned in September to talk about the upsurge in violent death, in murder in this country. We saw the horror of 11 murders within one week in the city of Montreal. We have heard from campuses across this country that the increase of sexual assaults is beyond belief for university administrators and university students. We know that there is a new violent spirit abroad in our country. We also know that the most common victims of this violent spirit are women.

I look at my colleague across the way, the hon. member for Don Valley North. I know that she and I and the member for Louis-Hébert and the member from New Westminster—Burnaby share duties on a parliament subcommittee that is specifically dealing with the question of violence against women. I know that those members in the other parties have the same feeling of commitment, the same feeling that time is running out for us. If we do not act, if we do not come in with the kinds of recommendations that will lead to legislation that will make a difference, we are going to see anarchy reign.

One way to prevent anarchy from reigning is by ensuring that gun control laws are strong enough to make a difference. One of the problems with Bill C-80—and we do say that the bill does not go far enough—not coming in is that it does nothing about the fact that there are 1,400 gun related deaths every year in Canada. Of these 1,400 gun related deaths, 1,100 are firearm suicides. We also know that tragically the question of suicide is one that relates very intrinsically to the question of disturbed young people. We know that that is where the suicide statistics are among the highest.

We do not have the same problem with guns that the Americans do. We are lucky in that, but we have to act now if we are to ensure that our country does not slide down the same slippery slope. We are subject to many of the same pressures, many of the same urban alienating aspects of life as the Americans. It is said that there are more guns in the city of Detroit than there are people. I do not think we would want that to be said about the city of Windsor. I do not think we would want it to be said about Montreal. We certainly would not want it to be said about Halifax. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, not to make light of this, probably in Halifax my constituents could not afford guns, given the economic situation.

Homicides constitute about 15 per cent of all firearm deaths each year. The overwhelmingly significant proportion of these firearm homicides are domestic disputes and crimes of passion. If the guns were not there, it is extremely unlikely that the deaths would take place.

I have heard over and over again, ad nauseam, the phrase that truly does irritate me a great deal and that is that guns do not kill people, people kill people. Let us be sensible about this, even this government is not in the business of outlawing people per se. We are always going to have people, one hopes; we do not always have to have guns.

I admit that I have an overwhelming prejudice against guns. It is part of my background. I come from an urban background. I did not grow up in a house where guns were even in evidence. I do understand that in the rural communities of this country, there is a different outlook. I understand and I sympathize with that but the kind of gun control we are talking about is, in my belief, the kind that can co-exist between the urban fear of increased violence and increased gun usage and the rural tradition of a sane, sensible, orderly and lawful use of firearms for hunting, animal control and whatever.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am disappointed in this government. I am disappointed in the parliamentary secretary and I am disappointed in the Minister of Justice because I think their agenda is the removal of this bill. I think this bill will not come back to the House of Commons. I fear that if we are to see gun control in the life of this Parliament, we will have to start all over again. I think that would be a shame because there are things in Bill C-80 that are good. There are things in Bill C-80 that the Canadian people want, my constituents want them and the people right across this country want them. If my premonitions are true, and I suspect they are, then shame on the government for not having the courage of its convictions, shame on the minister, shame on the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, who raised many points and I commend her on bringing out the fact that the real reason we are here today is for this government to get rid of this piece of legislation that is urgently needed and sweep it under the rug.

I have a particular concern and I want to share it with my colleague. In the riding of Scarborough—Agincourt, some very violent crimes have been committed. In 1985 a young offender used a hunting gun to kill an entire family. Very recently a handgun was used in my riding to shoot a 15-year-old young man in the back of the head. Just to the south of my riding, there was another incident last August, where a young man was killed.

There are areas in Toronto where the police will not patrol because they fear for their lives, they are terrified because of the use handguns and automatic rifles. Criminals, such as those bringing illegal drugs into the country, use semi-automatic guns, and Uzis. These people are better equipped than our police forces.

Something has to be done to curtail this usage of automatic rifles. The police forces across this country are stating this. Does my colleague wonder, as I do, if this government is really listening. If the government is not listening, what would my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, who comes from one of the great parts of our eastern coast, see the answer to be? Do we need to move pretty fast? Do we need to consult? If we do consult, how do we go about not letting the government sweep this piece of legislation under the rug? It is caught in a bind because the backbenchers who come from the west and certainly people from the rural areas do not want this legislation. This is a way for them to sweep this thing under the carpet. What would she like to see done and what has to be done in order to keep—my colleague from across the aisle is laughing, it is not a laughing matter when a 15-year old wipes out an entire family. It is not a laughing matter when that young man is sentenced to only three years. It might be a laughing matter in your riding, but it is certainly not a laughing matter in my riding.

My constituents have told me this clearly. As far as the minister is concerned, being from the western part of Toronto, I am wondering what he would say to his constituents.

What does my colleague see as needed on an urgent basis?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Scarborough—Agincourt for his question.

I have had a fair amount of experience in dealing with young offenders. Tragically, the only young offender in Canadian judicial history to be sentenced to preventive detention was a young offender from the city of Halifax. It is a very difficult area about which to make hard and fast statements. That is why there are difficulties and that is why we are waiting with great anticipation for the young offenders bill and the amendments thereto.

I still say the problem is the availability of weapons. The problem is the availability in our urban centres of handguns and high-speed rifles. If this committee is going to do something, maybe it will have the opportunity to look at the differences in gun usage, urban and rural, and the very legitimate uses for guns in the rural areas and the fact that they are used lawfully and so on.

I agree with my colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands who spoke previously. The glamour of guns for young people is very serious. The increase in drug-related crimes in my own city is very serious. We have had numerous drug-related deaths in the city of Halifax. There have been deaths in which firearms have been used. If the guns were not there the problem would not disappear, but I suggest it would be minimized.

My great fear is that this committee, as my colleague suggested, has a way of sweeping a somewhat unpalatable bill under the rug. I hope it does not. I certainly would support the government if that were not the case, but I fear that it is the case. The parliamentary secretary and the minister know that. The minister who is present in the House is nodding at me and I know he agrees with me on the whole question of drug-related deaths and the urban problems. He too is a member who has seen this.

We have to deal with it now. Every day that we do not deal with this matter, every day that we do not tighten up the gun control laws is another day that we are going to see more deaths.

The question of young people and the use of guns is something that is better answered with gun control, in my belief, than it is in young offenders legislation by making that bill perhaps more stringent than it ought to be. We will wait until the bill appears. The answer is in going to the cause, rather than the effect, of the availability of firearms. We need to tighten up gun control.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the intervention of my colleague from Halifax. She has put into perspective the whole issue of gun control and the implications and impact for those of us who represent urban ridings and have to live on a day-to-day basis with the impact of gun possession. There are a couple of points that I would like to draw to the hon. member's attention and hope that she will give us comments which will perhaps spread greater light on the issue. We fail to establish what is gun control, as applied generically to all types of guns, and I am in favour of that, quite frankly. I might begin by saying that.

Second, how does gun control apply, either by implication or by direct regulation, to those who see a legitimate use for guns. There is a component of our community that uses guns in rural areas of Canada for hunting and other purposes, none of which represent a danger to civilized society.

We have not had the opportunity to be able to discuss that in this bill because the bill has come to us, as the minister and other members have indicated, as the result of a tragedy that took place about one year ago, one that we all bemoan.

In fairness, what many members on this side of the House and all those who deplore the violence associated with guns have difficulty accepting is that the minister would come forward with an item of legislation without having had the opportunity to reach out, as her department should have done. The Minister of Justice and the department are supposed to be in touch with all Canadians throughout the year on a continuous basis with or without the occasion of tragic events. However, she has come forward with a piece of legislation that does not consider the interests of collectors, hunters, other gun lobbyists and the interests of society at large, and especially those who are victimized by the spread of guns and other weapons possession.

Putting aside this legislation for a moment, why should we solicit opinions when they have been coming to each and every member's office since the day the massacre happened in Montreal and since the day the legislation was presented before the House. I do not know how much more we are able to hear that the Department of Justice ought to have heard, probably has heard, and should have incorporated in legislation. Then we could recognize the merits of the government's intention in legislative form, in regulatory form as it applied to the gun lobby and as it applied to citizens at large.

In closing, I wonder if the hon. member would give us an indication whether the government, in this instance, is pulling a political ploy in order to camouflage the fact that it is failing to live up to its responsibilities, both to gun lobbyists and to victims of violence at the hands of those who wield weapons, by introducing this kind of technique so as to avoid coming to grips with the reality of the problem for at least another session?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence for his comments, and indeed, I agree. I think they are insightful comments and lay the problems very much at the door where they belong. Again, I support a committee that will consult widely and listen to Canadians. It should have been the role of government to look at this problem. The government understood this. It has rural and urban members. It knows what the problems are in an urban community, and I am reminded—and I may be dating myself by this—of watching Gunsmoke as a child and seeing the people of Dodge City being told to take off their guns before they came into town. Maybe we need something in that modifying manner in our cities. Now, how we control it, I do not know. I will leave that to the great ability of the parliamentary secretary to come with a response.

Mr. Nicholson: That can be one of your amendments.

Ms. Clancy: A few more amendments. All right. The parliamentary secretary, having Nova Scotia roots, probably has the kind of ingenious mind to think of it. However, the response is that we do have to look at guns differently in an urban and in a rural context. We also have to look at the traffic in illegal guns. If we say there is one rule for the cities and another for the country, if we can manage to do that in some way that would satisfy those people who legitimately want to use firearms in a peaceful way, that is fine. That is the kind of knotty problem we are dealing with and that is the kind of knotty problem with which the government has not come to grips. It is the kind of problem that has to be dealt with without fail to ensure that this legislation can be passed. It is not going to solve any of the problems we have enumerated here by sweeping the whole thing under the rug, throwing it to a committee, and letting it die.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate today and to offer some views with respect to this important subject matter.

A couple of the hon. members who just spoke, particularly the hon. member for Halifax, have implied that there was a lobby among some members of the government party that got this piece of legislation sent to a committee and, as a result of that, it would be swept under the rug, and therefore not lead to the conclusion that Canada would have effective gun legislation.

I can inform her, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I would be one of those members who has lobbied to have another look at this legislation, but I certainly would never be a member who would lobby to say that we should have no legislation or that we should have weak or ineffective legislation.

I believe that there are two constituencies with two different perspectives on this important issue. The bill just tabled tends to satisfy one of those constituencies. I say that it is possible to have good, effective, workable legislation that will satisfy both of the two polarized views with respect to guns.

When the hon. member for Halifax addressed the House, she made a comment that could not help but have me reckon back to the truth of what she said. She said that we have to look at guns differently in urban areas than in rural. I do not subscribe to the "have to" part of that, but I do subscribe to the cultural difference that exists between those two situations.

I was a member of the House some many years ago when the Liberal government was introducing its gun legislation. The heat was coming into this Chamber from all parts of the country. It was during the highest period of tension on gun control and rural Canada in that all of its regions was mad. I was struck by the fact that as I drove into the community of Hanna, Alberta, coming out of the Big Country Sporting Goods Store was a person carrying a new rifle. He walked just in front of where I had parked my car. Several people stopped on the sidewalk to examine his new rifle. They pointed it in the air. They moved the workings of it and praised this fine new rifle that he had. Then, the person went on, put it in his truck, and went back out to the ranch.

That was a very comfortable situation about which any urban person would have been struck by the casualness of that sort of conversation. Had that happened on Yonge Street in Toronto, four blocks of citizens would have absolutely evaporated. Somebody pointed a rifle in the air, handed it over to his friend, showing it back and forth, and these ranchers were thinking absolutely nothing other than one of them had purchased a new tool to his industry.

I come from that kind of country. I know there are colleagues in all three parties from those remote regions of Canada. In the Peace River area of British Columbia, one is probably a moose hunter. In Canada's two northern territories, one's livelihood and security is largely dependent on it. Wrestling polar bears by hand is largely fictional. It may make covers of men's magazines, but do not ask anyone in the high North to do it.

For personal security, for food supply, and in the ranching and farming industries, it is a tool of the industry. I am a fruit farmer, Sir, and rabbits can cause a lot of difficulty to my orchards. The presently proposed legislation would like to have it limited to a five-bullet clip in the gun. Those who know me at all know it takes more than five bullets for the rabbit to start getting scared when I go after them. I obviously need more than a five-bullet clip.

I submit that we really need to redress the thought processes on this legislation. From the earliest of examination by the Government of Canada, the community of Canada that drafted the legislation was largely urban, but not totally. It then submitted it to the justice ministers of both past and present governments. They came to the notion of gun control from the perspective that the gun is evil, that it is the instrument that is wrong, and that it is the instrument that we somehow have to do something about.

The automobile also kills many people. We have had as a society a more mature attitude about how we regulate the automobile. We do not start from the perception that the automobile is wrong. We start from the perception that we will train the operator through written and oral examinations, and then in skill testing. I believe that ought to happen also with the gun.

One ought not to be able to use a gun unless able to demonstrate competence. One should be required to demonstrate competence not only on physical skill, but on mental security. I believe that those persons to whom I have spoken—members in gun organizations or those who use guns as a means to their livelihood—would subscribe to that.

As a member of Parliament from a rural region of Canada, I can tell you, Sir, that I do not desire, any more than any urban person anywhere, to have a gun in the hands of a lunatic. But there is that funny notion that when these awful, tragic, deplorable, emotional situations take place in our country, such as that at École Polytechnique about a year ago, that somehow if we attack the instrument, we will achieve justice. The person who committed that crime was mad. Everything about him demonstrated that he was a person filled with anger. It would be naive in the unfortunate extreme for us to presume that, had we at some earlier period of time abolished every gun in the country, the crime would not have taken place in some other way. I know that statistics do not in any situation necessarily establish proof.

With regard to training and skills, I would give the example of Switzerland. Because Switzerland does not have an armed forces as such, but requires that every male aged 18 and over must have a high powered rifle in their possession and be trained to use it. They undergo training. One of the things that is observable about Switzerland is it has one of the western world's lowest incidences of crimes with a gun and yet it is a nation in which virtually every home has a gun. I submit that what has been wrong through a history of almost 20 years now is that we have approached this issue from the perspective that we have to control the gun, rather than to somehow control licensed safe operation of the person.

The other area that I wish to mention is that, for those regions of the country where guns are used in the line of work or as a tool to a livelihood, ambiguity in the regulatory process causes a great concern. People know who the regulators are and they know it is largely urban Canada. It is the bureaucrats of Ottawa. They are very fine people and many of them are very, very hard working, but there are not many people in the rural and northern regions of Canada who believe that their views will be expressed in a change in the regulation. They want a consultative process that designs the right legislation and fixes it specifically.

If we leave lots of changes for the regulatory process, where many things can be changed at whim, it will never be changed with the consultation of rural Canada. That fear must be set aside. I say to you, Sir, it is not difficult to set it aside.

I am absolutely convinced of it and I am pleased that we have been effective in asking the minister to go one consultative process further in an attempt to draft legislation that, on the one hand will make urban Canada say that this is safe and this is good, and on the other hand those who use a gun in of their day-to-day lives will also come to the conclusion that this is acceptable, that this is reasonable, and that we can endorse it. I am fully convinced that that kind of balance can be achieved.

The first objective should be to set aside the notion that it is the instrument that is wrong and come to a far higher and more intense training in the skills and the use, and the testing of the persons competence, both mentally and physically, to use that weapon. When we do, hopefully, we will have a safer society and a more trusted one for all sectors of our country.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his speech. I enjoyed the way he makes a presentation. I agree with him on the over-all position that there are two constituencies out there, rural and urban, if you like, and that we must find a way of bringing them both together with workable gun control. That is, gun control which works for rural people as well. We are in agreement there, but our agreement stops there.

He said: "Guns don't kill, people do." That was in the latter part of his speech. Is it not a fact that guns make it a heck of a lot easier for people to kill? It is pretty hard to kill with bare hands or even with knives, although one can kill with knives.

The fact is that gun control has affected the murder rate in Canada compared to the United States. That is the best example I think.

In Switzerland they do not keep AK-47s in their houses or semi-automatic weapons, as I understand it.

Mr. Crawford: Yes, they do.

Mr. Waddell: They do? Well, in any case I want to ask if that is not kind of the old argument against having any kind of gun control. Guns don't kill, people do. It seems to me that if the guns are controlled, then there is going to be a lot less killing. I think the statistics which he spoke about bear that out. I also want to ask him if hunters really need semi-automatics or automatics, some of the new kinds of guns. I went to the RCMP here in Ottawa and looked at some of the guns they have seized. It is unbelievable the kind of weapons that are coming into Canada, even weapons that are now controlled in California and other places, but not controlled yet in Canada.

What do you need in the woods? Do you need more than five shots? What animals are in Canada? Do we have tigers in Canada? What kind of animals do we have in Canada that you cannot kill with a regular gun and without having a semi-automatic or automatic, and without having more than five rounds at one time? I do not know of any animals.

An hon. member: Dinosaurs?

Mr. Waddell: Dinosaurs? No, they are all over. I do not know animals in the woods that a good hunter cannot deal with and I do not know why we have to use that argument.

The hon. member mentioned training. I think that is an excellent point. It is the one part that the gun lobby is right on. There has to be training. But it still has not been proclaimed. That gun law came in in 1978 and it is now 1990 and they still have not got around to getting a training system. I think we can both agree that it should be done.

Let me just end by saying this to the member and perhaps he could deal with it. He says: "We,"—meaning the Conservative backbench—"have been effective to have convinced the minister to go another step, that is to have this committee". He has already heard me say in the House that I interpret this as a major defeat for the new Minister of Justice in the cabinet, a major defeat for her after her promise to the students at the École Polytechnique in Montreal last April that she would bring in effective gun control. I see this as a major defeat for the minister. The member has said that the backbench has been effective in putting it off.

Why could we not have passed the bill in principle, dealt with it in committee and made the amendments that we need to make to protect rural Canada in committee? Now we are going to have a committee which is really a phoney. Any committee could look at a subject matter. The justice committee could look at gun control. We are passing a motion to send this material to the committee and the committee can send it back to the House and we never get to Bill C-80.

Why would the member not agree to protect at least the integrity of his own justice minister and her promises that she gave last April that the matter could pass in principle here in the House, then go to committee? If it goes to committee it will bounce around committee for a period. It will come back and God knows when we will ever get to it. Is it not, in fact, what he has done is succeed in burying gun control?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I am always very proud of myself when I can pronounce his constituency. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the minister's integrity is absolutely intact. Her commitment to those who are relatives and friends of those persons who were so tragically slain at École Polytechnique is absolutely intact. I totally, 100 per cent support absolutely the need for legislation.

Surely I would ask of the hon. member for Moody—Port Coquitlam that he also recognize that if it is possible to get better legislation by trying to rethink the fundamental principle that we are better off. Why do we not just amend it? I think we shot and missed—pun intended. We have started on a process for 20 years that pretends somehow that if you take this instrument and chop away at it in a legislative process, you can be effective. There is room for that. The hon. member asks the question: "What do you need in the woods." With tongue in cheek, I tell him mosquito spray. But, not tongue in cheek, I tell him he is right. You do not need fully automatic weapons. They should be outlawed. They should not be allowed into our country. You do not go moose hunting with an automatic weapon. Automatic weapons do only one thing well. They kill people. They do nothing else well. It is similar to the pistol. The pistol does two things well. It kills people or, in sporting activities for target shooting, it is part of a gaming event where the pistol is used that way. It is one of those things that is easily concealed.

The semi-automatic is a different thing. When you pull the trigger, the explosion of the first bullet allows for the second bullet to enter the chamber. I have a semi-automatic rifle. You should see the parking lot, the area where berry pickers come to my farm, and where the gophers are in the spring of the year. Colonies of them come up. You need a rapid capacity to be able to have varmint control. Anybody who is a northern resident will also submit to the same perspective. If you want to limit clips, I said fine. Five cartridge clips destroys the very reason why you have a semi-automatic in the first place. They are very different instruments. Fully automatic is military equipment, whereas semi-automatic is not.

The hon. member asks about the slogan, 'guns don't kill people, people kill people'. I have never tried to make persuasions or arguments on the basis of slogans. If I wanted to live my political life with slogans, I would join the Reform Party. There may be an element of truth to that message on bumper stickers. The gun can kill in a faster way.

I think the hon. member will recognize that in violent societies, death rates can be very high. He may or may not be surprised by the fact that the instrument that killed the most Albertans last year was the knife. It was not the gun. The most murders in Alberta took place with a knife. Most domestic murders in Canada do not take place with a gun, they take place with a knife.

To what does that logically lead us? Knife control? If so, what knife? The butter knife? Who defines and how do you define? This is a problem we have to wrestle with in an effective way that leads to its natural results that we all want, both urban and rural. People should not be of the view that there is some rural group out there who likes the notion of violence. I have no knowledge of any, though I am not naive enough to believe that there are not violent people in our society. I do not personally know of any.

Those are the questions I believe asked of me. That is what I offer him as my response and hope that that is of some satisfaction to the hon. member.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise and speak about the merits and the shortcomings of Bill C-80.

Specifically today, we are speaking on a motion to refer the bill to a legislative committee for further study.

It seems that the Tory caucus has reached the Minister of Justice. As a former president of the Dover Rod and Gun Club, I bring certain strong views to the subject of gun control. I am a hunter and sportsman, as are many of my constituents. It is economically important to my riding that hunting is allowed. I am of the firm belief that any gun control legislation must not hinder the honest citizen, that the current laws on the books should be used to the fullest against the dishonest citizen.

It is estimated that there are six million guns in Canada today. Canadians can buy firearms and ammunition at more than 10,000 outlets across Canada. Those figures may startle those who favour tougher gun control, but the figures show Canada does not have a high homicide rate or a high gun use.

The laws that are on the books now should be enforced by the police and the judicial system. We have a strong gun law in Canada today. It is not being enforced.

A strict system of controls was first introduced by the Liberal government in 1977 in order to prevent the criminal and irresponsible use of firearms and to encourage responsible gun ownership and use.

I have received many letters from constituents who are hunters like myself. One, in particular, the Kent Clover Leaf Conservation Club has some serious concerns with the bill that I share. For example, the proposed limitation of magazine capacities to five rounds on semi-automatics is unacceptable to the club, and it was mentioned earlier by the previous speaker. Guns are designed for certain clips and a five-clip in an automatic is of very little use.

They also stand in opposition to any further restrictions to or the banning of semi-automatic rifles, pistols or shotguns. Again, it does nothing to deter crime, but only hinders the enjoyment of a legitimate sport. Those who know nothing of guns or sport shooting are quick to offer that sport shooters do not need the new technology of self-loading firearms. It must be pointed out that they have been on the scene since the turn of the century and are an important part of sport shooting, in fact, also of the Olympics.

In the town of Wallaceburg, which is in my riding, we have the Lee-Enfield rifle in the museum. This gun under the new legislation would be banned. This gun has been known all over the world and has been used in two world wars.

The club makes some good points and I want to quote from their letter to the Minister of Justice on June 26, 1990:

> The criminal aspects of gun use must be tightened and enforced. Murder, armed robbery, assault with or without a weapon and the possession of a firearm or ammunition at a public gathering are all illegal.

So, we do have the law, but it is not being upheld by the judicial system.

Now is definitely the time for action in dealing with Canada's crime problem, but let us aim the action in the proper direction. We must place the responsibility solely where it belongs, on the shoulders of the criminal element.

The provisions in Bill C-80 regarding conditions for a firearms acquisition certificate, the FAC, are very reasonable. Gun clubs have always been supportive of safety courses and strong background checks of prospective gun buyers.

The requirement that an applicant must complete—

Mr. Nicholson: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I have just been informed by members that the question will automatically be put at two o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: So it will. The hon. member still has a few seconds.

Mr. Crawford: Under provincial law hunters have to complete safety courses before obtaining a hunting licence, so it is fair that firearm owners be properly trained, too. That is why the sportsmen's clubs are around. That is one of their most important functions, to teach the safety of firearms.

The FAC should bear a photograph of the applicant, and the 28-day waiting period is also fair and reasonable. I am certainly not against that. I support it 100 per cent.

Currently, many police authorities do inadequate checks for an FAC. I must say the ones in my riding certainly do their job well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do regret, but it being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to an order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

The first question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

The Deputy Speaker: The next question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The next question is on the main motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion as amended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand there have been discussions and I would like to place the following consent motion:

> Notwithstanding the Order of the House adopted earlier this day, respecting proceedings this day, at the completion of the times provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business, the House shall stand adjourned until 1 o'clock p.m., Monday, November 26, 1990.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion as moved by the minister. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 2 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

NORTHERN QUEBEC

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL CONSTITUENCY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce legislation to provide an additional constituency in Northern Quebec which would be identical to the territory covered by the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement of 1975 and thereby provide better representation for the people of Northern Quebec and, in particular, for the Inuit, Cree and Naskapi citizens who are the majority in this area.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to provide a new constituency in the extreme north of Quebec where the great majority of the population is Cree, Inuit or Naskapi. The area for the constituency that I have in mind is the area which would be more or less similar to the area covered in the James Bay Agreement of 1975.

In 1975 a land claim settlement was arrived at with respect to the Cree and the Inuit living in the north of Quebec. It was followed a few years later by a companion agreement with respect to the Naskapi who live on the more eastern side of the same territory.

At the present time, these aboriginal people living in the north of Quebec are not properly represented. I am not saying that the individual members of Parliament who represent those constituencies are bad members of Parliament, but they do not truly reflect the people who live in the far north of Quebec.

Right now in this area there are two constituencies. One of the constituencies, Manicouagan, is on the eastern side of that territory and runs from the St. Lawrence River right up to Hudson Strait and includes the more southern communities—one can call them southern in respect of that area but they are quite north—of Sept-Îles, Port-Cartier, Baie Comeau, and so on.

The majority of the population in the Manicouagan riding is in the southern part of that constituency, near the St. Lawrence River. Consequently the control of the constituency is with those people who are traditional Quebecois people and not aboriginal people.

The other constituency, which is on the western side of the area, is the constituency of Abitibi. It includes the southern communities of Rouyn, Noranda, Val d'Or, and so on. These communities, as well, control what happens in that constituency of Abitibi, and the people in the far north have very little to say.

Rather than have two constituencies which run right up to Hudson Strait and which are divided by a line that runs north and south, I am suggesting that we cut off the northern part of Quebec with a line that would run east and west and form a new constituency which would more or less include the same territory as the territory of the James Bay Agreement. The Quebecois cities of Sept-Îles, Baie Comeau, Port Cartier, Rouyn, Noranda, Val d'Or, and so on, would be south of that constituency and would belong to properly composed traditional Quebec constituencies.

I am not proposing that we take away one of the constituencies now allocated to Quebec for this purpose. Right now Quebec has 75 seats. I am suggesting that we have a 76th seat to deal with this very special need and very special proposal. Of course such a constituency would have fewer than the average population of most constituencies in Canada. The population would be more or less 20,000 people north of that line. By the way, that line would run near the 52nd parallel.

I must point out that in a sense it would be equivalent to the new constituency of Labrador, which is now a single constituency. Since 1988 the constituency of Labrador does not contain any territory on the island of Newfoundland, and that is new since 1988. It was done for the same purposes as I am suggesting now for the north of Quebec, but the southern boundary of this new constituency would be more or less the same as the southern boundary of Labrador. This sort of exception for constituencies has been done before. We did it in 1988 for Labrador. Before 1988 Labrador was lumped in with a large number of communities on the island of Newfoundland, but it was decided for cultural, historical and community purposes to give Labrador its own constituency.

It was also done, I cannot remember the exact year, for the present constituency of Nunatsiaq. Nunatsiaq is that part of the Northwest Territories on the eastern side which is above the tree line and which contains principally a population of Inuit people. A few years ago we decided, despite the fact that this area had a very small population compared to other Canadian constituencies, that it was appropriate to give the people in that area a representative in Parliament. It was agreed that we would set up this new constituency of Nunatsiaq. I will put on the record the population of that area.

It was also done when we first established the constituencies of Yukon and the Northwest Territories, because we would never have constituencies in Yukon or the Northwest Territories—and here I am talking of the western Arctic, the area around the Mackenzie River—if they were based on numbers of constituents. If we were to be very strict with respect to the number of constituents required for a constituency, then the Yukon, Western Arctic or Nunatsiaq do not meet that criteria. They are way below that criteria, but we did it because we felt that those people needed representation in Parliament and should not be lumped in with the more southerly areas of Canada which have larger populations. By the way, these southerly areas are economically, socially and culturally quite different in many respects and would not really represent the more northern areas.

We also make exceptions for Prince Edward Island. In the Constitution of 1867 we decided that Prince Edward Island should also have the same number of members of Parliament as senators. Consequently Prince Edward Island has four constituencies even though, according to the average Canadian standard for constituencies, there should be only one and a half constituencies in that province.

I would like to put on record some of the populations of these areas. For example, right now the constituency of Labrador has about 28,000 people and about 17,000 electors. I would have you compare that with the average Canadian constituency.

For example, let us take the two constituencies that presently exist in the north of Quebec. The constituency of Abitibi has a population of nearly 87,000 people with an electorate of 61,000. I am rounding off the figures. The constituency of Manicouagan has a population of a little over 57,000 people with nearly 39,000 electors. Labrador has a population of 28,000 with 17,000 electors, the Yukon has a population of nearly 24,000 with 16,000 electors, Nunatsiaq has a population of 19,000 with a little over 11,000 electors and the Western Arctic has a population of 32,000, with 18,000 electors.

If we look at the four constituencies in Prince Edward Island, Cardigan, Egmont, Hillsborough and Malpeque have populations of 29,000, 34,000, 31,000 and 30,000 respectively. As I say, we can easily see that these are all much less than the average for Canadian constituencies, which is around 60,000 to 70,000 people in each constituency.

We have done it in the past. We did it for Labrador and Nunatsiaq because we thought it would be a good thing for a group living with the same type of economy to have the right to representation in Parliament.

I should also point out, because it is very instructive, that at the time of Confederation in 1867, when this country was first established, there were 182 constituencies. The average population at that time of each constituency was 17,400. We were able to carry on quite well as a country and our members of Parliament were able to represent those areas quite well.

I gave you the populations for the constituencies of Abitibi and Manicouagan, Madam Speaker, but the national average population for constituencies in Canada is 85,794, and the average for Quebec is 87,099. What I am proposing is, of course, an exception to the rule, but it is not an exception to the rule that has not been done before.

I do not think anyone will deny that we need more aboriginal representatives in this House. We already have two in this party, one from the Northwest Territories and one from Nunatsiaq. I doubt if we would have them if we had stuck to the general rule for populations for constituencies. If we did not have those special constituencies with smaller populations than the average, if we did not have them in Nunatsiaq and the Eastern Arctic, we would not have the two members that we now have in this party. There is a member of the Conservative Party from Alberta, a treaty Indian, who comes from an ordinarily constructed constituency, and it is good that he does represent that area, but again, I think we need to do more to involve these peoples in our parliamentary process.

One way of doing it is to carve out constituencies in the northernmost parts of our provinces, such as I am suggesting, where there is a heavier than usual concentration of aboriginal people. It is very difficult for aboriginal people, who are a minority, to be elected in more southerly constituencies. It was done by the hon. member in the Conservative Party to whom I have just referred and it was done on this side of the House a few years ago when Senator Len Marchand was elected in the constituency of Kamloops.

If we look at the situation last summer, where we had a severe crisis at Oka, Quebec with respect to the Kanesatake community, there was nobody to really represent those people here in Parliament. Many of us tried to represent them. I did, and others did as well, but there was nobody from that community itself. With respect to Kahnawake, it is sad to say but the member of Parliament for La Prairie took very opposite views to the people of Kahnawake. As a matter of fact, the member for La Prairie suggested that the whole population of the Kahnawake community be moved to Labrador or some such place. I do not think that was a good idea.

No matter what we might think of Elijah Harper's politics, while many of us might have supported the Meech Accord and were upset that it did not succeed, we have to admit that the fact that Elijah Harper was in the Manitoba legislature representing a northern constituency in Manitoba helped him represent the views of his people. Whether or not we liked the outcome, the fact that Elijah Harper was in the Manitoba legislature in a minority Parliament meant that he was able to represent the views of his people. I think that is very important.

If you are not in Parliament where you can legitimately put forward the views of your people, in this case aboriginal people, then you will very often have extra-parliamentary action and that action is not always legal or appropriate. You have demonstrations, you have blockades, you have all sorts of things that might happen if you cannot legitimately pursue your views through the ordinary democratic process of elections and Parliament. People get frustrated because they feel they are not being represented in Parliament and therefore they take our their frustrations in other ways to get their political views known. I do not think that is a good thing.

I see here today the hon. member for Abitibi who is one of the most active members on the government side and one of the most active backbenchers in Parliament. I am not suggesting that he be replaced. I am suggesting that it would be more appropriate that he represent the communities that he comes from in the more southern part of the Abitibi riding and, as I said, that we add an additional riding to Quebec to take care of the area that is north of the communities, the Quebecois communities as opposed to the Cree and the Inuit communities which are in the north.

I am familiar with those communities because I was a former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I visited that region several times. I know that there is a real difference between the Cree, Inuit and Naskapi communities and the communities of Sept Iles, Port Cartier, Baie Comeau, Rouyn, Val d'Or, Amos and all the other communities which are non-aboriginal communities and for the most part reflect different cultural, economic and social values, not totally but enough to require special representation in Parliament.

I was responsible as minister for putting through the James Bay legislation in this House. We finally passed it in 1977. Since that time, there has been great development in these aboriginal communities in the north of Quebec. They have their economic development programs, their own school boards and their own health programs. In the Inuit areas there is the Makivik Corporation, the Kativik regional government and so on. It is only appropriate that we give these people some means of being directly represented in Parliament and this is my proposal.

Ideally, there should be two constituencies in that area because there are two or even three aboriginal groups. There is the Cree community, which has its own way of life. Then there is the Inuit further north in their own communities. If we can get agreement to move forward, it would be a great accomplishment. For example, in the western Arctic, which is represented by my colleague from Yellowknife, who is a Dene Indian, her constituency also has some Inuit. There are white people as well, people from different backgrounds. The great majority of people in that constituency are either Indian or Métis or Inuit. The overwhelming percentage of the population is of aboriginal background.

I have been campaigning for this proposal for several years. I have written to the Chief Electoral Officer who, in principle, does not oppose it. This is an idea that came to me from leaders in the north of Quebec. People from the Makivik Corporation and people from the Cree communities felt that this was the only way that they would ever get represented in Parliament. Some of them have run for office before in the constituencies of either Manicouagan or Abitibi as independents, but did not have any chance at all. Their population cannot compete with the populations in the southern part of the constituency.

This is a motion and not a bill. I am asking the House to approve, in principle, the formation of a new constituency in the north of Quebec. This constituency would be more or less contiguous with the territory of the James Bay agreement so that the people in that area could be represented, need not be, but would most likely be represented by an aboriginal person from that area.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, Narkurmik Marialuk. I rise today to speak on motion M-415 presented by my honorable colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, proposing that the federal government introduce legislation to provide an additional constituency in Northern Quebec. This new constituency would be identical to the territory covered by the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement of 1975, and would provide better representation for the people living in this large northern area.

Madam Speaker, the constituency of Abitibi covers an area of 553,837 square kilometers, or 213,837 square miles, and has a population of 86,990. It is the largest constituency in all ten provinces after the Northwest Territories, and it covers a substantial part of that agreement's territory together with the constituency of Manicouagan, represented here by Charles Langlois. Rest assured, Madam Speaker, we do not intend to replace the member who is here today, because since his arrival in 1988, he has defended the interests of all of his constituency, north and south.

Numbering 3,584, the Inuit are scattered in the following villages: Salluit, Ivujivik, Akulivik, Povungnituk, Inukjuak, Umiujaq, Kuujjuarapik, and Mailasikkut.

Some 9,593 strong, the Crees are scattered in the villages of Whapmagoostui, Chisasibi, Wemindji, Eastmain, Nemaska, Waswanipi, Waskaganish, and Mistassini.

On February 8, 1983, Mr. Jean-Jacques Martel, of Amos, who has been a member of Parliament here in Ottawa, appeared before the Electoral Boundaries Commission, and said: "As another practical suggestion, the great northern Quebec area, also known as New Quebec or the Ungava Territory, should make a separate electoral riding because of its enormous size, its scattered population, its needs and problems which are different from ours and those of the major metropolitan centres".

During hearings held on December 1, 1986, Mrs. Jeannette Dupuis Lessard, speaking on behalf of the Abitibi-Témiscamingue Regional Development Council (CRDAT), stated similarly: "The climatic and soil conditions which exist in the southern part of the Abitibi riding allows such economic activities as agriculture, forestry and mining, which is clearly not the case of the Middle and Far North of the riding. Do you realize, Madam Speaker, that there is a distance of 1,600 kilometres between the south and the north of my region, which is about the same distance as between Val d'Or and Tampa, Florida. You can understand the time it takes to cover such an area and what enormous task it would be for one member.

The northern part of this territory is inhabited by Natives, Crees and Inuits, with a culture and both social and economic needs different from those of the south. Transport and communication are very difficult. There is no longer any road to the north of James Bay and the airplane is the only means of transportation to visit this whole territory. The inhabitants of the middle North and the far North are our neighbours and our social and economic ties with them are increasing. Yet, the CRDAT representative added: "Because of its peculiarities, this northern territory should have its own electoral representative in the House of Commons."

The current incumbent of the Abitibi seat and his predecessors have done everything possible to represent this huge territory. Yet, it must be recognized that such a task is beyond human capacity.

That is why the CRDAT is in favour of the creation of a third electoral riding which would represent the inhabitants of both the middle North and far North of the current Abitibi riding. In view of the small number of its inhabitants, it is true that the creation of such a new electoral riding would not meet the current electoral standards.

But you must realize, members of the Commission, that this electoral ratio does not reflect the reality of the huge and sparsely populated northern territories.

In short, we wish that that portion of the territory be made into an extraordinary electoral district, as defined in the Canada Elections Act and as is the case for the Northwest Territories of Canada.

Madam Speaker, the message from every Quebec electoral district boundaries commission is the same: "Some findings based on geographical or ethnic considerations suggested that the commission should establish electoral districts with less than the minimum population requirement. That was the case of requests received from Inuit and Cree people. Of course, the commission does not have any authority to act on these requests."

Madam Speaker, let us not forget the residents and workers of the La Grande complex, a hydro development with various sites in Radisson, LG1, LG2, LG3, LG4 and elsewhere, as well as the residents in northern communities.

The Cree-Naskapi Commission, chaired by the honourable Justice Réjean F. Paul, from the Superior Court, recommended in Chapter 3 of its 1988 report the recognition of the Cree in Ouje-Bougoumou as the ninth Cree band, in accordance with the Cree-Naskapi of Quebec Act. Nowadays, Canada should officially recognize this new Cree band, which was omitted in the hon. member's motion, and put in place a process to establish this new village.

Madam Speaker, the James bay and Northern Québec Agreement divides the lands in three caterogies: the first category includes lands to be controlled solely by the native people; the second category comprises provincial public lands on which the natives have the exclusive right to hunt, fish and trap; and finally the third category is made up of public lands belonging to the province.

Since the James Bay and northern Quebec Agreement was signed 12 years ago the Governments of Canada and Quebec paid more than $1 billion in cash and services to the 17,000 native people of Northern Quebec living in the ridings of Abitibi and Manicouagan. On-going payments by Canada under the agreements amount to more than $100 million a year.

The Inuit, Cree and Naskapi people have been using these funds to raise the standards of living of their communities. They have shown outstanding ingeniosity and a remarkable spirit of entreprise.

The most enduring benefit of the agreements is that the native people have been able to gain better control over their own future. This very positive climate was highlighted by the July 13, 1984 enactment of the legislation governing Quebec Crees and Naskapis. Crees and Naskapees do now have the power to look after all matters related to their land and affairs. Inuit have also taken charge of their own affairs as a result of the James Bay and northern Quebec convention.

Madam Speaker, we must always remember that in the vast territory of Northern Quebec, in my constituency and that of my colleague of Manicouagan, there are several cities and places that belong to, or rather should I say that are presently inhabited by white people, such as Chapais, Chibougamau, Matagami, Joutel et Lebel-sur-Quévillon. And there is also the buffer zone established by the James Bay convention which exceeds a little bit the James Bay municipality located at the 49th parallel. It represents a vast territory and that is why it is important to consult our people before introducing a bill.

Madam Speaker, before tabling a legislation to provide for an additional federal constituency in Northern Quebec, we will have to ask the Inuit, the Cree, the Naskapi and the permanent residents of the North, as well as the Cree-Naskapi Commission under the chairmanship of the hon. Réjean F. Paul, justice of the Superior Court, to present us with a draft legislation to provide for an additional federal constituency. The success of this collective effort will be a model of co-operation between our native friends and the members of the House of Commons.

This is not an easy challenge, but I am confident that our joint efforts will enable us to set up a northern federal constituency in Quebec. Norkurmik Marialuk.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I rise to support the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on his motion. I do so, not necessarily because I spent five years or so in the constituency of my friend from Abitibi, but mainly because I have spent most of my life in northern communities and I feel that I can speak with some authority on the kind of approach that the hon. member suggests. I must congratulate the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for his approach to this.

To a certain extent, in our democratic structure in Canada and in a large part of the world, we have been seduced by the idea that representation by population, the old "rep by pop" approach, is the proper and most fair way of representation across the country. That motto, "rep by pop", has been the motto of electoral democracy over the years. We should not really knock it because it is still the essence of what we believe in as the democratic base of the country—one vote for one member and representation in the governing body by equal numbers.

Democracy can sometimes be undermined by the majority. We face it every day in the House. The ruling party, which represents a minority of the people in Canada but has a majority of the seats, marches over the will of the people without much concern for what the people of Canada think. It is sort of jack-boot democracy, if you would call it that. But that, Madam Speaker, is another story.

Every minority, every group, has the right to have representation in the House. That often does not happen. Theoretically, I suppose, we could expect the House would be a mirror image of the representation of the various groups of people across the country, but that is not likely to happen. It has not happened in the past and it is unlikely to happen in the future.

We can do something to allow certain geographic areas to have the kind of representation which, because of our immense geography in the country, makes it possible and necessary to vary the rule of representation by population. Many live in vast areas of this land and have not been directly represented in the House at any time.

We have solved the problem, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has pointed out, in many places. We solved it in the Northwest Territories. We solved it in the Yukon. We established representation in those areas, regardless of how many people happen to live in those particular areas. We have also made some room for a specific kind of regional representation by varying the numbers of electors that are needed to elect a member in the provinces. For instance, a considerably fewer number of electors are required to elect a member in Prince Edward Island and in Saskatchewan, than are required to elect a member in Ontario or in Quebec. Consequently, to some extent, we have moved away from the idea of representation by population and the number of people required to elect a member to represent them in the House being the same across the country.

But there are large groups and regions that fall through the cracks of our representation. The hon. member has pointed out one or two of these groups by looking at the situation in northern Quebec. I am supporting this particular resolution because the same kind of situation exists in the northern parts of almost every one of our provinces that reaches up to the 54th parallel, or at least to the 60th parallel and above. Quite often, there are very few people in a large area, but those people have a particular point of view.

As I indicated before, I spent a considerable part of my career in those northern areas and have a feeling for the lack of representation they have sometimes felt. A large portion of my time was spent in the Yukon and Northwest Territories where representation is recognized on a regional basis. I have also had some responsibility in northern Saskatchewan where at one time I was the director of education for the northern half of the province.

I suppose it is a good indication of the kind of lack of representation there, in that in the southern half of the province there are something like 85 superintendents of schools. In the northern half, there is only one, but we expect the representation of the large group in the south to be effective in the north.

Northern Saskatchewan, like northern Quebec, has large rural areas, but very little in common with their urban neighbours to the south, or even with their rural neighbours to the south, because a large part of rural Saskatchewan is our farming communities. Consequently, they are being represented by people who do not necessarily feel the same kind of empathy for that group as they would for their more numerous neighbours of the south. I gather that this is the reason for this particular motion and that is to try to give representation to the people who now feel they are not represented as they might be.

The area that we consider to be northern Saskatchewan starts approximately halfway between the U.S. border and the border of the Northwest Territories, just 100 miles or so north of the city of Prince Albert. Therefore, it is approximately half of the territory of the province of Saskatchewan. That territory is presently represented by the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, who has a great deal of empathy for the people in the north, but recognizes, as he works in that area, that he is not considered by the people to be a northerner.

During the last readjustment of boundaries in northern Saskatchewan, the people of northern Saskatchewan placed before the commission, whose responsibility it was to draw the borders of the constituencies, a number of very broad and responsible briefs which indicated that they felt they would like and needed representation for their particular area separate from that of the more southern areas of the province. The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act allows a 25 per cent deviation between constituencies within a province. In Saskatchewan the average is about 70,000. The northern part of the province would probably be composed of 35,000 or 40,000, so the deviation would be more than 25 per cent. That is the reason the commission said it would not continue with the idea of establishing one northern constituency.

I support this particular motion because, if we look at it thoroughly, we will recognize that the idea is proper and that it can be adapted, not only for northern Quebec, but for many other parts of the country where representation is needed and not available at the moment.

M. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Narkurmik, Marialuk, Madam Speaker. It is with great interest that I am participating today in the debate on motion M–415, tabled by the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. The motion, tabled on April 11, 1989 by my hon. colleague, deals with a situation about which I have been concerned since November of 1988, that is since I was elected as the hon. member for the riding of Manicouagan.

In the next few minutes, I will use both official languages, in order to respect the linguistic duality of the country. I would have liked to be able to address the House in Innutituk, the language of our fellow Inuit who live in the communities of northern Quebec. Unfortunately, I cannot do it. Therefore, I will use the English language, since the Inuit are more familiar with it than with the French.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the riding of Manicouagan, that I have been representing in this house since November of 1988, is one of the largest in the country. It covers an area of over 465,680 square kilometers. It stretches along the north coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, from the community of Franquelin to Blanc Sablon, in the eastern reaches of the province of Quebec.

It also stretches from the north coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the northern reaches of both coasts of Ungava Bay. It is a vast and diversified land. The riding territory includes industrialized sections where the major centres of Port–Cartier, Sept–Îles, and Havre–St–Pierre are located. It covers vast areas where logging operations are taking place. It also covers vast areas where there are tourist attractions. The eastern part of the riding, called the Lower North Shore, is made up of 15 fishing villages, most of them linked by sea and air.

It also covers vast lands rich in natural resources where the towns of Fermont and Schefferville have been built. Moving further north, the riding of Manicouagan reaches the southern part of the Bay of Ungava where we find the community of Kuujjuak. The communities on both coasts of the Ungava Bay are also located in the riding of Manicouagan. When we get there, we have an Inuit land.

I recognized from the start of my mandate that it would be difficult for me to give good and frequent services to Inuit communities of Ungava Bay. I planned several times to go and stay there for a while but unfortunately, it was impossible to carry out my wishes.

[English]

One must understand that Manicouagan is a large riding with different needs and problems.

Since the fall of 1988, I have tried to be as useful as possible to the people of the northern communities. I have worked actively with my colleague from Abitibi to implement economic programs. I have followed very closely the project of installing an FOL base in Kuujjuak by the Department of National Defence. I felt from the beginning that this project will bring economic activities and employment in Kuujjuak.

While supporting the project, I share the concerns of the community of Kuujjuak and its leaders about the impact that the project could have on the way of life of its people. The Minister of National Defence would be well advised to take the necessary steps to clean up the garbage, debris and drums accumulated in Kuujjuak by the U.S. Air Force during the Second World War and left there. The shore of the Koksoak River and its beaches are littered with drums full of tar. Clean-up procedures satisfactory to the community should be undertaken right away.

After the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing was established, I had several meetings and discussions with its chairman, Mr. Pierre Lortie, on the problems of representations for the northern communities. These discussions led to the visit to Kuujjuak by the royal commission. It gave the Inuit leaders the opportunity to express their view on northern representation and participation in the Canadian democratic process and in the Canadian government.

In a letter sent to the commission chairman and to Mr. Jimmy Johannes, Chairman of the Kativik Regional government, I strongly supported the position of the Inuit leaders. In my letter I stated: "I fully support the position of the Inuit people as outlined in your brief." I also said: "The time is long overdue for a better and more active representation of the native people in the House of Commons."

In my letter to Mr. Pierre Lortie, chairman of the royal commission, I wrote: "I would like to take this opportunity to express the view that all efforts should be made to allow the native communities of the northern part of Quebec to be part of a northern federal riding." I further stated: "The creation of a federal riding that would include all communities located on both shores of the Ungava Bay would allow more normal representation in the House of Commons. The process of self-government for the Inuit and other native populations should include representation by a native person in the House of Commons."

Madam Speaker, you will agree that my position is very clear on this matter and I will keep on working to assure better representation for the people living in the north.

Madam Speaker, it is now time to ask the following question: Does the motion introduced by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce give a good answer to the expectations of northern populations? I don't think so.

The motion specifies that a new federal constituency should match exactly with the territories covered by the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement signed in 1975.

In this geographical context, what will happen to the native population living in the villages located outside the territory covered by the agreement?

Since the terms of the motion refer to the Naskapi people, I think we must evaluate its impacts on the Naskapi and Montagnais groups living in seperate reserves in Schefferville.

[English]

The motion implies two main points: First, that the people of northern Quebec, especially the Inuit, Cree and Naskapi citizens of this region are in need of additional representation in this House, and I agree.

Second, that the Government of Canada may not be exercising its responsibilities to safeguard the economic, social, cultural and environmental rights of all peoples living in this important region of our country.

• (1450 )

I would like for a moment to focus on the second point since I have covered the first aspect quite extensively.

The hon. member calls for additional representation, presumably to address a deterioration in conditions faced by native people in northern Quebec. The facts suggest otherwise.

The James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement was signed in November of 1975. This was followed by the signing of the Northeastern Quebec Agreement in 1978. Since the conclusion of these two landmark agreements, 18,000 Cree, Inuit and Naskapi living in these regions have received cash and services totalling more than $1 billion from the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec.

The James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement involved an initial compensation of $225 million. The Northeastern Quebec Agreement provides $9 million in compensation and a subsequent agreement involved various types of compensation, relocation and related funding totalling more than $250 million. These figures are significant in their own way.

By themselves, they do not provide the true appreciation of the profound improvement in the quality of life and health standards which the Cree, Naskapi and Inuit have experienced over the past 12 years.

Each village now has its own dispensaries providing first aid care, home visits and community health services. Communities have been divided into independent municipalities. The Cree school board and the Kativik school board are run entirely by elected representatives of the communities.

The James Bay development has actually resulted in considerably reducing the cost of supplies to northern Quebec communities. The existing highway system has made transportation more accessible. Moreover, Cree-owned Air Creebec and Inuit-owned Air Inuit now supply coastal villages from Val d'Or to the Bay of Ungava.

Housing is yet another area where substantial improvements have been achieved. Cree, Naskapi and Inuit families now live in modern homes. Community construction projects are carried out by the Cree, Naskapi and Inuit themselves.

These are impressive accomplishments by any standard of measurement. They offer solid evidence that the aboriginal peoples of northern Quebec have been able to reap significant and lasting benefits from the James Bay development.

Never before have the Cree, Inuit and Naskapi citizens of this region had more control over their own lives, or enjoyed a higher quality of life and health standards, as demonstrated by the considerable population growth in this region in recent years.

The Cree, Naskapi and Inuit citizens of northern Quebec have made some very significant advances over the past decade, both from an economic perspective and in terms of their over-all quality of life.

The Government of Canada is committed to seeing that this progress is not only sustained, but advanced. We will honour our agreements with the aboriginal peoples of this region, as with aboriginal peoples in all regions of Canada.

I would like to suggest in response to the motion by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that Parliament wait for the report of the Lortie royal commission that is taking place at the present time to see its recommendation on this important aspect.

I would also suggest that members' budgets representing those areas, are funded in such a way that will make it possible for us to open up riding offices in those areas, hiring aboriginal peoples so we can provide a daily and a more appropriate service for the people of these communities.

I will conclude by saying that in my capacity as member of Parliament for the riding of Manicouagan, I will continue to represent the Inuit people to the best of my capacity.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I would like to rise today on motion M-415, brought forward by my honourable colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. He referred to the James Bay agreement, signed in 1975, which sought to provide better representation for the people of that region. According to this agreement and the northeastern Quebec one, which was signed in 1978, these agreements have allowed native people of that region to improve their standard of living and to better control their own development.

Moreover, with the Cree-Naskapi of Quebec Act, the Cree and Naskapi have been the first native people in Canada to achieve some kind of self-government. Bands administer their lands and the natural resources they are controlling. They maintain the native culture, values and traditions and look after community development.

So, the question is this: Why should the federal government create a new electoral district to better represent the native people of that region when there are systems in place that work properly?

Madam Speaker, I admire the interest the member from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce shows in the aboriginal people. Nevertheless, it would be wrong to create an additional constituency in Quebec.

Much still remains to be done and many of their grievances are legitimate. That is why the prime minister made public, on September 25, an action plan in order to settle some of the issues concerning aboriginal people of Canada.

That action plan is not made up of vain promises. It is a realistic and concrete plan made which has four objectives: to settle territorial claims; to improve economic and social conditions in reserves; to enhance relations between aboriginal people and governments; to bring the concerns of aboriginal people into contemporary Canadian society.

During the last two months, you noticed for sure that this government takes land claims very seriously. We said that nothing was more important than that and we kept our word.

As early as the beginning of October, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his Minister of State sought the co-operation of a number of native leaders having experience with the process of specific claims.

That group asked for our support in the setting up of a task force to have discussions with aboriginal communities throughout the country. We agreed, and the task force was struck and is chaired by Manny Jules of British Columbia. It should submit a report at the beginning of December stating its position on a great many subjects concerning specific claims.

We also made progress in other areas. Policy changes were made to allow the negotiation of land claims in British Columbia. We took the necessary steps to ensure that legal obligations contracted over a century ago concerning the transfer of land entitlements to Treaty Indians are respected.

As a matter of fact, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs announced a few weeks ago that the government was willing to negotiate Treaty land entitlement claims in Saskatchewan. Negotiations will be based on the Treaty Commissioner's report. We have already announced similar measures in Alberta and Manitoba.

The second objective of the government's action plan is to improve living conditions on Indian reserves. As we all know, while major progress was made in recent years, living conditions on native reserves are in many cases still lower than those of the majority of Canadians.

We are ready to co-operate with Indian leaders and provincial governments in order to introduce a number of improvements to basic community programs and services, like running water, sewers, sanitary facilities and so on. The government will soon announce concrete plans designed to make life easier in all native communities.

The third objective is to improve the relations between native people and governments, that is to make it possible for our native fellow citizens to have the same opportunities as other Canadians to contribute to the growth and prosperity of our country. This, Madam Speaker, is definitely not an easy task.

I am convinced that real progress in that field can only flow from redefining the legal relation between government and native people.

The Indian Act, very seldom amended since it was enacted in 1876, maintains native people in a situation of dependence on the state. It belittles both natives and non-natives.

Native leaders on the task force to which I referred a moment ago are expected to make their recommendations on that issue in the near future, so we are looking forward to unveiling the first of a series of amendments to the Indian Act early next year.

The ultimate objective is to prepare native people to assume their autonomy within the Canadian Constitution. Native people would thus be able to take control over the development of their communities, upgrade their social and educational systems, and acquire the economic infrastructures they need to live the kind of life which reflects their own culture.

Finally, when the Prime Minister announced the creation of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's future on the first of this month, he set in motion an in-depth review of the fundamental place and the role of native people in Canadian society, which happens to be the fourth phase of the federal government's plan of action.

This initiative gives native people an unprecedented opportunity to share their concerns and their hopes with the Canadian public and to insure that their ideas will be considered when we redefine the constitutional status of our country.

Much has passed since our honourable colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, introduced his motion. The government of Canada has clearly demonstrated, over the last few months, its will to find a resolution to the problems affecting the aboriginal people.

I am convinced, Madam Speaker, that the policy plan implemented by the federal government to deal with the problems of the aboriginal communities will be successful. My colleagues in the House will no doubt agree that a comprehensive program like the one proposed by the government is more appropriate than any initiative pertaining only to a single region or a single part of the country, as regards its representation in this humble assembly.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved that Bill C–217, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act (priority of claims) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my bill is being debated at a most propitious time, a time when this country finds itself in recession, when it finds that bankruptcies are soaring beyond belief. Personal and business bankruptcies are up 60 per cent. Bill C–217 addresses particularly the whole question of business bankruptcies and their effect on employees.

My bill which cries out for some attention by this government attempts to correct an injustice to employees who, when the company goes bankrupt, end up going to the back of the bus to get any kind of compensation for lost wages and benefits, and in some cases even pensions and vacation pay.

The Bankruptcy Act came into effect in 1949. It divides creditors into secured creditors and preferred creditors. Secured creditors are banks and any other individual or group who has lent money to the company and their loans are secured against the equipment and assets of the company.

The employees are preferred creditors and the preferred creditors are limited in the 1949 act, which is still in effect, to a maximum limit of $500. This may have been quite generous in 1949 but since it has not been adjusted since then is really an insult in 1990.

In 1966 amendments were passed which provided some administrative tinkering with the act with respect to filing a bankruptcy for individuals. In fact it never dealt with the very important question of securing for the employees of a bankrupt company their past wages and benefits. It did nothing at all about placing them in a spectrum or in a line so they would take some priority with respect to getting any money when the company goes bankrupt.

We had an example here in Ottawa. Leigh Instruments in Ottawa went bankrupt in about April of this year. Seven hundred and fifty employees lost their jobs. These employees go to the back of the bus when it comes to collecting their lost wages and benefits, and then they could only collect to a limit of $500.

What happens is that the bank gets its cut and any other secured creditor gets their cuts. If there is any money left in the pot, then come the employees. They can get a limit of $500. If the amount that they are filing for exceeds $500, they then have to make a separate claim which has to go to the end of the list.

After the secured creditors get their take from the pot, there is nothing left for the preferred creditors. The employees, in many cases, get nothing. We do not even have to talk about the red tape of the bureaucracy and the administrative detail of filing with the bankruptcy trustee, and the time it takes to even collect the crumbs to which they might be entitled.

This matter just did not start in 1990. There have been all kinds of studies done by successive Liberal and Tory governments since 1970. They have studied this question to death. They promised that they would amend the Bankruptcy Act. In the early 1980s, the then consumer and corporate affairs minister tabled a bill. It died on the order paper.

In 1986, the previous consumer and corporate affairs minister of this government, the man who is now the House leader for the government—

An hon. member: Is that Harvie?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is Harvie Andre. —said that amending the Bankruptcy Act to give more protection to employees was one of his priorities. Two ministers and four years later, this priority has not been achieved yet.

An hon. member: The banks got to him.

Mr. Rodriguez: The banks got to him. It shows that there are other priorities that have more priority.

Now we come to the present consumer and corporate affairs minister. What is he saying? He said in the House the other day, "I am going to look at the NDP proposal in Ontario where some kind of fund will be set up". Where have these people been? Where are they?

First of all, I want to say in making my argument that there are two things that have to be considered. One is the limit. I have dealt with the limit in my bill. I have raised the limit to $9,000 per employee.

I do a second thing in the bill. I moved the employees to the top of the parade. They go to the head of the line.

An hon. member: Where they should be.

Mr. Rodriguez: I want to talk about the secured creditor and the preferred creditors of business. I do not understand secured and preferred. I really do not. They can secure a loan against a piece of equipment—a chair, a table, or a microphone. This is secured creditor. But what about the workers' toil, labour, commitment? Is that not a secured right? When an employee works for an employer, he puts in his commitment, labour, time, effort and loyalty to the company. That has to rate above securing a loan against equipment. The employee has given credit to the company and that credit has to be secured ahead of the security against equipment and the money that the company borrowed against equipment.

We have two problems. It is not just raising the limit to $500. It is actually saying that employees come first and the banks go to the back of the bus, or secured creditors go to the back of the bus.

My friend across the aisle is smiling because he knows that what I am saying is common sense.

I do not know what the great fuss is about. I do not know why this government and previous Liberal governments have sat on this egg for so long. I know the gestation period for an elephant is nine years. Surely, this has got to be a super elephant to try to amend the Bankruptcy Act. It cannot be that difficult.

An hon. member: What's the gestation period for the NDP?

Mr. Rodriguez: The member wants to know what the gestation period for the NDP is. Let's go to an election now and we will see where you are going to be dispatched to. You will be dispatched to the waste basket of history, brother, just like Maggie Thatcher.

There has been a suggestion from the government that it will look at a fund. Employees and employers can contribute to the fund. I have a problem with that. Why should the employees contribute to a fund? They are not responsible for the company going bankrupt. Oftentimes, it is the company's own fault that it goes bankrupt. Employees do not have any participation in the decision-making of the bankrupt company, that is, management's right to make decisions for the company. Those are protected very fiercely by management. Why should the employees put their own money into the fund so that when the bosses make the mistakes and lose their jobs, they get paid back their own money? Why should they be contributing to the fund?

If the workers go to the head of the parade, then the employees will get their share on a priority basis when the assets are sold. It seems to me that that makes a lot of common sense. Surely, if this is a priority for the government, it ought not to take four years and three ministers of consumer and corporate affairs to realize that the legislation has to be placed before the House of Commons. There have been enough studies done on this matter. There has been other legislation which has been attempted. Yet, we still do not have the Bankruptcy Act updated.

Recently the Auditor General said in his report that it is a crying shame and it is a scandal that employees of bankrupt companies are left without the moneys for which they have worked for the company. This situation has been allowed to continue. Only a heartless government—I am not talking about brainless—can turn a blind eye to the misery that the present act creates. Surely, after a person has worked so many years for a company and the company goes bankrupt, it is not good enough to say that they have to join a line and, in the meantime, go on welfare. In most cases, the company has not paid the UI premiums. That has to be sorted out because the Unemployment Insurance Commission goes to the back of the line, as well.

Surely, that is not the way a caring, feeling, sensitive society treats people who, through no fault of their own, end up losing not only their employment, but they lose the wages for which they have worked and contributed.

I know the Conservative government is looking for good ideas because it does not think of any good ideas. There is a magnificent government in the province of Ontario that is about two months old. In its first Throne Speech it has outlined its determination to come to grips with the whole question of employees getting a fair shake on their wages, benefits, and possible pensions lost as a result of bankruptcy. It is determined to move ahead with a fund, but this will only apply to provincially incorporated companies.

Where is the leadership from the federal government? I saw the government move with more action on the question of sending the Nina, the Pinta and the Santa Maria to the Gulf, without even the United Nations having approved it. It moved with the speed of light. Yet, Canadians are being treated unjustly, unfairly, and most shabbily.

All the government needs is the resolve to say, that yes, the workers of a company that goes bankrupt must go to the head of the line as secured creditors. I cannot stress that more firmly, Mr. Speaker. They are secured creditors. They gave hours of work as credit to the company, yet they are being treated as preferred creditors. In this case, preferred might sound nice. At the racetrack there is preferred parking, and it sounds like you are being treated special. But, in this context, preferred does not amount to a pinch of salt. A pinch of salt. The government does not give a pinch of salt.

Mr. McWilliam: It doesn't work.

Mr. Rodriguez: It doesn't work. I am not going to put salt in the wounds here.

Where is the federal leadership from the government? The government of the province of Ontario, in office only two months, has already indicated a desire to move in the direction of clearing up a problem in its own backyard with respect to the employees of bankrupt companies. Yet, the federal government, with all the vast array of personnel in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the vast treasury of the federal Parliament, and the people of Canada, and all we get are pious statements that it is a priority. A minister says: "It is my priority." Before the guy could realize his priority, he has gone through the revolving door and the next cardboard figure comes up for us to take target practice at. Just when we are getting warm with him, he resigns from the cabinet.

Then we get another cardboard figure coming through on the revolving door. He has been studying this question for a year now. He is just a slow studier. He studies slowly. The minister, too, now says right here in the House of Commons: "I am going to look at this proposal." A federal minister may borrow a NDP idea on worker protection in bankruptcies. He may. He is even playing on the words now. He does not say: "I will borrow." He says: "I may borrow." Of course, if he borrows that he is a secured creditor, or is he a preferred?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: My bill, I think, is timely. It comes at an appropriate time. It is an excellent bill, not just a good bill. It is an excellent bill. It deals with the current problem, a problem that has been festering for too long. Yet, the government, which has the responsibility to lead, has reneged on its responsibility by not acting. We cannot treat people who are unequal in an equal fashion and compound it by treating people who are unequal in an unequal fashion. The government, by closing its eyes to this blot on the escutcheon of labour and management relationships in the country, should hang its head in collective shame, that it has done nothing about this problem.

Why does the House not pass my bill and let us get on with it. If the government cannot do it, I have done it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt again did himself proud. He does do a good job when speaking to bills.

I would like to emphasize that I believe, probably as strongly as the hon. member for Nickel Belt, that the current Bankruptcy Act does not provide adequate protection to Canadian workers whose employers have gone bankrupt. I would review the existing Act briefly.

The existing legislation allows workers a privileged claim for up to $500 in unpaid wages and commissions. In 1949, when this law was enacted, $500 meant three months' wages. That meant that three months' wages were protected for that worker. A lot has changed in 40 years. Five hundred dollars is now just a week's wages. This Act that we have now unfortunately protects a worker for one solitary week. Of course, not every worker is able to collect even that first $500 or the rest of his or her wage claim. There are simply not enough assets to give workers their due in most cases, not when the workers' claims are dealt with only after the banks have recovered on their securities and after the trustees have been paid.

I am told that over half of the workers who submit a claim for unpaid wages in bankruptcy recover little or nothing from their claim. First, the workers find out that the wages that they have worked hard for and for which they are due, will not be paid to them. Second, they find out that they have a waiting period, even if there was going to be some payment. Of course, if they then turn to unemployment insurance, in many cases they have to wait for it as well because technically they have money coming to them from their former employer. Eventually, if they do recover any money from the company, it is long, long, after the bankruptcy. It can be years before any amount is paid to the creditors, and this is a long time to wait. It is a long time to wait for a nearly forgotten pay cheque, especially if you are out of work.

Canadian workers certainly deserve to have those wages paid. But, the changes we are talking about today, I am sorry to say, do not correct that situation. This legislation, although it is based on a good intention and a good idea, offers workers a super priority. It is a super priority claim for their wages, commissions and pension contributions, going back six months, to a maximum of $9,000.

Super priority means that the workers who have valid claims will be paid before the secured creditors receive anything. On the surface, that sounds like a good idea. These secured creditors are often banks, but they might also be businesses or other individuals. Secured creditors hold securities or mortgages as collateral against the money they have loaned the company that is now bankrupt. These securities must have been properly registered so that subsequent creditors could be aware of liens on a company's assets. It is important to see that a security is a precise thing.

Mr. Rodriguez: The workers are precise.

Mr. Worthy: The workers are of ultimate importance. but one has to understand the environment.

Let us say that creditor a has a mortgage on a bankrupt company's factory and creditor b has registered a security on an office building that the company owns. The way a bankruptcy is administered, under the law, is that the factory and office building can be sold.

Mr. Rodriguez: Who is more important?

Mr. Worthy: Obviously, the people are more important. The money received from the factory goes, first, toward paying creditor a what is still owed on the mortgage. The purchase price of the office building goes to pay creditor b. It is only then that the value of the remaining assets are distributed to other creditors including workers. In this case, they may or may not receive their money.

The hon. member in his bill has not explained how workers will be paid, before the creditors a and b. Will the unpaid wages be paid out from the proceeds from selling the factory or will they be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the building or will they combine the proceeds from the building and the factory or will some employees only get paid if there is a surplus from the factory?

Mr. Rodriguez: Sell it all and you will make the workers worse off.

An hon. member: Are you addressing the right bill?

Mr. Worthy: I have to apologize, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, I have confused some of the people. The question has to be looked at. Someone has to consider the issues when legislation is put down. One has to have answers which satisfy all conditions. The hon. member, in spite of his good intentions, has not considered all those alternatives.

Over the last 15 years there have been six bankruptcy reform bills which have been put forward in this House. The first and the last proposed super priority for wage earners. In the case of the last bill, the system devised to administer super priority for wage claims was so complex that it took 31 subsections to explain it. Both times that super priority was considered by this House or the other, the conclusion was that it did not answer all of the problems for providing promptness and certainty of payment to those workers. It was considered by many to be impossible to administer. If it cannot be administered and does not solve the problems, it really does not provide protection to the workers.

In case my colleague has not been convinced of these arguments, I would like to discuss the impact that the implementation of super priority could have on the lending industry.

Increasing the priority of paying wage claims in bankruptcy, as I have already shown, will have a direct impact on secured creditors.

Most of these, as the hon. member knows, are banks. As a result, they will be facing a higher risk with the money that they are lending to these companies. To compensate for this higher risk, and the hon. member knows better than most in this House, the banks will find it necessary to increase their rates.

Increasing the interest rates on the business loan is not exactly what we are trying to achieve in today's economy. In fact, it is exactly the opposite of what the businesses nowadays need.

Super priority leads to distortion in lending practices. We have already mentioned it can lead to higher interest rates. In many cases, that higher interest rate based on the argument I have put forward could in fact break the camel's back. It could be the straw.

Similarly, recognizing the super priority would risk their investments. Banks might begin, in fact, to move more quickly to foreclose to ensure that they do get their assets returned. This could trigger action by banks that would create more foreclosures than we have now. This also is opposite to what we want to achieve.

Mr. Speaker, I see you signalling that I only have a minute. I have so many arguments to face here, I will have to try to summarize them.

I think if I am going to summarize many pages into the key points, we have to recognize that the worker who the hon. member has gone out to protect is the one who does need to be protected. His best protection is, in fact, the job, and wherever possible, a continuing job. I think the hon. member would agree with that.

A bill that tries to address not only the employee and his or her protection, but tries to ensure that those companies that are approaching bankruptcy get all of the assistance they need, in fact trying to prevent the bankruptcy from occurring, is the best protection that you can get, Mr. Speaker, for those same employees.

The member's intentions are good. He has argued well, but in fact this bill does not solve enough of the problems. We would be wise to wait for the government's bill that will do so.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today and support the initiative of my friend from Nickel Belt.

It is something that this government obviously lacks either the intellect or the courage to do, that is to take the bull by the horns, particularly in these very trying times, and to try to initiate some change in the outdated Bankruptcy Act, and to protect the interest of workers in bankrupt firms.

It is very easy to stand here and to criticize a member because his or her particular piece of legislation does not go far enough. The parliamentary secretary just said: "It is a good proposal, but it will not work because it is very complex." It is a big world out there, and since 1947 or 1949 nobody has been able to figure out how to make this piece of legislation better.

If anything, the parliamentary secretary should have first of all admitted the impotence and incompetence of this government in coming to terms with a very real problem. He could have said: "The legislation no longer has any relevance in a modern economic world, and we cannot do anything about it. We do not have the wherewithal to come in with a comprehensive set of changes to the Bankruptcy Act." He could have asked some of the members on this side of the House and on the New Democratic Party side of the House for some assistance.

What we are seeing is a made in Canada recession. I know the government does not like to hear that, but when we talk about recession of business downturn, it means the companies go out of business.

Companies are going out of business at an unprecedented rate now because of the government's reckless economic policies. The government could not control growth in southern Ontario.

• (1340 )

What did they do? The only weapon that they could find to use to try to cool down that engine was high interest rates. So they jacked up the interest rates to an unconscionable level and caused the level of bankruptcies, usually in the peripheral economies in the Atlantic, in the north, and in the west, to go through the roof.

In the Financial Post of November 22, just last week, we read: "Bankruptcies Leap". My goodness, the headline must be three inches high. "Cases rise 61 per cent as recession takes financial toll". There has been a 61 per cent rise in bankruptcies. At a time when this government has caused a recession that is pushing bankruptcies to an unconscionable level, it absolutely, positively, fundamentally refuses to sit down and look at the changes that are necessary to the act to protect the interests of workers.

The way the act is currently, it gives you 500 bucks. Big deal. My friend opposite, the parliamentary secretary, admitted that maybe $500 in 1949 was three months wages, but $500 today, if that is what you are making a week and you have a family of two, probably would put you below the poverty line. With $500 a week, you are still going to a food bank, for goodness sake, in order to feed your kids, if you live in any major city in this country.

He admits that the $500 limit is unconscionable. It does not address the real needs, but at the same time, he tells us to wait until the government comes in with more comprehensive changes. I am not going to pretend that changes to the Bankruptcy Act are going to be easy. They are going to be very complex.

If Bill C-217 goes through, what is it going to do to the banking institutions? Are they going to still want to lend money to some of the small businesses that are very labour intensive, like a trucking firm? They probably do not get paid for 45 or 60 days. What are they going to do? Are they going to be able to get financing? There are the real considerations.

I have always attacked a problem by looking at what was the most grievous error in the system before deciding what was the best solution, and then effect all of the other necessary changes as a result of that solution. That is what my hon. friend's motion does. It states a desired outcome.

A worker's wage interest in a company that is going bankrupt today because of this government's fiscal policy is protected. That interest is not protected for a measly $500, but it is protected much deeper. Again, he says that we cannot support this because we do not know how to solve all of the rest of the problems.

The government does not know how to solve the rest of the problems with the Bankrupt Act or with the economy. It does not know how to solve the rest of the problems with national unity. Perhaps this government should just throw in the towel, go to the Canadian public and let them elect a new government. You will see some action on these problems that have been going for much too long. They have been aggravated by this government's policies.

When you talk about the flaws in the Bankruptcy Act, this government will tell you that it has a study group to come in with some comprehensive changes to the Bankruptcy Act. Well, we are waiting. We wait, and wait, and wait.

There have been a number of proposals that have been put forward, but they have all died on the Order Paper. There is only a report recommending that legislation like this be put into place at some future point in time. I am not going to question the sincerity of the hon. parliamentary secretary when he says that we should wait and see with regard to these problems.

I am sure that he would like to see those problems addressed in a new comprehensive reform of the bankruptcy bill. One has to wonder about the government's sincerity. After all, one of the most spectacular bankruptcies that we have seen in recent years is a bankruptcy by Route Canada. Do not forget that it was this government which, in its frenzy toward privatization, sold off Route Canada. It sold it to an individual who could not even get a credit card, for God's sake. They gave it away for about a quarter of what it was worth.

All of a sudden, after the new owner had split the real estate assets off, he declared bankruptcy and threw nearly 2,000 employees out of work. Those employers have been trying to get this government to do the right thing and have a parliamentary investigation through the transport committee. They have not received their moneys yet.

There was a deal that this government had put together with the new owners that offered protection, job security, wage protection to those employees after the sale for, I think, a period of 24 months.

As soon as that agreement expired, this government did not have the good faith to step in, admit that it had sold it to the wrong company, admit that it had made a mistake, and make sure that those workers had the wage and pension protection that they should have.

When the hon. parliamentary secretary gets up and says "trust us", how can we when we have already seen what the government has done to the lives of Route Canada employees. Their lives have been thrown into disarray, some after working for that company for 18 years and 20 years. Perhaps the government opposite is saying: "Wait until we come in, because we are going to come in with a wholesale package that is going to protect workers". It has had an opportunity with Route Canada employees to protect their jobs, to protect the interest of those employees in a company that this government and the people of Canada had owned. It was remiss, and it reneged on that responsibility.

I also have to take a crack at my friends opposite. The member for Nickel Belt is a gentleman who participates greatly in debate in this Chamber. I have no question about where his loyalties lie with the workers of Canada. It is also ironic—and I should put it on the record—that, in dealing with the Route Canada employees, just recently the House committee that may look at it made a decision to defer it. There was a motion put forward by the Liberals, and they made that decision.

It is interesting that the New Democratic member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan who was on that committee voted with the government to defer a full investigation as to how Route Canada was sold in the first place and why the interests of the workers were not paramount and looked after by this government. I would only hope that the next time that committee meets an individual such as my friend from Nickel Belt, who does have the interest of the workers at heart, perhaps will represent his party at that table. Then maybe we can see some real progress toward a full investigation of that fiasco.

Reform of the Bankruptcy Act is absolutely essential. Do I have faith that this government is serious about reforming it? No. Do I think that Bill C-217 goes far enough? No, I do not think it does, but it is a start in the right direction because it takes the workers and it puts them in priority so that their sweat and labour get recognized when a company goes bankrupt. That is something that everyone in this House should recognize and should affirm, and the rest of it could come later.

In conclusion, I wish to offer my support of these humble beginnings so that the interest of workers and the equity that they put into a company get recognized when the company unfortunately, like happens many times these days, gets forced into bankruptcy for whatever reason.

Mr. Thompson: Wind it up. We want to speak on this matter.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): My hon. friend over there has asked me to wind it up. I did not know that he had been made Speaker.

I am very pleased to support this initiative. I would hope that hon. member's opposite will see their way clear to do the same thing.

[Translation]

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it is not very encouraging to hear a member of the Liberal Party, which was instrumental in bringing our country to the brink of bankruptcy over a period of 12 years—

Mrs. Maheu: That's not nice!

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): —and increasing the debt to $200 billion in just a few years, and which allowed inflation to rise to 13 or 14 per cent and interest rates to 22 per cent, I repeat, it is not very encouraging to hear him criticize the government for its consistent economic policy.

Mr. Speaker, regarding the bill before the House today, again sponsored by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the goverment cannot support a bill that concentrates solely on protecting employees, at a time when it is about to table in the House a bill to amend the entire Bankruptcy Act.

Improving the protection of employees in the case of bankruptcy or insolvency of their employers is a question that our government is looking at very closely, and it is part of a series of measures that it intends to introduce. In fact, the government is finalizing a bill designed to revamp the 1949 Act. The government can hardly be accused of acting hastily, forty-one years later, to bring about substancial reforms.

Granted, employees are often the first to suffer when an employer is in financial difficulty, and the present Bankruptcy Act offers inadequate protection. The inadequacy of the provisions of the present act is readily acknowledged but all parties. Unfortunately, nothing has been done yet to correct this problem.

On May 5, 1975, Bill C-60 was tabled in the House of Commons. It proposed to pay employees in priority to any other creditors, secured or unsecured, up to a limit of $2,000 per employee.

This type of preferential treatment, known as "super priority", would have granted absolute priority of wage claims over any other secured debts.

In its report on Bill C-60, the Standing Committee of the Senate responsible for bankruptcies indicated, however, that granting "super priority" to wages would lead to a serious disruption of the commercial lending system. There are a number of reasons why the super priority clause is not the best way to protect the rights of employees.

First of all, the clause would provide no absolute guarantee of payment of unpaid wages after a company goes bankrupt. In fact, the remaining assets of a company might not be sufficient to cover the amount of wages claimed. Second, this priority would offer no guarantee of speedy payment. In fact, it might take sometime before wage claims could be paid, since the sale and disposition of the assets of a bankrupt company might turn out to be a lengthy operation. Furthermore, the courts would have to settle disputes or clear up certain problems, which might further delay the process. A super priority clause would not guarantee that employees would immediately get the necessary funds to live on until they find work.

The super priority clause also has a number of serious drawbacks from the administrative point of view, Mr. Speaker. All amounts paid to employees would have to be taken from money owed to secured creditors. The latter, however, also have certain payments that must be met, and they want to be paid. Determining how wage claims would be paid would involve some very complicated arithmetic.

For these and many other reasons, the super priority clause, attractive though it may seem at first glance, is not the best way to protect employees whose employer goes bankrupt. This was acknowledged by the Senate Committee, which, as an alternative, recommended creating, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, a government administered fund that would guarantee payment of unpaid wages as soon as the employer declared bankruptcy.

This formula—an administered fund—seems to have been supported by the government at the time. The then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Hon. Warren Allmand, said: "If it can be justified, after careful analysis, a funded insurance scheme would clearly be the most desirable solution to the problem of indemnifying employees who suffer losses of wages as a result of their employer's bankruptcy"(13). However, no measures were taken at the time. Bill C-12, tabled in 1980, was another attempt to reform the Bankruptcy Act.

In 1981, a committee chaired by Mr. Raymond Landry, the present Dean of the Department of Civil Law of the University of Ottawa and former Superintendant of Bankruptcy, was appointed to find ways to protect employees. In its report submitted in 1981, the Landry Committee recommended setting up a wage protection fund. Despite the recommendations of the committee, Bill C-17, tabled in 1984, basically contained the same provisions with respect to wage earners as did Bill C-12. However, it was subsequently amended to grant priority to wage claims.

Since Bill C-17 died on the Order Paper, we still have the 1949 legislation which, as I said before, badly needs improving if we are to provide adequate protection for employees.

The bill before the House today, like the other bills sponsored by the same member, including C–249, tabled in February 1987, would extend the protection granted to unpaid wages to contributions paid or deemed to have been paid into a pension fund. Although the concept as such is indeed praiseworthy, the financial impact of such a provision might well prove to be extremely severe, and would probably lead to even greater credit restrictions, especially in economic sectors that are highly labour intensive.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the mechanisms we choose to protect employees in case of employer bankruptcy must not affect the ability of Canadian businesses to compete on international markets. In fact, with the present globalization of markets, it is imperative that protection mechanisms do not, as might well happen with the super priority which is the focus of Bill C–217, impede business financing and as a result impair the efficiency and competitive potential of our businesses. If businesses cannot develop as they should—and they are the motor of our economy—the result is fewer jobs, which means that in the end employees are the ones who suffer.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, these were the reasons why Bill C–217 cannot be supported by this government as well as the main points of the bill the government intends to table early next year.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Private Member's C–217.

Going back and looking at from where the bill comes, the member proposing it and the party he represents, I think we have an understanding of what he is attempting to do. We do not disagree with that. The difficulty obviously is that they do not understand the complexity of legislation and the net effect it will have on our business community.

None of us will disagree with what he is telling us and what he is proposing should be done, but it is much more complex than that. The member for Nickel Belt mentioned in his speech an elephant gestation period of nine years. In response to that, they have been around here for about 40 years and have yet to conceive. If they hang around long enough possibly they will deliver, but at this point I do not think we are going to have to worry about it. There is no question they have not taken the time to read thoroughly what they are suggesting. If they did so, they would change some of what they are saying.

One of the problems obviously when a firm goes bankrupt is the little people, the people who carry lunch boxes, the ordinary worker. All of us want to see those people protected. However, in a much broader and much bigger picture, obviously we need factories and places of business for those people to enter to work. We all want them to get paid, but what they are proposing goes beyond that. They are taking a look at super priority for workers; in other words, being at the head of the bus, as the member for Nickel Belt pointed out, in terms of getting their wages.

We do not disagree with that. However, what that is going to do is throw a few other elements into the equation which they have not considered, one of them being the fact that trustees have to be appointed. At some point trustees have to receive payment for their services to ensure that the business is liquidated and that other creditors are paid, including the workers. If there is no trustee there to do the job, no one gets paid. Members of the NDP have not considered that.

The other thing they have thrown at us is the fact that there should be an onus, a responsibility on the backs of the banks to make sure that employees are paid. I guess none of us would disagree with that either, but the difficulty obviously is if that is the way it is done in every business that goes bankrupt, investment in that business will be stifled from day one. Obviously banking institutions and others will take a hard look at where they want to put their dollars if they believe that they are going to be the last to be paid.

The secret to the whole thing is a healthy economy, and that is what we have had for the last six years. We have been number one or number two in the world for the last six years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TRIBUTE TO PASCALE LEFRANÇOIS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to Quebec's new junior spelling champion Pascale Lefrançois. At age 16, her message to other youths her age was simple: «Love your language, learn to speak and write it well, for it is a beautiful language. The more you get to know it, the more you will like it. To me French has always been very important. I talk a lot but I like to use the right words to express all my feelings.»

Mr. Speaker, Pascale modestly says that part of the credit for her victory goes to her family. I for one want to assure her that we are very proud of her accomplishment. Thanks to her all Quebec youths have made a name for themselves on the international francophone scene.

SPORTS

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the efforts being made to obtain National Hockey League franchises for the cities of Ottawa and Hamilton deserve the support of all members of this House.

I would like to commend my colleague from London—Middlesex for forming the national hockey caucus of parliamentarians who support the application for NHL franchises in these two cities.

Hockey is an integral part of Canada's cultural and sport heritage and is a unifying factor in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have close contacts with the world of hockey. Throughout my ten years as a National Hockey League official, a time during which Quebec city, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver joined the NHL, I was able to see personally to what extent a new franchise contributes to a municipality, its residents and their economy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my wholehearted support to those involved in bringing the National Hockey League to both Hamilton and Ottawa.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at a time when Canadians want peace rather than war, want social and environmental security, not arms, this government instead, with the excuse of the gulf crisis, cuts spending allegedly to finance a war effort, but in reality to finance the implementation of the general sales tax. As a result, the government cut $14 million from the budget of Environment Canada and $24 million in environmental grants and contributions.

Canadians, who are on the side of peace, are asking why the environment and other important measures are being sacrificed to protect American dependency on foreign oil and implement the hated general sales tax. What à disgrace, Mr. Speaker.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, recent events in Alberta, where the premier was caught in a clear conflict of interest, shows the need for effective conflict of interest rules for members of Parliament and senators.

At this point in time, we have senators who are tied very closely to the financial institutions of the country. It seems to me these same senators are participating in passing legislation such as the deregulation of financial institutions, selling shares in Petro-Canada, Hibernia handouts, not to mention the hundreds of private contracts that go out in the name of government every day.

The temptation is there for these foxes to get in because there is no fence around the chicken pen. The Prime Minister still has not learned his lesson. When it comes to guarding the chicken coop this government has once again left it in the hands of the foxes.

This government made a commitment not once, but twice, to bring in new legislation to keep conflict of interest out of government. We still do not have any effective rules safeguarding against conflict of interest by members of Parliament and senators. This is not right. We must have conflict of interest regulations now.

The Prime Minister need only take a look at the example set by his friend, the premier of Gettysburg, to know that this problem needs to be addressed—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

EPILEPSY AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): This year, Mr. Speaker, November has been chosen as the month to make people more conscious of epilepsy. Epilepsy Canada and the various associations included in this organization have made concerted efforts throughout the month to help Canadians become more familiar with this neurological illness.

Current statistics put at roughly 400,000 the number of Canadians suffering from some form of epilepsy, a far higher percentage than in the case of any other neurological disorder. Today, appropriate care and treatment enable many people to lead a normal and productive life, yet about half of epileptics continue to be the victims of uncontrollable seizures.

Strange though it may seem, our so-called advanced society still nurtures myths and false conceptions with respect to epilepsy. Some people hesitate to admit they are subject to epileptic convulsions because they fear losing their job, their friends or their status. Discrimination and rejection still cause problems at school, at work and in society generally.

Mr. Speaker, let us hope these people will soon be openly accepted by their fellow citizens.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic caucus again I would like to raise the issue of a northern tax benefit. I would like to point out that it is our caucus, the New Democratic caucus, which has raised this issue more often in the House than the other two parties and/or the independents.

I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance that the Christmas season and the new year are fast approaching. The people of thousands of northern Canadian communities are living with uncertainty because of the impending elimination of the northern tax benefit to their communities effective this January.

The Minister of Finance has had a task force report on northern and isolated areas in his hands for over one year now and has not announced what he will do with regard to this issue. The government has a responsibility to act immediately. It is a shame that some Canadians will face the new year and the holiday season with this uncertainty about their financial situation. It is a disgrace that these Canadians have had to wait as long as they have for action.

Once again, I call upon the government to reject their flawed task force report and implement a fair taxation system for Canada's northern and isolated areas.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this morning saw 2,000 lobster fishermen from Nova Scotia districts 33 and 34 heading out to set their traps for the first day of the lobster season. We wish them safety and a full harvest.

The lobster industry in Nova Scotia brought some $69 million this year, up $3 million from the year before. While prices were low, catches, particularly in western Nova Scotia, were high.

The recent lobster dispute with the United States has created some uncertainty with respect to prices and markets for the immediate future. In response to the express wishes of a significant majority of Nova Scotia lobster fishermen, the government rejected the recently negotiated lobster agreement with the United States. I commend the government for listening to and acting upon the wishes of the people most directly affected.

This morning a 40-knot gale greeted the lobster fishermen as they headed out with their traps. We pray they all return safely. To greater enhance the possibility of this in the future, perhaps the government should consider providing fisheries officers with some flexibility in opening dates to accommodate the exigencies of the North Atlantic's November weather.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the lessons of Thatcherism are lost on the Prime Minister. While support for the PM and his party are at new lows the cutting, slashing and privatization continues unabashed.

The government has used the Persian Gulf crisis as a convenient excuse to slash $350 million from key federal departments. Let us be honest here, Mr. Speaker. We pay for the ships and crew whether they are in Canada or in the Persian Gulf. In fact, it may cost the government far less while the ships and crew are in the gulf.

Employment and Immigration will lose over $25 million which will not only cut language training programs for recent immigrants but will further clog the refugee backlog process.

As well, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety will be receiving $80,000 less than expected. Although my private members' motion calling upon the government to reinstate full funding for the CCOHS was adopted last spring, the Minister of Labour has chosen to ignore Parliament and to fast-track privatization.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says that Canadians have never looked for a free ride. I say the only free ride has been the one taken by the Prime Minister in his rule by decree. Any Heseltines over there?

THE GREY CUP

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canada watched the Winnipeg Blue Bombers march with unflagging energy to defeat the Edmonton Eskimos 50-11 for a stunning Grey Cup victory.

Today's Ottawa Citizen has it right with a one-word headline on its sports page "Winner-peg". Winner-peg is the pretty city of the prairies that knows how to do things right and next year the heat is on for the biggest, the best, the hottest Grey Cup in the history of the Canadian Football League.

Congratulations Winnipeg and congratulations Bombers. As Michael Gray says: "There is nothing like a little smoked ham at Thanksgiving".

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond). Mr. Speaker, the NDP are at it again.

Some hon. members: Oh, no.

Mr. Dingwall: It was reported over the weekend that the leader of the New Democratic Party stated: "We are a federal party". Yet the NDP's only Quebec member of Parliament, the member for Chambly, tabled a brief before the Bélanger-Campeau commission that favoured a form of sovereignty association, not federalism.

• (1410)

Once again the NDP, the no direction party, has an exposed difference of opinion between its leader and its backbench.

Mr. Speaker, I sometimes like to compare the NDP to a ship, rather than an organized political organization, because we all know a ship makes the most noise when it is in the fog. Here we have the NDP, not only in the fog but drifting without a political hand at the helm. Canadians want sound, solid and sensitive answers to the country's problems and we in the Liberal Party of Canada can provide that direction.

LILLOOET LIBRARY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my fellow members will recall that in March of this year, a fire in my constituency totally destroyed the town of Lillooet's only library.

I am pleased to report that the response to our appeals to other communities, publishers, and libraries was overwhelming. Most impressive, however, was the response from my fellow members of Parliament. The original centre's construction, as is the case in so many small towns, was a community effort. I am pleased to acknowledge that my colleagues in the House and their staffs united in a community effort of their own, providing the library with a base of some several thousand books upon which it can now build. Considering the diversity of the donors, Lillooet can now lay claim to a truly unique catalogue.

On behalf of the people of Lillooet, I would like to extend heartfelt thanks to all members of the House, from all parties, for their support.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would again like to draw the attention of all the hon. members to the forestry subcommittee report entitled Forests of Canada, the Federal Role, which was tabled in this House two weeks ago.

The words "sustainable development" were first used in federal legislation in Canada to help create the new Department of Forestry with Bill C-29 which became law in February of 1990.

The forestry subcommittee report proposes a practical process by which the federal government can help lead the implementation of sustainable development in forestry in this country to translate that concept into reality on the ground and in the forest. As the report states, that should become the mission for the new Department of Forestry. The forests of Canada must not be taken for granted. They are pillars of our nation's prosperity and they constitute the very essence of our environment.

If sustainable development is ever going to be practised successfully in Canada, it must begin in our forests.

I urge every member of this House to read the forestry report and to help promote its proposals and purposes.

SHIPPING

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the brunt of the government's cost recovery policy for the Coast Guard will be borne by St. Lawrence shippers who will have to foot the bill. Once again, the federal government is leaving Quebec with a bill that in the medium and long term will financially drain the shipping industry in Quebec. The Coast Guard cost recovery project is unfair to Quebec. If the minister thinks we are going to stand aside while this happens, I can assure him that we intend to watch developments very closely.

THE GREY CUP

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's 78th Canadian Football League Grey Cup Game created new records. The Winnipeg Blue Bombers cruised to a 50-11 victory—their second championship in three years, with a 28-point third-quarter outburst—a record in any Grey Cup game, led by the second longest interception return in Grey Cup history—56 yards.

I salute the Bombers for a great performance. A special salute goes to Warren Hudson—the outstanding Canadian, Tom Burgess—the outstanding offensive player, and to Greg Battle for the twin honours—the game's and the league's top defensive player of 1990.

Indeed, Manitobans have special reasons to celebrate yesterday's event. May we, in Parliament, and all Canadians pay tribute to the Winnipeg Blue Bombers for a unique display of team work and a one of a kind Grey Cup victory.

Let us continue to support the CFL for a distinctively Canadian game and as a source of Canadian pride.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has been sabotaged by her own back-bench on a major piece of legislation, the gun control bill.

Last week, she was forced into the humiliating spectacle of filibustering and blocking her own bill. Her only other significant act in her tenure so far—other than calling my colleague, our House leader, cute—is the recriminalization of abortion, which she professes to oppose.

It is almost a year since the massacre of 14 young women at the École Polytechnique in Montreal and six months since the Minister of Justice promised its students action on gun control, a promise now betrayed. To think that just a month ago, some journalists were talking about the minister as a possible successor to Mr. Mulroney. They should look again at this record of incompetence, defeat and lack of political will, especially on abortion and on gun control.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Last Friday, the government tabled supplementary estimates in which it tried to use the Persian Gulf crisis as a smoke-screen to hide its own economic mismanagement. An example of this mismanagement lies in the numbers for the government's plans to implement the GST.

Last month, the Minister of National Revenue said that the government will be spending $260 million to bring in the GST. But if we look at the supplementary estimates tabled last Friday, we will find the government intends to spend, not $260 million, but more than $380 million just in this fiscal year, until the end of March alone.

Why will the Minister of Finance and the government not admit that they have no idea just how much it is going to cost to bring in this unfair tax? Why will the government not listen to Canadians and scrap this tax, before it wastes millions more of taxpayers' dollars trying to get ready for a tax that Canadians have said over and over again they just do not want?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Leader of the Liberals in the House does not know the difference between apples and oranges. That is precisely the type of arithmetic that he is using to try to establish the cost of implementing and preparing the GST.

There are two levels of additions to be made: one for the collection and administration, and one for the preparation and implementation. The figure that I quoted last month was that I was estimating $260 million for costs this fiscal year for the preparation and administration of the GST.

The supplementary estimates confirm that that figure, in fact, is going to be $257 million. When he adds in social services, such as social benefits which will be accrued to some eight million Canadians who will receive the GST credits, then of course the figures are larger.

Is the member suggesting that social elements of the GST are the same as administration and preparation? Is he against the GST credits? If he is against the GST credits, he should stand up and say so.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

What he just said is another example of this government's tortured logic. It wants to have Parliament approve the spending of another $108 million to help send out rebate cheques to some of the thousands of Canadians who are going to be clobbered by this unfair GST.

Does the Minister of National Revenue not realize that these rebate cheques would not be necessary if the government was not proceeding with the GST? All these rebate cheques do is try to make up for just some of the negative effects of this unfair tax.

I ask the minister to answer this question on behalf of the government once again: Why will the government not come to its senses and drop this unfair tax?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition talks about people being clobbered by this tax.

Let me remind him that when he was in the government, there was no GST credit. There was no refundable sales tax credit. People in low income brackets paid indirectly through the price of the products that they bought. They paid sales tax and they got no credit for it.

The result was that people with low incomes paid three or four percentage points more of their income in sales tax than those in upper income brackets.

• (1420 )

The result of the GST credit is that will be reversed. People in low income brackets will pay two or three percentage points less as a per cent of their income than people in upper income brackets. That is why we say the GST is a fairer tax.

If he wants to talk about people being clobbered by sales tax, they were clobbered by sales tax when he was in the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there would be no tax on haircuts without the GST, there would be no tax on muffins, there would be no tax on popcorn, and there would be no tax on funerals. No wonder the government's funeral is being brought about by this GST.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, according to the Supplementary Estimates, the government intends to waste another $14 million on a propaganda campaign for its own GST. I want to ask the minister why his government wishes to undermine the freedom of thought of Canadians by taxing books, when it has no scruples about promoting its own GST and does so without regard for the cost to Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is no surprise that the Leader of the Opposition is using these questions as a diversion from what is going on in Canada today.

There is a poll of Canadians done by Angus-Reid which said that respondents do not believe Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien's promise to kill the tax if his party forms the next government. Sixty per cent of Canadians do not believe the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada. Sixty per cent of Canadians say if he comes in—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, 70 per cent believe that we are going to have this GST in place, so they believe what we are saying.

We are committed to the GST, but for good reasons. We are committed to the GST because it is going to help our exporters. It is going to put Canadian companies on a level playing-field with imports when imports now pay one-third less tax. It will result in a reduction of the cost of new investment of 4 per cent for all of Canada and, for those provinces that harmonize, 7.5 per cent.

There are good, solid economic reasons why we are bringing in this tax, in addition to the fairness that the GST credit will bring to low-income Canadians. Those are the reasons why we are going to bring in this tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PERSIAN GULF

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, last month the House passed a motion on the gulf crisis condemning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and affirming Canada's support of the UN approved multinational military effort enforcing sanctions against Iraq. At the time, the Secretary of State confirmed to us in correspondence that the government agreed to bring Parliament into debate on any change in our countries involvement in the gulf.

The government benches are quite empty today, but I wonder if a minister in the name of the government will immediately guarantee that parliamentarians will have the opportunity to debate the present gulf situation before Canada votes on a new resolution this week?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this Parliament has had an opportunity to debate the gulf situation and, of course, the opposition can always bring forward a motion for a debate on the gulf situation any time it wishes.

With respect to any other debate on the gulf situation, I will pass on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the member's suggestion. He will announce on behalf of the government whether or not that is a request that can or should be acceded to later in the week.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, Canada holds the position at the UN Security Council of vice-chair of the Gulf Sanctions Committee.

In order that Parliament could have a debate, and in order that parliamentarians and the Canadian public can evaluate the effect of sanctions, will the government immediately provide the House the fullest possible documentation concerning the history and effectiveness of the Iraqi sanctions to date?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quite prepared to make available to the House, or to the Standing Committee on External Affairs, the full information on how effective the sanctions policy appears to be.

With respect to the Gulf situation generally, the House knows that the government is giving its full support to the concept of collective security with respect to the events in the Gulf and the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We intend to continue with that policy and to support those people who believe that together, collectively, we have to protect the security of all countries in the world, certainly countries that believe in the UN and support the United Nations system.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. There are reports today that the United States will seek a UN resolution setting a deadline for war and ask for the support of the United Nations for that deadline.

On October 26, the Secretary of State said that he would entertain a full debate in the House, if there was time, on the Gulf crisis should conditions change. They appear to be changing, at least at the urging of the United States. This weekend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, while he personally might have some disagreement with setting a deadline for war, Canada would probably support that proposition. Surely, if the minister responsible is to go against his conscience, it shows how much we need this kind of parliamentary debate.

Will the government support the New Democratic motion for an emergency debate on this situation?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the House has already debated a resolution in connection with the Gulf crisis. The policy of the government is a policy of supporting the nations of the world in the concept of collective security.

An hon. member: We are talking about war now, John.

Mr. Crosbie: As far as war is concerned, war was an act that was instituted by Iraq as a country when it invaded Kuwait some months ago.

The government is not planning any declaration of war, but it is planning full support to the United Nations and to our allies with respect to a responsible approach to this crisis. It is a crisis that threatens every country in the world which might have a powerful nation living next to it, a nation which in the future might covet its territory.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government clearly has not been able to tell the House what period of time it supports to see whether economic sanctions will be affected. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that his government would support a resolution, even though he may be in disagreement that we should be specifying a time where offensive action would be taken. Surely, circumstances have changed. We have not debated this in the House of Commons. We have debated the economic sanctions.

Again, will the Acting Prime Minister commit his government today to debate the UN resolution that will be coming up later this week, before that resolution comes up and before the government commits Canada to an action that has not had full democratic parliamentary debate?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the offensive action that was taken was the offensive action of Iraq invading and taking possession of Kuwait, by force of arms, without any warning, and without any justification, several months ago. That is the offensive action.

The government is clearly against that and it is going to support the countries of the world who are united in their condemnation of those acts. We will support whatever action is necessary so that Kuwait can be restored to the status quo ante.

With respect to a request for a debate, that is a matter, as I have said, that I will pass on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is presently travelling in the area, doing his best to ensure a Canadian presence there and to support those countries that have been adversely affected by these unprovoked and war-like actions of the country of Iraq.

I will pass on to him these requests. They will be dealt with when he returns.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for external affairs has indeed been travelling around making very inflammatory remarks, which may in fact have put the Canadian hostages at risk, just when it seems that the whole parliamentary committee is making some kind of progress.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the government cut its budget allocations for workers, social services, the environment, fishermen and veterans. The government said it was because of the gulf crisis, but according to a survey, the increase in the price of oil will result in more than $1 billion of revenue for the federal government. Furthermore, it is estimated that oil companies will be able to increase their profits by $5 billion annually. Why should Canadians who are least well-off have to bear the brunt of the gulf crisis?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is not remarkable and, of course, it is to be expected that the Leader of the New Democratic Party will always take a simplistic approach to whatever problems may arise in the world.

With respect to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he has just visited Jordan and Egypt where he has announced that we are providing $26 million in assistance to Jordan and $25 million in assistance to Egypt, along with $13 million in debt write-offs for previously granted development aid to assist those countries because of the position they have been put into by the aggressive actions taken by Iraq.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed the policy of this government clearly and succinctly. The policy of this government is not going to change, no matter what position is taken with respect to the Government of Iraq, with respect to hostages who they should not have taken in the first place. We have no intention of altering our policy of assisting in a collective response to Iraqi aggression. That is a policy we are going to continue firmly and decisively in the future.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the President of the Treasury Board said in this House: "Liberal members are certainly not helping by saying constantly that things are going awfully bad. I wish to warn him against constantly making negative and pessimistic statements which do not reflect the reality." Let me try just a little slice of reality.

Record bankruptcies have devastated our manufacturing sector; there are 216,000 fewer jobs than a year ago; our economy is in recession and, last Friday, the government announced an accounting error of $4.5 billion.

All Canadians are anxiously awaiting the good news. When will the minister end the suspense?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Willowdale spent most of his weekend talking about a $4.8 million error. That is not the case.

I refer him to documents tabled and discussed in this House, the Main Estimates, in which we indicated that we were setting aside reserves of $2.6 billion and that we were expecting a lapse of $1 billion. This is not an accounting error. This is good management.

On program expenditure we were threatened with an over-spending of $350 million. Instead of pushing it on the deficit as the Liberals did for so many years, we made an additional effort to try and finance it from within. We are still on target, as my colleague, the Minister of Finance, said in September, of $106 billion for program expenditure, and not more.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is fantastic economic management that the government underestimated the deficit by $2.5 billion.

On Friday, the President of the Treasury Board defended his government's record in terms of the underestimation of costs, in terms of its high interest rate recession-causing policies, when he defiantly declared: "We will stay the course."

How many more Canadians must lose their homes, their jobs, their farms and their businesses under this government's devastating economic mismanagement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member leads with his chin in this way, we have to bring out some of the facts relating to the last few years of the Liberal administration.

In 1982–83, the projection of the deficit was $10.5 billion. It was revised in June to $19.6 billion. It was revised again in October to $23.6 billion and the final outcome was $27.8 billion, a full $17.3 billion over estimate. That was equivalent to 20 per cent of total spending at that time.

What my colleague and I have been saying on many occasions is that it is important for us to manage far, far better than that, and we are, because the $1.5 billion increase in the deficit this year is equivalent to less than 1 per cent of total spending.

The reason it is important to maintain this good spending record is to ensure that we maintain the confidence of the markets. I see members opposite are laughing. They are willing to compare their record where it was $17.3 billion or 20 per cent over the total spending. That was the amount of the error. I know what they are laughing at. They are laughing at the record of the administration when the Leader of the Opposition was the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. No region has paid more for his government's misguided, high interest rate and high dollar policies than Atlantic Canada. We have paid through lost exports and lost jobs. We have lost our trains. We have lost CFB Summerside. Now, for $150 a plate, the minister tells the last 175 Tories in New Brunswick that we must pay $21 million more in cuts to ACOA to get lower interest rates and a lower deficit.

Why will the Minister of Finance not wake up to the fact that it is his interest rate policy that is causing the deficit and stop punishing Atlantic Canada for his own fiscal incompetence?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the point I was making in response to a question I was asked in New Brunswick last week was the same point that I just made to the hon. member's colleague, that we have to manage our expenditures well here. We have to manage our deficit position well. If we can get our deficit down, we will be able to get interest rates down, and that is the primary objective of the initiatives that were announced on Friday by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

All Canadians, including those in Atlantic Canada, will enjoy the benefits of lower interest rates if we are able to get the deficit down. There is simply a shifting of expenditures on ACOA from one year to others. There is no loss of those moneys. They will be spent in Atlantic Canada. It is just a question of different timing and the result will be part of a broader effort to keep our deficit under control.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, after that answer, I would suggest that those Tories ask for their money back.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the minister responsible for the implementation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act. The minister knows that the Atlantic region is already in a recession, that we have the highest unemployment rates in Canada and that the GST will hit us harder than anyone else in Canada, except perhaps in the North. He knows this is the worst time to cut regional development programs. Why, as the minister responsible for ACOA, did he accept these cutbacks?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the concern of my hon. friend opposite. Surely he must have paid attention to the reply of the Minister of Finance which summed up the situation accurately. ACOA has not lost its capacity to deal with economic and regional development. We have absorbed a cut, as well we should, to help with other contributions in reduction on our O and M, operations and management. Our capacity to respond to the mandate that ACOA has in Atlantic Canada has not been affected.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I have here a copy of Friday's briefing notes to the cabinet ministers in terms of the supplementary estimates, the notes that the Minister of Finance and others had on Friday. In here we have 10 pages of briefing notes and 25 questions and answers suggested for the ministers in areas dealing primarily with the GST, cut-backs, and the military.

I do not have time to refer to many of these. but I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he can be frank and honest with the Canadian people and tell us what the cost of administering and setting up the GST will be in light of the fact that among other questions, question No. 4 says: "What are the ongoing costs of implementing the GST?" The suggested answer is: "Once legislation is approved, we will be reviewing departmental requirements for this year and the availability of funds in existing appropriations. If additional funds are needed, they will be included in further supplementary estimates".

In light of that, Mr. Speaker, are we to expect even further supplementary estimates for the GST? Can the minister now be frank, open and honest with the people of this country and tell us exactly how much it will cost to set up and administer the GST, or do I have to read the rest of his notes into the record?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can read any note into the record that he wants. He will know that in so far as the proposed costs for the GST are concerned, we have been open right from the start about what the costs are going to be.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): So far.

Mr. Jelinek: This member is a member of the Standing Committee on Finance where, on March 13, I gave the estimate officially as to what the costs were going to be for the GST for the preparation and planning. That figure which I gave to the finance committee was $300 million. I am happy to note that the cost for that is below $300 million.

If the hon. member is talking about collection and administration, that has been stated in the finance minister's budget papers of earlier this year, and we are on budget and on target on those. I have been open and honest with everybody, as were all my other colleagues. I can tell the hon. member that we are on track and on budget.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on the same subject, the same briefing notes say in respect of National Defence expenditures that National Defence had been planning to absorb the 1989 and 1990 budget reductions through a series of internal measures, but it goes on to say that now that the gulf situation has come about, we can squeeze in these items under the heading of the Persian Gulf expenditures. In fact, when one looks carefully at the notes that were provided the public on Friday, it becomes very clear.

Of the $121 million in capital expenditures for equipment, only $21 million are for the gulf and over $100 million expenditures are for "the advancement of previously planned military equipment purchases". Will the minister explain to the House what planned expenditures are being advanced, exactly what these funds are going for, why over $200 million is not going to the gulf at all but in fact going to enhance the Department of National Defence?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I guess I should not be surprised at the member's mathematics after hearing him on the weekend say that he was informed the cost in the gulf was $1.3 million a month, which included rental for some accommodation and some dry cleaning for forces stationed there. He should have paid a little more attention to the briefing and the information we provided not only to the members, but to the media.

If he takes a look, he will find that there is $121 million for capital. I said on Friday that a major portion of that was under commercial negotiation by the government to acquire additional capital assets that we need at this time.

The member asked for what purpose. I can inform him that it is for the general military preparedness of Canada because we have a very serious situation. Because the government—and I am sure it is supported by the hon. member and his party—has put men and women in the Persian Gulf region, the government believes that they should be sustained and supported.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The strike at Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie was settled over a week ago, involving some 6,000 employees and having a devastating impact on the community.

Because only 1,000 employees have been called back to work so far and because of the estimates of reinstatement of jobs, it is estimated that most employees will not receive any UIC benefits until the end of December of this year.

What is the minister going to do about this travesty of justice to ensure that cheques are sent out to these employees who have been on strike for over four months.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the rules that are being applied in the Algoma situation, which has been a long and unfortunate one, are the same as the rules that are applied in other situations.

The Algoma management has confirmed with my officials that something like 2,000 workers will be recalled in the next two or three weeks. To expedite claims, our officials in Sault Ste. Marie have set up temporary headquarters in the union hall to assist with claims and are planning to register all workers who will need unemployment insurance as efficiently as possible.

This is the normal procedure within UI in events like this.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Surely the minister cannot hide behind the unfair regulations and the UIC act. Thousands of families in the Algoma district face a Christmas without money unless the minister acts now.

I wonder if the minister would use the discretion she has under the act and the regulations to order that cheques be sent out immediately.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that this is not something the minister can simply wave a magic wand over.

Forty years of jurisprudence have gone into these kinds of decisions. We have asked our officials to work as efficiently as possible within the parameters of what we have to do. We will be getting the money to them as soon as possible.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, over $10 million in cultural cuts were announced Friday allegedly to pay for our military exercise in the Persian Gulf.

On August 13, the CBC extended its international voice in Arabic to the Middle East, bringing messages from a western middle power.

My question for the President of the Treasury Board. At this time of crisis, with the citizens of Iraq and Kuwait isolated to Saddam Hussein's message, does the minister agree that Radio Canada International is vital to Canada's pursuing peace with these people, as well as a key voice to our Armed Forces? Is this not an important role for Canada and Canada's national interest?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, CBC Radio-Canada is an independent society. It is an independent, arm's length body that functions in a completely independent fashion. I imagine it will make—

Some hon. members: Come on, give us an answer.

Mr. Weiner: I will, if you let me try. I imagine that when the expenditure reduction was applied in an equitable fashion, there was a sharing by all of us. The CBC will indeed determine what its priorities are and continue to offer the same high quality service it always has.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board, had he cared to answer this question, knows perfectly well that he controls the funds.

In controlling those funds, the President of the Treasury Board controls the program, so don't try to hide behind arm's length in this circumstance.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government is responsible for cutting the CBC budget right down to the bone by reducing corporate appropriations to the tune of more than $240 million and forcing management to slash legitimate outlays to the extent that the future of some services is in doubt. My supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Does he not think that Radio Canada International has to know today that the necessary funds will be set aside just so it will survive? Yes or no?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that our government has done all it could to maintain the funds required by the CBC to fulfill its mandate. Being one of its supporters I can tell you quite frankly that I have always been satisfied with its excellent service. The CBC management now has to deal with some restrictions, but I am sure it will continue to provide outstanding services.

OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

As my leader stressed, economic forecasts show that the oil industry in Canada will make an extra $5 billion in profits next year from the gulf crisis, as a direct result of that. In fact, Statistics Canada has just reported an increase of $600 million in petroleum products profits in the third quarter alone.

Will the minister see to it that these super profits pay the cost of the blockade in the gulf instead of cutbacks in programs for people across this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my friend already knows, we have made significant changes to the taxation of corporations, with the result that there will be significant tax revenues coming from the additional profits that the oil companies will be making with the increase in the price of oil. He can be assured that those moneys that will accrue to the Consolidated Revenue Fund will be applied in the appropriate way. One of those ways will be to help finance a variety of programs in a variety of ways.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance makes an important point. The estimates which have been undertaken by Informetrica, for instance, suggest that indeed the government will get an extra $1.1 billion in revenue as a consequence of the oil price increases coming out of the gulf crisis.

Why will the government not take this money to pay for the blockade in the gulf? Why is the government trying in a sense to make money out of this gulf crisis for its own revenue?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has asked me this question.

The net effect of the increase in the price of oil over all on the revenues of the Government of Canada is not positive. It is negative.

There is an increase in revenues related to the increased revenues that the oil and gas companies make, but offset by that is the negative impact on the economy of the increased price of oil and the impact this could have on inflation.

The net balance is not positive, as the hon. member suggests. The net balance is negative, and that is why my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, came to the House last Friday with supplementary estimates to finance the increased cost of the efforts in the gulf.

FORESTRY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. On October 24 last I rose in the House to enquire about the Canada-Quebec forestry development subsidiary agreement.

My question is this: Should Quebec fail to respond to the August 24, 1990 federal government offer, will Ottawa look at another option to help the province's hard-pressed forestry producers?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, on August 24 we offered Quebec a model that would serve as a future generation forest resource development agreement.

The province wanted to take some time to assess its own priorities. I indicated subsequently that failing any response from the province we would consider other options that would perhaps assist us in enlarging our traditional role in research and assistance to private wood lots.

However, I can report to my friend in the House that on Friday there was a very useful meeting with Quebec officials, and it seems now that there is a desire to arrive at a new agreement quite soon.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his role as the minister responsible for the core area initiative.

For the first time since the Great Depression, there are thousands of Canadians who can no longer feed and clothe themselves or their families. If we look at the supplementary estimates, we see there is nothing but bad news for all regional development projects.

I would like to ask the minister about a very special project in Winnipeg, the core area initiative, which thousands of Winnipegers depend upon and look forward to its renewal. The project is due to end on March 31, 1991 and yet there has been no announcement from the federal government.

Will he tell the House today what the government intends to do about the core area initiative?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is very good news about regional development in western Canada.

In terms of the estimates, my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds who is responsible for western diversification, has stated that any reductions will be done in the area of management and operating costs. I know his staff is working on that, and I think it is fully in harmony with that.

I remind the hon. member of western diversification in his own city with Boeing, a tremendous expansion in the aeronautical industry. He was a member who decried western diversification giving money to Boeing because it was another one of these ugly multinationals that happened to be in Winnipeg and happened to create over 1,000 jobs for us.

That is what western diversification has done for our region and, if he does not want to praise his city, I will, including the great results yesterday in Vancouver.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister is the first western minister to announce that a cutback is a gain for the west. I am sure that will be well received throughout western Canada.

Second, he refers back to the Boeing example of the federal government giving $9 million to that corporation while in fact another department was paying out $150 million in a legal settlement. Quite obviously the left hand does not know what the right hand is doing when it comes to economic development.

The minister refused to answer the question. I will ask it again. The core area initiative has less than six months to go. You have not said anything. People think you are about to bail out on this city. Would you tell Canadians you are not going to bail out on Winnipeg?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to direct their questions through the Chair?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member now feels that the Boeing deal is a good deal for Winnipeg and for Canada. I find it surprising, if he is talking about the CAI deal.

That deal was there before this government came into power in 1984. It has cost the country a tremendous amount of money, and the only person who has really benefitted is a certain Liberal who happened to be a supporter of that party in Manitoba.

An hon. member: A lawyer.

Mr. Epp: He is a lawyer of course but, more seriously, Mr. Speaker, in terms of the core we will be having a tripartite meeting on Friday of this week. I say to the hon. member that I appreciate his interest in core and that we will do the right thing for Winnipeg.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

The government has cut $38 million from the department responsible for the highest priority of Canadians, the environment. It has cut over $130 million additionally from the programs of other departments which impact on the environment.

Will the minister tell us now what specific environmental programs will suffer from the cuts announced on Friday? What specific programs?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer to my hon. colleague that there will be no program cuts.

The cuts announced by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, will be reflected in increased efficiency in operations and management. It is O and M expenses that will reflect the cuts.

In terms of programs I would like to repeat, for the benefit of my colleague, that the budget of Environment Canada has been increased by 9.4 per cent for 1988–89 and 11.7 per cent for 1989–90, without counting for the current period an increase announced in the supplementary estimates of an additional $78.3 million to Environment Canada.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

We are all aware of how the budget of the Department of the Environment was gutted in the first mandate of this government, and now it is just starting to get back. Canada is likely to have a white Christmas long before it has a Green Plan. The minister has said repeatedly in the House he knows the cost of the Green Plan and that the government has set aside reserves for this.

• (1500)

Will the minister tell us exactly where in these supplementary estimates we will find the money for the Green Plan? What page? What line?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I find it very hard to accept the word that the hon. member used when she said that the Environment Canada budget was gutted by this government. This gutted budget went from $777 million to $973 million. If that is gutting a budget, I do not know what increasing a budget is.

The hon. member has asked where the moneys are for the Green Plan. We have made it quite clear that there have been reserves that have been established for this purpose. The Minister of the Environment will be announcing the Green Plan in due course and that will set out more detail on this matter.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Robert Cliche, the federal negotiator of the joint environmental assessment for the Great Whale project is quoted on the weekend as saying: "It is very, very, very unlikely that Quebec will ratify the agreement". There is an old saying that I am sure the Minister of the Environment is aware of, three strikes and you are out.

Given that two years have been fiddled, piddled and diddled away trying to negotiate a joint agreement on the Great Whale with the province of Quebec, will the minister stop dithering today and call for a full environmental assessment and review process of the Great Whale project, the dams, the flooding and the reservoirs, before the proponents start bellyaching that there is not time for assessing the environmental impacts of the project.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat what I said last week. There will be an environmental assessment of the project, the roads and the airport. It will be a public process.

I stated very clearly, at that time, that we would prefer that process to be a joint process with the other interested parties, namely, the provincial government and native people. That is what we are discussing with the province at the moment and, hopefully, we will have news to report shortly. But there will be a process; it will be carried out; and, the process will be complete.

PRIVILEGE

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the tabling of the supplementary estimates on Friday last. Attached to my copy of the supplementary estimates was a press release. The press release says, and I quote from it: "Parliament will be asked to approve expenditures that include $257 million to prepare and plan for the goods and services tax".

Over the weekend I took the time to read the supplementary estimates, as the government House leader recommended we do, and I found on page 32 a provision under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the establishment of a goods and services tax consumer information office for a total estimate of $19,496,000. I found on page 52 of the supplementary estimates an additional $14,305,000 under the Department of Finance for its advertising campaigning to convince Canadians that this is a good tax. I found on page 84 of the supplementary estimates the sum of $202,987,000 under the Department of National Revenue (Customs and Excise Department) for preparation and planning for the GST. For the taxation portion of the same department, on page 85 of the estimates, there was shown an additional $67,254,000. On page 88 of the supplementary estimates, I found an additional $40 million for the Department of Public Works for preparation and planning for GST accommodation. On page 100—

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member wishes to debate the supplementary estimates, but I am sure that there will be an opportunity to do so.

I am having some difficulty in finding the point of privilege. Perhaps he could get to the point.

Mr. Milliken: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but the last one was an additional $21 million. The $21 million in supply and services was for cheques. Now if all those figures are added up, it comes to $365 million for the goods and services tax. The minister's press release says it is $257 million. I submit there is a very serious discrepancy.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: His press release is misleading the public.

Mr. Speaker: I have to say to the hon. member that that is a matter of debate and is not a question of privilege.

An hon. member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Speaker: It is a matter of debate, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, the press release is not correct.

Mr. Speaker: There is a debate about what is correct or not correct in a press release. That is the question of debate.

POINT OF ORDER

THE BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS—REQUEST FOR A RESEARCH FUND

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, because it has been several months since my colleagues in the Bloc québécois and myself sent a request to the Chair and to the Board of Internal Economy about our rights and access to a research fund.

I am convinced that the fact we are not heated the same as other members, although there is a precedent for doing so, makes it difficult for us to function as efficiently as other members. And now, four months later, Mr. Speaker, I must say I find it hard to accept that not only are we deprived of adequate research but our former parties still receive funding allocated on the basis of our membership. Both the Liberal Party the Progressive Conservative Party continue to receive this funding.

Mr. Speaker, these funds should be put in trust immediately, because I believe access to research is a privilege to which all members should be entitled. I therefore find it very difficult to accept that it takes four months for the Board of Internal Economy to send us a reply, when we realize that in Quebec City, the four members of the Equality Party who represent a much smaller constituency—

Look at today's polls, Mr. Speaker—I won't read them to you, modesty forbids—but we represent a substantial share of the Quebec population. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I hope and trust you will give us an answer as soon as possible. Whatever your decision we are at least entitled to a reply.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I will take into consideration what the hon. member has said. It may well be that an answer has been sent and the hon. member may not have received it. I will look into it and report back to the hon. member.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond on a point of order.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be best to choose another location to discuss this with you, such as your chambers, but I would like to raise this matter with you.

On November 1, 1990 the hon. member for Abitibi under Statements by Members made reference to my colleague from Burin—St. George's in terms of his travel expenses which the Chair allowed to proceed in its entirety.

On November 8, the member for Scarborough—Agincourt made certain references to subject matter which he believed to be important. He was thereafter called to order by the Chair.

More importantly, Mr. Speaker, on November 19, my colleague from Burin—St. George's made some remarks with regard to the different positions being taken by the New Democratic Party in the province of Newfoundland, as well as on the floor of the House of Commons. I believe at that time the Chair stood in its place and again directed certain comments to that particular member. I, as well as other members on this side would like to have the opportunity of perhaps visiting your chambers in order to discuss both the process and indeed, the substance of what appeared at first hand, to be different treatments, if you will, being given to different members of Parliament from different political parties. I am sure this Speaker would at least entertain me in his chamber in order to make those particular points.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to assure the hon. member that the Chair, as much as is humanly possible, would not ever treat one hon. member differently than the others.

A few days ago I said to the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt that it may well have been that something slipped by my careful consideration. That is not satisfactory, but perhaps that is what happened. With respect to the hon. member for Burin–St. George's, I would be very pleased to go over the transcript. I might also ask the hon. member to give me in full what it was he intended to say.

We will try to keep within the bounds of the prescription of Madam Sauvé of some years go, in that Statements by Members are not supposed to make a personal attack on a member. I recognize that that gets a little difficult sometimes, especially when what is being attacked is a political position taken by the member.

Madam Sauvé also commented on the fact that congratulations are really not the purpose of members' statements. I received a note today from one hon. member who is very diligent on these matters, pointing out that it may not have been appropriate to offer congratulations to the Winnipeg team. I felt constrained, despite the fact that there have been comments by past Speakers, I was not sure that to restrain hon. members in congratulating the winner of the Grey Cup would make any friends in the Chamber at all.

However, it is a difficult line sometimes to find. It is doubly difficult because the Chair cannot always be sure of exactly where the statement is going. If it is giving members trouble and difficulties, I would be very pleased to discuss it and to see if we can straighten it out. It is not my purpose to leave even an impression that one member is getting treatment that is not available to another member.

I would ask all hon. members because it is an important matter, to be very careful in giving members' statements. If it is strictly a comment upon a political position, that is one thing. If it passes over that and becomes a personal attack, then we have tried to stay away from that sort of thing.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the same question of privilege, since my name was not mentioned. It was on Thursday, October 1, that I mentioned in a statement in the House of Commons that the hon. member for Burin—St. George's had spent $118,865 on travel expenses.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I made this statement on the basis of information taken from the Public Accounts of Canada, available to all members of this House, and I merely said what appeared in the Public Accounts. I only reported the truth.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the best thing to do would be to leave it as I said. I will see the hon. member and other hon. members if there is difficulty.

We have tried to be very careful in this matter. I think hon. members can understand why.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege and honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition signed by Canadians from coast to coast.

The petitioners implore the government not to impose a GST on journals, magazines, books and other reading material, and to maintain the tradition in Canada that taxes not be placed upon reading materials and the promotion of literacy in a country that needs that kind of promotion.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is from residents of the town of Dominion in my constituency, primarily those individuals who have been associated for quite some time with the Dominion volunteer fire department.

As duly noted in their petition, fire departments provide a vital service protecting the lives and property of all citizens. Because the federal Department of Communications has now imposed huge increases in licence fees for radio telecommunications including all emergency service radio equipment, the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to exempt fire departments such as those in communities such as the town of Dominion. I would call upon the government to act forthwith.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on another subject matter, I have a number of petitions to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by individuals from across the country, from places such as like Markham and Don Mills, both in Ontario.

The petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax and in particular the tax which has been levied upon books, newspapers, magazines and various other materials. They would hope that the members of the government would see their way and acknowledge the outright opposition that Canadians have from coast to coast with regard to this particular measure and in particular the effect that it has on magazines, books and newspapers and that the GST be withdrawn immediately.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this petition has been certified correct as to form, pursuant to Standing Order 36. Your petitioners do not support the government's intention to apply the goods and services tax to books, magazines and periodicals.

[English]

These people find that the dissemination of the printed word as a corner-stone of democracy, culture, and education and of a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST. The petitioners call upon the government and this minister to understand the impact. A 1 per cent increase in books is a 2 per cent loss in sales. As this is the year of literacy internationally sponsored by the United Nations, this is a very serious matter and I hope the government through the Prime Minister's good offices—because he agrees with us—that this tax will be withdrawn.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by just over 250 residents of Edmonton, Alberta, and St. Albert, Alberta. They are petitioning the government and the House of Commons to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers now as it has done in all of the years since Confederation.

The petitioners are concerned that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a corner-stone of democracy, of culture, education, and literature, and a productive society will be negatively affected by the application of the GST to the printed word. The petitioners call on the government to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation as it affects the printed word.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on behalf of a large number of petitioners from Ottawa, Toronto and other Ontario communities, who do not want to see the GST applied to books, magazines and other reading articles.

At a time when we are talking about promoting literacy, it is just not the time at all, at any time, to be putting a tax on reading. This has never been done in Canada since Confederation. Surely, with the interest that Canadians have in education and the need for the wide dissemination of knowledge today, there should be no tax inhibiting the progress of knowledge and reading material in any way whatsoever.

• (1520)

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, once again to present a petition to the House signed by members of the communities Shubenacadie and Stewiacke, most of whom are volunteers with the volunteer fire departments of those communities.

The petitioners are asking the government to withdraw its increases in radio licence fees, telecommunications licensing fees. They believe that these fees which have not applied to them since 1986, but now do, will place a severe financial burden on these volunteer fire departments. Also, because of the additional cost, volunteer fire departments may be prevented from upgrading their services and equipment.

The petitioners are asking the government to see the error of its ways and to forthwith reduce and eliminate these unfair licence fees that volunteer fire departments now find themselves faced with.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with a petition which has been affirmed as correct.

The petitioners humbly pray that the government will withdraw the GST from the printed word. There are over 250 signatures from various cities in Alberta. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word. The petitioners find it deplorable that a government would be bringing in a tax system at this time when we are trying to allow people to have a better opportunity to upgrade their reading skills and so on. They are calling for the government to abandon its taxation of the printed word.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House five petitions wherein the petitioners call upon the government to abandon the proposed GST on books and periodicals. This tax, if passed, would be an impediment both to improved literacy and our freedom of expression, both of which are principal underpinnings of our democracy here in Canada.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of citizens of Edmonton who point out that they dislike the GST under any circumstances, but they particularly dislike the idea of it being put on magazines, books and newspapers. The petitioners call upon the government to retain a zero rate of GST on those articles.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition along the same lines signed by numerous residents of the city of Toronto who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They are opposed to the greedy way in which the government has proceeded to levy this tax.

The petitioners support the senators in their efforts to excise from the goods and services tax bill the provisions relating to the tax on books and the printed word which is unprecedented in this country and, indeed, in almost any reasonable democracy.

I call upon the government, as do these petitioners, to withdraw the goods and services tax in its entirety and, if it is unwilling to do that, at least to amend it to excise these very odious and offensive provisions.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 295 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 295 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 355, 362, 374 and 376. Due to the number of responses, I would ask that they may be printed in Hansard as read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EVENTS AT KANESATAKE AND KAHNAWAKE, QUE.

*Question No. 374—Mr. Riis:

Does the government intend to inform Canadians fully of all the details of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, Que. and, if so, will it be gathering that information through an impartial judicial inquiry?

Hon. Thomas Edward Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): On October 22, 1990 the House of Commons unanimously agreed "that the subject matter of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake during the summer of 1990 be referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs".

EVENTS AT KANESATAKE AND KAHNAWAKE, QUE.

*Question No. 376—Mr. Riis:

Has the government determined the cause or causes of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, Que., and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Thomas Edward Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The immediate cause was the non-settlement of the land question at Kanesatake. The federal government had been in negotiations with the Kanesatake Band Council concerning its land grievances and an agreement was reached in the Fall of 1989 which was to be discussed and ratified by the community in early 1990. In January 1990 the Band Council was changed and in March 1990 the Band Council informed the federal negotiator that the Council would not pursue the negotiated agreement and would not continue talks until further notice.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development met with the Council in June 1990 to attempt to put in place a process aimed at resolving the long standing issues in the community. In late June the Municipality of Oka obtained an injunction against individuals blockading municipal land and a violent confrontation occurred when this injunction was served by the Sûreté du Québec.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as I understand, a letter was delivered to the Speaker notifying the Speaker that I intended to ask today for an emergency debate as provided under Standing Order 52.

The emergency to which I refer is the fact that the reports are that on Thursday of this week the United Nations Security Council will consider a resolution authorizing the use of force in the Persian Gulf. Canada, of course, is a member of the Security Council. We will have no opportunity between now and then in the House to debate the position that Canada should be taking at the United Nations.

The issue is one of momentous international significance and of tremendous significance to Canada and to the people of this country. The government has earlier indicated that it would ask Parliament for its advice on key issues in the gulf crisis as it moved along. There is no more significant issue than the issue of war and peace in the gulf.

I would therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, to find that this is in fact a genuine emergency, one of those for which Standing Order 52 was developed and an appropriate motion under that standing order.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair fully agrees that the question raised by the hon. member for Victoria is extremely important. However, it was raised today during Oral Question Period, and for the time being, as far as today is concerned, the Chair does not feel this question is so urgent it should be debated immediately.

I therefore repeat: Although the question is important, it is not as urgent today as the hon. member for Victoria would have us believe.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: On November 1, Bill C–91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof was introduced in the House. The amendments this bill proposed for consideration by the House are largely technical in nature. I do not anticipate that the hon. member will find much with which to take issue in this bill.

In leading off debate, I would like first to describe the government's purpose in proposing these amendments to the House, and then describe the most significant of them in further detail so that hon. members can appreciate their significance and understand why they make sense and why they should be passed as quickly as possible.

This bill amends some 70 sections of the Financial Administration Act. The bill has been drawn together after considerable thought and a lengthy consultation process into a package of amendments designed to do a number of things.

First, they would improve the management of the federal government's cash inflows and outflows. They would streamline internal administrative processes that have tied the hands of our management in the past. They would clarify roles, responsibilities and authorities so that accountability is increased and uncertainty is decreased.

They would increase the efficiency with which government programs and services are administered. They would permit Public Service employees and managers to offer better service to the public by cutting red tape and giving more flexibility to fund delivery of services.

Ultimately, Mr. Speaker, the government's aim in coming forward with these amendments is to prepare the federal government's financial administration practice for the increasingly complex and competitive 1990s and beyond.

An hon. member: And the GST.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the government must remain competitive with advances being made in the private sector. It must be prepared to cut its costs of operation further and to work more efficiency. It must measure up to the increasingly demanding expectations of Parliament, the Public Accounts committee, the Auditor General, and all taxpayers.

Bill C–91 contains some amendments designed specifically to help our program managers achieve some of the spending cuts and management improvement that were contained in the December 15, 1989 announcement and to open up new opportunities to save money in the future when it is appropriate to do so along the same lines.

By permitting the introduction of new efficiencies, these amendments would make a significant contribution to deficit reduction which will benefit all constituents. At the same time, they would improve the consistency and fairness with which the government's user fees are applied, which I am confident is important to all members.

Bill C–91 also supports the goals and general direction of the government's ongoing Public Service 2000 initiative.

Mr. Speaker, Members of this House are aware that Public Service 2000 aims to cut back on red tape and internal constraints that have long impaired the efforts by Public Service managers to improve program efficiency. "Constraints to productive management", as the Auditor General has referred to them in the past, have prevented many government departments from becoming what he referred to more recently as "well–performing organizations".

They have also resulted in low morale among government managers and employees who seek only to serve the public in the best way they know how.

[English]

Since Canadians are both shareholders and customers of the Public Service, I thoroughly endorse and recommend for rapid passage these worthy amendments that I would now like to describe in some detail.

The Treasury Board has had an informal role in the planning and administration of real property management in the Public Service for some time. Amendments proposed would formalize that role.

Several amendments are designed to improve cash management and to modernize the government's payment practices. They are driven by an overriding desire to be fairer to all taxpayers, the majority of whom pay their bills to the government on time.

Among these are provisions to make collection agency fees statutory expenditures, thereby eliminating the current budgetary disincentive faced by managers when using them.

In the case of the minority of Canadians who do not pay their bills to the government within a reasonable time, thereby placing a financial burden on all taxpayers, there are provisions to make regulations to charge interest on overdue accounts and to impose an administrative fee when payment is made by NSF cheques.

There is, throughout, provision to exempt taxpayers from these measures for humanitarian reasons when it is appropriate to do so, including an expanded authority to forgive any debts, not just fees and taxes, where enforcement and collection is considered to be unreasonable or unjust under the circumstances. The issue also arose during debate in this House on Veterans Affairs' overpayments on September 23, 1988.

The forgiveness provisions are important because they would make it possible for the government to recover at least some of the hundreds of millions of dollars that are owed, but which are deemed to be effectively uncollectable, by making it possible in exchange for payment of the principal. This would also extend to all Canadians the same straightforward process that we apply to crown corporations. This proposed change was recommended by the Senate finance committee in its fourteenth report in March 1986.

There are also provisions to permit the making of payments electronically, which is the wave of the future, and in general to permit more businesslike practices in the interests of all Canadians.

Other amendments are aimed at clarifying and modestly extending Financial Administration Act provisions regarding cost recovery and user charges. Among other things, the amendments will facilitate a more consistent and equitable approach to charging across the government.

These amendments would enhance revenue-generation and cost-recovery opportunities from the users of government programs and services, which are important to the government's efforts to improve efficiency and attack the deficit.

Furthermore, the government feels that charging clients a fee for specific services and the use of facilities when there is a clearly identified beneficiary is fairer to all taxpayers. It is also an important means of improving the management and allocation of scarce resources.

[English]

Other provisions of this bill would help certain commercial type government operations to respond in a more businesslike way by adjusting the level of service to meet client demand on a full or at least partially self-financing basis. This would both relieve pressures on the government's operating reserve and support the Public Service 2000 initiative with its clear emphasis on improving service to the public.

I would like to stress that neither the user charging nor the spending of revenue provisions containing these amendments would result in departments suddenly supplementing their appropriations with user fees. Only Parliament may authorize departments to spend revenues they collect. Fees would be prescribed by order and therefore would have to be published in The Canada Gazette. In addition, consistent with the government's regulatory process, which provides an opportunity for public input, users would be notified in advance and, where warranted, would be consulted prior to the establishment of fees.

Authority to spend revenues would have to be included in appropriation acts that Parliament would be asked to review and approve. These arrangements facilitate spending of revenues and create revolving funds which would be used only when it is considered that significant managerial improvement would result.

The government agrees with the Auditor General that spending of user fees should be restricted to specific existing activities. They would be tied directly to expenditures incurred and limited to actual out-of-pocket expenses. Cross-subsidy or diversion to other activities would be strictly prohibited.

These amendments would also support the financial arrangements necessary for more innovative and cost-effective forms of organization to deliver services to the public. An example of these is the new special operating agency concept that was announced on December 15, 1989.

With the passage of this bill, the Department of Finance would be assisted in its day-to-day management of the government's debt while some technical amendments would improve or clarify some 39 other sections of the Financial Administration Act, of which 25 deal with the accountability and control of Crown corporations.

Proposed amendments concerning Crown corporations are largely technical in nature, or build on established policies already in place and on lessons learned since the control and accountability regime for Crown corporations was extensively revised in 1984.

Members will be aware that an important element of the Comptroller General of Canada's cash management strategy, a successful strategy, that has saved taxpayers $1 billion since it began five years ago, is the recovery of millions of dollars of cash surplus to the needs of some Crown corporations.

The government proposes to amend the Financial Administration Act to require that corporate plans of profitable Crown corporations that operate in a commercial environment would provide a dividend payment strategy. With these changes to the act, commercially-successful Crown corporations would expect to provide a return on the investment made by taxpayers.

Although a minister responsible for Crown corporation and the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, can now direct a Crown corporation to return surplus funds to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, there is no provision explicity for dividends that would make planning for dividends an integral part of the corporate planning process.

However, the government feels that these corporations have a responsibility to pay dividends to the shareholders—that is, to ALL Canadians—whenever they are capable of doing so. After all, in the private sector, it is considered normal that a shareholder earn a return on investment, and the government does not feel ordinary taxpayers should be shortchanged in this respect.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments would enshrine the clear-cut expectation that commercial, profitable Crown corporations would be expected to pay dividends, just like their competitors.

Annual dividend proposals would be included as part of the corporate plans for Schedule III, Part II, corporations such as Petro-Canada, CN and Canada Post, although the Governor in Council would be able to waive or vary dividends, when considered appropriate.

[English]

To summarize the aims of this bill, it is felt that the passage of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act, responds to the view of the majority of Canadians that the government should continue to adopt more businesslike practices and that the clients who use specific government services and facilities should pay their fair share of the costs of providing those services and facilities.

Consumers have told us that in the 1990s and beyond they will expect more quality and a higher level of service from the providers of goods and services, be they companies in the business community or governments. The Public Service 2000 initiative supports this expressed desire from the public, and Bill C-91 supports it as well.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister tells us that this bill meets the wishes of Canadians for more business-like practices, for the government to remain current with practices in the private sector and to operate in a more business-like manner.

On the other hand, it is presented as primarily a technical and housekeeping bill. I cannot express the concern with which I have just heard some of the minister's statements.

Less than a month ago, the minister and officials of the government made a commitment that there would be no legislative implementation of the directions of Public Service 2000 until there had been full consultation with employees and with their unions, and further consultation with the public.

The comments I have heard today have made it clear that the government is consulting with a very limited segment of Canadian society. The names one sees on the consultations throughout the process of PS 2000 make it evident that primarily large corporations are directing the tendency of this government and the ways it intends to practise. The commitments it made to its employees just a short month ago do not count at all. I must express to the minister my very bitter disappointment that he has chosen to take that approach today in speaking to this bill.

One thing that concerns me deeply is that there is a tremendous need for revitalization in the Public Service. There is a tremendous need for reform, for renewal of morale, commitment and excellence in the Public Service, one which the employees are willing and eager to co-operate with. In proceeding with the implementation of a plan that they have not been part of developing and in that they have not been part of identifying solutions and problems, the government is undermining any hope for realistic and lasting reform and revitalization in the Public Service.

The government may have heard the views of a certain segment of Canadian society that we should be operating more like the private sector. In my view that has not been appropriately or sufficiently balanced by the recognition that this is not the private sector. Our bottom line is not profit, but people.

I want to talk to some particular aspects of the bill. The minister mentioned that people would be consulted on various things that are being done with this bill. Yet today his very commitments to consultation with his own employees have not been kept.

We are seeing some major fundamental changes here in a number of ways. We are certainly seeing progress along the path of privatization and depublicizing the public sector that perhaps a limited circle of those with whom the minister and the government can consult are entirely in favour of but with which I think the majority of Canadians are not.

I want to address some of the changes made to Crown corporations. Nobody disagrees that there should be more accountability and that the ways in which that can be achieved should be achieved.

However, I also want to point out the tendency in this bill to look at profits rather than public policy as the major objective of Crown corporations. We have seen the devastating results in a number of areas from the government's basic approach of not believing in a public role for Crown corporations, of believing that when they become profitable they immediately no longer become a public sector operation. This bill paves the way for even more of that approach.

I want to remind the House of some of the areas in which the government seems to have forgotten the public policy role of Crown corporations.

I would mention VIA Rail. If this is an example of the government's concept of how a Crown corporation should operate in a more customer oriented way and in a more responsible way to deliver good service, I can assure members of the government sitting opposite that that is not what is happening.

It is now impossible, if one wants to travel by rail, to do it conveniently, to arrange to have a ticket conveniently, or to change one's travel plans conveniently. I can walk into any airport in this country and at the last minute decide that I am not taking one flight, that I am taking another, and switch my ticket. I cannot do that on VIA Rail. In fact I cannot even walk into VIA Rail, pick up my ticket on the basis of my Visa card, and get on a train. Students who come home for the weekend to visit their families, mostly because they want a nice hot meal on Sunday evening, cannot leave Ottawa and go back to Toronto, Montreal, or Kingston after six o'clock.

I would mention Air Canada and the approach of the government on privatization. I well remember a program just before Air Canada was privatized or put on the road to privatization. I would like to replay it in this Chamber today. I remember Mr. Claude Taylor saying how wonderfully he could manage Air Canada if only he were not hampered by the rules and regulations imposed on his by government. My private thoughts were: if he can manage so well, why would he not manage in the public interest as well as in the private interest?

Now we see Air Canada, just a little over a year later, losing business. We see competitiveness in our air industry damaged beyond belief. We see reduced service, and we see increased costs.

We see the post office under this government's view of how Crown corporations should act, delivering a lesser and lesser level of service to fewer and fewer Canadians and abandoning all pretence at what this country is about, which is equality of service and equality of standards to Canadians across Canada.

I hesitate to accept that the changes being made in this bill as to how Crown corporations are going to report and how they are going to be held accountable will improve the functioning of Crown corporations. They will do nothing more than prepare them a little better for privatization and sell-off.

What has the public got out of the sell-off of Crown corporations? The selling of a Crown corporation and not using the proceeds to reduce the national debt is a little like selling your house to pay your heating bill. If you are selling off an asset, you should use it to reduce your capital obligations, and this government has not done that.

It has sold off billions of dollars of Crown corporations over the last six years. Has any of that money been used directly to write down the debt and to reduce the growing burden of interest payments on the taxpayers of Canada? I do not think so. If we look at the debt now compared to what it was when the government came to office in 1984, we see that it is more than double.

I would think that in making changes to help Crown corporations operate and in trying to make them more accountable this government should also be reaffirming its commitment to the idea of the public sector—public policy role of Crown corporations and their obligation to serve a public policy purpose as opposed simply to making profits.

If for instance we were amending the accountability processes for Crown corporations, this would have been an opportune time to include environmental auditing and the other various audits and mechanisms with which the bill deals, but it does not do that. It further reduces the obligation of the President of the Treasury Board to report to this House on how Crown corporations are exercising their accountability. It reduces that obligation from four times a year to once a year.

I think that is enough on Crown corporations. I would like to move on to some of the other financial management measures in this bill. One of the difficulties is that the public does not have a very good record of financial management by this government on which to judge this bill.

We are slightly suspicious of intentions to expand the use of collection agencies, especially as we see the government forcing more and more of the burden of taxation on to lower income Canadians. That will only be exacerbated when the GST is imposed. We see increasing discretion by ministers in this bill for forgiveness of debts to the government. Yet we see the ability to use collection agencies to go out and grab from Canadians the few dollars that they may not be able to pay.

I see very little in this bill that controls the use of collection agencies by this government. I would like to touch on one area where we have reason to be concerned about the failure of the government to explain adequately to Canadians how it is spending their money and how it is being accountable and responsible for their money.

I was shocked to be sitting at a meeting of Standing Committee on Public Accounts less than six months ago when a member of the committee asked if Treasury Board officials could tell us whether we are really saving money by downsizing the Public Service, for instance. They were asked if they could tell us how the cost of contracting out services, hiring contract people, hiring temporary agencies to perform work previously done by Public Service employees was saving us money, or how it compared to the cost of doing it with permanent, long-term committed Public Service employees. The shocking answer was that Treasury Board could not tell the public accounts committee that because it did not keep track of it. It is no wonder that Canadians have lost confidence in the financial management practices of the government.

I would like to refer to some of the cuts that were announced by the government last Friday which give us deep cause for concern. It was almost the atmosphere in which this was done. We saw the travesty of the Prime Minister, for over a week before this announcement was made on Friday, attempting to create the impression that the government would be bringing in cuts to government programs and cuts to government spending in order to finance the efforts of our men and women in the gulf.

Instead we find out on Friday that the bulk of the overspending by government is not due to the efforts of those people who are serving us in the gulf. It is due to the high interest rate policy of this government. We have $2.5 billion of overspending to cover the increase in public debt charges due to the high interest rate policy of this government. It is the same high interest rate policy through which Canadians are losing their homes and their jobs. It has also increased the number of bankruptcies. People are losing their ability to keep their heads above water in difficult economic times. It is not our forces in the gulf that are causing this cut to government programs. It is $2.5 billion of overspending by this government, based on its own interest rate policy.

Then we have over $300 million additional spending on the goods and services tax, a tax that nobody wants. Where is most of this money going? It prepares to grab and gouge that tax from Canadians. Then the insult of insults: it prepares propaganda to convince them they like it. Even worse is to send out cheques, bribing them into thinking that next year they really want to pay more tax. For the Prime Minister to talk for over a week about the needs of our forces in the gulf and then to table this kind of financial information, where less than 10 per cent of the overspending is due to the forces in the gulf is an insult to Canadians and an abuse of those men and women who are serving us away from home.

I want to talk about a few other cuts that were announced on Friday. They are great examples of the financial mismanagement of this government. We are not going to refurbish or rebuild our Archives. We are going to go through another winter with freezing pipes and irreplaceable antique records and documents lost as they were last year.

A recently released spills report says that the government is incapable of responding to an even minor oil spill, much less a one. The coast guard is 25 per cent underfunded for what it needs to do in the area of protecting our oceans and our waterways.

The report of the Auditor General says there is no monitoring of ocean dumping whatsoever under Environment Canada. Again the Auditor General's report tells us that the enforcement of CEPA is tremendously lacking, that there were in total three convictions for violations of Canada's Environmental Protection Act out of well over 3,000 investigations.

The report that was tabled on Friday tells us cuts that the government has made in the past to the transport department now have to be reinstated because the aviation safety of Canadians can no longer be assured. The government was told that when it cut personnel from aviation safety, but it persisted with that cut anyway. Now here it is, having received a devastatingly, critical report on aviation safety in Canada which pointed out that we have twice the accident rate as exists in the United States. Now the government is reinstating jobs and operating money that it should never have cut in the first place.

Health and welfare, especially the health protection branch, is being cut when the costs of health care are increasing dramatically.

Employment and immigration is being cut while the Auditor General is criticizing the government for its mishandling of immigration and refugees, security clearances and its virtual lack of verifying the performance of entrepreneur immigrants.

We have cuts to unemployment and immigration when right now the Canada Employment Centres can do no more than hand out cheques. They cannot help people at a time of high unemployment to find jobs because they cannot help employers to find people who can fill their jobs.

We have the whole area of the environment in many departments which is suffering from cuts announced on Friday, despite the words of this government. We still have no clear explanation of why these cuts are being made. We have no clear explanation of why our armed forces at full strength, being paid for and equipped in Canada, suddenly are costing us hundreds of millions of dollars more because they happen to be in a different location.

The report of the Auditor General says there has been a steady drift to larger and larger numbers of officers and NCOs with fewer and fewer lineal units to lead. The senior ranks now appear disproportionately larger in comparison with the over-all size of the forces and the number of line units. The Auditor General criticized the medical support system for the Canadian Armed Forces. It is not much wonder if Canadians and the Liberal Party view with suspicion any financial management bill that the government brings forward in light of its performance to date on these issues.

I want to mention a few specifics of this bill. The government is increasing the application of user fees to virtually anything that government or any agency connected with government touches. Yet it protects itself from fees. I noticed in the bill that where the government is charging more and more fees, the adjustment to those fees is automatic.

Now I do not imagine the bill is talking about downward adjustment of fees. The adjustment of fees is automatic, but we have discussed time after time in this House bills and challenged the government to put an automatic adjustment of benefits to Canadians into legislation or regulation without any success.

The clawback of old age security will affect more and more Canadians at lower and lower incomes because the government has failed to provide any automatic indexing to protect seniors in Canada against the growing clawback. As their incomes go up, as inflation goes up, those at lower and lower incomes unfortunately will be paying the clawback. Families with smaller and smaller real incomes will be paying the clawback.

But when the government brings in legislation that allows it to impose fees, it sure knows how to protect itself against inflation, but not Canadians.

In this bill the government charges interest on money owing to the government, even where the payment of that money has been an overpayment or a straight error by government. It wants to be able to go back, regardless of how long ago it was, and gouge that money back from the taxpayer and charge interest on top of that.

It wants to have penalties when bills are not paid within 30 days. But ask anybody who does business with the government how often they get paid within 30 days of submitting their bill.

This is the same government that has chosen to ignore whether or not laws are passed in imposing costs on Canadians. It is out there selling a tax that has not even been passed through this House. It is out there across the land collecting higher unemployment insurance fees from Canadians, back to last January, when it had no legislative authority to do so, and yet refusing to back-date the benefits for which those higher fees are supposed to pay.

It refuses to give mothers, parents, adoptive parents the benefits that the new bill entitles them to have, it refuses to give the training benefits that the new bill entitled workers in Canada to have, despite the fact that it has been charging those higher fees since January and it is now November.

The government has pocketed millions and millions of dollars out of the pockets of Canadian workers, money that was supposed to go to pay for unemployment insurance when they are out of work. There are hundreds of thousands more of them out of work now. The government has pocketed that money. It has not improved their benefits. It has not improved payment. It has not improved training programs. It has had 11 months of collecting increased fees without providing one bit of increased benefits to workers. It has left families wondering whether they will qualify for parental benefits based on whether or not they have a child on November 15 or November 16.

If the government can go back and retroactively collect fees totally illegally, everybody out there fails to understand why they cannot go back and also pay benefits to which Canadians are now entitled.

The government can pretend if it wants that this is a simple, technical housekeeping bill. It is far more than that. It is an instrument of the same right wing agenda that we have seen now for six years. That agenda has left us in a recession, with rising unemployment. It has left Canadians without the ability to hang on to their own homes in times of high interest rates.

Perhaps the member opposite would like me to sit down so he can get up and speak for a little while. He is making an awful lot of noise over there, but not an awful lot of sense.

We have growing bankruptcies. For the first time, we have a government that has deliberately driven this country into a recession, that has deliberately deprived people of a livelihood, that has deliberately made it difficult or impossible for people to feed, clothe and house the family.

Finally, I want to repeat again what I said at the beginning of these comments. I do not see how this government expects those people to pay taxes and support the Government of Canada, expecting that they are paying for services that Canadians want, any level of trust whatsoever from the Canadian public when it deals with user fees, taxes, interest rates and Crown corporations, because this government is systematically dismantling the institutions of nationhood in this country.

The next election cannot come soon enough, and the defeat of this government cannot come soon enough.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, may I say first that I appreciate the action of the minister in speaking to me briefly before he presented this legislation, telling me of his plans to introduce it and saying some of what he said today, that is, the bill is almost entirely housekeeping.

I am indebted to the research branch of the Library for having produced a study in quick order which endorses what the minister had to say, that is it is largely housekeeping without, of course, going into some detail.

I have taken the opportunity in the time that we have had to check with one of the labour organizations that represents a large number of government employees, and with the exception of a question relating to one of the sections, to this point, it has found nothing that would worry it as employees of the Crown.

Because of those facts and because of what I have heard about this minister to date from anyone who has had any dealings with him, I accept what he said at face value; that the bill is mainly housekeeping. This was confirmed by Library research, the opinion of the union members and, of course first and perhaps most important, the statement of the minister himself in a discussion that we had one afternoon and another evening.

I have some questions. This is sort of legislation that one cannot deal with really at second reading, because it just deals with, as the minister said, 70 different sections of the Financial Administration Act.

While I want to talk generally about it, I also want to raise some questions about some of the sections.

The minister mentioned not only that it deals with 70 sections but also that there was lengthy consultation. He did not say with whom he held the consultation. I would expect, from reading the legislation and the report that I have, that the consultation was entirely within the department and within Treasury Board staff itself.

I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong with that, but there will be an opportunity, I am sure, to ask at some later date when the bill is in committee just who was involved in the consultation and what kind of discussion there was.

During the course of his remarks, he suggested that when it comes to changing fees, for example, there would be further consultation with the people being affected. I am not sure just how meaningful that consultation will be. I expect when the minister or whoever makes a decision to change a fee—and on this I would agree with the member who preceded me—that if there is to be an adjustment of the fee, in all likelihood, it will be an upward adjustment. Any meaningful consultation will not really be engaged in, but it will simply be a matter of telling people why the government feels that the fee in this particular instance must be adjusted upward.

With regard to increasing the efficiency of service delivery, I do not believe the minister said that he was referring to the various recommendations that he has had from the Auditor General over the years. For some five years, the Auditor General has made recommendations and the Public Accounts Committee has made recommendations. I would suspect, from the reading I have done and from what I have heard, these recommendations have been more to urge increasing the efficiency of the delivery of service, than to try to adjust upward government revenues. Although, in the course of his remarks, the minister said that certainly one of the purposes of the legislation was to make a significant contribution to government revenue, he did not quantify that. I am wondering just exactly what that means, a significant contribution to government revenue.

I am aware of the province of British Columbia making some adjustments to fees over a period of about three years. When we added them all up at the end of the three years, we found out that these adjustments to fees were bringing in an extra $500 million a year. Significant is, indeed, the word to use in an economy or a government in a province the size of British Columbia, compared to the Government of Canada. If we are looking at $500 million in the upward adjustment of fees over three years, what kind of a total we are looking at for the Government of Canada? It could be extremely significant. In that case, of course, I am sure there was discussion with the people being affected, as well, but it did not have any downward effect on the increases that were being made.

I just do not know about the changes in land management. I suppose, from the reading of the proposed legislation and the library report, it is simply doing as the minister said and as the report says, providing in legislation for what is currently the practice. If that is the case, then I think it is welcome and it is time we did it. I have no reason for thinking that it is anything other than that.

When it comes to charging interest on overdue accounts, it is hard to argue against that. People should pay their bills on time. We have to pay interest everywhere else, why not pay interest to the government as well? I am not thinking of individuals such as you and I, Mr. Speaker. I am thinking of the large corporations which make a practice of cash management to the benefit of the corporation and stretch everything as far as they can, particularly when it comes to paying the government and they take advantage of that. In these cases, it could be a significant contribution to government revenue and one that I would be in support of.

Again, as I have said earlier, to the extent that it is dealing with recommendations from the Auditor General, we can all be happy that the government is finally moving to legislate the changes. Some of the changes have already been made over the last two or three years, but the legislation has never caught up with the changes that the Auditor General or the Public Accounts Committee recommended. It is good housekeeping and it is good to have it done so the government will be acting in line with the Financial Administration Act and the Financial Administration Act is in keeping with government procedures.

Clause 6 deals with the increases in fees for services. Of course, my question there is, just how much money are we talking about. With $500 million in the province of British Columbia, here it could be several billions a year that the government is talking about getting out of the economy.

We do not know where these fees are going to be increased and who this is going to affect. There are some fees that can be increased, and quite properly, from a commercial point of view. A Crown corporation or a government service that is strictly commercially oriented should be paying the cost of that, and an increase is reasonable. But sometimes, it is hard to differentiate between a public service and a commercial operation.

For example, while Canada Post is not one of the ones listed in the schedule in the notes I have, there is a difference within the corporation of the service that it provides to the extent that, for example, it distributes and handles junk mail. That is strictly commercial. That kind of operation should be covering the cost of delivering so-called junk mail. To the extent that it provides rural mail delivery, then there is a service involved. It is not a service that necessarily should be carrying its own way in every division. For Canada Post to be operating the way it does with a policy of closing down rural post offices, of cutting back on rural mail delivery, and of privatizing the provision of the service of rural mail, I think is not in keeping with a crown corporation that is designed at least in part to provide a service to the public.

VIA Rail is another good example. The operations of parts of VIA Rail were cut down or done away with when it was providing a service, not necessarily a commercially successful service, but nevertheless providing the transportation service of people and/or goods. That service is important to a country such as Canada, a country that stretches from east to west for some 4,000 miles and that needs that kind of a link to keep us an east-west country, as opposed to one where the transportation links might very well become north-south links without the tying together effect of a national railroad or a couple of national railroads.

Therefore, there are differences. We cannot say that a Crown corporation has to provide that service at a profit unless we look at the various sectors of the operation of that Crown operation. While we might admit that some services can be delivered at a price that will provide a profit, there are others where that should not be the case, where the government should be prepared to provide that service as a means of doing something for the people of Canada. I do not accept the principle that every Crown corporation has to operate at a profit.

When the government refers to adding corporations to Part 2 of Schedule III and that the corporations must be ones that are operated in a business way and that there must be a reasonable expectation of dividends, I have to wonder what corporations it is looking at. Does the government have in mind bringing in any particular corporations that are currently not being operated that way and making them profitable, first, by charging Canadian taxpayers enough for those services that those corporations will earn a profit? Does it have that kind of a program in mind or will it instruct those corporations to pay dividends to the Crown? If it does, it is simply another way of raising the taxes imposed on Canadians.

Some ten months ago in bringing in a budget, the government made much about saying that there were no tax increases in the budget. It forgot to mention it had imposed tax increases the year before, and even the year before that, that did not come into effect until 1990. While it did not, by legislation, bring in new taxes in 1990, it had brought in new taxes in previous years that became effective in 1990. Now, to say that it is going to do something else that, as I have suggested, could mean several billions of dollars of additional revenue for government, if it is going to take it away in dividends, while saying it is not increasing taxes, is not really telling the whole truth.

If one pays a little more for a postage stamp, in one's mind one is paying more to the government, even if it is a Crown corporation. It does not have to be called a tax. One knows that the government is taking more money and not giving anything back. Indeed, if we use Canada Post and VIA Rail as examples, it is taking more money away and giving less back. To say that it is not an increase in taxes is not telling the whole story.

What other plans does the government have? I do not think this particular section is simply doing something that the Auditor General recommended. I do not know, but I do not think it is. It seems to me that the government must have some specific plans for making certain Crown corporations profitable to the extent that they will be required to transfer dividends to the Crown, with a view of the Crown making more money without increasing taxes and yet taking that money out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers.

I am pleased with one change that is being made and that is with regard to giving the government the authority to make payments by electronic means. It is makes it possible to make the payments more up to date, to be prompt with the payments, if you like, and to cut out some of the paperwork. It just makes it that much more efficient. I expect that that could well have been one of the recommendations of the Auditor General.

Among the important provisions are the requirements for regular reporting in corporate plans, budgets and annual reports, and extensive auditing requirements, including comprehensive and value for money audits known as special examinations. This was, of course, one of the recommendations of the Auditor General and on more than one occasion. It is well that this is now being provided for in the legislation. Let us hope that the government goes the next step, if it has not already—it may have done so in some instances—and actually does what it is saying it will do here in proposing this change in the legislation.

With respect to dividends paid by Crown corporations, I have a list of corporations that paid dividends in 1988 and 1989. Canada Ports Corporation in 1988 had dividends of $100,000; and in 1989, $70,000. To me, that is an example of a commercial operation that could quite properly be expected to operate at a profit and to return at least a portion of that profit regularly to the Crown.

Another one is the Canadian National Railways which is being required by law to make dividends of a certain amount. This legislation is being changed so that it will not be that tightly tied to what the dividend should be. Dividends in 1988 were $56.5 million and in 1989, $41.2 million.

Canadian National, it would seem to me, more so than the CPR, has been in the business of providing a service because of the very long linkages of tracks to remote areas that it inherited when it became the CNR when it took over all the companies that went under. It was part of a national policy to provide rail linkage to a lot of communities throughout Canada, on the Prairies and in other provinces as well.

To say that corporation must provide specific dividends annually to the Crown is not playing fair with the Canadian people. If it is able to operate at a profit without decreasing the service to the people who it is serving, then, yes, I agree with it paying dividends. But a law previous to this change that is being made now required the CNR to pay these dividends every year. The only way it could get that money was to borrow it or to increase the charges on people who were expecting to get a service from this Crown corporation, rather than to have it operated at a profit.

The Halifax Port Corporation is another one. I think it is proper that the Montreal Port Corporation be expected to operate profitably and to make dividend payments.

Petro-Canada, nil. Of course, Petro-Canada has been discussed at some length in this House and probably will be again. It was an instrument of public policy. It is important that we develop energy resources in Canada. The government has chosen to bring in legislation to turn it over to the private sector. I am sorry this happened. I appreciate that I cannot reflect on a decision of the House. Petro-Canada did not pay any dividends. It was not in any financial position to do so, but it was making a significant contribution, on behalf of the Canadian people, of developing and helping to find and promote the development of energy resources. That was something that we needed in Canada, being the kind of country that we are, with the need for energy, and the fact that we use more per capita than any other country in the world. It was important to have an instrument of public policy that could be used in the energy field, in particular. It did not go far enough. It should not have been tied totally to petroleum energy. There were many other things that it should have been doing, but it had a record of not paying dividends, and it is small wonder.

The Royal Canadian Mint paid no dividend in 1988, but a dividend of $60.4 million in 1989. That is a good example of a commercial operation that could well be expected to operate at a profit and should be paying at least some of that profit to the Crown by way of dividends. I support that.

I am not opposed to the idea of Crown corporations paying dividends. I am opposed to legislation saying that they have to pay regardless of what they are making. I am opposed to them not being able to provide a service as part of their activities, but I am not opposed in general principle to some Crown corporations paying dividends. Clause 7 of Schedule III provided for the set dividend rate for Canadian National. This amendment would change that.

I have raised some questions about it. The most interesting one from my point of view is the one that I will be pursuing. No doubt this bill will be going to committee where we will have an opportunity to get into the details of the various clauses. The one I am really interested in is what the government is looking at by way of what the minister called a significant contribution to the government deficit. I believe that is the way he phrased it.

If this is a sneaky way for the government to raise a lot more money without bringing in legislation specifically saying that it is going to do some housekeeping with respect to the Financial Administration Act, and by that means trying to make a significant contribution to the government deficit, then I am opposed to that principle of the bill, if that is indeed the principle.

It is not spelled out. I cannot vote against the bill on the basis that it is designed, not to be housekeeping, but rather to make a significant contribution to the government deficit. I must say that I regret very much if the government is bringing in legislation such as this which in general is good housekeeping, but at the same time is going to use it in a way that it hopes will make a significant contribution to the government deficit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment area as follows: the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands—Environment; the hon. member for London East—Housing; the hon. member for Winnipeg North—Health.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, commenting on Bill C-91 today I have a number of points I wish to make, many of them pertaining to financial management or mismanagement thereof. Bill C-91 is an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof. If the average lay person is to read the contents of a bill of that nature and size, all I say is thank goodness for good researchers and advisers in this business.

Many of the improvements that are listed here have been recommended by public accounts committees over the years of their sittings in this House. A number of those have been accomplished recently by our public accounts committee. For example, there is the addition of sovereign loans that are unlikely to be paid are added to the national debt of Canada. Before they were just sitting there. Everybody knew that we would never collect many of those debts from foreign countries. It is a good move to bring those into the financial structure of the country, showing them as a national debt because undoubtedly we are going to have to cover them at some time in the future anyway. That has been a good move. It is one that the Auditor General has wanted for some time.

I have many comments that I want to make about this bill. While it brings out all the good points of government, we do not want it to be a cushion for the government to be spreading what it considers to be its good news and its updates and so on without also bringing in the basic and broad underlying weaknesses of financial management in Canada today. This bill is an act to amend the Financial Administration Act. It is a housekeeping bill in many ways on matters of a technical nature that have been evolving for the last five years in financial management and control practices of the government, recommended on many occasions by the Auditor General and the public accounts committee.

Many of these amendments are being made on recommendations of those two bodies. I congratulate the Auditor General on his very constructive remarks over the past number of years. I know that when you are in government you do not like the reports of auditors general sometimes. I sat on that side of the House for a number of years and I know what it feels like. It is very necessary in government to have a good auditor general and a good staff behind him. I think we are well served by the auditor general's organization, from all members of his staff and the way they serve the House of Commons of Canada.

There is nothing inherently wrong with this bill. As I said, it is a housekeeping bill. It is in most cases merely legitimizing into legislation the things that are current practice anyway. Therefore, the Liberal approach to this is that we are quite happy to see these changes formalized, but there have been many areas of mismanagement on the part of this government and it has no reason to pat itself on the back.

The public debt has doubled in five years from $170 billion to $351 billion. The scary part of it is that in spite of all the increases in taxes and the rhetoric of this government, we are now on our way to tripling the national debt in this country. That is a very scary thing indeed.

The government missed the opportunity to make meaningful reductions in the deficit during five years of world-wide economic growth. This government had five years of the best economic growth in the country. Even at that, the deficit and the national debt in this country continued to grow by leaps and bounds. Yet they campaigned in 1984 by telling all Canadians how simple it was going to be to bring the national debt of Canada under control. They have succeeded in their six years in power in increasing the national debt in this country by more than it has been increased in any period of time since Confederation. Not much of a record to be proud of, Mr. Speaker.

The deficit is increasing, not decreasing as the government would have us believe. Let us take a look at the figures. The deficit has risen from $28.1 billion in 1987-88 to $28.7 billion in 1988-1989 and to $30.5 billion in 1989-90. Many efforts have been made to save the face of the finance minister. This is about the third major round of cutting the Public Service of Canada and there is a feeling out there that when they do that, they are hitting Ottawa and area.

Just to clarify that point, I want to say that three out of four public servants in Canada live outside the National Capital Region. They are spread all the way across this country from Halifax to the west coast and from the south of Canada to the Arctic circle. It is very easy to attack public servants because they cannot stand up and defend themselves.

When you attack the Public Service, decrease the numbers of the Public Service, you can go around to those who believe that that is a great thing. You brag about it and say: "What a great fellow am I". Then they turn around and hire contractors to do much of the same work that public servants were doing before. They say: "We are saving money by doing this". Well, Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago we had the Treasury Board, the Privy Council and the Auditor General before the public accounts committee. I asked them specifically for a comparison of the costs of contracting out as opposed to the amount it would cost had those public servants been retained. They said: "Oh, yes, we can get you those figures."

It was not very long until I got a reply from them to the opposite. This is what Treasury Board had to say: "In connection with the information requested on personal services contracts which replace the use of public servants, the Treasury Board Secretariat does not collect such data. As far as we are aware, departments have not been gathering statistical data of that kind. We do not have data on what portion of the contract statistics that have been collected per the paragraph above would have replaced the use of public servants. Furthermore, our statistics would not likely incorporate all contracting out of services but only those captured by the criteria of the two special areas of interest."

On what grounds does any member of this government go around Canada saying: "We have decreased the Public Service from such a figure down to such a figure and boy, are we doing a good job." They say by contracting out they are saving money. Yet, they do not have any statistics to prove their point. That is just a bunch of rhetoric. It is really amazing what you find out. You are promised information. Then you find they do not have it.

When you cut the Public Service, you are not only downsizing the Public Service. You are downsizing the morale as well because people do not know when the hatchet is going to fall on them. This is not the way to get the best work out of your employees. The Public Service of Canada has been the scapegoat of this government on many occasions. This government is going to pay dearly for those attacks.

Federal tax revenues have increased by $50 billion since 1984. This government has increased its tax revenues by $50 billion since it gained power six years ago. The finance minister has had more than enough tax increases to reduce the deficit, but he has failed to do so.

Because of high interest rates, the deficit will be $4 billion to $6 billion higher in 1990–91, unless the government takes additional action to raise taxes or cut spending. It is after everybody to impress upon them how important it is that it cuts the deficit and how important it is to downsize the national debt. It then turns around and brings in a high interest rate policy that results in adding $4 billion to $6 billion to the national debt of this country. It then brags about its great success in financial management.

The high interest rate policy is keeping interest rates in Canada more than 4 per cent higher than they are in the United States. A public debt of $351 billion is equivalent to a personal debt of $25,000 for each Canadian taxpayer. Each Canadian must now pay $2,500 in taxes each year just to pay the interest on the federal government's debt. The government is on its way to tripling the national debt, and it has only been in power for six years.

The proportion of the debt owed to foreigners—and this is a crucial point that many Canadians will not take any heart in—has doubled under the Conservative government, from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. Before these people came to power, 90 per cent of the national debt was owned by Canadians and interest rates were being paid to those Canadians. Now, there is another 20 per cent being paid outside the country.

High interest rates have caused Japanese and European investors to purchase Government of Canada securities. This means that more of Canada's future wealth will have to be paid to foreigners in interest, and the government calls this good financial management.

The Conservative policy has been to shift its deficit systematically to the provinces and to other levels of government. This is a serious situation. You are not cutting anything in Canada when you simply shift your problems over to another level of government.

Cuts to transfer payments to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education squeeze provincial budgets. Cuts to unemployment insurance push more people on to welfare, which costs the provinces and the municipalities more money. Federal spending cuts eventually result in higher provincial taxes and higher municipal property taxes.

When people across Canada have a major increase in their municipal taxes and an increase in their provincial taxes, it may well be due to the fact that the federal government is unloading more of its debt and more of its administrative difficulties on to the provinces and on to municipalities in order to try to make itself look good.

On Friday in the House the Minister of National Defence said the government had no plans for emergencies or crises. Yet in 1988 this government passed the Emergency Preparedness Canada Act, which has been legislation now for over two years. We know and all Canadians know that this government does not prepare itself for any crisis. It is running helter-skelter from one crisis to another. The fact is this government has become the crisis in the eyes of Canadians.

Canadians have a plan in place to look after that crisis and will put that plan into operation in the next election. We will see a lot of changes on the other side of the House. I feel sorry for some of the back-benchers on the other side of the House because there are many good people over there. They will be drowned in the mismanagement procedures of this government, because they stand every day and support this government. If they stand and support something that is wrong, then they must be wrong too.

There is another item I want to mention. I have gone through the Public Service. We do not know how many more contracts will be let to do the work of the public servants who will bite the dust as a result of last Friday's announcement by the government. That is sad. This government should be ashamed of itself.

Just before it got the free trade agreement signed with the United States, the then Minister for International Trade, Pat Carney, who now in the other place, signed the memorandum of understanding bringing in that infamous 15 per cent export tax on Canadian softwood lumber going into the United States. She agreed to it, and she has recently been awarded a Senate position as a reward for her actions in attacking the forest industry in Canada.

That has hurt the Canadian forest industry since day one because American financiers assisted their forest industry in the northern United States, lent them money to build up their equipment and to improve their operations, and today they are able to compete very successfully. They are taking over what used to be traditional Canadian markets in the United States. We used to sell lumber as far south as Tennessee. That is not happening any more. We are having difficulty even getting it across the border. Thousands and thousands of people have been laid off in the forest industry in this country. There was a time not very long ago when 11 per cent of the Canadian labour force was employed in the forest industry of Canada.

Many companies have tried selling their products in Europe, in countries like Britain, France, Germany, and Italy where there is a good market for Canadian forest products. The problem is that it has been 90 or 120 days before they have their accounts receivable, get their money back. They have to go out and borrow money for their operations at the high interest rates of the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Crow, who have no consideration for these people at all.

The government is pulling the rug from underneath one industry communities in this country. When that goes, the other infrastructure or the other service industries around it start going down too. Of course, by propping up these high interest rates, an artificially high value is being created for the Canadian dollar, which is hurting that export market as well. This is what the government calls good management.

I just want to say here that in the last meeting of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, we went over an item with regard to external affairs, wherein the existing organizational structure and processes in the Department of External Affairs do not provide adequate control of moneys advanced to employees. The amounts involved, according to departmental records, have increased from $15 million on March 31, 1986 to $25 million on March 31, 1990. There is no management there at all. The Auditor General found that there is no clear accountability for monitoring, following up, and recovering amounts due to the Crown.

I have before me here a list of some of these accountable advances that have not been repaid, accounted for or recovered, and then details of accountable advances outstanding as at April 30, 1990. These are advances that have not been paid back. On that list is a P. Carney with a 2 after it. What External Affairs is telling the Auditor General is that that person has two outstanding amounts of money owing to that department. Of even more interest, down at the bottom is the name J. Clark with 8 in brackets after it. That means he has eight accountable advances that have not been recollected. Some of these things are three years old.

Mr. Worthy: Read them all out.

Mr. Hopkins: If I wanted to read them all out, I would be here until ten o'clock tonight; they are all in there. A lot of this, I am pointing out, is due to inefficiency of accounting. The Auditor General says that there is no real accounting. Do we really know that these people owe the money? That is the question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I have succeeded in getting them going over there. I want to talk about farm marketing boards because if we lose our farm marketing boards in Canada we lose our farmers. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your patience. I would like to go on and talk about the importance of our own food production and our own health controls in our food production in Canada. We cannot destroy our food production and then have to import artificial foods and all other kinds of things from abroad, where we do not have the direct control of the health services when those foods are processed.

We have it now in Canada. We have our farmers. For heaven's sakes, let's keep them.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the last hon. member, and I have to say I was very disappointed.

His last couple of comments were not something that I would normally expect from him. To single out a former minister and a current minister of all the names that may be there with no explanation and to use it in the House is not something that I would have expected him of all people to be party to. I just have to say that I am disappointed. There has been a number of comments today by the last speaker as well as by several others on financial management. I sit here in horror when listening to how they describe it and end up somehow or other saying that this government is guilty of mismanagement, especially when it pertains to our deficit and our debt.

I remind hon. members opposite that when the Progressive Conservative government took office in 1984 the difference in the operating statement of the country—and I am not a fancy man with figures but I understand operating statements—between the revenue brought in and what was spent was $16 billion in deficit. The government of that day was $16 billion in a year more than it brought in.

This government has progressively tried to make a difference in that regard. The difference this year between the revenue we bring in and what we spend on operating programs is a $10 billion surplus. From a $16 billion deficit to a $10 billion surplus is called good management. It has been done through a combination of restraint on government spending as well as a judicious increase of taxes. There is no question. That is what this country needs.

I am not going to blame the Liberals for all the debt that was built up before, although they were the government. I believe that if as Canadians we are prepared to let a government continue to spend more and more, year after year, than it brings in in revenue, we as a Canadian people are responsible.

For a period of 15 years the people and the Government of Canada spent progressively more and more every year than they brought in in revenue. Since the Conservatives took office that trend has been reversed. In fact there is some hope for this country, some light at the end of the tunnel. That in fact is what I call proper financial management.

There are many more things to be done. There are many more things that can be done, but we have to give credit to the government that took the tough action to do what was necessary to have a $26 billion turnaround in six years. That is good, sound financial management.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I cannot get over the self-righteous attitude of the hon. member opposite. I am surprised at him. He talked to me about putting names on the record. I sat over there for a number of years and I know what was said over here, but I will tell him this.

The entire list of all these figures was before the public accounts committee less than a week ago. We discussed all this. As I said at the end of my speech, the accounting processes are such that we do not know whether they are paid, whether they are not paid, but they are there. There are pages of names, and we have to bring this out. But they are public knowledge. Anybody across Canada can read them, so the member should not say that is a terrible thing to do.

He says that they are making great progress with over a $30 billion deficit this year, much of it—$4 billion to $6 billion of it—caused by their own high interest rate policy. He should not start to scream and blame everybody else on a self-righteous basis.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke missed the point of my hon. friend, and I am going to bring it up again. The hon. member has been the chairman of the public accounts committee. He knows very well that the list he read from, when speaking about people who have outstanding accounts on travel advances, is a snapshot at any one time. I know he just mentioned J. Clark, when speaking about the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but he knew damned well who he was talking about and he did it on purpose. The minister goes on many trips on behalf of the government and at the time the account was audited there were outstanding accounts. The inference was that these were not being paid.

If the hon. member was honest with the House, he would also read the names of the members from his own party who happen to be on that list. My point is this. I would not name them anymore than I would name anybody else because, at that particular time, there are outstanding advances. I think we all, as members of Parliament, at some time have outstanding advances. A number of members of Parliament take three or four airplane tickets at a time so that if they have to make a trip in a hurry, they have an airline ticket. That is charged in advance. The hon. member should be honest with the House. He left the impression that these people are not paying their accounts. That is very unfair, he knows it and I wish he would correct it.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, obviously they have been so enthralled with their self-righteous attitude across the way, that they missed the entire point. I said that the accounting procedures are so bad that they do not know whether the bills are paid or not. One can read these names all night long. Even the minister knows these are public knowledge. The minister says that one should not do so, but is it wrong to discuss something that is public knowledge? Is it wrong to say that some of these are perhaps paid and some may not be. I said that at the end of my speech. The accounting procedures are so bad that they did not know which ones are paid and which were not.

Mr. McDermid: I see.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. minister is so busy shouting and screaming that he does not have time to listen. If he had been listening, he would have heard that. But the minister's comments always lead him astray. I do not see anything wrong with discussing in this House what is public knowledge.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member tell us if he has any evidence that the Minister of Finance is borrowing money. If not, would he assume that this is because, even the minister, himself, feels interest rates are too high?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance puts interest rates so high, they become attractive to investors in Japan and other countries that they start coming in here and buying up our securities then, naturally, we are going to have all this debt transferred to the foreign marketplace. This is dangerous to Canadians. If you are paying interest to Canadians that is one thing but, when you pay interest to foreigners, that is a different thing.

Canada was in a much better position on this than was the United States. Just a short time ago the Americans were paying far more interest to foreigners than they were to Americans. We, in Canada, do not want to continue that procedure here because, if we ever get into a position where we are paying more interest out of the country than we are paying to Canadians inside of the country, then we are in serious shape. At the time this government came to power, 10 per cent of our debt interest was being paid outside of the country and now 20 per cent is being paid outside of the country. By increasing the interest rates, the Minister of Finance is destroying his own case.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to speak to this bill because I think that this particular piece of legislation is much more important than has been indicated and is much more than bare housekeeping. Within this bill is the expanding of authority or power, giving it to the Treasury Board, taking it from other ministers and other acts. It is put into the area of an Order in Council and regulations under the Treasury Board.

When the minister let slip that this was going to be one of the pieces of legislation that was going to help to eliminate the deficit, he really meant that, because within this particular piece of legislation is the authority for Treasury Board to define what is a service. There is no definition of a service or a facility in the bill.

If that is looked at a little more deeply, it will be found that that can mean a considerable amount more than would appear on the surface. The umbrella legislation is the Financial Administration Act. It affects every department and every movement of funds between departments. It is umbrella legislation under which the government is supposed to be able to control the financial structure of its operations.

If the operations which are presently the responsibility of every one of the departments are centralized under the Treasury Board, and the government decides it wants a 15 per cent or a 20 per cent increase, it can do it right across the board without any problem at all. It does not have to go to each minister or act to get the authority under that act to change the regulations because it can now be done centrally.

I think that is the danger of this particular piece of legislation. It puts into the hands of the Treasury Board and the cabinet much more power than they have had in the past. It is the kind of power which allows them to fleece the citizens of Canada without coming to Parliament, or without going to the department which knows the most about the particular charges that are being made. It gives the Treasury Board the authority to define what a service is and how much should be charged for it.

A little later on, Mr. Speaker, I will point out the kind of things that I think this may turn into if the government wishes it to.

I want to spend a little bit of time going over a couple of things in the bill that I think prove my particular point. Clause 6 which amends section 19 of the act says:

> The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board,
> (a) by regulations prescribe the fees or charges to be paid for a service—

No definition of a service.

> —or the use of a facility provided by of on behalf of Her Majesty in the right of Canada, by the users or classes of users of the service or facility; or
> (b) to authorize the appropriate Minister to prescribe by order those fees or charges, subject to such terms and conditions as may be specified by the Governor in Council.

In other words, if I read this correctly, it takes out of the hands of the minister and puts into the hands of the Governor of Council and the Treasury Board the right to collect any fee on any service and any facility that has anything to do with the Government of Canada.

I wonder if we realize how many times we have touched the Government of Canada and if this kind of power is given to the Treasury Board they can charge us for it? I do not think it is nearly as much of a housekeeping bill as the minister has indicated.

I want to spend a minute on the schedule relative to interest. It is interest on money owed to the government. This bill gives the authority to the government, to the Treasury Board, to charge interest on any fee or debt that is owed to the government by any citizen of Canada or any corporation that owes the Government of Canada.

At present that ability, as far as the government is concerned, is in the Income Tax Act as revenue but it is not part of any other act. Mr. Speaker, if you have tried to collect interest from the government, you will find it is impossible. I hope that this particular indication that the government is now giving itself authority to charge interest on something that is owed to it, that it is going to reciprocate. If one has waited for six months or six years, as sometimes happens, for the government to pay a bill, one should be able to charge interest on it. Try to do it now, Mr. Speaker, there is no way that you can charge interest on a bill, regardless of how long the government has had it in hand and not paid it.

I have cases in my files where the length of time has been years. I have one case where the government did not pay a bill for six years. In this case, a corporation which did some turfing for the government has collected only the basic bill after six years. If the government is going to have the right to collect interest on money owed to it, then it must also give the right to Canadian citizens to collect interest.

I am a little worried about the section on collection agencies. Knowing the basis under which this government has given out contracts to work for the government, if one is a private individual, it would appear to me that this opens up a tremendous area for the friends of the government. This could result in more patronage without any control over how much the government is going to pay for that service.

The government is going to give the collection of money over to lawyers or collection agencies. I mention the Farm Credit Corporation. Only a government supporting lawyer may apply. I have a feeling that when it comes to a collection agency or a lawyer working for the government, only if one is a government supporter may one apply.

In the Farm Credit Corporation the lawyers know the business so well that the day the government changed, the lawyers turned over their files. I think that that needs to be looked at very thoroughly and we must look at it very closely in committee.

The right of remission is also in this bill. The right of remission is always there, of course, in money that is paid to the government, at least in most cases. It is there statutorily. For instance the automobile companies in Canada used to pay duty on parts coming in from the United States. Statutorily, once they had fulfilled the requirements of the auto pact, they got back the duty that they had paid. What happens in this bill is much more open again to finagling, manipulation and patronage because the decision as to whether or not there shall be remission is not statutory, it is in the hands of the minister. We should look at that very thoroughly.

My friend from Renfrew has gone, but I want to point out that section 20 of this act may be put in there for a particular reason. Section 20 gives Treasury Board the authority to collect from people who fail to pay back money owing to the Crown. That list of people who had advances and neglected to pay them back can, under this act, be collected from, so it is not all bad. I must say when I get to that point, that it is not all bad.

There are a lot of things in here that I, and other members of the Public Accounts Committee have pointed to over the years as needing to be cleaned up. A lot of that has been done in this act. I have not had much time to go through it, so I hope that in that sense the minister is correct and that there is a lot of housekeeping in the act done to allow the government to operate a little more effectively than it has in the past.

On page 11 of the act, there is a clause on lapsing. The Financial Administration Act in the past required that if a department still had money in its coffers at the end of the year, then that money lapsed and was returned to the General Revenue Fund. For a civil servant or a director of a particular department, that is annoying and causes a tremendous amount of expenditure during the last month which is usually not good expenditure, but it did have a certain quality in that the control of the financing was there all the time.

Many civil servants will be very pleased with this change, but I wonder about its value and whether it should really be in here. It states that at the end of the fiscal year the money will not lapse in quite the same way. Money unexpended at the end of the fiscal year, after adjustments for the recording of debts incurred and other amounts due and owing, referred to in Section 37(1), shall lapse. It lapses except for the amount that you can show you owe. There is no department, corporation or agency that is going to go into the next fiscal year without making sure that anything that is possible to be charged for last year will be put on that account.

There is only one other area I want to cover, and that is the section on Schedule III. Earlier, I suggested that the definition of services and the definition of the fee would be left up to Treasury Board. The definition of the service covers a much larger area than you would expect. I will only use some of the examples in the act because there is no limitation to these particular areas of control. The act allows any department any kind of service, but they are not exact.

It allows the establishment of fees under the Aeronautics Act. In flying around in the northern part of the country, either in the provinces or in the Northwest Territories, one depends entirely upon the navigation assistance available to one at no charge. Is that going to be charged? Or, is any kind of flying assistance going to be charged? At the moment, no, but if the government decides that it wants to eliminate the deficit fast enough, it may charge for the air one uses, as it has some responsibility for it.

There are multiple services that are made on agricultural products. With regard to inspection fees, if one is selling grain, there are grading responsibilities and the grain commission. There are inspection fees for meat and seed grain, the certification of seed grain, the certification of particular breeds of animals, and the importing inspection. All of those are services which have been sometimes charged for, but, most often, not. This would allow Treasury Board to start charging for all of those services. It should charge at the level that it thinks the traffic can stand.

I am sure that the government thinks it is being reasonable, but the people who really know what is going on are the people who are working with these agricultural products. The Department of Agriculture would be the logical people to do it. I would hope that it would do it jointly. When done under the Department of Agriculture, it is required to put it as part of the appropriation bill. This does not even require that. If I understand this correctly, it will no longer have to be made part of that appropriation bill as it is presently.

Under the Canada Pensions Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Act, Part III is repealed. This leaves me at a loss because I do not know what Part III is. That is the kind of thing we are being faced with. This bill came out a couple of days ago. No one has been able to go through it as thoroughly as we should have been able to do.

One section refers to the national parks and determining or describing the manner of determining fees, rates, rents and other charges for use of resources and facilities in parks for issuance of licence and permits for the provision of service materials and works. That is going to become part of the responsibility of the Treasury Board. Is the Treasury Board the place where that should be? I think not.

In the case of the Canada Shipping Act, for instance, is de-icing a harbour going to become one of the things that is chargeable? Is search and rescue going to be one of the areas that is going to be chargeable? If one's husband disappears while out at sea, is the seaman's wife going to be charged for search and rescue? Under this act, it is possible.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate on Bill C-91, the amendments to the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I recognize, as do other members of my party, that this bill is primarily a housekeeping measure. Essentially, it implements in the way the federal government manages its finances, its cash, and its billing procedures and collection of accounts, recommendations which have been already made over the last few years by the Auditor General, the Comptroller General, and the public accounts committee. Therefore, it modernizes and brings up to date various aspects of the financial management activities of the government. In that respect, we are certainly not opposed to that practice.

However, there are a number of aspects of the bill which lead to questions, particularly as they interact with the whole regulatory process of the government. Here we have legislation through which the government presents its policies, some of which involve increased taxes or increased charges of user fees and which are debated here on the floor of the House of Commons, and in many other areas, particularly those that have the designation of Governor in Council or approval through Treasury Board, through Governor in Council or which, in effect, involve regulatory changes. They do not get debated on the floor of the House of Commons necessarily, but in fact are introduced quite surreptitiously by pre-publication in The Canada Gazette. Following a short notice period, they then become regulations and have the force of law for those people who are affected by them.

Some of these regulations can be very complex and can be very difficult for the member of Parliament and for professionals, let alone the ordinary Canadians, to understand their import and to be able to comment on their impact before the regulations come into force.

One provision in particular that I have noticed in the bill that we are discussing today, combined with these regulatory powers that are available through the Treasury Board and through the Governor in Council, has a major effect on a program and a charge which applies to a large number of municipal units and voluntary agencies across the country. It is on that point that I would like to develop my argument this afternoon.

The clause that I am dealing with in the bill is clause 6, which amends section 19 in the Financial Administration Act. It broadens the application. Clause 6 would repeal Section 19 and substitute the following for it:

> "19.(1) The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board,
> (a) by regulation prescribe the fees or charges to be paid for a service or the use of the facility provided by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada by the users or classes of users of the service or facility—

There are other clauses that essentially broaden the range of services and user charges for which the Treasury Board or the Governor in Council may prescribe regulations. One of the additions in the bill, as I understand it, is that while broadening the category of user charges, the bill also includes rights or privileges conferred by the Crown by means of a licence, permit or other document, and these also may be subject to user fees and charges and subject to regulation which would be introduced without going through Parliament, but merely through Governor in Council on recommendation of the Treasury Board.

There is a case now that will have a devastating impact in my constituency in particular and many other constituencies of a rural nature in Canada which has to do precisely with this point. I am speaking of an act which was introduced in the last Parliament, the Radiocommunications bill, Bill C-3 which in effect made changes to the Radiocommunications Act to increase user fees and licence fees for those in the public sector who used radio services and had radio licences.

What the Act did was enable the government to charge fees in a broader category of users of radio licences. The minister, at the time, assured this House that these additional charges would only apply to provincial and federal government agencies. They would not apply, for example, to municipalities that have radio licences for their use for local police protection, search and rescue, fire protection, emergency measures and they would also not apply to voluntary agencies, agencies like fire departments which are comprised of volunteers and perform the same types of services on a voluntary basis often over a wide area and for which there are no charges for these services.

The then Minister of Communications exempted municipalities and voluntary fire departments from those additional charges. What has happened since the election is through the regulatory route, the Minister of Communications has introduced by regulation, by Governor in Council, through the Canada Gazette in January of this year, and with very little contact in particular with the voluntary fire departments, which are most affected by this measure, provisions to the Radiocommunications Act regulations, drastically increasing licence fees for municipalities, voluntary fire departments and imposing an incredible burden on those organizations which are composed of volunteers in rural areas and do not have the funds to meet those obligations, but require radio licence fees to perform their essential tasks.

This regulatory change, which was permitted one month of pre-publication through the Canada Gazette, is a most arcane and complex piece of regulation, combined with a schedule which would require a whole company of accountants a month to figure out, let alone the fire departments that were affected. Of course, it went right by the voluntary fire departments that were most affected. They have discovered since then that they are now saddled with an enormous increase in their radio licence fees.

For example, the Strait Area Mutual Aid Association, which is a group of 25 volunteer fire departments located in the area around the Strait of Canso, paid licence fees last year which totalled $236. With the passage of this regulation in February, without their knowledge, they are subject since April 1 of this year with a licence fee for their radios of $8,574 for this year. That is something like a 3,600 per cent increase in their radio licence fees. Next year, that is to say the 1991 fiscal year, they will have to pay an additional $8,574 or $17,148 for their radio licence fees. They are unable to meet that charge.

What is going to happen, and this illustrates the false economy which this government in slavishly attempting to apply this principle of user pay across the board to voluntary fire departments, voluntary mutual aid associations, local police forces, and municipal governments, is this will shut down municipal fire protection and search and rescue in rural areas, such as my constituency.

These services are essential. These people, for no pay, at considerable expense to themselves and risk to their lives and a major time commitment, provide fire protection for people's homes and for the few federal government buildings which exist in rural Canada, Search and Rescue which means safety for many people who are lost, and a whole range of other services.

What is going to happen if this is allowed to go forward is that these services are going to dry up. The government is going to have to replace them with paid services made up of paid firemen and paid local search and rescue organizations. The cost of these services is going to skyrocket and the fabric of these communities will be weakened. This is happening through a regulatory process which will be made easier by the amendments in this bill. I want to underscore the importance of this particular proposed measure being withdrawn and, if it can be done through this legislation, it has to be done.

I want to give a personal example of how important this is. In 1981, long before I was a member of Parliament or had even contemplated being a member, I was home for Christmas. On Boxing Day, I went cross-country skiing with my brother. We got lost in the woods. If it had not been for the voluntary efforts of our local search and rescue organizations in the area of Margaree Forks, from where I come, and the surrounding communities of Cheticamp and Inverness and the voluntary fire departments, using radios to communicate and to search, at night, in the woods behind our place to find me and my brother who were completely lost in the woods, we would be dead, frozen corpses, and I would not be here to make this point today.

That is the kind of service which these voluntary agencies provide and which is going to be completely scrapped if theses exorbitant radio licence fees are allowed to go through. These licence fees applications have been introduced and mentioned in The Canada Gazette, without being considered at all in the House of Commons. They went through the regulatory process. I do not, in principle, object to the fact that the government permits the Governor in Council to issue regulations. That simplifies the legislative process and, of course, there are many things which cannot possibly be put into legislation. I am not objecting to that principle but I am just saying, relative to Bill C-91 in particular, the new expanded clause 19 in the Financial Administration Act, which that bill will allow for, is going to expand the powers of the Governor in Council to introduce the kinds of regulations which the Minister of Communications issued earlier this year. This is going to make it absolutely impossible for mutual aid, fire departments, and rural municipalities to perform basic functions which are essential to those communities and which are now provided on a voluntary basis by these community groups. This relates directly by the channel of the regulatory process to the financial management provisions which are contained in this legislation.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, while I am not opposed to the principle of updating and modernizing the financial and cash management practices of the government, particularly as they have been found deficient by the Auditor General, the Comptroller General or through the hearings of the public accounts committee, I do believe that this particular aspect of this legislation ought to be gone over again in light of those very Draconian fee increases introduced by the Minister of Communications for radio licence fees earlier this year and which are really going to hurt voluntary organizations in communities in my riding and also, I suggest, in many other communities that are of a rural nature across Canada. They cannot bear these fees. They are going to be unable to function if they are going to be saddled with these fees.

That is the main point I want to raise in connection with Bill C-91. I would ask that if this bill goes forward to committee that that clause in the bill be given very careful scrutiny in light of the points I have mentioned.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and honoured to rise in the House to speak to Bill C-91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

If any one part of the country is impacted by the Financial Administration Act as administered by the federal government and to be adhered to by the various jurisdictions in this country, it has to be the Northwest territories. The government of the Northwest Territories, as you well know, is governed by the NWT Act and the government of the Northwest Territories is not a constitutional entity unto itself. It is in fact an extension of the federal government and is so managed.

On April 1, 1990, a new formula financing arrangement went into effect between the federal government and the government of the NWT. The immediate financial impact of the new arrangements is the reduction of the 1990-91 grant to the government of the Northwest Territories of about $25 million. Over the next five years, the reductions will amount to about $110 million. Not only are these cuts damaging to the NWT's fiscal position but the new formula contains serious flaws which will limit our ability to develop the northern economy.

It is particularly serious in that the Northwest Territories, at a time when the goods and services tax would definitely be an imposition and the high interest rate policy dominates all discussions on the economy, the new unemployment insurance bill, which definitely impacts the north because of the high seasonal employment situation that exists there, will have devastating effects on people in Canada's north.

Essentially it is to say that any kind of legislation that comes from the federal government definitely has an impact on the north in a disproportionate way than it does in any other region of Canada in that the ties are very close. Although we have an act that we are governed by, we definitely are still an extension and we still have these huge transfers that we have to adhere to strict regulations to manage these resources by.

Having said that, I guess we could assume that in the territories we have been virtually taken off the transportation grid. There have been major cutbacks which will have a very devastating effect on the north, in that the north has a very high cost of travel for its public. Essentially, most of the travel is by air and most of the communities serviced are by air travel. There really is not the kind of infrastructure that exists in other parts of Canada.

As far as the communications grid is concerned, I guess essentially the million dollar cutbacks referred to in the budgetary cutbacks of a few days ago will definitely have an impact on the voice that the north has through this particular mechanism to communicate.

In terms of communications and the Financial Administration Act, I suppose the north would be in a position, as would every other community in the south, to be on an equal playing field in terms of its infrastructure, but the north lags behind.

In the last two months Gordon Wray, the Minister of Tourism and Economic Development for the Government of the Northwest Territories, stated in terms of a major transportation strategy he presented to his legislature: "Our transportation infrastructure lags far behind anywhere else in Canada and must be improved. Our lack of adequate roads, airports, docks and harbours handicaps our economic growth. A better transportation system will create opportunities for mining, tourism, fishing, trade and travel between communities".

This is a major concern of the territories. Finding the investment dollars for communities in the north would be a major consideration for this particular portfolio and this particular minister. It is of the utmost importance for this particular government to have the moneys to administer in a responsible way under the Financial Administration Act. It should be able to get returns instead of always playing catch-up and trying to build an infrastructure at the same time, which is degrading.

What I mean by that is that the strategy includes major program initiatives and a substantial financial commitment. The minister states that at current levels we would spend some $1.65 billion over the next 20 years on transportation. Achieving the four strategic objectives would require expenditures of $4.32 billion, representing an increase of $2.6 billion.

In the fiscal arrangement or the new formula financing arrangement that went into effect on April 1, 1990, it seems very hopeless to put forward any kind of an economic initiative for the north when we have the kinds of arrangements that are essentially going to degrade the future economic prospects of the north by $110 million over the next five years. The reality is that this is definitely a need. This is something that is undeniable to the economic well-being of the north.

The Government of the Northwest Territories has assumed a significant role in the northern transportation mandates. Northerners will be the recipients of the economic, social and political benefits of the transportation strategy proposed by Mr. Wray. The Government of the Northwest Territories, therefore, must be prepared to contribute a substantial share of the required investment. However it should not be alone.

The minister goes on to say in a further statement that the transportation strategy will be a catalyst for the economic, social and political development of the Northwest Territories into the 21st century. It will benefit current generations of northerners and Canadians and establish a legacy for the north.

He also says that despite the fact that the GNWT has signalled its commitment to transportation as a catalyst for the long-term economic, social and political health of the north, the scale of investment required cannot be made without the participation of Canada, the provinces and the private sector. These partners will be shareholders of the benefits. They must also be prepared to share in the investment.

Having said that about the whole infrastructure of the north, I want to mention a number of other important realities that my constituents in Western Arctic are faced with in dealing with this fiscal arrangement as governed by the Financial Administration Act and the federal government in the relationship they have to deal with these major funding transfers.

The reality for my constituents is that they are faced in their everyday life with the need for economic security. Not only are they beyond the communications grid and the transportation grid, but basically the north is in the pre-industrialized setting. Having reflected on this a bit, I would say that everybody who knows Canadian history knows that it was fur that built this country.

As of late that particular industry or traditional economy has fallen on hard times. It will probably be the lowest return for hunters and trappers in that particular area. They are severely impacted by whatever kind of budgetary decisions are made at the federal level in arrangements with the territorial government. Territorial communities, all 39 in my riding, are essentially in a pre-industrialized area. They do not have the kinds of opportunities that southern communities have. They do not have the same opportunities when it comes to businesses and the infrastructure that is needed. They do not have the opportunities to pick and choose the kinds of services that are contracted and the kinds of goods that are imported and bought. It is all very costly for the people in the north.

Turning to the need for economic security and the need for public infrastructure, all the while with high regard for the environment, and the need to settle some rather major land questions that have gone by the wayside, the Government of the Northwest Territories is fully cognizant of how it should in fact relate to the Financial Administration Act.

In the information released by the Auditor General, it was clearly stated that land use planning in the Northwest Territories had expended millions and millions of dollars, yet there was no clear mandate or policy expressed by the federal government for this particular area. This is something that is totally negligent and unacceptable.

There are other areas to which I should refer. When we talk about the collection of debts on behalf of the government, they say not to make specific reference to taxes, but in my particular area there is a mechanism called grants in lieu of taxes. In this particular area there are communities which have been saddled with debts that have accumulated.

The collector is no longer the federal government but municipalities. Municipalities have been imposed upon and have been asked to be the tax collector. This is quite unfair. This is something that many of the communities are grappling with. Many of the groups are small communities that have never had a tax base.

When you live in a harsh climate where you do not have an appreciation of your property, you do not have adequate infrastructure and you do not have the kinds of goods and services that would warrant that kind of a tax base, it is somewhat of a gradual transition for those people to get accustomed to what used to be referred to as a grant in lieu of taxes situation. The federal government used to be able to give those communities grants as almost an approach of forgiveness for those taxes that were accumulated by those particular residents. Now that responsibility has been turned over.

In terms of the Financial Administration Act, there is a gradual move with the increased responsibilities that the territorial government is taking on toward it taking over the responsibility for being more accountable.

There has been a number of financial arrangements. The territorial government used to have what I think was termed vote 4 moneys, and it was required to do a very strict accounting. One example was the French language services that were going to be introduced in the Northwest Territories. That particular financing arrangement for the vote 4 moneys was done on an annual basis. It was a very cumbersome process which needed to be overhauled.

In terms of the Financial Administration Act, if we want to have delivery of services in those particular areas and to have those particular programs meet their legal obligations, just last week the N.W.T. Act had to be amended because we could not meet the requirements set under the Official Languages Act to translate all the bills and statutes. Therefore I think that a more practical and a more reasonable approach has to be taken rather than an annual funding arrangement. What has to be engaged in is a multi-year operational program for French language services.

In conjunction with that we also have another area of concern. In 1984 the GNWT had a $16 million grant given to it for the introduction of French language services as a trade-off for the aboriginal languages of $16 million. What has happened with that is that it is coming to an end. After they have in fact reprofiled the unspent moneys and that time has expired, we will need to renew this particular commitment because it has become a world-class model for indigenous languages and the way the services have been expressed in terms of the use of the money responsibly under the Financial Administration Acts per se. It is a model, something that the federal government should be proud of and something that the territorial government is proud of.

It is definitely something that is worth the investment. I think it has been worth every penny that the federal government has put into it and has been managed very responsibly. There have been people who have gone in to appraise that work, and I think it will stand the test of time and stand the test of responsibility.

I have a number of other points, if you will bear with me, Mr. Speaker, in the area of transportation. As I indicated, we are off the transportation grid. I hear some very pleasant rumours that perhaps the government is reconsidering the area that is going to have to cancel its medivacs because of a lack of air safety and a communications budget of $35,000. I am sure the government does not want to consider putting a dollar value on the lives of my constituents and those northerners who should be afforded the dignity and the right of travelling safely, especially when there are no other ways of travelling than by air.

Another point in terms of communications is that it was very sadly regretted by many of the air industry officials that the Weather North Program was cancelled. This was a program that was headed up by CBC. It was very much valued by many airline industry officials in the north. It was $400,000, and I must say that investment was worth everything to the people who have to travel and work under the most adverse conditions.

I would say, just as a last statement, that in the area of tourism, in the area of the high cost of travel, and in the area of small businesses any kind of assistance that the federal government could give to the reality of the future of the north will be felt. It would be one of continuing to support the north and continuing to invest in the north.

Canada is a northern country, and that northern country is truly actualized in what exists beyond the 60th parallel. The government has to take a second look and continue its commitment to put money into the transportation strategy as proposed by the Government of the Northwest Territories, to reinstate the Weather North Program, to put money into air safety, and to invest in tourism initiatives which make Canada truly a northern country. So I say to the rest of Canada and to the government that every Canadian and every part of Canada must be given an equal chance to participate fully in our country. The north must not be economically marginalized when it comes to the Financial Administration Act. I think you will know in years past that the N.W.T. was essentially punished for having a surplus. They were fiscally responsible, they managed their money well, and they set priorities in a way that was quite responsible.

Having just come back from the Yukon, I would say that another area where perhaps the government could express a bit of latitude is the kind of moneys that it puts forward for the implementation of the Yukon land claims. The people in the Yukon would like to have some say about how an implementation plan for their land claims is expressed. Right now they have a working group that works from the top down and expresses perhaps what they feel the communities need because they do not have the resources to go to the community and to express and perhaps extract from the people at the grass roots level what it is they want in an implementation plan.

Perhaps the federal government could express a bit of latitude and generosity of heart in allowing those people to truly define from the grassroots level. The Canadian public at large is calling for participation at the grassroots level. Perhaps this is an opportunity for the government to make a symbolic gesture in both territories to adequately fund these people. I think they will know that under the Financial Administration Act these people are very responsible and very accountable.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments by the hon. member for Western Arctic. I would like to take a few minutes to draw an analogy, to compare her constituency with mine, the riding of Manicouagan, which extends nearly 700 miles along the coast of the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where over three-quarters of the villages and the people who live there are not connected by roads. The only means of transportation is by plane during most of the year and by ship in the summer. There is also the northern part of my riding which borders on both shores of Ungava Bay, where Inuit communities have been living since time immemorial, and there again, communications are extremely difficult.

I must say that I can identify with her comments and her description of the difficult conditions under which many of her constituents were living. This is a situation our government is trying to correct with every means at its disposal.

[English]

Would my colleague from Western Arctic agree with me that the best way to assure proper financial intervention by the federal government in all aspects she talked about, such as providing additional sums and means for the population in the northern region and remote areas such as in her riding and in my riding, the proper way to ensure that the government can intervene is through sound management of the financial assets that the federal government has. By managing properly, money that the taxpayers of this country provide to the government will enable provision of additional financial means to the people and to the area she just talked about, an area that we both represent.

Does she agree with me that Bill C-91 is a modest way to go in the direction she talked about? I am sure she would want to support this bill and other measures that this government has taken, is taking, and will take in the future to better manage the taxpayers' money, so that it can distribute more wisely and more equitably the sums of money the federal government has.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member opposite for his question. It is a rare day that I am able to compare notes with members opposite who agree, to any extent, on any issue that I bring forward. I am quite happy to hear that we have in common, I guess, the remoteness of our communities in terms of transportation and communication. The sad part is that those services need to be met. I cannot speak for the communities of the hon. member opposite and the jurisdiction that he comes from, but I have to say that I know that the territorial government has been very responsible.

The territorial government has acted quite responsibly under the Financial Administration Act. Essentially, their budget has been cut back because they had a surplus. They were very cautious not to overspend their budget. There is no way under any fiscal arrangement that the territorial government would be deemed to be irresponsible.

As I indicated, as of April 1, 1990 the new formula financing agreement that went into effect is, over the next five years, going to cut back the N.W.T.'s budget by $110 million. In light of their needs, because of their remoteness from prime North American markets and from southern centres that offer a better price for service and product, they are going to be punished. They are not going to be rewarded for being responsible. This does not mean that I wish them to be irresponsible. Under any arrangement, the government and the jurisdiction that I come from have been extremely responsible.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak for the second time today. After the break we had two weeks ago, I guess I thirsted for the battle. I am getting my fill today.

It is a good day to get up and speak on this bill, which is primarily a housekeeping bill. It enacts very technical changes and requirements to the Financial Administration Act. Before I start my speech, the hon. member opposite who just asked the last question, asked my colleague from Western Arctic a question. What he was looking for were some bouquets on the government's financial management ability of the fiscal resources of the nation. He might have been fishing in the wrong direction. I cannot say that this piece of legislation is bad. It is a technical piece of legislation. It tightens up some loopholes. There are a few things I find terribly wrong with it. I will deal with that because it reflects an error in policy direction that the government has taken.

The hon. member opposite asked my colleague from Western Arctic whether or not she thought that this government had made some modest steps towards proper financial accountability and proper management with the fiscal resources of the nation. I would like to put a case forward to prove that it is not just technical amendments to law that indicates what should be a benchmark of whether or not a government is fiscally managing itself properly, but other things like ACOA. ACOA is an agency that is not directly dealt with in this bill. The bill deals with Crown corporations and the like. I want to talk about ACOA and by doing so, perhaps I will answer my hon. colleague's question.

ACOA is a Crown corporation. It has a budget of $1.05 billion. When it was created, it was supposed to be new money. In a subsequent budget about a year ago, the Minister of Finance indicated that in the area of fiscal responsibility, the government was going to extend the mandate of ACOA from five to seven years, which effectively is a 20 per cent cut. It could not get the word cut out of their lips, although everyone who looked at the amendments or the changes knew that it meant that Atlantic Canada, over that five-year period, would have 20 per cent less money to spend on economic development. Over and over, in my previous capacity as regional development critic and the critic for ACOA, I would ask the minister responsible for some accounting of how he and his officials were spending that $1.05 billion.

Repeatedly we got bafflegab and every type of distortion and diatribe so that the questions would not be answered.

Here is a case in point, a company called NSC Diesel. It was funded through ACOA. That is taxpayers' money. Do you want to talk about accountability? I asked the minister, many times, questions on NSC Diesel. Before it even got the superstructure up on its building, it went belly up and left dozens of small contractors on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia owed literally millions of dollars.

I could not get any answers from the government on financial accountability. I figured that since it was funded with public money and since it did not seem to have a market, the public had a right to know how that project got funded.

I had to go to the unusual length of asking the Auditor General, since the ministers on the front benches refused to answer. For goodness sakes, the government should have a look at whether or not this project was properly approved and whether or not there is some financial management accountability in the system.

In his report the Auditor General said that the project in question, which may end up costing taxpayers in this country over $10 million and probably cause the bankruptcy of a whole number of small firms on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia, was approved outside the program criteria. The ACOA offices in Atlantic Canada did not do the proper evaluation of the project.

Where is the accountability, I will ask my friend opposite. Where is the accountability in a system like that? Mr. Speaker, if you are asking for examples, or if you want to put forward examples of technical accountability or strengthening the laws, perhaps this bill addresses them.

The true question that has to be answered is why is this government not accountable for the way it spends the money of the people of Canada? An example would be the NSC Diesel fiasco for which the minister should have resigned and for which there should have been a full and complete police investigation. Perhaps we will have that yet.

There are a couple of points that need to be raised concerning this piece of legislation. I want to speak to some specific issues. I am going to start off at the back end of the bill and work my way forward. I want to talk about clause 40.

Clause 40 causes me great concern. We have a history in this country of equalization and of understanding that the country cannot be run as a business. It has to be run as a nation.

In order to run a country as vast and as great as Canada and have equity put in the system, it sometimes costs money. Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, you have to invest in infrastructure and admit that there is a cost for producing equity in this country, no matter where you live.

Mr. Speaker, if you live in Atlantic Canada you still have the right for quality health care. If you live in British Columbia, you should still have access to post-secondary educational institutions. We have entrenched in our Constitution the great liberal principle of equalization. It is there. It is what has made the country great.

Clause 40 tampers with the right of this Parliament to debate fundamental changes and directions in dealing with some Crown corporations.

I want to quote what it is going to do. Clause 40 effectively is going to do the following. It would effectively require commercial Crown corporations, those listed in Schedule III, Part II of the FAA, which operate in a competitive environment and not ordinarily dependent on appropriations for operating purposes, to incorporate dividend planning in its annual corporate plan.

In itself, that does not seem like a bad idea. If it is making money, it should put in its corporate plan that it expects to make money, and account for those revenues.

The bill goes a little further and says that the Governor in Council would be empowered to set, waive or vary dividend payments for any schedule Crown corporation.

There is something fundamentally wrong here. What happens if, by Order in Council—which means a cabinet decision—it decides to have incredible user fees or a very high dividend from a Crown corporation like Ports Canada. This would decrease the effectiveness of Ports Canada to be a competitive alternative to ports on the U.S. seaboard.

Look at the port of Halifax.

The Port of Halifax is responsible for nearly $750 million worth of activity in the economy of Atlantic Canada and, more particularly, in the Halifax-Dartmouth area. Ports Canada is fighting for its life against subsidized activity from the port of New York and from rail lines like the D and H, which Canadian Pacific recently acquired. It will be able to draw goods currently destined for the central Canadian market away from Canadian ports and draw them in through the U.S. and up through the Atlantic Seaboard with a line like D and H.

That Crown corporation is there for a reason. That Crown corporation is there because previous governments have decided that the ports of Canada were a national resource that should be operated by a national government. This government has changed all that. As I said a little earlier, the government does not understand. It thinks that everything has to turn a profit and, if it does not, it is bad and it has to be dismantled and thrown out.

We have seen what a few years of that kind of policy has done. This country has never, ever, faced the crossroads of confidence that it faces today, because this government does not understand national unity and it does not understand the important role of national infrastructuring in keeping the country together.

The Port of Halifax is facing incredible competition from the ports in New York and New Jersey. There is no question that when the inter-state trade commission of the United States was examining the application by the Canadian Pacific Railway to acquire the bankrupt D and H line, which will be able to take goods right from the Port of Halifax straight up to the Quebec border, a short-cut route for Canada-destined goods to get in through the United States, one of the largest shippers going into the Port of Halifax with containerized traffic indicated that it supported this application. It gave it an alternate and cheaper route for cargo going to the central part of Canada.

What does the Canadian government do? It forgets about the mandate of Canada Ports Corporation and, in the last budget, demanded that there be a dividend paid. This, at the very time that the people who are running the Port of Halifax have been doing everything but lying in the middle of the Macdonald Bridge and screaming to get the attention of the government that it is going to lose its competitive edge in trying to attract or keep container-based traffic going to the central part of Canada.

What does the government do? It forgets the mandate. It does not come to Parliament. It says in a budget that Ports Canada is going to have to pay a dividend. It forgets that it is there to do a job. It takes the money that Ports Canada needs to upgrade facilities, such as those at the Port of Halifax, and it says it has to be given to the government as a profit. The government takes the ability of the Port of Halifax and other ports to plan properly and, when they are efficient and make money, to have that money in reserve to reinvest.

I read here in Clause 40 of the bill that that may not be the case. The dividends that will be forced upon some of these Crown corporations can be made by a bunch of the guys and a few of the ladies who are on the opposite side, in the Cabinet, sitting down and deciding: "Well, I guess we blew it again. I guess the budgets that we had, the projections that we had for spending, went out the window again. We need an extra $100 million. Where are we going to go? I know, Ports Canada. Tell them they do not need $100 million this year. Tell them we need $200 million."

Before long, the debate that should take place in the House about the fundamental change in direction and philosophy of those Crown corporations will be muted and the government will be able, by that simple tool of Order in Council, that undemocratic tool, perhaps to dismantle even more of the national infrastructure and to do even more damage, not just to the economy of regions such as Atlantic Canada, but also to national unity. These are the underpinnings of national unity and anybody opposite who thinks they are not is crazy.

There are one or two other things I want to deal with. One of these, my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso dealt with and it is not a small issue. I hope that there are a whole lot of people out there watching, who have faith in their local fire departments. I hope that they are watching us as we speak.

I think it is Clause 6 which deals with user fees. Mr. Speaker, the government is absolutely crazed. It says: "Turn a profit, turn a profit, turn a profit." It does not matter what it shuts down, just turn a profit.

Let us not forget that it raised more personal income tax, I think 24 per cent or 27 per cent more, in the first half of this year than last year. By God, it is milking taxes out of us like we are a cow, an engorged cow. It just squeezes, squeezes, squeezes. It gets more and more cash. That is all it wants. It is so ashamed of what it has done on taxation that it has to find new ways to tax, and a tax is a tax is a tax. No matter how it takes it from someone's pocket, it is still taking it. But, it is dealing with something pretty dangerous here in user fees.

In 1986 the government changed the Telecommunications Act. The minister at the time was the former member for Kingston and the Islands, a former Cape Bretoner. I read the debates. There was a great debate, even in the Tory caucus, and the debate still goes on. It tells me that there are still a few people over there who are close to their constituents, not many, but a few. The minister at the time in the debate answered a question from the then member from South West Nova, who is now sitting in the other place as a senator. He was defeated by a Liberal, like most of those people were in Atlantic Canada at least. She said in response to a question from the former member from South West Nova that volunteer fire departments would be exempted. I do not have to embellish it. It is right there in the record. She said they would be exempted from those new licence fees.

What did the government do? It waited until it got another term in government and then it nailed the very organizations in communities, the people of which give of their time freely and risk their life and limb and security to ensure that the public safety and security is being looked after. I am talking about volunteer firemen, for goodness sake. What did it do? This government, to milk a few more dollars, has gone after volunteer fire departments with unconscionable licence fees. Volunteer fire departments are not Liberal, Tories or NDPers. They are people in the communities and they feel very diminished. The minister opposite is nodding, and I hope he can tell his colleagues in cabinet that they should change this foolishness.

On user fees, the government would even hit volunteer fire departments. This means that in some cases there is over a 1000 per cent increase in the fee. A volunteer fire department, whether in Eastern Passage in my riding, or in any other ridings all over the country, has to raise its money. It gets a little bit of a fee from the municipality, but it has to hold bean suppers and fall fairs so that it can purchase equipment to protect the people in the community. What the government does is say work a little harder because it is going to charge a licence fee for every piece of communications equipment they have, not just one fee to cover the fire department, every single fee.

We started a petition drive. Every fire department in the country that I have been in touch with has indicated that these fees are not only regressive, but that they have been misled. In 1986, a very honourable member, the former member for Kingston and the Islands, said, as reported in Hansard, that the volunteer fire departments would be exempt. Again, because of user fees, the government thinks it can go in because there is nothing sacred. It does not matter if there is a fire department in some far-flung reach of this great nation that may have to forgo purchasing a new piece of equipment. Do not forget that they do not have bank accounts. They have to raise their money. Mostly, volunteer fire departments are in poor municipalities. These people are doing their part. For God's sake, the least the government can do with user fees is keep its hands out of their pockets.

I have talked to members opposite who have said the same thing. If there is one thing that the government could do to show that it has a little bit of compassion and understands how the country operates and the important contribution of volunteers like firemen and firewomen right across the country, is to say it made a mistake. It should live by the word and the commitment of the former Minister of Communications and withdraw those fees. That is what it should do.

Every fireman, fire department or individual watching this tonight should write to their member of Parliament and tell them that. More particularly, they should write to the ministers on the front benches. It is one of those small things when you talk about user fees. It is easy to say it will only cost a few bucks. But when looking at the potential damage to get that few extra bucks, it could be a little bit more financially responsible and ingenious on that side of the House. The few dollars the government will pick up on that may result in a slower response to an emergency in a community. It should withdraw the fee. That is why I have a little bit of a problem with the user fees.

I used to think that democracy worked in a certain way, that no matter if a government came in with a piece of legislation, if it saw that for whatever reason there was a flaw in it, it would change it. The government has developed a siege mentality when it comes to this type of initiative and it simply will not do it.

We on this side of the House are going to continue. I will be up every day, if I have to, presenting petitions from volunteer fire departments until the government comes to its senses and realizes there are certain things that cannot be touched and cannot be milked from the country because of its financial irresponsibility and mismanagement.

The last thing deals with transportation and infrastructure generally, user fees again. We have seen the government, with its quest for the bottom line, dismantle many pieces of the national infrastructure. Well, we do not all live in a Toronto, or Hamilton, or Vancouver, or even Halifax. Some of us have to live in other beautiful parts of the country where we do not perhaps have infrastructure that supports itself.

I talked a little bit earlier about the principle of equalization. It is enshrined in our Constitution—it is there. It means that the government, the people in the country, believe that we have to make level playing-fields, that there is a cost in keeping this nation together. It does not mean that we squander our money, but it means that we recognize that there is a cost and that we budget for it.

The government is now toying with full recovery fees, full implementation of cost recovery in the air transportation sector. Well, Mr. Speaker, do you know what that means? If we want to talk about destroying national unity, here is what it means. I am reading from a document from Air Nova in Atlantic Canada. I hope you will be a little patient because this is pretty important. It states that under full implementation of cost recovery, Halifax will be the most expensive of the nine major airports in the country. For example, a Dash-8 landing in Halifax will have to pay a fee of $121.60. The same Dash-8 landing in Vancouver, because it is a larger airport with more traffic, pays $37.60. A Boeing 747 landing in Halifax will cost $2,675.20. The same 747 landing in Toronto is $616.

This government has gone bonkers. It is going to try to implement full user fees, forgetting the fact that this is a regional economy, that we have many regions here, and it is going to try to take the levelling effect out of many of the user fees that we have in this country. It is going to pull another spike out of the track of national unity. Eventually, it will have Canadians so distraught at the way it has mismanaged us that, when it comes to the next great national unity debate, it will be hard to muster the forces in many parts of the country because of this government's financial mismanagement plan.

I could speak for days about what the government is doing, but suffice it to say that I will be on my feet again to complete my speech under another piece of legislation.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Dartmouth. I had trouble accepting some of the points he raised, especially when he claimed that the Government of Canada should spend certain amounts of money and transfer amounts hither and thither. My impression is that he would want the government to do all this without considering its ability to pay or the taxpayers' ability to pay.

Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that Canada has a very substantial cumulative deficit which we must start paying off as soon as possible. If we don't, and if we don't succeed in putting into place various ways to control government spending and bring down the deficit, the equalization principle mentioned by the hon. member will be a commitment this government will no longer be able to meet because it will not have the money to do so. There will not be enough money to do this, and Canadians of course will not have the ability to pay.

To get back to his comment on user fees, I think the hon. member would agree that a great deal can be done in this area. Obviously, the government must try to recover the costs of infrastructures, whether we are talking about marine facilities, airports or other areas where it is entirely normal that users should pay a certain amount of money.

We can question the amounts, we can question the tariffs and we can question the principle according to which the prices are set. However, I think the principle that users should contribute to the cost of infrastructures put in place by taxpayers is a universally recognized principle that should help, on the basis of revenue the government will raise, to absorb the costs of these infrastructures and maintain them in proper condition.

So I think the hon. member should have the honesty and common sense to admit that the principle of charging users certain amounts for the infrastructures made available to them by taxpayers is a fair principle and a sound one, and aside from the amounts to be charged and the tariffs to be set, I think the hon. member will agree that the principle of charging users certain amounts for public infrastructures should be acknowledged and maintained.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I certainly do realize that in some cases the government has to be efficient. Let us be fair. This government came into office and all was going to be wonderful in la-la land the day after it got in. It is finding out that that is not the easiest thing to do.

Mr. Milliken: Six years later and it is worse.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Six years later is much worse, as my colleague for Kingston and the Islands said.

The member opposite wants to talk about fairness. I will give him a little lesson from his own books about fairness. We witnessed on Friday the government coming in, saying that first of all it needed more money and it was going to trim bucks from all over the place, but it was going to be fair.

I want to tell you how fair they are going to be, Mr. Speaker. They came into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, that quasi accountable agency that I referred to earlier, and do you know what the government did? It took about $650,000 from administration. Okay. Maybe it is going to have to do a little better with a little less money.

The government went over to the Western Diversification Fund which is the agency to deliver regional development in the west, like ACOA is the agency to deliver regional development to business and business assistance in the east. What did it do? It took $20 million in deferred grants and contributions from ACOA and did not take one penny in deferred grants and contributions from the Western Diversification Fund.

What the member opposite has to understand is that you cannot go about abusing the trust and misusing the resources that this country has and treat one part of your family differently than another part of your family. If the cuts are to be effected, then it should have effected it across the board. There should not be one member from Atlantic Canada on the Tory benches, not one member opposite who agrees that any part of the country, be it east or west, should suffer more under government cuts.

Do you know what they are saying opposite, Mr. Speaker? A great nationalist that I am, I believe everybody in this country should be treated equally. I guess I squeal a little bit when I see people from my part of the country who had the good sense to vote Liberal getting the boot from this government every time it comes in with its fiscal knife.

An hon. member: Howard is laughing.

An hon. member: Howard is laughing at us.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The member for Halifax West is laughing. But the member for Halifax West also laughed when I raised in the House the problems about the decreased competitiveness for the port of Halifax. He also laughed when we held up the strike-breaking legislation that his government brought in against the ships' crews and he also laughed when our party supported the end of a wage inequity through regional rates of pay for dockyard workers. That member will be laughing on the other side of his face the next time the electors have a chance to deal with him.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague for Dartmouth with a great deal of interest. I think he has expressed quite well the plight in which this government has placed Atlantic Canada. It is absolutely devastating to our economy, this idea of complete cost recovery of all government expenditures.

I fully expect that this is not the end of it. I think we have an awful lot of user pay without it being designated as user pay. One example of this is in small craft harbours where this government is ignoring the plight of the fishermen in allowing the wharves which the fishermen need so desperately to fall into disrepair. Also, they are not doing any dredging in the small harbours.

That is not only a question of hurting the fishing industry, but it is also a question of allowing the silt to fill in the mouths of the harbours so that in rough weather fishermen cannot re-enter their harbours. They are in the position of being at risk of their lives out in the Atlantic Ocean.

Also, this government is actually diverting business away from the ports of Halifax and Saint John by refusing to put into place the repairs to infrastructure needed for Canadian National and actually encouraging Canadian cargo to be shipped into New York and transported by train from New York to Montreal and Toronto.

I would like to ask the hon. member, because he has spoken about this often, to comment on these and give us his interpretation as to whether these are as damaging to Atlantic Canada as I believe or whether I am being an alarmist in this regard.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, somebody who has stood up over and over again not just for the people of his riding but for all the people of Atlantic Canada and for a vision of this country where equality of opportunity exists no matter where you live.

In response, I think this government has no sense of where it is going. It rules from the centre. It rules for the centre and rules to where the numbers are at. That means that if you can withdraw fiscal support to create a level playing field in places like Atlantic Canada, so be it. If it means that you can pit one part of Canada, east against west, you do it because all the Conservatives are concerned about is pleasing their buddies down on Bay Street and they do not know the first thing about national unity or the role that national infrastructure like railways, ports and small craft harbours play in keeping this great country together.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to participate in this debate today because I noticed the President of the Treasury Board on his hind legs this morning telling us about the virtues of Bill C-91. I thought that it was appropriate to indicate some of the disasters.

I note that the bill is an act to amend the Financial Administration Act. Really, for this government to introduce a bill that has to do with good administration was an incredible sight. We had the minister standing there telling us how much more efficient this bill was going to make the government. Well, anything would be an improvement. There is no doubt about that. I have grave doubts though. When the minister talks about efficiency, he talks about nothing more than gouging and screwing tax dollars out of Canadians, which this government has shown itself to be so good at.

Mr. Worthy: Be positive. Don't be so mean spirited.

Mr. Milliken: The parliamentary secretary suggests that perhaps I am being mean spirited. I suggest that is not the case. The minister beamed and smiled his way through his presentation. He did very well, considering the material he had to work with. I suggest that what we have to do with this bill is have a good long look at it and look at the very bad administration that Canadians have been treated to under this government.

I want to turn to the supplementary estimates which the minister tabled the other day because I think they reveal something of the ability of this government to administer—

Mr. Sobeski: Is this a point of privilege or debate?

Mr. Milliken: If the hon. member listens for a moment, I think he will enjoy these comments. Page 32 of the supplementary estimates has some of the costs of the goods and services tax which this government is applying to Canadians. It is establishing a goods and services tax consumer information office. If you do a little arithmetic, Mr. Speaker, not complicated, a little arithmetic, you can see that they are hiring 20 new people, 20 person years are authorized. If you divide that into the amount of money for personnel that is shown in the estimates you get an average salary of $54,150 per annum for those individuals. That sounds a little high, but I will come back to that.

If we turn to page 84 the hon. member will see that in the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, 1,163 lucky Canadians are going to be hired as tax police to enforce the new goods and services tax at an average salary according to these estimates of $41,490. You will notice that is down a little from the previous group that is working with the corporations.

Then if you look across the page you will see in the Taxation Division of National Revenue they are preparing and planning for pre-payment of the tax credits. In other words, this is the group that hands the money out to Canadians that we are all supposed to be so thankful for. The average salary of the 642 people being hired in that department is $33,124. Why would it be so much lower for the individuals who are going to pay out the revenue to Canadians, the great bonanza that they are getting back, than for the ones who are going to gouge and screw the tax out of Canadians? I know why. The government is more interested in getting the money than it is in paying it out. Why pay someone a lot of money to give money back to Canadians? Pay it to get it out of them. That is the priority of this government. That is what it means about better administration under the Financial Administration Act.

If that is not enough to convince the hon. member, he can turn to page 100 of the estimates. There we have the people who are actually going to send the cheques. "Preparation and planning for the prepayment of the GST credit to taxpayers", that is the people who actually write the cheques, I presume, in the Supply and Services Department, since that is where cheques are issued. The average salary there is the lowest yet. They are expecting to hire 45 people for this work at an average salary of $31,471. In other words, who are the highest paid in this group? The ones who are advising the corporations, the ones who are in the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department to advise the corporations, presumably, on how to make their tax payments most efficiently. They are being paid the most. Then we go to the Department of National Revenue where they actually go around and tax police and gouge Canadians for their money. They are going to be paid the second highest. The ones who make the refunds are the lowest paid on the totem pole.

I ask the hon. member to ask the minister for details on this. I am sure the minister would be more than happy to fill him in on how many senior bureaucrats are going to be hired at higher salaries in the upper end of the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department. Take a look at the figures. I urge the hon. member to read the Supplementary Estimates. Perhaps he will find that he agrees with my analysis of this situation and will realize that when the President of the Treasury Board talks about better administration, what he is talking about is screwing more money out of Canadians.

I was happy to receive a press release recently from business leaders. This came from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Business Council. I know that the minister got a copy too. These business leaders all called on Ottawa and the provinces to curb spending. These people were simply appalled at this government's spending record, its out-of-control budget deficits, its inability to do anything effectively to control the deficit.

Some of these people may like the GST, but the bulk of the small businessmen who I know in Canada are dead set against this tax. The hon. member knows that too. If he were doing his job, he would be filing petitions from his constituents who are signing them by the hundred and who are, I have no doubt, opposing this tax. He should not sit there worrying about whether these people are opposed to the GST. They are opposed to the tax. Over 80 per cent of the population is opposed to this tax. I will give that fact to the hon. member. If he were listening to the 80 per cent of Canadians who are, he would be up voting against this tax, and sitting on this side of the House with his former colleagues who have had the good sense to get out of the Progressive Conservative Party and sit on this side of the House.

I turn to the allegation of the minister this morning that this bill is supposed to be good for Canadians. He said that it would be good for Canada because it would make the government more efficient. I want to look at some of the evidence of the government's efficiency over the past few years. I have a calculation that I did from the Public Accounts of Canada. I thought that we might usefully see what kind of increases in taxes Canadians have had to face in the last few years.

Doing a year-on-year comparison of the increases in revenue, I was able to determine that from 1984-85, or in the 1985 financial year, there was a 10 per cent increase in revenue in the Government of Canada. 1985 was the first big Tory year. It was the first year after that disastrous election in 1984 that crippled the Canadian economy.

I can remember the Diefenbaker government. I remember and I am sure hon. members opposite will agree with me that it was probably the worst government Canada had ever had up until that time. Everyone acknowledges that the Diefenbaker government was a complete disaster for Canada.

The only one that I can imagine is worse is the present one. These figures bear that out. For 1984-1985 revenue increased 10 per cent, that is 1985 over 1984; the next year, an 8 per cent increase; the next year, 11 per cent; the next year, a 13 per cent increase; the next year, 6 per cent; and this year, 1990 over 1989, it is projected at 9 per cent.

That is the kind of revenue increases we have had under this government. We have indicated it has increased taxes over 31 times, and now think what it is going to be like under the GST. Think what it will be like under the GST. And here the minister is concerned about efficiency—

Mr. Sobeski: You'll have no room on your credit card.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says he has no room on the credit card. That is because the government has failed to live up to its responsibilities and its promises. That is the reason for it, and he knows it, and he should get this government out at the earliest opportunity.

Now we could turn to the percentage change in personal income tax and corporate tax revenue. Let us look at the personal income tax changes over this period, that is the amount of revenue the government derived from that source. In 1984–1985, that is the 1985 year over 1984, revenue from personal income taxes went up 8 per cent; the next year, 12 per cent; the next year, 14 per cent; the next year, 19 per cent—19 per cent in one year, Mr. Speaker. In 1989 over 1988 we have the big decrease. It only went up by 2 per cent.

Guess what? Maybe there was an election. Maybe it reduced taxes because there was an election. Is that possible? I would not have thought this government would be that politically motivated, yet it appears that is what might have happened. From 1989 to 1990, that is this year over last year, because of the tax increases and the recent budget, 12 per cent. Is that not an extraordinary story: 8, 12, 14, 19, election year 2, and the next year 12. That is what this government has been doing to Canadians. It has been fiddling around with the public accounts, the taxes, and so on, in order to make things easy for Canadians when it is time to re-elect it but darn difficult in all the years in between. That is what has been going on.

The corporate tax increases reflect a similar pattern but not the same. The first year, 1985 over 1984, there was a 28 per cent increase. It must have been a profitable year for the corporations. The next year it was 2 per cent; the next year, 7 per cent; the next year, 10 per cent; the next year, the election one, 7 per cent; the next one, 11 per cent. Modest increases by comparison. Compound them and I will bet you will find they are lower, and indeed all the figures suggest exactly that.

What this government means by saying that it wants to make financial administration of the government more efficient is that it wants to get more money out of Canadians for more things. You can look at the act. You will see that it applies interest on all kinds of obligations that citizens have to the government. It enables the government to use a collection agency so it will be more efficient in collecting money from Canadians and in collecting arrears of taxes. That is the purpose of this bill. Let us not kid around.

While we will say that some of the changes are quite laudable and probably worth while, the fact is this government is a real pro when it comes to squeezing money out of Canadians and failing to deliver on the return side.

The other thing I thought was important and interesting as I perused this little bill the government has introduced was the fact that it left something out. We all know that this government has shown repeated, continuous contempt for this institution. It is showing it in the other place this very day, I have no doubt. I do not know what has happened down there this afternoon, but I am sure that the Conservative majority and its puppet, the Speaker, is busy doing what it can to deprive the opposition in that House of an opportunity to debate this bill. I suggest that what is going on there is another indication of the contempt this government shows for Parliament.

We saw it before because of course government members got into a mess when they called Parliament back after the 1989 election for two weeks and then decided that rather than face the music in this House they would help themselves to the public money by Governor General's special warrants. They abused these warrants in a way they had never been used before in Canada, by grabbing billions of dollars out of the public Treasury by warrant between sessions of Parliament, something that had never happened in this country before on anything like that scale and which I submit—and I submitted it at the time—was entirely improper, so much so that I felt I should—

Mr. Sobeski: You lost the debate.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, I did, because I was overruled by a large majority in this House. That is why I lost this debate; not because there was any element of fairness. The Speaker said that he would not rule on the issue.

When it was raised in committee, the Conservative majority in the committee silenced the issue very promptly. The hon. member for Halifax West was there. He ranted and raved. He said that I was being partisan in raising the issue. It was a completely improper use of the authority granted to cabinet and to the Governor General under the Financial Administration Act, this very Act that we are now seeking to amend.

Wonderful thing. Mr. Speaker, you look through this Act in vain for any change to the provision relating to the use of Governor General special warrants. I would have thought the government might want to put some restriction on its future misconduct in this field, because I suspect we are about to see its misuse again before too long in spite of the grumbles from the hon. member for Halifax West.

I know this subject is a sore point with him. I believe he has some considerable experience in legal matters. I am sure he understands perfectly the arguments that I made in respect of those Governor General's warrants. I expect he agrees with every argument I made that in fact there was a flagrant abuse by the government of the use of those means of obtaining public money. It helped itself to the Treasury in a way that was completely unprecedented and wrong.

I introduced a private member's bill, Bill C-211, which sought to restrict the use of Governor General's special warrants. That bill is still sitting on the Order Paper. I am optimistic, as I am sure Your Honour is, that sooner or later it will be drawn in the famous draw that takes place every few weeks in Private Members' Business. Maybe we will get to discuss it in this House some day.

In the meantime, I would have thought that the government might have incorporated my amendment, or something like it, in Bill C-91. I went through the bill and I was dismayed to see not a word or mention of any change to section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, which might have corrected these bad habits on the part of the government.

It could easily have made it unlawful for it to do what I submit is improper and unlawful, that is, to abuse these warrants the way it has. Yet the amendment is not there.

I would invite the hon. member for Halifax West, who I know agrees with me in this regard, to raise this matter in caucus on Wednesday morning and see if he cannot get the minister to agree to an amendment to Bill C-91 so that we can fix this mess up now and not have a recurrence of the disastrous events of early 1989.

I can say that if the minister is worried about the amendment to the bill, I would be happy to have my bill read for the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the legislative committee with Bill C-91. The amendment could be incorporated into the bill. I do not want to claim pride of authorship. I am not worried about that. I just want the law fixed.

I know hon. members opposite would be more than happy to ensure that their government did not act improperly or wrongly again, because it must have been a very embarrassing day for the hon. member for Halifax West and others to have to vote with the government when the government had acted with such obvious impropriety.

I submit what we have in this case is a bill that the government has introduced with one purpose in mind: To get more money from you, from me, and from the Canadian taxpayer. What it wants to be able to do—and the minister said it this morning—is collect money more efficiently. It wants to be able to manage the accounts of Canada more efficiently.

He made some reference to the fact that this would help the Auditor General and made a few other what I could only describe as pious utterances, to try to make the bill more palatable. It really is—and I think a quick glance through the provisions of the bill indicates that—an attempt to get more money out of Canadians in a faster, more direct, and perhaps more simple manner for the government.

I submit that while perhaps that is a laudable aim, it is not particularly a fair one for Canadians. We will want to examine the provisions of this bill on a clause by clause basis when the bill gets referred to the legislative committee.

I think the other part of the equation that I did not mention earlier is important. I talked about the increase in revenue, but I neglected to talk about the increase in expenditures. The businessmen who issued the communique I referred to a moment ago, the joint statement on the national economy from the Chamber of Commerce, among others, mentioned that spending was out of control. I have some figures to show just how much spending went up in the course of time.

The only reason I did not mention them was because the spending did not go up as fast as the revenue did. The revenue increases have been fairly astronomic, as the House has heard. Expenditures were a little more modest. I say a little more modest: 13 per cent the first year, 1 per cent the next, 4 per cent, 7 per cent, 5 per cent, and 7 per cent. So, you can hear, Mr. Speaker, that they are lower than the revenue.

The revenue, of course, is the taxes we are all paying, but it did not cut—

Mr. Sobeski: What was it for the election year?

Mr. Milliken: No, no. It was 7 per cent the year before. The hon. member will be glad to know it was one of the highest.

I should also tell the hon. member that the national debt increased fairly significantly throughout this year. In fact we all know it doubled; 22 per cent in the first year, 16 per in the second, 12 per cent in the third, 10 per cent in the fourth, 9.9 per cent in the fifth, and 8.8 per cent in the sixth.

Mr. Sobeski: It is getting smaller.

Mr. Milliken: It is getting smaller, yes. As the hon. member says it is getting smaller. The increase is getting smaller because the debt is so much bigger. If the hon. member would study the figures sometime, he would find that what this government has done is allow the national debt to increase at a record pace in spite of all the phoney claims to the contrary. The idea that the operating budget is in surplus, what nonsense. You do not run an office and not pay the rent. This government is trying to claim it has a surplus because it is running the office and it is not paying the rent. It has to pay the rent. Canadians are having to pay the rent. This bill is one more indication of the government's desire to gouge and screw the Canadian taxpayer. We object to it.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in my colleague's comments regarding the debt and the deficit. We do know how the debt has grown in the last six years. Not only has it grown, but the percentage of the debt that is being financed abroad has grown.

In 1984, when this government took office, the debt was around $170 billion and about 17 per cent of Treasury bonds were financed outside the country. Now the debt is $380 billion and 37 per cent of the debt is being financed outside the country.

It would be nice to have free trade with the Americans where we would be on an even footing. Of course interest rates are now 500 basis points higher than the Americans. Before the free trade agreement we could say: "If you are going to do business in Canada you have to manufacture in Canada". The free trade agreement did away with that, so it now seems that there is a haemorrhaging of businesses away from Canada into the United States. There is really very little we can do because of the government's financial fiasco other than bring out new financial policies, which this government refuses to do.

Has the hon. member, as a member from southern Ontario, experienced this trend of businesses leaving Canada and going to the United States as a result of the disastrous financial policies of this government?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to my very learned and distinguished colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

I want to confirm that in fact there have been closures of businesses in my riding. I know of two that closed for the sole purpose of moving to the United States. There have been extensive lay-offs, particularly in the last few weeks as the recession for which the government claims credit—it claims it created it as a result of its policies—takes hold on the Canadian economy, throwing Canadians out of work.

On the other side of the coin, which my hon. friend mentioned, was the difficulty we face in borrowing abroad and the significant borrowings we have. Of course the higher the government deficit is, the more it drives Canadian investment out of Canada. Canadian companies cannot get capital on the markets at a reasonable rate, so they are forced to go and borrow abroad, which means we have more foreign investment in Canada and more Canadian industries being sold.

When this government said that Canada was open for business again, it really meant Canada is up for sale again. That is what it was talking about.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1900)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to expand on the question which I asked the Minister of Transport on May 15, regarding a barge carrying three million gallons of bunker oil. At that time it was projected to travel through the Gulf Islands of my riding and into the waters of Saanich Inlet, on which a number of people are working hard to have become a federal marine reserve park. My question related to the regulatory vacuum that existed in respect of oil barges and tanker traffic in that area.

I want to take the opportunity now to expand on that because we have, since that question was asked and the government responded, received the report from the public review panel on tanker safety, marine spills and the response capability. This panel was appointed on June 9, 1989 by the Prime Minister. The report's short name is the Brander–Smith report. I would like to take the opportunity to highlight some of the report's findings, because they are quite critical and point out some of the regulatory vacuum which I highlighted in my question of last May.

One of the panel's major findings was that the capability to respond effectively to a spill of any significant magnitude did not presently exist anywhere in Canada. This shows the reality of the situation.

Another finding was that a much greater volume of oil enters the marine environment as a result of routine tanker operations such as loading, offloading, tank washings, and waste water discharges than as a result of accidents. Almost all of these operational skills can be avoided. Only 8 per cent of the oil tankers operating world–wide have double hulls or bottoms. Of Canada's 31 tankers, only one is double hulled and ice–reinforced.

Over all, foreign tankers pose a much greater threat to our shores than domestic tankers. Almost one–quarter of the foreign tankers inspected by the Canadian Coast Guard in the Atlantic region, over an 18–month period ending December 31, 1989, were found to be defective. There is a requirement, because Canada is a signatory to an international agreement, that Canada inspect one–quarter of the foreign tankers. Only 8 per cent of those foreign tankers are inspected, because there is not the capacity to inspect the others.

I read in The Toronto Star of November 24 about an incident which occurred just off our Atlantic coast. I think it shows the mindset of some of the members of the Department of Transport. We are talking about a major spill off the coast of Nova Scotia, and a Transport Canada spokesperson said that it was really out of our jurisdiction because the spill occurred in international waters and it was a foreign tanker, a Norwegian ship.

"It is really out of our jurisdiction" is almost like the "it is not my department" kind of response which I find and I think all members of this House find very irritating when we have to deal with any bureaucracy. It is our department, it is our jurisdiction, because we all live on one planet and it is in our interest that this issue is looked at. I know that the government is trying to use shrinking resources in order to do a job, but we have to reassess our priorities to make certain that people really understand what the danger is. When we are told that there is no capability to respond effectively in the case of any major spill, that is a pretty significant finding.

I would like to point out some other findings. There is also a glaring need to standardize and upgrade dockside chemical loading and offloading requirements, as well as the design, construction, and inspection of chemical tankers and barges.

I think this is the key recommendation or the key finding. In my riding, the Coast Guard receives a lot of criticism for its inability to respond. This finding is that the Coast Guard is seriously under–resourced and cannot provide for the level of monitoring, inspection and surveillance required to adequately protect our waters.

The people who work for the Coast Guard are probably doing their best but they are just not given adequate resources. I think it is up to the Minister of Transport to go to cabinet and say, "In order to do our job properly, we have to have these resources".

I will quote from the report. I think it is important that I get this right.

> The Coast Guard's investigative and prosecution efforts are seriously inadequate and do little to deter polluters. Indeed, the chances of polluters being caught are small; of being caught and prosecuted even smaller. If polluters are prosecuted, the chances of being found guilty are minuscule and, if found guilty, fines are paltry. In the few instances where prosecutions are attempted and prove successful, fines are unacceptably meagre: between 1979 and 1988, the average fine under the Canada Shipping Act was $4,700.

That is hardly a deterrent.

Mr. Speaker, you are giving me the sign that I have only one minute left. There is a lot more I could say on this. What the government has to do is to start implementing these recommendations. The regulatory vacuum that exists is frightening for anybody who cares about the environment; anybody who lives on the coast line; anybody who has a business that depends on a pristine marine environment. That is a lot of people. We have to be able to integrate our economy and our environment. We have to start putting sufficient resources into protection of our environment so that the environment is protected.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I know she is extremely serious in her questioning, as she should be when it comes to the environment, especially to something that could permanently damage and irrevocably harm any part of our environment. She has to be especially serious because of the coast line in the area in which she lives. As she points out, it is the job of all parties to be questioning and critical. It is the government's job to respond, and I will try to do that now.

Sharing the hon. member's concern, as all of us do, our Prime Minister announced the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spill Response Capability in June of 1989. This was the David Brander–Smith report. It was released November 2 of this year and it is far–reaching. The recommendations have been accepted by the department and will assist in the improvement of Canada's spill response capability.

Some of the initial actions now under way by the Coast Guard include the developing of barge regulations and the planning for the improvement and upgrading of equipment.

In addition, the Canadian Coast Guard has a number of contingency plans in place to attempt to deal with ship or barge source oil spills. The master plan is the National Marine Emergency Plan which covers all Canadian waters. On the west coast, this is supplemented by the Western Region Contingency Plan.

Furthermore, should a spill impact on boundary waters, the Canada–United States Joint Marine Pollution Contingency Plan would be invoked. This calls for the combined Canada–U.S. pollution countermeasure response. These contingency plans are exercised, of course, with our American colleagues on a regular basis.

In terms of resources, the Canadian Coast Guard has major pollution countermeasures equipment depots at Victoria, Vancouver and Prince Rupert. A recent one has been established in Sandspit and another is being established at Ucluelet.

There are also a number of private sector resources that can be called upon. In addition, of course, Canada can call on the U.S. Coast Guard in case of emergency.

• (1910 )

The Canadian Coast Guard monitoring vessel monitors Canada's traffic movements on Canada's coast on a continuous basis and provides a reporting point for spills of oil or noxious substances. While my comments have been specific to the hon. member's region, needless to say all regions of Canada are being upgraded and similarly equipped.

Mr. Brander–Smith's study was in depth and far reaching in its implications. The panel's hard work is greatly appreciated and, as the hon. member indicated, it will go a long way to improving our marine response capability if we in fact can follow up on it.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my previous question to the Minister of State for Housing as to whether or not we will have a co–operative housing program in 1991 and additional units built for people waiting for co–op housing, the minister was not as forthcoming as he could have been. In fact, he sounded rather unsure of himself and sounded rather unsure of his government's commitment to co–operative housing. I do not need to remind the minister that this government never made good on its initial commitment to 5,000 units per year. What it delivered is shamefully and irresponsibly much less than that: 13,000 instead of the 25,000 promised.

CMHC's evaluation of the current co–op program in the past five years indicates that the co–op housing has worked, is well received, and is meeting its social goals. By using its unique and innovative index linked mortgage instrument, it can produce cost effective and affordable housing for this country.

However, mysteriously and suspiciously, CMHC has attempted to discredit some of the key areas of the co-op housing program by twisting statistical information. In its evaluation CMHC has made the conclusion that more targeting is needed and that security of tenure is not necessarily better served by the co-op housing than the private rental market. The evaluation also claims that the benefits of a mixed income cannot be proven.

Despite the fact that half of all co-op units is occupied by people in core need of housing, only 4.2 per cent of all households and co-ops perceived that it was very likely that they would be forced to move because of affordability problems, compared to the 11 per cent of private renters. Therefore it can be concluded that co-operative housing units do provide better security of tenure than regular rental units.

The minister said that the evaluation also revealed that a number of co-op tenants paying market rents can afford home ownership. Granted, there might be a few, but approximately 63 per cent of all co-op residents have annual incomes of less than $30,000 and approximately 80 per cent of co-op residents have incomes of less than $40,000 a year. The evaluation never tells us that in 12 cities across Canada a family with an annual income under $40,000 still will not be able to afford to buy a home. Given the incomes of its residents, these statistics suggests that co-ops are well targeted and are serving low and moderate income households.

By focusing solely on the income of the residents, CMHC evaluation limits the scope of its assessment. Affordability is just one housing issue addressed by co-ops. CMHC also indicates that 60 per cent of all co-ops have units targeted to accommodate single parents. Half of the projects accommodate the elderly and half also have units for the disabled. These targeted groups would have difficulty finding comparable housing accommodations regardless of their current incomes elsewhere.

The concept of mixed income co-op projects has great social value. Eliminating the possibility of constructing low income ghettos, it also allows for co-ops to be targeted to specific groups which have particular needs. Improving targeting to reduce the subsidies to moderate and high income earners in co-ops can be achieved but without jeopardizing the mixed income element of the program. The evaluation does not explore ways in which this can be achieved.

A report completed by Nick Van Dyk of the Canadian Housing and Renewal Association shows how the co-op program delivers affordable housing more effectively than other housing programs, including those that subsidize private developers. An evaluation of the co-op program's targeting must include a comparison with other housing programs to determine which is more effective. The information contained in the evaluation report clearly leads to the conclusion that the index link financing of co-operatives has successfully made the programs economical. This is beneficial in dealing with Canada's housing problems. The ILM should be used to refinance all co-operatives constructed prior to the introduction of the ILM in order to make them more economical. These savings should be used toward the construction of the new co-ops.

It is clear that the Conservative government has not used the evaluation to examine new possibilities for co-op housing in this country. Instead this government has allowed only three weeks of so-called consultation with the Co-operative Housing Federation and other co-op resource groups to help with the new program. Meaningful consultation means working with the groups. It is little wonder that I and others questioned the sincerity of this government. Do they really want to quietly and secretly kill co-op housing in this country?

Given that the co-operative housing program has provided an economical and successful form of housing, and given that the demand for this different type of tenure is high, will the government again commit itself to the construction of 5,000 co-op units annually in order to meet the broad-based need for this housing program? Will this government and this minister announce tonight, commit, to renewed and a rejuvenated co-op housing program for 1991 and beyond? Or will affordable housing for needy Canadians be also sacrificed for a military effort in the Persian Gulf?

I ask once again that this minister let these co-op people in the waiting lines and the co-op resource groups know exactly what the government's plans are for the next five years for a worthy program that has succeeded in the past 25 years in this country.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear to the hon. member that I am a very strong supporter of co-op housing and a very strong supporter of a continuing co-op housing program.

I know that the hon. member is aware that the federal government has been involved in a co-op housing program of one sort or another since the 1970s. In fact there have been three separate co-operative housing programs dating back to the 1970s. Each one has had different criteria, different aspects to it but all of those programs together have produced some 45,000 or more units of co-operative housing over the length of time there has been federal co-operative housing programs. Since 1985 when the current co-operative housing program was put into effect, over 13,000 units of co-op housing have been included and added to that total.

Back in 1985 the federal government, as you know, Mr. Speaker, and as the hon. member knows, conducted some consultations with respect to its housing policies in order to determine where we should go from that point. At that time there were consultations broadly held with the entire housing industry, all groups involved, including the co-op housing movement and everyone associated with it. Out of that came a consensus that the government would try from that point forward to target all of its housing dollars to those people in our country who were most in need of housing.

The hon. member is well aware that there are an awful lot of people in that category who are not being served today. In fact, about 1.2 million households in this country fall into that category.

The difficulty, as the hon. member is aware, is the fact that the co-operative housing program fact is not entirely targeted to low-income people. It is in fact, by definition, and by philosophy a program which is a mixture of incomes and therefore, as a result of that, is an exception to the government's housing policy targeting all housing funds to low-income people.

This housing program that was put into effect, being an ILM, an index-linked mortgage program, for five years was carried out in consultation with the co-op housing movement. It was to achieve some 5,000 units of co-op housing a year, but in fact failed to do that, not because there was any intention on the government to not produce that amount of money, but because there was an agreement made to put $5 million a year into producing units of co-op housing. We were unable to achieve that target because of the differing real interest rates on ILM mortgages and because the subsidy per unit cost rose from $1,000 to over $3,000 per unit at the current time. We have been endeavouring through our consultation process and our evaluation process to come up with a new program and some new recommendations in good faith. I will be making those recommendations to cabinet before the end of the year. I can assure the hon. member that I am certain he will be pleased with the results of those recommendations.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the issue that I continue to raise with the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerns ethics in biomedical research. When may clinical testing of drugs be done on humans and how should subjects be enrolled in the clinical study? Does it matter whether the sponsor of drug testing is a medical school, a hospital, a doctor's clinic or a medical establishment?

On November 5, Canadians saw on national television a revelation that Canadian subjects had been enrolled in a clinical trial of the drug HI-6, an antidote against nerve gas poison, sponsored by the Department of National Defence, without them being fully informed that the drug could cause cancer, apparently despite contrary advice from the ministry of health.

Hence, my first question to the minister on November 6 was: "Could he explain why this study went ahead despite non-compliance with our Canadian ethical standards? Was he surprised and would he halt the study unless it reveals all known side effects to volunteers and thereby ensure informed consent?"

The minister in essence replied that in subsequent trials, that is during phase two, he will insist that a specific reference be made as to the possibility of carcinogenicity notwithstanding the fact that no direct evidence suggests the drug can cause cancer.

On November 7, I again posed a question to the minister. I challenged him to admit that the necessary tests for cancer in animals have not yet been done. I called to his attention that the drug is prohibited from being manufactured in the United States because of danger to the employees and the community.

Earlier, during Question Period at that time, the Minister of National Defence had admitted that one ingredient used in the manufacturing of the drug is bis-chloromethyl ether, which is a known carcinogen, that is, it has cancer-causing properties.

The minister for health, in his reply, indicated that tests done in other jurisdictions showed the drug is safe. If one did not specifically test for cancer-causing properties of the drug and one did not have so-called purity data, that is the extent of chemical reactions during manufacturing, one takes the risk the carcinogenic ingredient could transmit its danger.

In fact, allowing such a practice would set a bad precedent for testing of new drugs for cancer in animals before trials in humans. To say that HI-6 could possibly cause cancer without animal data is meaningless and unethical.

On November 8, one of the subjects for the clinical trials was quoted in the press as having agreed to participate mainly because he was "broke" and he stayed in the study because he needed the money.

I therefore asked the minister whether enticing Canadians who are poor with extra dollars to serve as subjects is ethical. Examination of the consent form reveals some inconsistencies with respect to this matter. Page 3 of the form states: "Discontinuation from the study will involve no penalty", yet, page 4 states: "the subject will only receive percentage of the full fee—" unless the subject completes, "all aspects of the study."

Page 2 of the consent form alluded to one clinical study in Yugoslavia to sustain the claim that there were no untoward effects to date yet page 3 of the form alluded to "previous clinical studies", thereby suggesting more than one. My question is, why the discrepancy in numbers?

The form also indicates that the drug "may damage sperm cells which could result in birth defects." While advice was given to subjects "to practice contraception during the study and for 90 days following the study," no clear information was available as to possible damage that may occur as a consequence of cumulative doses as this particular study would allow.

I further challenged the minister why the clinical testing on humans should proceed before testing for cancer is done on animals. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I thought the government had the sequence backwards.

The issue before us is indeed most important. I would like to conclude by reading into the record of this debate a brief letter to the editor of The Globe and Mail, the issue of last November 11, from Dr. David Roy, Director of the Centre for Bioethics and Clinical Research at the Institute of Montreal. He writes:

> Respect for human beings and the protection of their health and lives, dignity and rights have formed the core of the many codes and guidelines governing the ethics of research with human subjects since the Second World War. The Nuremberg code marks a turning point. It crystallized the essential characteristics of consent required to protect the autonomy of human beings in biomedical research.
> Consent is not voluntary if people are seduced by money to submit themselves to potentially dangerous tests of new drugs. Consent to such tests is not adequately informed if those seduced to participate are not told about the effects previous tests of a new drug have had on animal and human bodies. Consent cannot be adequately informed if previous testing was insufficient to deliver reliable information about possible toxicity. Consent cannot be comprehending if warnings are couched in terms so vague they blind participants to the possible dangers of testing.

He continued:

> It makes no difference whether the sponsor of drug testing is the medical establishment, a drug company, or the military—the ethics of research with human beings remains the same.

He concluded his letter:

> We must not now, or ever, abandon the ethical progress we have made with and since Nuremberg.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, the HI-6 drug testing in question has failed to fully comply with the established ethical guidelines that now govern the conduct of biomedical research in human volunteers. Therefore, this particular study must be halted until the required animal studies for the concerns that I have raised have been done.

I trust and hope that this government will respond accordingly.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this question during the adjournment debate and for giving me this opportunity to repeat the guidelines for testing new products.

I am sure you will understand, and I assume the hon. member is aware, that the Department of National Health and Welfare takes this very seriously. It does not take lightly the risks to human beings who test new products.

Obviously, Health and Welfare Canada considers the risks and must weigh the pros and cons, before it finally authorizes human testing.

In the case of HI-6, Health and Welfare analysed these aspects, and at the time it was concluded most emphatically, on the basis of the evidence, that its benefits as an antidote for organic phosphate gases outweighed the potential risk.

There have been allegations that it would be harder for a company than a department to reach that conclusion. Not so. In this particular case, the Department of National Defence had to conform to the same guidelines and then some, before Health and Welfare Canada would allow this product to be tested.

Of course there is also the matter of compliance with the Food and Drugs Act and Regulations. Mr. Speaker, it has also been alleged that the regulations themselves are not strong enough. That is not the case. In fact, we are told the exact opposite is true. Often companies launch new products they are sure will be good for various diseases, including AIDS in one case. We heard a lot about this in connection with a drug for AIDS.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that the Department of National Health and Welfare has the authority under the Act. It is all very regulated.

There is also the ethical aspect, and I agree with the hon. member that it must be very strictly observed. Canada signed the Helsinki Convention. This aspect is very strictly enforced, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that with the help of the hon. member, we will continue to ensure that our standards are the very highest and protect the health of Canadians who test these products.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, you will find, I believe, that there is unanimous consent for the House to waive the 48-hours notice required to debate the following motion in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Wednesday, November 28, 1990:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council Resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of Third Country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council Resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, due to the exceptional circumstances, having knowledge that the government wanted to table with the Clerk that motion yesterday so that we could comply with the 48-hour notice, and given the circumstances of the Secretary of State for External Affairs being outside the country—there was a relapse of time between our time and the time in Jerusalem—we would certainly accept that we waive the Standing Orders requiring the 48-hour notice in order to have this debated tomorrow.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we are in accordance with the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion and the expressions of consent.

Motion agreed to and so ordered.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: On that same point, Mr. Speaker, it would be helpful if the government could indicate if we could agree also to possibly extending the hours to allow for more members to participate in this debate, and if so, to set a time for tomorrow night, perhaps 11 o'clock or midnight, for the debate to last.

Mr. Cooper: I want to indicate that we on this side are more than willing to co-operate in any way that we can. May I just apply a couple of caveats. One is that we have a House leaders' meeting at 3.30 p.m. today which would allow us to discuss this in detail. Second, we could have a discussion, perhaps, of voting that may come out of the motion and how we would handle that. I would like to signal our co-operation, but to leave the final discussions of that to 3.30 this afternoon when the House leaders meet.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several persons from Nova Scotia.

They call upon the government to cease with its proposed shift of the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through a real tax reform.

In other words, they call upon the government to withdraw the GST legislation.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table two petitions that add to the former petitions dealing with the imposition of the new sales tax on reading.

These petitioners take strong exception to the government's intentions to impose a GST on books. They state clearly that since Confederation no government has dared do this. This government is certainly to be condemned for its measures.

The petitioners say that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a corner-stone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST applications.

The undersigned pray and call upon Parliament to re-affirm the historic principles embodied in the free status of all taxes for the printed word by retaining the zero rate applied for years to books and publications.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition duly certified from members of my constituency in Punnichy, Saskatchewan.

They call upon the government and Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, in short, to engage in real tax reform instead of the regressive reforms proposed by this government.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from residents of Senneterre, in Abitibi, who call upon the Government of Canada to scrap the so-called Hill project, which, at a cost of $68 million, would provide for the construction of an underground parking garage and shopping mall under the Parliament Buildings. Your petitioners recognize the need to preserve the environment and historic character of the Parliament Buildings and Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

Your petitioners also maintain that members should continue to park in the spaces behind the Parliament Buildings, and park outside like our factory workers in this country, and that the Government of Canada has better things to do than to provide an underground parking garage and shopping mall on the Hill for members of Parliament.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to file a petition with the House, under Standing Order 36, from the people of Port Alberni, British Columbia.

The petitioners say that they are fed up with the service cutbacks at Canada Post and fed up with management and direction by government that places customer service at the bottom of the priority list. In particular, they request of Parliament that Canada Post reopen the drive-through postal drop-off service at Port Alberni, and also that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to keep existing outlets open, to operate longer hours, to expand revenue generating services, to stop privatizing, and to start increasing services in order to retain revenues.

CABLE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the residents of Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam, and Port Moody, British Columbia in my riding. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have been fighting a battle to get cable companies regulated.

These petitioners say that cable companies are making an average 32 per cent profit on fixed assets, whereas phone companies are making half that. The petitions humbly pray and call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284, which is my private members' bill, to apply rate of return regulations so that the cable industry will be regulated like the phone industry and Canadians will have lower cable rates.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the city of Toronto who are opposed to the goods and services tax and particularly to the tax on books and the printed word.

These persons would be outraged, had they been in the Senate the other day, to witness the spectacle of the Conservative majority in that body vote down a sensible, sound amendment proposed by my colleagues there which would have scrapped this aspect of that tax. Unfortunately, these senators, under instructions from the government, felt that they had to vote down this very reasonable amendment.

These petitioners call upon the government to reject the goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 369 could be made an Order for Return, this return could be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 369 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

Question No. 369—Mr. Berger:

Since January 1, 1989, what is the number of deportations to the United States of non-U.S. citizens by (a) country of origin (b) province from which they were deported?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining question be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BROADCASTING ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, November 1, consider of Bill C–40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 12 to 15 of Mrs. Finestone (p. 14979); and Motion No. 42 of Mr. Edwards (p. 14979).

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you have just indicated, we are resuming debate on motions which include the excellent motions of the hon. member for Mount Royal which are before us for discussion. The motions presented by the hon. member for Mount Royal reflect, in essence, the deep dissatisfaction with the substance of Bill C–40. We have to register such a feeling in the context of report stage.

The dissatisfaction flows from the key issue of the removal from the 1968 mandate given to the CBC to contribute to the development of national unity and to provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity.

The removal of a national unity reference in the CBC mandate was recommended by two initiatives. One was the Caplan–Sauvageau report in 1986 and the other subsequently came from the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture the year after. Both were concerned that this particular mandate of contributing to the development of national unity might, and I quote from their report, "interfere with the CBC's ability to ensure that its programming reflects and interprets as fully and fairly and accurately as possible Canada's cultural, social, political, economic, linguistic and regional reality and diversity".

I submit that this is rubbish. It is unadulterated nonsense. It is an abandonment and almost a betrayal of the original purpose and mandate that appropriately was given to the CBC in 1968 when its linguistic, cultural and social role was given a modern interpretation and a badly needed one.

A former president of the CBC, Pierre Juneau, when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Communications said that the phrase "national unity" had not caused any problems during his years as president of the CBC. It is worth noting that the CRTC noted that its interpretation of the term never precluded a free political discussion from all points of view.

In that context, we are very distressed to see that the Minister of Communications, who is in the House today, also drank the same bathtub water produced by the Caplan–Sauvageau report and subscribed to that rubbish as well. I am very disappointed because I always thought that, in philosophical and political terms, he was very much in favour of developing and maintaining strong bonds across Canada.

It is not just the fact that the CBC's appropriation was cut by $240 million over the last six years by the government that is creating unhappiness on this side of the House. The motions before us surround this dissatisfaction. It is the dropping of the national mandate given to the CBC. There is no amount of outrage that can reflect sufficiently the profound distaste for this measure contained in the bill proposed by the Conservative government. However, it comes as no surprise, considering the composition of the caucus and the recent transfers across the floor of the House from the government caucus to the independent benches.

Evidently, their interpretation of national unity is a very shaky one. It is a very shaky political alliance anyway, and it has given in recent time indications of falling apart.

We believe, as it was very well put in The Ottawa Citizen in May of this year, that the CBC is an agent for Canadian unity and that it must remain that way, that it is a bulwark against various decentralizing forces. It was in September of this year put very well in the Globe and Mail by Steven Godfrey who, among others, wrote on the CBC that Parliament should reject this bill as the cynical piece of work it is, making specific reference to the question of the dropping of the national unity clause. It seems as though the government has abandoned the basic principles that have determined the action and the spirit of this very important institution.

I would like to put on record some of the principles as restated in recent weeks by the Friends of the CBC movement, which is a coalition of artists, writers and the like, and who have somehow pledged their commitment to the CBC in the following terms. First, they see Canada as a place for a lively broadcasting industry which should have a strong and healthy balance between the public and the private stations. They believe that the CBC, both radio and television, is the most important element of the Canadian broadcasting system, and so do we. They believe that the CBC must continue to be a public service broadcaster and a dynamic alternative to the commercial networks and stations. They oppose the introduction of advertising on CBC radio and stereo, and the recent trends of increasing publicity and commercialization on the CBC television network.

In addition, they believe that the CBC must provide a balanced program service, a service which informs, enlightens, entertains, and meets the particular needs of a variety of specialized audiences. They believe that CBC programming should reflect and serve all parts of the country. They support a level of funding for the CBC that permits it to carry out its statutory mandate and here, of course, we come to the question of cuts and, therefore, a requirement to increase its funding. It is, with regret, that we know that our network in Canada is lagging behind other national networks, particularly the European ones, where there is a network one, a network two, and a network three, which try to meet the needs of different audiences.

Finally, the Friends of the CBC support an increased Canadianization of the airwaves. This eight-point set of principles was produced and distributed by a well-known Canadian author and writer, Peter Newman.

At this stage, of course, it is late to reorganize and to modify appropriately Bill C-40. Nevertheless, it is important to put on record these views because this bill, if passed, will hopefully be proclaimed, implemented and enforced only for a short time, that is, between now and the next election. At the time of the next election, I am sure that an electorate, enraged for a variety of reasons to which Bill C-40 has to be added, will take care of the wrong directions in which the government is leading Canada. Then we will see to it that the CBC is restored to its original mandate.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to this Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting, especially at a time when major decisions are going to be made, within the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that will drastically affect not only the quality of our programming but the variety of services that we have been proud of for so long. I refer, specifically, to Radio-Canada International. RCI has been in existence since 1942 and, although some changes have been made to the service, the principle remains the same. That is, and I quote: "to convey objective information and balanced comment, thus reflecting the fullest possible freedom of expression".

Motion No. 15, the motion of our Liberal critic, the member for Mount Royal, and Motion No. 42, the government motion, contained, if you will, the future of an effective service.

If the information regarding CBC's projected $100 million budgetary shortfall is correct, there is nothing in this act to protect Radio Canada International from being eliminated altogether. Under Bill C-40, CBC is not required to operate an international service. It may do so if it so desires.

Motion No. 15 would prevent that, and I would like to share it with the members in the House:

Motion No. 15

That Bill C-40 be amended in Clause 3 by adding immediately after line 20 at page 5 the following:

(m) the Corporation should provide an international service subject to such applicable statutes and regulations as the Governor in Council may deem necessary;

Since you, Mr. Speaker, have grouped Motions Nos. 15 and 42 for debate, I would like to make a few comments about the government motion.

The government motion says:

(2) The Corporation shall, within the conditions of any licence or licences issued to it by the Commission and subject to any applicable regulations of the Commission, provide an international service in accordance with such directions as the Governor in Council may issue.

It is not very often that I praise the government, but in this case, I do praise the government because its motion is even stronger. It said:

(2) The Corporation shall—provide an international service

Whereas the Liberal resolution says:

(m) the Corporation should

I think we should all support Motion No. 42 where it says:

(2) The Corporation shall,

In other words, it must provide such a service.

Mr. Speaker, before I forget, I do want to mention that I do not like the words at the end of the government motion which say:

—with such directions as the Governor in Council may issue.

I will bring in an amendment to that motion at the end of my debate.

Usually, when programs have to be cut or reduced, they are phased out over a period of time. RCI does not even have that protection. To protect our international image, if reductions have to be made, I hope RCI will play an integral role in the decisions, and that any decision will be allowed a period of three to five years to take effect.

Hopefully, we will not even need that period.

My other concern has to do with the risk inherent in RCI being funded from the cultural envelope. The priority for the cultural envelope is servicing Canadians.

The priority for Radio Canada International is to reflect the spectrum of Canadian life and opinion to an international audience, although RCI does provide some programming for Canadians abroad.

I would suggest that the funding for RCI be left to those who understand what best serves Canada's national interest. I would not, however, go as far as suggesting that the Department of External Affairs manage the service, because it is the very independence of the service from the government that gives it the unique characteristics to make it as credible as the BBC.

I was impressed in the sixties when we had student exchanges with an American college, Alliance College in Pennsylvania. The president of Alliance College told us that he listened to nothing but CBC, Radio Canada.

I felt very good as a Canadian. Here is a president of an American college not listening to any American programs, but listening to our CBC.

I would suggest, however, that the responsibility for funding be moved to the external affairs and international trade envelope. This argument is especially important today. We are spending literally millions of dollars on trade delegations all over the world to make international markets more aware of Canadian trade opportunities, and millions on supporting trade with the Soviet Union and eastern Europe as encouragement in their struggle for democracy.

Yet, we are actually considering taking away one of the more effective and inexpensive means to reach and achieve exactly those goals.

I have on numerous occasions expressed concern about the government's commitment to following through with programs that it established. Just over three weeks ago, we debated the new and expanded role of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. We talked about the need to exchange technologies, information and the importance of discussing long and openly, if need be, to reach consensus among all countries involved.

We are still awaiting the return of Bill C-88, a bill that deals with Canada's contribution to the European Bank for reconstruction and development. Once again, they are the same concerns about the political will to follow through.

I do not think you would find too many objections to any of these initiatives if there was confidence in the motives for all these initiatives. But we keep seeing the introduction of new ones, while others lay by the wayside, forgotten.

One way to show that the government is serious about all these endeavours is to commit directly to keeping Radio Canada International alive so that the people in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe know about our desire and our efforts to see them through these difficult times.

I broke away from a three-day conference held here in Ottawa. The name of the conference is "The Changing Soviet Union: Implications for Canada and the World". I was impressed how the organizers found funding in a very creative way. They did not have enough money in one envelope from one department, so they found money from National Defence Canada, Industry, Science and Technology Canada, Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, External Affairs and International Trade, the Disarmament Fund, Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, and the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. So there are creative waves of coming up with funding. Maybe it is time that RCI be funded from the external affairs envelope, rather than the cultural envelope.

I cannot emphasize the importance of the free and independent Canadian international service. I stress "Canadian" because —although the way this government is going, I am not sure how long this will last—we may find that to tune in to Canadian opinion, one need only turn on Voice of America. Hopefully this will never happen again because to date there is still great affection and respect for a news service that is Canadian. It is still felt that a Canadian news service is impartial and by being impartial it is encouraging to those populations in countries where censorship and news are synonymous.

One of the more recent examples that typifies this particular situation is the events that took place in Tiananmen Square. We were able to reach the students and convey to them our reaction to the tragic events. We were able to let them know that Canada was not going to send Chinese students back to China, that we were going to offer them refuge.

You are giving me the signal, Mr. Speaker, that the time is up. I have a lot more to debate here, but I do want to table an amendment to Motion No. 42 which would read:

That motion 42 be amended by removing the period after the word "issue" to be replaced by a comma and inserting the following:

provided such directions do not limit its journalistic, creative or programming independence.

I think the amendment is self explanatory.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the motion presented by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park under advisement.

Resuming debate.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Flis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can I give the rationale behind my amendment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes.

Mr. Flis: The rationale is that the members of the Liberal Party are concerned that the words "such directions as the Governor in Council may issue" are too broad and inconsistent with clause 35, subclause 2. This provides and enhances the freedom of expression and the journalistic, creative and programming independence enjoyed by the corporation in the pursuit of its objects and in the exercise of its powers.

• (1140)

Canada has shown through Radio Canada International that it has a dramatic role model to the world and in particular to those countries where democratic institutions are developing. Because of this role it is crucial that Radio Canada International not be seen as a tool manipulated by the Canadian government.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to participate in this very important debate at report stage of this very important Bill C–40.

I want to keep my comments to a number of the proposed amendments, the motions before us in the grouping. There are five motions in this grouping, three of which I want to speak to in particular.

At the outset I should say that I support each of the amendments in this grouping.

The first one, Motion No. 12, deals very specifically with the parliamentary service. In a modern democracy, especially when we look at what is happening around the world, countries such as Yugoslavia, which I visited recently with some other parliamentarians, are experiencing for the first time a multi-party democratic election. We see that all over eastern Europe. Countries have to work as best they can to deliver the institutions to the people. What I mean is that in a place like Canada, this body here which is the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada, must take every means possible and use everything at her disposal to ensure that the people of Canada have access to their parliamentarians and can watch Parliament in action.

One way that that can be done, very clearly, is through the parliamentary channel. The parliamentary channel has been a great experiment in Canadian politics. I think now we have over 440,000 households on average watching Question Period every day of the week that this place sits. That is important because in a modern democratic state, televised proceedings of the legislature of the Parliament is a check on abuse by governments. It means that the people of Canada can watch their parliamentarians in action and when governments choose to abuse or override the rules or have the tyranny of the majority—which happens many times in this place—the people of Canada can tune in on their television, unobstructed, without editorial comment, without filtering by a news agency, and watch Parliament in action. That is very important.

The motion that we have before us, Motion No. 12, is very important because it would mandate CBC under this legislation to provide a parliamentary service. I know there is a committee of the House that is looking at better ways to deliver the proceedings of this place and of the committees of this place via the air waves. At some point it will make a report and the report will be debated. But I would hope that we understand that the CBC has a mandate and it is a mandate of national unity. Part of its new mandate, I believe, is to ensure that never, ever, will commercial considerations or time considerations between conflicting priorities of the cable company overtake the ability of the Canadian public to watch Parliament in action. The CBC is such a body. The CBC is the vehicle that should be mandated specifically by statute to ensure that Canadians everywhere have a right of access through their televisions to what happens in this Parliament.

We know that many times a government, not just this government but more particularly this government, would like to ensure that the record of the House is not properly distributed to everybody in the country because sometimes governments make mistakes.

An hon. member: Especially this government.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Especially this government. It is notorious for it. A parliamentary channel mandated through a vehicle of national unity like the CBC is the way to ensure the independence and access of every Canadian to the proceedings of the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada.

I would like to address Motion 14 because it really concerns me. This motion is one that I really hope all members in this House will support. It is an important motion. I come from Atlantic Canada. Unfortunately or fortunately, we have had to grow up watching the reporting of what goes on in this great nation from a central Canadian bias. The CBC, Global, and CTV obviously have to play to the ratings. They have to pay the bills at the end of the month. Those news organizations have mastered and got into the five-second or the ten-second clip, the sound bite, for the evening news because they only have a fifteen-minute or half-hour newscast.

What happens perhaps in Cape Breton Island or Newfoundland or Fogo Island may not be of such national importance in the view of the editors of those newscasts that it is going to show up on a national news report that evening. I do not fault them for that. That is the reality of the modern world. They have to pay their bills. If they are broadcasting news that does not appeal to the millions of people who live in this unbalanced country, because too many people live at the centre and too few outside the centre, they are not going to get their rates for their advertising and therefore they are not going to be competitive.

All of a sudden what appeared on the scene was CBC Newsworld in English. CBC Newsworld in my view—and I have said this to the director out of the Halifax operation—has provided a tool for national unity and understanding in this country. CBC Newsworld does not have to master the 15, the 10 or the 5 second clip for a 30-minute newscast. The mandate of CBC Newsworld is to report the news from around the world but, more particularly, from around this country.

I have learned more about Alberta from watching CBC Newsworld than from reading any newspaper in this country or any combination of newspapers. I have learned more about the problems of the farmers in Saskatchewan by watching CBC Newsworld because its mandate is different. Its mandate is to try to give a balanced view of news from across the country; not a biased view focused toward the centre, which is Ontario and Quebec, where most of the people live. It has done something different.

It started out as perhaps a Canadian version CNN, that great American all-news network that gives us a great American slant on every piece of world news, national news, or local news that it puts out. However, it has developed into something much more than that. It has developed into a piece of national infrastructure that promotes national unity and understanding in this country. I do not think anybody in this country or on any side of this House who has watched that service would disagree with me. It has been a refreshing break from the divisiveness and the isolationism that are all too often practised by Canadians in their regions and in their local areas. It is something that absolutely must be protected.

Motion No. 14 which says that there should be a French CBC all-news network is something which is very important. Nobody in this House has to be reminded of the difficulties we have between English Canada and French Canada. They are real and they are severe. Any vehicle that can appeal or deliver itself to the masses, which will increase the level of understanding between English Canadians and French Canadians, should be something that we should support whole-heartedly. We should find the money, no matter where we have to scrape it up, because it is an instrument of national unity.

This motion makes sure that at some future point, because of economic considerations, CBC Newsworld does not have to go out of business. This motion makes sure that CBC Newsworld does not have to alter its format because of commercial considerations, because it has to make a profit. This motion ensures that CBC Newsworld and the benefit that we get in English Canada where it is shown of understanding the diversity and the richness of this country in its cultural, ethnic and regional diversity, are also available to people of the French language who live in Quebec and in other parts of Canada. Examples are the Acadians in Atlantic Canada and the French in the west.

I would hope that this motion in particular be really seriously considered by members opposite. I know that all too often in this House we vote strictly along party lines. If there is an amendment to the government bill, government members opposite think: My God, the House is going to come down on top of us if we agree that an opposition motion makes the legislation better. This is one of those cases where it not only would make the legislation better, but it would make the nation a more tolerant, hospitable and unified country in which to live.

In closing, I would just like to say that these motions that were put forward by my colleague from Mount Royal are thoughtful motions. They have been put forward in the spirit of keeping a national institution a national institution, and that is the CBC. Instead of shrinking its mandate to expand it by statute to ensure that when budget considerations come, as they currently are right now with massive cuts at CBC, some of the important aspects of Canadian unity and Canadian unity infrastructure such as the CBC are not tampered with by a budget axe but are mandated by the Parliament of Canada.

I would hope that members on all sides of the House would see fit to support these motions.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken on this group of amendments, but the Liberal Party member has seen fit to amend one of the amendments, so therefore I am entitled to speak again. It is very interesting what has happened here, because the amendment was originally a government amendment, subamended by the Liberal Party. The government amendment states:

> The Corporation shall, within the conditions of any licence or licences issued to it by the Commission and subject to any applicable regulations of the Commission, provide an international service in accordance with such directions as the Governor in Council may issue.

What the government has put in the bill is to guarantee really an international service. We have just heard this week that the government proposes to cut Radio Canada International. I say to the minister that he cannot put that in the bill and at the same time turn around and eliminate Radio Canada International.

Why does the government want to cut Radio Canada International? It is part of a pattern to cut back and to threaten not only the independence but the very existence of the CBC. We have seen throughout the Mulroney government's mandate the systematic attack on the budget of the CBC. I have said it has leeched the CBC. It has also meeched it too, but we will come back to that when we debate the national unity clause.

The CBC has cut back its regional programming. It has been forced to behave like every other private broadcaster with an eye to the bottom line. The CBC has been stripped of its ability to do good regional programming. Now it will be stripped of its ability to do international programming. We will get a CBC, at least for English television, that is concentrated in Toronto. All the money will be in the Peter and Wendy and Barbara show and so on. I suggest that members might want to read Rick Salutin article in Saturday Night magazine. It is a devastating criticism of what is happening to the CBC.

I want to focus on something else when I see the minister here. I want to focus on real dollars. What I have done is have had a look at what has happened to the CBC's finances, and I just want to go over that. I am talking about allocations in 1988 dollars. I am going to give some figures for appropriations for operations and for commercial revenues, because my submission is that the CBC is becoming more and more commercial, becoming more and more like any other network. Therefore, when we see the CBC logo on television, it just becomes like any other station, and it is not distinctively Canadian.

The CBC, for example, has been forced to abandon its goal of having 95 per cent Canadian content in prime time. It has been forced, as I have already said, to abandon its goal of having regional programming, which has been cut back 30 per cent.

I remember that years ago the CBC used to reflect Canadians to Canadians all across the country. Ten or fifteen years ago, we could see on prime time television The Plouffe Family, a family in Quebec. It was reflected to those of us who live in western Canada. We could see western Canadian programs that were reflected to other aspects of the country. We could see Don Messer's Jubliee from the Maritimes, which took some of that culture and reflected it across the country. There were four, five or six prime time shows from different regions in Canada that reflected the regions to Canadians. Now we do not have anything like that, and I will tell the House why.

In 1984 to 1985, the appropriations budget—and I am doing this in 1988 dollars—was $943.3 million and the capital budget was $93 million, for a total of about $1 billion. The commercial revenues were $265 million. That was 20 per cent of the budget. In 1985 to 1986, the appropriations operations go down to $879 million and commercial revenues go up to $268 million, some 22 per cent. In 1986 to 1987, $849 million for operations and revenues of 23 per cent. In 1987 to 1988, $828 million with revenues of 26 per cent. In 1988 to 1989, $814 million with revenues of 28 per cent. In 1989 to 1990, $812 million and commercial revenues of $374 million. Almost 30 per cent of the CBC budget is now in commercial revenues.

The minister over there just put everyone in a panic when he came before the committee and said: "Maybe we should get rid of ads". If we got rid of ads, the CBC could not even operate at all. Now the government has backtracked. The Toronto Star has quoted a policy proposal that in fact advertising come to CBC Radio. I like CBC Radio. I like listening to the Gzowski Show and the other shows. I like the fact that it is not beholden to commercial revenue. Leave that for the private sector and keep the CBC unique. This government is meeching and leeching the CBC. The radio network has been especially hurt.

The CRTC said in its most recent licence renewal that the CBC could not fulfil its mandate at current funding levels. Since then funding levels have declined further. In response to the questions before the standing committee on broadcasting last May, CBC Vice-President Michael McEwan said: "You are right. We are getting squeezed and each year. We have to factor in how we are doing to do that. This year, 1989–90, they lost a 1 per cent real cut across the radio system". They managed to sustain their activity for one more year. As the president, Mr. Veilleux, said: "If we keep going, something is going to have to give, and then you start talking about making decisions. Do you change the nature of how you express all your services? Do you lose some service? Do you lop off an arm rather than deleting the whole thing? These are the issues we are going to have to deal with if we keep heading down this road".

The government is sending contradictory signals. In its broadcasting policy Canadian Voices, Canadian Choices, the government said: "To capture an audience share consistent with the size of its parliamentary appropriation and to be able to generate sufficient commercial revenues, the CBC needs to reach large audiences". Yet, at the legislative committee, the minister emphasized CBC's cultural role and, as I said, he caused a near panic by suggesting that the commission might give up its commercial revenue.

The government has got to get a consistent policy. It has brought in an amendment to the bill to say that it is going to institutionalize Radio Canada International. Then it announced a couple of weeks later that it was thinking of cutting Radio Canada International.

It says it wants a national system; then it cuts regional programs. The minister says: "Maybe we should cut commercials". On the other hand 30 per cent of the CBC budget, as I have shown by figures, is in fact through commercial appropriations. This government has no consistent policy. I am glad the minister is in the House today, but it is about time that he paid some attention to what is going on in communications. I call him Oscar Masse, accepting Oscars in Hollywood or jetting off to Rome.

I am glad the minister is here so he can deal with the real question of communications policy. The role of the CBC in international, national and regional programming is absolutely vital in this country. This is part of the glue that keeps Canada together.

That is why we, in the NDP, have proposed amendments with respect to national unity, the make-up of the CBC, keeping the CBC independent, getting it well funded and putting it in the right direction.

In the next year, we are facing a constitutional crisis in this country. We are going to need a strong CBC that reflects fairly the major issues in this country. We are going to need to reflect Canada to the world. That is why I am glad the government has brought in this amendment.

I say to the minister that he should not be inconsistent. Do not bring in this amendment and then turn around and cut all the funds in the CBC, especially the funds for the international service.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate, and I am delighted to see the minister in our midst. Some words of welcome are in order, and it is a great pleasure to see him back in the House. I must say we missed him, and it is indeed a pleasure to see him here today.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister has had time to read the amendments with the requisite care, especially those put forward by our colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal. The hon. member put a great deal of time and effort into these amendments and came up with some excellent ones which I will now mention, if I may, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Mount Royal wants the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide an all-news service in French and English, a service that is badly needed. There is, of course, Newsworld on the English network, which I think is very good and which provides a 24-hour service. However, although this is excellent for Canadians, at the present time we do not have a similar service in French, although the need is there.

Mr. Speaker, during the crisis at Oka last summer, for instance, we could get a steady stream of information on the English channel, while no similar service was available in French. I think Canadians, whether they are French-speaking or English-speaking, had the right to be informed about a matter of this importance, whatever their position happened to be on this question.

The fact remains that we had the right, as I see it, to be better informed on this question, and when I say we, I mean the French-speaking population. In fact, we were not getting the same level of service in French as we were getting in English because of the lack of a 24-hour tv news channel.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of the members in this House who had the privilege of learning both official languages of our country at a very early age, and I regularly watch the news on television in French and in English. I often wonder whether several times a week, we could perhaps translate the French news on Radio-Canada into English and take the English news on the CBC and translate it into French, so that Canadians would know what is happening on the other network, because the news we get on the English network is often quite different from the news we get on the French network, reflecting a different perspective.

As far as the regional question is concerned, I think the French network concentrates far too much on central Canada and tells us very little about remote areas, unlike the English network which does a better job.

I think it would be an interesting exercise to let French-speaking Canadians see the English news, translated into French of course, and vice versa, as I said earlier. I think Canadians need more exposure to the news broadcast in the other official language.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I think we should also compliment the hon. member for Mount Royal for proposing to this House that there should be an inclusion in the bill regarding northern service and, of course, regarding Radio Canada International. When we speak about the northern service, again we are talking about an amendment that was proposed by our colleague from Mount Royal who, very thoughtfully, proposed that there be such a reference in the bill. I say to the minister, across the way, that he should stop being so partisan and look at things objectively.

Mr. Karygiannis: He is not listening.

Mr. Boudria: I know the minister is listening; he is listening attentively, I can tell. With the close attention that he is paying to this debate, I am sure that he will want to consider the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Mount Royal. I see him nodding, right now, in favour of those amendments. I am sure that that nod indicates that the minister wants to approve those amendments of the member for Mount Royal.

Now in the unlikely event that he is so biased that he refuses to consider those amendments, I will say that it is to the peril of this government. More importantly, I think we must entrench in legislation the need to have the CBC and Radio Canada not only transmit programming to Canadians but transmit information to Canadians which will assist the theme of national unity.

I know that will be addressed in a later amendment but I still wanted to take this very brief opportunity to raise it now because the need to promote national unity is an important component in the job of the CBC and Radio–Canada. I think it should be part of their mandate. I intend to support the amendments of my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal, to that effect and to support her tremendous initiatives in improving this bill.

In conclusion, we must not only continue to ensure that the CBC operates well and in the interests of Canada, we cannot take chances with the government across the way, and we must include in legislation some of the components of the CBC mandate to ensure that in a fit of privatization or cutting back, such as the Tories take from time to time, the government does not sacrifice some very valuable programming of the CBC.

I want to make one further point which relates to the parliamentary service. Again, that is set out in Motion No. 12, proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal. I know that the parliamentary service is available to a large number of Canadians at the present time, but access to the parliamentary service should be made even easier. I say this because a number of cable distributors have made it such that the parliamentary service is only accessible by means of a television converter. I cannot see why it cannot be one of the basic channels for at least one parliamentary service.

I would even go further and say that all three channels should be on the converter so that Canadians can listen to the House of Commons in the language spoken from the floor, as well as in their choice of English or French, but all three could be on cable and at least one of them should be available on the basic service without the converter.

I conclude with those comments and I ask the minister, across the way, to support the amendments of the hon. member for Mount Royal.

• (1210 )

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by following up on the comments of my colleague who raised a very good point about availability of the CBC Parliamentary channel on the regular service. Several cable companies have put it into a channel which cannot be reached by low–income Canadians.

I know in my riding where people have an older TV and cannot afford to buy a new TV, they cannot watch the proceedings of the House of Commons when they are carried on a channel in the 20's. This coverage is one way we have of communicating with Canadians.

There are a whole range of problems. I wish the government, through the CRTC, would show more concern about this removal of service. It is not a small issue for Canadians, just one of those issues that gets lost in the shuffle. There are many low–income Canadians who wish the opportunity to participate in these debates through watching them and writing letters to the members when they agree or disagree with us. That simply is not available if it requires a new TV or a converter.

I would like to talk in this debate about the role of CBC in these particular areas. When I was listening to the debate a few days ago, I was struck by the number of members from all parties who stood up in support of the CBC and recognized that this government was not showing to Canadians the support that it has traditionally shown to the Crown corporation.

Throughout the last 50 years of broadcasting in Canada, the CBC has been a cornerstone of how we communicate. It has become a greater preoccupation as we enter into the debate on national unity. Every day the newspapers have one story after another about the near collapse of the country, the depression that we feel, our inability to communicate with each other. We realize that for any party to put this country back together, it must find the building blocks. The CBC, now as in the past, is one of those building blocks.

I know there has been a great deal of criticism, as alluded to by another member, and that journalists had been attacking the CBC, but that is part of the game. There are times when the CBC does a good job. There are other times, like any other Crown corporation, when it does not do such a good job. Nevertheless, taking an historical perspective, CBC is one of the few building blocks that we have for communicating among Canadians.

In order to begin to set out a national dream and find a sense of purpose for Canadians, we need a vehicle by which to to communicate. The drive behind that communication cannot simply be commercial interest. There also has to be a non-profit, public purpose organization which can drive us into a forum which allows us to communicate through the regular broadcast of news services and the specials that can be put on in the public affairs area give CBC a role to perform.

Perhaps one of the most important services that is provided to us is the CBC English and French radio services which provide a commonalty of communications through all the remote areas. It does not matter whether you live in Toronto, like my colleague, in my riding in Winnipeg, or in the Northwest Territories as other colleagues do, there is a commonalty there.

If you accept that CBC is one of the building blocks that we should be protecting and enhancing, we have to make sure that the CBC services which are of value to the country are protected. For example, the parliamentary service, which I already discussed, is considered to be a key window for Canadians to view Parliament. Canadians deserve access to its proceedings.

The challenge for us as parliamentarians is to ensure that the new legislative framework and funding arrangements will make adequate and appropriate provision for the full and effective use of the parliamentary channel. I think there can be a great deal of expansion if it is properly funded. That should not be left silent in the legislation. There should be an amendment to show our support for the parliamentary service.

In light of what is happening in the Middle East right now, one of the most important services is Radio Canada International. Our critic, the member for Mount Royal, yesterday asked the government if it was still supportive of Radio Canada International particularly in the Arabic services in the Middle East.

When you see how quickly propaganda can be used to put us on the edge of war, a peaceful way of communicating to a captive audience—captive in someone else's hands rights now—is very important. Again we just cannot assume that the corporation will protect those in times of cutbacks. We have to say through Parliament that this is one of the services that we want it to protect and we are willing to pay for it.

Third, there is the all-news service. One of the great experiments in Canada in the last year has been the development of Newsworld. I can attest as a parliamentarian just how dramatically it has changed the coverage of Parliament and the coverage of other events.

Canadians now participate much more closely with world events because they are brought to us in an immediate fashion. It does not matter whether we are talking about the justice inquiry into aboriginal affairs in Manitoba or the inquiry into abuse in Newfoundland. No issue is too small and no issue is too big to be shared by Canadians.

What Newsworld does in terms of communications is that it pulls away the cost factor of big-time television and, more important, it removes the time factor to allow for the greater explanation of events and permit people to see things unfold, rather than be compacted into a 15-second clip, or compacted into a 90-second item. The subject can be expanded so that people who are really interested in an issue have an opportunity to see it take place.

For example, on Newsworld out of Winnipeg there is a call-in program on which Canadians have an opportunity at noon each day of the week, except for weekends, to phone in and to speak about issues of the day.

We as parliamentarians get a little lazy, I think, because we accept that we have an opportunity to stand up in the House whenever we want to express our opinions. For every one of us there are 80,000 Canadians who do not have that opportunity and it is our responsibility to give them every avenue possible so their views can be expressed. They have a way of talking about the problems facing this country without going through politicians. They should be able to do so just by picking up the phone and talking to people, or watching television to see somebody talking about Parliament, again not in a 90-second clip, but at great length and in great detail.

These are the sorts of services which are needed. In a country becoming as impoverished as Canada is becoming, mainly because of the laziness of the government in taxation issues, and its inability to manage the economy and where we are faced with such an overwhelming debt, people begin to feel that they cannot afford to do this or cannot afford to do that. They feel that maybe television and radio are not important. It is time to stand up right now and say that these services are important and that the purpose of Parliament is to protect those services from people who do not understand their importance.

Obviously, in this debate the government does not understand the importance of the CBC. Perhaps it is because the Liberal Party is so proud of its tradition of building national organizations, of supporting national institutions, that we naturally rise up to the occasion to defend the CBC. We are astonished by the silence in the other parties.

As I sit in the House today I cannot believe that the NDP cannot contribute more to this debate. They should be rising to speak on this issue too. I think the reason they cannot do so is because they do not know where they stand on national unity. They do not know what the role of a national institution should be. When we hear more from them we will begin to understand whether or not they want to be a national party of purpose or just some rump group sitting over in the corner of the House of Commons.

These are very serious issues, not partisan issues. They are issues that we should all be addressing and we look forward to their contribution and I am sure that sooner or later they will have something to say. I look forward to the government being receptive to the amendments being proposed by our critic who has done a first-class job of bringing to the attention of all Canadians the importance of the CBC.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I return to the subject of Radio Canada International which I brought to the attention of this House yesterday. I know that the minister was not able to be present yesterday but I did ask for serious consideration of the assurance that Radio Canada International be maintained as an integral arm and a broadcasting voice to the international community as a voice of reason, a voice of a middle-western power, and something that the world scene requires.

It is not enough that the BBC, which is an important voice, or the Voice of America be heard, this middle power which is Canada and which is so highly respected across the land must also be heard.

I pointed out yesterday that CBC is in a very serious and difficult position because it is constrained. It cannot deficit finance, as the minister knows, and it cannot borrow.

I addressed my comments to the President of the Treasury Board, because in the final analysis the money that is allocated to CBC is determined by Treasury Board jointly with the Minister of Communications.

It is through their allocation of funds—actually through the starvation that they have undertaken of CBC— that we are, at this point, concerned about the maintenance of Radio Canada International as a viable voice of Canada to Canadians overseas and to countries that are looking for this middle level, democratic voice, that expresses cultural values in the two official languages here in Canada, English and French, and close to 1,400 other languages, which is an absolutely important function.

I have added this amendment because of our experience with the newly emerging democracies, the newly emerging democratic societies of this world who look to countries like Canada to understand democratic process.

I think that this House and the general public should know that the Speaker of the House of Commons asked that Mr. Philip Laundy be named as one of the officers of the House to enable Canadians and the Canadian democratic process to be understood by these newly emerging democracies.

Radio Canada International is in a similar position as the Speaker—the new one who is sitting there right now—and the Table Officers, men and women who in a non-partisan way help the instances of democracy work.

Radio Canada International is in the same position. The problem, perhaps, is that society does not understand the key role that is played by this service at a cost of $20 million a year to Canadians.

Not only does it bring a voice other than Saddam Hussein to Iraqis and Kuwaitis, enabling them to hear democratic views, it also brings the voice to our men and women who are soldiers playing a peacekeeping role on the front in many parts of the world.

I want to point out that 1990, which was a watershed year for freedom, came about in many ways because of the impact of voices like Radio Canada International.

I remember when we were discussing Tiananmen Square, we sat in this House until 3 a.m. Perhaps I was remiss but I thought it was very important to speak not only about the strength and the character of the young students who were in the square or the people's wish and hope for democracy. I spoke about the cameramen and the journalists who were in there bringing to the world a vision and a view so that we could understand what was going on.

At the same time, that voice—Radio Canada International—was bringing a picture of what was happening in that dynamism, in that moment of hope and then despair that was Tiananmen Square.

Mr. Speaker, the crumbling of the Berlin Wall and the changing dynamic in Europe did not happen without the voice of freedom that was heard on radio through short wave, through international voice.

It was very much the role of Radio Canada International. I wonder how many of us know that within days of the Tiananmen Square massacre, we began two daily broadcasts to China in Mandarin. We placed Radio Canada International material on local radio in three of the east European countries to which we broadcast already by short wave?

Through state broadcasts in Poland, Czechoslovakia and a private station in Hungary, all these countries were hearing the voice of freedom, the voice of democracy, the voice of a middle-sized nation, not one of the power brokers of this world, through Radio Canada International. These countries needed our voice. Now we are arranging training programs through Radio Canada International for nine broadcasters who are here from Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary on topics that range from journalistic policy and freedoms to the administration and sale of commercials, on how to bring the concepts of a democratic and free society together with advertising as a means of income for these stations. We have had staff exchanges through Radio Canada International.

We have an incredible challenge through the international broadcasting voice in the Persian Gulf right now. I think many of my colleagues have alluded to what is going on in a very serious crisis that is at the flash-point in the Middle East. How can we hope that both sanctions will work and peace will come about because Saddam Hussein finally comes to his senses and realizes that you cannot just march in and repress another country? If his voice is the only one heard, how will the citizens start to react? Through the international broadcasting voice we can have an inside citizen understanding and we can work with the people of Kuwait and the people of Iraq and have them understand that our presence in that Persian Gulf is to enable a peaceful solution, not to become aggressors in war as a first step. If we do not sensitize, through a democratic voice, who else are they going to hear?

I am saying that when we put Arabic on the air in the Middle East we were rendering a very important service in the national interest. Although we contributed that $10 million to our forces, as our part of the $350 million that was being sought, we were still contributing to the development of the national interest and the national concerns of Canada and Canadians by explaining Canada's presence in the Gulf, by explaining the role of sanctions, by explaining why Saddam Hussein does not have the right to just walk in and trample on the people and the property of Kuwait.

Those are things that we can do so that we can emphasize the country's motivation in joining the multinational expeditionary force. We have made our airways available to Canadians so that Canadians could try to reach their families and friends in the Gulf area. We set up special telephone lines through Radio Canada International.

Radio Canada International has been very creative because it has not had the means needed to reach all these areas of the world. Although it does, with 14 languages through Montreal and then through their station in New Brunswick, broadcast to many parts of the world, in many parts of the world it has had to undertake joint contracts through Japan, through the BBC. It has been extremely creative.

I would like to really plead with the minister and say to him that he may not want to accept my amendment on the parliamentary channel to ensure that there is always the decision of the Speaker and the decision of this House in a non-partisan way. He may not want to ensure northern services. I think he is wrong, but he may not wish to. He may not wish to ensure all news particularly in French as well as in English as part of the CBC services, but certainly the international voice of Canada should be maintained. I plead with the minister to accept the amendment which was proposed, by the way, by a member from his own side, the member for St. Maurice. I would hope that we can see Radio Canada International enabled to be present on the international world scene because it could eventually be an even more important voice in the international voice for democracy and understanding across the world.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to speak in the debate on report stage of a very important bill. The CBC has given this country the opportunity to reach across the globe for almost 50 years and convey to people what is happening in Canada and abroad. If I am not mistaken, I believe that we initiated CBC Radio International right after World War II. Our people in the Armed Forces were able to listen to what was happening at home and we were able to convey to them the message of support. We were able to convey to them that we at home are very supportive of their efforts and tribulations. Then, we went to the Korean War and our army overseas was again able to listen to the feelings of the people at home.

We have had peacekeeping forces for the past 25 to 30 years serving world-wide. In 1989, I visited Cyprus where I had the opportunity to speak to a lot of our people who are there in peacekeeping forces. They related to me how important it is to be able to listen to Radio Canada International, the short wave of the Canada voice coming to them. It makes sure that we do not forget them, and makes sure that they can participate and be active Canadians while halfway around the world. They can understand what is happening here. The newspapers take about four or five days to reach there, but Radio Canada International can be there simultaneously, the same night.

We have something else which is important. That is parliamentary services of Canada. This government is notorious about a number of things. I say that, Mr. Speaker, n-o-t-o-r-i-o-u-s, "no Tory us". Why am I saying "no Tory us?" We have seen this government plummet to a 14 per cent rating. We are not sure if the government wants to chop off completely the parliamentary service because it does not want the rest of the Canadian people to watch what we are doing in this great House.

I have the opportunity from time to time to rise in the House and speak. My constituents come to me and criticize what I say or give me a pat on the back for what I say. I wonder if the minister sitting across—and I see he is nodding his head—also has the same from his constituents and most of his colleagues in government. We can see from the recent polls that at 14 per cent the government does not want this "no Tory us" nonsense broadcast. I would not be surprised for one single minute if over the next couple of months the proposals the government is putting forward to chop the budget, gut the CBC, is not done on purpose because and I quote: "476 Canadian cable companies have this as of March, 1989 and this is available to 7.7 million households".

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell also pointed out that the parliamentary channel should not only be available with a converter, but should be on a regular channel in French and English so that if people who live in the west want to watch it in French, they have the opportunity, or people in Quebec, if they want to watch it in English, also have the opportunity, or vice versa.

It is very important that we keep this service going because we have noticed that this government from time to time to time does not want the public to know what is happening. It wants to hoodwink the public, so it sweeps it under the rug.

I come to the next issue. Why the changes? Are we losing so much money that we want the changes? Are we going to privatize the CBC? Did I hear someone say yes? The minister is sort of nodding his head.

I go back to what we did with CN Express when we privatized it and gave it to Route Canada. The government was going to guarantee three years of service to our people. Eighteen months down the line, bang, we privatized Air Canada and 2,900 jobs were lost. We are moving to privatize Petro-Canada. I wonder how many jobs will be lost? We are moving to privatize everything. I wonder, is the CBC going to be privatized next?

Mr. Volpe: The minister says yes.

Mr. Karygiannis: Ah, so there lies the culprit. We are going to move into privatization. Shame on the government, real shame on this government.

The other thing of great importance is CBC Newsworld. In September, Toronto lost the bid to have the Olympics in 1996.

Mr. Volpe: It was a shameful decision.

Mr. Karygiannis: My colleague from Eglinton–Lawrence says it was a shameful decision. I agree with my colleague because I am a Torontonian, but my heart also felt that the Olympics was eventually going to go back to its birthplace. It is something about celebrating the centenary. I was at a dilemma. What happened took me out of that dilemma.

However, it is important to note why the decision was made that the Olympics went to the United States. CNN was pumping directly into those peoples bedrooms and in their hotel rooms, scenes from where else? Scenes from Canada. Scenes about Oka and the turbulence with the Indians. It was also pumping into their hotel rooms the turbulence about Greece. We have seen how CNN effectively moved for them to get the Olympic games. Toronto lost and my city of birth also lost.

CBC Newsworld promotes national unity. There is no better means than having this opportunity for people, on channel 17 in Ottawa and on different channels across our country, to tune in through a converter box. Rather than requiring a converter box, this should be available on a regular channel so that Canadians can tune in and get more than a 20-second clip of what the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition said. I am sure they are not interested as to what the first said, but I am sure they are interested as to what the second said. Canadians have noticed that we go back to "No Tory Us." The people of this country are tired of listening to what the Tory government has to say. They tune in to CBC Newsworld and they watch with great importance. They look at the news that we have to provide. Yet this government, once it got CBC altogether in 1989—

Mr. Walker: Shame.

Mr. Karygiannis: Shame, my colleague from Winnipeg says. In 1989, when the Tiananmen massacre broke, we were among the first nations to reach into mainland China with service in Mandarin and Cantonese and tell the people of China that we were supportive. We were among the first nations to reach and applaud the efforts of the students.

We are faced today with the situation in Middle East. We have approximately 2,000 servicemen in the Middle East. These servicemen watch with interest in what is happening in Canada. They watch and listen with interest to what we are doing.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are giving me the nod that I have only a few seconds left. I am going to pose this question to the minister. I know it is going to fall on "No Tory Us" because of deaf ears.

Mr. Speaker, I ask through you, and I know the minister is not going to listen. Mr. Minister, what is your real purpose of this? Do you want to privatize CBC? Do you want to gut it, so it shows that it is making money, like you did with the post office and everything else? If that is the real thing, shame on them. This country wants no more "No Tory Us."

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill C-40 which gives the government an opportunity to improve broadcasting services to the Canadian public and guarantee on-going parliamentary services of Radio Canada International, the Newsworld and the northern information services.

Our culture cannot survive without these services. Let us be mindful of the fact that Canada is not a uniform country but one where cultural, linguistic and geographical diversities play a very significant role. This is why the government cannot afford to miss this opportunity to maintain through legislation all the essential services of the all-Canadian CBC network. We simply cannot cut off the communication links which make it possible for Canadians to learn to appreciate their diversity.

• (1240)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this government will be missing a great opportunity to enshrine in this legislation services that the Canadian public both needs and wants. That is why I support the changes so eloquently put forward by the hon. member for Mount Royal.

It is clear that the Conservatives are backing down from recommendations that their own members supported in the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture in 1987. Unfortunately for Canadians, it seems that this government refuses to listen to some of the progressive recommendations that come from the committees of this House. Mr. Speaker, as you well know, Canadians across this country have access to this place through one primary mechanism, the parliamentary service.

Canadians deserve a service to view their elected representatives in action. They deserve to have an unbiased and undisguised presentation of how their MPs perform their tasks. The challenge is to make certain that the new legislative framework and the funding arrangements will make adequate and appropriate provision for the full and effective use of the parliamentary service. Millions of Canadians who cannot come to Ottawa or who do not want to rely solely on media reports, tune in to watch us here in this Chamber. For more than a year, this service has been available to more than 80 per cent or 7.7 million Canadian households.

I firmly believe that it is worth while to legislatively ensure a continuation of this window on Parliament. May I add that I would be very interested to hear what objections the Conservatives have to this progressive amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation must cover Radio Canada International because its role has put Canada on the world scene. Other world countries have heard about us through this international network.

Radio Canada International came on the air in 1942 and the first network programs were heard in Europe in 1944. With respect to the international community, the RCI mandate is to reflect Canadian life and the various opinions which prevail in this country, not to mention various programs intended for Canadians overseas.

Mr. Speaker, Radio Canada International has a staff of 194 and listeners everywhere in Europe, Asia, the Caribbean Islands, Latin America, the Pacific, Africa and the Middle East. At least 16 million listeners tune in to Radio Canada International programs on a weekly basis.

Nor can we ignore the fact that RCI promotes employment equity for linguistic minorities. Services in a wide variety of languages are a source of employmnent and contribute to promoting an ever widening multi-ethnic, multilingual and cultural society.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this service has proved to be a beacon to countries which are emerging into democracy. Within days of the massacre in Tiananmen Square, when the Chinese pro-democracy protesters were suppressed, Radio Canada International began daily broadcasts to China in Mandarin. In October, the service switched to a full Chinese program service with two half-hour transmissions a day.

When a people are oppressed and when they do not have any source of information other than official government propaganda, services such as ours prove to be indispensable. They offer a ray of hope to a people who are starved for information. These people need to know that their struggle abroad is not forgotten.

I feel that this service deserves to be enshrined in the legislation.

It proves to be even more important now than ever. The situation in the Persian Gulf is critical. We have sent over 1,000 Canadians to a hostile area and have asked them to put their lives on the line for us. It is obvious to say that the need to have the service in the gulf is paramount. It is not only essential for our troops but for the people of the region to understand our true intentions.

For example, we should let the people of Iraq know that our quarrel is not with them but with Saddam Hussein. As we all know, effective propaganda on the part of the Iraqi dictatorship scewers the information that may be related to Canadian involvement in the region.

One must also remember that hundreds of thousands of Canadians at home listen to these broadcasts. They assist in promoting our multicultural and multilinguistic character. It provides a unifying voice for all Canadians, be they here or abroad. I respectfully submit that these facts should help in convincing the government to accept Motions Nos. 12 through 15, as well as Motion No. 42.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation brought in Newsworld to provide news with a uniquely Canadian perspective. This channel gives a detailed review of events affecting all Canadians. However, it is disappointing that the service is only available in English. As a Quebecer, I think we should have this kind of services in French as well. I am sure this would lead to a greater degree of tolerance.

[English]

Finally, we cannot forget the fact that Canada is an arctic country. Our northern service is important to Inuit, Indian, Dene, Métis, and non-native groups. This service provides our northern citizens with programs in seven native languages. All these essential agencies must be preserved and protected within the legislation.

Liberals are concerned that this government is missing a chance to protect and recognize CBC services in this bill. I sincerely hope that members opposite consider the motions put forward by the member for Mount Royal and support them before passing this bill.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for providing me with this opportunity to speak on a bill which threatens to do irreparable damage to our country's public broadcasting system.

Canada's history is rich and it is testimony to the strength of character and determination of our forefathers. In fact, without such a determination to be Canadian, combined with the guiding hand of government participation in a variety of sectors, Canada would definitely not have thrived nor asserted its national identity so strongly on the world stage.

This country is the fruit of the efforts and the will of our forefathers to build a nation east and west, to unite the land. Successive governments gave us a national railway system, a post office, a national radio and TV network, a national airline, as well as a variety of measures to help develop Canada as we know it.

If you look at what the Tories have done to the institutions I have just mentioned, you will be well on your way to understanding why the country is experiencing such an identity crisis and why so many Canadians have become so cynical about their government.

The privatization of Petro-Canada, the gutting of VIA Rail, the auctioning of Air Canada, and now the undermining of our national broadcasting system. All these policies were designed by a government seemingly intent on turning our country into an empty shelf. Frankly, I do not know how much more of this kind of mindless treatment our Canada can endure.

On a more positive note, Canadians have always been leaders in the field of communications, not only in telecommunications, but we have actually produced two world-class thinkers in communication theory. Harold Innis and Marshall McLuhan have set the standard as far as the study of communications is concerned. It would be an understatement to say that these two men contributed significantly to the affirmation of Canadian identity on the world stage.

It would be sad to see the progress we have made in this area come to nothing. I am amazed that the Conservative government has taken steps to undermine one of the pillars of of nationhood at a time when Canada is seriously questioning its raison d'être.

• (1250 )

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the 1968 Broadcasting Act required that CBC contribute to the development of national unity. Unfortunately all reference to this has been eliminated from Bill C-40.

Moreover, the government's proposed broadcast policy stipulates measures which could, as the hon. member for Mount Royal has said, cause the disintegration of the national broadcasting system. The shortcomings of Bill C-40 which include the creation of two separate standing committees for English and French language broadcasting at the CBC, the failure to recognize various CBC services specifically, the regionalization of the CRTC, and the potential loss of federal jurisdiction will seriously undermine a system which has helped unite our country from sea to sea.

Although Bill C–40 is flawed, I believe that the amendments proposed by the member for Mount Royal go a long way in addressing and correcting its shortcomings.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the amendments proposed by the Liberal Party, contained in motions Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16, are aimed at ensuring the integrity of our broadcasting system. First of all, they would help the Corporation maintain its role of contributing to national unity and being a permanent expression of Canadian identity. Second, they would ensure recognition for and continuity of the following elements: the Parliamentary Service, Radio Canada International, the all–news service in English and in French and the northern Service. Motion No. 42 further refines the provisions concerning Radio Canada International.

Unfortunately, if the government does not act wisely and fails to approve the amendments we are proposing, Canadian broadcasting will be severly affected. And what about the unity of our country? If the Corporation is denied that part of its mandate which is to contribute to the development of our Canadian identity, one of the pillars of our collective consciousness will have ceased to exist.

Mr. Speaker, you will agree this is not the right time to approve such a policy. According to the government, this change in the 1968 Broadcasting Act is justified because the national unity clause would handicap the Corporation's ability to encure that its programming fully, fairly and accurately reflects and interprets the cultural, social, political, economic, linguistic and regional realities of Canada.

This does not stand up under analysis. In fact, Pierre Juneau, former President of the Corporation, stated before the Standing Committee that the phrase "national unity" did not cause him any problems during his mandate. In fact, the CRTC made it clear that its interpretation of this term had never hindered free political discussion.

The Liberal Party feels that the Corporation must maintain its contribution to developing national unity, especially at a time when Canada seems so divided. If Canada is to have and maintain a national identity, we must bring all regions of this country together and create a feeling of belonging, and we can do through a well–shuchired broadcasting system.

Interestingly, even the chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture supports the principle that the Corporation must maintain its mandate in this respect.

[English]

The minister has dismissed the CBC's 22–year old national unity mandate as intolerant interference, because the agency was maintaining this political value artificially and it was a constraint on freedom of expression.

I would like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, one of the more serious shortcomings of the bill. As we mentioned earlier, it fails to recognize various CBC services. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention some of these services and highlight their importance.

The failure of Bill C–40 to recognize the CBC's all–news network in either English or French is extremely unfortunate, since we have seen that the corporation has made incredible progress in this area. I believe that this extremely innovative undertaking ought to be officially recognized.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, I come from New Brunswick which is the only officially bilingual province in the nation. English and French citizens have learned to live together in my home province. In many ways we have demonstrated to the rest of the country what biculturalism is all about.

It seems to me that the recognition of the CBC all–news network would be important and that it would help create and foster a sense of nationhood. Moreover, the development of a French all–news network would go a long way toward helping relieve some of the tensions which our country now faces.

As for the other services including the parliamentary service, Radio Canada International and the CBC northern service, I believe that the government should heed the advice contained in the 1987 sixth report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. It should provide these services with legal recognition in order to help forestall the possibility of abolition in times of budgetary restraint.

CBC is in a very difficult position at this time, as it can neither operate with a deficit nor can it borrow money. The minister well knows this. It is very important that the government and the minister put in this bill the power to guarantee the place for CBC and to guarantee its future budgets.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can see that it is approaching 12.56 p.m. I know that I will be stopping at 12.58 p.m. and will be speaking on this legislation after three o'clock.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Mount Royal on her amendment to the legislation, an amendment that we support whole-heartedly. We believe that those amendments are fundamental. They are very important amendments made in good faith. It is our hope that the government will take those amendments to heart and will deal with them accordingly.

As it has indicated before, the CBC is a must. It is not a luxury. It is not something that our society or our country can live without. CBC is a necessity for our society. It does not matter how we look at it, whether we are talking about our culture, Canadian unity, our history, the Canada that we want to build and see 15, 20 or 100 years from now, CBC always has been in the past and still is on the leading edge in promoting Canadian unity and culture.

We only have to look at Newsworld, as one example as my colleagues indicated a little earlier. That is one of the very few broadcasting institutions in our country where 90 per cent of its broadcasting is purely Canadian. That is something we have to pride ourselves in and to commend CBC on providing.

The second service is the parliamentary channel. I have been informed that over 7.7 million Canadians listen to the parliamentary channel on a regular basis. That is another very important service that is provided by CBC.

Of course that is not to mention Canada International, the international news system which we have in place. Nowadays, when Canada has an incredible, excellent and great reputation internationally, I think to turn around and shut down such an institution internationally would not serve our purpose or our country.

As many of my colleagues have indicated, we do support the amendment. I can see the clock approaching 1 p.m. At this point in time, I would like to commend my colleague on introducing those great amendments. I will be speaking on the bill a little later.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

POST OFFICE CLOSURE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canada Post announced that it is going to be closing the Yorkton post office on March 1, 1991.

Yorkton is a city of nearly 20,000 people, a trading area of some tens of thousands of people, and despite that this callous government across the way wants to close the post office.

I want is a justification from the government across the way as to why they it is doing it. I also want it to reverse that decision because if Yorkton, with at almost 20,000 people, goes, then what about the other towns and the other small cities across Saskatchewan and across Canada? How long is it before Kamsack, Estevan, or Weyburn are closed as well?

The government across the way does not give a damn about rural Canada. I invite today the back-benchers of the Conservative Party to stand up and join me in a fight to save the Yorkton post office, to reverse that decision, to stand up for rural Canada, and to stand up for some of the historical values and contributions made in the country by rural people. What is it doing to our rural way of life, to a service that people need, and a service that people want? Justify the decision and reverse it.

POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, there are many people on Rural Routes 1 and 2, Renfrew, Ontario, who wish that Canada Post would take their complaints about mail service seriously.

On October 1, Canada Post decided to award one contract for the two rural mail routes to a person who does not live on either route. Canada Post unceremoniously dispensed with two well-liked and efficient contractors who knew everyone along the way. In return, it gave the people a service where cheques and other types of mail were ending up in neighbours' mailboxes; letters that were put in mailboxes for the contractor to pick up were left in the mailboxes; a businessman lost the opportunity to bid on a contract because the tender was floating around in the system; and wrongly delivered letters that were put back into the mailboxes with instructions as to where they belonged were being delivered back into the same mailboxes a few days later.

Customers on RR 1 and 2 Renfrew want me to call on Canada Post again to treat their legitimate complaints seriously, to review the contract that was granted on October 1, to talk to the customers about the type of mail service they are receiving and to get this serious problem settled now.

AGRICULTURE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my compliments go out to the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture who recently agreed in Winnipeg to several initiatives recommended by agri-food policy review task forces.

One in particular will lead to the creation of an agri-food advisory council for environmental sustainability. This council will advise ministers on resource base and environmental policy issues for the agri-food sector. This is one element of a three-part strategy relating to the conservation of soil and water and the protection of the environment. The strategy will also involve the private sector which will advise on programs in each province relating to the sustainability of agricultural resources.

Hon. members anxiously await the ministers' next meeting scheduled for February when they will assess the situation following the conclusion of the GATT negotiations and discuss the cost-sharing formula of the proposed safety net system.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, we can see that the GST is already hurting our economy. For example, under the GST transitional rules all industries, except the housing industry, will get rebates for inventory on hand at December 31, 1990.

With new housing, purchasers of homes started prior to that date will qualify for an FST rebate of 2.8 per cent of the purchase price if they close before February 15, 1991. They get nothing after that date. All inventory standing as of December 31 carries the full FST and is subject to full GST if unsold by March 31. That inventory will suffer a double taxation.

A high interest rate policy and a phenomenon of walk-away purchasers are exacerbating that problem. Those in housing propose one simple, corrective solution. Specifically, will the Minister of Finance extend the deadlines for the FST rebate provisions, or will he allow builders the same rebates available to purchasers, following the March 31, 1991 deadline?

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the concept of regional development is frequently misunderstood by many Canadians, particularly those in regions who do not require such help.

We must always remember that Canada is a confederation of regional distinctions, some of which have economic advantages over others. One principle of Confederation is a fair balance between regions so that economic advantage and disadvantage are equalized.

All too often, regional development is characterized as charity. Nothing could be further from fact. Regional development is a right in Confederation. That is why the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is so crucial to the Atlantic region. It is a program of fundamental economic advantage to these four provinces, which is designed to provide the potential for economic balance with more affluent regions of Canada.

It is not only important that we maintain ACOA's advantage, it is even more important that we use it wisely and well to create lasting benefits which, themselves, will help achieve the balance and may, eventually, even remove the need for special regional aid. Until then, regional development is a unique and essential instrument of Canadian Confederation in Atlantic Canada and elsewhere.

INUIT RELOCATION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we are appalled by an article in The Ottawa Citizen today which denies the suffering endured by Inuit of northern Quebec, who were relocated to the Canadian high Arctic in the 1950s as part of a government initiative. It is obvious that the writer has not spoken to any of the Inuit involved, nor does he have any personal knowledge of the circumstances and hardships which confronted these Inuit people.

The writer accuses the survivors and descendants of the relocation of spreading garbage. Perhaps this writer, unlike the people who were relocated, never had to forage through a white man's dump because he was hungry.

The article is misinformed, ill-researched, and pompous. Not only do these Inuit people deserve recognition of their suffering and an apology from the Canadian government, they now deserve an apology from the writer of this disgraceful article.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, from December 3 to December 7, International Trade ministers from 100 or so GATT member States will meet in Brussels to conclude the Uruguay Round and make decisions on the future of world trade. This Round is the most ambitious one we have known since 1948.

The Union des producteurs agricoles in Abitibi—Témiscamingue has made frequent representations during the past few months. It is afraid the Canadian government's strategy consists in gaining access to international markets for our wheat in exchange for dropping subsidies and production support programs in Eastern Canada for milk, beef, pork, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian representatives must stand up for our farm producers in Quebec and Canada.

PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, in La Presse, we were again treated to one of those recycled statements by "Lord Screech". Premier Clyde Wells was at it again, and all I can say is that although as Quebecers, we patiently listened to him for eighteen months when there was still hope for renewed federalism, today, our patience has run out. We will not stand for lectures from the Premier of Newfoundland on citizenship or Politics 101, Mr. Speaker.

The Premier of Newfoundland had the nerve to say that the Bélanger–Campeau Commission was unlawful. Mr. Speaker, we have news for the Premier. The Bélanger–Campeau Commission will serve as a guide for all Quebecers in deciding on their common future, and nothing Clyde Wells can do will stop them. Quebecers have nothing to learn from " Lord Screech" who says today it is up to the federal government to decide on our future.

Mr. Speaker, the right to self-determination is internationally recognized. Even Newfoundland called a referendum to decide whether it would join Canada. And today, they would deny us the same basic right? Mr. Speaker, that is unacceptable!

Mr. Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, today 12 different housing interest groups are on Parliament Hill lobbying for continued support for co-operative housing by the federal government.

They want the federal government to make a commitment now to continue direct sponsorship of the index-linked co-operative housing program in 1991 and beyond. The income mix as it now exists in housing co-operatives has been developed over the past 20 years and allows people from different economic and social backgrounds to build strong, healthy communities together. The index-linked mortgage has significantly lowered the cost of developing non-profit, co-op housing. The current program costs 58 per cent less in the first year and almost 20 per cent less over a project's life than the previous program.

As the Federation of Canadian Municipalities' Big Cities Mayors Caucus has put it, it urges "the federal government to maintain the federal non-profit co-op housing program with the existing income mix component".

THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, more on NDP hypocrisy.

I am deeply concerned about both the Ontario New Democratic Party and their federal cousins here in Ottawa. It seems that they are unable to decide in which direction they are headed. Simply put, they do not know which end is up.

One example is the Ontario government, headed by back-flip Bob, who have reneged on a majority of election promises. Now these self-annointed environmentalists have proposed to extend the already overburdened Keele Valley Dump site, thus threatening the Oak Ridges Marine.

What makes this situation comical is that the federal NDP is putting forth a candidate claiming to be an environmental engineer, if you can believe it, in the York North by-election where the dump is located. This type of confusion is consistent with NDP policy-making. After all, the party to my left is where Big Bad Bob received his political training.

A second example of confusion politics is the NDP stand on constitutional reform. It has managed to cover all of its bases with a federal leader who states that she is a federalist, her entire Quebec caucus which believes in sovereignty-association, and a provincial leader who has absolutely no idea where he stands.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am truly worried about the NDP.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the gulf crisis is not an issue over which Canadians should seem to be divided.

It would seem that it has become the pattern of politics in the country that the opposition is not prepared to agree with the government even on the time of day or the weather forecast.

But Canadians cannot seem, nor should they be, divided on the actions of a Saddam Hussein. We cannot seem to be divided over the actions of a nation that arbitrarily invades its neighbours, or a leader who is prepared to use his nations' children as cannon fodder, or to gas his own troops.

The world is united against such actions and is preparing to send the message that such behaviour will not be tolerated, indeed will be repelled with force, if necessary.

Canada must stand unequivocally with our allies on this issue, and Canadians should stand united.

I urge all members of the House to put Canadian and world interests first, to lay aside their partisanship, and show Saddam Hussein and his ilk that their actions are totally unacceptable to Canadians.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Next week, Mr. Speaker, the representatives of 100 countries will meet in Brussels, Belgium, to seal the fate of international trade. For Quebec farmers and dairy producers, this round of GATT negotiations is one of the major indicators of the economic future of the whole agricultural community in Quebec. Since the mid 1980s the United States and the European Community have been waging a costly war to market their agricultural products, a war whose annual tab amounts to $300 billion in financial support of every description.

Mr. Speaker, I urge our governement to remain firm at the negotiation table so that our agricultural producers may keep what they have acquired through many years of efforts and sacrifices.

MILITARY FAMILY SUPPORT CENTRES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, as you know, my riding of Dartmouth is home to many of the men and women who are currently serving under three Canadian naval ships, HMCS Athasbaskan, HMCS Terra Nova and HMCS Protecteur which have been deployed in the Persian Gulf.

It is also home to the families who have been left behind while their loved ones go off to an area of the world in conflict. To say that these people—wives, husbands, children, parents, and friends—are living through a stressful period of time would be an understatement.

Fortunately, they do not have to wait in isolation. Thanks to the work of the Military Family Support Centre, under the direction of Lieutenant Commander Tom Willdey, they have been strengthened through the establishment of special Ships Spousal Support Networks for each of the ships on deployment.

It is a chance for the families who have been left behind to get together and get involved in activities, to be updated on Gulf news, or simply to enjoy the company of someone with whom they share a similar experience.

The idea of the Ships Spousal Networks is not new. They often come about when a vessel is away at sea. However, under these circumstances these networks are special and participants are describing them as a lifeline.

Thanks to the work of Lieutenant Commander Willdey, the staff, and volunteers at the military family support centre, these life lines remain strong. For that the families, the community, and members of all parties in the House of Commons thank them.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, a few veterans in my constituency were left with the mistaken impression that they would be adversely affected by spending cuts included in the supplementary estimates. I have discussed this matter with the Hon. Gerry Merrithew, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and am pleased to tell those veterans and the House that they will not be touched as the Department of Veterans Affairs finds $3 million in reductions.

For instance, there will be no reduction in budgets for disability pensions, no reductions in war veterans allowances, and no reductions in the Veterans Independence Program. The cost of transport for counsellors to veteran clients will not be cut. No cuts are being made in the operation of the veterans' hospital or veterans' homes. Reductions will only apply to operating and capital budgets so veterans in Calgary and across the country will not be adversely affected by spending cuts.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Canadians are aware of a draft resolution currently under discussion among members of the United Nations Security Council. This resolution would authorize all necessary means to get Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait on or before a deadline, likely this coming January 1 or January 15.

Yesterday, speaking from the Middle East, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote: "My personal view is that deadlines are artificial."

Will the Prime Minister confirm that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking for the government when he said that deadlines are artificial?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the resolution to which my hon. friend refers contains the words "draft resolution" because it is just being considered by members of the Security Council. It demands that Iraq comply fully with Resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and decides, while maintaining all of its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so.

I think that the Secretary of State spoke about what all members of the Security Council who seek peace and who seek the respect of the Security Council resolutions and not war, have been addressing. The pause of goodwill would be sufficient to allow the President of Iraq another opportunity to reflect upon actions that he has taken and to do what the world community unanimously has called upon him to do, namely, to withdraw from Kuwait and to return to the borders of his own country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not denied that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking for the government when he said that deadlines are artificial.

Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister: Has the government instructed its representatives at the United Nations Security Council to inform the other members of that council that Canada will not support a deadline being included in the draft resolution on Iraq currently being discussed among members of that council?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated very carefully what the Secretary of State for External Affairs is seeking to achieve, and it is consistent with the participants at the Security Council who on every resolution, of which this will be the eleventh, have supported almost unanimously the requests that the authority and the moral authority of the United Nations be respected and defended. Yesterday, for example, by way of illustration, it is reported that Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev delivered an ultimatum to Iraq last night warning it to withdraw from Kuwait or face the worst consequences. "If Iraq really wanted to settle within the entire region and is interested in avoiding the worst, it must now openly pull out of Kuwait and release hostages, " Gorbachev reportedly told Foreign Minister Aziz.

• (1420)

President Gorbachev said: "He must weigh everything once more. The fate of Iraq is now in the hands of its own leaders and time is expiring". Indeed, this is the language and the substance of the resolution. Time is indeed expiring. What Canada is seeking is the opportunity for the President of Iraq to weigh this very carefully and to make a considered decision, such as the one that President Gorbachev yesterday invited him to make in the interests of world peace.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we all welcome the interest of President Gorbachev in peacefully resolving this matter.

I did not hear any deadline mentioned in the quotation from President Gorbachev read out to the House by the Prime Minister. The UN resolution does make a specific reference to a deadline.

[Translation]

Speaking to an American Senate committee this morning, former American Defence Secretary James Schlesinger said that so far economic sanctions against Iraq have produced the expected results but might have to be maintained for a whole year if they are to have a decisive impact. His opinion is shared by a good many international affairs experts.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Does he share the views of these experts and, if not, would he explain why?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, sanctions do have an impact on Irak, and this is why the Canadian government approved them and support them with the troops that have been sent to the scene.

Nothing in the resolution proposed for the consideration of Security Council members flies in the face of that reality. However most council members see eye to eye on one point: if the president keeps insisting, they might have to consider other circumstances and other options. But that is as far as the resolution goes. Nothing there clashes with the position taken by the Canadian government, or those of the President of the Soviet Union or of the President of the French Republic, to name just a few.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague just said, according to many observers there is strong evidence that sanctions are working.

It would seem important to listen to further evidence concerning sanctions from our parliamentary delegation now in Iraq. We would like further clarification and to know if the Prime Minister agrees today that sanctions still are the best means to achieve UN goals and a resolution of the conflict in the Gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are there in the gulf because we seek to avoid war. We seek to defend the interests and the integrity of the United Nations. We seek to assist in the deterrence of aggression which is consistent not only with our traditions and our history, but also with our position as one of the founding nations of the United Nations.

Indeed, we believe that sanctions have played and will continue to play a useful role. There is nothing in the draft resolution at variance with that.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, so that all members can participate in a full and informed debate tomorrow on the Gulf crisis, I would ask the Prime Minister to fulfil the promise made to this House yesterday and table today full information on the effectiveness of the sanction policy.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed there is a motion for tomorrow:

> That this House, noting that the government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council Resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

That will be debated by all members of the House. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is on his way back from Jordan and Israel presently. He will no doubt provide information we have available on sanctions.

An hon. member: He is not here yet.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, he is not here yet but I will ask to see what information is available that might be relevant. There will be this debate tomorrow. Not only will all members participate but it will be interesting to see how all members vote.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which the Prime Minister just read out does not, as the Prime Minister I am sure will concede, expressly commit the Canadian government to place Canadian troops in any offensive action against Iraq, should that be authorized by the United Nations. That resolution which is coming before the Security Council on Thursday, according to the drafts that are now circulating, clearly authorizes the use of force in the gulf after the deadline—whatever the deadline ultimately is—is passed.

My question to the Prime Minister is this, will the Prime Minister make a clear, unequivocal commitment that before Canadian troops are committed to any offensive action against Iraq, the Prime Minister will bring a motion before this House giving this House a chance to pass judgment on whether Canadian troops as such should be committed to offensive action in the gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hypothesis that my hon. friend raises is one to which I will respond only because it is in the context of a debate that will take place tomorrow.

I personally believe and have said many times that the action that was taken at the United Nations and the action that is proposed is designed to convey an unequivocal message to the president of Iraq that aggression does not pay and that lawlessness is an unacceptable code of conduct in the international community.

That having been said, the hypothesis that my hon. friend raises would represent a substantial variance from policy at this point in time and I would be happy to ask the House leader to consult with members of the House to ensure that there is full participation.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if anyone in this House, let alone the Canadian people, could understand what the Prime Minister just said in respect of the specific question that I asked, that is will there be a debate in this House on a clear resolution authorizing Canadian participation in force, or will there not be? Will the Prime Minister indicate how he interprets the resolution, that is the motion that is being placed before the House for debate tomorrow? Will he acknowledge that does not in fact give the government the right to place Canadian troops at war in the Middle East?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we brought the matter forward for full debate on September 24. It is going to be brought before the House for full debate again tomorrow. If circumstances require, we will bring it for debate again.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): I take that, Mr. Speaker, and I assume that the House will take that as in fact a commitment that before troops are committed to the Persian Gulf that the government will bring forward yet another resolution.

Let me conclude with a supplementary on the resolution that is coming before the UN on Thursday.

• (1430)

It is clear to this House and to the world that a war in the gulf will be a catastrophe not just for Canadians or other forces who are involved but for civilians, the environment and the whole region.

Will the government use its position on the Security Council just for once in this term and speak and act independently at the Security Council for peace and not war in the Persian Gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a deeply offensive suggestion to the people who represent Canada on the Security Council whose entire commitment is to the cause of peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: From the very beginning, Canada's conduct has always been devoted to the cause of peace. It was our position. We could hardly be accused of anything when our position was the same on most of these motions as China, the Soviet Union, Colombia, Cote-d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland, Romania, Malaysia or Yemen.

This is the international community coming together and saying to those of all political persuasions from all areas of the world and conveying a message to Saddam Hussein that indeed, as my friend says, war is a catastrophe.

Rather than accuse the United Nations or the United States, the NDP should be conveying that message to Iraq.

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Housing. The minister is about to table before Cabinet his recommendations regarding the co-operative housing mouvement. The Canadian people are concerned that the government will abolish the mixed income housing program which was very successful in the past. Why does the minister intend to abolish the Co-operative Housing Program? Will he tell the Canadian people now what his plans are?

[English]

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I have said a number of times in the House already and as recently as last evening that the government is reviewing the current Co-operative Housing Program that has been in place for the last five years.

We are consulting in good faith with the co-operative housing movement and the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada. I will be making recommendations in due course before the end of the year on where we should be going in co-op housing from here on in. No question about it, I will be making those recommendations.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister is well aware that there are over 1.2 million Canadians who are in need of housing.

I would like to specifically ask the minister if he will extend his support to: One, meeting the high demand for co-operative housing through the construction of at least 5,000 units annually. Two, the continuation of index-linked financing, and three, the maintenance of the income mix component for new and existing co-operative housing.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, in 1985 the government undertook some consultations with all people involved in housing in Canada.

At that time, as a result of those discussions, the government arrived at a policy whereby all federal housing dollars would be targeted toward low income Canadians.

The Co-operative Housing Program, as the hon. member knows, is an exception to those principles. It is an exception because the philosophy of co-operative housing is to have a mix of income in a co-operative housing project. That is something we are looking at very closely at at the present time.

The recommendations that I will be making to cabinet will address the whole issue of income mix. It will address the issue of ILM mortgages and the whole question of a continuing co-operative housing policy and program federally.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Housing starts are at their lowest level in six years, down 40 per cent. The construction industry has 82,000 unemployed and climbing, and could reach 150,000 in the next month or two.

Now that the minister has admitted that he has purposely triggered this recession and inflicted this pain, will he now do the right thing: lower interest rates, scrap the GST and start building this country instead of tearing it down?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a gross distortion of the policy of this government to suggest that we have triggered a recession deliberately. The hon. member talks about the low level of housing starts, and that is true. What has happened here is we had a very strong level of housing starts, in excess of 200,000 units a year and up as high as 240,000 units a year for a period. That has resulted in a fairly substantial amount of the demand being met. Now the pendulum has swung the other way. We hope that it will swing back soon to a more normal level of housing. We have seen interest rates come down. Five-year mortgage rates have come down from the 14.25 to 14.5 per cent to the 12.75 to 13.0 per cent range, and other mortgages rates have come down as well.

This we believe is the best thing that we can do without doing things that will distort the housing market, as the housing industry would agree. They do not want us to put special programs in that will distort the market, but they do want us to get interest rates down. That is what we have been doing.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, surely the Minister of Finance is not suggesting that interest rates are low enough. In fact, he should know that support for his government is even lower than the interest rates in this country.

My supplementary question is this. Effective April 1, 1991, 1991 home buyers, if there are any left, who buy a home which which was completed in 1990 but not yet sold will get no FST rebate but will also have to pay the GST. Why does this government insist on double-dipping into the pockets of new home buyers who are already pounded by this government's high interest rate policy? Will this government reverse that double-dipping policy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I met with representatives of the housing industry just yesterday. This was a proposal that they put on the table that I said I would give consideration to. At this point I am not in a position to say what we would do.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Given the press reports that President Bush conditionally agreed to Canada sitting at the negotiating table to discuss free trade with Mexico, I ask the minister to please tell this House today exactly what the specific conditions are that Canada has agreed to in order to participate in these negotiations. Will the minister table all correspondence that his department has had with the United States relative to the Mexico-Canada-U.S. free trade agreement, plus research papers that support Canada's position?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed glad to welcome the hon. gentleman back from his prolonged siesta.

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. minister is motivated by only the best of good wishes, but I would hope that he would remember the rules here and carry on with the answer to the question.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not going to ask the hon. gentleman to vamoose.

With respect to his question, he is a little out of date because it was two or three months ago, I believe—I cannot remember the exact date—that we agreed with the United States and Mexico to engage in a consultation as to how we would best proceed with a trilateral negotiation of a possible U.S.–Mexico–Canada free trade agreement. The U.S. administration agreed to that then.

I will be having a meeting at Brussels toward the end of the week or on the week-end with the minister of trade of Mexico and Carla Hills, the U.S. trade negotiator on that subject. Our officials have had several meetings. We are working on a series of papers in that connection. By the early winter we expect to know whether or not we will engage in a such a trilateral negotiation.

• (1440)

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, there is a difference between having a siesta and being asleep at the switch.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member says there is a difference, I accept that there is a difference.

Mr. Barrett: Having sold out Canada in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the minister is now being asked what specific conditions the Americans are asking for. Of course he has not answered that question.

I now ask the minister what steps he will take to ensure Canadian working men and women that they will not be faced with cheap Mexican wages competing with existing Canadian jobs in Canada and lose thousands of jobs, as they already have under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is apparently afraid of every country in the world that has lower wages than Canada. If that is his policy, then we will cease trading and we will raise prohibitive tariffs against every developing country in the world. This apparently is the new humanitarian NDP policy: we cut off every country in the world that has lower wages.

As a matter of fact, since January 1989, 207,000 net jobs have been created here in Canada, of which 180,000 or 87 per cent have gone to women. That is the record of success that we have achieved despite difficult economic conditions.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for International Trade.

In the Uruguay Round of the GATT, tougher rules regarding intellectual property are being sought, including for pharmaceuticals.

Is the Canadian government satisfied with the draft proposals permitting Canada to continue its current system of compulsory licensing in the pharmaceutical industry? Or, does the government envisage that it will need to change the present Canadian system?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact there is an interesting comparison here between a sensible question being asked and the previous question that was asked.

This is an important issue that the hon. gentleman is asking about. There is a negotiation on TRIPs, so-called, trade related intellectual property, and about the U.S. and parts of Europe including Switzerland. The European Community has made suggestions in connection with the intellectual property matter that would prohibit compulsory licensing systems, for example, applying only to special fields of technology.

As far as the government is concerned, we are very satisfied with the present system that we have in effect. It was passed by the House several years ago, as I remember. There was considerable opposition from members opposite, but now they apparently support that system. I gather from the tenor from the hon. member's question that they realize their mistake and are supporting our system. We intend to continue to support it ourselves.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my sensible question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The minister will be aware that the use of generic drugs has saved consumers hundreds of millions of dollars. If compulsory licensing is dropped at GATT, it could wipe out thousands of Canadian jobs.

Will the minister tell this House once and for all that he will not sacrifice Canadian jobs just to satisfy his government's American corporate friends?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. gentleman did not hear the previous question or the previous answer.

I can certainly tell him that this government is not going to sacrifice Canadian jobs for anyone, including hon. members opposite.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Canadians who leave the country to marry a citizen of another country have to wait two years or more before their spouses can come to Canada.

Can the minister tell Canadians, and in particular Canadians of Indian origin, that this inhumane, long delay will not be tolerated any more and that new measures will be introduced to reunite spouses as soon as possible?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, clearly this is a matter of some considerable concern from a humanitarian point of view.

However, as the hon. member knows, part of the reason for the delay is simply the high demand of people who want to come to Canada. As the hon. member also knows from my announcement on immigration levels, with the additional money that we are going to put into processing we will be able to speed this process up, I would hope quite considerably. We will be moving spouses to the top of our priority list, as we move into our new immigration plan.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister said that it is due to the high demand of people who want to come to Canada. But why do spouses have to wait over two years to be reunited? Why does the minister demand that spouses be separated immediately after getting married?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that our immigration plan does call for better conditions for spouses. It is a problem, but it is also due to the high number of people who are applying to come to Canada. We have the power to change the system to some extent, but not to the extent the hon. member and myself would like to.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment who has lost the battle in cabinet on including specifics on global warming in the shrinking green plan. Greed obviously packs more punch than green for the Conservatives and their millionaire friends in the fossil fuel sector.

Would the minister explain to Canadians why he has chosen pollution and profit ahead of the conservation and energy efficiency strategy, which would have cut carbon dioxide emissions and would have saved every man, woman and child in Canada $5,000 over the next 10 years?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to my hon. colleague in answer to that question is that the only thing that is shrinking here is his knowledge base about what is going to be in the green plan.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. It will be interesting to see if when he said "billions" with an s it is the $5 billion that his predecessor promised in five $1 billion announcements.

Would the minister confirm that without action on global warming, which is clearly the most serious global environmental threat that we face, Canadians will face emergency costs as revealed in Geneva of $12 billion in dikes and other emergency measures to hold back sea rise over the next 20 years?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to re-emphasize the position that this Government of Canada has taken in Geneva.

First of all, we re-emphasized our commitment to stabilize greenhouse gases by the year 2000 at 1990 levels. Second, we stated very clearly in Geneva—and my colleague was there to hear me—that we accepted that further steps were required and that we would be working with the international community to set out those steps. Finally, we argued very strongly in that forum that the convention to be negotiated, starting in January in Washington and leading up to the meeting on global warming in Brazil in 1992, should be negotiated at the same time as the protocols are negotiated so that the heads of state in 1992 could sign a comprehensive package.

We are moving very aggressively on global warming, and that is the reason why at the Geneva meeting Canada was singled out among a small group of countries as being among those that had moved aggressively on the issue.

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS PROGRAM

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Science. It pertains to the Canada Scholarships Program in science and technology.

Presently the Canada Scholarships Program in science and technology is not available to students attending colleges and technological institutes.

Could the minister apprise the House whether the government, as part of its commitment to improving Canadian competitiveness, plans to recognize the excellent research being conducted by the young men and women in our colleges and institutes, by implementing an awards program for technicians and technologists?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for her question and for her continued interest in this subject.

There is no question that every member of this House would agree that technicians and technologists are an important part of making Canada a competitive nation. I have received hundreds of recommendations on this same issue. Maybe they have all been inspired by my hon. colleague.

I remind the House that this government, not very long ago, agreed to support a private sector led study on the role of technicians and technologists in Canada. I think what we will do—and it is on the science agenda and it will stay very high on the science agenda—is that as soon as funding becomes available, we would be pleased to consider it.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We all know that Ottawa and Quebec are supposed to sign a new agreement on immigration. This morning, the Quebec Minister of Cultural Communities and Immigration pointed out that signing this agreement was essential if Quebec was to pursue its plans with respect to immigration and that the agreement was not incompatible with current attempts at constitutional clarification in Quebec. My question is this: Does the Prime Minister intend to sign this agreement as soon as possible and if not, why not?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last week, before the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, we talked about the Meech Lake Accord and a constitutional agreement, and subsequently about an administrative agreement. Of course, we are still working on this question but at this point it is impossible to set a date.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the minister has just demonstrated that federalism can be an asset to Quebec. History will remember the important role played by the Prime Minister of Canada since his famous speech in Sept-îles on Quebec's progress towards sovereignty, and I want to thank him for that.

An hon. member: That's more than you ever did!

Mr. Duceppe: However, would she perhaps tell us, in no uncertain terms, whether or not she will sign this agreement? Since there is no immediate connection with the discussions on our constitutional future, it is feasible in the present context.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer doesn't change just because the hon. member is a bit upset.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The answer is still the same. The Prime Minister and myself have said this is an important question, but other matters remain to be discussed. There may be an announcement at some future date.

[English]

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He will know that the inshore fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is a complete disaster once again this year. Ten thousand fishermen on the south west coast, in Labrador, and along the great northern peninsula are facing a pretty rough winter as a result.

Would he confirm for us that further quota cuts in the gulf are being contemplated? Also, would he indicate to the House what plans he and the government have to help those fishermen and plant workers who are caught in this situation, absolutely through no fault of their own?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that it is not a fault of their own. Certainly members will not at this time blame the Spaniards or the Portuguese for the overfishing of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

We know and we are aware that some fishermen have raided the resource by discarding and dumping at sea in ways that are totally unacceptable. We have people from the industry, from the provinces and from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans working out a plan to try to address these enormous problems in the gulf.

Yes, we are contemplating reduction of the total allowable catch in that area, but before we make that decision we have to see what measures we can take to try to alleviate the impact that this could have on fishermen on both sides of the gulf.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed in the minister. He will want to reflect on the answer he just gave, because apart from it being inaccurate it is unfair.

He may be talking about some people but, if he listened to my question, he is not talking about the people in my first question. I carefully did not say people in other provinces or in other parts of Canada. I carefully said people on the south west coast of Newfoundland, in the great northern peninsula, and Labrador. I put to him in this House that none of them in these categories have been guilty of the kind of activities that he has described. He might first want to apologize to the House and to these people in particular.

I ask him, more to the point, to reflect on the question now that he understands it and tell us what he is going to do for those people who, I repeat to him, through no fault of their own find themselves in the situation.

I am not suggesting that it is particularly the minister's fault either, but he is in a position to do something about it. I appeal to him, on behalf of those people, to do exactly that instead of flailing away and blaming people who do not deserve—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has put his question. The hon. minister.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I fully understand that the answer or the solution does not lie in trying to blame anyone for the problems that fishermen on the south west coast of Newfoundland are experiencing and will be experiencing.

I think the hon. member knows the concern that this government has shown for fishermen affected by a reduction in fishing quotas. We will monitor the situation in the next few weeks and in the next few months. If it becomes required to implement measures to try to be helpful to those communities and those fishermen, we shall proceed the way we have done in the past.

CHILDREN

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On October 1st, this government virtuously declared it would designate a minister responsible for children. Today, we see reports telling us that 30 per cent of the 1,2 million children in Quebec schools are undernourished. I would like to ask the Minister responsible for children—that man who asked with such eloquence the rest of the world to fight children's poverty—to explain why his government did nothing to put an end to that shameful situation in Canadian schools?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the key responsibility of the federal government is ensuring that an attack is made on child poverty in Canada and around the world. We have made significant progress during the tenure of this government to lift children out of poverty, to give their parents the resources that they need to ensure that all children in Canada are properly nourished.

It is a commitment that is ongoing. It is one where we have made significant progress, and it is one where we are determined to make progress in the future.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadian children cannot afford breakfast while this government is out to lunch.

I have a supplementary questions. Some 20 years ago, the Prime Minister's friend and mentor, Margaret Thatcher, as education minister cancelled the milk program for school children in England.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if the events at Westminster last week will encourage his government to repair the holes it has cut in Canada's social safety net and, for a change, bring in direct support for those children who are hungry.

• (1500 )

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have to give the hon. member credit for creativity, if not for her understanding of the Constitution. She may well understand education is a provincial responsibility as opposed to federal, but where the federal government does have a responsibility is in ensuring the welfare of Canadian citizens. We do that, first of all, with transfers to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan and, second, in ensuring that an attack is made nationally on the issue of poverty.

If the hon. member would consider the figures today with those when her party was last in office, she would find that poverty among all groups, and particularly among children, has declined significantly since the Liberals were thrown out of office.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I think everyone is relieved that Algoma Steel is back to work and hopefully 6,000 people will eventually get back to work. The callback threshold for steel workers to become eligible for UI has been designated as 1,870, more or less. I asked her chief policy adviser if 1,725 would be acceptable. He said: "Yes". I retorted: "1,625?" He said: "No.".

I am asking the minister which number would she endorse: 1,200, 1,625, 1,750, or 1,870, or none of the above?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question clearly is a frivolous one because what we do is determine every case on its merit and that is the part of what is in the legislation and what is in the regulation. It depends on the context of the situation. He knows that.

PRIVILEGE

BLOC QUEBECOIS—REQUEST FOR RESEARCH FUNDS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention and that of hon. members to a question of privilege concerning services and resources which are available to members and which unfortunately are not fair at this time. You sent me a letter today—I take it upon myself to read it because it is so very short—in which you say: "Dear Colleague, be advised that the Board of Internal Economy has considered the note in which you propose that the board allocate funds to your group for research and for the leader's office. Having examined your request, the board members deemed it impossible to approve the allocation of funds for the time being. Sincerely yours—" and so on.

Mr. Speaker, this response is not satisfactory at all, and when I think it took two months for each line, things are worse still. As far as I know the Board of Internal Economy is not a dictator and, in cases of requests for public funds, it should have to justify its decisions. Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot be satisfied with this "no", no "for the time being".

For what reasons was the request deemed impossible? I suggest that nine members of the House are entitled to know who made the decision. When you say "for the time being", what do you mean by "for the time being"? Will it be possible next week or even the following month?

Mr. Speaker, I call on your sense of fairness to explain to me why some members of this House have access to research services when others, who must play the role of opposition, do not have access to these same services.

Mr. Speaker, which rule of the House prescribes that there are two kinds of members? Does the decision of your board create two categories, those who are entitled to research services and have the right to carry out their mandate in the opposition, and the other element which is even worse, because with the budgets the traditional parties have voted for themselves they continue to use funds allocated at the time when some of us were in other parties. Mr. Speaker, we know that these amounts are calculated on the basis of the number of members in the House.

Therefore, I find it unacceptable that the Progressive Conservative Party should continue getting over one million dollars, the Liberal Party $674,000, the NDP $461,000, while no research staff is available to our group, which represents nine ridings.

Mr. Speaker, even in the Members' Manual of Allowances and Services, they explain that it was agreed later on to make the research funds also available to the caucuses and ordinary members.

When I read this on page 2 of Chapter E–8 of the Members' Manual of Allowances and Services, I agree with you that the members of our group rank as individuals members, but I do not understand why, if these funds are available to individuals members, your reply was so short, so unjustified and so unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that your Board of Internal Economy operates as a sort of small select club, but it is indefensible not to provide the necessary means to those who have legitimately chosen to defend certain options which you might not share. But democracy being what it is, I feel that the Board of Internal Economy through its rules, is imposing what I call the tyranny of the majority. It will not allow the people who do not share their option to have access to the same services. I do not see why my friend the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie who sits here as an individual member should he not have access to as much research staff as the former member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie? What is the difference? Was he less properly elected then the former incumbent? What is this private club, whose members allow themselves millions of dollars but who refuse to make them available to the people who do not share their view, but who have greater legitimacy in public opinion?

My colleague of the Reform Party has no research staff either, and we all know that if an election was held today, she would represent many more citizens than all of the Western Tory Members put together. And I can foresee that if an election was held today, there would be very few Tory Members on the other side and that the Bloc quebecois would represent thousands and even millions of people.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a point which goes very much to the administration of this place. I am listening carefully. A political speech is not going to help me make up my mind as to how I respond to the particular issue that the hon. member is raising.

I certainly have the hon. member's point. I would ask him to sum up.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to dwell on this issue, but I must say that in order to fully carry out my responsibility as the member for Shefford, I must have the same rights and privileges as any other member in this House. I insist that all hon. members should be treated the same because we represent here thousands upon thousands of people. We want to do so adequately. Mr. Speaker, research staff are there first and foremost to make it possible for members of the opposition to make a thorough review of the government's legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we get them in large number everyday. It is clear that if we want to assume fully our responsibility—in spite of everything, we manage as best we can, and the public appreciates it, but it is not enough. I do not see why the member sitting in front of me has access to a research staff while I do not.

Mr. Speaker, it is a question of justice, fairness and ability to do the job. There are not two categories of members in this House and you must make sure that they receive the same treatment. There are not two categories of citizens, and there are not two categories of members. That is why I beseech you to reverse your decision, and if you refuse, you should at least have the decency to explain why.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an interesting point. I would like to respond from my point of view and especially the view of my constituents in western Canada.

The hon. member says his party wants the same rights and privileges as other members. They have them, do they not? They have a research staff. They have people in their offices. We have three people in our office. They have three people in their office. They have their office budget like we all have. Each MP has that. They have that.

This Parliament has been very liberal—small l—toward the Bloc quebecois. That is what my constituents say.

• (1510 )

They have places in this House. They have been asking questions. They have been allowed to get in the House after a questionable oath taking ceremony. We have been very liberal.

It is not a party. It does not have 12 people. Those are the rules. They should stop whining. The House has been very liberal to them and I find it shocking when they get up and whine, bitch and complain.

If my constituents were here in the House, they would be a lot harder on them than the rest of us. We have been very liberal toward them. They should stop whining and get to work by using their existing resources.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to exercise my prerogative as Speaker and take the point that the hon. member for Shefford has made. I see other members rising, and this could go on all afternoon.

It may well be only an administrative matter, but the hon. member has argued his case with some passion and I am going to consider it carefully.

I am going to return to the House, and I hope my response will at least show that the complaint has been taken seriously, which I know the hon. member wishes me to do. I hope that my response will be consistent with fairness in the House.

This is not a place to continue a debate on oaths or other things.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BROADCASTING ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 17

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 39 and 40 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"(vi) contribute to national unity, shared national consciousness and identity",

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 30

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 5 by adding immediately after line 6 at page 9 the following:

"(a) establishes priorities for the system based upon the national interest;"

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a very crucial amendment to the bill, perhaps to one of the most important parts of it. Let me summarize what it does.

The 1968 Broadcasting Act, the act that we are changing, says that part of the mandate of the CBC is to promote national unity.

The government has removed that clause from the CBC's mandate. This is a very crucial change to a bill.

In describing the CBC's mandate, this present Bill C-40 describes it as follows: That the CBC should:

(i) be predominantly and distinctively Canadian,

(ii) reflect Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences, while serving the special needs of those regions,

(iii) actively contribute to the flow and exchange of cultural expression,

(iv) be in English and in French, reflecting the different needs and circumstances of each official language community—

(v) strive to be of equivalent quality in English and in French,

(vi) contribute to shared national consciousness and identity,

(vii) be made available throughout Canada—

(viii) reflect the multicultural and multiracial nature of Canada;

And so on.

Yet, the government has removed the one obligation from the CBC, that of promoting national unity. The removal of this clause combined with the division of the CBC board into English and French standing committees weakens the CBC as a national institution. It seems to me that now more than ever we need someone to speak for Canada. We need to start looking about strengthening national institutions.

My hon. friend from the Bloc quebecois wants to dismember Canada, to have a separate Quebec and other separate regions in Canada.

There are forces in the country that are out to destroy this very country. There are traitorous forces in the country that want to dismember it. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the government itself should be moving to strengthen national unity, not to weaken the country; to strengthen national institutions, not to weaken them. That is what is happening in this bill.

Marjorie Nichols, my friend, writing in the paper today, The Ottawa Citizen, suggested that maybe we should privatize the CBC. Well, there again, we would lose another national institution. The people in the country are asking who is speaking for Canada. They are dying for someone to speak for Canada. Look at the opinion polls. They want someone to speak for Canada.

Steven Godfrey, in a recent article in The Globe and Mail, put it this way: "The proposed changes," that is, the change in dropping this clause out of the Broadcasting Act, the promotion of national unity, "are a sad commentary on the fact that there remains no area in which the very words 'national unity' can be spoken without inviting attack from members of the federal government alone. The federal government itself."

In an earlier speech today, I pointed out how the government is leeching the CBC by cutting back its budget and by relying more on advertising revenues to make it more of a commercial corporation. The government is squeezing and leeching the CBC. What is it doing now? It is meeching the CBC.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Waddell: I make reference to Meech Lake. What the government is doing is saying we want the CBC to have a Meech Lake view of Canada, but Canada is a little more than Joe Clark's community of communities. This is one reason why ordinary Canadians were opposed to Meech Lake. It is not because they were anti-Quebec, not at all. That is a misinterpretation in Quebec.

My friend laughs and many Quebecers believe that, but it was not to be anti-Quebec at all. Canadians believe, I think, that there is an over-all Canadianism that is beyond the regional loyalties and Canada must be more than 10 distinct societies. It is true that Quebec has a special place in Confederation, through language and culture, and should have power to do that.

Canadians, by and large, when they think about it, including English Canadians from all over the country, agree with that. But they do not want to see a number of decentralized distinct societies in the country so there is no national government at all. That is what this government is doing. That is what this Prime Minister tried to do with Meech Lake. That is why Canadians rejected that. There is a greater view of Canada.

When I was speaking in the Meech Lake debate, I said—and you have to remember that goes back a few years, Mr. Speaker—that Canadians do not want Team

Alberta with Gretzky—he then played for Edmonton—or Team Quebec with Mario Lemieux—he was then playing for a Canadian team. They wanted Team Canada. They wanted to see one team and they wanted people to speak for Canada.

The minister and others have expressed the view that keeping the clause dealing with the CBC promoting national unity will lead to propaganda, that the CBC will be forced to maintain an artificial, political notion of unity in defiance of the artistic integrity of the corporation and the independence. The minister noted in his speech that Liberal governments in the past have launched witch-hunts against separatists in the CBC. That is wrong. Clearly, it is wrong.

It should be noted that the CBC's journalistic independence is protected elsewhere in the bill.

I see the minister leaving the House. I hoped the minister would stay and listen to this very important clause. He just puts his hand down and he leaves. It is one of the reasons why this minister has never got this bill through the House of Commons and why it is being delayed. He just does not simply care.

This is a key provision of the bill. The government has attacked the CBC in the past. It stacked the board of the CBC. It made political appointments, such as Bill Neville and Elizabeth Burnam. It has cut back the budget of the CBC. It attacked people in the last election campaign. Dale Goldhawk, for example, the president of ACTRA, was silenced and forced to resign his union position. It has taken after other people in terms of the investigation of election coverage in respect of the free trade issue. Look at the attacks on Roy Bonisteel and David Suzuki?

The CBC is in trouble. The CBC has problems. Part of the reason is because of this government. It is about to attack the CBC radio. I appeal to people out in the country who are followers of CBC radio and CBC television, when it is at its best, to stand up for the CBC and to stand up for Canada. Do not let the government destroy it. My God, it has destroyed almost everything we have got. It has taken our rural railways and our rural post offices and gotten rid of them. It has cut back railways. It is about to sell Petro-Canada. It has slavishly followed the United States in foreign policy. We are losing Canada. This whole country is up for grabs and this is an indication of what is going on. This country may not survive.

We are in a struggle for survival in the next couple of years. This government should be forced to go. It is too bad that we have this out-dated system where a government can be so low in the polls and at the same time still have a majority in the House of Commons, because we have gutless back-benchers who are afraid to vote against their government. If they were not afraid, we would not have the GST. We would not have the cutbacks in these national symbols.

The government is removing the national unity clause of the CBC. It has said to the CBC board of directors: "Well, now you have to sit in English. You have to sit in French." The next step will be while there will be an English network and a French network. Then there will be an English network responsible to the government in Ottawa and a French network responsible to the government in Quebec. Then there will be two countries. We are moving to lose Canada. We need people to speak up for Canada and we need these particular clauses.

I know there are arguments saying that the CBC should not be a propaganda tool. I do not believe the CBC is a propaganda tool with government. I think there are problems with the CBC. I think some of the commentators, as Rick Salutin said in the Saturday Night article recently, feel that perhaps there is too much centralized power in Toronto where the CBC broadcasters, such as the Peter-and-Wendy-and-Barbara group, take on too much power to themselves.

But the real view of the CBC is an instrument of national unity, reflecting Canadians to Canadians, taking every part of the country and showing it to other parts of the country, not being a commercial network, such as the American networks, being distinctively Canadian with 95 per cent Canadian content in drama, with a Canadian view of the world, reflecting to our people.

Who speaks for Canada, Mr. Speaker? Not the government. Who is going to stand up while this country is going to the dogs? I hope ordinary Canadians will put pressure on the government, hopefully to get it to resign and to change government in Canada.

I believe this country is worth fighting for. I believe we are losing it and I think that is a great tragedy. We have to fight it everywhere we can and this is one of the places to fight it. I am pleased my colleagues in the other opposition party are are also making this fight and I applaud them for that.

We want to see the role of the CBC to promote national unity. We want federal institutions to speak for Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the hon. member for his excellent presentation.

I am glad that this review of the Broadcasting Act provides us with another opportunity to talk about national unity. To me and to millions of Canadians and Quebecers, this question is extremely important, and I think it is a matter of utmost concern. I therefore want to take every opportunity to express my faith in a country I am proud of, a country that is mine, that is ours, and a country that is admired and respected throughout the world. Tell me: Where on this planet would we be better off than right here in Canada? Unfortunately, we are destroying this country with a bill that is a disaster, that is poorly drafted and unacceptable to Canadian men and women.

It should come as no surprise when I say that when I read the papers or watch television in Quebec, I can't help wondering who defends the interests of Canada in our province. There is plenty of talk about sovereignty and independence, but hardly a whisper about federalism. I am reminded of what was said so eloquently by the leader of my party. My leader said it this way: "No one has the courage to talk about Canada in Quebec," and I think this is very sad.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, my leader said no one has the courage to talk about Canada in Quebec, and I think he is right. And that is why I object to the abrogation of the national unity clause as proposed by Bill C–40 before the House today.

The bill, in fact, does away with the mission entrusted to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in 1968, and I quote:

> Contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity.

If we relieve the Corporation of this obligation, who will take over that responsibility? Isn't the corporation the nerve centre of our communications, as was said by our Prime Minister? What do we expect to accomplish with this wording change proposed by the government, for it does not add anything—quite the contrary, it diminishes the importance of the CBC mandate? There can be no doubt that at a time when our country has to cope with profound divisions concerning our constitution and linguistic issues, at a time when intolerance and racism are all too often so obvious, the CBC can indeed be the very link which unites Canadians from coast to coast and which can promote our identity and set off the absolutely unique nature of our nation.

Since the infrastructure is already in place, Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why we should fail to ensure that it is properly maintained and in good condition. Why would anyone want to thwart such positive measures and not promote national unity? I cannot understand that.

Can this kind of mission be considered as propaganda, as the Conservatives claim, and I quote my leader, Mr. Jean Chrétien:

> The raison d'être of a country is to survive.
> Quebecers have to be told about Canada. Never since Confederation has the survival of our country been so seriously threatened.

Even after the Meech Lake failure we must continue to cultivate the will to live together, to understand one another, and to respect, support and appreciate all our differences. We must put the emphasis on the similarities which unite us, not on the differences which divide us. By taking away from the CBC the mandate to promote national unity—and not the Union nationale, as our Minister of Communications said a number of times in the House, for he thinks we are still in the mid 1960s—are we going to prevent the broadcasting of scenes which do nothing at all for national unity? If so, I will come back on my position.

As I see it, changing the words will not change anything. Freedom of the press would always be respected, and I sincerely hope so. I have in mind the sad isolated incidents in Brockville and Sault Ste. Marie which, repeatedly shown on the screen, led us to believe that all English Canadians were intolerant, something which our history has contradicted on a number of occasions. That is unacceptable.

I suggest that the government is making a serious mistake by weakening an institution such as the CBC, which is the cornerstone of our broadcasting system. As far as the government is concerned, the CBC should be relieved of its responsibility for national unity at the time when the government should be using everything at its disposal to ensure that the people of Canada are well informed and share a common vision of the future, while appreciating our regional and linguistic differences.

I believe that building national unity in Canada requires developing its character, building its identity and its national conciousness. We need strong institutions like the CBC to ensure that all regions and all social partners weave together the fabric of national unity.

[English]

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this is not the way this bill is designed. What this government is doing is building a form of sovereignty association into our national broadcasting system, the CBC, instead of building bridges of communication and common links across this land. Cultural survival is one of the critical issues today.

• (1530)

I have before me an interesting piece of legislation which is presently being looked at by the European council. They have set up an important fund called the Euromidges support fund. It was set up at the end of 1988 to develop the European cinematographic and audiovisual industry. Its main aim is of a cultural nature. It said in its report that the importance of audiovisual works in transmitting European culture in all its forms is obvious. The European cultural values in particular to younger generations must be communicated.

Cultural survival is a critical issue today. Broadcasting is a central vehicle through which Canadians can communicate, a major instrument for Canadian expression in the arts and entertainment, an essential means for providing a Canadian perspective in news information and programming. CBC reaches almost every household, so it is in a unique position to enable this cultural appreciation and growth as identification for ourselves, our children and our grandchildren. This is what will help form Canada and inform Canada. It becomes a very distinctive culture on the global map.

I find this whole approach totally disturbing. On the television sets in our living-rooms is this little remote control that my grandson calls "the little clicker". We hold the key to the future of the cultural identity of Canada. If you look at this bill and if you look at the way the government has put a sense of sovereignty association into this bill, it is totally disturbing. It has taken the CBC and divided it into English and French. It has taken the national unity mandate away from it. It has taken the CRTC and balkanized it by putting in a "he who hears decides" on a regional level. It has put in the potential for a challenge of its federal jurisdiction through its definition of programming.

This bill is totally unacceptable and the national unity clause is the greatest farce of them all when you see what the government has done in removing that. It has also removed all the other things that make this a distinctive Canadian unity from coast to coast and have allowed us to take a sovereignty association vehicle, instead of being the central nervous system of this country, the transportation unit of the intellect. We have managed to destroy a wonderful concept that needs to be reinstated into this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Since the House is dealing with Bill C-40, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my views on the two amendments moved by my hon. colleagues of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party and aimed at using the CBC in part as a propaganda agency.

I know that the Hon. Member for Mount Royal would simply love to see the CBC become an exponent of her own political convictions, that her leader would love to appear more often on the CBC and feels that the CBC should act as a agent of his party. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that if we respect the freedom of the press, the creative ability and the record of an institution which has adequately served its listening and viewing public, I do not think that we should allow the CBC to become a propaganda agency.

The NDP member has emphasized that the CBC should—

Mr. Waddell: Weaken Canada!

Mr. Lapierre: He said: "Weaken Canada". I say to the hon. member that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would have no credibility if it were to become a propaganda tool. I am surprised these members show so little respect for the intelligence of the audience.

Mr. Speaker, you yourself were once a dynamic element of Radio–Canada, and I am sure you would never have wanted to become a propaganda tool. This particular clause in the Act could be interpreted very narrowly. If tomorrow morning, the hon. member for Mount Royal became minister of Communications, I predict she would immediately tell the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation about his obligation to promote national unity. And in any referendum we might have in Quebec, for instance, Radio–Canada would play a pro–active role that would have no connection with the neutral and objective information gathering to which Radio–Canada has always been dedicated.

The hon. member said earlier that we did not talk enough about federalism, that not enough people were talking about it. The problem isn't Radio–Canada. The problem is that the hon. member can find no credible spokespersons for her option in Quebec today. Only her leader, on his occasional visits to Quebec, mumbles a few words about old–fashioned federalism. But we shouldn't blame Radio–Canada.

What we must realize is that there are no more credible Francophone spokespersons for the option they want to suggest, no one who is prepared to serve their cause, and that is true across the province. When I see this abdication reason and common sense, these demands for a propaganda mandate for a Crown corporation, I can tell them it won't work. Quebecers didn't give Radio–Quebec a mandate to work for Quebec's sovereignty. In fact, the first people to object would have been the hon. member for Mount Royal and all her friends in the Equality Party. They would immediately draw parallels with the Nazis or whatever. We have heard those speeches before.

Why do they want to make Radio–Canada do something they would not approve in the case of Radio–Quebec? When the Parti quebecois was in power in Quebec City, for instance, did they tell Radio–Quebec: Now you are going to pursue the same objectives as the government? Never, Mr. Speaker! They had too much respect for freedom of the press.

When I heard the hon. member for Mount Royal say that the leader of her party said a country's purpose in life was to survive, I thought I never heard such a stupid statement. A country's purpose in life, Mr. Speaker, is to share what we have and to establish common institutions. Survival is not enough. When I hear them saying this sort of thing, I am not surprised they have dropped substantially in the polls. They just want to survive, but we want more that just survive, we want to live! To that extent I believe that the definition she wants to give to the CBC again underlies the weakness of their arguments.

Mr. Speaker, they say that the CBC should develop a common vision of the future, but who will do that? The hon. member for Mount Royal, or perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver? Will it be Clyde Wells, Mr. Speaker? Can you imagine Clyde Wells being the CBC president tomorrow morning? What kind of propaganda outlet would it become?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapierre: I see the Liberal members applauding. I can appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, because they may already be looking for a new leader and Clyde Wells seems to be giving a much better performance than their present leader. Even so, Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to promote him.

When I hear the kind of statements Clyde Wells has just made, suggesting that the Bélanger–Campeau Commission is illegitimate, can you imagine what it would be like if he were president of the CBC! He would ban all news concerning the B–C Commisison. When he states that the future of the country lies in the Senate, it speaks volumes for intelligence and democracy! You know, Clyde Wells is the one who is called— In fact he is the Premier of Newfoundland, the man with great ambitions. He is learning French not only to be able to speak on the CBC English network, but now he also wants to speak in French on Radio–Canada!

Mr. Waddell: He is not a New Democrat.

• (1540)

Mr. Lapierre: He is not NDP, but NDPs are worse, Mr. Speaker.

The point I wish to make is that instead of asking the CBC to do the job for them, they should offer true alternatives to Quebecers. I respect their determination to promote federalism and Canadian unity. I tell them that we are prepared to discuss this issue with them anywhere and anytime.

Over the past few weeks, Mr. Speaker, debates were held in 26 Quebec CEGEPs, and in most cases, the elected Liberal members did not have the guts to appear before the students. They had to send in their some insignificant party hacks. I can tell you that my friend from the NDP and my colleagues of the Bloc Quebecois took part in these debates. We did not ask the CBC to do our own job. The fact is that these people are desperate, that they cannot find anyone to transmit their message and they would gladly avail themselves of the federal government's resources.

Mr. Speaker, that happened before and I must confess that literally at the time the Canadian Unity Information Centre dumped millions upon millions of dollars on Quebec. A gentleman named Paul Tellier was in charge then but now the situation is different; such abuses were tolerated in the 1980s but today they would be totally unacceptable.

And I say to the Federalists: Go ahead, promote your convictions, but do not try this time to use Ottawa's spending power to buy the support of Quebecers. You would simply fail. Every effort to buy their support would result in a massive rejection. It is not without reason that the vision defended by the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada only has a mere 6 per cent support in Quebec. This is not CBC's fault but that of the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada himself, with 6 per cent. Even if he appeared every night on the CBC television network, he would not convince anybody. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say to them: Do not try using federal taxpayers' money to put one over. Use the power of your convictions. The time for propaganda is over!

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is a relief to get up to speak. I can only say that the unmitigated balderdash to which we have just been treated by the hon. member for Shefford needs some response, even if it does dignify such nonsense by even mentioning it.

I am enthralled by the clear belief that the member who just spoke has absolutely no regard for journalistic integrity, obviously no regard for the professionalism of journalists who work for the CBC, and clearly no regard for journalists in general. I am glad to see the hon. member for Halifax West applauding. I trust that the hon. member for Halifax West holds the view I do. I would presume he does, that Canadian unity is a good thing. Perhaps he does not. No doubt he will have a chance to say so himself.

It is a tragedy in this country today that people are asking from one coast to the other, east and west, north and south, inside Quebec and outside Quebec: "Who speaks for Canada". When did it become a crime in the minds of members of this Chamber to speak out in favour of Canadian unity? When did it become some sort of disgrace, to quote the member who spoke previously, some propaganda, to be in favour of the survival and the flourishing of this country?

I cannot believe that anyone who would sit here in this House, who would stand in this House and speak or claim to speak for Canadians, could actually stand and argue against Canadian unity. It is a sad time that we have come to, if this is the case in this country today.

The mandate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for Canadian unity is something that has been with us for a very long time. It is something that the past president of the CBC, Pierre Juneau, said did not in any way interfere with the workings of the corporation in serving its various and multicultural audience.

On May 16, The Ottawa Citizen reported that the CBC is an agent for Canadian unity. It must remain that way as a bulwark against various decentralizing forces. Everybody who sits in this Chamber knows what the decentralizing forces are. There are hundreds of them. There are the questions of language, culture, geography, and regionalism which every single one of us in our home provinces and here in Ottawa have dealt with and continue to deal with on a daily basis.

The things that pull us apart are part and parcel of our experience as Canadians. They make us who we are. To quote Andrew Coyne in The Financial Post, "they make us know that we are us, that we are imperfect and that we have a multitude of problems", but they also make us know that we have survived for 123 years and, please God, we will survive as long as this earth survives. Mind you, with this government, that may be a problem as well.

The member who spoke previously talked about a mandate for national unity destroying a respect for creativity. I am sorry that my colleague for Kingston and the Islands is not here to make his usual interjection of "what nonsense", because that is what it is. It is rank and errant nonsense. The creativity that has been fostered by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation across this country, whether one is talking about Cod Co. from the province of Newfoundland or cultural programs that relate to our native peoples in the north and in the west or whether—

Mr. Tobin: Codswell.

Ms. Clancy: It is codswallop, just so that the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte will know.

At any rate, the cultural programs which have come from all over this country reflect that "useness", if I may coin the word, that is Canadianism, that is neither English nor French nor any of the multitude of other cultural groups of people this country. It is Canadianism.

When I speak to that, I know that I speak to the hearts of millions of Canadians, from whatever background they have been fortunate enough to spring. I know that that strikes a cord. It must strike a cord in the vast majority of members of this House, because this country in all its works and pomps is perhaps the most precious gift which any group of 26 million people were ever lucky enough to receive.

We stand here in this Chamber, we look at a Crown corporation such as the CBC, and we know that that Crown corporation, that broadcasting network, has made a difference to Canadians all over this country. It creates for Canadians a sense of self and a sense of oneness with our neighbours. The forces that pull us apart, as I said before, are many, varied, and strong, so we must be particularly careful of those forces that pull us together, and the CBC is one of those forces. It is something that Canadians, certainly those of my generation and the generation that is coming behind me, have always taken as a given. I say that of Canadians, of whatever background and of whichever of the two official languages.

I recall, as a graduate student in England with other Canadian graduate students from Quebec, Ontario, the maritimes and the west, staying up all night to listen to Radio Canada International in order to get the news from home, to listen to hockey games, and to just keep our link with our home country. That is how we discussed it, English and French, of whatever background, our country. It remains our country. CBC is one of the strongest mechanisms that makes it stay our country.

This summer I was fortunate enough to travel to different parts of Canada to speak to friends and family who live all over this vast country. I visited Quebec, western Canada, and the north. I heard the same thing from all these people. What is happening to our country? What has become of the country that we all fought for? What has become of the spirit of tolerance, acceptance and acknowledging each other?

I will tell you one of the things that has become of it, Mr. Speaker. It has become the butt of jokes for people who have no respect for the history and the traditions that began with great explorers who came to this country in the winter with De Monts and Poutrencourt who came to Port Royal.

My friend over there thinks this is funny. He thinks that a spirit of caring for this country is funny. I am glad I amuse him. If I amuse him, that is fine. He should remember that French and English alike have a stake in this country and will hold that stake. It is this country. It is not two countries; it is one country. It is not two nations; it is one country.

I fear for my colleagues in the New Democratic Party as well. The critic for the New Democratic Party, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, said in a November 25 article in The Toronto Star that he does not share the fears of the member for Mount Royal about the deleted national unity clause. He believes that the CBC contributes to unity simply by existing.

I believe that it contributes to unity simply by existing. I believe, along with the member for Mount Royal, along with the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, and along with every Liberal member in this House, that putting in the mandate for national unity can only strengthen that endeavour. It can only strengthen our belief that this is one country of many peoples, all with an equal share and an equal stake; that we are not going to see the CBC die; that we are not going to see that mandate destroyed; and that we are not going to see this country go down the tubes because of an irrational response of a government that does not care.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the stand taken by the hon. member for Mount Royal who is in fact attacking the freedom of the press. I get the feeling that she has the same disease as her leader who accused members of the press of being against him. In his view, to be on his side, journalists have to be actually working for him. She said we should promote national unity because there is more talk about separatism than federalism in Quebec. But that is what is really happening in Quebec, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, there are more people talking of sovereignty than there are talking of federalism. Should the CBC not reflect that fact, make it known and ensure that the people get a clear picture of what is going on in Quebec? Should objectivity be denied for the sake of national unity?

Should the CBC be used for propaganda purposes? What would you say if Radio-Quebec were used to promote sovereignty? That is not the case. That is not the mandate it was given by the national assembly.

Mr. Speaker, for the hon. member for Mount Royal national unity means that you must say "Jean Chrétien is against Meech Lake!" if you are speaking English, and Jean Chrétien est en faveur du lac Meech if you are speaking French. That is how the member for Mount Royal sees national unity, Mr. Speaker.

Does national unity mean that the people of Quebec are to be made to believe that the NDP exists in Quebec because it exists in British Columbia? Come now! We know that would not be an objective statement and that is not the truth. So, once again, the CBC must reflect the reality and not be a propaganda tool at the hands of the government.

Must we, all in the name of national unity, display Chinese vases, would say a very contemptuous former prime minister as he did when he was having problems with Quebec? Is that what national unity means for the Liberal member? All in all, if the people of Quebec make use of the CBC and pay for it, do they not have the right to be informed objectively? Do francophone journalists not provide objective information? I am almost done, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that there is a disinformation problem in Quebec at the present time. It has to do with anglophone media distorting the Quebec reality and not informing the rest of the country of what is going on. All Quebecers do not live in the town of Mount Royal, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to rise and participate in debate on this bill. I want you to know that I was number 10 on the list. Eight of the colleagues who were ahead of me were contemplating their speech material in the back and I had the opportunity, I am sure of their deep contemplation, to rush in here and fill the gap.

I am pleased once again to rise and participate in debate on this bill respecting broadcasting. I had the pleasure of doing so some three or four weeks ago. This bill, in the context and against the backdrop of what is occurring today in our country, points out the new mindset—

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A member asked if there was a quorum.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There being a quorum, I shall give the floor back to the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

[English]

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Karygiannis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sick and tired of what the member just did. I think the Chair should actually talk to him when he just gets up and says "on a point of order" and then leaves.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will adjust the clock so that I do not want to lose the opportunity to participate in this important debate. The Speaker, of course, has earned a reputation for fairness in this place.

It is indeed interesting that a member would want on the one hand to be concerned that the proper quorum be present in the House and, having ascertained that in fact the proper quorum is present in the House, would then vacate the House. That is not the kind of attitude that demonstrates a sincere desire to debate, a sincere desire to exchange views, because there is nothing more legitimate than having different strongly held views, no matter what the view, and wanting to share that view, wanting to generate understanding. I do not share the views of the members of the Bloc quebecois. I do not always share the views of every member of my own caucus. We discuss that on Wednesday mornings in the Liberal caucus. We certainly do not always share views with members of the Conservative Party. But, if I do not share views with colleagues of this place, I always share at least the notion that every voice has a right to be heard, and that every voice represents a legitimate point of view.

• (1600)

We are here in one place and the whole notion of a legislature is to ensure that different voices from different backgrounds, different regions, and sometimes in different languages, can exchange knowledge and information on life's experience and generate a degree of understanding.

Simply playing a role of anarchy, a role of division, a role of frustration and a role of anger is testimony to a mandate that seeks, not to build, but to break down.

In the face of those kinds of people, represented by the member who caused the point of order, who caused the fuss, and then left, and in the face of that kind of mentality what has the government done?

In almost every aspect of the national life of this country in the face of that kind of mentality, this government has retreated. In the face of the challenge to Canada today, the challenge to national unity, this government has retreated.

It has brought in a broadcast bill to appease certain people that removes the offensive and terribly insensitive reference to the mandate of the CBC to be an agent of national unity. That offended some people, so it takes it out because people such as the Bloc quebecois did not like it.

It brought in a Broadcast Act that set up two boards for the CBC because that offended some people—people such as members of the Bloc quebecois—so we take it out. In the face of the very thorough, very serious professional and dedicated members of Quebec's Bélanger–Campeau Commission—and I do not agree with many of its members—who were doing their job in a most serious manner on the future of Quebec, how does the government respond? Does the Prime Minister decide that he is going to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission? No. Does the leader of the NDP decide to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission? No. Does the government decide to set up a parallel national process involving every part of the country, including Quebec, to respond to Bélanger–Campeau? No, Mr. Speaker, it does not.

It sets up the Spicer Commission without any reference to the individual members of that commission. It has a mandate that is a watered–down, pale, pathetic mandate to act as a legitimate and serious response on behalf of the people of Canada through their agent, the national government, to the crisis that is unfolding in Canada today and to what is going on in Quebec today, legitimately. It is the right of the people of Quebec to have such an exercise, but it is the responsibility of the Government of Canada to respond to it in a meaningful way.

That has not happened with this pale, pathetic, watered–down, ridiculous answer called the Citizens' Forum. It is an insult to the intelligence of the people of Canada, a country mired in paralysis at a time when leadership is demanded.

These points have been made by the Leader of the Opposition in responding on the day the forum was announced when he said it had to be a serious agent to provide an opportunity for the people of Canada to speak about their country and to seek solutions and new directions. That was the position of the Leader of the Opposition and he shares my view, I am sure, that that the kind of comprehensive action we wanted has not been produced. We have nothing but great disappointment in what we have seen so far in the face of the constitutional evolution that is under way in the country.

An hon. member: Why didn't you tell Wells that?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. speaker, the member across the way is hooting and hollering: "Why did you not tell Wells that?"

What I am saying, and what I suspect, modestly, is reflected in the gut and in the heart and soul of a great many Canadians, is that people have a sense that this ship of state upon which they are all passengers today is adrift in a vast angry and stormy sea. As they sit as passengers, 26 million or 27 million Canadians, on that ship adrift on an angry sea being bounced to and fro, feeling their stomachs heave, they want a sense of leadership. They want once again a steady hand on the helm. They want a leader to chart a new course for this country. They want a captain capable of bringing the ship out of the stormy seas and back safe home again at port.

When they see this Prime Minister, this captain, to whom we have entrusted the job of navigating the ship of state for the next two years, the two years left of the mandate, obsessed with indecision and stuck in his wardroom below decks, incapable of taking new directions for Canada, incapable of being heard in the province of Quebec on behalf of all Canada at a critical time, the people of this country wish there was a way of making this captain walk the plank. They hope that when he walks that plank that he finds himself in shark-infested waters, because Canada needs a new beginning. It needs a new captain on the ship of state.

Canada needs a new sense of direction, and that sense of direction cannot be found in a government that continues to water-down national institutions, to haul the heart and soul out of the CBC, to strip bare of any national mandate the Broadcast Act, and to give us these pale and pathetic responses, such as the Spicer forum, to national crises.

The people of Canada know that this country is in crisis. They know that these are serious days. They know that the challenge to unity is great, perhaps greater than ever before in our history, but they believe the country is worth fighting for. They believe that the hearts, minds and souls of Quebecers are worth fighting for, that those who have turned to the Reform Party are worth fighting for and they want a leader to rally them to the cause. The sooner we get that kind of leader, the better off this country will be.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak about an issue that is very important in the hearts of many Canadians. Unity. There are some of us who have chosen Canada and have come to this great country of ours by choice.

Mr. Gustafson: They destroyed it.

Mr. Karygiannis: My hon. colleague across the floor says we destroyed it. Well, I challenge him, because I came to this country 20 years ago to add to this country, and I certainly do not think that I came here to destroy it.

Mr. Gustafson: Ask Wells.

Mr. Karygiannis: Well, I do not have to ask Wells. I can ask my father when he made that choice to come to this great country of ours, and if you, sir, think that I do not have a place in here, then you are mistaken.

In the year 2000, 50 per cent of the Canadian population will be something that is neither French—which the Bloc quebecois thinks it has in the bag—nor English. They will be from other minorities. They will be people from Europe, south Asia, and east Asia.

When these people come here, are we going to ask them to follow the example of the Bloc quebecois? Are we going to ask them: "Why do you not raise your little bandito flag and make this part of Canada yours?" Well, I say to my hon. colleague from Quebec that that is not what those people coming over would prefer to do. They come here looking for a better future, as your forefathers did, Mr. Speaker, and as my father did. Yet, when we come to this great country of ours, we have something which is called dismemberment. We want to take this country and tear its guts out.

The Reform Party in the west says it is going to be a national party. Yet, its constitution does not allow it to run candidates in other parts of the country. The Bloc quebecois that is only interested in getting its 37 per cent in Quebec. There is one party that stands for Canada and there is one party that fights for Canada.

We see CBC and we listen to it. There is some dead time on CBC which is on the weekends in the mornings. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Communications will say: "Let us take this time and let some multicultural groups use it." In the greater area of metropolitan Toronto and in other areas, there is MTV which is distinctively made up of multicultural television. There is City TV, which is channel 7, which on Saturday and Sunday mornings devotes its programming entirely to multicultural television. There is Global which does the same. In Hamilton, CHCH-TV does the same.

Therefore, I am challenging the minister and I ask him why we do not give some air time to these different ethnic minorities. We should not call them minorities. We should call them different ethnic Canadian components, because I am proud to be Canadian first and of different roots and different heritages.

Mr. Lapierre: Good for you.

Mr. Karygiannis: My colleague from the Bloc quebecois says: "Good for you." Sir, it is good for me because I made this country my choice and I want to fight to keep it united, regardless of the hon. member who wants to split the country. He wants to take the country and split it apart.

Mr. Lapierre: I fought the last referendum and you betrayed me.

Mr. Karygiannis: You fought the last referendum and I betrayed you? Well, I did not betray you. In the commission set up by the Liberals in Quebec, who are in the hip pocket of the Prime Minister, we do not find one single member who speaks for the anglophones. In the Spicer commission, this hoodwink of a commission that the Prime Minister has set up, we do not find a single representative who speaks—

Mr. Gustafson: Keep your eye on it.

Mr. Karygiannis: My colleague says: "Keep your eye on it." It will be swept under the carpet, as was done with Meech Lake which failed completely.

I spoke before about notorious. This government is notorious about hoodwinking the Canadian people. Notorious, "n–o t–o–r–i u–s". Mr. Speaker, you can fill the blanks in.

I am very proud to stand in the House and speak about unity. For those members who think that unity is something to take to task, I say to them that there are those of us, the late comers, who have been the soft targets up to now who are going to stand up and say to their faces: "No more." There are those of us, 50 per cent by the year 2000, who will be neither English or French, who are going to say: "We want to keep this country united." There are those of us who will not opt for division. There are those of us who will fight to the death.

Mr. Lapierre: Too late.

Mr. Karygiannis: My hon. colleague from Quebec says: "It is too late." I have to remind him and the Bloc quebecois that there are only 37 per cent in the latest poll in Quebec who think like him. I wonder where the rest, the 63 per cent of the people—

An hon. member: Oh, no.

Mr. Karygiannis: Thirty–seven per cent is its popularity. Sixty–three per cent of the other people of Quebec—

Mr. Gustafson: They're all Tories.

Mr. Karygiannis: He says: "They're all Tories." He is dreaming, too. Is that notorious Tories? Is that "n–o t–o–r–i u–s" Tories? That is all he has got.

We want to keep the country united and, if the hon. member does not want to keep this country united, I will tell him what the Canadian population is going to do to him. They will turf him out.

I want to quote the Prime Minister. On July 31, 1990 he said: "I will not allow it to break into pieces or give it up to anyone." This Prime Minister has done nothing else but that. This Prime Minister has been a vehicle for division. He wanted to win the election so he went to Quebec to talk to those member who said they were federalists. We saw what happened to one of those members. They walked from over there on the government benches to be over here with the Bloc quebecois. They walked over here because the Prime Minister could not deliver to them what he promised.

The Prime Minister sold Canada out in order to form the government and he is going to try to do it again. Well, it is not going to work, Mr. Speaker.

My hon. colleague from Quebec asks if Canadians have a leader. I say to him that Canadians do have a leader. They have a leader within the Liberal Party.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lapierre: Look at the polls.

Mr. Karygiannis: I would look at the polls and the hon. member had better look at the polls. By the year 2000, 50 per cent of the Canadian people—

Mr. Lapierre: That's not a poll.

Mr. Karygiannis: It is not a poll, he says. Well, maybe he should wake up and smell the coffee. He should wake up and smell the rationale because one-third of the Quebec people are allophones, one-third of those people.

Mr. Lapierre: They will be tested.

Mr. Karygiannis: Well, they came to this country by choice and that choice is to stay within Canada, not to separate.

Mr. Lapierre: They will be tested.

Mr. Karygiannis: He says that they will be tested. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sure they will be tested.

In the two minutes I have left, I want to take the time to realize that as we proceed to the year 2000 there is one party that will speak for Canada's unity. There is one party that will try to work very hard to keep Canada united and that, Mr. Speaker, is not the Conservative Party. It is not the NDP. We know what its member from Quebec is saying. We know what he wants to do. He wants to sell this country out so he can get elected and so it can get one more seat in this House of Commons.

We know that the Bloc quebecois is saying: "Vote for us, we are going to separate."

There is one party that will fight very hard to keep this country united and that one party is none other than the Liberal Party.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join in debate at report stage of Bill C-40, an act to amend the Broadcasting Act.

The legislation before us is similar to that bill which was presented in the House before I became a member in 1988. Because the election was called, of course, that bill died on the Order Paper.

As a former broadcast journalist, the major difficulty I have with this bill, and indeed the Official Opposition has with Bill C-40, is that it drops the CBC's 1968 mandate, and I quote, "to contribute to the development of national unity to provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity".

I have always found, and I am sure other Canadians agree with me, that the CBC has been a great instrument of national unity and, in fact, an expression of our very identity, the promoter of our cultural distinctiveness, our linguistic duality, and our regional diversity.

Where there are no CBC affiliates, there is a tendency to rely on news provided by American networks which have the budgets and resources to post correspondents around the world. The result is, of course, good news and good reporting, but it is through the eyes of another country, a country very different than ours, with a different philosophy and a different ideology.

There was the courage to establish a national broadcasting network composed of radio and television outlets across Canada, in part to resist the strong cultural influences of the south.

While working as a television broadcast journalist in the city of Barrie, Ontario, CKVR, a CBC affiliate, was fortunate enough to rely in part on news gathered from across the country and around the world. Then, while employed by CHCH-TV in Hamilton, Ontario, it became quite evident to me, because of budget restrictions and because it was an independent station—that is it did not have an affiliation with the CBC or CTV networks—we had to rely on our international news and purchase that news from NBC. The American slant to the news was ever-present, and that cannot be denied. The same can be said of other news organizations from across the country. Instead of relying on the American feed, they would be able to broadcast news from a Canadian perspective, with Canadians speaking on Canadian issues from around the world about those issues important to Canada.

• (1620)

Part of the reason behind the national unity clause was that Canada was so vast a land and in many ways geographically remote, that it was necessary to bring Canadian content to these regions. Many people wonder what the true identity of Canadians is. Whatever the definition is, as our communications critic for the opposition, the hon. member for Mount Royal noted: "there is no doubt that without a constant and unflinching determination to be ourselves and the direct and constant involvement of our government, never would we have survived or would we have preserved our identity."

This bill would move the CBC away from that mandate of promoting national unity. Just because the CBC is well established does not mean that it has to turn its attention away from its national unity role. After all, the forces of the United States are not any weaker today than they were yesterday. Indeed, they are even stronger. Make no mistake. By opposing the changes to Bill C–40, we are not fighting against outside influences but fighting for our national unity. At this time in our nation's history, the role of national unity and our national broadcasting network is especially and crucially important. As other Canadian institutions are put on the auction block or are disseminated by this government and decimated by this government, such as the massive VIA Rail cuts that we saw last year, the CBC is truly the purveyor of national unity and is that thread that weaves and binds the regions of our country.

Unfortunately, it appears that the damage the Conservative government has wrought on this country is not enough and is far from over. Now it has sets its sights on the CBC. What is next? Privatization? I would certainly hope not.

Speaking on the record, the second reading of the Broadcast Act, 1932, R. B. Bennett stated of the national unity mandate that: "This country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources. Without such control broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals. It seems to me that in Canada, the system we can most profitably employ—"and the members opposite perk up their ears when they hear the word profitably—R. B. Bennett was talking about cultural profitability, "is one which responds most directly to the popular will and the national need."

He concluded: "In this stage of our national development we have problems peculiar to ourselves and we must reach a solution of them through the employment of all available means." The Minister of Communications said of the national unity clause that it is an "intolerable interference" because the CBC "was maintaining this political value artificially and it was a constraint on freedom of expression."

The minister himself has not contributed greatly to the CBC's freedom of expression when he himself has cut an estimated $240 million over six years. How can the CBC pursue the mandate it was founded to perform when it is under siege by this government? The maintenance of a Canadian broadcasting system such as the CBC is fundamental to the future of Canada.

Most people recognize how greatly affected we are by what we hear and what we see in connection with radio and television programming. Statistics brought forward in earlier debate by the hon. member for Mount Royal, who has been very articulate and worked very hard on this very thick bill, show that 80 per cent of our publishing industry rests in foreign hands. Eighty per cent of our publishing industry rests in foreign hands. Ninety–seven per cent of films shown in Canada come from outside the country. Eight–five per cent of records and tapes are based on imported master tapes in broadcasting. Seventy–one per cent of all programming viewed by English–speaking Canadians on television is American. The figure is lower in French–speaking Canada.

Mr. Karygiannis: Canada for sale.

Mr. Keyes: Canadians watch an average of 24 hours of television programming each week and 18 hours listening to the radio. Obviously, these statistics reveal not only how we rely on radio or television for entertainment, but show us how whatever is actually being broadcast will make its impression, affect our thinking. It is therefore important that the CBC remain an agent of Canadian unity and that it is so described in this legislation.

I would like to address a couple of other amendments put forward by my colleague, the member for Mount Royal. The amendment is grouped together with that of the amendment of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, dealing with the national unity cause itself. This amendment, Motion 17, reaffirms the mandate of the CBC to:

> "(vi) contribute to national unity, shared national consciousness and identity,".

This clause must be put back into the legislation. I believe that these amendments and others put forward by my colleague for Mount Royal will address some of the inadequacies of this bill, especially the one dealing with national unity.

I say again, in conclusion, that the government should not proceed with this legislation without the clause. As R.B. Bennett would have said, "especially at this critical stage of our national development".

Communications is, after all, the vehicle for understanding. The CBC, the envy of this ever-changing world of ours, is the beacon of our true national spirit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Comox—Alberni—Human Rights; the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Scotia Synfuels Project.

The member for Oshawa has the floor.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take just a moment to participate in the debate here this afternoon because I must admit I have been disturbed somewhat by not only what I have heard, but the way in which it has been put.

I think that most of us who have been in political life for a little while understand that the basics of it all is communication. If your constituents cannot talk to you, reach you or tell you what their problems are, you cannot very well solve them.

It seems to me that part of what I have heard discussed here this afternoon has to do with that ability to communicate. It may be that the CBC is only one of many ways in which the people of Canada can talk to one another. But it is apparent from the debate this afternoon that if we need anything, we need an ability to talk to one another.

I do not know that it serves a useful purpose to have a nation split up, people unable to communicate with one another, with political parties forming in different regions of the country and the rest of us not even able to share in that discussion.

It seems to me that some of what we have seen this afternoon is evidence of that, that there are political parties forming and reforming in this country which have a different idea. It would be fine if we all had some means, like this Parliament and like a national communications system, to hear them out, to hear what they have to say and to respond to them. It seems that some members do not want to hear what others have to say. They do not want to accept that somebody else might have an opinion just as valid as theirs.

I would argue that in this bill and in this Parliament this afternoon, there is evidence that we have a major problem in just translating our beefs to one another. I think we better resolve that because I think that that is the road to ruin. Whether one would be a member of the Bloc quebecois arguing that no one else in the world understands their point of view, or whether somebody is from the Reform Party in western Canada, and somehow you feel that the rest of the nation has not bothered to listen to you, we should all admit that at the very least we need a means to communicate. We need to resolve some of our difficulties and disagreements. If we have an argument that is real and substantive and divides, then surely it should be something where we can sense, but not just that we forgot to talk to one another. It is not just that we did not have any means to communicate. It is that the question before us is for real and that the arguments are for real. They are not because someone portrayed us in a light that we did not want.

It is difficult in this day and age where communication very often is not the long speech that is made in this Parliament, but communication is a 20-second clip on television. I do not think that any of us could deny for a moment, whether we like it or not, that we have all seen clips of life that have had much more impact on the people of this country than anything that has been said in this Chamber.

I think, very dramatically for example, we are now getting around to the point where we are analyzing the clip of people in the city of Brockville, Ontario, who walked on a Quebec flag. Now we are analyzing how widely that visual was disseminated around the world, and how much of an impact it had on people in Quebec, in other parts of Canada, and in other parts of the world. It is dramatic. It is ironic that it was the CBC which had the thoughtfulness to go back, almost a year after the fact, and analyse is that really what those people were trying to transmit? Well, most of them were not even from Brockville. Most of them did not have that idea in mind when they participated in something that was captured in a small video clip and broadcast around the world. That is the negative power of communications.

What about the positive power? Is there a chance? I was struck again during the entire Meech Lake debate of how little Canadians know about one another, about the different circumstances in which people in Canada find themselves. I heard this afternoon in this chamber a lot of members who, it seems to me, simply feel that if someone could slip a few words into a piece of legislation, the problem would be resolved. I do not believe that is true. I wish it were that simple, but I do not think it is. I have heard members espouse that if we could only find a new slogan, or a new person, or a new leader, that all of a sudden all of the nation's problems would disappear. I do not believe that is true either. I wish it was, but I do not believe it is.

I look at the world, particularly a nation like Canada, and it is a pretty awkward place to try to govern. I am sure even the Prime Minister would admit to that this afternoon. It is difficult to bring together all of the different regions of the country. Some times people would say "this country does not make sense. It is too big. It is too diverse. It is hard to get around. It is cold. It is not a friendly climate in many parts of this country".

In part, even old Tories like Sir John A. Macdonald understood some basics about this nation, that if you wanted to be a nation people had better be able to reach one another. They need a train to go from one place to another, or you cannot even pretend to be a nation. People would have said: "You need things like a post office. You have to be able to send letters to one another". Even if you do not send a whole lot of letters, there has to be something which represents the federal government in each of our little communities. That is not a supermailbox. That is a tradition which they call a post office. They recognize that as being a focal point for the federal government in their community.

If there is someone who is undermining all of this sense of a nation, it probably is not anyone on this side of the aisle. I do not think that I would point my finger at less than a dozen members who purport to be something called a Bloc quebecois. I would look across the aisle where someone has taken away most of the institutions, slowly, surely and methodically, over a fairly lengthy period of time on which people have relied to make this a country that works.

Part of what we are discussing this afternoon is, once again, someone looking to the CBC to solve all their problems. I do not think it can. I do think it ever has. I do not think it ever will. But, I think it is part of what we need. If there is not an effective communications system in this country, how can you even have the argument? You cannot. You will wind up with people shouting slogans. That does no one a service, no one anywhere in this country. It is difficult. Many of the members here have had a chance to travel across Canada. The first thing that hits one when one tries to do that is that this is not easy; this is a huge nation, a diverse nation. We need to be able to talk to one another, we need to communicate effectively, we need to reinstate all of those institutions that brought us together, in the first instance.

I think it is sad, but it is a fact, that this government has moved steadily, slowly, on a day–by–day basis, to take away some of the things that made it possible to have a country called Canada. It seems to me, and it is evident from the discussion this afternoon, that the nation called Canada has a crisis on its hands, not just one but many of them.

If we are to move forward in a sensible, rational manner, we will need every communication device we can conceive of, including a revitalized Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to do that. I believe it is possible for all of us, with very different ideas about what this country should be and about what the problems are here and extremely different ideas about how you would resolve them, to meet somewhere, whether it be by means of radio, television, print journalism, an effective communications system, or a postal system that we can all recognize in our own community. If these things can be put together and if members here and all Canadians can have some chance to utilize these things we will have, at least, an opportunity to work out our differences.

Part of what disturbs me about the debate I have heard here this afternoon is not that people argue and disagree but that they have no time to hear someone else's point of view. You cannot win an argument that way. One can shout people down; one can avoid the eventual resolution of a problem; but one cannot win an argument unless one is, first and foremost, prepared to hear what the other side has to say. One must test the waters and see if the grievances of others can be addressed. There has not been a lot of that in here, this afternoon.

It is true, as I have heard members say during the course of this debate, that this nation is changing. I am not sure that it is a planned, logical evolution but, undeniably, it is changing. It is changing in economic terms, in linguistic terms, and in demographic terms. I would hope that in this Chamber and in the broadcasting done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, we would at least have an opportunity to have a sensible, rational, logical argument and that we could, at least, have the tools that would allow us to communicate, effectively, with one another. I hope that that is what comes out of this bill and other attempts by the government, but I must say, I do not see a concerted effort to do that. Quite the contrary, I see things moving in the opposite direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me this afternoon.

[English]

I want to make a few comments on what my colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa, said earlier. His concept of Canada probably parallels that of quite a few people in this country. Bill C–40 deals with amendments to the CBC act. My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, put the problem into perspective.

What I would like to do in the time allotted to me is to point out, perhaps, some of the good things that emanated from the old Bill C–136, which are now incorporated in Bill C–40 and also, as gently as I can but hopefully with constructive criticism, point out where the bill might be a little bit deficient.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, said, the purpose of Bill C–40 is really to replace the 1968 Broadcasting Act and is essentially identical to Bill C–136 which died on the Order Paper when the 1988 federal election was called. The legislation had its genesis in the task force on broadcasting policy and it had an extensive review by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, which resulted in four reports, containing recommendations for new broadcasting legislation. Since Bill C–136 died, we hoped that the new minister would take the time to reshape a new bill and put his own imprimatur on it. In my opinion Bill C–40 is not such a bill. It is still the hurried bill of a defeated minister with very few changes. We had hoped that the new minister and the Department of Communications would have prepared a report on all of the suggestions made by so many responsible citizens and groups, by so many experts and, at the very least, explained why their concerns have not been met.

I mentioned earlier that there were positive provisions which were carried forth from Bill C–136 to Bill C–40. Among them, we the Liberals are very pleased to see the following provisions. Women, children, cultural minorities, aboriginal peoples and the disabled are specifically mentioned in the legislation. The need to portray more accurately the multicultural nature of our society is also included in there. The special nature of the French language broadcasting environment is recognized. The CRTC will thus be required to take these market differences into account when making licensing decisions.

The originators of program signals and their authorized agents, such as the cable operators, will be able to take action in the courts against commercial pirates stealing their scrambled signals. There is provision for making educational broadcasting an integral part of the law. I want to deal more specifically with that particular area a little later in my speech.

Local Canadian stations will be given priority status when carried by cable, and the provision that the president of the CBC be a member of the CBC board of directors seems to be a very common sense approach to this whole thing.

There were some amendments made by my party which were accepted in the legislative committee, such as the recognition of community broadcasting as one of the elements of the Canadian broadcasting system, along with the public and the private. We are going to have an amalgamation of the three. The mandatory requirement that the Canadian Broadcasting system be owned and controlled by Canadians is just common sense. Why should we have our communication systems controlled by someone outside this country? The programming of Canadian broadcasters will also include children and be a reflection of the multicultural and multiracial nature of Canada, ensuring that television and radio more accurately portray the multiracial as well as the multicultural nature of Canada.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to interject a few mild criticisms, if I might, hoping that with these interjections the minister will perhaps consider them. We believe, as I am sure my hon. colleague from Manitoba believes, because in his heart I believe he harbours Liberal ideas, that Bill C–40, while improved, is still seriously flawed and should not be passed into law without further major changes. We believe in a national broadcasting system and a national vision of Canada; not a community of communities, not two Canadas, and most definitely not 10 Canadas. Bill C–40, if passed, will only further separate and Balkanize Canadians at a very critical point in our nation's history.

The following are some of my concerns. First of all there is the challenge to federal jurisdictions. We in my party are concerned that the federal government's jurisdiction over broadcasting could be challenged through new definitions. The new definition of broadcasting in clause 2 of the bill is defined broadly as to include the transmission and reception of programs other than by means of radiocommunications; that is to say, hard wire or closed circuit transmissions. These were considered previously to be under provincial jurisdiction.

Second, undertakings will be divided into programming and non–programming functions, a rejection of the conventional legal practice which has regarded such undertakings as indivisible. That too seems to be absolutely in keeping with common sense.

My colleague who is sitting beside me, the member for Hamilton West for whom I have a great deal of respect, addressed the problem of Canadian unity. The 1968 Broadcasting Act required that the CBC "contribute to the development of national unity". Of course it should. It is not there for the unity of another country. It is there so that we can speak to one another as Canadians. However, that reference has been dropped in Bill C–40. Why would they do this if this is the major raison d'être for this bill?

The Liberals, and myself personally, believe in the goal of Canada in developing its national personality. Building its sense of national identity and consciousness are factors needed to build Canadian national unity. This has been endorsed by my colleague from Quebec when he spoke on behalf of the Bloc quebecois. He and I do not share the same concept of Canada. We need a strong, national institution like the CBC, as my colleague said, to weave all the regions together in this mosaic that we keep talking about, the mosaic of Canada.

I skipped a lot of what I wanted to say because I want to deal with the educational service. First, the alternative program that we talk about in education should not be introduced at this time or through Bill C–40. This ruling was expressed by the Nova Scotia Department of Transportation and Communications and the Canadian Association of Broadcasters to which my colleague belongs.

However, if the government believes that there should be another service, we believe that it should be a Canadian learning channel which would address national needs while serving provincial and educational demands of its learner audiences. A Canadian service would provide a necessary and needed complement to the already existing American learning channel, which in 1987 was watched by 120,000 Canadians. That was an increase of 124 per cent over 1986.

There is a dire need to put forth our own Canadian programs for Canadians. Liberals recognize that education is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. We feel that collaboration by the provinces should be encouraged to provide such a service. Issues and social challenges such as the general criticism of current educational standards, emphasis on the delivery capacity of education in Canada and others would be countless subjects available for the exploration of Canadian learning in this country. We should have our own learning channel.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the Friends of Canadian Broadcasting, all 21,000 of the them across Canada who brought this issue forward in the years between 1985 and 1990. They worked extremely hard to bring this issue back before the House of Commons.

In my riding there is approximately 486 Friends of Canadian Broadcasting. Many of them have written to me on this issue, trying to bring to my attention to the many important aspects of Canadian broadcasting. I am in total agreement with the thrust of what they wrote to me about, and here I am before the House speaking in support of national unity as part of the CBC mandate.

If we look back to 1932, when the government of the day decided to create the public radio service that eventually became the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, at that time the government made a very important step. It realized that Canadians should have control over broadcasting in Canada. R. B. Bennett said at second reading of the broadcasting bill, as reported at page 3035 of Hansard of May 18, 1932:

> First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources—

• (1650)

He recognized that Canada's autonomy and independence hung on the control of our communications systems.

When television was introduced, there was a need for further regulation to protect Canadian content and culture in CBC programming. Therefore in 1968 a new Broadcasting Act was introduced, at which time something very important took place. At that time the mandate of the CBC was to "contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity". For the first time in Canadian broadcasting history, the national role of the CBC was reaffirmed.

The CBC realizes that Canada is unique in both its demographic and cultural diversity. As a result, a national medium is required to serve the needs of the Canadian population. Precisely because the CBC is considered our national medium, it does not make much sense to eliminate its role to promote and preserve a uniquely Canadian identity. As we know, traditionally the CBC has been a great vehicle for promoting Canadian culture.

There is no doubt that there is money to be made by decreasing Canadian made programs and by purchasing low cost commercial production, but the facts remain that Canadians without a doubt enjoy the CBC the way it is. I have the figures to prove it.

Nearly 500 English radio outlets and almost 200 French radio outlets broadcast CBC services in Canada. This year the CBC's annual report states that English and French radio programming reached about one out of five Canadian adults every week. That is approximately six million Canadians on a weekly basis.

As for television, English broadcasts are now made from 18 stations, 23 affiliates, and 637 broadcasters. CBC French television is broadcast from 217 media outlets. During the year 1988—89 television season, the CBC English audience share was 17 per cent, a figure that put it on par with the three major American commercial networks in their home markets.

The fact that the CBC has almost 20 per cent of the television market share is very impressive, particularly since most large cities in Canada receive all the American channels and some Canadian stations broadcast American programs.

The figures show also that Canadians are watching more and more Canadian television productions. According to the CBC annual report, efforts to Canadianize prime time schedules of both English and French television networks have had positive effects.

For instance, since 1984—85 the production of prime time CBC English viewing captured by Canadian programs rose from 60 per cent to 64 per cent. For the French network, for example, the proportion of viewing to Canadian programming has risen from 75 per cent to 85 per cent. Clearly the CBC continues to be a leading force in bringing a uniquely Canadian flavour to broadcasting in Canada. There is absolutely no reason why this should not be mandated within Bill C–40.

There can be no doubt that in this day and age we are flooded with information from all sides. It is for this reason that Canada needs a national information clearing house to sort through the information and present it from a Canadian perspective.

The CBC has always been a unifying force for Canada. It should be allowed to grow and continue to be Canada's voice. I do not think that keeping the national unity clause within Bill C–40 will turn the CBC into an instrument of the state, as has been stated by some members of the House.

Looking at the past four years, the CBC had some really difficult times. For instance, when the government was first elected in 1984, it promised support for CBC's resources and independence. However, in 1984 when the Minister of Finance introduced his mini budget, the first thing it did was cut $75 million from the CBC parliamentary allocation.

The following year, in February 1985, the first advertisement of the Friends of Canadian Broadcasting appeared in The Globe and Mail, calling upon the Prime Minister to study the future of broadcasting instead of making senseless cuts to the CBC's budget. In May 1985 the government responded by appointing the Caplan–Sauvageau task force on broadcasting policy.

The following year, after extensive public hearings and research, the task force issued a comprehensive unanimous report with recommendations for broadcasting policy and a badly needed new Broadcasting Act.

In 1987 a House of Commons committee studied the Caplan–Sauvageau report and issued unanimous recommendations to the government supporting the thrust of the task force report. As a result, in June 1988 Bill C–136 was introduced and in September 1988 it died on the Order Paper.

Now we have Bill C–40 before us. I would like to stop right here by saying that we do support certain aspects of the bill, but we would whole–heartedly like to see the government adopt the recommendation of the hon. member for Mount Royal.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the two or three minutes remaining to express some of my views on Canadian unity.

[English]

I am pleased to speak about the unity clause because what we are talking about is the essence of Canada. The best statement I have heard or read to date comes from the The Financial Post a few months ago. It indicated, and I quoted: "If information is the currency of commerce of the modern economy, ideas are the binding force of a modern nation. We can no longer be defined by what we are but by what we believe. To be Canadian should mean to stand for something".

[Translation]

So we must learn and appreciate the fact that the CBC can be used as a vehicule to express the concept of Canada. We can defend Canada only if there exists a concept which all people can appreciate.

[English]

On that question, unless we give the CBC the opportunity, the mandate, or the requirement to gather together all concepts which in their totality define Canada and Canadians, identify the regions, and show the contribution that each and every one of these regions gives to the Canadian identity, both on a cultural and linguistic basis, then truly we can say that we have a vehicle for the expression of what is Canadian.

Unless we consider the amendment that my hon. colleague for Mount Royal has presented, we will forgo the opportunity to give the CBC not only this mandate but the opportunity as well to carry out the concept of a Canada that exists in the totality of all of its residents and all of its regions, be they from the west or the east, from the maritimes, from Quebec whether they speak French or English, or from a culture like my own which fits into neither pattern.

The important reason to support this amendment—and I think my colleague from Shefford can also appreciate it—is that we cannot understand and fully integrate the total diversity that is the essence of Canada, unless we are willing to recognize specific regions.

One would be tempted almost to say the distinctive nature of certain regions can be translated and exchanged with all other Canadians through a common vehicle. We are going to forgo that opportunity. For what purpose? To give us an opportunity to turn our backs on fellow Canadians? To ignore the contributions that French and English—

SOLICITOR GENERAL

TASK FORCE ON ABORIGINAL PEOPLES IN FEDERAL CORRECTIONS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of immediately implementing the recommendations respecting policing of the Task Force on Aboriginal Peoples in Federal Corrections, as presented to the Solicitor General on March 30, 1989, and file with this House a timetable for implementing the remaining recommendations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion was placed on the Order Paper many months ago when I was the critic for our party in the area of the Solicitor General and dealt with federal corrections.

Under the system in which the House operates, the names of members get drawn to present their motions. Mine happened to be drawn. I was very pleased about that and for the opportunity of presenting this motion to the House, because I view it as a particularly important motion at this time.

The issue of the condition and treatment of our aboriginal peoples is a matter that, of course, is now front and centre in Canada, one that has attracted the attention of all Canadians over the last number of months. The problems have been with us for many years, and the problem in particular of the treatment of our aboriginal Canadians in our corrections system is one that has been before Canada for years and years.

The Solicitor General's department and the Correctional Service finally responded to those problems with the appointment of a task force on aboriginal peoples in federal corrections. The task force was, for practical purposes, internal to the Correctional Service. Its members included Mr. Ingstrup, the present Correctional Service of Canada Commissioner, along with Messrs. Rayner, Nuttall, Sawatsky, Cunningham, Louis, and Dicerni, as well as a working committee, all the members of which came from within the Public Service of Canada.

The task force reports and recommendations outline the continuing horror story and the sheer racism of the treatment of native and aboriginal Canadians within our corrections system.

As we all know and as it has been pointed out time and time again, it is a scandal that a so-called civilized country such as Canada should treat its native people the way it does. There is no clearer picture of the discrimination against native people than the treatment within our Correctional Service.

It is a story of institutional, systematic racism, institutional conservatism, and an inability to change and respond to an obvious wrong, immorality, and evil. There is the simple statistic that 9 per cent of those within our Correctional Service who are incarcerated in Canadian prisons are native people. Yet, they only reflect 2.5 per cent of the general population.

To some extent, the Correctional Service of Canada can say: "Well, that is somebody else's fault. We only take the ones they send us." Yet, as this report shows, native people stay in jail longer than white, non-Indian, non-aboriginal inmates in our system. They spend less time on parole and more time actually behind bars. They have fewer services available to them. Frequently, their religion is given no regard whatsoever. Their system of thought and of internal government is disregarded and the result, of course, is that it contributes to recidivism among the native populations in Canada.

The time has finally come for the House and for the government to address the issue and to procrastinate no longer. The government, through the Correctional Service of Canada, produced a fine report, full of excellent recommendations. As a member of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, when I asked Mr. Ingstrup, Commissioner of the Correctional Service, what he intended to do about implementing the report, he said that there was a committee working on this. This was over a year ago, I think in the spring of 1989, shortly after the report was made public.

I am quite looking forward to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General telling us specifically what has been done to implement this report. If he is able to say that there has been substantial implementation, then I will congratulate him. But I would also hope that the parliamentary secretary will come to the House and offer a timetable for completion of implementation. I would hope that not only will there be a substantial record of achievement over the last year and a half, but for those items which have not yet been implemented, that a timetable will be offered today in this House.

This is not a partisan matter. It is a matter on which all sides of the House can join. We want the parliamentary secretary and the department to come forward with accomplishments in this area, because the people of Canada finally are saying to the government: "Do not wait longer. You must act on these recommendations."

I could take the House through the recommendations. They are important, but it seems to me the important point to make now is that the time has come for action.

There is a companion report which appeared after I had filed this motion in the House. That report is called Creating Choices, and it is the report of the task force on federally-sentenced women, filed in April, 1990. Among women who are incarcerated, there is again a disproportionate number of native people. This report poignantly outlines the pain that is suffered by native women in our prisons. Just recently, there was yet another suicide, that of a young native woman in our prisons.

I know that the Solicitor General has responded very positively to this particular report and he is to be congratulated for that. He recently announced that finally after over 50 years, the prison for women in Kingston is going to be closed. He said that the government has made a firm commitment to implement the recommendations of the task force on federally-sentenced women. I would like to hear from the parliamentary secretary a specific commitment to implement the recommendations respecting native women in our prisons, because that is important to hear and it is important to get the government on record on that.

We have not yet heard in the House the government commit itself to an implementation of the earlier task force report on aboriginal peoples in our federal corrections system. I would ask the government to take this opportunity to deal with this long-standing and painful issue. I would ask that the parliamentary secretary take the time to outline the specifics of what the government has done and what the government will do.

I am going to keep my remarks brief, because I know there are other members who would like to speak to this. I call on the government, not only to speak to the issue, but to allow this motion to pass unanimously before six o'clock.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to this motion. Rather than make my hon. friend do penance, I will not dwell too long on what is perhaps a point of order or a technical problem that I had in the wording of the motion which seems to refer more to policing than—

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, just to clarify—

• (1710 )

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has had ample opportunity—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Victoria on a point of order.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I hope you do not take this from my friend's time, but rather from the time I did not use.

I should have explained that in the wording of the resolution before the House the word "policing" slipped in inadvertently, but the motion does call on the House to ask the Government to consider the advisability of immediately implementing the recommendation respecting the task force on aboriginal people as presented and filed with this House. That is what it was intended to mean, and I believe that is what it really does say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the reference to policing was just partly Freudian as a result of the member's fine work on the Committee for Justice and the Solicitor General where the hon. member for Victoria served over the last year or so.

In any event, the task force report that is the subject of the motion raised many issues in corrections at a time which was well in advance of a number of very public Canadian events that brought to the attention of the public our clear delay in addressing a number of very obvious needs of native Canadians, not just in the field of corrections, but in a broad spectrum of activity that cuts right across the whole of their existence. We, in Parliament, must share some of that blame.

The task force was not a parliamentary task force, but was a task force of individuals with expertise in the field that was being studied, that was corrections.

The recommendations of the report address very clearly and succinctly a number of areas to which I am sure we agree the corrections system should be responding. I will mention just a few of the highlights of the report for the benefit of the record since the report is not a parliamentary report.

The report recommends the gathering of statistical information that would relate to the ethnicity that is the status of being an aboriginal in the country at the time the native comes in contact with the correctional system. It recommends the generation of some new particularly targeted measuring sticks to determine how well we are serving the native community in the corrections field. It recommends instituting mechanisms which will address the particular rehabilitative needs of native Canadians.

As an aside, I would like to refer back, as I guess we should, to the justice system of which the corrections system forms a part. We must recall that there are several goals of the justice system taken as a package and the two most important for our discussion here are the deterrence role of the justice system and the rehabilitative goals of the corrections system.

No one wishes to detract from the deterrence function. We have a criminal code in the country that applies to all, including native Canadians, but I think we must admit that there are some environments across the country where our western Judaeo–Christian based criminal code may not be a perfect fit for the native communities. That issue is a conceptual one which is being addressed in other fora.

The second function is a rehabilitative one. I pray that we are not failed to be convinced, in addressing the rehabilitation function of our justice system for native Canadians, that we do not forget that for most native Canadians—not for all, but for most—they live their lives in a society and environment which is other than main street in any of our urban areas.

Therefore, in order to truly and honestly address rehabilitation in the corrections system, we have to do it from where they live their lives. There is a need in our corrections system to institute mechanisms that will dovetail and correspond to the social order in which they find themselves. It is a social order that has been there long before the white man came to this continent.

Another of the recommendations involves the integration of native Canadians into the corrections system's policing systems.

Lastly, it recommends that we have programs at least in a transition period to raise the sensitivity and awareness level of civil servants and volunteers in the area of corrections. Thus, when they work within the system in policing and corrections, whether it be the incarceration phase, a parole phase, a mandatory supervision phase, a residency phase—all of those aspects of corrections—the particular rehabilitative needs of native offenders are responded to in a way that is very sensitive and calculated to produce a result that will serve both the community that that individual lives in and Canadian society as a whole.

My colleagues on this side of the House are supportive of a prompt but comprehensive response of the government to this report. Because it is not a parliamentary report, it does not have a clock running on it. We would be remiss if we did not call the government to task and demand that the report not gather dust and that it respond in a concrete way to the well articulated needs of aboriginal peoples in our corrections system.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the motion put by my colleague from Victoria regarding the report on the incarceration of native people of our country.

I listened with care to the comments of my colleague. I must say I was somewhat disappointed in them. First, he said that his comments were not meant to be partisan. If that was non–partisan, I would hate to see him in full flight when he gets partisan with his comments.

This motion is now over a year–and–a–half old. While it is not his fault that it has been on the Order Paper so long, he has been a critic for most of that period of time. He said he was waiting to hear from me as to what recommendations and activity had been going on in this area in the intervening months. A simple call to the department could have helped his curiosity during this period. He would have found that the department has been taking this report very seriously.

What concerns me even more is the fact that he has seen other indications that this minister and his predecessor had taken all of these recommendations seriously. Witness, for example, the example he gave of all of the recommendations regarding the incarceration of women. Part of that involves the incarceration of native women.

As he knows, and he will know, special attention will be given to native women in that particular report. That is what he said, and the very fact that he could recognize that should be clear evidence that we do take this report seriously.

• (1720)

The fact is that the report was filed just over 20 months ago. It is one thing to file a report. It is another thing to implement the recommendations, all of which are accepted in principle. The government accepts these recommendations. There then has to be a mechanism for implementing those recommendations. It would be wrong on the part of the government to try to implement them again from Ottawa. I think the hon. member for Victoria would agree to that. What we have to do is implement them in consultation with the people who are most affected by them.

The intervening months have been used, by and large, in consultation with the native community across Canada to make sure that when we do implement these recommendations, it is done in a way that is mindful of the sensitivity of the native community.

In a sense, I suppose I want to compliment the member for bringing this motion forward because it does allow us to put on the record what has been happening in the intervening months. I would like to put on the record the fact that following the completion of the consultations with the provinces, the territories and the national aboriginal organizations, the implementation of the recommendations of the task force was approved in February 1990.

In March 1990 the executive committee of Correctional Service Canada directed the execution of an accelerated implementation plan for the recommendations. I would emphasize the the plan is currently in effect with the objective of implementing the majority of the recommendations within the current fiscal year.

The hon. member opposite happens to be leaving right now just when he finished saying that he wanted on record what was happening. He is already leaving the House.

The 61 recommendations of the task force have been grouped thematically to foster a systematic approach to their application. The categories include recommendations relating to the following areas: institutional programs and operations; the release preparation of aboriginal offenders, post–release programs and support services; personnel matters, including aboriginal cultural awareness training and the recruitment of aboriginal staff; and the monitoring and evaluation of aboriginal programs and services. In addition, a study of the needs of Inuit offenders was commissioned by Correctional Service Canada to supplement the work of the task force. The study, which was completed in April 1989, produced an additional 29 recommendations which are being put into effect as part of the accelerated implementation plan.

The plan has the following objectives: to increase the number of institutional programs which are relevant to the needs and interests of aboriginal offenders; to increase the full parole release rate for aboriginal offenders to equal at least the rate for non–aboriginal inmates, which is what the member who just left wanted to hear about, to make sure that the aboriginal population would be treated the same way as the non–aboriginal population was treated; to increase the percentage of aboriginal offenders who are successfully serving a portion of their sentences on conditional release; to increase the extent of program delivery for aboriginal persons, and/or agencies; and to implement the development of accurate data collection concerning aboriginal offenders and their program involvement.

The strategies for the implementation of the recommendations of the task force vary in the five regions of Correctional Service Canada. This variation is necessary because each region has a different proportion and distribution of aboriginal offenders. As of September 30, 1990, the distribution was as follows: the Atlantic region had only 31 aboriginal offenders; a small population of aboriginal offenders existed in the Quebec region, which had only 34; the Ontario region had 146; the Prairie region had by far the largest population of aboriginal offenders with 844; and the Pacific region had 246 aboriginal offenders. In total, the number of aboriginal offenders under the responsibility of Correctional Service Canada as of September 30, 1990 was 1,301.

Aboriginal inmates comprise about 11 per cent, not 9 per cent as the member suggested before, but rather it is much worse. It is 11 per cent of the total of approximately 13,000 offenders incarcerated in the federal system. Aboriginal peoples who constitute only 2.5 per cent of the population of Canada are therefore significantly over–represented in the population of federally–incarcerated offenders.

In addition, the 194 aboriginal offenders who are serving federal sentences are housed in provincial institutions under the terms of federal-provincial exchange of service agreements. A number of initiatives—and this is what the member wants to hear—toward the provision of equitable decision making and equivalent opportunities for the successful reintegration of aboriginal offenders have been implemented or they have advanced enough to report on. For example, the Atlantic region has established native liaison services in its institutions. Despite the small number of aboriginal inmates in this region the native liaison workers are necessary for the development of culturally sensitive programs and services.

In the Quebec region, the tensions of the past summer between aboriginal people and governments have not slowed down the implementation of initiatives planned in support of the aboriginal and Inuit offenders in that region. For that reason a special program for Inuit offenders is under way at La Macaza Institution. When fully implemented, the program will include academic instruction by a professional person who has experience in teaching Inuit individuals as well as a program of cultural instruction.

There is also significant progress in the Ontario region, and I notice Mr. Speaker, that you want me to hurry along, and in the Prairie region.

The Prairie region has the largest population of incarcerated native persons, with approximately 65 per cent of all federal aboriginal offenders. For that reason, many special initiatives are under way within that region. Let me give some very noteworthy examples, and I will conclude with this, Mr. Speaker: an increase in the number of native liaison workers under contract to a ratio of one worker for every 50 inmates; the solicitation of proposals for the piloting of a new substance abuse treatment program in three institutions; the implementation of three pilot projects for the intensive case preparation of difficult and high-risk cases; the commencement of staffing actions for the placement of community development officers in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan; the production of printed materials in the Inuit language for placement in four institutions; the modification of regional instructions in order to accommodate the unique dietary needs of Inuit offenders; the establishment of a regional council of aboriginal elders in order to obtain elder input into native issues in the region, this in addition to the native advisory committee of the Prairie region; the implementation of a pilot project on cross-cultural staff training that promotes increased understanding of aboriginal approaches to learning, this in addition to the native awareness training which is already established within the region.

I could go on. There is the Pacific region and so forth. I would hope that the member is satisfied that the government has, is and will continue to take this issue seriously, not simply because it is a government responsibility, but because it is right to do and the aboriginal peoples of our country deserve it.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Victoria for bringing forth this motion so long delayed because of the problems of House business. I think it is nevertheless timely that we discuss this issue, given what has been happening across the country in the last several months.

While I appreciate the statement that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General has brought to the House, in every instance he talks about this has commenced or that has commenced. It has been a year since this motion has been tabled in the House and there should be much more progress, I would say, than has been the case in this situation.

Every time we hear the government answer criticisms as to the delay in implementing programs, we hear that the process of consultation has had to be carried out.

• (1730 )

The process of consultation is not that satisfactory either. I am sure that would find some agreement among natives across Canada. This is just another example of the points of contact that native Canadians have had with non-native institutions in this country dating back to time immemorial.

The first institutional contact, of course, was the institution of the reserves and the Indian agent system. When natives were forced on to reserves, they were forced to suffer some of the worst, lowest quality lands that Canada could locate for them.

They were put on to reserves without adequate funding or the adequate availability of housing, health care, infrastructure and education systems. As a result, those kinds of problems resulted in additional problems which native people were forced to experiences: diseases of poverty, things like tuberculosis and dysentery that killed thousands of our native citizens across this country.

They were oppressed while on the reserves. They had to get permits from the Indian agents in order to leave the reserve. If they violated that permit system, often they were enfranchised and kicked out of their communities. That is the first point of institutional contact that native people made with the non-native society.

The second point of institutional contact, of course, was the residential school system. We have all heard the stories recently about what happened to native children in the residential school system. That system was designed as a systematic approach by the Canadian government and the Department of Indian Affairs to tear native children away from their parents and communities, which were seen as cultural influences, influencing them toward the old native culture, and forcing them into the residential school institutions which were run by the missionary religions.

Those institutional schools totally uprooted children from their communities, something that many of us who have not gone through that school system would find extremely difficult to understand, contemplate or sympathize with because without having gone through that kind of experience, it is very difficult to understand.

It is only now that native citizens such as Phil Fontaine who have gone through the experience of the residential school system have begun to tell us about that institutional point of contact with the dominant, non-native society.

In those institutions, native children were terrorized, brutalized, sodomized with the object of destroying their culture, contact with their parents, families and communities, and accepting the culture of the dominant society. That institution was an institution of cultural genocide that achieved its objectives by humiliating and brutalizing those native children.

I do not think any Canadian, having seen that system in operation, could possibly believe that that kind of system could be perpetrated by one Canadian upon another. It is interesting because I am getting to the other institutional points of contact.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I just wonder if it would not be in order to call irrelevance of the remarks of this member to the motion.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if I may speak for a second to the issue of relevance, I think as many native people will tell you today, many of the community and social and individual dysfunctions that have resulted from this particular Canadian institution brought about into Indian communities "for their own good"—to use the term of the Department of Indian Affairs—have resulted in dysfunctions in native communities that result in many natives ending up in another institution, the institution we are talking about now.

I think it is strictly relevant to the discussion that we are having now. If given a few seconds, I will be able to make that relevance clear.

What has happened as a result of the residential school system is that native people have lost their languages, culture, family and community institutions in many cases. That has led to serious individual problems that result in native people coming into contact with the justice system.

For example, when native children came home to their reserves from residential schools, children who had been away for years and years from their parents did not, in many cases, recognize their parents. The understanding of the content of the relationship between parents and their children had been lost. The incest taboo that exists between parents and child had been lost. There are many cases now of domestic sexual abuse and violence that are prevalent on native reserves that many people draw exactly back to this system of the residential school system.

The United Church of Canada has apologized to the native people of Canada for what they have done to the native people through the residential school system. It is regrettable to this day that the Roman Catholic Church has not done that. The Government of Canada, which was the author of the system in the first place, has not seen fit to apologize to native people for what it did to native children, native communities, native parents and to native culture through the residential school system.

Those individuals are still paying the price for that institution today. In fact, all Canadians are paying the price for that system today.

The result has been that when natives themselves revolted against the school system and refused to allow them to continue, back in the 1960s, what happened was that native people took control of their own education. They insisted on taking control of their education system, thereby taking it away from the missionaries who had so abused native children and native communities.

What happened is that natives then came into contact with another institutional system of the dominant society. That was the child welfare system. Indian families had been so disintegrated that it gave the white middle–class social service system an opportunity to apprehend those children. Often they were adopted into foster homes or exported to the United States or Europe where they lost their culture altogether. The final point of contact that many native children and many native young people have with this system is the prison system. For this assistant to the Solicitor General to stand up here and say that things are proceeding normally and that things are progressing as quickly as they possible can is a cop–out.

My colleague from Mackenzie recently told me that of the six women in Kingston prison in the last year, three have committed suicide.

Mr. Brewin: Six native women.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): That is six native women in the Kingston prison. Fifty per cent of them have committed suicide. As a result of the contact that native people have had with our institutions, natives have the highest suicide rate of any ethnic group anywhere in the world. It is 11 times higher than any other ethnic group anywhere in the world. It is directly due to the kind of institutions that Canadians have forced upon native people, including the institution of prisons.

We have to act quickly on this issue. We have to act effectively on this issue. A territorial judge has pointed out that now, more native young men are likely to come into contact with the justice system or to go to jail in the Yukon than are likely to complete school. There are serious problems out there. I do not think that the Solicitor General or his parliamentary secretary have taken this issue seriously enough. I congratulate the member for Victoria on bringing this measure and motion forward to make sure that this Parliament is constantly looking over the shoulder of the Solicitor General, to make sure that this institution does not treat natives like other institutions that we have forced on them in the past.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me that for the record, I should raise a point of order about a comment made by the parliamentary secretary during his remarks.

He is an experienced member and he knows it is not appropriate to draw attention to the fact that a member happens to be absent from his seat at any particular moment. I happened to briefly duck behind the curtains. I could hear every single word the member was speaking. I am probably one of a few people in the country who could even tell him now what it was he said while he was speaking. I would hope that he would render an apology to the House, because he knows he was out of order when he said what he said.

• (1740)

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I made those remarks. I accept the fact that we are not to call members on that, but he had made such a point of wanting to hear exactly what we were proposing and the progress we were making that I was a little surprised he was leaving the Chamber.

Mr. Brewin: I would ask the parliamentary secretary to do a little better than that, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the co–operation of hon. members on both sides of the House. Again I recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today in support of the motion of the member. I am a little surprised at some of the comments I hear when my understanding is that the House is very much in accordance with this motion.

In that spirit we want to proceed to speak in favour of the motion because the government certainly takes these questions very seriously. A major factor in our efforts to improve the delivery of correctional services to aboriginal offenders was the task force on federally sentenced women. This was a joint initiative between the public and volunteer sectors.

The task force was made up of two committees, a steering committee and a working group, which were co-chaired by representatives of the Correctional Service Canada and the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies. As my colleague probably knows, the membership of the task force included federally sentenced women, community, aboriginal women's groups, and a variety of governmental agency representatives as well. The task force released its report in April 1990. As I have said, that has had a major impact on the thinking of this government.

There are approximately 260 federally sentenced women incarcerated in various places in Canada. The total number of women offenders is generally a stable number, as my colleague is aware, representing about 2 per cent of the total federal offender population. Of this group, about 15 per cent are aboriginal women. Specifically, according to the latest statistics available to me, native women in prison number about 46.

Approximately 200 of women at any given time are under the control of the federal government are under the Community Release Supervision Program. About 50 per cent of all federally sentenced women are accommodated at the only federal prison for women, which is a multi-level institution located in Kingston. Most of the remaining women are serving their sentences in provincial institutions due to a federal-provincial exchange of service agreements.

Additionally, since March 1990, 11 women who are serving federal sentences and who have earned the privilege of a minimum security rating have been housed in a new minimum security institution which is also located in Kingston.

Due in part to their small numbers, there are several long-standing and unresolved issues which have placed women at a disadvantage in the federal facility for women at Kingston. Many of the women, for example, are very far from their families, their cultures, and their communities. Like their male counterparts, many aboriginal women offenders come from the prairie provinces. They already face cultural isolation. In addition, when they are removed geographically from their communities they face additional isolation. As well most of the inmates are whites, so there is a cultural separation that creates many problems.

Because it was originally designed as a maximum security institution, the prison for women must accommodate a whole variety of security classification levels. This results in the overclassification of many women. That reduces their opportunities to access other community facilities and programs that are geared and suited to their individual security needs. While the minimum security facility for women helps to address some of these problems, especially, for example, the problem of geographical dislocation, like the prison for women it too is in Kingston. It can only accommodate 11 minimum security women, which means there is a great and crying need.

There is also a lack of programs and services to respond to the unique needs of women. The task force found that physical and sexual abuse is part of the history of many federally sentenced women and that the incidence of such abuse is particularly high among aboriginal women.

In fact, 90 per cent of aboriginal women offenders told the task force members that they had been physically abused during their lifetimes. Usually this abuse had taken place over long periods of time. This compared to 61 per cent of non-aboriginal women. In addition, the number of aboriginal women who talked of being sexually abused was as high as 61 per cent as compared to 50 per cent of non-aboriginal population. Many of these women expressed a desire for individual counselling to deal with these experiences.

There are very few services available in provincial institutions for survivors of physical and/or sexual abuse, a fact which disadvantages many of the federally sentenced women who reside in these facilities through the exchange of service agreements with the provinces, as I mentioned before. Furthermore, aboriginal women really look to having some culturally appropriate programs—they need these—which will help them to recover from their experience with either kind of abuse.

There are other program inequities which result from the placement of federally sentenced women in provincial institutions. These facilities, for example, are not geared to the needs of longer term offenders, people who will be in the population for a longer period of time. They do not offer programs that will contribute to the eventual reintegration of these women into the community. There is very little effective pre-release planning or programming to help these women.

Furthermore, it is somewhat demoralizing for women who are facing long-term incarceration to be housed in provincial institutions with other offenders who are there for only a short period of time. Because of the time differences friendships are broken up just when they are beginning. This creates much greater pressures for the women who are there as federal offenders. The facilities are continually releasing women who are there with shorter sentences, reducing the opportunities for friendship.

In its report the task force presented a number of recommendations including the following. It suggested that we close the prison for women and the establishment of four federally operated regional facilities for women serving federal sentences. Additionally it suggested the creation of an aboriginal healing lodge, which would serve as an incarceration option for aboriginal women who are under sentence.

The aboriginal healing lodge would be designed in consultation with aboriginal people. It will operate from a unique cultural perspective, which would put a high value on spiritual leadership, as well on things that are culturally appropriate in terms of role modelling. The services will be provided by professionals who have had some experience with the native traditions and cultures. In addition, the healing lodge will respond to the concerns expressed by many aboriginal women offenders that they are not dealing with people who understand their culture and have experiences relevant to their particular needs and that they are not comfortable talking with non-aboriginal people about sexual or other kinds of abuse.

The lodge will provide the following to aboriginal offenders: a safe place for women of aboriginal descent; a caring attitude toward self, family and community; a belief in individualized client specific planning so that people are treated like people rather than like numbers; an understanding of the healing role of children who, in aboriginal cultures, are considered to be closer to the spirit world; and pride in surviving difficult backgrounds and personal experiences.

The lodge will also respond to the concerns of aboriginal women around issues of racism. Aboriginal programs should reflect the cultures and spiritual experiences of federally sentenced women who feel that they have suffered from marginalization and from erosion of their culture in mainstream Canadian society.

• (1750)

On September 26, the Solicitor General announced the government's response to the recommendations of the task force on federally sentenced women. Canadians can be very proud that the response included full support for the major recommendations of the task force.

The government has made a commitment to ensure that new regional correctional facilities for women will be constructed within four years. In the meantime, Correctional Service Canada is committed to implementing the short-term recommendations which were also submitted by the task force and which aimed at improving conditions in the prison for women.

The recommendations calling for the elimination of transfers from provincial correctional institutions for women will be implemented. The recommendation calling for the daily presence of an aboriginal elder at the prison for women to minister to the spiritual needs has been partially implemented. The service is also in the process of implementing such measures as funded visits with family and enhanced telephone contacts at no additional cost to the inmate.

This will be of particular value and of great assistance to aboriginal women because, as I pointed out, most of them suffer from serious geographical dislocation from their families, their communities, and their cultures.

Finally, the recommendation which calls for the provision of a national aboriginal liaison worker has been successfully implemented already. This worker facilitates information sharing and assists aboriginal women in maintaining contact with their families, cultures, and communities cross Canada.

Once again, we would like to support the motion of the hon. member opposite and say that we whole-heartedly support all and any measures that can make the aboriginal women more comfortable in federal institutions.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased for this opportunity to comment on the motion and to offer my support to it in principle. I share the desire of the hon. member for Victoria, as do most if not all members on both sides of this House, to implement any changes that are going to make Correction Service Canada more effective and able to improve rehabilitative services to all inmates of both sexes and all races.

The issue raised in this motion is serious. Although it is obvious that I am going to be more supportive of actions that have been taken since the task force recommendations than was the hon. member for Victoria, we are both going to agree that there is still need for more.

I also edited my comments very carefully so that they fit into the allotted time. I notice that the time has been reduced somewhat, so I would like to offer my conclusion and then give my argument because I do not want to leave out the conclusion.

My conclusion is that I feel there has been a significant evolution in aboriginal offences services over the last two decades, but there are still facts that are outstanding and troubling. They include the fact that fewer aboriginal offenders have been granted full parole by the National Parole Board. Second, when aboriginal offenders were granted some form of conditional release, it occurred later in their sentence than in the case of non-native offenders. Third, aboriginal offenders were more likely to have their parole revoked than non-native offenders.

These are serious concerns, but I believe that the federal government, through the intervention of Correctional Service Canada, has, is, and will continue to take every possible step in implementing the recommendations of the task force on aboriginal peoples in federal institutions.

I said that I support the motion in principle. I would suggest that so does the federal government and Correctional Service Canada. The federal government and the CSC have already taken measures to implement the majority of the recommendations within this current fiscal year. I say "the majority of the recommendations" because some of them, those which relate to affirmative action, to personnel recruitment and development, and to the statistical adaptation of psychometric diagnostic tests for use with aboriginal people, as well as some which require other agency participation, will require a phased in implementation that will extend beyond the current fiscal year.

The hon. member for Victoria has spent time, as have I, on the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. Among other things, we have read and reviewed the mission statement Correctional Service Canada. For those who have not heard or read it, I would like to add it to the record of this debate.

Correctional Service Canada, as part of the criminal justice system, contributes to the protection of society by actively encouraging and assisting offenders to become law-abiding citizens, while exercising reasonable, safe, secure and humane control. Through this mission statement, Correctional Service Canada recognizes its responsibility toward all offenders, including aboriginals. Further, it recognizes what it calls core value number 2, that "the offender has the potential to live as a law-abiding citizen".

The mission statement also articulates a specific strategy objective in relation to core value number 2, which is "to ensure that the needs of female and aboriginal offenders are properly addressed".

Many other objectives which are reflected in the CSC strategic plan for the period of 1990-91 to 1992-93 are also of special importance in order to meet the needs of aboriginal offenders. They are all relevant to the question before us, so again I am quoting:

> 1.2 to ensure that policies and procedures affecting offenders are communicated in such a way that they can be understood by offenders and are readily accessible to them;
> 2.3 to provide programs to assist offenders in meeting their individual needs, in order to enhance their potential for reintegration as law-abiding citizens;
> 2.4 to ensure that offenders are productively occupied and have access to a variety of work and educational opportunities to meet their needs for growth and personal development;
> 2.6 to ensure that program needs are considered when making placement and transfer decisions;
> 2.7 to ensure that the risk presented by the offender is taken into account when making decisions, particularly in matters relating to the reduction of security and conditional release;

> 3.8 to provide staff training and development opportunities that are based on the achievement of our Mission, develop the full potential of staff members, and emphasize interpersonal skills, leadership, and respect for the unique differences and needs of all offenders.

Corporate objective number II of the plan is:

> To develop and implement policies and programs to address the specific needs and reduce the potential recidivism of federally sentenced women, native offenders, violent offenders, sex offenders, mentally disordered offenders and inmates serving long sentence.

The innovative projects and enhanced services for aboriginal offenders are aimed directly at these strategic and corporate objectives.

These objectives do not answer all of the recommendations contained in the report of April 1989, but it is important for this House and everyone concerned about the recommendations and their impact on Correctional Service Canada to know that they exist. They are stated objectives of Correctional Service Canada written for this year which illustrate that the recommendations of the committee are being acted upon and that the programs are being influenced.

As I mentioned earlier, the federal government and Correctional Service of Canada have already taken measures through a national accelerated implementation plan to implement the majority of these recommendations within the current fiscal year. The plan has the following five objectives:

> to increase institutional programs that are relevant for Aboriginal offenders, and to assist in their preparation for success on conditional release;
> to increase the release rate on full parole for Aboriginal offenders;
> to increase the percentage of Aboriginal offenders who are successfully serving a portion of their sentence on conditional release; > to increase program delivery by Aboriginal persons and/or agencies; and > to develop accurate data collection concerning Aboriginal offenders and their program involvement.

Prior to being elected to this House my first-hand experience with federal Correctional Service Canada was limited to the medium security institution in Bowden, and of course media reports about others. Since my election and appointment to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, I have had the opportunity to look at corrections in a different and hopefully more complete manner. I still know more about Bowden than the others.

I would like to offer two recent press reports as examples of positive attempts to improve correction programs. First, on October 9, a news story appeared in the Red Deer Advocate, under the heading "Spirits soar at prison powwow". It outlined a Thanksgiving week pow wow that was held in the Bowden institution. It reported not only that the spirits of native inmates had been raised but, quoting from the article, "It gave them a chance to reflect, take in and start to heal". On the institution grounds in Bowden the native inmates have established a tepee and sacred grounds where they have erected a sweat lodge, where they hold sweat lodge ceremonies twice a month. From the Red Deer Advocate, of last Friday, an announcement was reported of a federal grant to the institution for a native awareness day to curb racism and give staff a better understanding of natives and of their culture.

In corrections it is important to address the individual needs of offenders and of specific, identified offender groups in order to optimize their successful reintegration. Because of the disadvantaged position of aboriginal offenders, this concern becomes even more acute in order to respond effectively to their needs and to encourage their return to the community as law-abiding citizens.

• (1800)

The implementation of elder services and native liaison worker services launched aboriginal specific correctional programming and marked a pivotal point in the situation of native offenders. These have now become the—

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am expressing some concern about a response that was given to a question I asked almost at the time that the member for Victoria submitted his motion.

I asked at that time the Minister of Justice, having received the 1989 report of the Human Rights Commissioner of Canada, if she would act on a recommendation proposed by the Human Rights Commissioner for a Royal commission of the stature of the Bilingualism and Biculturalism commission into the issue of the relationship between natives and non-natives in Canada. At that time the minister responded: "It is not up to me to institute a Royal commission. It should be a decision of the Prime Minister and his government".

As Mr. Speaker will recall, in his 1988 report, the Human Rights Commissioner pointed to the situation of native people in Canada. He indicated that the grand promise of equal opportunity that forms the central purpose of Canadian human rights stands in stark contrast with the conditions in which many native people of Canada lived. He pointed out that the treatment of native Canadians is a national shame. He called upon the people of Canada to set up a Royal commission which would inquire into the relationship between Canada and its native citizens, a Royal commission that would have the stature of the Bilingualism and Biculturalism commission that set the language and cultural debate between the two nations of Canada's dominant society.

At the time of his annual report of 1989 the Human Rights Commissioner came back to the House of Commons recognizing that little if anything had happened to correct the situation or improve the situation of native people in Canada. He talked about the conditions under which native people in this country lived. He said to the people of Canada: "Anyone who thinks the game has been won need only to glance at the statistics or have a closer look at the shattering truth that lies behind them. Some of the social indicators may have improved, but the condition of aboriginal life is still a long way from matching the expectations of Canadian society as a whole".

He also said: "Make no mistake about it, these are human rights problems. If there is any single issue on which Canada cannot hold its head high in the international community, any single area in which we can be accused of falling down on our obligations, it is in this area of aboriginal relations". Again he called upon the people of Canada, the Parliament of Canada, and the Government of Canada. He said: "It is for this reason we have suggested that a thorough going inquiry into these problems modelled on the Royal commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism of 25 years ago might play a useful role in achieving consensus without being used as an excuse for delaying important developments".

Again the chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission called on Parliament and called on government to take action to establish a Royal commission into the relations between Canada's native people and its dominant society.

• (1805)

Just a few days ago, on September 21, in an act almost of desperation and frustration coming out of the Oka crisis this summer, again Human Rights Commissioner Max Yalden made public a report to Parliament in which he again called on the Canadian government, saying: "Progress has been too slow and little if anything has been done." He called upon the Canadian government to establish a Royal commission into the relations among Canada's aboriginal people, the government, and the people of Canada. Again nothing was done.

I am concerned that as a result of what is happening with the recommendations of the Royal commission, native people are becoming more and more frustrated and perceive more and more that Canada does not attach any priority to their problems. In fact, they see the Prime Minister playing games with the issue of a Royal commission. At one time, he holds it out as a carrot to the Manitoba chiefs in order to try to get the chiefs to silence Elijah Harper when he is standing up in the legislature and saying no to the Meech Lake Accord. Another time he is holding it as a stick to the natives. When Meech Lake died he said: "You are responsible and, as a result, you are not going to get a Royal commission."

When he talked to the First Nations Congress in British Columbia about the possibility of either having a process to set up land claims negotiations in that province or having a Royal commission, the native people in British Columbia said that they wanted both but that they did not want the selection of one to jeopardize the other.

More recently we have heard Lowell Murray say: "No, this Royal commission will not be struck until the Spicer committee reports on July 1."

It is time to end this process of manipulation. It is time for the government to call a Royal commission. It is evident that the problems out there need the examination of a Royal commission. The aboriginal people want it. The people of Canada want it. When is the government going to follow the people of Canada and do the bidding of the people of Canada?

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the issues raised by the Canadian Human Rights Commission are serious ones of concern to the federal government.

As the hon. member noted, the report recommends a Royal commission, one modelled on the Bilingual and Biculturalism Royal commission of 25 years ago.

The Prime Minister told this House of Commons on September 25, 1990 that the government had been discussing an agenda with native leaders to address issues of concern to Canada's native people. The Prime Minister outlined this government's plans to preserve the special place of first nations in this country, based on the aboriginal and treaty rights recognized in the Constitution.

The agenda will have four main pillars: the land claims, the economic and social conditions on reserves, the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments, and the concerns of aboriginal peoples in contemporary life. Fundamental to the agenda are changes to the Indian Act, with the objective of enlarging the aboriginal capacity for self-government within the framework of the Canadian Constitution.

However, at the present time many of the departments of this government are already at work on the issues that have been identified by the Human Rights Commission. The Ministry of the Solicitor General, the Ministry of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Department of Justice are among those departments that are addressing separately and jointly the question of aboriginal rights, native justice, self-government, and other pressing issues of concern to the people of Canada, aboriginal and non-aboriginal alike.

Since 1977 the Department of Justice has funded the Native Court Worker Program in conjunction with the provinces and territories. The purpose of this program is to assist natives who become involved in the criminal justice system and to enhance the awareness of those involved in the criminal justice system concerning the values, customs, and socio-economic conditions of native people.

In most cases the program is delivered by a native agency which varies from province to province. In British Columbia, for example, the carrier agency is the Native Court Worker and Counselling Association, while in Ontario the Friendship Centres deliver the program.

In June 1990 the Minister of Justice, meeting with her provincial and territorial colleagues, agreed to sponsor a national conference on aboriginal justice jointly. Fifty per cent of those participants will be aboriginal people. The conference will be co-sponsored by the Yukon whose Minister of Justice originally proposed the gathering.

• (1810)

The Marshall inquiry made a number of recommendations concerning the criminal justice system and aboriginal people in Nova Scotia, and since the report was released representatives of our government have been available to work with provincial and Micmac representatives to act upon these recommendations.

I think the hon. member would, and should, agree that the federal government has demonstrated by these and other initiatives that it is deeply committed to addressing the problems faced by aboriginal people in this country today, and we have every intention of continuing to do so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have raised a number of questions regarding the GST and the way it affects lower-income Canadians.

Over the past several months, we have heard the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare state repeatedly that families with incomes of $30,000 or less will, in fact, be better off under the goods and services tax than they are now. This statement is open to challenge on a number of grounds. In fact, the GST will not help middle and lower-income families in any way, shape or form. That is why, of course, 80 per cent or so of Canadians want the tax scrapped and want a fair taxation system in the country.

While arguing the benefits of the GST for lower-income Canadians, the government often refers to the GST tax credit as the measure that takes the burden of the GST off this group. This, of course, is simply not the case. The tax credit is only partially indexed to inflation, first of all, meaning that its real value will decline each year and that the income threshold for receiving the credit will also decline. As the years go by, fewer and fewer families will be eligible for the credit and those who are eligible will receive less money.

If the government was serious about using the GST tax credit to assist the less well off, it would have indexed it fully to inflation. By not doing so, the government is making it clear to lower-income Canadians that they will bear a greater tax burden in the years ahead. Lower-income Canadians will be paying more tax and receiving less in the form of the GST tax credit in the future.

Another problem with the tax credits under the GST is that by earning less, a person does not necessarily receive a higher credit. In other words, those who are less well off will not necessarily be compensated any more. For instance, a single person earning $6,000 is eligible for a tax credit of $190. A single person earning between $14,000 and $24,000 is eligible for a tax credit of $280. Whatever the case, it is clear that this will not compensate those Canadians for the increased costs due to the GST.

Presumably, the rationale for giving those with lower incomes a lower GST credit is that they will, in fact, spend less of their money on GST taxable items. But they will spend a higher proportion of their income on taxable goods and services. The lower a person's income, the larger the proportion they will spend on essential goods and services.

Lower-income earners do not have the luxury of putting some money aside in tax-free savings account such as RRSPs. Canadians living below the poverty line are not going to be savers. In fact, with this government's regressive policies, such as cutbacks to family allowances, cuts to transfer payments to the provinces for health and post-secondary education, cap on CAP for British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, and the privatization and reduction in benefits for the Unemployment Insurance Plan, few ordinary Canadians will be saving at all.

Yet another call for concern about the efficacy of the GST tax credit is that a number of provinces have indicated that they may consider the credit as income and thus reclaim the credit from welfare recipients. In other words, many welfare recipients, the poorest of the poor, will have absolutely no protection from this regressive GST at all.

The Minister of Finance, and others, have indicated in the House and elsewhere that they would strongly encourage the provinces not to take this step of robbing the poor of their GST tax credit. But, the government has not made a firm and absolute commitment to ensuring that this will not occur. It must make such a commitment immediately to stop its ideological cousins and provincial Conservative governments from grabbing this meagre GST tax credit from the poorest of Canadians.

This, Mr. Speaker, is particularly a problem in Alberta and my province of Saskatchewan, which has not yet indicated that it has no intention of taking the GST credit from social assistance recipients, and indeed appears to be considering the matter very strongly.

In addition to this, there are many other claims about the miracle of the GST. The Minister of Finance has told us that many products will actually cost less under the GST. He has given examples such as washing machines, driers, and new automobiles. These items are generally not in the budget of lower income families. Lower-income families, if they can afford a car at all, will buy used cars which are newly taxed under the goods and services tax. It is hard to visualize just how lower-income families will benefit under the goods and services tax.

• (1815)

In addition, the minister's statements assuring us that some items will cost less under the goods and services tax because of the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax are based on the assumption that manufacturers will pass this saving on to the consumer. Yet we have heard on numerous occasions from manufacturers saying that they have no intention of passing on the savings. Instead, we will see many items simply jump 7 per cent in price beginning January 1, 1991, if indeed the tax is implemented.

What about the timing of the implementation of the GST. Canada is presently in a recession and governments across the country are running deficit budgets and, at the same time, trying to reduce the deficits. The way in which they are trying to do this will inevitably lead us down the road to cuts in social assistance, health services, post-secondary education programs and so on. These are the sorts of cuts we have seen from this Conservative government and provincial Conservative governments.

During a recession, a time when low-income Canadians need social safety nets the most, it appears that they will be reduced, both at the federal and provincial level.

The government has acknowledged but under-estimated greatly the inflationary effect of the GST. While this will make it more difficult for all Canadians to make ends meet, once again lower-income Canadians will be the hardest hit. Lower-income Canadians, if employed at all, are most likely to be employed in non-unionized, part-time and temporary jobs. They have no bargaining power with their employer, or with the government, to index their wages or, if they are on social assistance, no bargaining power to indexed or social assistance cheques to inflation. The latest example of this is the partially-indexed GST credit, a small compensation to the poor for the great hardship the GST will bring them. They will fall further and further behind in times of inflation.

In closing, Canadians have asked for tax reform but they have not asked for the GST. The GST is clearly not what they have in mind. When they want a tax reform, they want a fair taxation system where those who can afford to pay more do so. The more affluent, who are now the subject of tax loopholes, should be paying their fair share. The 118,700 profitable corporations which paid no tax last year should also be paying their fair share. The GST is regressive and hurts lower-income Canadians the most. It is not fair that a welfare mother earning $6,000 a year pays the same 7 per cent tax that a corporate executive earning $200,000 a year pays.

In closing, it is time the government listened to the concerns of Canadian families by helping them, instead of punishing them for being less well off. Surely not being able to see their own children eat properly—we all know that one in four children in Saskatchewan goes hungry—is punishment enough. It is time that the government decided to implement a fair tax system and scrap the goods and services tax.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, prior to the assertions of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, this government has had a great interest in fair taxation.

We have worked to eliminate the special treatment that is used to permit those of greater means to pay less tax. Consequently, higher-income Canadians and profitable corporations now pay taxes which are more commensurate with their earnings.

First, we converted personal exemptions and many deductions to tax credits to improve fairness, and reduced or eliminated many special tax breaks. We also eliminated or reduced many special corporate tax breaks, and broadened the tax base so that profitable corporations pay tax.

In the 1989 budget, the government announced a new large corporations tax for Canadian corporate capital in excess of $10 million. Effectively January 1, 1991, the large corporations tax will be raised and that rate will be a 15 per cent increase. This tax will help ensure that big business pays its fair share of tax.

The proposed goods and services tax is designed to further improve the fairness of taxation in Canada. Under the GST, the distribution of the tax burden will be more progressive.

Wealthy Canadians will pay their fair share. They will not be able to avoid the GST. They tend to consume more and, therefore, will pay more on average on the sales tax. With the GST credit, families with incomes of up to $30,000 a year will have more after-tax income than they do now. This includes three-quarters of families headed by seniors or single parent families. In total, some 8.7 million families and individuals will receive credit cheques.

• (1820 )

As well, basic groceries and residential rents will be exempt under the GST, further reducing the tax burden of lower income Canadians.

Before the government introduced refundable sales tax credits in 1986, low income Canadians paid much more federal sales tax as a percentage of their income than the higher income brackets. Since 1986, the federal sales tax credit has been increased three times. With the introduction of the GST, the refundable sales tax credit will be enhanced once more, the monetary value of the credit will be increased and the income eligibility threshold to receive the credit will be raised. As a result, lower income earners will pay much less as a percentage of their income than those in higher income brackets.

The hon. member is also of the opinion that business will fail to pass on to the consumer the savings of the existing sales tax replaced by the GST.

Mr. Dingwall: That's right. That's right. Nose is growing.

Mrs. Browes: Well, albeit there will be a number of forces operating to ensure that savings in the removal of the existing tax are passed on to consumers.

The hon. member might just want to look at pages 7 and 8 which contain a number of businesses in the Consumer and Corporate Affairs operations dated 1990 of the committee report.

Since 1984, the government has taken an active role in making the Canadian tax system more progressive. The GST is just another step toward fair taxation.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise with regard to a question that I posed on November 20 this year to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

On that particular occasion I asked the minister if he would reconsider the decision that he had made to kill the Synfuels project, which affects the people of eastern Nova Scotia.

This particular project had widespread support across the province. In fact, April 18, 1990, was the first time in a long time the Nova Scotia House of Assembly passed an all-party resolution. Even the socialists and the Conservatives supported the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia in supporting the Synfuels project, which in its very essence is where coal and crude oil come together to form a particular product, thereafter being exported to various countries and to various businesses in order to produce energy.

Unfortunately, the Government of Canada has killed this particular project. If there is any further testimony, as codified in the Chronicle Herald of November 16, 1990, it said: "Ottawa kills Synfuels Project".

There are three major advantages of this particular project. I would have hoped that the minister in his wisdom. and particularly the officials of the department, would have seen fit to sit down with the principals of the Synfuels project to debate and discuss with them a plan of action in order to see this particular project realized.

I should note for the edification of members in this House that we in Atlantic Canada, partly because of our geography, and also because of our limited sources of energy at the present time, are dependent to a large extent on the importation of foreign oil, so much so that it has caused provincial governments down through the years, going back to the mid 1950s, and perhaps even before that, to come up with an energy policy which is supportive of the resources which we have in the boundaries within our provinces and to utilize that not only to create jobs, but also to have a stable supply, if you will, of energy for the taxpayers of that province.

With coal being used on the Synfuels project and the technology that is readily available, one could get approximately five barrels of oil per tonne of coal. That is an amazing sum, Mr. Speaker, in view of the large quantities of imported oil that we have in the province of Nova Scotia.

There is a clear advantage for Canadians from coast to coast, but particularly for those of us in Atlantic Canada, namely, that there would be less of a dependence on foreign oil. I do not have to point out to the parliamentary secretary who will be responding to my assertions here today the need for stable supplies of energy across this great country of ours. We just have to look to the Persian Gulf where the stability of oil supplies which feed many parts of the world are certainly in question. Of course, the consequential effect that that has with regard to rising energy prices is a concern for all Canadians.

• (1825)

The environmental advantages of this particular project are well documented and well supported by environmentalists and those of us who are concerned with good public policy for Canadians in that area of our country.

Cape Breton has coal which is low in ash, but it is very high in sulphur. It is a very soft coal and it would be utilized very easily with regard to new coal technologies and the processes that go into place in terms of changing that particular coal into a liquid substance, which is thereafter used in energy and used for domestic purposes. There is a real environmental advantage.

There is a regional development advantage. As I said on November 20, as my colleagues have said on previous occasions, and of course as I have said this repeatedly in the House, the construction phase of this project would result in approximately 500 construction jobs. It would provide direct and indirect jobs of approximately 2,000. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, in terms of an economic bonanza, if you will, in that area of eastern Nova Scotia, it would be very helpful.

I want to point out to the parliamentary secretary that in that area of the province unemployment is exceedingly high. In fact, the figures from the Department of Employment and Immigration base it at approximately 17.3 per cent. For those of us who have the privilege, and I say it is a privilege to live in that area of this country, we know it to be much worse than 17 per cent. In fact, municipal leaders in many parts of my constituency, namely Glace Bay, would indicate that it is much higher than 17 per cent and at 30 and 40 per cent.

Hibernia will cost $5.2 billion of taxpayers money. The Lloydminster project will cost taxpayers $1.2 billion. The OSLO project will cost Canadian taxpayers $4.1 billion. All those compared to the Synfuels Project, with benefits in terms of environment, regional development, jobs indirect and direct, as well as the construction, and of course the benefits in terms of less dependence on foreign oil, which will cost a mere $400 million.

In closing, I am the first to admit that this is indeed a lot of money. Therefore, it underlines the need for the the Government of Canada to sit down with principals of the Synfuels Project and work out a plan which is equitable for the principals and for the Government of Canada, but more importantly beneficial to Canadians who happen to live in the Atlantic region and reside in the eastern part of Nova Scotia.

I invite the very able parliamentary secretary to stand in his place and give us the kind of reassurance that taxpayers in that area of the country so rightly deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond East concerning the Scotia Synfuels project.

The project, in a variety of configurations, has been examined and analysed by federal representatives for nearly ten years. During the initial years of its development, the project enjoyed financial and technical support provided by a consortium, directed by private sector interests with the necessary expertise to carry out the project. Over time, the members of this consortium abandoned the project for technical or financial reasons.

During that time, the federal government invested approximately $2 million, together with the private sector, in testing procedures and project-related technology studies. We wanted to work with the project sponsors to find out whether we could develop viable markets and thus use the human and natural resources of Cape Breton.

Tests indicated that the technology could be used but additional detailed engineering studies were necessary to ensure that the proposed facility would produce the forecast quantity and quality of synthetic fuel. Federal and provincial representatives met with the project leaders on many occasions over the years in order to make the project a success. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, we co-operated very closely and we invested taxpayers' money. Briefly, we did our share to make the project materialize.

During discussions with the sponsor last year, it was frequently pointed out that a project of this size could not proceed without a qualified and dynamic principal partner from the private sector. This essential ingredient could not be found, Mr. Speaker, which means that all the risks would have to be taken by Canadian taxpayers. In addition to the requested investment tax credits totalling $200 million, the project would require hundreds of millions of dollars in additional financial assistance, in the form of interest reductions and credit insurance.

As I pointed out, the project sponsors have had every opportunity to develop the project and meet the appropriate people to make the project a success. At the present time, after years of activity, the project has not yet been finalized. Funds that were supposed to come from the private sector are not there and have not even been identified. Briefly, it is no use having further meetings on the subject, Mr. Speaker, unless there is a significant change with respect to private sector interests.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tommorow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.32 p.m.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

Mr. Ronald. J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, Canada is facing a number of serious social problems such as marital violence, environmental complications, constitutional issues, native claims, new reproduction technologies, illiteracy, poverty, sexual, physical, psychological and emotional abuse, just to name a few. All such matters relate to humanities.

Humanities have been neglected. Since 1980 the budget of the council has increased by a mere 23 per cent while appropriations for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council have gone up by 77 per cent. Humanities researchers account for 55 per cent of university scientists but the government allocates to them only 12 per cent of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Three quarters of students applying for doctorate scholarships are turned down despite the shortage of academics in this field. The Canadian federation is advocating a considerable budget increase, as recommended in the report of the Advisory Council on Science and Technology.

The environmental green plan must acknowledge the determining role of humanities in this field, and a tax credit must be established with a view to encouraging businesses to invest in research in humanities, as is the case in other research endeavours.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, on January 1, 1991 the United States plans to charge an excise tax of $1.07 U.S. a gallon against the products of small Canadian wine and cider makers, while only charging 17 cents a gallon against the beverages of American producers.

Chapter 5 of the free trade agreement clearly states that once goods have been imported into either country, they will not be the object of discrimination.

It is a bitter irony to discover that U.S. lawmakers passed an act of Congress to abrogate the obligations of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, resulting in Canadian small producers, such as Wyder's Cider of Delta, suffering discriminatory excise taxes for an indefinite period.

I commend the work the Minister of International Trade has done already on this issue, but I would urge him to take an even stronger stance against this discriminatory excise tax.

VOLUNTEER FIREFIGHTERS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, no group of Canadians makes a more selfless or more valuable contribution to the safety of our society and our community than our volunteer firefighters.

In a modest way, this contribution and the financial costs associated with it are recognized through a $500 exemption or allowance under the Income Tax Act.

This exemption has not changed for 20 years. The same cannot be said for the value of the dollar. The time is overdue for a change, and in accordance with the request put forward by the Maritime Fire Chiefs Association, I urge the government and the Minister of Finance to increase the volunteer firefighters' exemption to at least $1,000 in the next budget.

PRESIDENT OF THE IRISH REPUBLIC

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian woman of Irish descent, it is with great pride that I salute the election of Mary Robinson, the first woman President of the Irish Republic.

Winning the post with 52 per cent of the vote, the 46 year old lawyer, in her own words, rocked the system instead of the cradle.

At 25, Mary Robinson was Ireland's youngest law professor. At 26, she was the youngest member of her country's Senate.

The mother of three has been a long-time advocate of liberalized divorce laws, access to contraception and the decriminalization of homosexuality.

The fact that the women of Ireland overwhelmingly supported her candidacy is another example of the increasing influence of the gender gap world-wide.

Ireland's presidential mansion is in Dublin's beautiful Phoenix Park. I know that all members of this House join me in agreeing with Mary Robinson's campaign slogan—A woman's place is in the park.

Mr. Speaker: I think members would permit me to observe that my grandmother was Mary Robinson. She also was Irish.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PROPONENTS OF FEDERALISM

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, would you believe it? After Jean Chrétien campaigned across the country and managed to kill the Meech Lake Accord, and now that Canada is in a constitutional dead end and the country is no longer able to renew and regenerate its federalism—all because of Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party—the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party, to provide a counterweight to Quebec's efforts to redefine its future, may be getting together on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission via their respective representatives. That the Progressive Conservative Party's representative is a federalist and defends that position is his right, and I respect that right, but Mr. Speaker, I also would like to see some respect for our history and the events that took place last June. Trudeau—and Chrétien—style federalism and Brian Mulroney's federalism are at opposite ends of the scale—never the twain shall meet!

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, rural Canada is in crisis. Most rural communities are losing their businesses, and their populations are stagnant or in decline.

This is not a crisis made in rural Canada. Past P.C. and Liberal governments have mismanaged our forestry, farming and fisheries.

This government's policies are a direct attack on rural communities. High interest rates, cuts to VIA Rail, the abandonment of railway branch lines, the goods and services tax, cuts to regional development and unemployment insurance changes are just a few examples.

Symbolic of it all, the government is standing by and applauding while Canada Post guts rural communities by closing rural post offices, even in places the size of Yorkton. Government members opposite sit idle while the only federal service that rural communities have is being savaged.

Rural Canadians deserve better. This Saturday, December 1, New Democrats will initiate a rural Canada defence campaign. We plan to stand shoulder to shoulder with rural people from Newfoundland to B.C., fighting with them against the government's attack, and for policies which will support viable rural communities.

LOBSTER FISHERY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, many fishermen in the riding of Malpeque and across Prince Edward Island are angry and confused over the contradictory policies and broken promises of this government.

Last spring the federal government advised Prince Edward Island lobster fishermen that no size increase would be introduced on the Island until the results of an experimental increase in Cape Breton were fully known.

Yet the Department of Fisheries and Oceans increased the lobster minimum size prior to making the results of the Cape Breton experiment public.

Once again, this government is not living up to its commitments to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Once again, this government has failed to properly consult the fishermen of my province prior to making a decision that may have a major affect on their livelihood.

• (1410)

When the minister meets with fishermen on December 7 in Prince Edward Island, I strongly encourage him to visit the wharfs and harbours on the Island. I call on him to commit his government to take into account the concerns and views of our Island fishermen. They have been ignored for long enough.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, a recent study by the economics and agricultural policy research group at Laval University concluded that Quebec's dairy producers might lose 21 per cent of their incomes as a result of GATT. The study refers to the present situation and does not consider the fact that if the talks fail, yogurt and ice cream would no longer be subject to article XI and that other products might be questioned, if we fail to clarify and reinforce this article.

Furthermore, the study did not allow for the fact that incomes of producers will improve as a result of higher prices on international markets. It also makes the assumption that our exports of dairy products will not increase, which is entirely unlikely. The 5 per cent increased access to U.S. and European markets will open up new markets so that we can expect to see a balanced situation in 10 years. It is mainly for these reasons that Canadian dairy producers have supported the government's position at the GATT talks, which, we hope will be successful.

TAX AUDITORS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this morning federal government auditors staged a demonstration at the Canadian Tax Foundation Conference in Montreal. These are the people who are responsible for conducting the tax audits of some of the largest corporate institutions in Canada.

The auditors bring in $2 billion annually in corporate tax, interest and penalties. As professionals they are seldom driven to such visible displays of labour unrest. What they seek is a fair contract with Treasury Board. There is a difference of only 1.5 per cent between what they have requested and what the conciliation board has proposed.

During a similar dispute last year, the government lost $180 million in revenue from tax audits. We cannot afford a loss of this amount of revenue if strike action is forced upon the government auditors. The government should realize that good economic sense and blind stubbornness do not mix.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence of a delegation of over 200 people representing the Coalition against Taxes on Books. More than 250,000 Quebecers have signed the coalition's petition against the GST. I may recall that the government of Quebec has decided to exempt books from the GST. Taxing books means imposing ignorance. Instead of trying to scare workers in Baie-Comeau, the Prime Minister should give them a chance to continue their education, but that may be what he fears above all.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times before this House, eastern Ontario badly needs economic development. Since September, the following lay-offs have taken place in the town of Hawkesbury, in my riding: Amoco Fabrics, 24; Fib Pak, 22; Fiberworld, 80; Canadian Plastic, 23; Astro, 29; IKO, 15; Montebello Metal, 11; Duplate, 20; and LPC Paper, 10, which adds up to 234 lay-offs in a town with a population of 10,000.

Mr. Speaker, on top of that, there have been a number of severe cutbacks in shared-cost programs. I therefore want to ask the government opposite to immediately provide assistance to help the economy of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Eastern Ontario.

HOUSING

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, this week I had the privilege of visiting a construction site in Saint-Jérôme, on behalf of the Hon. Allan Redway, Minister of State (Housing). This is a 63-unit project for single people and the elderly, which is being built under the Non-Profit Housing Program. These units will help meet the needs identified by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Société d'habitation du Québec as part of their joint planning for 1990.

This is a concrete result of the housing policies introduced by our government, realistic and dynamic policies that provide housing where it is needed, for the people who need it.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, less than a week from the final match in the Uruguay Round, which is surely the most ambitious initiative ever taken since the GATT was established in 1948, the Quebec Milk Producers Federation met with us this morning and apprised us of their concerns about the Canadian position regarding the global access level of the domestic production allowed for foreign dairy products. To reassure these producers, Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate the statement the Minister of State for Agriculture made to the effect that the Canadian position is clear and did not change since we made our offer on October 15.

Therefore, the minimal access to importations we would agree to under par. 2*c* of section XI of the GATT would be no more than 5 percent.

[English]

PERSIAN GULF

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary delegation that has been in Baghdad this past week consisting of hon. members for Burnaby—Kingsway, Winnipeg South Centre and Fundy—Royal have received word today that at least five Canadians will be allowed to leave Iraq. Members from the New Democratic Party wish to pay tribute at this time to those Canadians who have suffered and worried about their relatives for several months now.

While there is reason to celebrate their return, this House must also express its support for the families of Canadians who still cannot leave Iraq and Kuwait. The pain felt by the absence of loved ones will be particularly difficult with the real possibility that they will not be home for the holiday season. The lives of these Canadians and those of our military personnel in the Persian Gulf are among the many compelling reasons why the Canadian government must commit itself to seeking a peaceful resolution to the crisis sparked by Iraq's illegal invasion and annexation of Kuwait.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is time once again for the corporate welfare bum of the week award. This week our nominees are: the first nominee, Varity Corporation, which used $200 million of Canadian taxpayers' money for the bail-out of Massey Ferguson and then promptly set up shop in Buffalo, New York; the second nominee, Consolidated Carma Corporation with $11.5 million in profits in 1989 and no taxes paid; finally, MICC Investments with $72.6 million in profits in 1989 plus a tax credit bonus of $29 million from taxpayers and no taxes paid.

The envelope, please. And the winner is Varity Corporation. Special thanks for this award go out to Victor Rice, the chairman of Varity who took the money and ran. After receiving $200 million in tax credits to help save Massey Ferguson, Mr. Rice shuffled off to Buffalo leaving behind 5,000 laid-off workers in his wake.

TAXATION SYSTEM

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval–Centre): Mr. Speaker, a movement called Alliance for Fiscal Justice was founded in Quebec a few years ago. Among its aims are tax justice and fairness for every individual and family in Quebec, bringing together individuals, couples, families and others who have a common desire for better quality of life and ensuring that everyone can exercise the right to chose the marital status he or she wants to live under, without tax or economic discrimination.

In a recent newsletter, the Alliance asked the following question: "Does the taxation system favour married couples?" The tax record of the past few years indicated that the winning answer is divorce, with the common law relationship where both spouses are working close second. The same study showed that the gap widens every year at the federal level between the various marital statuses.

In closing, the Alliance requests that all taxpayers and all families who have the same income and burden be treated fairly, taking into account their true burden, no matter what their marital status is.

Mr. Speaker, I support these goals and commit to helping to achieve them.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Like us, Mr. Speaker, for a good many months the government of Quebec has been urging the federal government to exempt books from the GST. Like ours, their plea fell on deaf ears. Yesterday, realizing that levying a tax on books had been a serious mistake, the government of Quebec revised their position and decided that neither books nor reading materials would be subject to the tax.

Is the Prime Minister now prepared to tell the House that he will follow the example of Quebec, heed the advice of thousands of eastern and western Canadians, and announce that books will indeed be exempted from the GST?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): With respect to taxation, Mr. Speaker, the government has opted for a wider tax base and a lower tax percentage. The government appreciates the fact that, particularly in recent years, the cultural industry sector generally and its publishing arm specifically have experienced hardships. The Prime Minister has stated that he can understand the problems facing publishers, and the government is prepared to analyze the conditions and respond appropriately as the situation evolves.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Appropriate measures are needed now, and the minister knows that full well, as does the Prime Minister, I am sure!

[English]

In Vancouver, the Prime Minister said he was reconsidering taxing books like the Bible and the Koran, for example. The television clip tells the story; the Prime Minister may not agree with the TV. I cannot blame him. We cannot blame him because every day we are more concerned about the growing problems of illiteracy, its impact on our economy, on our international competitiveness, as well as the isolation of those who do not yet know how to read.

The Ministers of Finance and Communications have told—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put her question.

Mrs. Finestone: The ministers have told me that they are looking for alternate ways to finance the book industry, which this minister has just acknowledged, and which also acknowledges that they are gutting the book publishing industry.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is beginning to make a speech. I would ask her to put the question.

Mrs. Finestone: Will the minister withdraw the tax on reading materials now?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Talking about reading materials, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member for Mount Royal read the exact words of the Prime Minister, for she would realize that her interpretation is completely at odds with the Prime Minister's statements.

Second, the hon. member says the government must take action. That is precisely what the government did, is doing, and will do. Indeed the government is quite conscious of Canada's two book markets, the English market and the French market. We know as well that the French market is under pressure because there are fewer people to sustain the industry as a whole. This is why 40 per cent of the $8–million government funded publishing assistance program are earmarked for Canada's French publishing industry, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Whether anglophones or francophones, Canadians who read books need that, not a tax.

[English]

—no tax on reading. Read my lips.

Mr. Speaker, for six years now this government has been systematically tearing down Canada's national institutions and Canada's cultural industries, and now the minister is choking Canada's cultural engine, the Canadian Broadcasting—

Mr. Speaker: It was to be a lead–off question, but it is becoming a speech. I would ask the hon. member, in her preamble, to lay the basis for the question and then put the question.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, CBC radio and television remains the last of the national institutions across this land.

Is this government, through its Minister of Finance, its Prime Minister and the Minister of Communications, going to acknowledge the exemplary role and the importance of communications across this land, and promise no further cuts to our national broadcasters.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to note the suggestion made by the hon. member for Mount Royal.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the environment.

Yesterday, thanks to a leak on the green plan, we heard, first, that the government will reduce the number of new national parks; second, it will dilute the impact of the solemn commitment it made in Geneva only three weeks ago with respect to $CO_2$ emissions; and third, it will cut 80 per cent of funds budgeted for protecting the environment. My question is this: Can the Prime Minister deny this bad news? Let's be frank and ask the real question: Can the Prime Minister give us the assurance that since September, his cabinet did not chop the green plan?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, speaking of editing, my hon. friend would need some revision.

As far as the green plan is concerned, we are not about to comment on leaks, even leaks at the CBC, if that was the case. We will comment once the plan has been tabled and made public. I know my hon. friend would not want us to do otherwise.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this is inconceivable.

Ask this government about Point Aconi and Kemano, and it dies. Ask it about Rafferty and the Oldman Dam, and it fumbles the ball. Ask it about James Bay, and it cannot hold a position for more than one day. Ask the Prime Minister about the green plan, and he does not know what the heck is in it.

The only positive thing that this government has ever done for the environment is to make a compost heap of its environment ministers.

Yesterday, despite all the leaks to the contrary, the minister could not even give us a date as to when the green plan will be released.

My question is: Will the Prime Minister take the environment minister out of his misery? Will he end the farce? Will he table the green plan now? If it gets any thinner, there will not be anything left to release.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I almost hate to respond, because my hon. friend gets so much pleasure from his own lyrical questions that he has prepared.

He enjoys them so much, I almost hate to break the rhythm and interrupt my friend with a few facts.

My hon. friend says that I do not know what is in the green plan. I can tell him this. Everything that he has mentioned is not in the green plan.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in an hour or so, this House will begin debate on the government motion dealing with the Persian Gulf crisis.

I would like to take this opportunity to ask the Prime Minister if he will clarify for the House the government's interpretation of the language in the resolution.

The Prime Minister will be aware that the resolution implies support for the Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions. Does the Prime Minister take this resolution as support for the resolution that will be coming before the United Nations—

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker is in some difficulty here.

We have had a rule for many years that says that in Question Period it is not appropriate to ask a question which anticipates the Orders of the Day. It is a rule which is there and which I must draw to the attention of the House.

Having said that, I am in the hands of the House. If the House wants to pursue this, it can. Perhaps the hon. member could rephrase the question. I know it is the lead question for the New Democratic Party and I do not want to cut him off, but I am bound by the rules as are we all.

• (1430)

Mr. Brewin: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, and it did seem to me a convenient and useful time for the government to make clear its position on this question. If the government wants to take the opportunity, I am giving the government the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the question, but I may have to rule on it.

Mr. Brewin: The question is: Will the government indicate to this House whether or not, assuming the motion today passes, it will tomorrow—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is in very great difficulty. I want hon. members and the public that is watching to understand what the difficulty is. First of all, the question the hon. member puts is a very pertinent question. It is going to be debated later this afternoon. The difficulty is that we have rules that say that we ought not to raise that question at Question Period.

The second question that the hon. member puts forward is equally intriguing, but it is hypothetical. I know the hon. member would want to support the Chair.

Mr. Brewin: I have said what I have to say. The Prime Minister can choose to do what he wishes. Let me now go to the substantive question, to another question, and I will ask the question of the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

The Government of Canada says it sent Canadian troops to the gulf to take part in the economic blockade of Iraq. For the blockade to be a success, it should be given time to work. Mr. Speaker, the motion on which the United Nations will be asked to vote does not seem to consider this fact. Why is the Canadian government in such a hurry? Why not give the blockade enough time to be successful?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government firmly supports all actions by the United Nations, and I hope all members of this House will do likewise.

As for sanctions, we have one of the most effective programs in history as far as the observance of sanctions is concerned by countries outside Iraq. The important question is whether these sanctions are having an impact on Iraq and whether they affect Saddam Hussein's decisions. That is not a foregone conclusion.

An hon. member: Give it more time!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): They say: Give it more time. You always have to judge the circumstances, and as far as we can see at this time, it is unlikely that these sanctions will have an impact on the people making the decisions in Iraq during the months to come.

If the New Democratic Party wants the United Nations to wait for months, that is their problem. We believe it is extremely important for the world, the United Nations and Canada to keep putting pressure on Saddam Hussein in order to make it easier to reach a peaceful solution to this problem, so that Iraq will withdraw peacefully from Kuwait.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the minister said that this coming week he would meet with the Mexican and United States trade representatives to discuss the proposed Mexico–Canada–U.S. trade agreement.

Any trilateral agreement must either reopen the existing bilateral agreement or else be limited to a narrow range of interests common to all three countries.

Will the Prime Minister indicate which alternative the government seeks? Which aspects of North American trade does the government want to see included in a trilateral deal?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made it very clear many times in the House that Canada is seeking to have discussions with the United States and Mexico to see what form the negotiations would take and what form the agreement would take.

I can assure the hon. member that the free trade agreement that was negotiated between the United States and Canada will remain in place. Of course, if we can improve the free trade agreement to Canada's advantage, we would always take a look at that. But it is not anticipated that the free trade agreement negotiated between Canada and the United States would be re-opened.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, you can have the bilateral deal or you can have a narrow trilateral deal, but you certainly cannot have it both ways.

In the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement this government conceded substantial sovereignty over our energy resources. By contrast, the United States has agreed with Mexico that its energy sector is not negotiable.

Does the government intend to negotiate a trilateral agreement in which Canada and Mexico would be equal with regard to energy? Why should Canada cede more sovereignty than Mexico in a trilateral deal?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think that the information that the hon. member has is incorrect. I do not know whether negotiations have started between Mexico and the United States and whether energy is included in that or not.

If the hon. member is reading the same newspaper clippings that I am, he is certainly interpreting them entirely different. I think his question is purely hypothetical and cannot be answered.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. With respect to the GST, the Quebec Furniture Manufacturers' Association has to cope with an unfair method to rebate the sales tax on inventories. Will the minister give consideration to the recommendations of the association which accounts for 80 per cent of Quebec's independent dealers with a view to resolving this matter which may end up by forcing many of them out of business?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have put into rules the basis on which we would provide a rebate in respect of federal sales tax that is to be paid on inventories which are in place on December 31.

Those rules have been discussed at length with industry. They are an average. There are some people who will have a greater rebate than the amount of the federal sales tax in their inventories. Others will get a lesser rebate, but the point is that it is a rebate. It is not a refund. It is important for my hon. friend to understand that people in the same businesses are all in the same position.

If my hon. friend is concerned about this, there are many business people who are uncertain about what the impact of the GST will be on them, simply because the law has not passed through the Senate.

If my friend has concerns about this, he will go down to the Senate and say: "The Liberal Party of Canada does not have an alternative to the GST. We have set up a committee that makes it quite clear that we do not have an alternative to the GST". I might just point out—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could deal with it on the supplemental.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question, very simple though it was. The association made a number of recommendations and its members are very interested and very concerned. Am I to infer from the minister's response that many of them will experience major problems during the recession because he cannot solve the GST problem, which happens to be very simple and which he could easily address? Will the minister respond at least in part to these recommendations.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the hon. member in my first answer, as I did the question raised by his colleague one or two weeks ago. The hon. member must understand that the GST is very important if this industry is to remain competitive with American imports, for they have an advantage over Canadian manufacturers. This is why the GST is so important, for it will put Canadian manufacturers in a better position to fight their competitors.

I should like to point out that former Liberal Party finance critic Raymond Garneau said, and I quote, "—the GST is the most equitable and least harmful—".

TAXATION

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the 1988 taxation statistics released yesterday show that the number of Canadians making more than a quarter million dollars a year who paid no income tax rose by 40 per cent over the previous year; 140 quarter-millionaires avoided all income tax. The number of Canadians who made more than $50,000 a year and who paid no income tax rose by a staggering 87 per cent, almost doubling. That is 5,430 tax holidayers.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. At a time when he was forcing ordinary Canadians to pay more and more and more, how could the Minister of Finance possibly put in place a taxation regime that allows wealthy Canadians to pay less and less and less?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I it is quite clear that phase one of the income tax reforms has resulted in a fair tax system.

Those Canadians who are earning $15,000 or less are going to see their share of income tax revenues drop from 2.1 per cent to 0.8 per cent. Those in the $15,000 to $30,000 range will see them drop from 26.5 per cent to 23.1 per cent. Those who are over $50,000 will see the amount increase from 34.1 per cent to 40.4 per cent. The tax system has become more progressive and more fair.

In terms of the upper income people whom my hon. friend has talked about, we have addressed that problem. It represented 2.17 per cent of tax filers in 1984. It is now down to .35 per cent. Those are people who have all endured a specific loss.

The clear point here is that when we say something about tax reform it happens. It happened in the phase one of tax reform. It will happen with the GST.

Those families who are earning less than $30,000 will be better off with the GST than is the case now under the existing sales tax.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I greatly fear the finance minister intends to keep his word, because those more than 3 million Canadians who earned $15,000 a year or less actually saw their average tax bill go up by an average $71, while those earning over a quarter million dollars saw their average tax bill decline by $20,597.

Will the minister not agree, then, that his government's tax reform is nothing more than tax cuts for the rich and tax hikes for the poor and ordinary Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the very clear fact is that those people who earn over $50,000, representing 7 per cent of the tax filers in this country, pay up to 40.4 per cent of the tax compared to 34.1 per cent. That clearly shows that the tax system is more progressive. It is fair.

We said in phase one of tax reform that there will be 850,000 low income Canadians who would not pay tax after tax reform where they paid tax before. In fact there are 905,000. We said there would be 250,000 seniors who were paying tax in 1987, who would not pay tax after tax reform. That figure is 290,000.

We have made tax reform work and we are going to make it work again.

HEALTH

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Two years ago, the government made a commitment to help senior independence by setting aside money for research into Alzheimer's disease and osteoporosis. Recently, the minister confirmed that he is cutting 20 per cent from the program. Alzheimer's may not be a concern for the minister, but it is a concern for millions of Canadians.

Will the minister do the right thing and restore the proper funding?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the hon. member that the government has committed substantial amounts of money for research into diseases of the elderly and for medical research in general.

We continue to set a high priority upon that and we will do so throughout the life of this government.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, cutting funds for research into prevention now will mean more funds will be required for cure of diseases in the future.

Many health researchers and workers responded to the government's initiative announced two years ago and planned their careers in accordance to the previously announced government priorities. Now, without any warning, after plans were made by the research community, the minister has cut funding by 20 per cent.

Will the minister admit his responsibilities to the seniors of the country and their families, and to the workers and research investigators, and restore funding to the levels previously committed to help reduce the occurrence of Alzheimer's disease among the seniors of tomorrow?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government continues to put a high priority upon diseases related to seniors.

If the hon. member were to look at the record of spending by the government on medical research during the life of this government, he would see that substantial commitments have been made and that substantial increases have taken place in research funding for health care in Canada.

Hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways. They recognize the fact that there is a national debt in Ottawa of over $13,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The hon. members complain about that, but every effort that is made to attempt to bring that debt under some control they oppose. They have to be honest with Canadians. It is time to choose whether or not they are prepared to support restraint, or whether they believe that we should continue to spend in all areas without constraint.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CFB CHATHAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

The minister has just announced today, I am told, that the Low-Level Air Defence School at CFB Chatham will be moved to Alberta. This is another way of announcing the closure of CFB Chatham.

Can the minister tell the House how he is going to replace 1,000 jobs and the $20 million annual input that CFB Chatham represents to the economy of the riding of Miramichi?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I realize the hon. member understands the importance of the base because he was a member of the government in 1983 which first started the procedure to close CFB Chatham.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKnight: I would inform the hon. member that the replacement activity that the Department of National Defence has identified is that of—

Ms. Copps Oh.

Mr. McKnight: I am sorry, the member's colleague is interrupting and I will wait.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Miramichi has the floor.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my supplementary to the Prime Minister.

During the 1984 election campaign, the Prime Minister promised to the people of Chatham that he would never hurt his home town and that there would be aircraft flying in Chatham as long as there was air.

Will the Prime Minister now rescind this minister's decision and fulfil the promise he made to the people of Chatham?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1450)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the comments attributed to me by my hon. friend are absolutely false.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: The statement that I did make was that, if a Conservative government were elected in 1984, we would put in train a process which would reverse the policy of the Liberal government, of which my hon. friend was a member, which meant the end of CFB Chatham. We said that we would not let the Liberals close Chatham. We would keep it open and we have been doing that ever since.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology claims that the GST is good for Canada as a whole and for Quebec as well. But the Quebec government seems to have repudiated the minister, since they removed the GST on books in Quebec.

My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Will the good Quebecer he claims to be personally put pressure on his colleagues to protect the interests of the people of Quebec and have the GST on books removed in Quebec, as the province of Quebec has already done? Does he prefer to impose ignorance by maintaining the tax on books in Quebec? What do the minister and his colleagues intend to do?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this question was answered in part, but I should like to add that the government, recognizing the existence of a francophone market separate from the anglophone market, already announced a seed money program for the cultural industries of Canada, in addition to a program 40 per cent oriented at francophone books. For the first two years, the program will be oriented toward the publishing industry and at least 30 per cent of the yearly budget, or $9 million, dollars, will be devoted to francophone books in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology who seems to have lost his tongue. His department has pointed out that the most important element in Canada's future economic growth is knowledge and technology.

In that circumstance, does he not agree that the introduction of the GST on books is plain asinine?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government does recognize the importance of books as an element of our cultural policy. That is why it supports the Canadian publishing industry with many programs.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance in regard to his so-called tax reform policy. In light of the fact that in the past he has made many statements in which he claims to be making our tax system more equitable, the truth of the matter is that 640 Canadians earning over $100,000 last year paid no taxes at all.

How can the minister make this claim on the one hand, while on the other hand allow his rich friends to avoid paying any taxes at the expense of hard-working, lower and middle-income Canadians?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we came to office there were 1,830 high-income Canadians who were not paying tax because of the loopholes that in place as a result of the policies of the Liberal government, that he was a part of, that he supported at that time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is now down to 640. In terms of the number of tax filers, it was 2.17 per cent of tax filers in 1984. It is down to 0.35 now.

There are good reasons why these people are not paying tax. They have suffered losses. They may be farmers. They may be—

Ms. Copps: Oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend from Hamilton is moaning over there. I do not think she understands how the tax system works.

There are individuals who own farms. There are individuals who own unincorporated businesses who lose money. It is for that reason that we have a provision that one can apply one's losses against other income and for that reason not pay tax.

We have removed a number of the other loopholes and incentives that were in place that were being misused by upper income Canadians. That is why there has been a substantial reduction from 2.14 to 0.35 per cent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, that is crocodile tears from Bay Street. This is typical of what we have come to expect from the government.

The facts are clear. The government is afraid to bring real tax reform, because it does not wish to offend the financial supporters of the party.

Will the minister explain why he continues to allow those in the highest tax brackets to pay no taxes, while he is crippling the middle and low income Canadians? Close the loopholes, and close them today, Michael.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): It's better than a crock from Scarborough, that is all I can say.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member is talking about low-income Canadians. The share of income tax dropped for people who are earning less than $15,000 from 2.1 per cent down to 0.8 per cent; for those between $15,000 and $30,000, from 26.5 per cent to 23.1 per cent; and from 37.3 per cent to 35.7 per cent for those people who are earning between $30,000 and $50,000.

The major thrust in making the tax system fair in 1987 was to reduce the share of income taxes paid by those low income people, as I have indicated here, and raise significantly, from 34.1 per cent to 40.4 per cent, the share of income of those people who are earning over $50,000.

I understand the people opposite do not like to hear the truth.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Early in 1989, four young children from my riding died instantly as a result of two front-end collisions. In both cases, the children were riding in the back, secured with lap belts.

For a number of years, the Régie de l'assurance automobile du Québec, as well as many individuals, including a former colleague Mrs. Thérèse Killens, have been urging Transport Canada, which is responsible for establishing motor vehicle safety standards, to make it mandatory for all cars and vans sold in Canada to have three-point seat belts installed on the back seat. Could the Minister indicate whether he will follow up on this request?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest my colleague is showing in this matter. The appropriate regulations will be published in The Canada Gazette before the end of January.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right honourable Prime Minister. The Quebec government, his greatest supporter in his effort to impose the GST, has yielded to the arguments of the book industry and abolished its tax on books. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Will he assume his responsibility and immediately order his Minister of Finance to announce officially that books will be also excluded from the federal GST?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government prefers to bring ad hoc solutions to the specific problems of the francophone book industry. I have already explained that 40 per cent of my department's assistance program is alloted to the francophone industry. Also, under the new program implemented by the Federal Development Bank, 30 per cent of the amounts allocated by the bank will go to assist the francophone book industry. Finally, the government is seriously considering the possibility of implementing two years earlier its postal subsidy replacement program, 50 per cent of which will assist the francophone publishing industry in Canada which we know is facing a very difficult situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford, for a very short supplementary.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Everyone in the book industry agrees that the minister's announcement is a lot of baloney. Is the Prime Minister ready to meet today with the cultural patriarch of Quebec, Mr. Gélinas, now more than 80 years old, who came to Ottawa to make representations for the book industry? Will the Prime Minister set aside five minutes to meet with the personality of the year in Quebec's book industry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the Minister of Communications asked me if I could take a few minutes before going to chair the National Council for Science and Technology and speak with Mr. Gélinas. I told to the minister I would pleased to meet him at three o'clock sharp. Is he here?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, in that case, we can do so right now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I will be pleased to meet him in a few moments.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, last Friday when Treasury Board's supplementary estimates were tabled, they showed that the veterans affairs budget was reduced by $3.26 million.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs stated that some budget-cutting measures will inevitably reduce veterans affairs' ability to respond to unforeseen problems and to deal as quickly as usual with new applications.

I ask the acting minister why is the government making it tougher for these people to receive their benefits?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because I think there is good news for Canadian veterans.

First of all, in terms of areas which will not be affected, the Minister of Veterans Affairs has indicated budgets for veterans benefits, for pensions, for war veterans allowances, for veterans and dependants program and so on will not be affected.

In addition to that, the hon. member will be aware that in the supplementary estimates there was an increase of some $60 million for veterans dependants. No doubt he will applaud that increase. We believe that the veterans affairs department can make these cuts from overhead. It will not result in a cut in terms of services or benefits for veterans.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING DEBATE ON BILL C-40

Mr. Speaker: I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege in regard to comments made yesterday in debate by the member for Souris—Moose Mountain.

While responding to a point I made about those of us who came to Canada by choice, the member said: "They destroyed it".

Along with all immigrants to this country, I am deeply offended by comments such as this. Nearly all of us who live in Canada are descended from people who trace their roots back to other countries and to say that the more recent arrivals have destroyed it is a gross manipulation of the truth. I found it doubly appalling that the member who made these remarks is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister.

I therefore call upon the member to immediately offer his apology for such insensitive remarks to the House and to all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that if you check the "blues" the debate was on the CBC. The debate became one of national unity and my reference to "they destroyed it" was a reference—if you will read on in Hansard—to the Liberal Party, to Clyde Wells, and those who did not support unity, including his leader. There was absolutely no reference whatever to immigrants.

My grandfather was also an immigrant to this country and the reference was to the Liberal Party. However, if there was anything inferred that was taken out of context I apologize for it. That is his problem. The question is clear if you read the "blues".

I again and again said: "Ask Mr. Clyde Wells about unity". It seemed somewhat hypocritical to me that they defended unity after defeating Meech Lake and—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Sit down.

Mr. Tobin: Come on, Mr. Speaker, I'm not going to stand for this.

Mr. Speaker: I have another question of privilege. I will certainly come to the hon. member in a moment.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege resulting from the non-answer to my question by the Prime Minister. If the record is checked I think you will find that the Prime Minister said: "Every word he said is a lie". And again he said that I was "a bloody liar"—

An hon. member: He said "hypocrite".

Mr. Dionne:—"A bloody hypocrite", I am sorry. Mr. Speaker, I will leave that in your hands until the Prime Minister is back in the House so that he can answer that charge. But I want to say more about it at that time, Sir.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond. The Prime Minister had to leave for a meeting of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, which he chairs.

I want to say to the hon. member that what the Prime Minister did say in his comments was that in 1983, when the Liberal government was planning to close CFB Chatham he promised that, if elected in 1984, we would keep CFB Chatham in operation. In fact, that is what happened. Any suggestion by the hon. member otherwise is simply not in keeping with the truth, as the Prime Minister saw it.

We will examine the "blues", in terms of other comments made and respond to the hon. member.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on the question of privilege raised by my colleague. I sit directly across from the Prime Minister in the House. The Prime Minister, quite clearly, was heard by many members sitting on this side of the House. I ask the Speaker to take the word of members. The hon. member from Hamilton brought it to your attention during Question Period, Mr. Speaker, quite loudly.

I heard every word the Prime Minister said. He said the member was a hypocrite. He then went on to say, and I am sure the clerk will record it, "Every damn word is a lie". Those are the Prime Minister's words, Mr. Speaker.

That kind of language by the Prime Minister and the example set by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister in attacking a premier outside of this House, does not lead to constructive debate in this House, it sets a poor tone. The example is coming from the Prime Minister; it is coming from his parliamentary secretary; it is not constructive; it is destroying the institution; they ought to apologize, without editorial comment.

COMMENTS DURING DEBATE ON BILL C-40

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege. I was in the House yesterday during the debate that caused the question of privilege by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt.

I was here during the debate. I remember what the hon. member for Souris—Moose Mountain indicated about other persons who were not here, Mr. Clyde Wells and my leader, Jean Chrétien. He clearly interrupted my colleague in the middle of the debate that dealt with the contribution made by those who were not born here in this country. It was very clear to me and, I think, to other members that he was referring to that particular element that was being introduced into the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the very strong feelings of the hon. member but we have heard the hon. member on a question, as he put it, of personal privilege. I have listened to it and the House has listened to it. I have also heard from the parliamentary secretary and the parliamentary secretary has said that whatever he did or did not do, if offence was taken, he apologizes for it and that closes it off. After that—

Ms. Copps: What about "bloody hypocrite"?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member feels the matter is not closed, I would like time to look at exactly what the parliamentary secretary said. If I feel that it was not an appropriate withdrawal, then I will come back to the House. But we are not going to reargue it now.

On the other question, I have listened very carefully to what has been said. I will look very carefully at Hansard and I would hope that the matter would resolve itself at the earliest opportunity but if it does not, then I will of course take steps to do something about it.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made clear that, as you mentioned in your remarks, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister had made a withdrawal. I would like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you can take this under advisement.

• (1510)

He also did say that he did not refer in any way to ethnic origin or immigrants, but he referred to the actions of the liberal government in killing unity in this country in the CBC. I think that should really be pointed out very clearly.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca has—

Mr. Arseneault: It's in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: —on a point of order really risen to reargue the position the parliamentary secretary made. I heard the parliamentary secretary. I will look very carefully at his remarks. If necessary, I will come back to the House.

On the other matter, as I have said, I hope it resolves itself. If it does not, then of course I shall have to do whatever it is that is appropriate.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, having heard the Prime Minister state quite categorically that my colleague, the member for Miramichi was a bloody hypocrite, I hope I understand from the Speaker that the resolution will be the Prime Minister coming into the House to withdraw those remarks. Is that what he takes to be a resolution?

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes Speakers make suggestions which, of course, are heard by everyone. Under certain circumstances they often are acted upon. I do not think I need to go any further.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT

Mr. Speaker: I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised on Thursday, October 18 by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan regarding events which transpired in connection with a planned meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport of the same day. The hon. member explained that a meeting of the transport committee had been duly convened with seven days notice pursuant to Standing Order 106(3) for the morning of October 18. He went on to state that the meeting did not take place because quorum could not be met. To put it in ordinary terms, there were not enough members there to proceed with the meeting.

The hon. member further argued that the absence of government members was perhaps a collective decision which in essence created a boycott of the committee and as such was an infringement upon the rights of other members of the committee. The hon. chief government Whip stated on the other hand that various government members of the committee had important previous commitments and it was felt that the subject matter was too important to leave in the hands of alternate or substitute members.

[Translation]

I have carefully considered the comments made by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and the Chief government Whip, and also the excellent arguments for and against which were made on that day by other members. It is difficult for the Speaker to decide on the specific issues raised by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

[English]

According to the conventions and traditions of this place, the Chair ought not to intervene in the proceedings of a committee unless the matter has been placed before the House by means of a report from the committee. While there obviously could be no report in these circumstances since the meeting never took place, the attendance or non-attendance of hon. members at committee meetings is clearly in the Chair's view not a matter upon which the Chair can or should take a position. However, it is a matter obviously of concern to the House and it becomes a matter of concern for the Speaker because when there are problems within the committee system, eventually and inevitably they are raised in this Chamber and before the Speaker.

As I have said on other occasions, it has to be a very severe situation indeed for the Speaker to consider intervening.

Further details of this situation have, however, been brought to the attention of the Chair by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan in a subsequent intervention on Tuesday, October 30, 1990. At that point, the hon. member asked the Chair to rule on whether the fact that the chief government Whip had not convened a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport for the purposes of electing a chairman constitutes an act which impedes members of the House in the performance of their duties on committees, in connection, specifically, with the review of Order in Council appointments is provided for in Standing Orders 110 and 111.

[Translation]

In his comments, the chief government Whip said that that House need only vote on the Striking Committee report pertaining to the membership of standing committees in order to deal with the situation of the transport committee.

[English]

The Chair has looked very closely at this matter. Clearly there is no chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport to convene a meeting for any purpose. Under these circumstances and pursuant to past practice, the next meeting of the committee can be convened by the Clerk of the House if the report of the Striking Committee providing for new committee memberships is adopted, or by the chief government Whip in consultation with the Whips of the other parties.

The Chair can see that there is cause for concern here, that it is difficult to find a breach of the privileges of hon. members in the fact that a standing committee is paralyzed and cannot meet. The solution would appear to lie in negotiations among the parties, which the Chair would encourage at this time.

I have to say to hon. members and to the public that the working of committees is very important to the working of the House of Commons. I do ask hon. colleagues to make every effort possible to come to whatever agreements and understandings among themselves which are necessary to make these committees work.

I do not want to state this too often, and I hope that I will not have to, but there is a general feeling across the country that somehow or other not only politicians, but maybe institutions, are letting down the country. This is why it is essential that everybody make an extra effort to try to make this system work.

I am not happy with this situation, obviously. But, I am also bound by rules here and if I am to intervene in committees, it has to be in a very severe and outrageous situation indeed. While this is not only inconvenient but perhaps very aggravating, I do not feel that I can depart from the laws which bind me as they bind all other members of the House of Commons.

I thank hon. members for their intervention.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as a member of that transport committee, I want to thank the Speaker for his decision today.

On a point of clarification, I wonder if the Speaker could clarify something for me. Am I to understand that the Chair is restricted to make decisions on issues only involving breaches of privilege out of the confines of this place?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West rises on a point of clarification. I have made it clear in the past that I do not take the position, nor do I think a Speaker should take the position, that a Speaker is forever bound never to intervene in a committee matter. But, it will have to be a matter of very gross disorder indeed, a very grave situation.

This is a matter which can still be settled by consultation. The jurisprudence on this kind of a question goes back not just decades, but for a long, long time indeed, and not just to jurisprudence in this House but in other Houses where we have the parliamentary system. I am very reluctant to move into the committees if it can be possibly avoided.

What I want the hon. member and other hon. members to understand very clearly, I am not saying that there might not be an occasion in which the Speaker would have to move. One can say well, it has not been done before. Speakers have made decisions in the past that had not been done before, and they form part of the precedents of our law of procedure.

What I am asking hon. members in this case to do is please take into account everybody's responsibility to this institution and to our country, and try to resolve it. I think it can be resolved by discussion, and that is the way I would hope it would be resolved.

What I am saying to the hon. member, in summary, is I might have to intervene at some point.

• (1520)

It would have to be under a most grave situation, and I am reluctant to move into the committee field and do what really the members of the committee ought to do for themselves.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, signed by several dozen Canadians, calling on the government to remove the goods and services tax as it applies to the printed word on such things as magazines, books, newspapers and other printed matter.

The petitioners point out that the dissemination of the printed word is the cornerstone of our democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society. This literate and productive society would be negatively affected by the application of the GST.

I would hope, now that the Prime Minister has indicated some concern about the imposition of this tax, the government would withdraw it as it applies to all matters, especially to books, newspapers, magazines and other printed word.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by 49 Canadians.

These Canadians note that since Confederation, a zero rate of tax has been applied on magazines, books and newspapers. Now with the goods and services tax, there will be a tax on this. In fact, the petitioners consider it a tax on reading.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first one deals with the clean-up of the Seine River. A large number of my constituents call upon the three levels of government to sort out the various responsibilities for the clean-up of rivers, and more specifically in this instance the Seine River, a once beautiful and non-polluted river. Of course, this is applicable to other Canadian rivers as well.

The petitioners really want governments to sort out what it is that they have to do, stop talking and start acting.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My second petition deals with the concern of a number of my constituents, and other Canadians as well, with the goods and services tax on reading materials. They note that there has never been a tax on reading and learning materials. They are concerned that while the government talks about competitiveness, participation and democracy, it will be imposing a tax on those very tools that permit us to do just that.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too am honoured to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of 50 Canadians who are concerned about the imposition of the GST tax on books and other printed word. It has been the cornerstone of our country, of our democratic society, that the printed word be disseminated as widely as possible and without tax.

I humbly submit this petition asking Parliament to reaffirm the principles of democracy and allow no tax on the printed word.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise to present a petition in this House concerning the goods and services tax. The many Canadians who have signed this petition are from the city of Toronto. They are opposed to the tax, and in particular insofar as that tax is applied to the printed word.

Like many other members of this House, I plead with the government to change its obstinate approach to this bill, agree to changes that will make the bill more sensible and reasonable for Canadians, although I find the whole idea of the goods and services tax unreasonable, as I am sure these petitioners do, and call upon the government, as they do, to reconsider the goods and services tax and for the Senate of course to reject this bill.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, as we have been doing for months and months, I come before you with hundreds of petitions once again from the general population from east to west and from the north, who are extremely concerned about the tax on reading. They consider this tax to be a tax imposing ignorance on our population with a terrible mortgage on our future. We should do everything possible to encourage reading, and not to tax reading. The petitioners call upon this government to reconsider the goods and services tax on books, magazines and literature and to stop being so stubborn, change its mind and move to remove the tax.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure to introduce similar petitions to those that have been introduced already. These come mainly from Toronto. They are opposed to the GST as it is related to the printed word. It is highly hypocritical of this government not to accede to this particular request and see that the GST is not applicable to the printed word.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a couple of different petitions this afternoon. The first one is from people who take objection to the GST being applied to magazines, books and newspapers, going totally against Canadian precedent. I think it is important that people realize that there are a lot of people in this country who do not have easy access to libraries where they can inform themselves and that the purchase of printed material is important to them. I ask on their behalf that the government consider dropping the application of the GST to the printed word.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): As well, Mr. Speaker, I have petitions from people in my riding who take exception to the government's budget proposals for veterans. I think that in this perilous time in which we live in this world, where we are sending our Armed Forces to serve in the Middle East, that we assure the Canadian public that we treat our veterans with the greatest respect for the service that they have given.

The petitioners on this petition humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject those budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

• (1530)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of many constituents from the city of Toronto.

They have noted a very timely action by the Government of Quebec on the decision not to impose a sales tax on printed matter and other learning material. They call upon the government to consider that action as a precedent, to act on it, and to follow up on it.

A GST or any kind of tax on the printed word and learning material that profligates the essence of democracy is truly unproductive, as is, for example—and they have noted it—the language of the Minister of National Revenue when referring to those who act against the GST.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions on behalf of Canadians who object to the GST in general but take particular exception to the tax on reading embodied in that particular tax.

They note that since Confederation the government has always avoided charging a tax on books, magazines and newspapers, up until the proposed GST. They feel that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is the cornerstone of our democracy.

They petition Parliament to reaffirm these historical principles and to withdraw the tax on reading embodied in the GST.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table a petition signed by a number of Canadian men and women. Your petitioners object to applying the Goods and Services Tax to books, newspapers and magazines, and they feel that this tax is extremely regressive. Your petitioners, and there are quite a few of them, maintain that free distribution of printed matter is one of the cornerstones of our democracy, our culture and our education. They also claim that an educated and productive society can only be undermined by a provision that would put a tax on books, textbooks and anything that can be used as such.

Today we want to congratulate the province of Quebec which has decided not to tax books, and we hope the federal government will do likewise.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the number of citizens objecting to the tax to be imposed on magazines, books and newspapers is increasing at an exponential rate day by day.

In addition to what my colleagues have already done, I have the honour to submit a substantial list signed by citizens from metro Toronto.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to submit petitions from Kitchener and from several sections of Toronto in opposition to the tax on books.

The petitioners oppose the increase in illiteracy and in the costs of persons who want to read, want to become educated, and want to become more productive members of society.

They are asking Parliament to restore the historical exemption of reading from taxes.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in presenting a petition against the GST.

I was approached a few days ago by representatives of the Canadian Student Federation. In view of the fact that these students are directly involved with the printed word, as this is how they get their education, they are adamantly opposed to the GST.

Once again, we put before the government to reconsider this ill-conceived and, I hope, ill-fated tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers P-28, in the name of the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, is acceptable to the government, and the document is tabled immediately.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a feasibility study on establishing a new race relations network, prepared by Mr. Ralph Agard of Toronto for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship).

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion No. P-31 that I have been after the parliamentary secretary to answer for some time, asks about the cost of the deployment of Canadian forces personnel to Oka.

This morning I received from the Minister of National Defence a press release that indicated a total cost of $83 million, so obviously the minister has this information. He must have had it in order to cook up this press release. In the circumstances—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: If the government House leader would look at the Notice of Motion on the Order Paper, it asks for details. Surely these details are now available if the Minister of National Defence has a total.

I wonder if the government House leader would agree immediately to this motion. He could table the documents tomorrow or Friday.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as usual I bend over backward for this member. I do everything I possibly can to accomplish all the various requests he makes of this government. If he noticed earlier today, I tabled responses to 95 petitions. I am not sure, but I suspect 89 of them were his.

I can tell him, we are looking at his particular Motion No. P-31. My information is that he should have an answer not soon but very soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INVASION OF KUWAIT

UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today we are on the eve of another important Security Council vote. I think it is right for Parliament to consider the implications of the crisis that prompts this vote. It is the intention of the government through this crisis to consult as much as possible with the people of Canada and with Parliament, just as we have been consulting extensively with our allies. I intend, in the course of my remarks, to report briefly upon some of the conversations that I have had over the last 16 days with countries involved directly as Canada is in the gulf.

We tried, in this extraordinary crisis, to offer candour to the House and to expect from the House and to ask from the House understanding of the larger international implications of the grave issues that face us. We are trying to approach this issue step by step. It is in that context that I want to take this opportunity to set out the thinking of the government on the decision that is before us in the Security Council tomorrow and my view of the context in which that decision will be taken. I expect there will be other debates in this House as the situation evolves.

This vote, Sir, comes near the end of Canada's two-year term on the Security Council. It is our fifth such term, a record for non-permanent members of that council.

That is an appropriate record because, I dare say, no other country has been as loyal a supporter of the ideals of this world organization in whose founding Canada participated actively and creatively.

When we look for a noble and far-sighted vision for managing world affairs in what will be a difficult decade and century to come, we can hardly do better than to draw on the vision of the United Nations charter.

The great sadness of our times has been that the charter was a dead letter for 40 years, because of the paralysis of the cold war.

The cold war is over. I was in Moscow the week before last, and I found an extraordinarily different country from the austere monolith I had visited five short years ago. Sadly, their problems in the Soviet Union are enormous but they have a country and they have a leadership and they have a people with great reserves of strength. Nations like Canada will and must help them where we can.

• (1540)

The tremors of the Gorbachev reforms have allowed profound change through eastern and central Europe that not only helped end the cold war, but set the stage for the CSCE summit in Paris last week. In some respects, that summit marked the formal end of the Second World War.

I would like to communicate, in passing, one of the remarkable moments of that CSCE conference. Vaclev Havel, prisoner, playwright, president, sitting at his desk in that debate, said to others around the room and around the world that this summit was the pre-eminent moment in his life because it brought to pass so much of what he had struggled for through all of those years. That was the context in which we met to bring in effect a formal end to the Second World War.

The Paris summit should have been an unqualified celebration of the new possibilities before us, of our shared determination to build a new European common home, to be secure from Vladivostok to Vienna to Vancouver, as Eduard Shevardnadze has said. It should have been a celebration of the growing willingness to use the United Nations in the way it had been intended, to bring peace and to bring greater security to this world.

But the celebration in Paris was muted, because we all understand that a terrible breach of faith and a breach of law and a breach of order has happened: an act of war by Iraq which imposes on the world community the burden of a great challenge. If new and more hopeful vistas for world peace are at last to open, we as the United Nations have to be equal to the challenge which Iraq's invasion of Kuwait represents clearly to all of us.

This challenge goes to the heart of Canadian interests and Canadian diplomacy, not just now but for 50 years: the building of a workable world organization able to prevent or able, if necessary, to reverse the most blatant and dangerous of international offences, which is the acquisition by force of another country's territory and, in this specific case, an effort to extinguish a UN member in its entirety.

The challenge has gone even beyond these transgressions of international law, as Iraqi authorities have threatened the use of terrorism and of chemical weapons which they have used in the past, with terrible consequences, even against their own people.

That is the evil that countries historically arm themselves against. That is the evil that causes proliferation, which is responsible for an arms race which in large part diverts the resources that should be going to the poor of the world and denies people in developing countries the right to live decent lives.

That this evil has occurred in the most heavily armed and the most volatile region in the world only amplifies its gravity.

I have just come from the Middle East. The potential for death and for destruction in the Middle East is very real. Members of this House of Commons should have no illusion about the danger, nor about our obligation to try to moderate that danger. Most of Israel's neighbours remain in a state of war against her. The Palestinian people, despite the intifada, despite their acceptance of resolution 242, live in a pressure cooker of frustration with thousands of new migrants forced home from the gulf. There are the larger questions of democracy and decision-making in the Middle East. There are quarrels between families and regimes who each want to leave the Arab world. There are shocking gaps in income between opulent wealth and the most terrible poverty. There are chemical weapons, biological weapons, almost certainly some capacity for nuclear weapons, and there is the steady flood of conventional arms.

In the midst of all that, in a region where the institutions of modern government have shallow roots, there is generally the common link of the noble religion of Islam which, if it became radicalized, could have devastating consequences around the world. President Gorbachev—the Prime Minister and I know from our conversations with him—is aware of those consequences. King Hussein is aware of them. Presidents Ozal and Mubarak are and, of course, Prime Minister Shamir understands the threat of Islamic extremism.

That the Iraqi aggression affects security of access to the most vital of commodities further compels our attention. But make no mistake about the importance of the principle we intend to defend, the principle of international order where international law is respected, and the United Nations is used and the United Nations works.

Canadians, historically, have been at the cutting edge of the practical measures which have won respect for the United Nations. We helped draft the charter. Professor John Humphrey of McGill was a principal author of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Lester Pearson guided the ideal of peacekeeping, against Canadian critics who said it was an inappropriate use of the United Nations, and 83,000 Canadians wore and wear today the blue beret, with pride and with effect, to build peace and to maintain peace.

Now we are at a new step in the evolution of the United Nations, a time in which at last the members of the Security Council are working together on resolutions which involve enough compromise on all sides to allow this diverse world to act together to keep its house in order. And yet, at the same time as being prepared to compromise to come together, the Security Council of the United Nations has taken actions which are clear in their intent and respected in their application. It is hard to think of a time when the United Nations worked better and we, Canada, want to keep it working because that is the only way to advance peace and prevent war.

Since the beginning of the crisis the United Nations has shown that blatant disrespect for international law can be met with a response that is firm in its resolve and unbending in its respect for international order.

For Canada, some of the basic precepts in which our foreign policy is deeply rooted are being challenged by the gulf crisis and they just may be vindicated by its resolution and its aftermath. The rule of law and the establishment of a stable international environment have been key objectives of ours since the end of the Second World War.

[Translation]

Since the beginning of the crisis, the government of Canada has kept the same objectives in constant view: to make clear the unacceptability of Iraqi behaviour and Canada's determination to play its part in the collective response; to reinforce the rule of law in international affairs and support a renewed United Nations in its first post-cold war response to a gross violation of its charter by a member state; and, of course, to protect Canadian lives and Canadian interests put in jeopardy by the invasion and annexation of Kuwait. Following from those objectives, we have been trying for three months, in co-operation with the other countries joined in a united stand against Iraq, to ensure that the UN-imposed sanctions are made as effective as possible; that the international consensus is sustained; that the humanitarian and economic problems created by the crisis and the sanctions are adressed quickly and sympathetically, both as an intrinsically important goal and one supportive in sustaining the international consensus; that the international community explore peaceful means to end the dispute, while enforcing the UN resolutions.

• (1550)

Well, Sir, where are we today? Iraq is still occupying Kuwait, in spite of universal condemnation and the near universal application of sanctions.

We, of course, hope that sanctions will help to persuade Saddam Hussein to withdraw. We continue to believe that they help make clear our resolve, but we also now recognize that sanctions in and of themselves are not sufficient to force a withdrawal, if the Iraqi government places a higher priority on holding onto its territorial gains than on the resumption of normal life for its citizenry. We simply have to face that fact.

The government in Baghdad, as the House knows, has been using innocent civilians of third countries, including Canada, in its efforts to wrest concessions from the international community and to try to win propaganda points with its own supporters. It has proceeded at the same time with a ruthless program to annihilate all traces of Kuwait's separate existence. In short, Iraq has repeatedly ignored the demands of the international community in successive Security Council resolutions passed since August 2. It has failed to comply with the obligations incumbent upon it on the basis of international law, on the basis of the principles of civilized behaviour, and on the basis of its own membership in the United Nations.

I have, as I said, Mr. Speaker, in the last several days been in the Middle East. That trip followed intensive talks that both the Prime Minister and I had with the leaders of the Soviet Union, the European Community, and the United States. In the Middle East, I spent many hours in discussions with Iraq's neighbours, including the President of Turkey, the King of Jordan, the Prime Minister of Israel, and with the ministers of foreign affairs of those countries. I also met at length with Several weeks ago, I met with other foreign ministers from the gulf area, from Saudi Arabia and Qatar. I set out for all these interlocutors the view of this government regarding the unacceptability of Iraq's invasion.

It is important for the House to know that every head of state, every head of government, and every minister with whom we have met shared that view, that the occupation of Kuwait is unacceptable.

The view in Canada, in the region, and throughout the world is the same. Iraq is isolated. Iraq has behaved abominably. It has invaded a small neighbour, and it has done its utmost to ensure that its restoration would be impossible. It has taken thousands of hostages, including Canadians.

This destruction of a small country is, in the words of President Mubarak, "unbelievable". That was the word President Mubarak conveyed to me when he told me of specific and categoric assurances that had been given to him personally by Iraq's president only days before Iraq unleashed its military arsenal against Kuwait.

From the beginning of this crisis, we have all hoped that peaceful means would produce the necessary Iraqi compliance with Security Council resolutions. Indeed, Canada has been working strenuously since the beginning of August to seek just such a peaceful solution. We have done so in the United Nations, we have done so in the region, and we have done so in close consultation with all the members of the Security Council.

Officials of my department have been travelling around the world regularly, particularly to Security Council members—including the people who rarely vote with Canada—to try to encourage a unanimity and a consensus that will allow the United Nations to be effective in these circumstances.

I am sure that I speak for all Canadians in hoping that a peaceful solution may still be possible. Time, however, is running out.

Tomorrow at the United Nations in New York, Canada will, as a member of the Security Council, participate in the formal consideration of a new resolution that has been under discussion for some days now. This new resolution will almost certainly authorize the use of whatever means are necessary to remove Iraq from Kuwait and to restore to Kuwait its own destiny.

For Canada and for others, what is at stake is the integrity of our international order and the credibility of international law and of our multilateral institutions.

We must recognize, however, as I have seen over the last few days, that the neighbours of Iraq have another interest in ensuring that Iraq's deed is undone. Mr. Speaker, we in Canada, far from the scene of the battle, far from the immediate site of those terrible tensions, must realize that there will be no safety and there will be no stability if Saddam Hussein gets away with his annexation of Kuwait.

All countries would prefer a peaceful solution, not a deal which rewards the aggressor, but full and swift compliance with the resolutions of the Security Council. Regrettably, many believe that a peaceful solution is not attainable, whatever their preference.

The leader of Iraq does not seem to grasp the dimensions of the problem he has created. Consequently, he does not seem to understand the strength of the resolve to see justice done. He thinks the world is bluffing. The purpose of the United Nations resolution, which Canada and other members of the Security Council will consider tomorrow, is to ensure that Iraq understands that this is not a bluff.

Tomorrow's resolution will demand full compliance with previous council resolutions. If Iraq does not fully implement those resolutions, the text will authorize member states co-operating with the government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to see they are implemented and to restore international peace and security in the area. Does this mean that force will be used? That is up to Iraq.

That resolution will probably be approved tomorrow, November 29. In normal cases, that would mean the capacity to act, with whatever means, would exist tomorrow, November 29. Now there is a serious and constructive proposal that the resolution build in a pause between the day in November when the authority is vested, and some specific later date on which it might be used. That proposal reflects the call for a pause which Canada and other countries proposed after discussions during the United Nations General Assembly. A deadline which implied an ultimatum could be counterproductive and artificial, and that is not what is proposed. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, what is contemplated is, instead, a pause of goodwill to allow Saddam Hussein one more opportunity to reflect on his options. Naturally, that time must be used by all nations to seek a basis for the peaceful acceptance of Security Council resolutions. But, in particular, it gives Iraq an opportunity to seek a peaceful end to the war it began when it invaded Kuwait.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I should say, that that proposal for a pause indicates one of the very real fruits and benefits of the new atmosphere within the Security Council, when countries that had not previously worked together were prepared to work together in these circumstances to ensure that there was a basis on which the world could act together.

We certainly hope that Iraq will take this opportunity. If Iraq does so, will the international community in any case insist on the elimination of its leadership or its entire military capacity? No, there is a willingness in the region to live with Iraq, warily to be sure, but on a basis of international law and internationally guaranteed frontiers.

• (1600 )

Does Iraq have legitimate concerns which should be discussed? Perhaps there are some. That is up to the Government of Kuwait to negotiate or for Iraq to pursue in the many international fora which adjudicate exactly such disputes. The possibility of such a negotiating power is contained in Security Council Resolution 660, the very first passed by the Council in responding to this invasion. We urge Saddam Hussein to pursue this option.

Would military action in the gulf be an exercise of only western will? Absolutely not. The coalition includes such partners as Pakistan, Morocco, Czechoslovakia, Argentina, as well of course as Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states and dozens of others.

An Arab force could see to the future defence of Kuwait with international peacekeeping components as necessary or as desirable. Canada would certainly consider seriously a request to participate in the cause of peace.

Will there be further attempts to resolve existing tensions in the gulf and Middle East regions? Yes. During my discussions in the Middle East the Arab–Israeli dispute was also raised, specifically the Palestinian question. I believe that one of the consequences of the current gulf crisis could be a new sense or urgency about solving other problems facing that troubled region. We have of late witnessed a pattern of successes within the Security Council in addressing regional issues, not just in the Middle East, but also in Cambodia and elsewhere. If that pattern continues, if we do not lose it here, if we can maintain the strength of the United Nations which we have so carefully built over the last years and particularly the last months, if that pattern continues, then a just, lasting and comprehensive solution to the Arab–Israeli dispute, which Canada views as necessary and urgent, may at last be possible. This is a matter than can only be addressed, however, separately from the current crisis.

Iraq's offence is sui generis and its undoing, according to the highest principles of international law and the highest interests of international security, is essential. But resolution of all territorial disputes in the region on a just and equitable basis is urgently required, if peace and security are to apply in a durable way in a region which may be the most volatile in our world.

We will also have to turn our collective attention to the need for arms control measures which deal with weapons of mass destruction that threaten the whole region. Sustaining the new unity of the international community is the only hope, the best hope, that these problems can be resolved with speed.

There may be the elements of a peaceful resolution of this crisis. I was more encouraged than I thought I might be by the conversations I had in the Middle East. I was encouraged by the determination of people ranging from Israeli leaders, to King Hussein, to the Palestinians to look for ways in which this experience may lead to constructive responses to other issues. So we hope that there will be means found to resolve this crisis.

Otherwise, force will have been authorized by the world community, and on behalf of the international institutions Canada has spent five decades to design and to defend.

To abandon those institutions now, to abandon the unanimity and the consensus that has been found in the United Nations now, would be to abandon all hope for the rule of law in world affairs. The world agrees with that. The question is: "Will Iraq agree with that?"

The resolution we will be voting on tomorrow in New York is the desirable option that I have sought and that many here have sought, the UN authority to use force if Iraq rejects the option of a peaceful withdrawal. The House will remember, and no one in our country should forget, that the use of force began on August 2 when Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait. It is now up to Saddam Hussein to determine whether the international community will have to use the authority of the United Nations to achieve our collective goals through further force.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Liberals welcome this opportunity to discuss some of the historic issues touched on by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This past August 2, the Iraqi army, acting on orders from President Saddam Hussein, invaded and occupied Kuwait, a sovereign member of the United Nations.

Since that date, we have witnessed dramatic and unprecedented events. Today there is fear that we are moving ever closer to war in the Persian Gulf with thousands of lives at risk, some of them Canadian lives.

Liberals are strongly supportive of the broad international consensus that has condemned the Iraqi aggression and which has called for the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait.

Let there be no mistake, Liberals strongly and unequivocally condemn the action Iraq has taken against Kuwait, and support calls for the immediate withdrawal of Iraqi troops from this sovereign nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the United Nations, Iraq is expected to abide by the UN Charter. It is expected to abide by the established rules of international law. However, it did not. We are convinced that all Canadians who are concerned about fairness and justice believe, as does the Liberal Party, that this flagrant violation of the UN Charter and international law is intolerable and must cease.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we believe that Saddam Hussein must understand that his aggression and expansionism do not and cannot pay dividends. As a member of the United Nations, and as a nation committed to peace, Canada must not let Iraq succeed in its unlawful occupation of Kuwait. The United Nations is of the same view.

As we know, on August 2, 1990, in an emergency session, the United Nations Security Council passed resolution 660, condemning Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and calling for its immediate withdrawal. On August 6, the council voted unanimously to impose sanctions amounting to an economic blockade of Iraq. On August 25, the council authorized military action to enforce these sanctions.

[Translation]

However, on August 10, two weeks before the United Nations gave its authorization for military action, the Prime Minister gave a press conference to announce he was deploying substantial numbers of Canadian troops in the Persian Gulf. Unlike his British, French and U.S. counterparts, however, our Prime Minister did not consult this Parliament to discuss the matter and reach a decision.

[English]

Instead, Canadians saw this government side-step immediate parliamentary debate on this matter by sneaking through a loophole in the National Defence Act.

The position of my party has been clear throughout this crisis. From the beginning we have insisted that the government should commit forces to the Persian Gulf only under the auspices of the United Nations, and only after consultation with Parliament including full parliamentary debate.

• (1610)

In September, the Liberals as a parliamentary party, strongly endorsed the actions taken to that date by the United Nations Security Council.

Soon after the House was recalled in that same month, the government did place a resolution before it concerning the Persian Gulf crisis. That draft resolution originally was merely an effort by the government to pat itself on the back and try to get carte blanche to pursue whatever course it saw fit. It was only through the efforts of the opposition critic for external affairs and others in our party that the government finally agreed to modify its motion, agreeing to an expanded role for parliamentary debate and for greater recognition of the role of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution, modified through efforts by Liberals, unequivocally condemned Saddam Hussein for invading Kuwait. Canadians were shocked and dismayed when the NDP voted against it.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the efforts of our critic for external affairs who has travelled to Iraq with members of other parties to seek the release on humanitarian grounds of Canadian hostages being held there and in Kuwait, and we are pleased to learn today that a number of these Canadian hostages are going to be released.

An hon. member: No thanks to Joe.

[Translation]

M. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we have consistently condemned the unlawful invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We in the Official Opposition believe that the Conservative government failed to put the necessary emphasis on the role that can be played by the United Nations in resolving this crisis. We also feel that the government abdicated its duty to inform Canadians, fully and on a regular basis, on developments in the Persian Gulf, and to involve them, through their elected representatives, in this country's decisions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the failure of the government to keep Canadians informed is not only wrong, it is a departure from the precedent established here by my party when in government. More than 40 years ago, following the attack by North Korean troops on South Korea, Lester B. Pearson, then the Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported every day to the House of Commons. There was extensive discussion of that crisis in the House which was then sitting.

Mr. Speaker, in the summer of 1950 the House of Commons was prorogued, that is, the session was formally ended. And on the eve of that prorogation, Mr. Pearson pledged that if necessary the House would be recalled to deal with the crisis. On August 19, 1950, the House was recalled for an emergency debate and members of Parliament were given a full opportunity to discuss the Korean conflict and Canada's role in it.

An hon. member: What a difference, the right Prime Minister.

[Translation]

M. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the crisis was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Both Chambers were asked to adopt legislation which subsequently provided the basis for Canada's participation in the Korean War under the aegis of the UN.

[English]

I want to emphasize that both Houses of Parliament were recalled to participate in a debate on the Korean crisis and to actually vote on legislation authorizing the participation of Canadian Armed Forces in that crisis, all in a comprehensive manner. This stands in sharp contrast to the approach taken by this Conservative government in the current Persian Gulf crisis, starting back last summer when the government refused to recall this House to discuss the crisis before it sent troops to the Persian Gulf, a departure from the precedent created by Liberals during the crisis of the Korean War.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, more than 40 years later, the Liberals stand for the same approach, full consultation, open debate in and decision by Parliament and involvement with and through the United nations.

This government has a duty to consult and seek the approval of the House of Commons during such crises. When Canadian lives are at stake, the Canadian people deserve nothing less. Yet, what do we see from this government? As I said, the Prime Minister authorized the sending of Canadian men and women to the Persian Gulf, into a battle zone, more than two weeks before the United Nations authorized the use of force.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has also now taken to sabre-rattling. Just last month, he made a virtual declaration of war while speaking at the University of Western Ontario. "We should not rule out the possibility", the minister told his audience, "that young Canadian soldiers, men and women, will not return to this country for celebration but will stay there for burial". Later, before a parliamentary committee, the minister said that Canadian Armed Forces could be involved in offensive action against Iraq even without United Nations authorization. So much for the commitment of this minister and his government to the principle of operating under the basis and umbrella of the United Nations. In his speech he used all sorts of nice words about support for the United Nations, but he spoke quite differently before a parliamentary committee not long ago.

Through the statements and actions of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it is clear that this government is embarking on a path that could lead to war. It does not appear to be sufficiently interested in determining first whether the United Nations approved sanctions have been working. It does not appear to be sufficiently interested in finding a constructive and a peaceful solution. It seems to be primarily interested in furthering a risky agenda for a military solution that will be anything but quick and anything but painless.

Mr. Speaker, on Monday my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland, asked the government to provide the House with the fullest possible documentation on the effectiveness of the United Nations sanctions. On Tuesday, I asked the Prime Minister whether the government shared the view of international experts, including a former American Defense Secretary, James Schlesinger, who in testimony before a committee of the United States Senate, said that sanctions are working and need more time to take full effect. In both cases, the government has not yet bothered to provide the full information we requested on the effectiveness of the sanctions.

In his speech, the minister said: "We now recognize that sanctions in and of themselves are not sufficient to force withdrawal of Iraq". I ask the minister, where is the evidence of this? How and when did the government reach that conclusion? The government did not answer these questions in any way, shape or form in the minister's speech. Maybe the government is reluctant to let us in on the facts about sanctions because there is evidence that the sanctions are working. Since the Second World War, no country has been disciplined so strongly and so completely in this way for its international aggression. With what have been described as near airtight sanctions, it is difficult to imagine how Iraq could consider itself in any way better off for having invaded Kuwait. In fact, the opposite increasingly appears to be the case.

It has been reported that 90 per cent of Iraq's food imports have been stopped and rice, flour and cooking oil are being rationed. Forty per cent of Iraq's industrial capacity has been shut down and Saddam Hussein has been forced to close non-essential factories to conserve lubricants, spare parts and electricity. Sanctions are estimated to be costing Baghdad more than $1.5 billion American per month in lost oil revenues and international authorities have succeeded in freezing virtually all Iraqi and Kuwaiti overseas bank accounts.

• (1620)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the lesson for Iraq is that the price of its act of aggression will be serious and ongoing damage to its economy, its isolation on the international scene and a weakened geostrategic position in the long term. This is a lesson given not by the use of military force but by the most imposing international coalition since the Allies in the Second World War, a new coalition acting on the resolutions of the UN Security Council.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this new coalition may well reflect a new international order that is rising out of the ashes of the cold war. At no time in the past 40 years has the United Nations been able to forge this kind of consensus. There is a real need for such a coalition, a new kind of coalition involving countries of the east and west, the north and south, a coalition that would have as its goal the effective maintenance of international peace and security.

The prevention of war was among the founding goals of the United Nations. The preamble of the United Nations Charter of 1945 begins: "We, the peoples of the United Nations determine to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as our leader, the hon. Jean Chrétien, said in a speech a few months ago, we can do far more to upgrade the tools available to the international community to resolve disputes before they degenerate into armed conflict or, if appropriate, to make it possible for parties to reach an agreement without outside intervention. The task was a difficult one during the cold war, but now that east-west tensions have relaxed, there is hope that we can consolidate the institutional framework for international co-operation.

Mr. Chrétien went on to say that we must give the UN some muscle. Canada was the first country to get involved in peacekeeping operations. Our soldiers have taken part in a number of operations and they will continue to do so. It is in our higher interest to use our influence to enhance the capabilities of the United Nations, expand its peacekeeping mandate and make it a forum where all nations will be able to resolve their disputes in an atmosphere of trust.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in response to the current crisis and in keeping with the founding principles of the United Nations, the Security Council has imposed near airtight sanctions against Iraq. UN member countries are enforcing those sanctions with the help of a broad-based multinational military force.

At this time, we are not convinced that sanctions have failed. On the contrary, as I have said, experts are pointing to increasing evidence of their success.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals believe that instead of rushing into a military offensive, we should maintain and reinforce sanctions to make Saddam Hussein understand that aggression does not pay.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, starting a war is all too easy. Anyone who knows anything about the Middle East knows that finishing a war in that region is going to be exceedingly difficult. The consequences of war will be enormous. We must, therefore, think always of the human cost of waging war.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, with thousands of lives at stake, we must move heaven and earth to find a peaceful solution. Only when we are convinced that all peaceful means of getting Saddam Hussein's troops out of Kuwait have been exhausted, should the United Nations consider further military action.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in its resolution today the Conservative government is asking Canadians to give it a blank cheque. It is asking for support of a vague motion before this House that may translate into support for any and all future UN resolutions, the exact contents and purposes of which no one can foresee.

In the view of Liberals, the draft Security Council resolution is premature. It is also vague. It authorizes any country individually, on its own, to do anything that country considers right; to use any means it considers necessary to achieve the goals of resolution 660 in this matter anywhere in the region, without any consideration of UN command or accountability.

I say, Mr. Speaker, the comments from the backbenches by the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicates he knows he has a weak case, otherwise he would be sitting and listening, as I did to his speech, even though I had plenty to say about its gaps and weaknesses while he was speaking. His comments show that he knows he and his government are on the wrong track.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, asking this Parliament to endorse the current draft Security Council resolution we believe is asking far too much at this time.

We will not, through supporting this government motion before the House today, give the government a blank cheque for any and all further action regarding the Persian Gulf. I do not think that this is what Canadians expect this House to do.

While I do not rule out the possibility that the United Nations may eventually have to make a decision on the use of force, Liberals do not believe that this point has yet been reached. We believe that the United Nations sanctions must first be given sufficient time to work. Liberals insist that before Canadians are called upon to participate in any offensive action, such participation must first be brought before Parliament and voted on here in the way it was done at the time of the Korean conflict.

The approach I have outlined is consistent with the support of Liberals for the evolving role of the United Nations in the development of a new post-cold war international order for the maintaining of international peace and security. It is consistent with our rejection of the aggression of Saddam Hussein. Above all, it is consistent with the role and responsibilities of this House of Commons.

Therefore, by way of conclusion, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "its" and by substituting the following:

"current efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions adopted as of 28 November 1990, and that this support shall not be interpreted as approval of the use of Canadian Forces for offensive action without further consultation with and approval by this House."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has had an opportunity to look at the motion and will agree to the motion.

• (1630)

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you are aware, under the rules of the House, now that there has been an amendment placed, the only procedure subsequent speakers could use to have anything else put on the floor would be to present a subamendment. We have had discussions with the parties and the other groupings in the House of Commons and believe that our proposed wording may not meet the criteria for a subamendment.

However, with consent of the House and because of the importance of this issue, we are asking that the motion which would be put in the name of the member for Victoria be treated as a further amendment and therefore be allowed.

It is a very important issue. I do not think this is the type of issue that we would like to see anybody in the House playing procedural games on. We are asking unanimous consent to do this and to make sure that the House has a very clearly worded motion on such an important issue.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can understand the difficulties the New Democratic Party is in.

Of course the rules would not allow another amendment to be put to the main motion. They would have to put an amendment to our amendment which has just been tabled by my leader. That would be called a subamendment.

The motion that is before us right now, as amended, would have to be exceptionally further amended by the NDP if it so wishes. It would be unusual for a motion to have two amendments, but we would, in the interest of fair play and in the interest of getting the message across from the NDP, allow it maybe to put it as an amendment; but by exceptional circumstances only do we accept it. There are no precedents being set here.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate as well that we have no problem with this procedure. The fact that we would allow the NDP to put an amendment, by consent, certainly is acceptable to this side of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier, but I heard him mention the words fair play. Since that is not a rule customarily observed in this House, I do not see why we should give our consent. I suggest that the principle of fair play could be applied to the decisions of the Board of Internal Economy. Consequently, we will not give our consent.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, of course I have to express our disappointment that we are not able to present our particular amendment to the motion before us. I hope that in my remarks I will be able to make our position eminently clear. The motion before the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to advise hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 43 the first two speakers had unlimited time, with no questions or comments. We are now entering a period of 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Brewin: The motion before us calls on the House to support "the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions".

The amendment of the Liberal Party would have the effect of clarifying the meaning of "subsequent resolutions". It would make very clear that this House only supports those resolutions which have been adopted to date. It does not imply support for the resolution that is going to be coming up before the Security Council tomorrow or any other future resolutions. Our party will support the Liberal amendment.

If we had had the opportunity and if something could have been worked out, we would however have gone further than the Liberal amendment. We would have asked the House for a further amendment, to make it absolutely clear, as follows:

> That this House opposes the use of force against Iraq until sanctions and other UN measures have had time to succeed and urges the government to seek amendments to the currently proposed Security Council resolution to that effect.

I had hoped—and I am sure most members of the House had hoped it—that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have in fact made it absolutely clear that the government had a narrow interpretation of the motion before the House. He failed to do that. He simply said with regard to the motion that he expected there might be further debates on the question of Canadian participation. He made no commitment to further debates before Canadians are committed to war in the gulf.

He further cast his remarks entirely in support of the proposition that Canada should vote for the motion before the Security Council tomorrow, thus making it clear that the government sees this motion as not only endorsing resolutions of the UN Security Council adopted to date but very clearly implying support for future resolutions including the resolution tomorrow. We are going to proceed on that basis. If the amendment the Liberals have proposed is lost, this party will stand in this House and oppose the resolution and the motion presented by the government.

This is a very difficult issue, not only for this House and for Canada, but for the world. I would like to say at the outset that this House is not divided on support for the United Nations, support for the United Nations system, or support for the proposition that the Security Council is the appropriate forum for the world to be dealing with this crisis.

Our party has from the beginning been the firmest of supporters for the United Nations, and we do not step back from that for one minute. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government, however, cannot translate support for the resolution that comes before the United Nations tomorrow into support for the system itself. The very fact that Canada is a member of the Security Council leaves it open.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What nonsense. It is like your position on the GATT.

Mr. Brewin: The minister says: "What nonsense". The minister simply does not understand that being a member of the Security Council imposes an obligation on Canada to act independently, sensibly and sensitively and, further, for the government to be prepared to accept the advice of this House on the action that Canada should be taking tomorrow.

There is no blank cheque to be given to the Security Council or to the permanent members. It is critically important that Canada, which was elected to the Security Council by the votes of the General Assembly, exercise its independent judgment on the issue that is coming before the Security Council tomorrow. That is not against the UN system. In fact it is entirely supportive of the UN system. We are expected to exercise our judgment. We owe it to Canadians. We owe it to the General Assembly. We owe it to the world to use our judgment and to present our views before the Security Council tomorrow.

It is our submission that that exercise of independent judgment calls on Canada to seek amendments to the presently proposed resolution and, failing amendment, to vote against the resolution in the Security Council tomorrow. That is what our independent judgment must lead us to.

There are a series of arguments presented on how to deal with Iraq, all of which spring from the proposition that the crisis must be dealt with. Let me emphasize that. I have first emphasized our party's support for the UN system. Let me go to a second support.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Except when it counts on it.

Mr. Brewin: Not at all. What do you do? Check your brains at the door when you go into the office of the Security Council? Not at all. You don't check your brains at the door. You exercise judgment. You reflect Canadian opinion. You are sensitive to what the world requires in this. The government cannot simply be a lap dog to the superpowers of the UN. It is expected to exercise judgment. That is what it is there for.

The second proposition must be clear. No one in this House forgives what Iraq did on August 2. We all start together on the proposition that Iraq is an international criminal. It has broken international law in invading Kuwait. We go further. The regime of Saddam Hussein has one of the worst human rights records in the world. Saddam Hussein is dangerous to his neighbours and to the world. He has developed and shown a capacity to use chemical weapons against his own people. He has developed and used biological weapons. He is in the process of developing nuclear weapons. It is a regime which is unacceptable to civilized opinion around the world. The acts that he committed on August 2 and, subsequently, in Kuwait are not forgivable.

This party takes second place to no one in its condemnation of Iraq's actions and of Saddam Hussein's regime. What we do say is that the issue before this House and before the international community is how to deal with the breach of international law committed by Iraq. It is at this point that we begin to differ from the approach of the government, the Government of the United States, and the other superpowers.

What we say is that while Iraq is a dangerous enemy, the United States, in compiling military force and seeming to be dogged in its persistence that military force is the only solution, is a dangerous ally. It is a necessary to send a message, not just to Iraq but to the hawks in the United States who we watched on television just last Thursday. They seemed to treat war as some kind of football game.

It is absolutely important that Canada speak as a peace-maker in the world, that Canada speak at the United Nations as the voice of caution, as the voice of wisdom, as the voice of peace, and not as the voice of war.

There are two propositions which I submit are virtually self-evident. First, sanctions are working in Iraq. The minister has said it. The Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf are employed in seeing that the UN boycott is effective. They are doing an outstanding job, as are the other forces that are enforcing the boycott. Iraq's neighbours are enforcing the boycott: Iran, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, and Jordan. The countries of the Middle East, as the minister indicated, are united in the proposition that the sanctions must be made effective.

Estimates are that they are 99.9 per cent effective. But, equally, the government would have the world community ignore all the evidence of expert opinions that it takes time for sanctions to succeed in the sense that they affect the behaviour of regimes. We have seen in South Africa that it took years for sanctions to bite. In Rhodesia it took years for sanctions to bite. I submit it will not take years in Iraq. It will take months, but those months should be invested to avoid war, because in the Iraq situation there is absolute unity of the international community in the enforcement of sanctions.

Further, Iraq has come into this situation virtually bankrupt. Iraq invaded on August 2, 1990 simply because it was broke after a 10-year war with Iran. For months prior to August 2—and the minister indicated some of this in his speech—it was going cap in hand to its Arab neighbours, Kuwait, Egypt and other countries, to the Arab League, seeking a handout because of the financial condition it was in. When it failed to get that and when, I might add, the United States failed to give it the appropriate signals in terms of a response to invasion, Iraq took its fate into its own hands. That was not only illegal, it was a serious miscalculation. But it should be understood that Iraq has gone into this situation in a very weakened position and that the effect of sanctions is going to be that Iraq's capacity to continue will be rapidly eroded.

The Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade of the House has been hearing witnesses. The witnesses have persistently said that sanctions will take four, six, eight, or ten months before they work. It is our view that the effect of war is going to be so catastrophic that it is critical that the international community give sanctions every opportunity to work. Sanctions combined—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Except when it counts on it.

Mr. Brewin: If the minister would be patient for a minute I will get to the rest of it.

Sanctions and the political isolation of Iraq will, in fact, if given time, produce the desired result. That is proposition number one.

Let me give you a second proposition.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Tell me about political isolation and how you achieve it without military means.

Mr. Brewin: The minister asks how we can achieve isolation without military means. The minister's thinking is locked in the Second World War.

It is a tragedy that the minister and the leaders of the international community have not been prepared to take the additional time necessary to understand that the continued isolation of Saddam Hussein will, in the long run, produce the results that are necessary. Turning him into a martyr to international exterior power will itself be a problem, but beyond that the minister completely discounts the impact of war in that region. Innocent civilians—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I do not.

Mr. Brewin: The minister says he does not. Let me suggest the minister fails to make an adequate balance between the cost of military action and the desired effect and object.

The desired effect and object is to bring Saddam Hussein to his senses over time, have him move out of Kuwait, and produce the kind of solution that the international community needs. All of the evidence is that sanctions, if given time, will work. Sanctions undercut prematurely, as the UN resolution proposes to do, will in fact move us to war much faster.

There is the bluff theory. I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be a peaceful person and I suspect, deep down in his heart, that he believes in the bluff theory, that if the Security Council passes this resolution, somehow between now and January 15 Saddam Hussein will see the light and back away. The problem with the bluff, Mr. Speaker, is that Saddam Hussein appears to be the sort of person who may well call the bluff of the international community.

The Secretary of State himself said that it is important that he get the message we are not bluffing. A resolution at the United Nations is not going to do that. No resolution will do that, because he is still going to be persuaded, I suspect, that all that is happening here is a bluff and he will be very tempted to call the bluff of the United States. That appears to be the way in which he works.

The risk is that, on the other side of it, the international community has given itself a deadline beyond which it must move. If he calls the bluff, the options of President Bush and others have been removed and those in the United States who urge war will have their way. What happens on January 16 if he has not moved? What happens if he has not moved on January 17?

The minister says this was not a deadline that could be interpreted as an ultimatum and that would be counterproductive. Precisely, Mr. Speaker. There should be no deadline. Sanctions should be given every chance to work and that should be the message to the international community.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is important, of course, that one consider carefully the effect of all of the permanent members of the Security Council, save perhaps China, appearing to be ready to vote for this resolution.

Let me contrast briefly the experience of the permanent members of the Security Council with that of Canada and suggest that our different perspective and our different experiences are also worth something and should be expressed clearly and independently at the United Nations.

The superpowers, perhaps by their nature and by their history, see military action differently than we do. All of them in their different ways have, from time to time in their history, shown a propensity to rely on military force to achieve political solutions: the United States in Vietnam, and in other places such as Panama and Grenada most recently; Britain in Argentina; France with its nuclear testing in the Pacific; and the Soviet Union in Afghanistan.

• (1650)

We, in Canada, I submit, have quite a different experience. It is critically important that this experience be reflected at the United Nations. Our experience is that when there is no choice, such as in the Second World War, we are ready to do our part, but clearly when there is no choice. In Korea, we did our part.

But our essential experience from the end of the Second World War is that military action is in fact counterproductive in producing useful solutions to difficult crises and difficult problems. Our experience is that it is important to work through the problem. It is important to contain militarily a country such as Iraq, and that is being done. It is critically important to apply economic sanctions and we have supported that against South Africa, for example, and in Rhodesia. But it is equally important that war not be acted on precipitously.

When I was home last weekend, it was interesting for me to talk to some of the people from Victoria. A Second World War veteran said he had two ships shot out from under him. He said the push towards war in the Middle East was madness.

A widow who lost a husband and a son said she could not believe that the international community is contemplating war in the Persian Gulf. Young students at Monterey Elementary in Victoria, got together to write letters to the Prime Minister, urging him to speak at the United Nations on behalf of Canadians, saying there must be peace and not war in the Middle East.

It is time that the government listened to Canadians. It is time the government acted independently of the United Nations. It is time the government was a voice for peace and not war.

This is a difficult issue, but it is one that calls for patience and that calls for sense. I would urge the government to speak for Canadians tomorrow at the United Nations, to commit itself that Canadians will not go to war in the Middle East without the full approval of this Parliament and until it is absolutely clear that there is no option.

We call on the government to act with sensitivity, to act with patience, and to act on behalf of Canadians. If the amendment of the Liberal Party is not adopted, we will vote against the resolution and continue to urge this government to act on behalf of Canadians.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate, a debate in which we are discussing a motion put forward by the government to support the resolution expected to come forward tomorrow at the United Nations which would provide further opportunities for the UN to find ways to resolve the situation in Iraq.

I would like to talk a little bit today about the role of our Canadian Armed Forces in the current situation and bring both the House and those members of the Canadian public who are watching up to date on our activities.

First, Mr. Speaker, it is important again to come back to the groundwork of the issue that we are dealing with. On August 2, the Government of Iraq launched a massive invasion of Kuwait. This unprovoked aggression was quickly followed by Baghdad's declaration of a comprehensive and eternal merger between Iraq and Kuwait, an ill-disguised phrase for Iraq's outright annexation of Kuwait.

The speed and brutality of this invasion aside, it is the maintenance of civilized norms of international behaviour that is at stake in the Persian Gulf, namely, how Canada and like-minded members of the world community can best forestall similar behaviour in the future by compelling Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait. We all know the lessons of history and that we cannot allow appeasement, we cannot allow incrementalism. It has been quite a unique experience how the world community has come together on this issue to say: "We will not allow one country to take over another country".

As my colleagues on all sides of the House are aware, a vital component of Canada's international defence policy is to work toward maintaining a stable international environment. It is in support of these long-standing objectives of both Canadian foreign and defence policy that our ships and aircraft have been committed to the Persian Gulf region.

By agreeing to participate in the multinational effort in support of the United Nations, we have indicated that this invasion will not stand. Saddam Hussein must recognize that it is unacceptable for larger, more powerful states to attack or to intimidate their weaker neighbours. Canada stands by those who seek to affirm the Charter of the United Nations, and signal that such gross violations of the charter will not be tolerated.

That is why I was surprised to hear the member for Victoria saying that Canada should act independently of the United Nations, when it has indeed been the very history of our country to support the United Nations in these efforts for international peace. This example is a unique example where the United Nations has indeed been able to bring together east and west on this issue. We should be doing everything we can to support the United Nations efforts.

I would like to assure the House and Canadians that the government considers the deployment of our Canadian forces abroad to be a matter of utmost seriousness. As such, any discussion of our participation in the multinational effort to support the United Nations' efforts to dislodge Iraq from Kuwait also compels us to conduct a very sober assessment of the Iraqi military capabilities.

On the whole, from the information that we have available, the reinforcement of Iraqi forces in Kuwait and southern Iraq would appear to have as their objective the consolidation of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. These capabilities are impressive, but I must emphasize that a thorough assessment of Iraq's posture—something that is being conducted on an ongoing basis by my department—shows that our air and naval personnel are not at undue risk in performing their duties under their current mandate.

The size and the deployment of the Iraqi ground force contingent make it well positioned to defend Iraq's gain in Kuwait. However, in the event of hostilities, Iraq would likely find that the task of co-ordinating and resupplying its forward-deployed troops to be beyond its current capabilities. In addition, allied air and naval superiority would go a long way in addressing Iraq's ground force advantages, while the morale and training of many Iraqi troops in Kuwait also remains a major question mark.

I have alluded to some of the capabilities of the multinational forces that have been deployed in the gulf. Upon closer examination, the composition of these forces reflects an unprecedented degree of international consensus on the need to provide a substantial military underpinning to the United Nations efforts to compel an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait.

At the moment, over 30 countries have committed, or have indicated their willingness to commit, military assets in support of the UN effort, while some 24 countries have currently deployed these resources in and around the Arabian Peninsula.

The diversity of the coalition is striking. The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned this as well. There are western countries, including Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, and Spain. There are Arab states including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Morocco, and even Syria. There are non-Arab states with substantial Muslim populations such as Pakistan and Bangladesh, as well as a number of African countries including Niger and Senegal. Additional support has come from the new democracies of central Europe—Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, and Poland.

This remarkable array of countries has contributed forces which are formidable in and of themselves; these are capable of deterring further Iraqi aggression and enforcing strict implementation of the United Nations embargo. The manpower total for these multinational forces currently exceeds 300,000 and is expected to grow to some 500,000. Some 17 countries have deployed over 110 ships in the Persian Gulf, the Gulf of Oman, and the Red Sea. Allied air power is prodigious, with over 1,500 aircraft deployed from 11 countries. As I mentioned earlier, allied forces enjoy overwhelming naval and air superiority and this will substantially redress the Iraqi advantage in ground force capabilities in the event of hostilities.

The contribution of the Canadian forces to this effort has been prompt and significant. The Canadian naval task group has been assigned to a critical zone in the Persian Gulf, and although our three ships comprise less than 3 per cent of the total multinational naval deployment, our personnel have been involved in more than 20 per cent of the activities surrounding the enforcement of the maritime embargo. Our squadron of CF-18s has also carried out its air defence role with great proficiency. If I may echo the remarks of the all-party group from this House which visited the Canadian forces contingent in mid-November, Canadians can be very proud of their men and women who are serving in the gulf.

As we know, Canada's commitment to the multinational effort involves nearly 1,700 men and women. Some 950 of these are with the Canadian task group, while our deployment of eighteen CF–18s and their associated support staff accounts for an additional 570 personnel. Both elements of our contribution are under the command of Commodore Ken Summers, whose joint task force headquarters reports directly to the Chief of the Defence Staff here in Ottawa, thus ensuring that our forces are employed only in those roles to which the government has agreed. Tactical arrangements for the employment of Canadian forces personnel as part of the over–all multinational deployment have been arranged for the Canadian task group and the CF–18s.

As all hon. members are aware, the deployment of the Canadian task group was announced on August 10 by the Prime Minister. After the ships were prepared for departure, they sailed across the Atlantic and through the Mediterranean before passing through the Suez Canal on September 16. That task group began its patrol in the assigned areas of the Persian Gulf on October 1 and has been able to utilize port facilities in Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates.

The deployment of the eighteen CF–18s from 409 Squadron, which is based in Baden–Soellingen, was announced by the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 14. These aircrafts are based in Qatar, and have been flying defensive air patrols over designated areas of the Persian Gulf since the middle of October, and Squadron 409 will soon be replaced by Squadron 416 from Cold Lake, where I visited last week.

The Canadian task group and the squadron of CF–18s have been deployed as part of a multinational effort to deter further Iraqi aggression and to ensure strict implementation of the United Nations embargo. As I noted before, Canada has certainly pulled its weight in this endeavour. At one point, Canadian ships and aircraft have been involved in the monitoring and interception of nearly 1,000 ships in pursuit of effective maritime trade sanctions against Iraq. Beyond this, they have participated in a number of actual boardings, all of which have taken place, fortunately, without incident. In addition, our squadron of CF–18s has been able to increase its number of daily patrols when required, and has been asked to cover critical air space over the Persian Gulf.

I think all Canadians can take great satisfaction from the way in which the skill and professionalism of the Canadian forces personnel has contributed to the controlled, yet effective enforcement of the UN trade embargo. What has been especially striking has been the way in which our personnel have adapted to the very challenging circumstances. Not only have they adjusted to the extremely demanding climate of the Persian Gulf, but our naval personnel and pilots have received outstanding support from Canadian forces personnel in Canada, Germany and in the gulf, all of whom have responded with innovation and a great deal of hard work in organizing and sustaining Canadian air and maritime operations there.

In summary, quoting the all–party committee that went over, as it reported, it said:

> In summary, we give top marks to the Canadian contingent in the gulf. They are contributing in a proficient way to Canada's highest traditions of outstanding international service in the cause of peace.

I want to say, as well, how much we appreciate the support of many individual Canadians: school children, business people, Canadians across the country who have been sending letters, calling and showing their support to Canadian men and women. It really means a lot to them when they are over there in the Persian Gulf.

Canada's security also depends on a stable international order. To this end, a continuing feature of our foreign and defence policy has been a broad–based commitment to promote international peace and security. We have pursued these objectives over the years in a variety of ways, in collective defence arrangements and multilateral peacekeeping operations. Canada has an outstanding record in those areas, one of which we are very proud.

However, Canada's commitment, as well, to international order has also entailed and must continue to oblige a commitment to collective security and defence, a commitment which we have seen as Canadians have fought in Europe in the world wars and in Korea. Since 1945, Canada has helped create a system of collective security which looked to Europe as the first line of defence. These commitments have taught us that security at home is meaningless unless all members of the international community can feel secure from military threats and intimidation.

I want to emphasize that the government is not considering the prospect of conflict in the Persian Gulf in anything but the gravest terms. As Canadians, our abhorrence of war is informed by the sacrifices that we have made in the past in the pursuit of a better world: in two world wars and in Korea and as part of peacekeeping operations, which have given us a very sober approach to conflict. Certainly, no one must have a keener sense of this than the families and friends of the Canadian forces personnel who are currently serving in the gulf, and I am sure that the thoughts of all hon. members are with them at this time.

Iraq's brutal invasion of Kuwait once again presents Canada with a severe challenge. How we respond will be a test of our maturity as a society, and of our willingness to actively pursue the principles which will promote the type of world community we keep for ourselves and future generations. Our ultimate objective, after all, is a safer and more secure world.

What Canada and the rest of the multinational coalition are doing in the gulf supports the goals of peace and security contained in the Charter of the United Nations. We are adhering to the notion that peace must be protected if it is to be kept. The best guarantee of peace is the guarantee that unprovoked attacks will not be tolerated.

I submit that it is imperative for Canada to insist and assist in enforcing the ground rules of a new international order where the kind of outrageous behaviour we have seen by Iraq is not tolerated. This new order is within reach, but only if it is supported and strengthened by all civilized nations, by the United Nations and of course Canada.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time might be up but in conclusion I would like to indicate that at this point I want to emphasize that the UN resolutions in themselves do not in any way change the mission assigned to the Canadian forces and that any change of mission that the Canadian government might assign to the Canadian forces in the future would indeed be commensurate with our capabilities. Should that occur I wish to reiterate that it would be on the basis of a deliberate decision made by the Canadian government.

For now, Canada, along with the other members of the UN Security Council and like-minded nations around the world, endeavour to ensure that future measures are implemented under UN auspices. This has been our preferences from the very beginning of the crisis. We are also mindful of the need to provide the multinational force with additional options so that it may better implement the aims of the UN resolutions.

Of course, we hope and will continue to do everything to try to ensure that war does not break out. But if wiser counsel does not prevail, rest assured that our men and women in uniform are equal to any of the tasks that may be demanded of them. Most important, they are not only serving the interests of security in the Middle East, but also of peace and stability in the world at large.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her presentation. I think she really brought us up to date with some of the facts, figures and numbers of the operation in the Persian Gulf. I was particularly pleased to hear her compliment the men and women of the Canadian forces who are over there, who are prepared to put their lives on the line to protect our way of life, peace, liberty and freedom.

I have a question, and it is important to me. Even the three, four speakers that we have had, and with the follow-on speakers that we are likely to have for the rest of this debate, I think it is important that we focus on any differences that we may have. I think it is very important that those men and women, of whom I just spoke, understand that if there are differences in this House, that the differences are substantive, that they are not for partisan reasons and that legitimate concerns are shown where there are differences. I think it is very important in an issue of this kind that that principle pertain.

To that end, I have great difficulty in understanding, if indeed the deadline of January 15 is in this particular resolution that we are asking for support, why we are asking for a deadline of any kind at this particular point in time. My understanding is that the sequence of events should be, as far as the United Nations is concerned, that identification of aggression has taken place. That certainly has taken place. There is call for compliance, non-military sanctions and blockades, which is where we are to date. Only if these measures fail do we consider military enforcement.

I have here a record of the sanctions and their descriptions. I see that on August 25 sanction 665 was invoked. It called upon maritime forces to use such measures as may be necessary. My understanding is, using the best information I can get, there seems to be general agreement. I have heard it mentioned a couple of times here in this House this afternoon that in order for the allies, or the United Nations if you like, to find out if the sanctions are biting they need from six to twelve months.

There is general agreement that sanctions can work because the economy of Iraq is semi-developed. It needs to import three-quarters of its food. Most on its manufactured goods and foreign currency depends of the export of oil, which it cannot do now. We are looking at February 15 as the minimum time that sanctions are likely to bite, or perhaps up to close to the end of 1991. I would like the minister to explain to this House why we seem to be taking this premature action to talk about all necessary means, which I believe certainly includes force. I equate all necessary means, the ultimate being force. Why are we entering into that debate at this particular point in time? Why not give embargoes a chance to work?

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. colleague from Bonavista—Twillingate has had a long and honourable career with the Armed Forces. I know his sincere interest for the well-being of our men and women serving in the Persian Gulf and has much knowledge of their activities.

I agree with the member. This should not be a debate along partisan lines. It is something we are all concerned about. It is the future of peace and security in the world, and the role that our people will play there.

The hon. member has raised a very important question. The Secretary of State earlier today during Question Period tried to respond to the question about sanctions, are they working?

As I understand it, through the United Nations there is a committee which is asked to review the enforcement of the sanctions, particularly dealing with resolution 661, which was the overriding resolution involving sanctions. Canada serves, I believe, as the vice-chair of that committee.

It is the assessment that the sanctions are not working effectively in the sense that while indeed the ordinary person in Iraq may suffer and there may indeed be shortages of various commodities, it is not affecting those who are empowered to make the decisions. As long as Saddam Hussein keeps his own agenda of maintaining his involvement with Kuwait ahead of the well-being of his own people, it is not really having the kind of impact that we would like it to have.

Among the international community there is a consensus that we have to keep the pressure on. As my hon. colleague knows, the resolution coming forward at the United Nations tomorrow provides this pause—this time of goodwill—in a sense saying: "Okay, we give you a chance to get out of Kuwait".

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said earlier, perhaps there is even some provision there for discussion on some of the grievances that have been involved through the United Nations. But there will come a time when through the international community, we will be prepared to say that other methods or other measures may be required. The resolution does not say they will be, but it does indicate that they may be. It creates a pressure to get this issue resolved because it is apparent that to date at least the resolutions of the UN do not seem to have had that bite and that kind of impact. There has to be that continuing pressure.

It is for that reason that certainly Canada, along with other countries on the Security Council, believes that it is important to provide for this further resolution; provide for that option. It does not necessarily say it will happen as I have indicated, and as I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated. It does not change Canada's role in and of itself because that would have to be a discussion and a debate at a further time. It does create a new sense of pressure which we hope will have an impact on Saddam Hussein and bring him to his senses to realize that he is not going to win. He cannot win in the long term. He might as well cut his losses, get out of Kuwait and have peace and stability restored to that part of the Middle East.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister. I listened with care to her assessment of the sanctions not having a bite against Saddam Hussein and those who are in military control in Iraq.

Those members of the House and those Canadians who have taken the time to read UN resolutions 660 to 674 know that the intention of the UN and of the Security Council was, through a variety of measures and resolutions, to make the sanctions against Iraq increasingly airtight, to make sure that all kinds of commodities that could get in or get our of Iraq were being controlled by the international community. Is the minister suggesting that it is the view of the committee of the United Nations that the sanctions are not working or is that the minister's interpretation? Certainly those of us who have taken the time to read the views of international experts on sanctions know that they have said the real bite of sanctions vis-à-vis Iraq and its economy, both military and non military, is not expected until some time either early or perhaps well on in 1991. That is where the targeting of the January 15 date does not makes sense in terms of the information made public by international experts who have observed sanctions in many different situations.

• (1720)

Is it the view of the committee of the United Nations that the sanctions are not working, or is that the interpretation that the minister and perhaps her government are giving to the matter of sanctions?

Mrs. Collins: I thank my colleague for his question.

I think sanctions apply differently in different situations. Obviously the time frame can vary. I think in South Africa it was a very different kind of situation than we are facing here in Iraq and that one cannot necessarily compare as some people have tried to do from some of the information I have seen. As I understand it, not only is it this government's view, similar kinds of concerns have been expressed by the committee which is involved in review and has that responsibility at the UN.

While I think the blockade from my understanding is working well, there may be possibilities of things coming in and out in other areas. We recognize it has not had the impact on deterring or changing Saddam Hussein and those others who are involved in making that decision. That ultimately is what has to happen. That is what this is all about. We cannot simply step back and take the attitude that it is okay and we will just wait. There has to be continuous pressure put on Iraq and Saddam Hussein so that he knows all the time that the international community is watching carefully and will not tolerate this, and that increasing pressure of turning the vice on him is what hopefully will bring him and others in Iraq to their senses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank you for recognizing me, but before we continue debate on this very important motion, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) I would like to move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of consideration of government business No. 24.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the government House leader. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker: According to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6), if 15 members rise in their places to object the motion is defeated. Shall the motion carry?

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker: There not being 15 members rising in objection to the motion, according to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6), the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Stewart: At the beginning of this debate I would like to outline some of the points that were mentioned in the last debate that we had in this House on this issue.

First, I think it is extremely important to say in this House that I, and all members of the Liberal Party, condemn outright the actions of Saddam Hussein in his invasion of Kuwait in August of this year. However, we continue to be appalled by his subsequent actions taken in that area of the world.

We heard reports yesterday in the United Nations and from other sources of atrocities that have been perpetrated against Kuwaitis. This should not come as any great surprise to us because we have known for years of the horrible human rights abuses that this man has perpetrated against his own citizens in his own country.

We have been aware of the fact that this man used chemical weapons against his own population in the past. We should not be surprised that subsequent to his actions taken in August of this year that he has continued to abuse the people not only of Iraq but of Kuwait as well. I think it is important to make that statement.

I also think it is important to clarify here in the House that we do support current UN resolutions taken with regard to the Middle East crisis which endorse the use of sanctions against Iraq, and demand the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait.

As well, I think it is extremely important to say here at the outset of debate that we totally support the United Nations as an institution, in particular as outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We support the founding principle of the United Nations, which is the prevention of war. We want to see this continue to be the major binding principle of the United Nations.

However, if we provide such total support to the United Nations as an institution, it is important that we be very vigilant about the instruments which the UN puts in place. We support the UN resolutions that have been approved to date with regard to Iraq, but we do not, on this side of the House approve of the draft resolution that is proposed to come before the Security Council tomorrow at the United Nations.

As well as not being able to support at this time such a UN resolution which will endorse the use of force in the Middle East, we cannot support the government's Motion No. 24, the resolution which we have before us in the House today. One of our major problems with the government's resolution today is that thereby we are giving a blank cheque to this government to carry out in our name, members of the House of Commons, in the name of all Canadians, whatever action this government deems responsible and appropriate. We cannot agree with giving that power to this government.

However, it is important to add what do we support, and to say that indeed we do support the motion that is on the floor of the House today, as amended by the Hon. House Leader and seconded by myself. Perhaps to clarify again, I will read what that amended motion says we do support.

It reads:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its current efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions adopted as of 28 November 1990, and that this support shall not be interpreted as approval of the use of Canadian Forces for offensive action without further consultation with and approval by this House.

If it is not possible for this House to approve the amended motion, the Liberal Party will be unable to support the resolution of the government.

• (1730)

Before dealing with some other points, I would like to address in particular the comments made in the speech today by the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would also like to draw attention made this day by the Prime Minister. As I understand it, he was saying today that he felt any nation that did not support a UN resolution—and the UN resolution he had in mind was the resolution proposed for tomorrow at the United Nations—should be condemned. Yet, in the past two weeks we have heard the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs say that this government was prepared to use force in the gulf with or without UN resolutions.

I feel there is quite a discrepancy between the Prime Minister's comments this morning with regard to the Middle East crisis and what we have heard from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in past weeks. It appears that the Prime Minister is prepared to support whatever policy supports his position at the time. It also seems obvious that this government wants to use force in the gulf. That is why we have on the floor today the motion from the government which we cannot support.

I go on to speak to some of the comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He commented that the actions of Saddam Hussein were a terrible breach of faith to the United Nations. It is illegal and abhorrent internationally for any nation to invade and occupy the territory of another nation. He talked of the evil of Saddam Hussein, the fact that he has not only the capability to use chemical and biological weapons in war, but the fact that indeed he has used chemical weapons against his own population.

Is it not that we sometimes prefer to forget or not look at human rights records, in this case the human rights records of Saddam Hussein which we have ignored?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that there was a steady flood of conventional arms into the Middle East, and particularly into Iraq. I would say that prior to the particular crisis we address today we as a country were involved in assisting the steady flow of conventional arms into Iraq, despite all the comments made and written by Amnesty International about the horrible human rights abuses perpetrated by Saddam Hussein.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that all peaceful means have been explored and that we have done everything, but we still arrive at where we are today. He said that he hopes sanctions will help to convince Saddam Hussein but, to quote the Secretary of State for External Affairs, "sanctions in and of themselves are not sufficient".

One of the most important questions on the floor today is: What are the criteria by which the Secretary of State for External Affairs can make such a statement? The fact is that despite questions no material has been provided by the government with regard to sanctions.

Twice this week I have put questions to the House asking that the government provide us with information concerning the effectiveness of sanctions, so that we could be involved today in a full and informed debate on what is happening at the United Nations. In response to my question on Monday, the Minister for International Trade stated with respect to the gulf situation generally:

> —I am quite sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quite prepared to make available to the House, or to the Standing Committee on External Affairs, the full information on how effective the sanctions policy appears to be.

Yesterday a question was put to the Prime Minister in which I asked him to fulfil the promise made in the House and to table information. The Prime Minister said that he would see what information was available. He also said:

> —but I will ask to see what information is available that might be relevant.

Despite persistent calls subsequent to Question Period yesterday, no information whatsoever has been provided to the House to tell us what the government's impressions are and what the experience has been in the application of sanctions and how effective they have been.

The hon. House leader explained that there is international evidence that sanctions are working. In addition to what has been quoted already as material indicating that sanctions are working, it seems to me that it would be important, before decisions are made about Canada's stand tomorrow at the Security Council on the proposed draft UN resolution, to listen to the evidence from our parliamentary delegation which is currently returning from Baghdad. Through telephone conversations with them while they have been in Baghdad, we have statements which suggest from their view that sanctions are having an effect.

Yesterday, in testimony before the Senate armed services committee in the United States, James Schlesinger said that he believed sanctions were having an impact. Also he said: "A year to me seems to be in the right ball park". That was his comment in response to questions from the committee. He went on to say that the economy in Iraq would be in severe difficulty in 10 months' to a year's time, but that it may take somewhat longer for those difficulties to lead Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to change his mind and withdraw from Kuwait.

It is important to understand, no matter what the costs of imposing sanctions by UN resolution at this time, that the cost of maintaining the embargo against Iraq is much less than would ever be the cost of becoming involved in a war in the Middle East.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say that Canada would participate tomorrow in debate in the Security Council on the draft UN resolution which, in his words, would authorize use of whatever means necessary to remove Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. In support of Canada's supporting this UN resolution, he commented that international order was at stake.

On what basis do we feel or what evidence do we have to guarantee that using force in the Middle East at this time to roust Saddam Hussein from Kuwait will bring about peace, maintain or improve international order?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say with regard to sanctions that many believed a peaceful solution was impossible, whatever their desire. Yet, again I say, we do not have enough evidence from this government upon which we can base such a statement. He also said whether or not the UN resolution will mean using force was entirely up to Saddam Hussein.

• (1740)

In describing the draft UN resolution which is to come before the Security Council tomorrow, he made a very curious statement. He talked about what he called the built-in constructive proposal which we see, in other words, as a deadline. I found it personally amusing to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs comment that the Prime Minister interprets deadline as a pause of goodwill and that a pause of goodwill cannot be misconstrued as a deadline. It is important for the Prime Minister to make this fine distinction because our Secretary of State for External Affairs is on record for believing that a deadline, in his view, is artificial and should not be used. Now, instead of talking about a deadline, we talk about a pause of goodwill. To my mind, in reading the UN resolution, by any other word that means deadline.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to talk about the post war situation vis-à-vis Iraq and about what accommodations could be made. It sounded so unrealistic, as if a war in the Middle East would be a very clean, neat operation. I reiterate that it is important for people to understand that a war in the Middle East will have enormous costs in terms of human life, if nothing else.

Saddam Hussein is somebody who has been known from past experience to use the weapons at hand that he has. There is no reason to believe that he would not use those weapons again. The weapons in hand would have a tremendously devastating effect, not just on Iraq and Kuwait but on the whole region. However, the loss of life will be beyond reckoning anything that we could condone or support, certainly at this time.

There were a few encouraging notes from the Secretary of State for External Affairs—and I hope it is so—in his comments wherein he said that this crisis had given us a new sense of urgency to deal with other Middle East problems. If this is so, we welcome it. I personally feel that the addressing of other Middle East problems is long past due.

Also he said that there must be elements of a peaceful resolution of this conflict. I think all of us would like to see a peaceful resolution of this conflict. I believe that at this time it is possible to do so in a peaceful way and not to have to use force through supporting the draft UN resolution which will come before the Security Council of the United Nations tomorrow.

I know that my time is nearly up. As a final point I just wish to say that the Liberal Party on this side of the House for which I speak cannot approve of the blank cheque the government has presented to us today with regard to the situation in the Middle East. We can support an amended resolution and hope that the government would agree with it.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the speech of the hon. member. She began by saying that the Liberal Party condemns Saddam Hussein for what he has done. I am not sure he will toss and turn in his bed at night worrying about our condemnation, if that is all we do.

Mr. Allmand: Sanctions too.

Mr. Friesen: Sanctions too, yes. She went on to say that the UN was created to stop war. Nobody would deny that, but I wonder why she stopped there. Let me read the first article of the UN charter:

> The Purposes of the United Nations are:
> 1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace.
> 2. To develop friendly relations—

And so on. I think she may have read this herself at some time. It continues:

> 3. To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends.

I wonder why the hon. member stopped only at the fact that it was created to stop war.

In responding to the Secretary of State for External Affairs' address, she went on to say that there has been a flow of arms to Iraq, and I hope I quote her accurately, and that Canada was wrong in assisting in the steady flow of conventional arms to Saddam Hussein.

In light of the fact that Canada has very strong legislation proscribing the flow of arms to countries such as Iraq, I wonder if she could give us evidence to support her claim that we assisted in the flow of arms to Saddam Hussein?

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I would begin by answering the hon. member's first comments about the UN Charter. There is nothing in the Charter that the member read here in the House with which I would disagree. I support that totally. It is how we institute and bring about those principles that is important.

In the United Nations itself we have all been so pleased with the universal adoption of UN resolutions imposing sanctions against Iraq and the participation of so many countries from all areas around the world in trying to make sure that those sanctions bite.

At the time that those resolutions were put in place, the thought was that through this peaceful means we would be able to get and convince Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait. There is evidence internationally today that those sanctions are beginning to bite. They are beginning to work. The problem is that we have not had provided to us, as requested, any information from this government which would lead us to believe that those sanctions are not being effective.

We listened to experts world-wide who are saying that it requires more time for those sanctions to be effective. If we can provide for those sanctions to be effective, we will have achieved our goal of driving Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait in a peaceful manner. That surely is our objective. We should be doing everything we can, in keeping with the principles of the United Nations, to work in a peaceful way for peace and security in our world.

With regard to the flow of arms into Iraq and the implication of Canada being involved with that, it is well known that the disclosure procedures and records of the government are inadequate. There have been constant and repeated requests for improved recording of Canada's trading in arms world-wide.

Canada is very involved in the production of parts of armaments that do not necessarily go directly to the end user of those parts. We need better records and a better method of disclosing publicly how arms flow around the world. There certainly have been strong allegations to the effect that indeed Canadian production has been implicated and that arms with Canadian parts at least have found their final residence in Iraq. We want to see measures taken by the government to prevent that occurrence in the future.

• (1750)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): First, I want to thank my colleague for her address. I found it most useful and helpful. I appreciate that she has put forward our party's position. I am going to make a comment, but with a series of questions that have been raised by my constituents. My colleague may choose to answer any one of them, or perhaps none at all, depending upon the time.

The constituents have called about a series of three concepts. The first is why the government did not consult Parliament before committing troops to the Gulf. There is a real concern that, whenever there is a possibility of major conflict, that should be discussed openly in the House of Commons.

The second question relates to the debate today. Why will the government not accept to wait for UN authorization before considering armed conflict, unless attacked of course? There is a real concern there that we ought to be going forward only with the UN resolution.

There is a concern, I believe, in further discussions, that this motion is really quite vague. I do not say that in a partisan or unkind way. Perhaps it is a blank cheque. The government is looking for a lot of flexibility and manoeuvrability and where will this lead?

Concerns are also related to casualties. For example, there is the whole question of what are the expected casualties if we were to go to war. That is a very important question that has not been addressed. When I tried to raise it on the Order Paper, it was ruled inadmissible.

What is the expected cost of hostilities for a day, a week, or a month? I am informed that if we were to go to war, the total costs of a 10-day conflict—and that would be a short conflict, I suspect—would equal the total cost of the United States conflict in Vietnam for one year, ten days equal one year. Those are astronomical sums.

Why the January 15 deadline? It seems quite artificial. Of course, related to that is: Have we really had the time to know whether or not the sanctions have worked?

Why is Canada, so rich in energy resources, still dependent on foreign oil? This is a major concern of Canadians. What is the government doing to control the price of fuel, including gas for Canadians? Will there be shortages? That is the second series of questions.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, where does the government find the money to send three ships, a squadron of F-18s and the necessary troups to the Persian Gulf when it is unable to adequatly help at least 5 million Canadians who are poor? Among those poor are senior citizens, a majority of women and more than one million children.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has a minute to wind up.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the number of casualties that will be envisaged, there are discrepancies in numbers, but one of the numbers that is bandied about is 65,000 dead if war were to break out in the Gulf at this time.

In terms of other costs—the costs of lives is no doubt the greatest cost that we are concerned about—we can be assured that the cost of war will be far beyond any cost of maintaining sanctions at this time.

I have just a final comment with regard to the UN resolution itself that we cannot support at this time. We feel it is premature. We believe that sanctions can work and the wording of it is very vague in what it authorizes, "that member states use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolutions and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area".

Any of the western allied countries could take action under this resolution. That includes Syria.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): On August 2nd last, Mr. Speaker, Iraq launched an unprovoked attack against Kuwait, a small neighbouring state, which, to defend itself, sought the assistance of the international community, as it was authorized to do under the United Nations Charter.

Concerned that the Iraqi forces would go beyond the Kuwaiti borders, Saudi Arabia also asked for international assistance to check the Iraqi threat. The United States and a group of other countries from Europe, the near East, Asia, as well as Africa, responded by dispatching forces to Saudi Arabia.

On the basis of a strong international consensus never achieved before, the Security Council quickly condemned Iraq and ordered it to leave Kuwait immediately. It is clear today that the decision of the Security Council has the support of almost all nations.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Shefford rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, while thousands of Canadian soldiers are probably risking their lives, there is not even quorum in the House. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like you to check whether or not there is a quorum. Because of the tremendous importance of this debate, I suggest it would be worthwhile.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member asks if there is a quorum.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are 20. There are enough people for a quorum.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: So, Mr. Speaker, I continue.

It it therefore clear today that the decision of the Security Council has the support of almost all nations.

Ever since its first resolution, the Security Council has constantly reaffirmed its will to force Iraq to leave Kuwait. This will was reaffirmed in a number of other resolutions whose purpose was to give force and effect to the initial decision. Clearly, the world community speaks as one when it asks Iraq to fully respect the decision of the Security Council.

The impact of the Iraqi invasion extends far beyond Kuwait's borders. Saddam Hussein has caught in a trap thousands of third country nationals and created long lines of refugees. For weeks on end, we could watch on television Egyptians, Sri Lankans, Pakistanis, Filipinos and many more leaving Kuwait. We especially witnessed the suffering inflicted by the Iraqi invader upon these people who, having lost their jobs, houses, possessions and savings, were forced to return to their respective homelands to face an uncertain and precarious future, even darker days.

To these human tragedies was added, for all the countries involved, an economic and social burden which they can hardly carry. Most of the refugees had in fact come from developing countries already grappling with poverty and a lack of resources. The return of these refugees adds to the hardships already suffered by these economically weak nations.

Fortunately, the community of nations was quick to respond to the refugee problem. As a matter of fact, Canada was one of the first nations to financially contribute to the patriation operation. Later on, our Prime Minister announced that for humanitarian purposes, an additional $75 million would be provided to the countries most affected by this influx of refugees.

However, the Iraqi aggression made other innocent victims among other third party nationals whose situation in a way is far worse than that of the refugees. Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the hundreds of people, including Canadians, who are forbidden by the Iraqi authorities to leave either Iraq or Kuwait. These people, who had done nothing to deserve such a treatment, are detained against their will by the Iraqi authorities.

These human beings are nothing but pawns in Saddam Hussein's hands. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the hostages may be free to travel anywhere in Iraqi territory but they cannot leave and are thus used as human shields. Some of them—not Canadians—are held in strategic sites and this is an obvious attempt to discourage any attack against these military facilities. The international community has strongly condemned Iraq's use of hostages and the Security Council has asked that these people be released immediately.

Mr. Lapierre: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening closely to the remarks read by the hon. member and I seek your guidance. Is there a Standing Order to the effect that a member must make a heart-felt contribution to the debate on the basis of personal knowledge rather than be content with reading a text which has obviously been prepared by others? Would you enlighten me on that rule?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In this House we do have an opportunity for a person to reflect on notes used in debate and we have done this continuously. I think I recall that the hon. member at one time had an opportunity to do that too. The hon. member for Bourassa has the floor on debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker, all the more so since my heart was so moved that I would have been hard-pressed to say everything I want to say within the time allocated to me. So I will continue to read my notes. Thank you very much, dear colleague.

Iraqi officials recently announced that they would free all hostages between Christmas and March 1991. If they can free them then, why can they not do so now?

In fact there should never have been any hostages. Iraq will have to own up to this despicable gesture and admit that the Security Council made a wise decision when asking that the hostages be released unconditionally and forthwith. Iraq's stubborness in not coming to its senses makes the injustice of its attack against Kuwait still more flagrant.

The United Nations organization was set up at the end of World War II to protect the international community against acts of aggression and to maintain peace and stability in the world. Canada is one of the UN founding members and its support for the organization has always been strong.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my heart-felt remarks are driving out of the House our colleague who was so upset earlier because we did not have a quorum.

Lester B. Pearson was the driving force behind the peacekeeping efforts to strengthen the role of the United Nations in the preservation of world peace and security. But it is not always good enough to intervene after the dissenting parties have found a compromise which calls for supervision. What happens when one of the protagonist is too weak to defeat the invading forces? Obviously that is a case where there is a need for United Nations protection.

If somebody attacks your neighbour, takes over his house and holds captive a visitor who happened to be there, you will immediately conclude that the neighbourhood is no longer safe and you will undoubtedly want to correct the situation. Canadians have always been the champions of the rights of others, not only because they support justice but also because they have utmost respect for the principle that breaching the rights of a person is tantamount to attacking and threatening those of others.

Law and order are essential to the well-being and peace of a community and its neighbours. And so it goes for each nation and for the international community as a whole. The United Nations is an organization which is essential to protect the international community.

Were we to remain passive or at best indifferent if a country invaded its neighbour, particularly a weaker neighbour, we would undermine the very foundation of international justice, to the detriment of all. Were we to make one exception on the pretense that the country invaded is thousands of kilometres away or that it does not deserve our consideration, we would be throwing our doors wide open to anarchy.

In the early years the United Nations was never able to exercise full influence. The cold war divided the world and thwarted the efforts of the United Nations, yet in spite of that—perhaps more by chance than as a result of enlightened management—it did successfully intervene in Korea.

We now have an opportunity to call upon the U.N. to play the role for which it was created, and that is make the world safer for all countries—large or small, strong or weak, rich or poor. This action—the will to object to undue use of force—involves a risk, with all the consequences and costs that go along with it. If we fail, as has happened in the past, the potential danger and the price to be paid will be even greater.

The United Nations reacted quite properly to the Iraqi act of aggression. Canada was involved at the Security Council level and has tried to maintain the remarkable consensus of all those who wish to see Iraq abide by the decisions of the Council.

It has been several months since the Iraqi invasion, and many official representatives of various countries, including Canada, have sought ways to make Iraq see reason. However, Iraq remains unmoved and the hostages are still being held.

So far, the UN has proved its mettle but has failed to reach its objective. Even the vigorous application of global sanctions decreed by the United Nations and the presence of a multinational force on its doorstep have failed to persuade Iraq to change its course.

We do not want to go to war against Iraq. We merely want it to abide by UN decisions that have received universal support. Mr. Speaker, anyone who took Latin in high school is familiar with descriptions of Roman military strategy, which included a basic principle expressed as follows: Si vis pacem, para bellum, which means: If you want peace, prepare for war. That is more or less what is happening today. In its actions and decisions, the UN has always tried to avoid provoking hostilities, but at the same time, Iraq should be well aware of the firm resolve of all who support the United Nations in this crisis.

The UN is a highly valued institution which Canada holds in high esteem. If we fail the UN now, it will be at the peril of the global village to which we all belong. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that in the final instances, the House will support the motion before it today.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a short comment on what the former speaker was mentioning and to pose a question to her, if she would accept it.

The hon. member said: "If you want peace, you should prepare for war". There is another truism that we must face and it is that there are very few nations in the history of man who have prepared for war and readied their weapons who have not actually used them. As a matter of fact, in the history of man, there have not been any weapons developed that have not been used in war. It would seem to me that it is always better to dialogue, to speak, than it is to take lives.

We, who are in this Chamber, make the decision to send our young women and men into combat. It is important that we exhaust all other avenues before we even contemplate taking that decision. I am of the opinion that it is better for us to negotiate for as long as we can. No, not from our knees, Mr. Speaker, but from a position of strength, that is to say the strength that comes from knowing that what we are doing is right. We must negotiate from a position, also, of knowing that by speaking now, we may avert war. We know that war, if it does come, is going to finish some time. Once again, we must go back to the table and speak, either with our defeated enemies or at least our wounded enemies.

The hon. member mentioned Kuwait, which is the country Iraq attacked. I wonder if my hon. colleague would address herself to the fact that Kuwait, after all, is not a democracy as we know it. My understanding is that the rulers of Kuwait leave a great deal to be desired in the field of human rights. I would like the hon. member to give us her opinion as to why, exactly, we are going to fight there. If it is to free the Kuwaitis, what are we going to replace it with or is it a fact, very simply, that we are fighting for oil rather than principles?

• (1810)

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his questions. I may remind him of the Latin saying: "If you want peace, prepare for war". I did not say wage war.

There are two comments I would like to make. First of all, I would like to remind hon. members that our government is not, to use the English expression, trigger happy. This summer we had the so-called native crisis. There might have been casualties, but for the exceptional restraint and dignity of our military forces in the face of all kinds of provocation. I think that what happened this summer, considering that it was very close to home and very violent, offers ample proof of the fact that our Canadian forces and our government are not trigger happy.

My second comment, Mr. Speaker, is that last week I had the privilege of being in Rome and discussing this matter with Italian parliamentarians who had been talking to some of their counterparts from other European countries. During those discussions, I had the distinct impression that Canada, through our Secretary of State and our Prime Minister, helped to moderate the urges and sentiments of certain other countries that were eager to start a war immediately, a war they felt could be over very quickly.

I also had the distinct impression that our leaders were determined to make use of all diplomatic resources, all peace mechanisms, negotiations and discussions. As you mentioned earlier, it was certainly not a matter of rushing in and acting like medieval knights on a quest, entirely oblivious of what was involved, not just at the geopolitical level, but also as far as the lives of our Canadians were concerned. I am going to say something terrible, but I am sure that the first Canadian corpse to come back would be a nightmare for each and everyone of us.

Mr. Duceppe: We do not have a quorum, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Just a minute, let us see.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, there is a quorum. Where did the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie go?

Mr. Gauthier: He disappears.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Bourassa has the floor.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker, I think a comment is in order. I deplore the fact that members of one of the parties in this House should find it necessary to indulge in such childish stratagems while we are discussing this dramatic situation. I find it very upsetting that junior members of this House should show an utter lack of respect for the House during a debate of this kind.

I will answer the hon. member's question. I shall proceed, Mr. Speaker, because his comment was quite sensible. Mr. Speaker, the last part of the hon. member's question was about what we were going to defend in Kuwait, which did not necessarily have a spotless record on human rights. I think it should be pointed out that we are not going to defend a political system but a principle that says a nation is sovereign and that other nations have no right to attack or violate the territory of a sovereign state.

That is why Canada went to the Persian Gulf. What Canada is asking now, through the motion tabled by the government in the House today, is that the principle of a country's sovereignty is respected.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I do have a comment or two to make to the hon. member since she brought up the precept that if you want peace you have to prepare for war or at least be prepared to go to war. It seems that we are preparing to go to war.

The Canadian forces sent into the Persian Gulf were initially there to perform picket duty outside the zone and ensure that sanctions would be effective. In that regard, our members have already indicated that there is an element of effectiveness that the government is refusing to acknowledge, elaborate on, or at least refusing to take into consideration when it is discussing what step we must take next.

The government has already authorized our forces to move into a very active role of intercepting within the military zone and participating very actively in offensive American military manoeuvres that, unlike UN manoeuvres, are not sanctioned by our Parliament.

If we are to prepare for peace, we should not only prepare for war, which is what the member has suggested that we must do. The associate minister for defence took pains to demonstrate in a very detailed fashion that we are represented by Armed Forces that are second to none in quality. That is not the issue that this House should be considering. The question of the quality of our troops, the quality and commitment of our personnel in the Persian Gulf is not at issue.

Let no one for one moment suggest that to question the government's policies in the Persian Gulf is in any way questioning the commitment and the quality of our men and women stationed there. It is absolutely irresponsible of the government to do that. It is very important that no member of the House on the other side be allowed to raise that issue again. What is at issue is whether the government really believes the commitment which it says it is addressing. That is the one of peace.

If we are going to be preparing ourselves for a new international order, which this member suggests and the associate minister for defence says we are doing, are we making plans for the peace that must follow the end of this crisis? What steps is the member from the government side willing to divulge to this House as part of the government's plan to prepare for the re-orientation of the military, economic, and political realities of the Persian Gulf which it sees as being so very important as to require the deployment of military activities—I am just about finished, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is only going to be a minute left for her to answer.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): I thank my colleague for his question, Mr. Speaker. This is the place to express our views. I would like to come back to the subject of the sanctions. They are probably beginning to work, as they were intended to by the members of the international community participating on the blockade, and that is precisely why it is working.

The problem is that we must remember that, while this is going on and starting to work, a territory is being violated, people are detained as hostages and crimes are being committed on some territories. Someone mentioned human rights earlier. You probably noticed—you must be following the events on TV—that some people's physical integrity is certainly not respected, nor their intellectual, political, or other rights.

Nothing proves for the time being that the sanctions will work. There is no way of knowing when Saddam Hussein will give in, but since he is not known for his logical and coherent actions, we have to make alternate plans. That is precisely what the international community is doing.

Its ultimate goal: peace, a peaceful resolution in the form of Iraq getting out of Kuwait. That is their goal. That is why the international community will make a decision tomorrow through the United Nations Security Council. I therefore urge my colleague to support the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now over. On debate, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party, as pointed out by my leader earlier this afternoon, cannot support this Conservative government motion, Motion No. 24, because it asks for a blank cheque to approve subsequent UN resolutions that we have not seen. We cannot do that, Mr. Speaker. It is too open-ended. It is too vague. The government is asking for carte blanche and, as I say, a blank cheque to approve subsequent resolutions of the United Nations that we have not had an opportunity to examine and do not know the content of. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, we do not support this motion as it stands and have suggested an amendment. We do support the first part of the resolution which asks that we support the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660. Then it says "and subsequent resolutions".

• (1820)

We are proposing an amendment which would say that we support the efforts of the United Nations to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions until this day because we know what the subsequent resolutions are until this day, but we do not support any resolutions that might be submitted tomorrow or thereafter until we examine them.

Does it mean that we are against the United Nations because we will not support a vague, open-ended resolution as the government submits to us today? No, it does not. We in this party are strong supporters of the United Nations. We are the party of Lester Pearson, a man who won the Nobel Prize for his innovative proposals for peacekeeping at the United Nations. We have long been a supporter of the United Nations and we remain a strong supporter, but we do not accept this proposal put to the House today by the government nor, Mr. Speaker, do we support the draft resolution to be put to the Security Council tomorrow.

I will comment more on that in a minute. Just because that resolution might win support by those governments which are on the Security Council at the present time does not mean that we would necessarily support it. We do not, and I will explain that in a minute.

I want to make very clear to this House and the Canadian public that we voted for the government's resolution, as amended, on October 19. In that resolution we in the Liberal Party joined with other political parties in this House condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and asking for the immediate withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. We also approved in that resolution the imposition of economic sanctions against Iraq as a result of that invasion and also the military support of those economic sanctions.

We have so far supported the government in its initiatives except, I might say, the fact that it sent those troops to the Middle East in the first place without the support of Parliament and sent them at the request of the United States and not the United Nations.

After the UN intervened, we have been on side with the government so far in this matter, and with the United Nations.

I say we cannot support this resolution or the draft resolution to be submitted to the United Nations tomorrow. At least we cannot support it in the form in which it was distributed to us today. Let me refer to the key paragraph in that resolution. This is the one to be presented to the Security Council tomorrow. It asks that the Security Council authorize its member states to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and all subsequent resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area.

Let us examine that. This resolution does not ask for the authorization for the United Nations to use all necessary means. It asks for authorization for member states to use all necessary means to implement Security Council resolution 660. This means they are asking for the United Nations Security Council to authorize Syria, Egypt, the United States, individually as member states, to use themselves all necessary means to uphold and implement the Security Council resolution 660.

It goes on not only to uphold and implement resolution 660, but to restore international peace and security in the area. What is meant by "the area"? How broad is that to be interpreted? Does it mean all of the Middle East? Does it mean just the Arabian Peninsula? Is it just the Persian Gulf?

Does "This resolution is to be presented to the United Nations" mean that we are giving authority to states such as Syria to use all means necessary to restore peace and security to the region? What are the implications of that?

I first of all criticize the resolution to be presented tomorrow for its wording, which I think is very loose and, in many respects, says things that none of us would want to support.

This is the main reason for not supporting it. We think it is premature. It is too soon to authorize member states to use all means necessary, which means military force at this point. It is premature because the economic sanctions were only authorized a little over three months ago. They have not been given enough time to bite.

For years we have been supporting economic sanctions against South Africa, for example. No one suggested after one, two, or three years that we should give up on the economic sanctions and send our troops into South Africa. No. We believed in economic sanctions, and we pushed hard with them. We improved them. We tightened them over the years. We made them more effective.

A little more than three months is not enough to test the efficiency of the economic sanctions against Iraq. In the testimony that has been presented to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and Foreign Trade, all the experts said that we must expect to wait at least six months to a year for those sanctions to bite hard and to have some effect.

Those people who are watching closely feel that they are beginning to take effect, but they will not have the full force of their effectiveness for some time yet.

I point out again that it is premature to suggest that we authorize all means necessary, that is outright war, to accomplish our purposes at this stage.

Economic sanctions are not the only measure that is being used in trying to achieve a peaceful settlement to this dispute. We are also using, and the government has pointed this out very often, diplomatic initiatives. As a matter of fact, if some of these diplomatic initiatives were taken more seriously, they could lead to a peaceful settlement, because there have been compromises suggested on both sides that could form the basis of discussion that might bring about peace if the two sides were not so inflexible.

Another major difficulty with the use of military force at this time is the double standard in doing so.

If we look at this attempt to use military force against Iraq, in other words to drive Iraq out of Kuwait at this time, and compare this initiative with what we have done in other similar examples around the world in recent years and which still exist today, we will see that there is a great deal of inconsistency and hypocrisy.

There are many examples where today sovereign territories and countries occupied by the armies of other states has been condemned by the United Nations, but where there have been no sanctions and no military action taken against the aggressor. I refer to the U.S. invasion of Panama about a year ago.

If you look at that case, Mr. Speaker, it really gives rise to some of the suspicion of hypocrisy and so on in this case. At that time there was a motion put to the Security Council on December 23, 1989, to condemn the United States for its unilateral military action in Panama, asking it to withdraw and respect international law.

What did the United States do at that time? They vetoed the resolution. The very sort of resolution that they want us to support today, at this early stage before the sanctions have been given a chance to work, they themselves vetoed before the United Nations Security Council on December 23, 1989.

• (1830)

I want to point out, talking about respect for United Nations resolutions, on December 29 the General Assembly did pass a resolution condemning the United States for its unilateral military invasion of Panama and asked them to withdraw and to respect international law. The United States paid no attention to it.

We also have the examples of the Soviet Union invasion into Afghanistan a few years ago—there were no sanctions, no attempt to use chapter 7 of the UN charter—the U.S. invasion of Grenada, the Chinese takeover in Tibet, and the present deplorable Indonesian occupation of East Timor. Where is all the self-righteousness in the world with respect to that? Here we have a country like Indonesia invading and occupying East Timor, with some pretty terrible human rights violations. Where is the consistency in principle? We also have the invasion of Lebanon by both Syria and Israel at different times in 1982. The same approach was not applied at that time.

To give other examples, we have the attempt by Morocco to occupy the western Sahara. We have the example years ago of Turkey occupying the northern part of Cyprus, and it still occupies the northern part of Cyprus. We have the examples of the U.S. complicity with respect to the overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua, the funding of the Contras, and the mining of Nicaraguan harbours contrary to UN resolutions and contrary to a decision of the World Court.

Today we hear the brave statements from the President of the United States about respect for international law, respect for the United Nations, and respect for the World Court. Where were they a few years ago when confronted with these decisions of the World Court and the resolutions of the United Nations?

When we are considering what is being attempted tomorrow in the United Nations, one must also understand the suspicion with which many nations of the world look on this attempt by the major powers at this time to do things that they did not accept themselves, whether the Soviet Union, the United States, or other countries, when they were in similar positions, when they unilaterally occupied and invaded territories which were not their own.

We are totally in favour of a new order at the United Nations where there would be no acceptance of unilateral offensive military action, where all grievances against other states would be dealt with through the United Nations, the World Court and other international bodies, and the use of UN military action against aggressors as suggested in the resolution with respect to Iraq to be presented tomorrow. We would accept that as a new world order if it was to be consistent and universal.

Would the countries that are putting forward the resolution tomorrow at the UN be willing to amend that draft resolution to adopt a universal policy against all aggression, and not simply this aggression of Iraq against Kuwait? Would they be willing to apply the principles that they are putting forward with respect to Iraq? Would they be willing to put those into operation against all cases of occupation of foreign territory which are presently existing in the world today? Would they make it apply to cases which might come up in the near future? In other words, would the major powers renounce all unilateral aggression on their own part and accept the same sanctions that they want to impose against Iraq?

If we were to cast ourselves back to a year ago, would the United States agree now with respect to Panama to the same sort of regime that it is suggesting with respect to Iraq? I might say that Noriega is just as serious an international outlaw as Saddam Hussein. Both of them are not people to be congratulated. They are people to be condemned for their actions internationally.

The question is: Do you deal with the Noriegas and the Husseins of the world by unilateral military action, or do you deal with them through the United Nations? Do you pick and choose according to your own national self-interest when you do that? In other words, you suggest one plan of action through the UN when your oil and energy interests are at stake, but when there are some other interests at stake, you do it another way.

One might ask: Why this double standard? Why this lack of consistency? There is no doubt that it has something to do with energy resources. If we look at statements of the American government over the years, we see that it has always considered the energy resources in the Middle East to be of utmost importance.

In the 1940s the State Department issued a statement that the Arabian Peninsula constituted a stupendous source of strategic power and one of the greatest material prizes in world history. Later President Eisenhower described the Middle East as the most strategically important area in the world. As a result, a driving concern of the United States over the years has been to protect its energy resources in that area.

I want to refer to an excellent article on this whole subject by Noam Chomsky in the October issue of Z Magazine. In analysing the whole situation in this article, Mr. Chomsky said the following:

> Also worth discussing would be the striking fact that from Mussolini until today, fascist killers and tyrants are quite acceptable allies as long as they line up on the right side of important matters—such as keeping the world safe for profit—but suddenly become beats who must be exterminated when they reveal a lack of appreciation—for the same doctrine.

In other words, the non-democratic countries, the Chiles, the Philippines, are quite acceptable. You can tolerate them as long as they vote with you at the UN and support you in international affairs, but when they stop doing so, you must take steps to get rid of their dictatorial government. You also try to get rid of those so-called dictatorial governments which do not agree with you at the United Nations whether they are dictatorial or not.

It is interesting to note how strongly the United States supported the same Saddam Hussein and the Government of Iraq only a year ago, a man they now denounce in the strongest terms. Once again referring to Mr. Chomsky's article at page 23 of Z Magazine, he said:

> It was also necessary to deal somehow with the fact that prior to Hussein's attack on Kuwait, the Bush administration and its predecessors treated this murderous thug as an amiable friend, encouraging trade with his regime and credits to enable it to purchase U.S. goods. Before that, Washington had supported his invasion of Iran (and perhaps more, we may learn some day), and then "tilted" so far towards Iraq in the Gulf War that military forces were sent to "protect shipping" from Iran—

He pointed to an example of an Atlanta based bank which extended $3 billion in letters of credit to Iraq, $800 million of it guaranteed by the Department of Agriculture.

He went on to point out that the United States became Iraq's largest trading partner just a few years ago. As a matter of fact, from 1982 Iraq became one of the biggest buyers of U.S. rice and wheat, purchasing some $5.5 million in crops and livestock. Also he said:

> According to 1987 data, the latest available, over 40 per cent of Iraq's food was imported from the United States, and in 1989 Iraq received $1 billion in loan assurances, second only to Mexico. The Reagan and Bush administrations scarcely reacted when Iraq purchased U.S. helicopters and transferred them to military use in violation of promises, used poison gas against Iranian troops and its own Kurdish citizens, and relocated half a million Kurds and Syrians by force, among other atrocities.

All this went on just a short time ago, but Mr. Hussein was a friend of the United States. Despite those atrocities they supported him, gave him economic development funding and credits, and so on. One might view with some suspicion the principles involved in this action that is going on at the United Nations.

I will repeat once again that we have supported the resolution before this House condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We have asked for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. We have supported the economic sanctions and the military support for those economic sanctions. But we are not going to give the government a blank cheque and we are not giving the United Nations a blank cheque. We want to have input into the United Nations so that it truly does what it was founded to do, which is to preserve peace with the least conflict necessary. That is what we want, and we do not think that the resolution to go to the United Nations tomorrow is acceptable. We do not think the resolution to go to this House is acceptable. We want it amended as we proposed, and then we will support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I go to questions and comments, I believe there is a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, you will find there is consent for the following motion:

> That the following provisions, respecting the conduct of business in the House, be made, notwithstanding any order:
> (1) That today, Wednesday, November 28, 1990, the House continue to sit, to consider Government Business No. 24 (motion respecting the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq), beyond the normal time of adjournment until 1 o'clock a.m. or until no member rises to speak in debate, whichever occurs first, at which time the debate shall be deemed adjourned and the House shall adjourn; provided that no dilatory motions or quorum calls shall be receivable this day; and
> (2) That on Thursday, November 29, 1990, the Speaker shall interrupt Routine Proceedings, if required, at 11.20 o'clock a.m., when the resumed debate will be called on Government Business No. 24, with each of the three recognized parties to have the opportunity for debate as each sees fit, at the conclusion of which time but no later than 12.30 o'clock p.m., the Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding then under way and put forthwith and successively, without further amendment or debate, every question necessary to dispose of the said business and any amendment thereto, with one 15-minute bell to call in the members, if required, following which recorded division the House shall recess until 2 o'clock p.m., when Statements by Members and Oral Questions shall be called in the usual manner until 3 o'clock p.m. when resumed debate on the report stage of Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, shall be called and continue until 5 o'clock p.m., when such debate shall be adjourned and Private Members' Business and proceedings on the adjournment shall be called in the usual manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Motion agreed to

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for Victoria is rising on a point of order.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the same vein, I believe I have unanimous consent to put a further amendment to the motion that is on the floor at this point. The motion would read as follows:

That the motion be further amending by adding the following words:

"and further, that this House oppose the use of force against Iraq until sanctions and other UN measures have had time to succeed and urges the government to seek amendments to the currently proposed Security Council resolution to that effect".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On the same point, I must say that this is an exception to the rule. There will be two amendments to the main motion, not a subamendment. It is two amendments to the main motion.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, this particular motion was put earlier and unanimous consent was denied. Now, there ought to be some fair play around here. I understand what is happening, the members of Parliament that did not give their consent to this particular resolution are absent from the House at this point in time. So I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to determine whether it is appropriate to bring forward a motion that it was already dealt with by the House.

I would like to also ask you, sir, whether this would, if adopted by the House unanimously, set a precedent. The NDP are asking that the rules be changed in order to accommodate them. The rules quite clearly state that they would not be in a position today to put an amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond to the hon. member who raises a concern. First, yes, the motion had been put previously but the House can do again by consent whatever it chooses to do. Second, because it is done by consent, it is very clear that it does not establish a precedent or a change in our procedures. They are legitimate questions and I just wanted to speak to those.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The consent is to have two amendments to the main motion.

Questions or comments. I will ask the hon. member for North Island—Powell River for the first question and then go to the hon. member for York South—Weston for the second question or comment.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, in the member's speech, he alluded to something that agrees with my point of view on this and I wonder if he could confirm it.

This motion before the House will be construed by the government as the authority to deploy the Canadian Armed Forces in the Persian Gulf and engage the Iraqis in active warfare if the United Nations declares that that is going to happen. What we are in fact debating today, in the minds of the Prime Minister and the government, is actually a declaration of war, or the equivalent of a declaration of war.

If the United Nations subsequently authorizes force, Canada has already had its debate on that issue in the mind of the government. The House will go forward. There is much talk about adjournment and we will not come back until March. In all probability, we could have become involved in a major war with Iraq in the Middle East by that time.

Consider the vagueness of the United Nations motion. It is a fact that any member nation can use whatever measures it requires. The scale of this war could be enormous and any measure could mean even the use of nuclear weapons, or theatre nuclear weapons, if the costs on the United Nations or United States side were thought too great. The hon. member's point about the vagueness of the government's position and the vagueness of the United Nations motion were well taken.

Are we, in fact, looking at a declaration of war and will we not get another attempt to debate this? Is the government in fact looking at this as their authority to deploy Canadian troops in a war in Iraq?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the resolution that is before this House today asks us not only to support Security Council Resolution 660 and all subsequent resolutions up to this date, but it is asking us to support all subsequent resolutions, including those that may come after this date, including one that will be presented tomorrow to the Security Council.

The government is asking us to support the resolution which will go to the Security Council tomorrow and the draft that I have before me would authorize member states to use all means necessary to implement Security Council Resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area.

Quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, if we were to vote for this government resolution as it stands, we would also be approving the draft resolution to be presented to the Security Council tomorrow which would allow the United States, or any other individual member state of the United Nations, to use all means necessary—I guess it could include nuclear weapons, it is horrible to think about that, but that is what the resolution says; there is no limit on it— to implement the Security Council resolution and all future resolutions, including the restoration of peace and security in the area.

This is virtually giving a carte blanche to the government and to the superpowers at the United Nations. It is not acceptable. It could in fact be a declaration of war.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for York South—Weston, then the hon. member for Athabasca, and the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, at times I have to pinch myself to determine if what we are doing here in the House of Commons is real, and if this discussion is fully comprehended by the people of Canada.

What we are doing here in the House is debating a resolution that would authorize war, that would authorize the United States and other member states to use whatever means possible to force Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait.

• (1850)

I do not think Canadians have been sufficiently involved in this debate for the House to take this position tomorrow, when the vote is called. I certainly was not elected to support war, or to support the sending of our troops to fight in battle, anywhere in the world. I certainly was not elected to support American foreign policy that could result in the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives. We have to ask ourselves why the United States and other states are asking for this authority to declare war and, in effect, to attack Iraq or Kuwait.

Let us not lose track of what the situation is. We went to war in the First World War and the Second World War for principles and those principles were democracy and freedom. Those values were important to fight for to ensure that people around the world were free.

What is the principle that the government wants us to fight for today? It wants to risk hundreds of thousands of lives, but for what? It is not freedom and democracy. It is aggression. As the hon. member has pointed out in his speech, there are all kinds of inconsistencies, hypocrisy and double-standards when we talk about this very principle of aggression.

Does the hon. member believe that the circumstances that exist in the Middle East justify war, whether it be today, tomorrow, or at any point in time? In other words, does aggression by a state—whether it be Iraq, the United States or the Soviet Union—justify declaring war? That is the question I would like to put to my friend and colleague.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I want to make clear that this party and I, personally, do not support the aggression of Saddam Hussein. We are totally opposed to that. I tried to make it clear that we condemn that. But we also approve of a means of dealing with it: economic sanctions, supported by military forces, and diplomatic initiatives.

Every expert will tell us that the diplomatic initiatives and the sanctions have not been given enough time. So, in answer to my hon. colleague, this is not the time for war. We must exhaust every possible means to settle this politically, through diplomacy and through economic sanctions, before we consider sacrificing the lives of thousands and thousands of individuals.

I point out to the House that, in the other examples that have happened over the last number of years, we used economic sanctions. Such was the case in South Africa, where we have used economic sanctions for years and have been hoping that they will work. We did not think of a war when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan. We condemned them in the United Nations, but we did not suggest a war.

In this case, it suggests that we are moving into a new order because the cold war is over. Good, Mr. Speaker, I want to see this new order, but I do not want it to apply selectively. If it is going to apply here, let us make it universal, and let us make sure that all nations, including the superpowers—the Soviet Union, the United States, France, Britain, and China—will accept for themselves the same sort of regime that they are suggesting to others.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend suggested that this is no time for war. No time is a time for war, and I think we all accept that in the House.

There were accusations of a double-standard when comparing actions that we have taken as a government against Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, and the American invasion of Grenada and Panama, and things like that.

There has been the accusation, in the media and obviously by my friend across the way who just finished speaking, that we are applying a double-standard in the approach to the present crisis in Iraq. That has become a recurring theme in the debate today, this double standard.

Canada has been forthright in its attitude in the Iraqi occupation. The opposition is saying that we did not show the same firmness when faced with other similar breaches. Well, it would be wrong to consider this act of aggression of Iraq against Kuwait in the same way, regardless of their context. Is the hon. member suggesting that all kinds of supposedly similar historical incidents can be brought up to argue that the world is behaving differently toward Iraq? The Canadian position on other issues is very clear, well known, and well justified.

For example, I would if ask Canada's policy with regard to the occupied territories is a matter of record. We have opposed consistently the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza by Israel. That is clearly on the record. But to compare the situation of a more powerful nation such as Iraq, heavily armed, unilaterally moving in and taking over another country, to fully occupy that country—not to occupy, restore order, and then move out, but to fully occupy that country—with the atrocities that are going on, to rape and pillage that country, and to announce clearly to the western world that it is going to annex that portion of Kuwait to the country is entirely different.

Does the hon. member not see a difference in the invasion of Grenada to restore order, peace, and government and then move out. It is entirely different. The United States at no point in time ever said that it was going to occupy permanently Grenada. The same thing happened in Panama. To use these, to me, just does not make sense when we hear Hussein in Iraq saying that it is going to occupy Kuwait, period. It is going to happen. It is going to keep the territory and it is going to annex it. It is entirely different.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept that. I do see similarities. In the cases of Grenada and Panama, the United States had certain grievances with respect to those governments. Instead of proceeding through the United Nations, it proceeded unilaterally with the use of its own armed forces and violated the principle of international law that every country is a sovereign state.

I am not saying that those countries, such as Panama, should not have been dealt with, but they should have been dealt with by the United Nations and that was not done. The Americans flaunted the resolutions of the United Nations which were similar to the ones that are now directed against Iraq.

If the member wants an example with respect to double standards, I will refer again to the still-existing occupation of East Timor by the Indonesians. We trade and have diplomatic relations with Indonesia. Why are we tolerating this occupation? The reason we tolerate that occupation, overlook it, and bury our heads in the sand, despite the human rights violations, is that there are no energy interests in that country. There are no interests to the United States, such as I pointed out when I referred to the declarations of the State Department in the 1940s and of President Eisenhower.

For years and years, the Americans have considered that the energy resources of the Middle East and of the Arabian Peninsula are of great strategic value to them. Here they act in a different way than they have done with respect to other places. It is not just the United States. It is China in Tibet. It is the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. It is Turkey in Cyprus, and so on.

We have turned a blind eye to those things. I am not saying that is right, but if we are going to do this this time, let us be consistent. Let us act on principle and have it apply to everyone in the same way as we are doing now. That will be a new world order and I will support it.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in congratulating the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, I would like to ask him if in his view, the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech this afternoon discharged the onus of demonstrating to the House that there is an urgency and inevitability and that it is absolutely necessary to subscribe in advance to a resolution which is a potential declaration of war through the United Nations?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker, he made his case. What the government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was attempting to do was to gain the support of the House for an exceptional measure, a measure which would give the member states of the United Nations all necessary means, including war, to implement the resolutions of the United Nations. That is an exceptional request of the House and the burden of proving it and gaining support for it was with the minister. He did not give us enough evidence to support it. As a matter of fact, he did not deal with the questions that were raised. Most experts think that sanctions, given time, will have an impact on Iraq and will work. If diplomatic initiatives were used with greater imagination, they would work as well. He did not make his case. The burden of proof is with him. This party will not support him in that resolution.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the Security Council of the United Nations again takes up the issue of the events in the gulf. Tonight, we again debate this very difficult question in the Canadian House of Commons.

We find ourselves these days in a desperate conundrum: committed to peace but constrained to show a willingness to use force to resolve the gulf crisis. I am as uncomfortable with this state of affairs as I think anyone else in our country is. I want peaceful resolutions to international conflicts and would certainly prefer the deliberate process of discussing the reasons for disputes before they turn into something more serious. Yet we are now beyond that point.

Iraq has already attacked its neighbour, Kuwait, and has begun to efface from the earth all evidence of the existence of that small country. The world cannot allow that sort of aggression to go unchecked, or it will invite further aggression and intimidation. All that stands between the collapse of respect for international order and the obliteration of a member state of the United Nations is the will of other member states that this must not happen.

Last week, I met with the new ambassador from Ethiopia to Canada. I asked him what he thought about the situation in the gulf. He pointed out that his country, Ethiopia, was one of the founding members of the League of Nations. He also pointed out that when Mussolini, the head of Italy, bombed, invaded, and occupied Ethiopia, the other members of the league stood by. While they lamented the development, they, in effect, did nothing about it. It is the ambassador's view that Adolf Hitler, watching that unwillingness of the League of Nations to respond to the wholesale occupation of one of the other league members, a charter member become emboldened in the subsequent course of events that unleashed an unspeakable terror in Europe and throughout the rest of the world in the late 1930s as Hitler occupied the Sudetenland, then Austria, Poland and Czechoslovakia and the low countries and everything that came in the wake of that.

In this crisis, the United Nations is facing its first real test since the end of the cold war and international law, and order must be upheld. If there was a peace dividend at the end of the east-west conflict, which ran virtually unchecked since 1945, it was the prospect of a more rational approach to the regional conflicts and of a smoother road to their resolution. We now see how fragile and, perhaps even naive, that hope was. Iraq has not only violated the sovereignty of another state, it has breached the human rights of the Kuwaiti people, as a demonstration at the United Nations earlier this week clearly showed. In the process, it has violated the rights of a number of citizens of third countries, including Canadians.

It has caused economic chaos, seriously affecting oil importers in the Third World and their fragile economy, who see oil prices going beyond their reach. As well, in a very real sense, it has upset the prospects of many nations heavily dependent on remittances from workers in Kuwait.

In the interests of buttressing his uncertain position, Saddam Hussein has tried to open up rifts between those opposed to him, cynically attempting to exploit every possibility for division and dissension.

In the face of this, our country has, on the diplomatic front, worked tirelessly since the beginning of this crisis at the United Nations. There we have played an active part in our role as a member of the Security Council and in our contacts with countries around the world.

The 10 resolutions which have been passed to date on the gulf crisis were the result of the careful attention to the concerns of all the members of the Security Council. It was Canada's expressed aim to ensure that maximum agreement would be achieved.

The result was the absolute unanimity of the permanent five on all 10 resolutions and the unanimous support of the entire membership of the council for five of those resolutions.

Canada co-chairs the 661 committee concerned with the monitoring and enforcement of the sanctions.

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have had dozens of meetings with other world leaders. We have used Canadian diplomatic resources world-wide to develop and maintain a united international position on the unacceptability of Iraq's invasion.

That is what we have done diplomatically. Militarily, we have sent Canadian forces to the gulf region to deter further aggression and to assist in the enforcement of United Nations sanctions against Iraq.

[Translation]

Respect of the sanctions has been what one could have expected. The problem is knowing whether they will have the desired effect in the near future.

Imposition and continued application of the sanctions has not been and will not be sufficient per se to compel the government of Iraq to withdraw, if it continues to give a higher priority to its occupation of Kuwait than to restoration of everyday life for its citizens. It must be remembered that over the past few years, Iraqis have become accustomed to certain hardships because of the eight-year war with Iran from 1980 to 1988.

The invasion of Kuwait was a disastrous decision on the part of the government of Iraq. It underestimated the opposition of the international community and did not take into account the new spirit of co-operation between the superpowers. It misjudged the acceptability of such ventures for other Arab countries.

The United Nations showed unparalleled unity in voting a series of resolutions which unequivocally condemned Iraq's initiative. Canada played a major role in obtaining and maintaining that unanimity.

Some wonder why the international community initiated such harsh measures against Iraq when other disputes and inequities persist.

It is because, in the history of the United Nations, this is the first time one member state tries to wipe out and wholly absorb another.

Past errors by the international community cannot be allowed to stand in the way of a solution to this crisis. The remarkable consensus obtained in the face of Iraqi aggression may show how to resolve other disputes. This is why the United Nations came into being. If a positive and unequivocal example can be made in this case, it may facilitate future solutions.

• (1910)

[English]

The progressive destruction of Kuwait, the immense costs of maintaining the military build-up in the gulf, the slowness with which the sanctions are apparently making themselves felt, and the isolation of Saddam Hussein from the reality of his situation, have now brought us to the stage where we face the need for further action.

The isolation of Iraq within the international community is virtually absolute, but Saddam Hussein seems unaware of it or unwilling to admit it. Perhaps he believes his own propaganda, according to which the steady stream of foreign visitors indicates weakness among his opposition.

Every other indication, however, contradicts such a view of his propaganda. For example, the universal acceptance of sanctions is one. Another is Saddam Hussein's condemnation in those forums which were important to him, the United Nations and certainly the Arab League. A third is the fact that the military forces lined up against him across the border in Saudi Arabia include his fellow Islamic and Arab nations. All of these things contradict the Iraqi propaganda line.

Under the old cold war system he could have perhaps counted upon comfort from his eastern allies, but they have all forsaken him. The Soviets, his former chief armourers, have spoken strongly in favour of his withdrawal from the territory that he has militarily seized.

Clearly the time has come to give a further signal about the international solidarity opposing Iraq, an unmistakable signal of the determination to see the invasion so crudely attempted reversed. That is why the United Nations must act again. That is why we must pile resolution upon resolution. That is why there must finally be adopted a resolution authorizing the use of force if Iraq does not respond to the other calls which the international community has issued through the United Nations to date.

The Security Council resolution does not make war inevitable. It authorizes but does not call for the use of force. The resolution gives Saddam Hussein a further chance to remedy the situation by complying further and fully with the Security Council resolutions on the situation. The resolution is a clear signal that a peaceful solution is still possible but Saddam Hussein must understand that the choice is up to him.

Furthermore, there is a disposition to set a deadline to allow a pause of goodwill before which force will not be used—I stress, before which it would not be used—to allow Saddam Hussein every chance to comply fully with United Nations resolutions and to ensure a peaceful solution. Following that pause, for however long the Security Council decides it should be, force becomes an option available to the countries of the coalition with the full authority of the United Nations. This is a very clear signal to Saddam Hussein about the importance of full compliance with the Security Council resolutions.

We must hope that reason will prevail and that Iraq, faced with the irrefutable evidence of the will of the international community, will at last comply.

I see the positions that Canada has taken in this as the natural extension of the internationalist spirit which animated the foreign policy of our country for the last 30 or 40 years. When the United Nations was created in those dark, final years of the Second World War, it was hoped that a new approach would be possible in international conflicts. Almost without exception, however, international communities saw the regional conflicts resisting treatment in the United Nations because it was neutralized by the division of the UN membership into the blocs, fostered by the cold war.

Now that the old cold war blocs seem to have dissolved, the United Nations again, and in a sense for the first time, has a chance to act in a manner consistent with the intention of those, including Canadians, who framed the UN Charter.

I referred earlier to this gulf situation being a test for the United Nations, and I take this very seriously. Canadian hopes for the maintenance of international security and peace, despite the situation in which we currently find ourselves, have never been higher. I find this when I speak to people around my Etobicoke—Lakeshore constituency, to other members of Parliament and to people who write to me from coast to coast in our country.

Canada's interests lie in the strengthening of the United Nations and in the enhancing of its capacity, through the co-operative action of its members, to act in such circumstances as these. It is not only the fate of Iraq and Kuwait which is at stake, but the global system for the maintenance of peace and security.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member. First of all, I wish to compliment the hon. member; his French was excellent; his message was very interesting and I sense that he shares a feeling of great concern about the well-being of young people, and the potential for war is as abhorrent to him as it is to us or to me. I will put it that way. Certainly none of us wishes to send young people into war, and that would be the last option.

As a member of the Liberal Party, I have been very supportive of all actions taken with respect to support of the United Nations and the Security Council and rejoice in the fact that, for once, the world is starting to stand up and speak with a concerted and joint voice about actions that are abhorrent to all of us. At the same time, I have serious concerns and reservations as I read the resolutions. I really would like some guidance and help from my hon. colleague.

First of all, in the government's business, Motion No. 24, the government intends to direct the vote tomorrow so that we would accept all subsequent resolutions that come out of the United Nations. I have a worry about that. Knowing my hon. colleague, I do not think he buys anything without seeing the contents or knowing the ramifications of the letter he might sign or the endorsement that he might give.

Knowing that about my colleague and seeing this suggestion to support subsequent resolutions, I looked very carefully today at the resolution that the United Nations is suggesting in its draft before the Security Council. That really has concerned and upset me because of what this resolution says, and perhaps the member can clarify. It authorizes member states, co-operating with the government of Kuwait, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area.

I ask him: can he define who can authorize this member state? Can any member state take an activity or an action that it deems worthy without going through the United Nations; and, second, who is and what is the area? Is that what the hon. member wants us to sign? I am really concerned.

• (1920)

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, it is an excellent question. I think that the wording is vague enough that it has given rise to several different interpretations. In a situation like this, it is most unfortunate that there would be any ambiguity because the stakes are very high in what we are dealing with.

I am looking at the text as it is printed in today's Order Paper. It reads as follows:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

In other words, I take this, Mr. Speaker, to mean the resolutions that have been passed to date.

Mrs. Finestone: Not the resolution for tomorrow.

Mr. Boyer: That is correct. I raised this matter with the senior-most officials of External Affairs and others whom I consider to be knowledgeable, and this is also the interpretation. Therefore, I hope I can allay the hon. member's concerns about this. Certainly I do not feel that we in this House are being asked to, or for that matter ought to be asked to give some kind of blank cheque or to look into a crystal ball as to what subsequent resolutions might be passed at subsequent dates.

What I see this as being is another step in the systematic efforts of the Security Council and the United Nations to take this step by step. We are dealing here in the gulf with an extraordinarily complex and difficult situation which to date has been very well handled. It has been handled very well in great measure because of the comity of nations; the effort of Canada giving leadership to try to have unanimity at all stages and to take it step by step.

I will conclude my answer to the hon. member by saying very directly that as a Canadian and as a parliamentarian, I would not expect that the next stages where Canadians would be sent into a combat situation would be taken without the process being before the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member. I am very surprised at his comments. On this side of the House we feel that this is a declaration of war, that the Prime Minister has deliberately worded this in a vague fashion and in a manner to give approval to subsequent resolutions and to the present one, that is to allow any member state to take whatever action necessary.

The Prime Minister has a track record on this particular issue of authorizing deployment of Canadian military forces without the sanction of Parliament to the Persian Gulf.

It is our feeling on this side of the House that this is a declaration of war or the government will interpret it as the right and sanction of Parliament to have this. Parliament will adjourn. There is a lot of discussion that it will not come back until March. It is also our feeling that this is Parliament's last opportunity to debate this issue. We are debating an extremely vague motion.

I would say that anyone in the House who expresses the concerns that the member has, along with the vague resolution, should be voting with us against that resolution because I think your Prime Minister is going to betray you on it.

In the bottom line, if we are right, how many Canadians will be killed? What will be the casualty over there if they engage their Iraqi army, along with the Americans?

The other thing is how many Iraqis will be killed by the multinational force? There will be hundreds of thousands of Iraqis killed and injured in this.

In the final analysis, the sad tragedy of this is that blockade will work. It will take time to work. It may not suit the United States and its belligerent war-like effort there, but certainly those sanctions will work if they are given a chance. We ought to be working ourselves as hard as we can to impose those sanctions so that the Iraqis leave Kuwait peacefully, and then sort out the remainder.

There is no way Canadian Armed Forces should be deployed over there when we have a safer, much better and more effective opportunity to use those sanctions to achieve the ends without killing anybody.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is doing a lot of crystal ball gazing not only as to when Parliament will be rising or being recalled, and all of that—which is quite an uncertain thing—not taking into account the ability to be recalled to his casualty statistics for what may or what may never happen.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): But it may happen.

Mr. Boyer: He is saying that it may happen.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): You said it may happen.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks on which the hon. member is making his comments, I was very deliberate and very clear about the sequence of events that are possible.

I talked about the time deadline that is going to be included in this resolution and the opportunity that that gives again to Saddam Hussein to recognize what he is up against and the seriousness to the whole international community of what he has done.

I think there is a tendency to sort of obscure the sincere efforts of a lot of people around the world to try to deal with this situation in a way that can contain it and preserve peace. As time goes by and the annexation of Kuwait continues month after month, there will come a point where it is de facto part of Iraq, and the world community will be standing there not having succeeded in what, since the day of the invasion, has been an almost unanimous view of the international community.

I know that the hon. member and the leader of his party have said that they view this as a declaration of war.

This interpretation is more of a statement than I would certainly be prepared to make. On the other hand, that interpretation by the New Democratic Party of Canada may certainly help to contribute to the psychological warfare that is necessary at this stage against Saddam Hussein to try to break through to him some realization that, in this century after all the wars and killings because of all the invasions and annexations, finally the United Nations has got an opportunity to say: "International law and order cannot tolerate the armed annexation of neighbouring countries."

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad—I mean it—to have a chance to speak on this subject. It has meant a lot to me for most of my life.

When I was a boy, I heard the effective beginning for us of World War II in church one Sunday morning, that is that Britain had declared war on Germany. I know that was not the first event, but that was what brought it home to Canadians.

It is not by coincidence that since then this has, for me, been not only a political question but a religious one.

On the religious side, I will in this forum simply say that I believe the world was made good, meant to be enjoyed by all and that there are troubles in it. The intention of our Creator is not to wipe us out, even through our own act but to cure what is wrong. That is the basic point of view from which I look at today's debate.

When I look at the government's motion, I feel that it is defective in the sense that we say we support the United Nations and its effort to ensure compliance with the Security Council resolution 660, and subsequent resolutions, with the ambiguity that is loaded into that word "subsequent"—which the Prime Minister refused yesterday or today to make any effort to clarify. If this is not a declaration of war, it is far too close to one. There is too much emphasis on punishment and on destruction.

• (1930)

The reason I prefer the resolution that the NDP supports is that it emphasizes more fully, and I think more realistically, the possibility of change for the better. We oppose the use of force against Iraq until sanctions have had the opportunity to work. We urge the government to seek an amendment to the Security Council resolution requiring member states to give sanctions and other UN efforts time to work and call on the government not to send Canadian Forces into military action beyond the current enforcement of UN sanctions without further approval from this House. The hon. member who just spoke feels sure there will be an occasion for that, but we want it to be laid down clearly because last summer we were denied that very right and responsibility.

In fact the position I am taking and that our party is taking is consistent with the position of the United Nations Association in its testimony before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on November 6 when it said:

> Let us be quite clear about this. The harsh economic sanctions which have been imposed on Iraq have not had time to produce results and there are other measures that could be taken before resorting to force. It may be useful to recall that even during the worst moments of its war against Iran, Iraq was still able to continue its oil exports. Under the current UN sanctions, this is not the case.

Others have gone into that question more fully and I do not intend to repeat most of what they have said. It seems to me that at this time and in the foreseeable future, in the coming months, war, which is envisaged in the resolution of the Prime Minister, would be premature. It would be too harsh both to our foe—and Saddam is our foe; there is no question—and to ourselves. He has broken the law. If he has a complaint, which is quite possible, he should have taken it to the United Nations with some patience, rather than unleashing the beginning of what could be an unimaginably wide war.

If we join as war makers in that, the damage to our enemy, to ourselves, and to many others who may not even be party to it, is beyond our ability to measure and contain at this time.

I was willing in the 1940s, in World War II, to volunteer for the Canadian forces because I thought there was no other way, as far as I could see, to do what was necessary. Some of my acquaintances were conscientious objectors. I did not see their view as mine. I was willing. I have not changed my view on that occasion. In principle I believe that should still in the present situation be a possibility in some cases. I have sons and daughters of an age where they must consider this same question. I know they would think responsibly on this occasion and on others like it.

On this occasion I think it is too soon, both too soon in the case of Iraq and too soon following on these other examples that have been mentioned: the invasion of East Timor, tolerated; the U.S. invasion of Vietnam and its years of war there; the U.S. action in overthrowing the elected Government of Guatemala, the elected Government of Chile, and the elected Prime Minister of Iran; the invasion by the U.S.S.R. of Afghanistan; China's invasion of Vietnam; and France's hard-hearted continuation of testing of nuclear weapons in the Pacific, poisoning the land and the ocean.

These are all members of the United Nations, most of them members of the Security Council, that is to say of the big five, the permanent members. I do not think the record shows that these members are to be trusted with the blank cheque that is in the motion before the United Nations tomorrow, which the Prime Minister has asked us to endorse. Especially they are not to be trusted when oil is one of the major concerns. That is not only my opinion. That has been stated by many others much closer to the responsibility. That is the trouble with the government's motion.

There was no call to Parliament in August. It gives us no confidence that Parliament will be called again unless it is absolutely, clearly guaranteed now before war.

There was no wait for the United Nations decision. When the ships were sent, it was in consultation with President Bush and with NATO officials in Brussels, with General Verner who had said that perhaps now that there is no danger from the Soviet Union we should use our armies in other parts of the world to protect our oil. In other words, oil was a major element in the NATO backed decision of Canada to send those ships to the Middle East.

Now sanctions have been agreed in the UN, but the present UN motion is flawed as has been pointed out. It gives unlimited rein to member states with no UN command, no definition of the goals, no one responsible for defining the goals to tell one country or another it is time to stop: "We won. Don't go on fighting". Every country just does what it thinks best.

However, I am encouraged by some of the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon. I am very glad that he made his visit to the Middle East. I do not agree with everything that the newspapers attribute to him there, but that is a common problem we all have. I took note of some of the things I heard him say today. He mentioned that, rather than an extreme of punishment to Saddam or Iraq, he finds in the region a willingness to live with Iraq. He goes on to say if Iraq has complaints against Kuwait, there is the United Nations in which to take them up.

He also mentioned the possibility of an Arab force likely for the future defence of Kuwait and that there could be further attempts to resolve regional problems such as the Arab–Israeli dispute, in which he said there is a new sense of urgency to resolve it, or words very close to that.

I commend the minister for raising that point. It is a very delicate, difficult point to raise. I think it is necessary to raise it whether we agree or not with the argument that the Arab–Israeli dispute cannot be dealt with at the same time as the Iraq dispute. At least he said that it has to be done in that context or in the aftermath. I am much encouraged by the fact that he reports helpful conversations with Israeli and Palestinian leaders and that he takes this occasion to reiterate that arms control must come to that region.

I am encouraged by those remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I take them as ground for listening carefully to the many people who have told us, including the minister, that there is evidence that the sanctions are working and therefore ground for giving them time.

I want to state three reasons why I believe we should not only rely on sanctions but avoid, as long as we honestly can, the declaration of war or the ordering of a military attack on Kuwait. One reason is that we have for 1,000 years, give or take a century or so, had hostility between the nations and cultures of Europe, the nations and cultures of North Africa and the Middle East, and now south central Asia, even east Asia.

• (1940)

Roughly speaking, it was the Christians against the Muslims. In school I thought that was old history. Now I find it is very present history with us. It never really ended. Perhaps what has ended is the European expansion into the rest of the countries of the world. That may be giving us some heart searching. Certainly there has been manipulation by European countries and by the United States of the oil that is so plentiful in the Middle East. That attitude seems to be that it is our oil.

The Prime Minister of Iran in 1953 thought that it was oil belonging to the Iranian people. He wanted to raise the price, and the United States arranged to have him overthrown. There has been no stability nor democracy in that country from 1953 until now. It is very unfortunate that the United States preferred to introduce a tyrant, the Shaw, in order to get cheap oil.

For us now to send an armada against Iraq may very well detonate a war that would spread much wider than Iraq. We know that there is sympathy with Iraq among some of the people even in some of the countries whose governments are officially allied with us or have sent troops. There is a possibility of a very widespread war, if we seem to be just renewing what was undertaken 1,000 years ago in the Crusades. We have to be very cautious on that account.

I would like to refer to the minister's remarks, quoted Tuesday in The Globe and Mail: "The Palestinian question must be dealt with as part of the process of dealing with the after-effects of dealing with this gulf crisis". I hope that will be kept in mind.

If a full-scale war breaks out, what will happen to Palestine, either to the Israelis there or to the Palestinians. I do not think they will be in as good shape after that war as they are now. I do not think the bitterness that has made it impossible to resolve the partitioning of that land will be any less after a war that we might start with Iraq.

Second, it is reliably reported that there are 500 nuclear explosive devices or nuclear bombs in the gulf area. Most of them are on American vessels and some of them are on the vessels of other allies.

The question is: Why are they there? If our allies do not mean to use them, why have them there? If we do mean to use them, when, on what occasion, for what purpose, and how many? Five hundred nukes? How many are we going to detonate under the phrase given by the United Nations: "use any means necessary."

I remember at the beginning of World War II when Hitler experimented with carpet bombing with stuka bombers, wiping out the civilians in the cities and towns of Poland. President Roosevelt said: "No civilized nation could possibly do a thing like that." It wasn't many years before Britain fire bombed scores of thousands of civilians in the centre of Dresden, until the United States atom bombed scores of thousands of civilians in Hiroshima and again at Nagasaki. We should not assume that those nukes will not be used. Those are just two nuclear bombs. With 500, it could not wipe out just Iraq. It could perhaps wipe out the world or the human part of the world and perhaps all living parts of it.

We are not ready for a controlled war, as seems to be offered to us. We have no guarantee, no reason to think it would be controlled.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I believe another reason why we should hold off from pushing to the possibility or probability of war tomorrow is because even in the United States and in other allied countries, there is growing unease about the ramifications, about the uncontrolled possibilities of ordering an attack on Iraq, which seems to be the issue. I have a statement here quoted in a small paper that I picked up in Kingston recently, Between the Lines, from one U.S. marine corporal, Eric Larson. He says:

> On April 21, 1986 I joined the Marine Corp to defend the American dream, which first attracted my parents to this country in 1958. I emerged from boot camp three months later, a fully indoctrinated fighting machine willing to go anywhere in the world to defend the ideals and freedoms stated in the Constitution of the United States of America.

I will not read his whole statement, but he says further down that after further consideration:

> I realized I could no longer blindly follow orders from my Commander-in-Chief but that my actions were ultimately accountable to a higher authority— namely God.
> My deeply rooted moral convictions have lead me to declare my objection to the escalation of tensions and seemingly inevitable war in the Middle East.

And further down:

> I declare myself a conscientious objector. I am no longer a Marine.

Mr. Speaker, there are anti-war demonstrations developing across the United States in many cities. They are anti war demonstrations in many cities of Europe. Recently French dockers refused to load certain ships that would be carrying war materials to the Middle East. It is not only demonstrators in the streets. I was amazed to read the transcript of the interview a few days ago or a week ago perhaps between Barbara Frum and Dr. Brzesinski, a former adviser to President Jimmy Carter and one generally considered to be a hawk. He says:

> And while I abhor the occupation of Kuwait, I also abhor the occupation of Cambodia by Vietnam or Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, or Lebanon by Syria, but I'm not prepared to advocate a war in every case and I do not see any overriding American national interest in America having to undertake a very risky and very costly military operation in the place of sanctions being applied against Iraq and which are punishing Iraq.

Mr. Speaker, this and the demonstrations in the cities of Europe and in the cities of Canada are only beginning as an opposition to the war. Therefore, I want to reiterate the position of my party.

There should be no attack now or in the foreseeable future. We should concentrate on making sanctions work. Some people have referred to the 1930s, to Ethiopia, to Spain and so on and what happened when we allowed Hitler and Mussolini to go unchecked. That is not the situation that we have. United States, France and Britain refused to impose sanctions on Franco when he was overthrowing the lawful government of his country. They refused to do anything to stop Hitler and Mussolini from sending troops to support Franco in the overthrow of the lawful government. That made World War II inevitable.

We now have an almost total world-wide agreement on sanctions against Iraq. We have a much stronger organization to guide it than was the old League of Nations. I believe that it is our moral duty to see to it that we make those sanctions and other political means work and make war unnecessary now. The old slogan of "a war to end war" was made out of date by the bombing of Hiroshima.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have listened with interest and some shock and amazement at what the New Democratic Party is saying here today.

• (1950)

One of the advantages of a debate like this is that people have to stand up and be counted. They have to be counted for some kind of consistency in their policy.

For years, we have listened to members of the New Democratic Party say: "Canada should work with the United Nations. Canada is a part of the United Nations. When we act, we should act in concert with all of the other countries. Canada should not go it alone". Today, we hear the spokesman for the New Democratic Party say: "It is time for the government to act independently of the United Nations". I could not believe what I was hearing. I could not believe it. For all these years we are supposed to work together and now is the time to act independently.

I think the message is clear. It certainly is clear to the House. I am sure it is clear across Canada, and I am sure it is clear among our allies, never count on these people for friends. They say they are friends when the times are good, but when the times are tough, they say: "Please, do not call on us". Then, the time is not now, no. We have to wait a while, you see.

Second, for years we have been listening to these people say: "Help the oppressed. You have got to help the oppressed, those who are hurting". Now, we hear reports about people being killed in Kuwait, hostages in Iraq, women being raped, and children being thrown out of incubators, and these people say: "Oh, the time is not now". No. The Soviets have 3,000 hostages there, the U.S. has so many, Canada has some, but the time is not now. Presumably, not enough people have died yet. I wonder what it is that makes these people tick. We hear their friends from the Peace Coalition say: "Canada and its leadership are warmongers".

Here is Saddam Hussein, with his tanks poised on the Saudi Arabian border, with a million troops in arms, who has obliterated the boundary of another nation, and Canada is the warmonger? Give me a break. How come the tables have all of a sudden turned?

I know this member believes in peace. Does he believe in peace at the cost of freedom? Which is more important? If he believes in peace more, would he have the freedom to stand here and say what he says today?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct a misunderstanding in the beginning on the part of the hon. member. As I understand it, what my colleague, the member for Victoria said, was not that Canada should act independently of the United Nations, but independently at the United Nations. I invite my hon. colleague to check that in yesterday's Hansard. In other words, independently of the United States, which would be very desirable. I fully stand by that and the NDP always has.

On the second point, about oppression, there are oppressions sometimes where we can do something immediately and there are others where we cannot. When the United states massacred more than 3,000 civilians in Panama, Canada's government did not even attempt to do anything about it. Let us not just talk in a vague generality about oppressors.

Finally, on the question of peace or freedom, I believe freedom is essential to peace and peace is essential to freedom. We do not have any of them perfectly, but I do not believe we are going to make either more peace or more freedom with 500 nuclear bombs in the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of remarks that my hon. colleague from Trinity-Spadina might comment upon. He has just finished with what I think was a very nice statement, and I want to compliment him on it.

What the government is doing by requesting approval for this motion is, in essence, a whitewash, a blank cheque to go ahead and engage the country in war without coming to Parliament to ask for the opportunity to go in. The parliamentary secretary, who has already indicated that he is unaware of exactly what the ramifica tions of the resolution are, is going to go back and try to figure it out with his department. That is fair. I am not calling into question his motives and his understandings, but there is a problem.

This House has a right to know what is on the government's agenda when it is going to ask Canadians to support its initiatives that are absolutely war-like.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has already, in all of his declarations, indicated that, as far as he is concerned, Canada is headed toward war. The presence that will soon be 400,000 American troops accompanied by 2,000 tanks, four aircraft carriers and the addition of other troops indicates that that is where we are going.

The Minister says that we are moving from peacekeeping to peacemaking. In other words, we are going to go from conflict co-operation to conflict resolution. That indicates that the government has in mind a policeman's role in the area. If the government is that willing to go forward, then will it come before the House and say: "We want to preserve peace, and here is our agenda?"

Has the member for Trinity—Spadina been given any indication from the government side, since it is so prone to looking at the examples of the 1930s and early 1940s, and even as far as 1950 and 1951, that the government is doing what the many governments of the western democracies were doing before the end of World War II at Quebec City, at Casablanca, at Yalta, with the Marshall Plan that emerged, and with McArthur plans for Japan, when they were beginning to reconsider a reorientation of the societies that were going to come after the war?

In other words, the government is making such hay in saying: "We want the opportunity to blow everybody up, because what we want to do is to ensure peace". Has it got a plan where it is going to plan for peace? What is that plan for peace? Have we been given any indication? Are we likely to get any indication from that?

Is the hon. member aware of any indication from the minister or the government that says that this motion is going to lead us in the direction where we are going to be talking about the way we establish and maintain peace in an area where we have already destabilized an integral and strategic part of the world?

Mr. Boyer: We have stabilized.

Mr. Volpe: The parliamentary secretary is confused about what the resolution calls for, and he is unaware of what is going on. If he would like to answer the question for the member for Trinity—Spadina, let him do it. Maybe the hon. member could advise him as well on how to go toward peace.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I will try to make a very brief answer to the hon. member.

Until today, I had not heard any sign of the willingness that the hon. member speaks of. But today, I thought I heard two signs. The remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which I referred to, and some of the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary suggest to me that the reason that the word "subsequent" is so adamantly maintained—in a totally ambiguous sense in what the parliamentary secretary seemed to say, unfortunately—suggests to me that there is serious division in the ranks of the government party.

I hope that the letters that are beginning to come in to me and to others, and the public demonstrations that are going to be heard from, will press the government ranks and the back-benchers of the Conservative Party to re-examine that word and to press for a meeting of Parliament to settle this matter clearly, instead of ambiguously.

It is only a hope, but I said I believe the world was made good, and we should hope for change for the better. The signs are very small, and I will be watching carefully for more. In the meantime, the sign that would make it work would be for the government to adopt the amendment that has been put forward by the NDP.

• (2000)

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, as we debate this motion tonight, the world finds itself intricately wrapped in a very serious international crisis. The stage for this crisis was set on August 2, 1990, the day that Iraq blatantly, ignoring international law, invaded its unsuspecting neighbour, Kuwait. Consequently, Canada, along with numerous other nations, finds itself facing the difficult question of whether to use other means beyond the economic sanctions which are already in place.

No one wants war, but Iraq started a war with the brutal and merciless invasion of Kuwait. No one wants war, but Iraq's continued attempt to eliminate the identity and very existence of a member state of the United Nations cannot be ignored. No one wants war, but Iraq must clearly understand the firmness of international resolve. That is the reason why the Security Council will be adopting a further resolution tomorrow and why this House should support the resolution before it tonight.

The Persian Gulf is in conflict tonight. There can be no denying of this fact. Not only has Iraq acted belligerently toward Kuwait, it has since held captive third country nationals as hostage, contrary to the principles of the United Nations.

Bernard Wood of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security stated the following in an External Affairs and International Trade committee meeting:

> First of all, let us be clear, there is a war in the Persian Gulf right now. There is an aggression that has taken place, and it has not been rolled back. Saddam Hussein declared and acted in an active war and it has not been resolved. It is therefore not the burden of the international community at this stage to say that we are the ones who are advocating war. What is at stake? I think it is important to choose our terms carefully in this regard. We are talking about enforcement action of international peace and security under the terms of the Charter.

Therefore, can we, as a peace-keeping nation, stand idly by as another nation, fully aware of the United Nation's charter, in fact a member of the United Nations itself, rapes and pillages another member country? Our collective conscience should answer that question.

Alex Morrison of the Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies recently stated to the External Affairs' standing committee:

> Canada and Canadians have always been ready to respond appropriately—and may I say more quickly than some of our allies in this century—to calls for contributions to the preservation and defence of international peace, security and stability. In the case of the gulf crisis we have done it again.
> Ought we always and ever, without fail, stand aside in the face of clear calls for action? Of course not. Are we only right when we disagree with the United States? No, not at all. Are we wrong when we agree with the United Nations Security Council? No, we not. Are we wrong when we join some 30 other countries in a multinational military effort to deter aggression? Of course not.

Mr. Speaker, later in that same meeting of the External Affairs committee, Mr. Alex Morrison went on to state the following:

> I think it is a very great misperception and it is wrong for Canadians to assume and conclude that Canada acts only under pressure or persuasion by the United States. I have had some experience in this during my six years as a member of the Canadian mission to the United Nations, and I can say that this is not the truth.
> It is, however, the truth per se that the opinion of the United States, our greatest ally, certainly is a factor in the determination and in the formulation of Canadian foreign policy. But, as has been said, we were active in 1914, not three years later.

As were the Americans.

> We were active in 1939, not two years later.

As were the Americans.

Let us remember that Iraq did not simply pop into Kuwait only for a drink and a friendly discussion. They invaded the country with decisive military force and since that time have systematically attempted to wipe out all traces of Kuwait and its people.

We are talking about a Stalinesque effort to remove all traces of a legitimately constituted nation and its population. Iraq has made no attempt to explain or justify its brutal acts, other than to offer the flimsiest of historical claims to Kuwait. Not satisfied with encouraging the flight of hundreds of thousands of people into the desert from Kuwait on August 2, Iraqi occupation forces have conducted a campaign of terror against those who have remained.

Yesterday at the United Nations some survivors of the ongoing Iraqi atrocities gave stirring accounts of the condition of their homeland and its remaining people. The Iraqis have spared no one from the suffering, the young as well as the old.

I firmly believe that the fundamental issue in this crisis is morality in international behaviour. Consequently, it is Canada's international responsibility to ensure that nations adhere to and fully respect international law. Without this consensus, the world would be captive to every despot's whims and wishes. We must re-establish international order. Without it, as history has clearly shown, chaos and then war are inevitable.

As the Prime Minister stated on August 10 of this year:

> The international community must do everything possible to ensure the respect of international law and to prevent its transgression. The lessons of history are clear—no civilized nation is excused from its broader responsibilities to the world community for international peace and order.

Since its inception, the United Nations, was designed to be the primary conduit of action on the international stage. Ever since 1945, the United Nations has sought to uphold international law and order. Unfortunately, from 1945 to as recently as this past summer, the cold war prevented any solidarity by the United Nations. Now, however, and in fact beginning with this crisis, for the first time the United Nations is working as it was originally designed. Since 1945, few other nations have worked as loyally and as diligently within the United Nations as Canada.

Since August 2, the United Nations Security Council has passed no less than 10 resolutions pertaining to the Persian Gulf crisis. Contrary to popular belief, propagated by some in the media and some in the socialist party on the other side, it is the world community and not simply the United States, that has acted quickly and decisively in response to this crisis. The UN Security Council resolution 660, which Canada, under the leadership of Ambassador Yves Fortier co-sponsored, states: "Determined that a breach of international peace and security had taken place, and therefore condemned the Iraqi invasion, demanded its withdrawal from Kuwait and called upon Iraq and Kuwait to negotiate".

Clearly it has been the world community, under the auspices of the United Nations, that has stood up to Iraq. Let us not be misled into thinking that we have blindly and naively followed just the United States into the crisis; we have not.

• (2010)

Again, Alex Morrison of the Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies has said:

> We (Canadians) act differently from the Americans in many ways. We have a different South African policy, a different Cuban policy, a different Middle East policy, a different Central American policy. At the United Nations, where I was part of the delegation for six years and a member of the Security Council delegation, Canada voted differently from the Americans on international security and arms control issues 66 per cent to 75 per cent of the time each year.

This situation is no different. Canada, in fact, has played an instrumental role at the Security Council. In fact, nine out of the 10 resolutions have been co-sponsored by Canada. Additionally, according to a New York Times article, of August 30, 1990, at a time when the Americans were considering acting alone with naval interdictions of Iraqui commerce at sea, Canada's United Nation's representative, Yves Fortier argued, and I quote from The New York Times article:

> —that the Security Council should instead take a step-by-step approach under the Charter's Article 42, which provides for blockades and other military actions but only with explicit Security Council approval.

Subsequent actions by the Americans attest to the strength of the Canadian argument.

Nevertheless, there can be no denying the importance of the leadership that the United States has provided in this crisis. Acceptance of their responsibilities as a world power may even have prevented greater international repercussions and perhaps forestalled any expanded attack by Iraq on the oil lines in Saudi Arabia itself.

Mr. Speaker, what has led to the impression that Canada is subservient to the Americans? The question is deeply disturbing to me and, I am sure, many other members of this House. Obviously, our role at the United Nations has been overlooked by our own media. How else can we explain the lack of media coverage of the positive actions of Yves Fortier at the United Nations?

An hon. member: There is no positive action.

Mr. Reimer: I am not alone in my concern. Dr. John Sigler, political scientist at Carleton University in Ottawa, in response to a question at the external affairs and international trade committee meeting, stated—and I invite my socialist friends to do a little listening for a change. Instead of talking from the seat of their pants, why do they not listen and then speak a little more in informed debate. Dr. Sigler said:

> We do not have someone, as far as I know, in the Canadian media who is an expert on the United Nations, who sits there and systematically has told the story of what has happened. We have all read The New York Times. The French do a much better job.

And then Dr. John Sigler went on to say, and I quote:

> I only learned, frankly, that Fortier had strongly stood up to the Americans on the blockade from (the) cable news network from Atlanta. I never saw any of it here. There was quite a story there about the fact that Canada, France, and the Soviet Union had taken a strong lead in criticizing the United States for moving unilaterally. I do not think I can find that story back in the Canadian media.

Mr. Speaker, nor could any of us. Tragically, our media was not even there to inform us. How could it be that a country, with membership on the Security Council of the United Nations, would not have media representation at such an important juncture in our history? Is our media provincial, only concentrating on pasta demonstrations, or is it a reluctance to report the truth when it goes against the chosen political philosophies of some in the media?

An hon. member: Shame on you.

Mr. Reimer: Surely this must be remedied.

Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with tonight, implicitly at least, is the United Nations Security Council resolution that will come to a vote tomorrow. For the record, let me read into Hansard section 2 of the draft resolution which will be voted on tomorrow at the Security Council:

2. Authorizes Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before January 1,— —or the 15th, which will be decided tomorrow—

1991 fully implements, as set forth in Paragraph 1 above, the foregoing Resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement the Security Council Resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant Resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area;

Accordingly, as I have already mentioned, the Security Council passed, unanimously I might add, resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions, including 661 which imposed strict economic sanctions against Iraq in accordance with article 39 and 41 of the UN Charter.

I would also like to quote from article 42 of the United Nations Charter which states:

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate, or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockades, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations.

It is important to note that article 42 should only be implemented after the economic sanctions of article 41 have been tried. That is exactly what resolution 661 did.

The resolution that will be presented to the Security Council tomorrow reiterates article 42, chapter 7 of the United Nations Charter. Additionally, a majority of member nations on the Security Council have committed themselves to supporting this motion. The Soviets will support it. The French will support it. The British will support it. The Finns will support it. The Americans will support it. So, too, should the Canadians.

Support for the motion before us tonight is a vote for peace and security, not war. It is a vote for international law and order. It is a vote against Saddam Hussein and his armed forces. It is a vote for Canadians still trapped in Iraq. A vote for this resolution before the House and that of the one before the Security Council of the United Nations builds in a pause of goodwill. This pause offers one more opportunity for Iraq to withdraw. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is a vote for the resolution to the Persian Gulf conflict.

It places the entire conflict back into the hands of Saddam Hussein and it is his decision whether it should be resolved peacefully or by other means.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the member and his party are supporting a resolution that would in effect give the UN resolution if passed tomorrow, and there is no doubt that it will pass, authority to the Americans and other member states to use whatever means necessary, whatever type of force necessary, in order to remove Iraq from Kuwait.

• (2020)

In effect, he is saying that this Parliament should support a declaration of war, not as a defensive means, but as a way of removing an aggressor from Kuwait.

I believe that it is important that the member ask himself what precedent is being set here. It is important for Canadians to understand the circumstances which that member across the way and others are suggesting exist to warrant the declaration of war and the potential loss of hundreds of thousands of lives.

We know what the principles were in the first and second wars. We know why the Americans were in Vietnam. We know why they lost. We know why 57,000 Americans lives were lost. A lot of people regret the fact that the Americans went into Vietnam. But what exactly is the principle? What are we trying to defend here by allowing the Americans and others to go to war? Why are we asking Canadian men and women in the Armed Forces to put their lives at risk, to remove an aggressor from Kuwait? What kind of precedent do we have?

That is my question to the member. What kind of precedent will be set here if that is the reason why we would allow member states of the United Nations to declare war or to go to war? Would it mean that in the future, it would be acceptable if the Americans were to invade Panama or another similar country? Would the precedent be set today to allow the Soviet Union or another country to declare war on the Americans?

If we were to have another regime similar to the South African regime that supported and endorsed the system of apartheid, would that be enough? Would that be sufficient reason to allow the declaration of war? I think not. War is brutal. It is ugly. It is hideous. It is the mark of madness to support war. Frankly, I am concerned about the direction this House and the world is going with respect to this particular set of circumstances in the Middle East.

I would like to ask the member: What type of precedent will be set if this particular resolution is passed in the House and at the United Nations?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, there is one point on which I can totally agree with the hon member and that is when he said: "War is brutal. It is ugly. It is hideous". There I totally agree with him. There is no question about that, and no one wants it. We are both saying the same thing.

He went on to ask what precedent was being set. He wanted to know what we were engaging in by putting this motion tonight, and then the Security Council approving the motion before the United Nations tomorrow. Was it a declaration of war.

No, it is not a declaration of war. I have read the resolution. It says that that it will authorize member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, that unless Iraq on or before January 1 or the 15, to be resolved tomorrow, fully implements resolution 660 and all the other 10 resolutions. Then it authorizes them to "use all necessary means to uphold and to implement the Security Council resolution 660".

The member said the only definition or interpretation he places on that is a declaration of war. That is the only one he places on that.

What it also does is send a clear signal to the Government of Iraq: "Look, we are giving you a pause of goodwill. Seize it. You can solve this problem. After all, you started it". The United Nations is saying to Saddam Hussein: "You decided in a classic case of aggression to aggress upon your unsuspecting neighbour. You did that. Now we are saying to you, for six months we will have had economic sanctions and you have not withdrawn".

Then we are saying we are now authorizing all of the member states of which there are many, not just the United States—and we are just one of over 26 others—to use all the necessary means to uphold and to implement the Security Council resolution 660. That is what it says. So, what is the principle? What is the fundamental issue at stake? Well, as I said in my comments, in my opinion the fundamental issue in the Persian Gulf is morality and international behaviour. Iraq broke it. The UN has now put in economic sanctions. The UN is now saying: "Here is another period of time. Think seriously about it because the consequences are severe". That is what we are saying.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the deliberate vagueness of this motion and the motion before the United Nations can only lead a person to conclude that this will authorize this Prime Minister to engage the Canadian Armed Forces against Iraq. I am convinced of that. I am convinced most Canadians believe that will happen. We are tonight dealing with a declaration of war.

I challenge the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley to debate this issue in any place in British Columbia that he chooses. They will stone him off the platform, if he has the guts to take up that challenge.

I am also convinced of how serious this is and how deceptive the Prime Minister is, that people in Canada will have to go into the streets in order to stop Canadian Armed Forces from engaging in a military action in Iraq. That is how concerned I am. That is how concerned people in the opposition are that there will be a betrayal by this Prime Minister. He will use the Canadian Armed Forces in Iraq and he will use them without any further consent from this House of Commons. Fourteen per cent of the people in this country support this government. Everyone else holds them in nothing but contempt. It is earned contempt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I don't know whether there is a question there. That was a comment.

I think I will allow the hon. member a short rebuttal.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, just a very brief response. I am amazed at how our socialist friends can always find the right statistic to quote and all the right ones to ignore. When it comes to this issue, he uses the one statistic that is in his favour. What about looking at another that we saw on the CBC news last night, if we watched the CBC national news. It said that if we were working in concert with the United Nations, as we have from day one, then 67 per cent of Canadians support that decision. Why did he not quote that 67 per cent instead of selectively looking at one other statistic that has nothing to do with the issue before us tonight?

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have sat in the Chamber all day and listened to the various comments made, and I trust the public is being instructed in precisely what is happening here. It may be difficult because I must confess to a certain amount of confusion myself as to what the points are that have been made without belittling or denigrating any of my colleagues. There are a number of issues that are under consideration here.

What I would like to do in the next 20 minutes or so is to just look at where we are now, what we have all approved in this Parliament of Canada, what it is we are debating here today, my position, some of the reasons I take that position, the position that my party has taken, and then I would like to cast ahead a little bit to the future.

Without reading the motion to which we agreed and was passed in the House, this is the point at which we are now, that this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, that it demand the immediate unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and that it affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's action in the Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2. This was at a point in time when that automatically included resolutions 660, 661, 663, and 664. I want to talk a little later about those resolutions.

We went on to say: "and for the sending of members, vessels and aircraft of the Canadian Forces to participate in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula, and in recognition of the seriousness of this matter, accept the undertaking of the government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian forces in and around the Arabian Peninsula."

I am not sure right now whether that is the debate that is going on. I do not believe it is. I believe there has been a disclaimer that that is the debate that is going on.

Let me move on now to what I believe we are discussing. I think there are three things before us today. There is the motion that has been put forward by the government, as amended by the Liberal Party and as further amended by the NDP. There is the United Nations resolution to which that motion refers, and that has been discussed here today. Then there is an unspoken thing that we are really thinking about, but we do not really know how to describe it because we are predicting the future. The only thing right about predicting the future is that you will probably be wrong.

We are looking at what happens after. After what? The way I see things with the positioning of forces that we have in the Persian Gulf now, with 26 nations, we are looking at 500,000 men and women, 115 ships and 1,600 aircraft. It is a large force, and it is there for what reason? I think the objective is Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait, to begin with, but I think the follow-on is important: with enough effective constraints being placed upon it so that it will not menace its neighbours again. I think that is the ultimate objective.

I am sure the government has asked itself questions about where we go from here, if indeed through the numbers that the government has this resolution is approved and is subsequently approved by the Security Council. I would like to have some indication of how our force is going to be used. Is it going to continue in the interdiction blockade role? Are we going to take more participatory action? Are we going to stay longer when Hussein gets out of Kuwait? Surely it has to end either by peaceful means or by other means with Saddam Hussein getting out of Kuwait.

I do not know the answers to those questions, but those are questions that are called up by the motion put forward by the government and by the resolution that will be put forward and discussed in the United Nations tomorrow.

My party has rejected the motion put forward by the government for a very simple reason as discussed by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. It is because we are giving a blank cheque for subsequent resolutions of the United Nations. We have always supported the United Nations. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my party has always been behind the actions of the United Nations, but only after discussions.

It has taken us from August 2 to September 25 to have the 10 resolutions that we now have. Presumably there was a lot of discussion. How can we now say: "Yes, and all follow-on discussions we will give you blank agreement for?" What we are about to embark on, whether it is this month, next month, six months or a year from now, deserves much more discussion and debate than that.

I am sure the public listened to resolutions 660, 661, 662, et cetera. We have now a total of 10 resolutions passed by the United Nations, all voted on and agreed to by Canada. Time does not permit that we go through them all, but I took the time to look at them and tried to relate them to what it is we are trying to do in the United Nations and in Iraq.

I believe the United Nations action that has taken place so far has been a model of the way the United Nations was supposed to operate and had not been able to operate because of the difficulty of the larger members of the Security Council not being able to agree.

In other words, it was the unique and remarkable unanimity of the Security Council that has allowed us to get these resolutions that we now have. We began first of all by identifying the aggressor. This was done on August 2 with resolution 660. It stated that there was a determination that a breach of international peace and security had taken place, and they condemned the Iraq invasion.

The second sequence in this drill is a call for compliance. This was achieved in resolution 661, which stated that Iraq had not complied with resolution 660 and affirmed the right of individual and collective self-defence under chapter 7 of the United Nations charter.

The next procedure was the declaration of non-military sanctions. That too was achieved by resolution 661, where it was stated that there would be an imposition of strict economic sanctions on Iraq until it complied with resolution 660.

Then the next step in the procedure was to call for compliance. This was done on August 9, a week after the invasion, and the resolution said that there was a decision that the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq was null and void and demanded that Iraq rescind its declaration of the annexation.

The next step was military sanctions. This was achieved by resolution 665 that called upon maritime forces to use such measures as may be necessary to halt all maritime shipping in order to prevent cargoes from reaching Iraq.

The next level is force. That is agreed. The next level has to be force, but only if these measures that we have discussed and that have been debated in the United Nations from August 2 to pretty well the end of September do not work.

My major concern with the resolution of the United Nations is that I believe it is too early. I have difficulty understanding why the deadline of January 15 has been used. I agree there has to be a deadline, but I would like to spend a few moments talking about the reason I have difficulty with that deadline.

It is agreed that military sanctions can work. I am not going to go through a great litany, but it goes back a long time. Britain maintained naval blockades of the main French ports during the Napoleonic Wars and they were successful. During the U.S. Civil War the union navy was unable to do a lot of things, but it was able to prevent the south from exporting cotton and getting cash so that it could buy weapons. That was a factor in determining the outcome of the Civil War. During World War I, the allies blockaded German ports, stopping supplies of war material and food from reaching the Kaiser's realm. By the end of the war in 1918, I think it was agreed by everybody that the Germans were hungry and they were short of munitions.

There were other examples where sanctions did not work. I refer now to the invasion of Ethiopia by Italy in 1935, where the League of Nations did impose sanctions for two years and they did not work.

A set of rules has been worked out by the experts addressing the question as to whether or not these sanctions will be able to work. The determinants are not difficult. There are four questions that you use in the litmus test, if you like.

The first one is that the country under embargo must have a weak economy. Iraq is a semi-developed country. It relies on its foreign exchange for the export of oil. It imports three-quarters of its food and most of its manufactured goods. As we stand in the House today, the Iraqis have spent billions of dollars. They have difficulty. They cannot export their oil, and their foreign exchange is being spent at a rate that they cannot replace. Therefore we answer yes to the first litmus test.

• (2040)

Second, there should be a relatively small number of geographical or financial points which international action can control. Iraq is surrounded by countries that are basically friendly to us, with one exception. It has 29 miles of coastline and is looking for more. Because of the confluence and the nature of the Persian Gulf, the Gulf of Oman, and the fairly narrow Strait of Hormuz, it is an ideal country in which to operate economic sanctions.

Another test is that its domestic political conditions must a little shaky. I do not think I need to go on about that. Any country that has to use chemical warfare on its own citizens to keep them in their place would come under the guise of being a fairly shaky country.

Finally, and I think this is very important, the leaders of the international community should be as clear as possible about their own objectives, which must be widely supported. I think we have that. Certainly in my knowledge of warfare and history, this is one of the first times we have had such world order being put together by 26 countries to try to deter the aggression of another country. Force may well be necessary. I agree with those who say that we may have to use force. That is why you have armed forces, so that you can if you have to use force.

Inherent in that statement and inherent in the possibility of new world order, where we may have a United Nations policeman made up of 26 countries and all these forces to which I made reference, it is incumbent on those who do the ordering of force to try every means in the book to make sure that they have tried every possible measure, means, and avenue to ensure that force has to be used.

The embargo started in the middle of August. Wherever I turn and whatever I hear, it is indicated to me that it is going to take six months as a minimum for the embargo to bite, that is to hurt Iraq. It could take a year as a maximum before we know where we are in this situation. We will not be at six months until the middle of February. A year from August is going to be August 1991. This is why I have difficulty with the ultimatum date of January 15. It it were March 15, I may not be making the same kind of presentation this evening.

Let's have a look at some of the costs. I see the Minister of National Defence is here. This not meant as rhetoric and it is not meant to get at the government. I understand how difficult it is to cost an operation exactly. The peacetime cost to Canada is anywhere from $1 million, to $3 million, to $5 million or thereabouts per day. The real cost is in the tension, although the morale is good, created in the country by having forces there. That is the real cost.

How long can we sustain this? We can sustain the peacetime operation as long as we want. We have to suffer, as indeed we have seen last Friday. The cost of force, whether or not it works, is a tremendous estimate. It is anywhere from 250,000 casualties on both sides, 65,000 deaths, and between $65 billion and $100 billion. God knows what will happen to the oil fields and the economies and where it will stop.

World War I started with a small scrimmage on June 28, 1914 when a nationalist killed Archduke Ferdinand of Austria. I do not have to tell the House how big that became. World War II started from a fairly small thing. It started small and ended with 50 million people being killed. I am not conjuring up that kind of an image for this kind of an operation, but the implications of force are fantastic.

If I may be permitted a personal note, in an Armistice Day presentation in my riding we spoke about the remembrance of those who had given their lives in sacrifice to their country. We also talked about those in the Middle East who were preparing to fight for liberty, peace, and freedom. We all hoped that their sacrifice would be in the preparation and not in the giving.

There was a couple there, Mr. and Mrs. McGurk, whose son, Darren, was in the Middle East. Mrs. McGurk went through a terrible evening listening to this. I spoke to her afterward and assured her that this Parliament would make sure that everything in the world was done to have a peaceful settlement of this operation.

My son is an RMC graduate. He happens to be in Montreal now, but he may well be in the next contingent to go to the Middle East. He belonged to a band at RMC, The Happy Days. The lead guitarist in that band is the squadron navigator for the force in the Middle East, Lieutenant Roger Boulet, and I know him quite well.

Another member of the band serves in submarines and he may be going. I talked to him three or four days ago. His name is Chris McLaughlin. He said: "What do you think is going to happen?" I said: "Well, we are all hoping for a peaceful settlement".

In looking at the human dimension of this, there can be no greater dimension and there can be no greater motivation than to try within every single perimeter that we can put on ourselves, in Canada, in Parliament, in the United Nations, and in the world, to try to settle this peacefully.

Few of us, here in the House, have lived through the horrors of war, but most of us know about them. I think it is safe to say that democratic wars, as just as they are, are not small; they are large. They are not short; they are long. They are also bloody.

In all the considerations that the government has, all the motivations—which I am assuming and I am positive are for the right reasons—I do not subscribe to the idea that we are supporting one nation. That is an insult to the 26 nations that are there. I do not want to subscribe to that. I think we are there for the right reasons, but I implore members of the government to look at the human dimension and to seriously consider what they are doing when they stand up to vote. If they all voted, they could, in numbers, pass this motion. This is probably the biggest decision they will make in this Parliament.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I found the hon. member's speech very helpful and thorough. I certainly agree with a lot of the ideas he was expressing including, in his words which were identical to the words I used in the House two hours ago, that we must still hope that there can be a peaceful resolution to this. I sincerely believe that the steps that are being deliberately taken, step by step, is the way to proceed in trying to achieve that.

The hon. member made many observations. I just want to return to one, where he was trying to clarify the meaning of the UN resolution. It struck me, while listening to him, that we had not really progressed in the debate tonight, beyond the exchange that the hon. member for Mount Royal and I had about two hours ago on whether or not this meaning is vague.

The motion refers to resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions. After that earlier exchange and my discussions this afternoon with senior people at External Affairs and elsewhere, and continuing to be concerned that there would be vagueness or uncertainty about this, I spoke this evening with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He said that he will not support a resolution or resolutions that he has not seen and he will not ask anyone else to do that. One cannot reasonably ask people, including hon. members of the House, to discuss resolutions that do not exist or that no one has seen. This is not what the government is suggesting by its motion before this House. The government is referring to Security Council resolutions which exist or are before us, including the resolution which will be addressed at the Security Council tomorrow. No one has ever suggested that this government will not endeavour to return to this House in the future when the need for that arises. I would say that again because one of the hon. members opposite—.

• (2050)

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Let's get the Minister of Defence to say that.

Mr. Boyer: I make that comment in response to the approach which the hon. member with his own distinguished military career has raised in this House. I hope that clarifies the point.

Mr. Nunziata: It doesn't. It doesn't clarify anything.

Mr. Mifflin: I do thank the hon. member for those comments and I am delighted that he does share this view. After all it is a very key consideration. If this has clarified it and if that is the true meaning of it, then certainly I am at least more sympathetic to the resolution as it stands. There are still some problems with it but that certainly was one of the major problems.

Again, if I could be permitted, the term 'all necessary means' has been equated by some to mean immediate force. I do not believe that, quite frankly. I am worried about the date. I am worried that there will be another debate. The hon. member, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has assured me that there would be. I will take that as face value. I feel a lot more secure since he has mentioned that, and I mean that genuinely and sincerely.

All necessary means could mean a lot of things. It could mean force in the middle of September next year. There is an important element to this term and let it not be lost on the public that this surely means something to Saddam Hussein as well. I think in fairness to the government and in fairness to the resolution itself, surely that has to be one of the reasons for that term. I do not quarrel with the term. We may eventually have to use it. I do quarrel somewhat with the time.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not need to tell members of this House that there is a divergence of opinion amongst Canadians on our involvement in the Middle East crisis situation. There are those who would not support any military action of any kind and I understand and appreciate their view. All I can say is that it is not my view. I think it is the view espoused by the members of the New Democratic Party, but it was not the view espoused by the members of the Liberal Party when they supported the resolution on October 23, 1990. The member was one of those who did support that resolution which made our position very clear. We support the United Nations actions. We condemn the actions of Iraq. We condemn the invasion of Kuwait.

Our difficulty and problem is what we do in light of that condemnation. Our colleagues in the New Democratic Party did not share in that condemnation so they really have no issue to raise in this debate. Surely we must appeal to our colleagues in the Liberal Party to continue to support not the government but Canada in this situation. We call upon all members to support the efforts of Canada because what is at stake is the peaceful settlement of the dispute. It is not governments that are on trial. It is not ministers of defence, it is the process of peaceful settlement.

How are we going to contribute to that process? I cannot believe that the member believes defeat of a resolution proposed in this House will contribute to the process of peaceful settlement. He saw, as I did, our service people sail to the Middle East. He knows the commitment that he made. Surely he will ask himself: What can I do to support the commitment that our men in the armed forces are making.

Does he really believe that defeat of this resolution now before the House will help? We still reserve the right to make the final decision on what our forces do in the Middle East, that is the decision that will always remain in Canada. He knows that. Why would he stand there and attempt to defeat this resolution which is really in support of Canada and our Canadian forces?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend from Halifax West, whom I have known for many years. He is not normally this garrulous. I am surprised at his question to me because the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has indeed suggested and clarified the difficulty I had. When I read these terms, it is the clarification the House has been seeking to ensure the compliance of the Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions up to now, that is up to October 28. He said that, if I understood him correctly, and that the support should not be interpreted as approval of the use of the Canadian forces for offensive action until there will be further consultation. He definitely said that. So, that is the subject of our amendment. What we are trying to do—

Mr. Nunziata: He includes tomorrow's resolution as well.

Mr. Mifflin: That is where we differ, then. If tomorrow's resolution is included, then that is indeed where we differ. It is a shame that it has taken six hours of debate to sort this issue out.

In response to my friend from Halifax West, I could assume that he would agree with this as well.

I find it somewhat difficult again that there has been this kind of confusion in the House. I will say to the public who are watching that these interpretations are so important that perhaps it is necessary for the Parliament of Canada to debate it word for word, sentence by sentence, phrase by phrase, so that the public does indeed appreciate what is happening. I only wish that we had had this debate before we committed our forces. Those are the kinds of questions that we could have asked and the whole operation itself could have been thought out a little more clearly. The answers to some of the questions that we are now asking could have been at least anticipated.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly, because in spite of what I thought was an effort to try to clarify this, it seems there still may be one point that is not clear.

What I said four or five minutes ago was that the government is referring in the resolution to the Security Council resolutions which exist or are before us, including the resolution that will be debated by the Security Council tomorrow. Whereas the Liberal Party amendment, I believe, refers to the date of November 28, which is today. Clearly, the intention—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think that I am certainly confused by what is going on here. What we seem to get from one Liberal member, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, is a very clear statement that the Liberal Party is opposed to this resolution.

Now, we hear from the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, in response to the parliamentary secretary's assurances that it is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Hunter: I am trying, if you would give me a chance, to clarify for the Canadian public, and I think that is the very least we can do when the issue we are talking about is going to war. If there are divisions in the House, I think they should be exposed.

I would like the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception to please indicate how he will be voting if the Liberal amendment fails? Is he going to vote in a different way than the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure why the hon. member is so exercised about this.

An hon. member: There's the enemy right there.

Mr. Mifflin: She is exercised at the government, I hope.

I think I made it very clear in my comments that I am not going to support a motion that says I signed a blank cheque, irrespective of what has been said. The hon. member is asking me if I would approve the understood version of the government's motion, that is, to approve the UN security resolution, whatever the next one is? Is that the question she is asking?

• (2100)

I think I made it very clear. I have great reservations with that. Normally I do not support something on which I have those reservations.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have just one very short comment and question for my colleague.

First of all, I want to congratulate our gallant colleague for his remarks earlier today. I want to bring just one issue to the attention of my colleague. He indicated in his remarks that there might be a point in the future, regrettably, where force will be necessary, but we have not reached that point yet.

I think he said that first we must do everything that we can in order to ensure that force is not used.

I just want to remind the House of an expression used by our leader earlier today when he said—

[Translation]

"Every possible effort must be made to find a peaceful solution".

[English]

In other words, we must turn the world upside down if we have to in order to try to find a peaceful solution. To me, those words were very well put. In other words, we must not spare anything. We must try everything that we can. I think my colleague has told us that we have not reached that point yet. I want him to confirm that very clearly to all members, particularly the one who was asking a question a moment ago, obviously not having listened as well as she could have, and perhaps for all Canadians, as well, who want to be sure what it is that we stand for.

I am sure I am clear, but at least I want that member who did not hear correctly to be sure as well.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, you have been very indulgent and I would like to thank you for that. I do not believe that we have reached the point when we have to use force.

Yet I cannot predict the events. Knowing what I know now, projecting it into the future and relying on the economic sanctions that we are using as a tool, I do not believe we will be ready by January 15.

I am going to end by once more saying that history has shown that democratic wars are not short and small. They are long, big and bloody.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, being able to observe this debate both in the House and as it is being broadcast, I can assure you and the Canadian public that this is a worth-while debate.

I have some concern about the context in which the resolution we are debating here and the amendments that have been placed by the two opposition parties to the motion that has been put forward by the government. I think it would be important to read the motion that has been put forward by the government:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of the third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

Canada is a relatively fortunate country. We have little direct military threat. We have great opportunity because of that to play a part in the world that other countries are not allowed to play because of their circumstance and the region within which they are located.

We have an opportunity to work towards a more stable and peaceful world and a better international order. Typically, we have done this through multilateral agreements and alliances. We participate as a country in collective defence arrangements with like-minded nations. We participate, as an example, in NATO. We participate in NORAD.

As a matter of fact, although being large in mass, Canada would not be considered a country of large military capacity. Therefore, we rely on the support of other nations for our own security. We join with other nations to have a secure Canada. I think it is important to understand that in the context of today and in the context of the aggression that Iraq has perpetrated upon Kuwait.

Canada has had opportunities to become involved in resolving disputes. The Canadian forces have joined in some 26 different peacekeeping operations in the world. Some 80,000 members of the Canadian forces have been involved in peacekeeping operations since the Second World War. Canada has participated in all but one of the United Nations peacekeeping missions. As a matter of fact, 78 members of the Canadian Armed Forces have been killed while participating in peacekeeping duties.

We have to take a look at the multilateral operations for collective security that we are discussing today. The last opportunity to be involved under the flag of the United Nations was the Korean war. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that because of the increase in tensions and east-west mistrust and lack of confidence since the Korean war, the United Nations has not been able to act with strength, concert or unity up until this time.

What allowed the United Nations to act this time with the strength it has shown and with the principles that are embedded in its charter for the first time in 40 years was the demise of the cold war. That came about because like-minded nations had the NATO alliance which was strong and steadfast and which assisted in bringing about the end of the cold war.

When we view the current crisis, the original dispute was about production quotas of oil. This escalated as Iraq revived some old territorial claims against Kuwait. As negotiations did not seem to progress, Saddam Hussein started a build-up of his military might along the border of Iraq and Kuwait. This dispute became the subject of intense negotiations and efforts on behalf of the countries in the region. As a matter of fact, Saddam Hussein assured President Mubarak of Egypt that there would not be an invasion of Kuwait and shortly thereafter when the Iraqi negotiators walked out of the negotiations, Iraq launched its massive invasion of Kuwait.

Since that time Iraq has proclaimed a comprehensive and internal merger between Iraq and Kuwait, offering a series of justifications for its behaviour.

I have heard members from the opposition talk about the action of the United States in Panama. I suggest to them that the United States is not and has not annexed Panama. I suggest to them that the United Nations has withdrawn from Panama. I could suggest to the hon. members that they are comparing apples and oranges and that their visceral distrust and their visceral hatred of our friends across the border sometimes allows them to be carried away with their rhetoric.

But what kind of a nation are we dealing with when we are dealing with Iraq? The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception just spoke. He identified four points around which he built his argument as to why the sanctions should be allowed to continue and why he believed that they would work in the long run because, as he said, he would accept the use of force reluctantly if there was more time to apply sanctions.

I suggest that his argument would have some justification with a lot of countries and a lot of regimes. But I think the third point in his argument was that they must have a shaky political regime. He suggested that that was the case in Iraq.

Perhaps that would be the case in ordinary circumstances but when you have a leader who uses chemical weapons on his own people; when you have a leader who entered an eight-year war, where a whole generation of teenagers between the ages of 16 to 25 were removed permanently from the population; when you have a leader who refuses to recognize the well-being of his own people; when you have a leader who dominates and controls his people by summary execution; when you have a leader who does not rely on what we would consider to be ordinary norms, then I would say that unless the hon. member really believes Saddam Hussein has a greater feeling for the Iraqi people than he does for the occupation of Kuwait, he cannot accept the fact that sanctions will work on Saddam Hussein as they would on other people.

I draw this to his attention because I know the member understands force and he understands and has said that he would reluctantly accept the use of force if there had been a proven time for sanctions to work.

It is important to understand what we are dealing with. There has to be some limit to the drive that we have seen for the military dominance of the region by Iraq. There has to be a demonstrated willingness by the rest of the world to put a stop to it.

There is a calloused disregard for human life that is not to be accepted in our society or other societies. These 10 resolutions are the most powerful statements of the United Nations Charter since its inception. I believe what the Government of Canada and like-minded nations have done has added to the support and the strength of the United Nations.

For the first time since its inception, the true characteristics that were enunciated in the United Nations Charter to provide peace, security and stability in the world have been enunciated in those 10 resolutions against Iraq.

I want to go on about our own response. Canada's response has traditionally been to provide forces to multinational organizations, and always in the pursuit of a more peaceful and stable world. That is what we debated in this House earlier. That is what the majority of the members of this House agreed should take place.

I would suggest that the speed in which Canada responded, both with its naval and air operations, which were set up under very challenging circumstances, are an appropriate response for a middle-sized power such as Canada.

Members of the House and the public should be aware that although our naval force in the Gulf makes up only 3 per cent of the naval assets in the gulf region, it is doing 22 per cent of the work. As of yesterday, they had been involved in some 1,000 interdictions and hailings and they have been involved in some 8 boardings. The men and women who are serving there, not missing one day on station, are doing a superb job and they are doing it with the professionalism that we all expect of them. When one looks at the CF-18 squadron, which is located in Qatar, one recognizes its ability to change its daily activity and the numbers of sorties, to constantly keep from 17 to 18 aircraft in operation in a difficult climate and provide cover for ships within that Persian Gulf region.

When we look at the buildup of the Iraqi army, we have to ask, why is it there? As King Fahd said, why was the army built up on the border of Saudi Arabia? Why was the Iraqi army there? Saudi Arabia was not going to attack Iraq so, obviously, one must ask the question, why? I think the answer is quite obvious. There was a determined pattern in Iraq's aggression against Kuwait and it has continued to work toward a military dominance of the region, which is resisted by other countries in that region.

We look at the difference between the conflict, as Canada sees it. We have been opposed to conflict in other areas; we have brought forward resolutions, stating that opposition; we have been involved in peacemaking. I have trouble with some members who would say that peacemaking is not part of peacekeeping tradition. It flows, naturally, in a democracy that is proud of its peacekeeping heritage, as we should be, that peacemaking also is an important part of Canada's heritage and our tradition and is consistent with bringing about a more stable and peaceful world.

When I take a look at the resolution that I see here, and in the United Nations, the resolution commits us to no change in our current status. I hear the members on the other side talking about blank cheques, but I tell you that it commits us to no change in our operations. What it does is send a signal to Saddam Hussein that those countries which have joined together in the United Nations to condemn his aggression, starting with UN resolution 660 and the other nine resolutions that have followed to this point, will not allow him and the Iraqi army to occupy a small country which had legitimate borders, just as Canada's borders are legitimate, which were invaded, occupied and annexed.

I have a lot of trouble with the argument that we should wait before applying more pressure, because what this resolution that will be voted on tomorrow at the United Nations does is give a signal to Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi people and the army of Iraq, that their future is in their own hands, that the world has condemned their action, that the world will respect the legitimate borders of Kuwait, and that that effort and that conviction by the world powers can only lead to one thing: either Saddam Hussein believes that he has to remove himself or he believes that the world will take whatever steps are necessary to restore the legitimate borders of Kuwait.

I believe that the UN resolution is appropriate to the traditions of the UN, particularly to the UN Charter. Obviously, it is not just my belief or Canada's belief, it is a belief of the assembled nations in the United Nations. It is not U.S. led, as our friends in the New Democratic Party would say. That is an affront to all the other nations which are presently in the gulf, all the other nations which have voted to condemn Iraq, all the other nations which are going to vote in support of the UN resolution tomorrow.

Mr. Keyes: Wrong.

Mr. McKnight: I see the member from Toronto is talking from his seat. His party has consistently said to the government: "Why don't you co-operate with the United Nations?" Tomorrow we are going to co-operate with the United Nations. The Liberal Party is condemning the government for doing just what it suggested we should do.

I suggest this is a difficult time. I really have concern about some of the members in the Official Opposition. I know they find the resolution that has been put forward by their leader difficult to support. They have to understand that any change in the mandate of the Canadian forces deployment in the Persian Gulf will only be consistent with the capabilities of the Canadian forces. I can assure hon. members that if there is a change in the mandate, it will be raised in the House of Commons if and when that time comes.

What the hon. members are saying now to the government is to assume—

Mr. Caccia: You didn't do it last summer.

Mr. McKnight: They say we did not do it the last time. We had a debate. The hon. member from Newfoundland referred to the debate. I know the hon. member from Toronto was not able to take part in it. It would be interesting reading, I am sure, if he had.

As things currently stand, the government along with the people of Canada, as it has from the start, hopes there is a peaceful resolution to this aggression.

Mr. Caccia: Declaring war.

Mr. McKnight: The members talk about declaring war. I have one final point. I suggest to them and to the members in the New Democratic Party that war was declared on August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait. The world is now condemning that action and is prepared to legitimize the borders of Kuwait. I ask them to support the government in its efforts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have five questioners in 10 minutes. I will start with the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James, then South West Nova, the hon. member for Portneuf, Davenport and Victoria.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, all of us want a peaceful solution. There is no doubt about that. However, we have to live with this resolution that is on the floor.

What this resolution demands of us parliamentarians is that we endorse the use of force. That raises the question that I would like to put to the Minister of National Defence. How far do you go with this particular kind of force and to what end?

With respect to the use of force, does the hon. Minister of National Defence tolerate or endorse any kind of force? Is this government in support of wiping out the entire country of Iraq? Is the government prepared to level Baghdad? Is it prepared to wipe out maybe tens of thousands, if not scores of thousands of Iraqis and Kuwaitis? Is that the position of this government? I think it behoves this government to make itself absolutely clear as to how far it is prepared to go with this kind of force. I do not think the government should be asking us to buy some pig in the poke. When you ask us to use force, you better be very explicit how far you are prepared to go.

The other thing is to what end? Is it your end by using force that you are to settle this dispute once and for all? Does this government think for a moment that it can wipe out Hussein who is a despot, a despicable creature? Does it believe that if it wipes out all his generals and armies, that will be the end, there will be nothing more, the disputes will be settled, calm will set in and there will be peace? Or do you think perhaps that that would just simply—

Mr. McKnight: Do you want an answer?

Mr. Harvard: —deliver instability in the region? In fact, maybe the confrontation will actually spread.

It is incumbent upon this minister to come absolutely clean.

Mr. McKnight: If the hon. member's logic matched his rhetoric, I would not stand up and answer the question because it would be very difficult.

The member for Winnipeg—St. James talked about the use of force. I want to read to him the draft of the UN Security Council resolution. Point 2 authorizes member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq, on or before January 15, 1991, fully implements, as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the foregoing resolutions: To use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660, and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security to the area.

No one wants war. The hon. member throws his hands up and goes like this.

An hon. member: Then start answering.

Mr. McKnight: I ask the members opposite: What is your alternative?

An hon. member: Economic sanctions.

Mr. McKnight: What is your alternative?

Some hon. members: Sanctions.

Mr. McKnight: I hear the bark and the cries of "sanctions, sanctions". I want to ask the hon. members how long we should allow Kuwait—

Mr. Keyes: As long as it takes.

Mr. McKnight: I see. One of the Liberal members says "As long as it takes". Two years? Three years? While Iraq occupies a sovereign nation? What the hon. member is saying is that the use of the United Nations and the original Charter of the United Nations to bring about peace and security in the world—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I was very kind with the hon. member. He asked a couple of questions. There are other people here who would like to ask the hon. minister some questions. Would you please allow them to ask and get an answer to their questions. The hon. member for South West Nova.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question will be quite short because I know there are others who want to speak. I do not think there is anybody in this House who has any dispute with the process of the United Nations to date.

The government is proposing a motion to go with subsequent resolutions, one of which may be passed tomorrow. One cannot prejudge what those 15 people in the Security Council will do tomorrow.

The government wants us to pass a draft resolution to give it sanction to go ahead. It can then come back tomorrow and say: "We passed that resolution here in this House". I think Canadians are smarter than that.

On top of that, this wording is vague. I do not want to repeat the minister but he referred to No. 2 in the resolution. I want to ask him about "to use all necessary means to uphold the existing and subsequent resolutions". This is the part that galls me. Let us pass that resolution. Let the UN pass it tomorrow, if it goes in this form, to restore international peace and security in the area.

• (2130)

I ask the minister: Are our troops there today for that reason? Is that what the Order in Council said? Or, is the minister going to bring in a new Order in Council next week to change the reasons why our troops are there? There are 26 member states in the gulf. Any one of them can use their interpretation of this and start the war that we are talking carelessly about here. The economic sanctions that were put in place at the UN have not been given the time. I ask him that question for the sake of Canadians out there.

The Order in Council said that it was for economic sanctions in the shipping. I cannot see that we should be even debating future resolutions before they are even passed in the UN. We should not even be talking about restoring international peace when our troops are not over there. They are only 3 per cent. Yes, I know they are good troops. I come from an area where they are trained. I am all for that training.

I think Canadians have a right to know why they are over there. I thought it was to keep the economic sanctions, not for a proposed resolution that may not get passed.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it clear, as I concluded my address, that if there were a change in the mandate of the Canadian Forces we would have it raised in the House. I do not know what else I could say to the hon. member.

We have indicated that we will provide an opportunity for further debate if there is a change in the mandate of the Canadian Forces. What we are asking the House, and what we would have expected of the hon. members opposite, would be to support the United Nations and the charter that founded that organization, and not to abuse this opportunity provided by the government after there was a request.

A request came from the opposition suggesting that there should be a debate and the government said yes, we would welcome this debate. We have become involved in the debate, and now the members of the opposition are saying that the debate is taking place at an inopportune time, that this is not a good time for this debate.

I would suggest that the time for the debate and the support of the members in this House should be concentrated on the support of the United Nations which, for the first time in 40 years, has been able to bring the member states together, and take a stand that is totally consistent with the charter on which it was founded.

I would expect hon. members to support the government and the men and women who are serving the Canadian forces, to support the United Nations Charter, and to support what the United Nations wishes to do with the world, that is make it a more stable and peaceful place. I cannot believe that the members opposite do not wish to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): During the week of November 13 to 17, Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to visit the Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf along with my colleagues from Victoria and Labrador. I was able to see for myself that the morale of our troops was good and that they were doing an outstanding job. I also had the firm impression that the military are fully conscious of their role and of the significance of their presence there.

When we came back last week, we three decided to hold a small press conference and, in the last paragraph of the release we all agreed on, we said: "We urge the government and all parties to take a unified approach so that the opinion of Canadians on the international scene will carry more weight and so that our troops in the gulf and our team with the United Nations will have the full support they deserve".

I would like to know whether the minister agrees with me and my two opposition colleagues to say that it is of the utmost importance at this time to obtain the support of all members of Parliament so that the Canadian position will be clearly heard throughout the world and that, above all, our troops, the men and women now stationed in the gulf area, will have the clear impression that all Canadians and particularly their Parliament are behind them.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: I agree, Mr. Speaker, with my colleague. I compliment him on taking the time from his recess, along with two colleagues, to visit the Canadian troops in the Persian Gulf area. I want to thank him on their behalf for that effort.

What I think is important is what my colleague concluded with. By putting forward this resolution and asking for support of the United Nations sanctions and United Nations actions, what we were hoping to do would be to show Saddam Hussein that Canada among the majority of countries in the Security Council was—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it might be a bit presumptuous to suggest that this question and answer period began at 9.20 p.m. and it is now 9.35 p.m. We are looking at 15 minutes. The government decided on a deadline here. I gather there are a number of approved speakers who would like to make speeches. If we could limit the period to strictly 10 minutes, we could then accommodate the established group of speakers in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say that it was because it was the Minister of National Defence that I felt I should extend the questions and comments for another couple of minutes.

I am at your disposal. I have one more questioner, and that would be it for the Minister of National Defence. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to be brief. By using the United Nations and gathering support from the world for increased pressure and condemnation of the action is an important part in getting Saddam Hussein to recognize the world is against his aggression in Kuwait.

What the members opposite are doing is giving him comfort. What they are saying is that they are not against his aggression in Kuwait, and they do not support—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: —the removal of Saddam Hussein from Kuwait.

Mr. Nunziata: You are a war monger.

Mr. McKnight: The member says that I am a war monger. I draw to his attention that the United Nations, which they say they support, is taking an action to remove an aggressor from a smaller country. Members opposite are saying that the United Nations should not be supported in its action, and the Government of Canada is saying that it should be supported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, but I do not want to abuse the rules. We are running out of time, so I will defer to a later opportunity.

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to use up just a moment of the House's time but, in conformity with what we have done in the past, I want to indicate that after the next speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West, other Liberal members tonight will be speaking in two successive 10-minute slots for the rest of the evening, if that is agreeable to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has made a speech and is still in the House it would be interesting if we could extend the question period. Other members who will take the floor will certainly have interesting comments to make, but if we ask questions to our colleagues we will get nothing but rhetoric and their answers will not be as specific as those of the minister. I wonder if it would be possible, with the agreement of my colleagues on both sides, to continue to ask questions to the minister.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

• (2140)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No. There is no consent. The hon. member for Hamilton West has the floor on debate.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite ironic that we are prepared to ask the Minister of Defence very important questions instead of asking other members across the way. We achieved almost unanimous consent until the NDP decided we did not want to ask any more questions of the Minister of Defence. That is intolerable.

The Prime Minister declared while speaking on the motion dispatching Canadian troops to the Persian Gulf on September 24, that Canadians have never looked for a free ride and would not begin to. I want to begin my remarks with a plea to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Defence to exercise patience, to re-examine our role in the Persian Gulf. Take a step back.

Unlike governments before him, the Prime Minister's refusal to recall Parliament once our troops were given their orders further illustrates the Prime Minister's unilateral and cavalier attitude toward Canadian public opinion. That action has brought discredit on this country, which has turned a country once highly praised for seeking peaceful solutions to world problems into a subservient partner of American militarism.

This House will remember that even recently deposed Margaret Thatcher recalled the British Parliament in order to deal with the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq; the French National Assembly in Paris was similarly recalled, but not our Parliament, not our Prime Minister. He was in Kennebunkport, Maine, with George Bush, absorbing, agreeing, and then regurgitating the policies of the American way.

I wanted to speak on this matter earlier this fall, but the debate was extremely short, despite pledges that the House would give ample time and opportunity to discuss the matter. Part of that earlier motion before this House called on Parliament to affirm its support for resolutions adopted by the United Nations Security Council, which imposed sanctions against Iraq over the invasion and occupation of Kuwait. I supported those resolutions. The actions of the Iraqis are reprehensible and are to be condemned. Sanctions are a necessary component of forcing Iraq out of the sovereign state of Kuwait. However, I do not support the resolution which will go before the United Nations Security Council tomorrow, nor do I support the blank cheque, through this blanket motion before us tonight in the House.

In fact, for 18 of the 20 minutes I listened to the Minister of National Defence I did not have much argument with his speech until the last couple of minutes when he enunciated, and made it quite clear that we had to support the resolution, referring to the last three words, "and subsequent resolutions".

Canadians are simply looking to the Minister of National Defence and the Conservative Party to spell out the end of the resolution. That is what the motion by my colleague is prepared to do.

The resolution which will be voted on tomorrow in the Security Council demands that Iraq withdraw from Kuwait by January 15, 1991. It "authorizes member states—to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolutions 660 and, subsequent resolutions and"—this is a caveat, "to restore international peace and security in the area". Members of this House will know that Canadians—especially Canadians tonight—should know that, if passed, this resolution does not create a United Nations force to kick Iraq out of Kuwait. There would be no direction from the United Nations for any military action. No, the United States would be at the head of any military operation along with its allies, which include Canada. The resolution would merely rubber-stamp the desire to expel Iraq by force.

The caveat is that the resolution has been framed in such a way that it authorizes those nations that have troops and weapons in the Gulf against Saddam to restore international peace and security in the area. This resolution can be construed no other way than not only to permit the expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait by force, but also to continue the battle in Iraq for who knows how long?

Iraq knows it has to go, but stands defiant against the currents of international condemnation. By the time Iraq uses up supplies in its country, it will still take about a year for the sanctions to take their full effect. Analysts have confirmed this to be so. I do not support the ultimatum that says, unless Iraq withdraws, it will be forced out with tanks, fighter jets, bombs, and who knows what else.

Canada has not given the sanctions enough time to work. We keep hearing, how long? We heard it from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We heard it again from the Minister of National Defence. How long? I screamed out from this side of the House "as long as it takes". The minister said: "What if it takes two years?" Well, what if it takes two years? Is it worth the lives of hundreds of thousands of individuals? We know that is a possibility. We know that the U.S. is going to embark on an air strike. We hear through our television sets and the national news from the United States that that is the way they have to proceed and they would rather not use ground troops. They say: "Let's get them from the air. Let's get them from the sea".

In a Toronto newspaper today, Canadians read the Prime Minister's statement that sanctions are working. The Prime Minister said yesterday that "we seek to defend the interests and the integrity of the United Nations and that we seek to assist in the deterrence of aggression". A curious statement. The Prime Minister, if I have this straight, seeks to assist in the deterrence of aggression with the threat of aggression. Is this Canada talking? No, this is the U.S. talking, a country that has been badgering other nations of the world to fall into line.

In our new and modern world of instant communications and new found democratic freedoms, world-wide war, or even the threat of war, is not the answer. In fact, the prevention of war is one of the founding goals of the United Nations, and I will get to that in a moment.

The trade-offs have been enormous. One day, not a month ago, the Soviet Union's Mikhail Gorbachev declared that time should be given for the sanctions to work. After pleas to the U.S. for aid in helping to stave off a looming famine, Gorbachev is now onside. Such delicate diplomacy usually takes weeks, but the trade-off was made.

China, disgraced by the actions taken at Tiananmen Square, now holds the trump card. As a permanent member of the Security Council, and therefore with a veto over any decisions taken by it, China has promised something, too. Will the American sanctions imposed on China after Tiananmen be lifted, resulting in China abstaining tomorrow. Not vetoing the resolution tomorrow, but abstaining at tomorrow's meeting?

• (2150)

The Secretary of State for External Affairs proclaims, that although he does not like deadlines, he and the government are prepared to back the American call for an ultimatum. Why? The U.S. loses its presidency at the Security Council on Friday, so it wants to push ahead, full steam ahead. But should Canada be prepared to act so hastily?

Canada should be at the forefront of diplomatic efforts right now, not abetting those who would go to war. As the pot is about to boil over, Canada is right there turning up the heat. Should Canada follow along in that pressure-cooker atmosphere of American politics and agree to an early date for a military strike against Iraq? No. There has been no decision and no debate, despite what the Prime Minister says. He and his Conservative government are prepared to support the ultimatum, to go to war, needlessly.

An hon. member: What are the Liberals talking about? Appeasement.

Mr. Keyes: The hon. members asks if the Liberals are talking about appeasement. No. We are asking that we continue the resolutions of sanctions, that sanctions can and will work if given time.

The Conservative government has reached the limits of its absurdity. The Prime Minister rules by Order in Council. He has divorced Canada, for the sake of cosying up to the United States, from our traditional role in international diplomacy, that of occupying the middle ground, not because we are too weak to occupy any other place, but because we were interested in the welfare of international peace and security.

What has happened to our traditional role, our peacekeeping role? In this situation, Canada has lost that golden opportunity to exercise its influence on the other nations which make up the Security Council.

The United Nations was born out of the carnage of the Second World War. The first sentence of the preamble of the United Nations Charter states:

> We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind—

Again, I say to the Minister of Defence, if it takes two years, we continue sanctions. The preamble then calls on member nations:

> —to practice tolerance and live in peace with one another as good neighbours—

I say, not only is our government forgetting the important place Canada has occupied in international diplomacy, but members of the United Nations are forgetting these important words in the Charter. I stress the word "tolerance" because that is what we are debating tonight. That is what the government is ignoring. United Nations resolutions are not some kind of blank cheque to be used by those able to coerce others into their schemes. Of course, part of the intention of the United Nations Charter is to ensure that armed forces not be used, save in the common interest. We must ask ourselves, is the use of all necessary means—let us be honest here, it is the use of force—truly in the common interests of all UN members. Second, is this of such importance that the guiding principle of tolerance be ignored? Tolerance should be given the greatest opportunity. As the great historian, Edmund Burke, noted: "Our patience will achieve more than our force".

Through the motion before us here today, the government is seeking tacit approval of its actions. Should the House approve this motion, it will be interpreted by the Prime Minister as an approval for the Parliament of Canada to use all necessary means to enact punishment on Iraq.

The motion reads:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and—

—here is the caveat, again—

> —all subsequent resolutions.

We cleared that up a little bit here this evening, not too long ago. All subsequent resolutions does not mean the resolutions we have brought forward to the 28th of this month, but what will happen tomorrow and beyond?

By carefully couching its words with this blanket search for approval of military force, the government has not been as clever as it had hoped. The wolf in sheep's clothing has been exposed. Yes, we denounce Iraq's action. We denounce the detention of third country nationals. But we also denounce the attempt by the government to manipulate this important and sensitive issue and denounce its unwillingness to prevail over others, show leadership, and allow cooler heads to prevail.

We, in the Liberal Party, support the United Nations in its efforts to encourage understanding and peace among all member nations. In addition, solidarity between member nations is required if UN resolutions, such as the sanctions presently under discussion, are to have effect. But they must be left in effect.

This being said, it is not enough for member nations of the UN, such as Canada, to operate under the current multinational military effort. Canada, as well as other countries involved in this military effort, must only take direction under the auspices of a co-operative United Nations force. Now is the time. We have the opportunity as members of the Security Council to further enhance the role of the United Nations.

The Prime Minister has taken the easy way out. He jumped on the bandwagon. I say Canada has never accepted a free ride because Canada has the global reputation of solving international problems through conciliation, patience, and thoughtful negotiations. Ours is a positive agenda, not a reactionary one. The Liberal Party believes that, apart from the Security Council resolutions, primacy must be given to the United Nations to negotiate an end to the crisis.

The Prime Minister attempts to justify his arbitrary actions by pointing to history. Canada has never been faint of heart, he says. Well, no one denies Canada's capacity to defend freedom. Canadian soldiers have paid the supreme sacrifice, but always in the knowledge that their government tried everything in its power to resolve the situation peacefully before sending them away from their homes, their families, and their country.

Canada has participated in many officially sanctioned United Nations peacekeeping forces. Perhaps the most memorable to Canadians was the participation of Canada in the United Nations Temporary Commission for Korea. In June, 1950, Parliament was still sitting and the Liberal government of the day took great pains to keep the House informed of developments, including the use of Canadian military forces. In fact, when the Canadian military was requested to participate in a UN force, that is, one with UN helmets, clothing, et cetera, the announcement was made here in Parliament. It was done with the full opportunity to discuss the issue. Parliament was subsequently recalled later that summer in August for an emergency session to deal specifically with events in Korea. The traditions in respect of Parliament were upheld and the view was that Canada would not fight for Korea, but for the United Nations and the principle of collective security.

I see by the clock, Mr. Speaker, I only have a minute left, so I would like to summarize.

Let us not forget that Canada could go to war. Our troops are already shoulder to shoulder with the Americans, as deep as you can get in the Persian Gulf. We are on the front-line. As what? Peacekeepers? Or order takers? God forbid the worst scenario comes true, we will have no alternative but to take our orders from George Bush.

Canada was not even a member of the Security Council when Canadian forces were sent to Korea under the UN flag. Now that Canada is a member of the Security Council, it has a special and valued opportunity to defend a multinational force. By jumping on the bandwagon called the multinational military force, Canada has lost that golden opportunity to be respected, to be counted on as the initiator of independent, thoughtful diplomacy. Failure to do so is nothing short of shameful.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words this evening with respect to the motion before the House, which reads:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, earlier today, outside the Parliament Buildings, there was a sign held by a number of Canadians which read, "Canada is for Peace not War". I think that that very well sums up my own personal feelings, the feelings of all of my colleagues on the government benches and I know, from the parts of the debate that I have heard in the House this evening, that it certainly sums up the feelings of the opposition members. I truly believe it sums up the feelings of all Canadians. Canada is indeed for peace and is certainly not for war.

This feeling has not burst forth in the last day or two, it is something that has been around for many, many years. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, as I do, the days of the early and middle 1980s in particular, when one of the principal concerns if not, perhaps, the principal concern of Canadians was the whole question of peace of disarmament. The desire for peace and disarmament heightened a fear that we would be engaged in a nuclear holocaust, a fear that there would be an escalation of the cold war, and concerns about nuclear missiles in Europe.

Those concerns led to the establishment of many groups and committees dedicated to peace and the cause of peace in Canada and around the world. I am sure that in every constituency in this country there are a number of these peace committees. Certainly in my own constituency, the East York Peace Committee has been established for many years and makes its points exceedingly well on this principle that Canada is for peace and Canada is not for war.

You will recall as well, Mr. Speaker, that during the 1980s there was a tremendous amount of focus in the schools, a lot of classes where the teachers focused on many, many occasions on this issue of peace and disarmament, particularly nuclear disarmament. It parallels one of the phenomena that we have right at the moment where, in many of our schools, we have teachers focusing on the environment and environmental issues, as the hon. member for Davenport is well aware.

The issue of peace and not war is certainly not a new one but it really boils down, not really to the question of whether people are for peace or war because I think we would agree, unanimously, that we are all for peace but, as there was at that time, there is a legitimate difference of opinion on how peace can best be achieved. Of course in the 1980s, there were those who argued that peace could best be achieved by not only disarmament but unilateral disarmament. Perhaps by disarming ourselves first, that would inspire others to disarm and lay down their arms as well. On the other hand, there were many who believed that the only way to achieve true lasting peace and disarmament at that time was through some form of negotiated, balanced and verifiable arrangements in order to reduce armaments and arrive at peace.

It was that difference of opinion that characterized the discussions that related to the peace issue during the 1980s. Both sides had the same objectives as far as I can see. What they did was disagree on the best way of achieving peace and disarmament.

There were a good many flash points or points that raised concerns on both sides of the House and at times there were different parties on both sides of the House making the points in different ways. Hon. members will recall the debates over cruise missile testing, something that from time to time still rises to the surface. There were debates over whether or not NATO should increase the number of nuclear missiles in Europe during that time and that generated very heated debates.

As well, those debates brought into question the very issue of NATO itself and whether we should be supporting NATO or withdrawing from it altogether. All of these issues are not really new ones and we have been living with them for a long time. Certainly in recent years they have been at the top of the agenda.

At the same time, fortunately, the cold war has now apparently come to an end in eastern Europe and the U.S.S.R. In Berlin itself the walls have come down. The Iron Curtain has been removed and now we have agreements on troop withdrawals from Germany, we have agreements on nuclear arms reduction, we have agreements on conventional arms reduction. Interestingly enough, the Soviet Union which for so many years was viewed as the enemy is now considered to be not the enemy but our friend.

There are again legitimate disagreements on what role, if any, NATO and what role, if any, Canada's part in NATO played in bringing about those events of the walls coming down and bringing about a situation where the Soviet Union is now our friend and not our enemy. There are many who feel quite strongly that NATO was a minimal part or perhaps no part at all. Personally, I believe that it played a very important part in the entire process. It played a part in halting potential aggression. It means that we stood firm and united with our allies and it allowed for those negotiated, balanced and verifiable arms reduction agreements to take place and to become reality. Hopefully we will see a time before too long when there will not be any weapons, conventional or nuclear in Europe or perhaps, hopefully, anywhere in the world.

By playing a role in that process, Canada was making a significant and a continuing contribution to our military defence force in Europe, which for that matter is still in Europe, through many years. Because we were playing that role, were involved and made a commitment, not just a commitment in words but a commitment in forces and troops, we had a voice in policy. We had a voice in influencing the disarmament positions of NATO and, for that matter, of the United States.

I would like to contrast that with what happened in New Zealand. New Zealand decided to opt for a position in which they banned United States military ships from the harbours of New Zealand on the basis that they might be carrying nuclear weapons. New Zealand took a stand on this issue.

In effect, New Zealand opted out of playing a role within the council of nations of the western world who were trying to bring about the peace and disarmament for which we all strive. In my view at least, New Zealand became irrelevant in that entire process.

The situation in the Persian Gulf as it now stands and the situation at that time have a good many parallels. Canadians want peace and not war. Again, they differ on the best way of achieving this. It is not just a debate that goes on in this House, it is a debate that rages probably in all of our constituencies. Each and every one of us has heard from constituents, perhaps not all the same way as I have, but I am sure opinions have been voiced on both sides of the issue, with a few shades in between.

I have heard from many who are most concerned about the fact that Canada is in the Persian Gulf at all. Those voices and concerns are voiced by people like Father Mahoney and Vi Thompson, who are prominent members of the East York Peace Committee. They are voiced by Gary Hayes as well. He is more concerned about the financial commitment that Canada has to make. They are also voiced by people like Helen Petrowski, Norman Vale, and Vi McIntosh.

On the other hand, there are those who take exactly the opposite position. They feel very strongly that Canada should be in the gulf and that we should be doing all that we can to resist the aggression of Iraq against Kuwait. There are people such as Richard Kerfoot, Nancy Tittel and Mr. Tooke who have all been in touch with me. Their positions are quite legitimate and understandable.

There is another group. I referred to them during the debate in late September when the issue first came before the House. This group of Canadians are of the Muslim faith, particularly Canadians who come from the Middle East. They have a point of view to bring forward on this issue. Their concerns are somewhat different from the concerns of other Canadians. I believe very strongly that they should have a forum in which to voice those concerns.

They should have a forum somewhat similar to that which was put in place with the problems in China. It was one of a consultative committee of Canadians of Chinese origin who had an opportunity to exchange views with the government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in particular. They had an opportunity to make their feelings and those of others with similar feelings known. At the same time they heard first hand from the Secretary of State for External Affairs the views of the government, and had an opportunity to have those explained to them.

In September, I put forth the suggestion that we have such a consultative committee. We have been working with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his staff to put that together. I am hopeful and optimistic that it will soon be reality, and we will have an opportunity for Canadians of the Muslim faith, particularly those from the Middle East, to have a voice in the whole process relating to this issue.

While there are many different views and concerns, all of them have been legitimate and understandable. As we know from what this House has debated before and is debating now, the government has taken a position very strongly in favour or peace. At the same time it has held the belief that peace can best be achieved not by pretending that there was no aggression on the part of Iraq against Kuwait but by opposing that aggression, and by doing it under the auspices of the United Nations, by working hard to ensure that there is United Nations endorsement for any actions that are taken with respect to the Persian Gulf.

You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that of the 11 resolutions of the United Nations Security Council to date on this issue, some nine of those have been co-sponsored by Canada. Canada has played a very significant role in trying to ensure that this entire process comes under the United Nations itself.

At the same time, the government feels, and I think a great many Canadians agree, that we have to back up our specific support. That is why, we have our ships in the Gulf, our squadron of CF-18s, and Canadian military personnel there as well. Canada has been trying to work through the system, just as we did in Europe with NATO, to try to influence the system, not toward war but toward peace; to make sure that there is no unilateral action on the part of anyone, the United States or anyone else; to make sure that nothing happens there without the authority and the full sanction of the United Nations. As in the case of NATO in the 1980s, we want to apply as much pressure as possible but always for the purpose of achieving peace, not war. That is what this motion is all about tonight. It is a motion to apply pressure. It is a motion to send a signal. I believe it is a motion in keeping with the kinds of action that were taken by NATO during the 1980s with respect to the Cold War, not in an effort to start a war but really to maintain peace and achieve disarmament.

There are some differences as well between the Persian Gulf situation today in the 1990s and Europe in the 1980s. One of them quite clearly is the fact that we are dealing now with the case of unprovoked aggression on the part of Iraq. Another is the fact that the Soviet Union and virtually all of the other countries are on our side as well.

Another difference is that this time it is not just a group of western nations through NATO but the United Nations that is taking this stand against aggression. It is acting, in my view at least, as a world policeman. Perhaps it is a very modest step in the direction of some form of world government order.

The United Nations was founded with great hope and great expectations but has been rather impotent for a long period of time. If that is going to suddenly turn around, and if we are going to have some sort of world order, then we must start acting together. We will have to start working together and start striving to apply the rule of law right across the entire world.

Canadians may not be able to agree on the kind of action that should be taken to preserve peace but I truly believe that Canadians want peace, they do not want war, and that this motion is in keeping with those expectations.

• (2220)

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to the intervention of my colleague across the floor, and I would like to make a comment, first of all, on the United Nations.

I would like to remind the people of this august Chamber that the United Nations is not a god. It is a fallible group of people representing different nations who are every bit, as if not more, political than we are, and therefore are very much capable of being influenced by different sectors of the world.

I would venture to say that we as a country,—perhaps not as powerful a country as some—should play a very key role in influencing the resolutions that might be put forward. In other words, much as I appreciate the role of the United Nations and respect its decisions, I think we have a key role to play in the decisions that it is going to take.

That is not giving it a blank cheque and saying: "Whatever you do, we know we will be just fine". How do we know that? Why are we not standing up and saying: "If we endorse the resolution,"—which they have not passed yet—"we are, in essence, endorsing war". Do we, as a country, want war? I do not think we do.

We do not like what Saddam Hussein has done. I do not believe that this is the time to be passing a motion endorsing war. I do not believe the people of Canada believe that. I believe that we need more time for sanctions, and the hon. member is right, we must work together, but not by endorsing war, because the cost of war is very great.

I must ask: "What do we as Canadians have to gain from endorsing war at this time?" I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have absolutely nothing to gain right now by endorsing war. We have not given sanctions time to really take effect.

As a matter of fact, we are even now endangering the fate of the hostages that we have in that country. Let's give it a little bit of time. If we declare war tomorrow, it is not going to be over six months from now. We are going to have tremendous casualties.

I am a mother. I have children who are of age to fight in a war. I do not know that I want to say to my children and to the people in my constituency: "Go out because you are going to defend the country". Defend it against what? What have we as a country, as Canadians, to gain by endorsing a resolution at the UN or saying to the UN: "We want you to pass this resolution. Whatever resolution you take, we will endorse at this time".

What have we to gain as a country? What do our children have to gain from this kind of a resolution? I am asking this in all honesty, because I do not believe we have anything to gain. I do not know why Mr. Bush is so anxious to have a war in the gulf because there has been aggression by others. We have not seen the Americans rush in.

Is it because there is oil there? We have oil here. Why are we in such a rush? What do we have to gain? I keep asking. We have everything to lose, and absolutely nothing to gain.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone would quarrel with the hon. member when she says that no one wants to see war.

In fact, the resolution before the House tonight certainly does not refer to war. I think I had better read it again for the hon. member so she will hear it. It reads as follows:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with the Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

There is nothing in that at all that refers to war.

There is a resolution coming before the United Nations tomorrow. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in that that refers to war. I will read that for the hon. member as well, particularly paragraph 2, the action paragraph. I hope hon. members will try to keep order on the other side so that I can complete my answer. The hon. member's question was a long one. I know she would love me to give a long answer as well. That is truly what I intend to do in keeping with her wishes.

Paragraph 2 of that UN resolution for tomorrow states: "authorizes member states to co-operate with the Government of Kuwait unless Iraq, on or before January 15, 1991, fully implements as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the foregoing resolutions: To use all necessary means to uphold and implement the Security Council resolution 660".

That does not refer to war either, Mr. Speaker.

In addition, the Minister of National Defence in his comments indicated quite clearly that this government has given a mandate to our forces in the gulf that if there is to be a change in that mandate in any way, there will be a debate in this House specifically on any change in that mandate.

There is nothing in any of that that refers to war in any way. The hon. member also asked what we and our children had to gain from all this. I think it is quite clear that we and our children have an enormous amount to gain from standing firm with the United Nations to standing against aggression.

A few years ago the Second World War got off the track when people refused to stand up against aggression. Now, at long last, the world seems to be united, not just the United States, not just Canada, not just the Soviet Union, but countries around the world are united in standing against aggression.

If we can finally get the world to stand up against aggression, albeit once, then there will be a second time, a third time, and pretty soon we will have a rule of law applying right across the world where we will have a peace which is meaningful and permanent. We are going to have disarmament, all the sorts of things that the hon. member would wish for our country, and certainly I do. I know that the government shares those wishes as well.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I congratulate the previous speaker for a balanced and inciteful description of what exists here.

On this side of the House there is a group of people who believe that two open-ended resolutions exist for the purposes of allowing the government the opportunity to make war.

We have no assurances over here. If the Prime Minister were to stand up and say we absolutely commit ourselves to not using the Canadian Armed Forces but are going to work to make sure that the economic sanctions, the blockade, the diplomatic initiatives and any other measures and pressures that can be conjured up, will be put on Iraq. If that is what we are dealing with, we could take some comfort in that. The Prime Minister's track record is honestly bad. The members have to admit that. This government's track record is so bad that the majority of Canadians are absolutely opposed to it.

I do not even know why we are here debating this. If the members who have spoken believe that the government is not going to use this as an opportunity to use the Canadian Armed Forces without the consent of Parliament, the motion would say that. That is what we would be dealing with. The government has left it open-ended because the opposition forced it to do so. There is very strong circumstantial evidence to assume that the government is going to follow Mr. Bush to war.

We should not be here debating an open-ended motion like this. I thank the member for his presentation. He certainly has defined it very clearly. We believe on the track record of that Prime Minister that we will go to war.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now completed. Debate.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could say that I was pleased to be rising tonight, but I am not.

Just over two years ago I was elected in what was called the free trade election. During that election campaign I made it clear that that election was a lot more than about a trade deal. That election was about a closer cultural-military link with the United States. We are seeing now that that is happening. What I was saying during that election campaign has turned out to be prophetic. We are seeing our independence in developing our foreign policy withering away, and now it seems that our foreign policy is practically indistinguishable from that of the United States.

• (2230)

The government members in this debate tonight have been pointing at the support of the United Nations. It is very selective support for the United Nations. They would not bring back the House to talk about sending troops to the gulf in August. They did ask the United Nations what it thought at that point. Theirs was a slavish following of the U.S. line. So this high moral fibre that they are talking about now in support of the United Nations is very dubious, Mr. Speaker. The ebbs and flows of support for the UN from this government seem to go with political expediency.

I want to talk about sanctions. A number of members have pointed out that there has not been sufficient time for sanctions to take effect. We have seen in the South African experience how there have been sanctions for nearly 30 years, and it is only now that we are seeing change. I am not advocating that we wait 30 years, because in this instance there has been unprecedented unity of the international community in following up on sanctions. I think it would take months, not years, for sanctions to take their effect.

What is the rush? We have heard the high-minded arguments of the government members for proceeding with this tack of going to war. That is what we are talking about this evening in this House, going to war.

One of the government members talked about the morality in international behaviour. If that is so, where is the consistency? Where was this government and where were these members when we talked about the invasion of East Timor in Indonesia? What happened when China invaded Tibet? We did nothing. There was no response.

I think what we have to look at is the real agenda here. There are numerous examples beyond East Timor and Tibet.

The government is also saying that we condemn Saddam Hussein. We all condemn Saddam Hussein. But what we have seen with the kind of rhetoric in this House and in the United States is an attempt to personalize this issue in one man, to make him so evil. He is evil. I believe he is evil. But the attempt is to personalize this issue to one man so that we are capable of taking unthinkable action, of sending our young men and women into war, the kind of war that is beyond imagination.

I have a document that was provided me by Greenpeace, Mr. Speaker. It is four pages, dealing only with the U.S. capability in the Middle East, the nuclear capability: seven aircraft carriers, each with over 100 nuclear bombs on them; two battleships; eleven cruisers; three destroyers; then there are all the support ships that go along with them, and the submarines, all nuclear capable. That is only the United States capability. We do not know about France, we do not know about the Soviet Union, we do not know about Iraq. There are probably biological and chemical weapons there. This is what we are sending our young men and women into, Mr. Speaker.

I know that some of the Liberals were saying that I was getting exercised earlier on on this issue. You are damn right I am getting exercised. I think war is something to get exercised about, when we are talking about going to war.

When I came to this House I was here as a member of the New Democratic Party and someone who had worked for a long time for peace. This is not the way of achieving peace. We should be allowing time for sanctions to work.

That whole picture of Saddam Hussein as a madman, as an evil being, is of course true. I believe that is true, but we have to look beyond Saddam Hussein. One newspaper article that I have read recently gave an interesting statistic, and that is that 50 per cent of the population of Iraq is 14 years of age and under. That is who we would be going to war against.

As a mother of a child who is 14 and another who is 17, I am not willing to put my vote for that action. It is always women and children that are the first victims in any war. It is the civilians, especially in the kind of war that we have already seen Saddam Hussein quite capable of waging, using chemical weapons against his own people. We do not want that to happen. We do not want our young men and women injured. We do not want the children of Iraq injured, the innocent victims of war.

Why are we doing this? I think all of us know why we are doing it. It is because Kuwait and Iraq have vast quantities of oil.

As the associate critic on the environment for my party, responsible for the international aspects of the environment, this is another aspect: we have been working for the past 18 months in the environment committee on the whole issue of the changes to atmosphere, of global warming, and of carbon dioxide emissions. Carbon dioxide emissions come from fossil fuels, come from oil. This is an opportunity to reduce our dependency on oil.

The government would have the public support to say no, we have to reduce our dependency on oil. But, no, the government has decided to take another tack. It has given away its independence on foreign policy. It is lock-step with the United States. It is leading us down a path, not only for our destruction, but for possible world destruction. I am not talking inflated rhetoric. We are playing a very dangerous game here.

In conclusion, there is no way that I will support this resolution, this government motion. I think the high-minded talk about supporting the UN is political expediency. They only do it when they figure that it is in lock-step with the United States. Let us be clear, my party and I are opposed to war in the gulf. We will be working diligently to make certain that the peace activists right across Canada contact their members of Parliament in every party of this House to make certain that they vote the correct way.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague on her performance this evening. I note that she is a known pacifist and that she truly believes in what she says. But what I did not like about her speech was that she hinted that Canada, with regard to the Iraqi situation, has climbed onto the American band wagon. That is not true. If she has followed the debates during the last few weeks, if she has kept up with the reactions of all the presidents and heads of state including Mr. Gorbachev, Mr. Mitterrand and others, then she knows that UN members for the first time are unanimous in saying that it is wrong, that it is unacceptable for any country to invade another by the force of arms, to rape the women, to kill the children, to destroy. I believe this is taking place at this very moment and that we must act; we must show all the other nations that we can unanimously tell Mr. Hussein:

"If you do not leave Kuwait, if you do not respect the freedom of the Kuwaiti, if you do not stop killing them and torturing them, we shall unfortunately have no choice but to take action". And this is what all countries are saying, not just the United States. Mr. Gorbachev clearly said so not long ago.

The Chinese made the same statement recently when they said: "No, Mr. Hussein, we shall not use our right of veto to support you in this action. It is unacceptable; we are heading towards a new world order". This is what we hear from all national leaders except Mr. Hussein who says: "I have my own vision of things. Using brute force, I shall attack any country I choose. I shall make them say that their land is now my land and I shall do as I please in those countries".

• (2240)

I consider that unacceptable and everyone in this country, all the men and women of Canada, disagree with what Mr. Hussein is doing at this time.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I think that we all share mutual abhorrence of Saddam Hussein's actions. I do not think that there should be any doubt of that, and I would take extreme umbrage if that was what the member intended to say. Where we differ, though, is on how we are going to move him to change. Are we going to kill millions of women and children in a holocaust in the Persian Gulf, or are we going to allow economic sanctions time to work?

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it has almost been driven out of my mind, the searing question that I had on the eloquent speech the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has given.

I would like first of all to make this comment that in dealing with the issue that is before the House we have one item in background. We heard the other day that the government was making various cutbacks to public and social services, allegedly to pay for the war. It even has $17 million in preparation for actions beyond March 1991.

What does the hon. member think of the idea of cutbacks in public and social services to pay for war in the gulf?

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Victoria for his question. This is what I was speaking of in my initial comments.

The increased militarization of our country is what we are seeing here, and that was implicit with the trade deal. If you are going to have a closer economic relationship with a country, it is a given that you are going to have a closer social policy and environmental connection. That is why we are seeing the increased budget items for the defence department. It is not just because of the Persian Gulf war; it is because of the increased militarization of our country.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I would feel much better about this debate tonight if it were a little more honest and if we were debating in this House whether we should be sending our troops to war. That would be a much more honest debate than the one we are having here today.

The position being put forward by the government in its motion does not even suggest that it is planning to use force. The government's motion, which asks us to support Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions before the Security Council, does not even suggest that the resolution that will be before the Security Council tomorrow is part of this debate. But the resolution that is to be debated tomorrow is very specific because it:

> 2. Authorizes Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before January 1 (15), 1991 fully implements, as set forth in Paragraph one above, the foregoing resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council Resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security to the area;
> 3. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of paragraph two of this resolution; and—.

It goes on. This provides a blank cheque to any country, Canada, the United States, or any other country to begin war in Kuwait. All other countries would be expected to support it. That is what we are debating today.

It goes on to make three other requests. If we pass this resolution, we are supporting the movement of troops, planes and ships into a war zone and into a war. To whom are we giving this support? To whatever country decides to go to war. The only country that has been talking about war in the last month is the United States. The decision to go to war will not be made by the Canadian government, but by some other government and from our understanding of Mr. Bush's comments, the United States government.

I think that the President of the United States has misread his people because there is a growing concern in the States that this is not the way to solve the problem. The sanctions seem to have been working but they have not been given a chance. As my colleague suggested, sanctions in South Africa took 20 to 30 years to work. I am not suggesting that there is a parallel here, but it does indicate that sanctions take time to work.

A declaration of war or an acceptance of this resolution gives someone authority to attack another nation, to attack another people. The products of war are death. The member from Surrey—White Rock—South Langley talked about the atrocities of the Iraqi. Violence begets violence. Should we kill thousands of Iraqi children by declaring this war? Do we punish Saddam Hussein by killing children and the civilians of Iraq?

There has to be a better way and the United Nations,until now , has been advocating that better way. It has advocated sanctions, isolation, and strong world opinion. We have come a long way on that track. We have acted together in the United Nations to keep the peace. Are we going to take a backward step now? Are we going to take a backward step because the President of the United States sees this as an opportunity to shore up his image in his own country? Again I think he has misread what his people believe because the U.S. people are not going to be supportive of this war.

What about the cost? The cost of keeping these troops in the Gulf in that area has been very high but it is small compared to the cost of going to war. As the critic for official development aid, I know that we can do a lot more for the people of this world by taking some of that money and spending it for aid in underdeveloped countries than spending it in war.

I am not alone in my concern.

In a letter from the Canadian Council of Churches to the Prime Minister, signed by my old friend, Dr. Stuart Brown, several points were made which I want to read into the record. A communique from the council states:

> A gulf war could have no beneficial results.

Quoting the letter, it continues:

> "The modern high-technology warfare for which the Gulf region has been prepared would result in mass destruction," with the loss of tens of thousands of lives and increased long-term instability in the Middle East.

It is more than just that. The communique goes to state:

> While Iraq's aggression against Kuwait is unacceptable, the most effective instrument against this aggression is economic sanctions. Sanctions must be accompanied by two fundamental assurances: that "the innocent people of Iraq and Kuwait will not simply be starved into submission" and that "there will be an openness to negotiate the terms of an Iraqi retreat." Canadian churches and churches in the region are committed to monitoring the effects of sanctions to ensure that the basic dietary and health needs of the people are met.

The letter commends the government for agreeing to debate this issue in Parliament. "This is not the time for ultimata; rather it is the time to search for non-military solutions, even if that means compromise and a less than ideal resolution. War will most certainly not produce an ideal solution".

The Council letter, signed by Dr. Stuart E. Brown, general secretary, was prepared by a joint working group of the CCC bodies: the Committee on International Affairs, the Middle East Working Group and Project Ploughshares. It was formally endorsed by the Anglican, United, Roman Catholic, Lutheran and Presbyterian churches.

Each member of the House, and each Canadian, who supports this resolution or the idea that we should go, should ask themselves if they would sacrifice their son or daughter for this war. Would they sacrifice their son or daughter if there was another way to save them? That is what they are asking other people to do.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the member who spoke, given what he has said, if he and his party have ruled out any military option, or if they still envisage that that is a possibility at some stage?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the idea of war under any circumstances is abhorrent to me.

We understand that security sometimes is backed up by military force. The need to use it is usually because there is an intent to gain something by it. I do not believe there is anything to be gained by it here, and I do not think it is necessary.

My suggestion would be that only under extreme circumstances and possibly on attack would we suggest that it go, but it is something that we have not ruled out entirely.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have been involved in quite a few debates in the House.

I am not taking tremendous exception to the remarks of the last speaker but, quite frankly, I feel that this debate from its start has been one of the more sombre and serious debates, and has actually had a flow of information back and forth that sometimes is not the common denominator in debates. In particular, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a tremendous contribution. He did clarify perhaps one of the big things that we are debating.

To start with, there is no one who is supporting Saddam Hussein by standing and asking questions about a resolution that is very vague.

There is an honest interpretation as to the meaning of the resolution when it is tied in with what is going to be debated in New York tomorrow. As it stands now, Motion No. 24, which the hon. member for Etobicoke Lakeshore tried to clarify, is vague and can be open to the interpretation that opposition members and others have put on it. I tremendously resent it, as sombre as I can be tonight, because other remarks have been said outside the House which have been more inflammatory than any remarks that have been made in the House. When talking about potential conflict, we do not need inflammatory remarks to put the old gas on the fire. Fortunately, tonight, things have been sombre. I intend to try to maintain that dictum along with all members' contributions here today in large measure.

People outside the House say that if you dispute this or do not support that, then you are in some camp that we never want to be in, that is Saddam Hussein's. But they forget that there is a fellow called Sam Nunn. He is the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States. There is a fellow called Les Aspin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the United States. They have questioned where America is going. It is their President, he being Republican and they being Democrat, whom they had do what the commander and chief of that country is entitled and is supposed to do. That is, to move quickly when Congress is not in session and/or stabilize bad situations. That is what George Bush did. That is why the Prime Minister of our country responded to the call and it is why other countries of the group of 26 of the coalition responded to the call to do what everyone wanted to be done, that is, to stabilize the position in the Middle East that everyone who is a student of history, let alone a student of the Middle East, knows is a most unstable area at the best of times.

You have friends one year that you feed fuel to and give them armaments. They are your best friends and then you do not believe what they say. They shoot a British journalist about a week or so before and everyone complains. They are still saying that an American delegation should go and meet Saddam Hussein.

I am going to quote the most interesting article that I wish everyone on the government side and everyone in the United Nations would have read. It appeared in a Sunday edition of The New York Times in September. It is the most appalling indictment of foreign policy when the ambassador of the United States, in talking to the President of Iraq, Saddam Hussein, eight days before the attack, asks her about what is your position on Kuwait. I have the quotes here and I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is perhaps aware of it.

I am amazed that it has not been raised more in this country in the media. It was of so much import before the Americans adjourned for their mid-term congressional elections, that a subcommittee on middle eastern affairs was having hearings on how their Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Kelly, had given instructions to the poor American ambassador. She was just carrying out instructions from Washington. She said: "Oh, your problem with Kuwait is a dispute between Arab and Arab. You don't have to worry about the United States on that". That was eight days before Saddam Hussein made the attack across the border and took over Kuwait. He may not be going to do it anyway, but it is that type of fundamental flip-flop on something that is so important that disturbs many people.

I want to congratulate the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, an ex-military maritime commander, who made a tremendous contribution.

I will digress to the American side. You can raise legitimate questions, but do not let anyone raise a question that people, on raising the questions, no matter where they sit, are for Saddam Hussein and against peace. This is the worst type of demagoguery that you could ever see. To bring this into proper perspective, we have a debate on a vague resolution that disturbs me.

I wish the government, before tomorrow's vote, would amend its own resolution. The Liberal Party has moved an amendment to the motion that I can certainly support because it clarifies some of the legitimate vagueness in the present resolution. I will not go over the interpretation we give to all the resolutions confronting the United Nations which will be debated tomorrow. They can be amended tomorrow, as the member for South West Nova mentioned in a question to the minister or one of the government members. Who is to say that even the draft will be debated? Yet this blanket resolution will get us involved, potentially, with whatever they pass in New York tomorrow.

Just to reduce the argument to the absurd by using an extreme analogy, there are resolutions at the United Nations about Israel. Let us just save it tonight over coffee cups in New York as they try to hammer out things. There seems to be a crack in the coalition. Someone says, and it might be Gorbachev, having just had the Foreign Minister of Iraq in Moscow, and allegedly, Gorbachev was supposed to have given him a tongue lashing and said: "Get out, you have only a little time". Well, let us say the coalition is starting to get frayed at the edges, because it is a very tenuous coalition at the best of times.

Just to reduce this argument to the extreme, when you start to absorb the blanket resolutions of the United Nations, they could start to make a deal down there that comes on the United Nations Plaza tomorrow which will affect Israel. Some of those resolutions very definitely affect the whole Middle East. Of course, that is one of the troubling things with this whole debate, we are talking about oil—and we know it is oil—but we also know, and everyone knows, and I am glad the Secretary of State for External Affairs alluded to it in his remarks, that until we can resolve the question of Israel and the Palestine refugees and the Gaza Strip, we will never get stability in the Middle East.

This brings me to a lighter thing that I throw out not in jest because of the lightness of the moment, but because of the pithy philosophy behind it, and that is my old friend Doonesbury, old Doonesbury the cartoonist. He comes up with a lot of interesting thoughts. Just last week, he had the cartoon that I think we all should remember as we try to hurry this thing along, all since August 2, four months down the road. There is the cartoon. The forces are coming in, Americans are getting off the helicopters—and no one accused me of being an anti-American. I am not anti-American at all, I married one, and am very happy to have married one, and am still married to her, so I am not anti-American. They are coming off the helicopter. There are the two camel drivers. One camel says to his fellow camel: "Boy, Ella, these fellows think they're pretty smart. They're going to settle this problem in four months, and we've been trying to settle it for 4,000 years".

Mr. Speaker, in talking about the Middle East, there is an awful lot of truth to that cartoon. So why, when everyone is for economic sanctions and some people raise questions about force. Even congressional leaders in the United States are now raising questions about force. The sad thing about this whole problem to me is that Canada will never have the forces, it never should have the forces of the United States. Thank God, we do not. But we did not exercise Pearsonian diplomacy this summer.

When Bush made the call and we responded initially with others it was to stabilize the situation, because Saudi Arabia was next. That was important, and we moved. Then there was the interval between the stability and preventing further invasion into Saudi Arabia. Saddam Hussein, according to what I read, would have controlled 40 per cent of the oil fields that feed the west. But we changed the mandate, which everyone responded to quickly to stabilize and prevent another invasion. No problem. Work things out.

The next item becomes removing Hussein from Kuwait. I do not know what the mandate is today. Yes, I have heard President Bush. I have heard the Prime Minister. Get out of Kuwait. Yes, aggression should not be rewarded. But does getting out of Kuwait mean terminating Saddam Hussein? Does it mean, as some members have said here earlier tonight in effect bombing Baghdad back to the cave, involving all the casualties that will make? Does that mean having a trusteeship go in and administer Iraq now that we have elevated President Assad of Syria? He and Saddam Hussein, I gather, are not the friendliest of souls.

It is unreal to even think about the potential of a war when we have so many feudal rivalries which have been there for a thousand years. They are flipping and flopping between one and the other, as some speakers have said the other night, just because some of the bad ones now happen to be on the good side—even though we know they are not very good.

How can President Bush justify going to Geneva and sitting down with President Assad of Syria, an acknowledged terrorist nation that puts bombs in international airplanes? Up until now we would not even talk to him, but because the end justifies the means in a Machiavellian way, we now get in bed with Assad, thinking that that is going to solve our problems in the Middle East, just having fallen out of bed with Saddam Hussein whom we were all for when he was fighting the hated Ayatollah of Iran.

We may start getting into that jigsaw puzzle, what with all the good intentions and serious things that have been said by all members about peace and the best way to try and resolve the problem in the Persian Gulf.

We just should not think of the geography of the world where time does not mean quite what it does in the more western world where we go by the clock. We have an eight-hour day and do not bow down and pray to Allah. We do not watch the old grass grow on the rock as is the oriental custom.

I have become involved emotionally with this problem because I watched the situation escalate. I was all for what President Bush did in getting people involved and Canada contributing. That was when I thought the UN would work things out. But the sadness to me! I have two sons, both fighting age and there is no way that I would want either of those sons to go to fight on the sand of a feudal kingdom where the democracy that we believe in has been put on suspension for 15 years.

If we, north of the 49th parallel, could have eased off on our unqualified and blind support after things had stabilized and said, "Hey, let us not get too many troops in there because obviously if we get 200,000, that may stabilize things. If we get half a million, then we are starting to set up a situation that we cannot pull back from". This has escalated the stakes beyond reason. That is the sadness I find and that is why I say we did not exercise Pearsonian diplomacy.

We are in the interval between stability and escalation because a President was caught in the mid-term election, for goodness sake. How much that has affected his decision, I do not know. But I certainly think it affected some of the things that Margaret Thatcher said when she was in Paris just 10 days ago. She talked about the brutal things going on in Iraq, things we all sort of knew. One wondered if she was saying this because of Iraq or whether it was because of her own particular political problems?

That may be very unfair, but I will tell you that that is what I thought when I saw her on television talking about Iraq in a most inflammatory way.

There was a time when putting half a million troops into Iraq, people would have said, "Hey, let us work this out and try to come up with something". Earlier I alluded to a New York Times story because we are on the precipice of a conflict.

Anyone who watched the the three-part PBS series on the Korean war will agree it was fantastic. It was on how you could miss communications and misjudge your enemy. The Americans soldiers were on the Yalu River in 1952 or 1953, thinking the war was over. It was one of the most interesting documentaries on PBS in a long while. The North Korean captain, the Chinese colonel, and the North Korean corporal, part of the 3,000 up in the hills, saw the Americans sitting on their tanks eating the American Thanksgiving dinner at the Yellow River because General McArthur thought the war was over. Here they had infiltrated the hills and from their cameras we could see this happening in this amazing documentary, just about two days before they came out of the hills. Of course, they chased the Americans and Canadians right back into Seoul. That was a misjudgment in communication in assessing the enemy. This is a misjudgment, too.

• (2310)

According to The New York Times of Sunday, September 23, 1990, it was the American Ambassador, April Glaspie, who on July 25, eight days before the invasion urged the Iraq leader, Saddam Hussein to settle his differences with Kuwait, but added:

> We have no opinion on the Arab-Arab conflicts, like your border disagreement with Kuwait.

This is according to an Iraqi document described as a transcript of their conversations. I am reading from The New York Times, Sunday edition. This is very authentic because this is what started a subcommittee hearing in the United States before they adjourned for their congressional elections.

I actually tried to phone Lee Hamilton, one of the better American congressman, a Democrat from Indiana, who was a chairman of that subcommittee, to find out the status of this subcommittee. Perhaps they thought it unpatriotic to explore it further, I do not know. Portions of the document, prepared in Arabic by the Iraqi government, was translated and broadcast by ABC News on September 11, and were the basis of accounts by The Washington Post and The Guardian of London. The article states:

> The State Department declined to confirm the accuracy of the document, but officials did not dispute Ms Glaspie's essential message.

Then it states:

> The administration was following what President Bush acknowledged last week was a flawed policy toward Iraq, a policy built on the premise that the best way to handle Mr. Hussein and moderate his behaviour was through improving relations with Baghdad. That assessment presumed that Iran and Iraq, both exhausted by their eight-year border war, would focus on domestic reconstruction, not foreign adventurism.
> As a result, the Bush Administration failed to calibrate its policy to take into account a string of belligerent statements and actions by Mr. Hussein in recent months, including the execution of a British journalist and a threat to use chemical weapons against Israel.

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

> "We were essentially operating without a policy," said a senior administration official. "The crisis came in a bit of a vacuum, at a time when everyone was focusing on German reunification."

This lady we have seen on PBS over the year because she speaks for the administration quite a bit:

> On July the 24, when Margaret D. Tutwiler, the States Department spokeswomen, was asked whether the United States had any commitment to defend Kuwait,she said"We do not have any defence > treaties with Kuwait, and there are no special defense or security commitments to Kuwait."

> Asked whether the United States would help Kuwait if it were attacked, she replied, "We also remain strongly committed to supporting the individual and collective self-defense of our friends in the gulf with whom we have deep and longstanding ties," a statement that some Kuwaiti officials said privately was too weak.
> Two days before the invasion, John H. Kelly, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, essentially repeated the same message in Congressional testimony.

Lee Hamilton, at the hearing, chided Mr. Kelly for not taking a tougher stance against Iraq in his testimony before the invasion. The article goes on:

> You left the impression that it was the policy of the United States not to come to the defense of Kuwait," said Mr. Hamilton, an Indiana Democrat. "I asked you if there was a U.S. commitment to come to Kuwait's defense if it was attacked. Your response over and over again was we have no defense-treaty relationship with any gulf country."

I will not go any further because others wish to speak. Time is very essential in any types of conclusion. In conclusion, we had this type of flip-flop in policy when mixed signals were sent to the president by the ambassador for the United States. Fortunately, Bush did stabilize those mixed signals, but we may get ourselves involved in a world war. If there is any doubt about fighting, everyone in this House and everyone at the United Nations should read the book The Bodyguard of Lies. In it Churchill is quoted as saying: "In war truth is so precious it must be protected by a bodyguard of lies".

I commend this to everybody to read because this is the story of the deception, the deceit, and the spies, not just during the war but before the war when the German Commander in Chief, General Beck, of the German general staff was trying to get a message to London in 1938, saying: "Hey, London, we will get rid of this madman Hitler if you make sure you don't do certain things". This story illustrates in quote after quote and person after person how even within the general staff, the head of the intelligence department of the German army was always trying to get messages through.

If these two cultures that think alike could not get the message through to prevent a war, how can we be expected to hurry the type of communication that obviously is a problem between an Arabic situation and our western situation?

I conclude with what a Christian told me at a New Year's levee during the Iran hostage situation when poor old President Carter was trying to get the hostages out. I will never forget this. This was told by a member of our Armed Forces at the base that I have the honour to represent, CFB Greenwood. He is a Christian now. He had been a Muslim. He told me: "Mr. Nowlan, what really is the trouble with you westerners trying to deal with us people in the Middle East, you do not understand us because fundamentally the quickest way a Muslim can get to heaven is to kill an infidel and every Christian is an infidel. If you cannot get to heaven that way, the second quickest way to get to heaven is to be killed by an infidel".

With that type of so different thinking, to think that we are hurrying this thing along and not giving the time that most experts say is necessary for trade sanctions, I say we will regret it. This debate has been important. I only hope it gets to some people in New York before tomorrow.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it was an interesting, very worth-while and entertaining presentation.

There are two interesting things that I would like to ask the member about the speech. One, he is a long-standing Conservative and respected member of the Conservative Party and the government in this House who recently crossed the floor. In his statement tonight he opposes the motion. He pointed out the difficulties in the vagueness of that resolution and the fact that the opposition could interpret it the way they have tonight. The other thing is the consistency of the government side of the House where they are rock solid for this resolution and speak in support of it.

Would the hon. member venture to guess that the reason that they are on side is the government caucus is being forced into this position and the fact that the member has crossed the floor has given him the freedom to speak out against a very poor resolution presented to this House?

Mr. Nowlan: Categorically no, Mr. Speaker, I would not subscribe to that at all. Some day if the hon. member's party ever gets to be the government he will understand that there are some different pressures, but he can still speak out, he can still speak within and then he can make up his mind. I think the debate here tonight typified that. Things were said by members on all sides that frankly were not strictly according to the dots on the i's and the crosses on the t's of the party lines.

I would like to see, frankly, more independence sometimes in the hon. member's party because his party is more monolithic than any party that I ever belonged to.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the feast of reason and flow of soul from the hon. member. It is wonderful that, having switched sides, he is able to become unzipped as it were and spill out all these wonderful thoughts for the benefit of all members of this House and, of course, for the Canadian public. What I want to ask him and what I could not understand from listening as attentively as I did to his lengthy speech was whether or not he is going to support the Liberal amendment to this motion.

• (2320)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the member for Niagara, even when I was sitting on the other side of the House, although he used to confound me sometimes with his semantic arguments on procedural hurdles that had no sense, but you did not hear—

Mr. Milliken: I'm from Kingston.

Mr. Nowlan: Kingston, sorry. Well, you sometimes sound like Niagara on your procedural points of privilege. That is what I thought.

I am sorry the member did not hear me too clearly because I thought I did say at one time when I was trying to speak a little slower than I usually speak that I was going to support your amendment.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, just a quick question. The member has been in the House for a considerable period of time. Perhaps he can shed some light on the NDP amendment.

The NDP amendment says that this House opposes the use of force against Iraq until sanctions and other UN measures have had time to succeed. In effect what the NDP is saying is that they are endorsing the use of force, which seems to be contrary to NDP policy. Perhaps the member, with his experience, can advise the House whether this is an about-face on behalf of the NDP who seem to be supporting war with this particular amendment. Does he share my conclusions?

Mr. Nowlan: I will be even shorter on this one.

Just because I moved across the floor of the House to this perch that has a great view is no sign that I am going to start to interpret NDP amendments, subamendments, or even motions. I think they are quite capable of trying to interpret themselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): I have a short question, Mr. Speaker. I am aware of my colleague's experience and I would like him to tell me, based on his many years in the House—during his career, he has taken part in debates which were just as important as this one—in view of the circumstances and of the importance of the issue and considering that motion No. 24 which we are studying this evening is meant to support action to be taken by the United Nations, whether he would agree with me that the members of this House should all stand behind Canada's support of the United Nations.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: This has been part of the debate, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate and know that the member has dutifully been here tonight and has had good questions. This is part of the debate. Obviously we all want to support the UN, but there is obviously a little different interpretation as how you most effectively support it, especially when you have a resolution that I think even my hon. friend would agree has some vagueness to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury and the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte will be the next two speakers with 10 minutes each.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate which I think we all wish was not necessary. Certainly it is one I would have preferred to avoid, but I feel it is a personal political responsibility to take a stand on difficult issues like this, perhaps particularly so on difficult issues like this.

It is unthinkable that we have come to this tonight. I do not think many of us ever believed we would again have to come to grips with the real prospects of war. It is a little like a nightmare, unreal, unimaginable that we must seriously consider decisions that will bear potential for death and destruction, not only of Canadian men and women, but possibly of tens of thousands of human beings on all sides, friends and foes, not just military personnel but innocent civilians, families, and children. It certainly is a horrible prospect.

My own instincts, as I believe would be the case with virtually every member in this House, would normally be to work for peace at almost any cost. Certainly I believe that we should do that. We should work for peace at almost any cost. Certainly I know that most of my constituents would have us avoid armed conflict except as a very last resort.

It is not difficult for me to identify with this issue in a very personal way. My wife and I have raised seven children and we have seven grandchildren. It is not inconceivable that war in the Persian Gulf might eventually impact directly on their lives. The world is a very small place today and distances are covered quickly by satellites, aircraft, intercontinental missiles, and, yes indeed, even by nuclear bombs.

It is very tempting, and it would be with great relief to set this subject aside, to leave it to other countries with larger stakes in the issues and with larger capabilities to deal with them. It would be far more satisfying to speak only for peace and never in contemplation of war.

That would not be responsible in the context of our membership in the United Nations. It would not be true to our commitments of interdependence with our allies, our neighbours and our friends. It would not be respectful of the faith in our mandates from our constituents, and I do not believe it would be Canada.

Rather, we have no alternative but to face up to the tragic irony that, although peace is the goal we all seek, history has taught us that sometimes if we want to ensure peace, we must even be prepared to go to war to attain it. This truly does seem to be one of those times in world history.

Not necessarily war, but a resolve for war if necessary to preserve the peace. I believe it is that resolve that will be our strength in preventing war at this time in the Persian Gulf.

I have always thanked my maker that I was born too young to fight in Europe or in Japan, but I do remember. Looking back those more than 50 years, I think we can now see with the perfect vision of hindsight that appeasement of dictators does not work to ensure peace.

Perhaps if Hitler had been confronted strongly and with determination in the late 1930s, the world might have been saved from the destruction of World War II, and many millions of lives might not have been lost.

Similarly, in 1990, I think the analogy does bear consideration that if the territorial ambition of Iraq, smaller than Germany but no less aggressive, and its dictator, Saddam Hussein, less powerful than Hitler but made from the same mould, and if their blatant aggression is not stopped in its tracks now, then who can tell where it may lead?

Our quest for peace and security cannot long tolerate the risks that that unanswered question contains. Will it stop at Kuwait? Will it be contained in the Middle East? Will it involve nuclear weapons? Can we really tolerate any of those questions at risk?

As compelling as those questions are, the burden of this debate does bear heavily upon us all. It was put in context for me today by an aggressive TV reporter on my way into the House when he asked: "Mr. Bird, are you really going to vote for young Canadians to come home in body bags from the Persian Gulf? Are you really going to obey orders from the U.S.A.?"

My quick answer seemed somehow inept and inadequate, almost as though these cynical and tortuous barbs were beyond my competence to answer. Yet, as I reflected upon these issues throughout the day, I believe I had them right at the start. I said to him: "I am not voting for death in the Persian Gulf, but rather I am voting for the best prospects of life and peace for this and future generations. I am not voting for the U.S.A. or any other foreign initiative, but rather for Canada to fulfil its responsibilities as a founding member of the United Nations designed so long ago as our best hope for preserving world peace".

Perhaps I could have even said more. For example, a little more than two weeks ago, we observed Remembrance Day in Canada. We paid tribute to hundreds of thousands of Canadians who fought for this country in two World Wars and in Korea, a great many of whom gave their lives in pursuit of freedom and peace.

It has long been part of our commitment on Remembrance Day to make the commitment that their sacrifices shall not have been in vain. We have not only a responsibility today to present and future generations, but also an obligation to the memory of our forebears: our fathers, brothers and uncles that we shall do what it takes to preserve peace in the world and indeed, yes, in many cases to our sisters, our aunts and our mothers.

It is a tragic statement, but to keep this commitment we must contemplate today the prospect of war again. That is a position I feel sure that those past generations, and indeed future generations, will understand and respect.

• (2330 )

Our first challenge is to demonstrate our resolve and our diplomatic skills to mount deterrent influence that will pre-empt the prospects of conflict. The economic blockade against Iraq is a powerful weapon. It must be used with ever-increasing discipline and intensity.

In the final analysis, however, we must make it terribly obvious that we are prepared to join the United Nations in whatever fight it takes to turn Iraq out of Kuwait and to stop its aggression completely. It is to be hoped, indeed it is to be prayed, that such a demonstration of economic sanctions and political will be sufficient to achieve the purposes of peace. Otherwise the cause of peace may demand the action of war and ultimately, with very heavy hearts yet resolute spirits, we may be called upon and we must be prepared to help fight it.

The entire area of the Middle East is now a flash point for world conflict. There are many volatile forces at work, none of which can be totally predictable, except that their impact will have profound consequences around the globe. Never, since its inception, has the United Nations represented such potential for world action toward peace, and never before has its mission led so closely to war.

Perhaps, to use a Churchillian phrase, this may become the United Nations' finest hour, when the consensus and strength of nations united for peace can demonstrate conclusively that they are capable of preserving it, even by force, if necessary to do so. There can be no compromise of the principles of respect for sovereignty of other nations and defence against aggression over the weak by the strong.

Let us hope and pray that in demonstrating its commitment to those principles, in the face of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the United Nations will also be delivering an unmistakable message of resolve that will help bring resolution to other Middle East conflicts as well. Ultimately, the fires of war must be banked in all corners of the world, particularly in the Middle East. Preserving peace in the Persian Gulf may prove to be the prelude to permanent peace elsewhere throughout that troubled region, and indeed throughout the world.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, we have heard from both sides tonight differing versions of what is going on in the world and what is going on in the Persian Gulf. I think we have to respect both sides. If Canadian people who are watching tonight can filter this debate to its lowest common denominator, I guess they will come up with the understanding that we are trying to say tonight is that we do want peace. Everyone in this House wants peace.

I can criticize the New Democrats for their position. I can criticize the Liberals for their position, and maybe some of our own Progressive Conservatives. However, if one were to cut through all the rhetoric and political posturing on both sides of the House, I think one would find that the common denominator is peace, to maintain peace in the Middle East.

If the Canadian people have had a chance to hear our Associate Minister of National Defence and our Minister of National Defence who is in the House at this very moment, they will come to the opinion that that is what they want. There is absolutely no question about it.

When we compare what is going on in the Persian Gulf at this very moment to what has gone on in Vietnam and in Europe during World War II under the dictates of Adolf Hitler, I do not think it is a fair comparison. I think some members draw those comparisons simply out of fear, because we do not want those types of things to happen. If we measure what has happened in this so-called civilized world of ours in the last hundred years, in fact within the last 20th century starting with World War II and going through, there is no question at all that war is the most inhumane of all activities that human beings engage in. We do not want it. Millions of lives have been lost forever. Young generations of Canadians did not have an opportunity to grow up and experience the great country that we do have. It was the same for Allied Forces in European countries and the United States of America.

We can go through all of the wars that we have been engaged in as a peacekeeping nation. None of us will question the fact that Canada is a peacekeeping nation, yet at some particular point we have had to put our men, our women, our children, our country on the line. Other nations have done the same thing in defence of certain principles. We have paid the price, not as much as other countries but we have certainly paid the price: hundreds of thousands of Canadians, millions of Europeans, countless millions of Russians. War has devastated the world in terms of human tragedy. None of us want to see that.

That is exactly what we are attempting to do in the Middle East. We have the support of just about every civilized nation in the world in what we are attempting to do as a nation: maintain the peace. We do not want to see the kind of devastation brought about by war, but we do not avoid war by backing down and allowing an aggressive nation to take advantage of a less aggressive nation or a smaller nation. I think we are being true hypocrites if we allow that to happen. We cannot allow that to happen.

I do not think we can allow the story to be distorted. I believe to a degree that is happening. We are simply attempting to maintain the peace. I do not pretend to have all the answers to what is going on in the Persian Gulf. I simply do not. There are many experts in this House who go far beyond my abilities in this area, but as a Canadian I probably have more at risk in this matter than virtually everyone in this House. Why is this? It is because my son will be engaged in that conflict. It is something I do not want to see happen. It is as simple as that. I do not.

If we could avoid it, we would do everything in our power to avoid it, but it is something that we cannot. It is reality staring me in the face, staring our nation in the face. We cannot avoid it. My wife at this very moment is in West Germany to visit our son before he is deployed to the Middle East, to the Persian Gulf. Why? Because, in reality, it could be the last time that my wife and my youngest son will see Greg Junior. It is as simple as that. That is the reality of the tragedy of war. We do not want it to happen. Hopefully I will be allowed to go over for a couple of days to see my son.

That is the human tragedy of war. There are parents and individuals in this very House whose sons and daughters or grandchildren are over there. Not one of us wants to see it come to the final act of man taking man, human life taking human life. We do not want that to happen.

That is why as a Canadian I can stand here very proudly and look over what we have done as a nation since World War I and certainly since World War II to maintain the peace. I believe in all sincerity that peace is exactly what our Prime Minister wants to achieve, that peace is exactly what our defence minister wants to maintain.

We are not an aggressive nation. We never have been and we never will be. We are a civilized nation that wants to bring about a civilized solution to that mighty problem, but we do not solve a problem by backing away from it. We have the support of almost every civilized nation in the universe, communist nations included or what is left of those communist nations.

That is a strange paradox when we think about it. Could we stand in this House a year ago and say that? No, we could not, but I believe our Secretary of State for External Affairs, our Prime Minister, and our Minister of National Defence have worked very strongly to bring about this sort of unification of spirit in this situation. They have worked very hard. Canada's credibility is certainly on the line. A lot of human emotions are on the line, mine included.

Going back to my opening, none of us want to see the ultimate, which is war. We do not want to see the ultimate inhumanity. Our NDP friends and our Liberal friends do not want to see it. We have taken a position which I believe history will prove right. When we look back a year, two years, five years or ten years from now, I think we could all honourably say that we did the right thing and that we were there for the right reasons: to prevent death, to prevent inhumanity, and to preserve peace.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I was moved by what the member said about his own son who will be in the Persian Gulf. I want to say a few words about paying the price.

This afternoon the Canadian parliamentary group, some 40 members of Parliament, met with representatives of Baltic peoples, Canadians of Baltic heritage. We talked about paying the price and freedom being snatched from the Baltic States some 50 years ago. It reminded me, as we were sitting in the West Block discussing something that happened 50 years ago, of how we might be able to right the situation. Here we are in the House tonight talking about freedom having been snatched from the people of Kuwait by the Iraqis, and the price that has to be paid by Canadians who are there, the hostages who are there. We were most pleased today that five of those hostages will be released.

What is happening is not just about that region itself. It is about the goals of our foreign policies that it is built upon. It is the foundation, goals which are peaceful and prosperous, goals which permit Canada to live in freedom. The Baltic people have not been able to live in freedom. Now the people of Kuwait cannot live in freedom. As the member has said, a price has been paid. We cannot let ourselves remain silent. We cannot fool ourselves into believing that we are isolated from events of this magnitude.

I would just like to say to the hon. member that his commitment is strong. His resolute is strong as his own family member is involved in this. I would also like to say that recently the constituents of Scarborough Centre promptly responded to a questionnaire supporting the government's position that Canada should play a role in the Persian Gulf, a role which has been fully consistent with the United Nations to date, including the enforcement of economic sanctions.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in this debate. I have sat here throughout the evening listening to many great speakers, and I want to state that I support, in principle, the Canadian government's actions in condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, by joining late with the United Nations and countries around the world to say that this type of activity cannot be allowed to go unchallenged, and that Canada would do the right thing, as it did, and participate in the naval blockade of Iraq.

From the moment Iraqi tanks rolled into Kuwait in August, there has been world-wide agreement that they must leave. The only question was how to make this happen. Some world leaders wanted immediate military action, regardless of whether the international community supported such a move. They believed that this would punish the Iraqi aggressor and ensure that Saddam Hussein would never again threaten the region.

Fortunately, other world leaders campaigned to stop such a move, recognizing that military action would shatter the international consequences in the United Nations. Other leaders promoted a more credible alternative. Since the objective behind the United States, Canada, and the other countries could be said to be the protection of Saudi Arabia from Iraqi attack, and the allies should not attack at all, but rather, declare the measures to be a success. The economic embargo of Iraq could be maintained as punishment. In time, these people argued, Iraq could sue for peace and abandon this occupied territory.

The third most widely appealing option was to combine UN-mandated economic sanctions with the potential for military action under UN agreement. In this option, every diplomatic effort would be exhausted before resorting to force. This is exactly what is happening now.

The Canadian people, through their elected representatives in Parliament, must be given the opportunity to be kept informed and to offer their opinion on the relevant issues. As I studied this motion, I realized that once again the government is trying to get authorization to branch out on its own and act without consulting Parliament. I specifically refer to the end of the motion which reads "subsequent resolutions". This makes me uneasy, as it leaves so many avenues open. The Liberal amendment would prevent the government from once again taking action without consulting Parliament.

If the House agrees to the Liberal amendment, then, and only then, will I support the motion. Without this amendment, we would be allowing the government to take action on behalf of Canadians without consulting their elected representatives. We would be writing a blank cheque to the government.

If there is one clear message that should come out of this debate tonight and tomorrow, it is this. Canada must be an advocate of patience. It must use its influence on the United Nations Security Council. It must argue for a diplomatic solution. There must be a clear understanding, agreed to by all of us, that sanctions must be given a chance and a peaceful solution should result, certainly not one of war.

Throughout two world wars and the Korean War, Canada was recognized as one of the greatest fighting nations on the face of this earth. After this, we have become a peacekeeping nation, a reputation earned to a great degree, by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. Lately, Canada has always filled the role as peacekeeper. That is exactly how we want to continue to be known. A peaceful solution must come of this.

I am in no way trying to minimize the fact that the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq must not be tolerated and that there is support for Canadian action to date in participating in the international effort to make sanctions work. We must all keep in mind that if war breaks out, there is no way of telling how many casualties there will be and how many of our men and women will lose their lives.

• (2350)

We all agree, I believe, that Saddam Hussein is a madman. He is a man who must be stopped. Maybe the only way to stop him will be by force. However, if this is true, this must be debated fully in this Parliament. This is why I stand here tonight and say that, if we are to support this motion, it must be amended so that any resolution undertaken by the Security Council tomorrow must be debated in the House of Commons before Canada participates.

Christmas is fast approaching and this House will be recessing. But, if we must debate it, whether it be on December 25, December 31, or on January 1, we must debate it before further Canadian action would be taken.

Saddam Hussein is a serious threat to international peace, and the Charter of the United Nations which forbids acts of aggression must be supported. The security of other states in the region must be secured. I cannot stress enough how important it is that we settle this crisis with peace rather than with war.

On Tuesday last, the Leader of the Opposition questioned the Prime Minister stating that:

> Speaking to an American Senate committee this morning, former American Defence Secretary James Schlesinger said that so far, economic sanctions against Iraq have produced the expected results, but might have to be maintained for a whole year if they are to have a decisive impact. His opinion is shared by a good many international affairs experts.

The Leader asked the Prime Minister if he shares the views of these experts and, if not, why not.

In response, the Prime Minister did not bother to provide full information on the effectiveness of the sanctions. This can only lead one to believe that perhaps the Prime Minister is reluctant to let us in on the facts about sanctions, because there is evidence that they are working.

Since the Second World War, no country has been disciplined so strongly and so completely because of its aggression. With such tight sanctions, it is difficult to imagine how Iraq could possibly be better off for having invaded Kuwait. Therefore, I feel that the sanctions should be given a longer period of time, perhaps six months, or perhaps a year. The precise length of time of the sanctions I am not here to debate tonight.

What I am prepared to say is that if sanctions do not achieve their objective, which is the complete withdrawal from Kuwait of Iraqi forces and the assurance that Saddam Hussein does not plan further aggression against neighbouring states, then war will be an option. It cannot be ruled out. If it should become the most viable option for the fulfilment of international objectives, then Canada will support military action at that time.

In any scenario, the government must not be able to take such steps as it did this summer without consulting the people of Canada through Parliament. Therefore, unless this amendment is adopted, I cannot support the government's action.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have listened carefully today to my colleagues on all sides of the House. I have to say that I think all Canadians have the idea that peace is the most important thing for any country to live by. However, I do feel that there are a few elements in this debate that have been whitewashed and perhaps have to be reviewed.

My colleague mentioned the use of sanctions and the length of time, and I agree totally with everything that has been said. I agree with the last speaker for the government as to the need to find peace.

I think Canadians should realize that the importance of this debate tonight has been to show Canadians that once again we have a government that is proceeding faster than we should be proceeding.

One of the saddest things I have heard was one of our three members who are in Iraq on the radio tonight saying that our government, our country had not done enough to free the hostages over there. I think this is what we have forgotten in this process today.

We have not asked ourselves if we have done enough, before asking for a resolution based on something that may pass in the future, or tomorrow, at the United Nations?

I will deal with that because I asked the Minister of Defence a question specifically about it. I do not think we have tried hard enough as a country who has had a role for peacekeeping that has been well accepted throughout the world to help the remaining hostages in Iraq and Kuwait. We have not tried either in the sense of using the United Nations properly. We have resolutions of the United Nations and we have all the economic sanctions, including the sea and air transport in and out of Iraq. We have not given them time to be effective, in my view.

Furthermore, we have no reporting mechanism to anyone about the effect of the economic sanctions. We just have to accept the information coming from one source or another. There is no UN statement coming out as to the effect. I know that the chairmanship of the United Nations today is in the hands of the United States and that that chairmanship changes to another country at the end of this month. I also know that a chairman of any committee controls the work program of that committee.

I do not want to get into the reasons why we are perhaps on the verge of exercising more force in the Persian Gulf. There will be another day to argue whether they are valid reasons for Canadians, or whether it is business interests like some have implied here tonight.

It may be big business interests in the Middle East that are forcing us into this. We did not go to war or even take this type of precaution in the crisis with Lebanon or in Central America. The draft resolution that is before the UN this week would change the mandate of our forces when they went over initially, which was to enforce economic sanctions. It was not to try and restore peace, as it says in the draft resolution.

We are asked here tonight by this government to pass a motion that supposes something in the future. Our amendment says that we do not mind passing a motion supporting all that the UN has done until today, but not a motion in the House that may or may not have a future resolution. Economic sanctions may start to work tomorrow. Why are we prejudging what the Security Council may or may not do tomorrow by passing a resolution in this House, by pre-empting a process that I think all of us have had a lot of respect for, and that is the United Nations. I do not think there has been any effort on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or our officials at the UN to try and find what the reporting mechanism is going to be for the member states who are taking part in forcing the economic sanctions in the gulf. There is no mechanism. Furthermore, there is no mechanism within the draft resolution tomorrow that would have a reporting of the necessary force or the necessary means to keep peace in the Persian Gulf.

An hon. member: It is committee 661, that Canada co-chaired.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Resolution 661, you mean.

An hon. member: The committee that created that resolution.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): You are talking about the military committee and I have not heard them report anywhere. I have not seen them report once. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will produce the reports of the committee.

• (0000)

However, I can say that we are rushing into an element that has all the hardships of losing a very secure role that we have played up until now, and the role that we have played up until tonight in the gulf. We are being asked to change that and are being asked by this government to pass a motion that will sanction its future moves, probably without having to come back to Parliament. If we sanction the motion tonight or tomorrow, and it will not be because the opposition is voting with it, we are sanctioning future resolutions. It gives the appearance that Parliament has debated and passed something that we have not had an opportunity to debate.

The vagueness of the government's motion, in its efforts to assure compliance with the Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions—and the offensive part is "subsequent resolutions", because it is vague as to what is subsequent resolutions—would be clearly defined if today's date was put in. In the future, we could come back to this House and debate any future resolutions that may be passed by the United Nations. But no, this government wants to pre-empt the Security Council and give the government carte blanche to change the role in the Persian Gulf without coming back to Parliament if the United Nations goes ahead.

In the summer, we saw troops leave Halifax without a resolution as to why they were going to the Persian Gulf. It was not until they were in Gibraltar, I think, that they got the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to join in this debate this evening. I particularly congratulate the government for bringing this debate forward in response, I might say, to requests put forward by various members of the opposition in the last few days and, indeed, because it is the proper thing to do.

It is appropriate that the Parliament of Canada should come together and discuss events as serious as those which have taken place in the Persian Gulf and the implication of the possibility that, for the first time in 37 years, Canadians have been drawn into hostile action.

But the debate we are engaged in today is not about war, it is about peace. The actions of the United Nations are about peace and about how best to bring forward peace. If we want to talk about war, quite frankly, war began on August 2 for the people of Kuwait and, by implication, war began on August 2 for the people of the world, the people who believe that the arbitrary actions of a medieval dictator like Saddam Hussein should not be tolerated in the world.

The events we have seen in the last year or so have been extraordinary and we thought the world was coming together for the first time. Now we are faced with this situation that brings us back down to earth and reminds us that, no matter how civilized the peoples of the world become, there will always be those who cannot play by the rules of civilized people. That is what the debate is about today.

What we have seen take place in the last three months is an extraordinary coming together of the peoples of the world, united through the vehicle of the United Nations, an institution whose credibility, quite frankly in recent years has been brought into question. What we have seen in the last three months is the renewal of the credibility of the United Nations.

I welcome the debate that is taking place this evening. There is something I regret, other than what has gone on with Mr. Saddam Hussein and his supporters who have made necessary the actions of the nations that have come together at the United Nations and, indeed, have made necessary this debate in Parliament today.

There is a second thing that I regret. I must say that honestly I regret the message might go out across the world, to Canadian forces in the gulf, that Canadians do not stand united on this issue, that Canadians do not speak with one voice on this issue, and that is something regrettable.

I do not know and I certainly do not wish to attribute motivation to my hon. friends opposite with respect to what is going on here in this discussion and, indeed, this debate tonight.

Mr. Milliken: Just agree to the amendment.

Mr. McCreath: I read the amendments of the hon. members opposite, both from the Liberal Party and the NDP. Those amendments are saying that Canada tomorrow is not prepared to stand with the United Nations. That is what they are saying. They are saying: "Let's wait. Let's debate. Let's not take a strong stand. Let's not tell this man that the world is not prepared to tolerate his actions". That is what they are saying on the other side. They are proposing that we show exactly what the leader of Iraq is looking to see from the western world. He is looking to see the cracks. He is looking to see those who would break ranks. He is looking to see the weakness and that is precisely what we must not show him.

I cannot help but wonder what would have been said in this country. Canadians are not used to war. It has been 37 years since our troops faced hostile action. What would have been said in 1950? What would Prime Minister St. Laurent have said about the opposition in Parliament that day when the United Nations said: "We have to stand together". If the Parliament of Canada had had to debate, if the people on the other side had said at that time: "We will not stand with the government because whatever this government does we are against". What would the Right Hon. Mackenzie King have said in 1939 if the opposition of the day had stood against the government of that time? I cannot help but think to myself that Neville Chamberlain would have been very much at home in the Liberal Party of Canada today. And what message is being sent out by that action?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there are two messages that the Parliament of this country must send out. One message should be sent to Mr. Saddam Hussein and that is that Canada stands with the world, that Canada is not prepared to tolerate countries invading its neighbours.

I listened earlier to my hon. friends from the NDP saying: "We must give sanctions time to work". Sanctions have not worked for 30 years in South Africa, but we must wait and let sanctions work. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, I do not care what the NDP thinks, sanctions are not good enough for the people of Kuwait.

I heard talk about children being killed in the war. Nobody wants to see children killed, nobody wants to see men or women killed. But tell it to the people of Kuwait. That is who the NDP should be talking to.

The message that we must send first and foremost is that Canada stands with the world.

Second, we must send a message to our troops, to our men and women who are in the gulf. Seventy per cent of those people live in Nova Scotia, my province. I know some of the people who are over there, former friends and colleagues in the navy. We must send a message to them that Canada stands united behind them, that Canada appreciates the courage that they are showing by being there.

We heard earlier a very eloquent speech from an hon. colleague from Carleton—Charlotte. He talked about his personal involvement with his son being over there. Well, there are a lot of people in Nova Scotia who have husbands or wives, or sons or daughters over there. We think about those people and what message are my friends opposite sending to them? I am saying we have to send them a message that Canada appreciates the courage that they are showing. We appreciate these men and women being there. They joined the armed forces. They knew the implications. Canadians are not used to war. We can play on that if we wish, as I think some members of this House have chosen to do by saying somebody might get killed in a war. Yes, Mr. Speaker, somebody might get killed in a war, but with a strong united front, there will be no war and that, surely, is our objective.

I listened earlier to my hon. friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, a very distinguished member of this House and a retired admiral. I could not help but wonder what reaction his friends, his former colleagues in the navy, would have to hearing him and his party stand there equivocating over where we are, saying we cannot take a chance. The implication of their position is very simple: "If the shootin' starts, don't shoot back, we've got to have a debate in Parliament over it". Nonsense! We must give our government a mandate to govern. That is what parliamentary government is all about. So, Mr. Speaker, I do feel strongly about this. I served ten years in the navy myself. I know what it is like to go to sea. I know what it is like to be in danger. I was never in a situation where people were going to be shooting at me. But the bottom line is that is where our people are. We should not laugh about it as my friends opposite are because it is a serious situation.

We have to send a message to the world. We have to send a message to Canadian men and women abroad and that message is that Canada stands with the world, and with our Canadian men and women in the Armed Forces. The Government of Canada, with or without the opposition, will do what is right by the Canadian Armed Forces and, indeed, will do the people of Canada proud in taking the actions that will make it not necessary to have a war and that we will have peace in our time.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly a very difficult act to follow. I do appreciate the member's words and I do concur with him 100 per cent.

I would like to express my support tonight for the resolution we are discussing and point out some of Canada's responsibilities in this particular crisis. We have a long history as peacekeepers and we do have the responsibility today to help restore the peace in the Persian Gulf.

As a member of the United Nations Security Council, we have the responsibility to uphold the charter of the United Nations and all of its resolutions. Ultimately, as the Government of Canada, we have the responsibility to explain to Canadians the role we intend to play in this particular crisis.

The background of this whole situation is well known to all of us. We are aware of the details of how on August 2 Iraq invaded Kuwait. This unprovoked, brutal and most monstrous act of aggression shocked the whole world and triggered one of the most serious international crises of recent times. It was a flagrant violation of international law and has been condemned by the whole international community. Despite the United Nations resolutions creating an international trade embargo and sanctions, Mr. Hussein has seen not fit to back down. Many foreigners, including 45 Canadians, are still being held hostage in Iraq. The threat of future violence toward Saudi Arabia and any other of the gulf states is still a real possibility.

While the sanctions have perhaps produced some changes in the position of Iraq, the Americans and others tell us that it will be perhaps a year before they take effect. I think we need to recognize what the delay while waiting for the sanctions to take a full effect would have. I believe that as we consider the build-up and development of nuclear arms by Iraq and stockpiling of chemical weapons, we realize the threat to all of the peaceful countries in the Middle East.

Mr. Hussein has been described as crazy, but I do not believe he is. I believe he is very shrewd and calculating, and as we have already seen, a very unpredictable person. His recent attempts to lead the whole Arab world against Israel are a very dangerous ploy and will lead to further destabilization in the Middle East.

The motion before us this evening is to support the United Nations resolution which demands that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 and all subsequent resolutions. This resolution provides Iraq with one final opportunity to remove all of its troops from Kuwait and release the foreign hostages. If this is not done, the resolution authorizes member states to use all necessary means to bring an end to this crises. While this does not necessarily mean the immediate use of troops, it does allow those in charge of the UN forces to use force if necessary.

In supporting this motion, we would be supporting the use of force which many feel would be inconsistent with our responsibilities to our traditional peacekeeping role.

We have to ask ourselves this evening what it really means to be peacekeepers. I believe that peacekeeping is an integral part of not only preserving the peace, but sometimes restoring it when it has been disturbed, such as has happened in the Middle East.

As Canadians, we can be justifiably proud of our role as peacekeepers. In March of this year we had the privilege to visit Cyprus where we visited the Canadian troops, who have an excellent role and an excellent reputation as peacekeepers.

We are familiar with the role that Canadians played in the Suez crisis in the 1950s. It was our country under the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester Pearson, who pioneered the United Nations Emergency Force, for which he won the Nobel Peace Prize.

Canada is the only member of the United Nations to have participated in all of the major peacekeeping operations. Our record spans four decades and include operations both within and without the UN auspices. Considering this history, we cannot abandon our role and responsibility as peacekeepers.

A very significant statement was made by our Prime Minister when he said: "Our traditional peacekeeping role neither excludes nor excuses us from the call to resist aggression".

The United Nations Charter does not provide a definition of peacekeeping either. However, peacekeeping reflects one of the first purposes of the UN announced in its preamble to the Charter when it says: "The establishment of conditions under which justice and respect for obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained".

Peacekeeping goes hand in hand with peacemaking. To quote the Secretary General: "As regards international peace and security, the United Nations Charter sets out a process which in its first stage is based on the renunciation of force in international relations and on the peaceful settlement of disputes".

If these principles are rejected, the Charter provides for a collective enforcement by the world community through the Security Council. Such actions range from various forms of embargoes to the use of military forces by the Security Council.

While I believe that we must use every diplomatic tool that we have, one of the best diplomacy tools that we have is to back up our diplomacy with a legitimate threat of force. If approved, the United Nations resolution will strengthen our diplomatic message and convey to Mr. Hussein that disregard for international law cannot, nor will not, be tolerated. Iraq must understand the conviction and the determination of the international community.

A second responsibility we must uphold is our responsibility as a member of the Security Council of the United Nations. As a member of the Security Council, we are responsible for maintaining international peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the UN.

In the event of a threat to peace or an act of aggression, we are to make recommendations as to what action should be taken. We are doing that in this case.

This can include, under the provisions of the Charter, chapter 7, the enforcement action by UN member states, including the use of armed forces or other collective measures for dealing with threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, or acts of aggression.

Canada has played an integral role in the creation of the United Nations and has been actively involved since the beginning. When we were elected to the Security Council two years ago, we won on the first ballot with 80 per cent of the member states voting for us.

We should be very proud as a country to be held in such high esteem throughout the world. How can we let those countries down that voted us to the Security Council when we are faced with such a difficult situation?

When Canada was first elected, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the seriousness of our commitment, said that our role would be to react to issues as they arise, depending on the issue, its timing, its connection to other issues and the crucial question of what is finally possible. He said the question of what is finally possible does not, unfortunately, always conform to what is desirable.

To quote from the speech of our Secretary of State for External Affairs to the United Nations Association, he said: "We will face the choice of working and voting for imperfect compromises that have some chance of success as opposed to speaking and voting for resolutions that sound great, but cannot be applied. This government has no illusions that some of our positions in the Security Council will from time to time displease segments of the Canadian public". This is one of those times. We agree that not everybody is going to agree with what we are doing. However, this is no excuse to shrink from our responsibility to the world community.

Some have accused the government of saying: "How high?" to the United States command of "Jump". This is an insult, as was mentioned earlier tonight, not only to Canada, but to France, the United Kingdom and many other countries that are involved in the Middle East. As the nation with the greatest resources, I believe it is natural that the United States should be the leader in this particular engagement.

This brings me to the last and final responsibility, and that is our responsibility as a government to keep Canadians informed of our position and the role we intend to play. I am glad that we have had this debate tonight to present Canada's position on the proposed UN resolution. I encourage the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister to continue to allow Parliament to play an important part in these decisions.

I support the motion and I hope that our decisions are made in Canada for Canadians.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the hour grows late, and I mean much more than the hour on the clock across from me. Just a year ago the world rejoiced as the walls came tumbling down and peace and democracy seemed to be sweeping huge parts of the world, where for decades the suppression of human potential and human freedom had been the norm. The cold war was ending and for the first time in 50 years we were seeing the possibility of turning the world's resources from instruments of death and destruction to feeding the hungry of the world, nurturing her children and reversing the devastating damage we do every day to the bounty of the earth and to the very ability of our planet to sustain life.

Now we find ourselves on the brink of war. We find Canada turning its back on the role for which we have become one of the most respected nations of the world, the role of peacemaker and peacekeeper. That role, despite what we have heard from the government side tonight, has not been a role of wimpish submission to aggression or to the violation of human rights. It has been one of going courageously into dangerous situations, acting with restraint but with the clear objective that our forces were there to prevent the outbreak of hostilities, of violence, of killing and that our diplomatic efforts in other places were sustaining and supporting their efforts to prevent war.

Now instead we have adopted a warmongering, sabre-rattling stance. We hear our Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of National Defence saying: "We will do what needs to be done with or without the United Nations".

It is important to understand what is before us tonight. The only purpose of the motion before us is to supersede a motion that was adopted by this House just a month ago, a motion that says we abhor the aggression against Kuwait, we support the United Nations resolutions calling for sanctions and we commit the Government of Canada reporting back to the Canadian people through their elected Parliament if further action is to be taken in the Middle East.

The government now wants to supersede that. It wants a wide open door to take whatever action it deems appropriate, without the responsibility to report to Parliament and to account to Canadians for its actions.

It is also important to understand what the motion is that will be dealt with by the Security Council tomorrow and that the government wants to support on behalf of the people of Canada. For a week now we have been subjected to suggestions and statements about what this motion is. I question whether many members on the other side have read the motion.

We have heard that this is a necessary step so that the United Nations can act with force. That is not what the motion says. The motion authorizes member states, not the United Nations, but any one of those member states, to take all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions, that is to have Iraq withdraw from Kuwait. Any one of those member states, with whatever weapons are at their disposal, with or without the rest of the United Nations members, is authorized by this motion to act.

Furthermore, those same member states are authorized to use all necessary means to restore international peace and security in the area. That goes far beyond Kuwait and Iraq. That can touch any one of a number of volatile situations in the Middle East. I ask the members opposite to think of all the countries in the United Nations, many of which are countries in the Middle East, and ask whether we really want, as a country, to give UN sanction to any one of those states in taking the action they think is necessary to "restore international peace and security in this area".

We are all aware of the numerous difficult and volatile situations that exist in that part of the world. Why does the Prime Minister want this carte blanche, not for the United Nations, but for the member states of the United Nations? What justification has he provided this House? Just as the government refused to come before Parliament and justify why we were putting Canadian men and women into a potential war zone in the first place, he has now refused to tell us what sanctions have accomplished, what they could accomplish by Christmas Day, what they could accomplish by January 15, and how long we would need sanctions to work. Frankly, how he can ask us on the basis of no justification as to what is happening with the sanctions to get this kind of open door to any further action without the specific information coming before this Parliament, I do not understand.

The Prime Minister says "trust me" but what reason have we to trust. He wraps himself in the United Nations flag, but it was not on the basis of the UN resolution that we committed troops to the Persian Gulf. We did that two weeks before the United Nations passed any resolution. It was not on the basis of any United Nations resolution that we moved our troops from outside the gulf to inside the gulf. It was not on the basis of any United Nations resolution, it was on the basis of a statement by the U.S. air force chief of staff that the U.S. was prepared to unleash a massive bombing attack against Baghdad that we committed our CF-18s.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said this motion is not a threat. Of course it is a threat. I question whether those who are making those threats, rattling those sabres, even understand the enemy well enough to know what effect this threat will have. We have assumed an air of superiority that discounts the values that guide the Arab nations and guide Iraq. We are not prepared to deal with them because we do not give them any credibility.

Horrible crimes have been committed against our own humanity when we fail to give value to each and every life on this planet. Hitler was able to perpetrate the Holocaust based on the belief that Jews were not quite human. Atrocities happened in Vietnam based on the views that people with yellow skin and slanted eyes were not quite human. Violence against women and children continues because we are able to convince ourselves that they are not quite human.

The UN was formed with the determination to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war. Surely we have progressed in our evolution as human beings beyond where we believe that only brute force is the way to resolve disputes. We should make no mistake in this volatile situation that a war puts at risk nothing less than the survival of the world.

I do not believe for one moment in appeasement or acquiescence or acceding to the aggression of a Saddam Hussein. Killing is not the only way to be tough. Sometimes it takes more toughness, more courage and more strength to last out a peaceful resolution of aggression.

I would like to see Canada taking much more of a leadership role in this issue than we have done. We look to the United Nations and welcome its concerted action, yet every day we continue to biologically and chemically destroy our world. The Minister of the Environment tells us that he won't take any action on that destruction of our world until two years from now when we might have an international agreement.

The appalling contradiction in our words and actions is diminishing Canada's reputation internationally and I call upon the government to either accept the amendment to this motion or to withdraw it and to let stand the motion of October 19 that we support the UN in sanctions; we will continue those sanctions until the aggression is undone and we will do nothing further until we come back to this Parliament and speak to the people of Canada.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we cannot and will not vote for this motion because it leaves far too many questions unanswered. The motion asks our Parliament to endorse not just one, but many Security Council resolutions, as spelled out in the motion before us, including resolutions whose wording we do not know because they have not been finalized nor passed. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State to External Affairs, in his intervention, revealed the weakness of this aspect of the resolution some five hours ago.

Second, we will not support it because the effect of sanctions which we all subscribe to and support is still unknown and has just begun to be felt.

Third, we will not support it because the environmental consequences both in human and ecological terms are frightening.

I would like to put on record in that respect a few paragraphs from a speech given by the King of Jordan, His Majesty King Hussein I, some three weeks ago in Geneva on the occasion of the Second World Conference on Climate Warming. He said:

> A war in the Gulf would not only result in devastating human death and injury, tremendous economic loss, and prolonged political confrontation between Orient and Occident. It could also lead to an environmental catastrophe the likes of which the world has not experienced since the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant—A war in the Gulf could result in the use of chemical and biological weapons, and widespread destruction to oil fields and oil storage depots.
> The preliminary calculations of our scientists indicate that if half Kuwait's oil reserves (or about 50 billion barrels) were to go up in flames during a war, the environmental impact would be swift, severe and devastating. Emissions of carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide would surpass internationally accepted safety standards by factors of hundreds, and, without factoring in wind effects, would blacken the skies over a radius of at least 750 kilometres from Kuwait—that is, all of Kuwait, Iraq, Bahrain, Qatar, the Emirates and the waters of the Gulf, and most of Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Syria and Iran.
> Other than poisonous emissions of carbon monoxide and sulphur dioxide, the emission of carbon dioxide will increase by at least a factor of 100 over the current total global emission of 5.5 billion tons a year. Lingering in the atmosphere for around 100 years, this massive CO2 emission would promote the greenhouse effect, and contribute to global warming, climatic changes, lower global food production, and human and animal health deterioration.

The environmental and human toll of such a scenario would be beyond our wildest fears. If oil production facilities suffered long-term damage, which is likely in the event of war, the catastrophe we warn of would be compounded by the devastating impact of the loss of oil imports for economies and peoples around the world.

Because of time limitations I will not go beyond these major quotations from that speech.

• (0035)

It seems to me that the premise that we ought to adopt as a civilized society with the record that Canada has would be that it is in the Persian Gulf an illusion to believe that peace can be attained through an act of war.

I am referring, in particular, to an editorial in The Globe and Mail today which is pursuing this perverse logic, trying to convince its readership that we can pursue peace through an act of war in the Persian Gulf.

Second, the United Nations is an instrument of peace. It should not be involved in offensive actions.

Third, Canada should pursue a policy of voting against any possible offensive action in the gulf, not subscribe to potential ones and ask the Parliament of Canada to subscribe to commit itself to subsequent resolutions, the wording of which we do not know. The draft which is in our possession and to which colleagues of mine have made reference earlier was produced on Monday of this week and has already been put on record on several occasions. It would give a green light and a blank cheque to the use of all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions.

I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs would not, in all honesty, expect Parliament to submit itself to resolutions that have not yet been drafted, agreed upon, and passed by virtue of this draft that is in our possession as of Monday of this week from the Canadian mission in New York.

Mr. Boyer: Certainly not.

Mr. Caccia: I am glad to hear that the parliamentary secretary concurs with that.

It seems to us that major features of Canadian policies have to be formulated as they have been by the distinguished Leader of the Senate group in the other place, who said on November 20 that Canada's policy should consist of major features:

First, Canada should work principally through the United Nations and not bilaterally—

Second, while safeguarding humanitarian action, medical supplies and food supplies, Canada should favour putting the maximum amount of pressure on Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait, short of offensive action.

Third, an early report should be obtained—

We have complained about all afternoon and evening:

—from the Security Council sanctions committee to be made public and discussed in the Canadian Parliament.

Fourth, Canada should make it clear that it will not consider offensive military action in the Gulf—

Fifth, Canadian land forces should not be sent to the Gulf area—

Sixth, Canada should initiate rounds of consultation with the countries concerned to find ways of de-escalating the conflict.

Finally, the Canadian government should not initiate or participate in offensive action without bringing the issue before both Houses of Parliament.

What we are witnessing, instead, is an erratic course of action of this government, not a well thought out policy that is implemented according to some very clearly set premises and principles.

There is agreement in this House it seems to me at the end of this debate on two points. First, we all agree that the action on the part of Iraq invading in Kuwait ought to be rejected, has been rejected, and must continue to be rejected and condemned. Second, there is no one in the House who would disagree that we fully support the use of sanctions. But beyond that we part ways.

We as Liberals are convinced that the solution to the Persian Gulf crisis must be found through dialogue and negotiations, not through armed conflict. The UN's role in this issue will not be ultimately successful and the world body prestige enhanced if it is not actively involved in the peace process.

Why is Canada not discussing ideas for a peacekeeping force, for instance? It has not been pursued in the Security Council by Canada, consistent with the tradition and experience that we have in this respect. How about the UN led strategy for curbing the global arms threat to avoid a repetition of the situation?

• (0040)

We believe that Canadians are looking for answers to creative questions and not to initiatives that we are being asked to pursue by way of commitments which would inevitably lead to Canada being involved in aggressive initiatives in the gulf area.

In his intervention this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs failed to prove his case. It was his responsibility to convince this House that there was urgency and an absolute necessity for Parliament to endorse this resolution. Instead he engaged in an elaboration of an historical nature as to what has happened so far and urged Parliament to follow the lead without, however, giving us the reasons for doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I see you signalling. I appreciate the opportunity for this intervention at this late hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next two speakers who will have 10 minutes each will be the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River and the hon member for North Island—Powell River. That will take us to around one o'clock, and I know that there are still two or three speakers.

I can, by unanimous consent, not see the clock or I am at your disposal as to whatever you would like me to do. There are three extra speakers, the member for Parkdale—High Park, the member for Beaver River, and the member for Fraser Valley West.

An hon. member: And the member for Winnipeg North.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is a little more than that. Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there might be unanimous consent, if there was a clear indication that there would be an absolute limit and no questions and answers, to a brief 10 minutes for each of the remaining four speakers?

Mr. Boyer: There is more than four.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): It would be a shame to limit a debate of this importance at this hour. Haste and brief remarks would facilitate in moving it along.

Mr. Flis: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am a little disappointed to hear from the parliamentary secretary that he did not give unanimous consent. Usually he is a very reasonable colleague and does agree to such a request. It would be a shame on such an important topic to see the clock. We could go half an hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Making a decision at this time of night when we have explained to all colleagues who have an interest in this matter that the debate would conclude at 1 p.m. and now making exceptions to what has been established does not seem fair to the colleagues who would have wished to speak and because of notification of 10-minute speeches and the closure at one o'clock are not here to take part in the extension. I find that unfair to the colleagues who are not here at this time.

Mr. Wenman: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can understand that the government wants the debate concluded and would not want to think that it was opening the debate through the night or this kind of thing. However if we agree, by unanimous consent, to limit it just to those on your list, the debate does come to an early conclusion and in fact rewards the patience of those of us who have sat here and waited so long to speak, because it was one of the most important issues we can face, an issue of life and death.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again I have to ask for unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. You will have to split that eight minutes apiece between yourself and your colleague.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be here to participate in this debate, even though the hour is late. As the previous interchange has indicated that my time will be quite limited, I would like to deal with some of the highlights of what I had planned to say.

We have heard many words of high principle and abstract thoughts about the nature of the United Nations, the international community, international law, and so on.

• (0045)

We are also talking about a very stark reality, a reality that is very clear, for example, to the 18-year-old in the Co-op service station that I went into on the weekend. He asked whether, in fact, he would be subject to a draft as a foreseeable consequence of the actions of the government and the United Nations in the Middle East, something that he felt personally to be a fear for him.

The fears that this young man expressed are indicative of the thoughts going through the minds of many young people in the country. We too often ignore that it is those people facing the direct reality, and not those of us who sit in the House.

At the other end, there are people probably not many blocks from here, and people in the Pentagon who are perhaps at this very moment, if they work this late, planning meticulously what would happen under various scenarios. How many people would die, how they would die, and when they would die. These things are well planned in advance and, if the people of Canada had that kind of information laid before them by the government, rather than lofty rhetoric and appeals to emotion, it might well cast a much different light on the question we are debating. That is the reality of what we are talking about tonight.

I certainly stand with my party and, in fact, the whole opposition in opposing the resolution put forward by the government. I do so for several reasons and many of those have been expressed very well by other speakers tonight. Basically, we cannot issue a blank cheque for what will happen after January 15. With all due respect, I do not think we can issue our own government a blank cheque for what will happen after January 15. I do not think, given the wording of the UN resolution which allows any member of the international community to take action, we cannot allow a blank cheque there either. It has been clear as these things evolved through the summer—the Oka dispute and our first excursion into the gulf—that, in fact, the government is prepared to move well ahead of the authority it has from Parliament and to move well ahead of the rationale which it might be offering.

This whole scenario and the resolution before us indicate that what we might have been doing up to now might well have been a fraud, in that it implies that we never were serious about sanctions, that the UN body was never serious about sanctions, that the U.S. was never serious about sanctions, and that the objective was always to invade and engage in a military conflict. Surely, all our experience with sanctions—and there has been considerable experience with sanctions internationally—has indicated that sanctions would not work this fast. It is silly to say that the possibilities of sanctions have been exhausted or would be exhausted by January 15. That clearly is not within the realm of imagination, especially when we are being asked again to accept a blank cheque when there has been no evidence before us that the sanctions are not working.

This was underlined when we heard the member from Surrey say: "What if it takes a year for sanctions to work?" Well, what if it takes a year for sanctions to work? Surely, a year of sanctions is a much preferable scenario than a blood-bath involving our own young men and women in the Middle East. Spending a year to make sure that sanctions work and engaging in other forms of international pressure are surely preferable to engaging in a blood-bath in the Middle East.

I was disturbed in this debate by the questioning of the motives of people who perhaps do not support this resolution and the implication that perhaps those who oppose the government's resolution, somehow or other, are condoning the actions of Saddam Hussein, are in favour of the expansionism, and of the flouting international law. I would like to ask the government, does it feel that the motives of people like the Christian Peacemaker Teams, a group from the Church of the Brethren, the Brethren in Christ, the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church, the delegation that departed last weekend, should be questioned. I might add that I might well have been a member of that delegation if Federal Express had not sent my passport to Winnipeg instead of Washington.

This delegation has been in Iraq for some days. Their objective was to meet with Iraqi families, to visit non-religious institutions such as hospitals, schools and other projects to communicate concerns for a just peace with the political leaders in Baghdad and so on.

I received a fax today from that delegation. Some of the things they say are interesting. It says: "Shortages are beginning. Sugar, milk, medical supplies, petrol additives, water purification chemicals are all in short supply". It says: "Everyone is growing in apprehension and conviction about the crisis". It says further: "In other meetings senior Iraqis underlined their desire to negotiate and said that they await a 'hint' of interest from the U.S.". All of these are indications to me that the sanctions are working, that the effects are being felt. Surely it is very much premature at this point to say that sanctions are not working.

We also have heard an appeal to principle, the principles of international law. It strikes me as ironic. My first experience at the United Nations came when I was making an intervention on behalf of East Timor at the same time as the initial debates were occurring in the Security Council regarding the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait at the beginning of August. It was an interesting juxtaposition, where on the one hand the world community was solidly condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, while at the same time totally ignoring the invasion of East Timor by Indonesia 15 years ago. The international community has been silent on that question ever since.

It struck me that it must be a matter of who ends up with the oil. In the case of Iraq obviously the bad guys ended up with the oil and in the case of East Timor the good guys ended up with the oil. That seems to be very much what these high flown principles come down to when they are examined closely.

In conclusion, I would like to urge the government to not let us go down the slippery slope that we are on, to not let ourselves get sucked into a situation that we cannot get out of, to not engage in a kind of demonization that allows us no options. Canada has been a leader in the search for peace internationally. We are not showing leadership now. Let us show leadership again. As a former cultural hero of a particular generation said: "Let's give the sanctions a chance, let's give peace a chance".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Fraser Valley West on a point of order.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government to reconsider the request for unanimous consent in order that they avoid the appearance of unfortunate coincidence in that I am the only government member not being allowed to speak, especially since I have informed the government that I cannot support their motion at this time. I would ask for their concurrence to be heard.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the problem with this is that as the evening dwindled on, members have relied on the unanimous consent of the House earlier to go to 1 a.m. and then left. There were a number of MPs who wanted to speak. I said they would not be able to and they went home. Recently we had the same thing and after that, 10 to 15 minutes ago other MPs left. I am trying to be fair on this and certainly not prevent anybody speaking no matter what point—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I think that is certainly regrettable. It is regrettable that the government has seen fit to do this. We have heard the arguments on why and they can be judged by the public. Mr. Speaker, I think in a few moments we will have finished this. What I would like to do is basically communicate to this House the feeling of my constituents. After all, we all represent a large number of people in this House of Commons, where the issues are aired and they are decided.

• (0055)

The people I represent do support the United Nations and they support it vigorously. They believe that the United Nations and its collective security approach is the only way to go. The allegations that that is not true, that I do not support it, my colleagues do not, and the people I represent do not is false.

They do not support Saddam Hussein. They do not support the invasion of Kuwait. They are not weak on this. They are absolutely firm. So am I as are my colleagues.

They do not believe, however, that the Canadian Armed Forces should be used to attack Iraq. The reason they do not believe that is that at the present time there is no one shooting inside Kuwait, or Iraq is not shooting at its neighbours at this point. The situation has stopped.

We believe that this government and the United States in the United Nations will convince their United Nations colleagues to use force to attack when nobody is actually shooting at this point for whatever reason, and we believe that is absolutely wrong. A million people will die, most of them women and children, but certainly members of the Canadian Armed Forces will die, and they could die in large numbers if the conflict takes on the complexion of the Iran–Iraq war. Americans will die in large numbers, as will members of the armed forces of every other nation. We will kill probably a million Iraqis as well, women and children, the elderly. It will be an absolute blood–bath.

That is what we have before us tonight. My constituents do not believe that that should happen, in spite of the polls that appear, in spite of what the government might believe.

The other thing they do not believe is the Prime Minister of Canada. Part of the dilemma of this country on the unity issue and on so many other issues is that the Prime Minister of Canada has lost the confidence of the nation. He is not viewed as a strong leader in whom the confidence of the citizenry exists.

What they fear the most and what I fear the most is that this open–ended resolution has been constructed by intelligent people to leave room for the government to act unilaterally. We have heard backbenchers stand in this House, even cabinet ministers, and say: "Oh, no, we would never do anything like that".

They have in fact done that before. I would point to the GATT agreement on the west coast in which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, now the Minister of Indian Affairs, stood up and said: "We will never let this thing come to pass. It would be catastrophic for the people on the west coast". The Prime Minister said: "Sorry. We are going to let it happen because our friends, the Americans, want that to happen".

We believe that will happen with this situation. When the Americans go, they are going to say to the Prime Minister of this country that he is going with them and that is the reason why we have an open–ended resolution. That is why the United Nations has an open–ended resolution.

The people I represent recognize in this Prime Minister an individual who will leave himself an out to use the Armed Forces, to not call back Parliament and to basically support the Americans who are the primary initiators of this action to leap into a blood–bath in the Middle East. This will be absolutely catastrophic.

I intend to go from this House because I do not believe that the other side of the House is acting in a responsible and honest fashion and I am going to urge citizens in every community to get out to demonstrate and to actively fight this government in its decision to lead us close and into a war in the Persian Gulf.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier, this sitting of the debate is now deemed adjourned and the House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock a.m. this day, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1 a.m.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

FUTURE EXPANSION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to propose a resolution in the House that has been discussed by all sides of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas:

> Whereas the game of hockey is part of the Canadian identity and mindful of the fact that the National Hockey League is considering expansion;
> And whereas this House is of the opinion that any future expansion of the NHL would benefit from the inclusion of Canadian teams;
> Therefore, that this House supports the efforts of Ottawa and Hamilton in their bids to obtain National Hockey League franchises.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, we have no problem with the content of the motion. Because we were unable to get agreement with the other two parties that our leader would be allowed 20 minutes to speak on this very important issue, which will be dealt with this morning, we said that we would not put any other procedures up this morning. We agreed with the content. Now we have a government backbencher getting up on a procedural motion after an agreement that we would not do so. It does not make sense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If there is no consent, we will go to Routine Proceedings.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 83 petitions.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have more petitions from Canadians in the metropolitan Toronto area arguing that at the present time the Government of Canada has seen fit to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers. It now proposes to include them in the GST. Their argument is that there has been no such tax since Confederation.

The petitioners are lobbying this House and this government, first of all, to get rid of the GST, and failing that, no GST be imposed on printed material.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to add these petitions containing 335 names to the 4,000 persons who have signed petitions asking the government to ban the use of MMT in gasoline. Methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl is what is meant by MMT. MM-3, a form of manganese, comes from the exhaust of cars. It is an insidious neuro-toxic substance taken in through the human respiratory system.

When the Department of Transport conducts their emission tests on Canadian automobiles, they do not use gasoline that contains MMT because the cars do not pass the test using this additive which has been banned in the United States since 1978.

These petitioners are calling upon the government to ban this insidious substance which attacks the brain cells of younger people whose immune systems are not fully developed.

• (1110 )

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions to the House. One is from some of the residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands who signed a petition opposed to the government cutbacks in public transportation and specifically cutbacks in the VIA Rail network in Canada.

I am sure the petitioners would be upset at the number of cuts that we have had in this area already. There is apprehension, given the run-down of VIA Rail that the government is engineering, there may be more. The petitioners call upon Parliament to reinstate, not cancel in whole or in part, any rail passenger service in Canada. Some of the signatures were before the cuts and some after the cuts.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): The second petition is from residents of the city of Toronto. These Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax in so far as the tax applies on books and the printed word. They support, of course, the amendment put forward by the Liberal senators in the other place supporting the cut of this vicious tax on books and the printed word and urging the Parliament of Canada to oppose the goods and services tax, specifically that portion of the tax that applies to books.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise once again, day after day, month after month to bring to this government's attention the thousands of petitions that have been presented to this House with respect to the unfortunate tax this government has decided to put on intellectual property, on books, and on magazines.

I ask this government to stop being so stubborn and to reconsider the tax on reading materials. The government is now well aware that the province of Quebec does not intend to tax intellectual property and reading materials. I would suggest that the government take a good lesson from the province of Quebec and the millions of Canadians who agree with it.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for recognizing me under the provisions of Standing Order 36 in order to place a petition on the table with regard to the goods and services tax.

A number of the petitioners come from the great province of British Columbia. They wish to register their complaint that the Government of Canada should not proceed with the goods and services tax as it will be a very prohibitive and negative factor in terms of the goods and services that they will have to purchase.

Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by individuals from the province of Alberta, which I am sure is dear to your heart, and they too, like previous petitioners, are opposed to the goods and services tax. They call upon the Government of Canada to move forthwith and withdraw the goods and services tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is very welcome.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I stand before this House to present a petition on behalf of people from Toronto, London, and even those people from the riding of the Minister of Finance, asking this government to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status of the printed word on books, newspapers and magazines by retaining the zero rate, instead of imposing the GST on learning materials.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour, duty and privilege to present to this House, under Standing Order 36, a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

This petition comes from the riding of the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk. Many of the petitioners are residents of Brantford, Mill Grove, Simcoe, Waterford and Princeton. These petitioners strongly oppose the goods and services tax, an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that will hit them not only with higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, taxing books, the Bible, university learning material in the year of literacy?

This petition says no to the goods and services tax and asks that the members in the other place, do all in their power to prevent it from passing.

FOOD PACKAGING AND LABELLING

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present this petition, on behalf of a number of my constituents in Scarborough.

They are concerned about the food packaging and the labelling of food packaging, as that relates to allergic reactions. The Allergy Information Association has done a great deal of work on this. The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to enact legislation, amending the food and drug regulations, in order to require manufacturers to list on pre-packaged foods, in place of the general classifications, the specific food ingredients and additives and, as well, to require restaurateurs and food retailers to provide, on demand, to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INVASION OF KUWAIT

UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 28, the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

And on the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "its" and substituting the following:

"current efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions adopted as of 28 November 1990, and that this support shall not be interpreted as approval of the use of Canadian Forces for offensive action without further consultation with and approval by this House."

And on the amendment of Mr. Brewin:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

"and further, that this House oppose use of force against Iraq until sanctions and other United Nations measures have had time to succeed and urges the government to seek amendments to the currently proposed Security Council resolution to that effect."

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Security Council of the United Nations will vote on a resolution authorizing member states, co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, and I quote from the resolution: "to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660, and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and to restore peace and security in the area".

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada will vote, this afternoon, in favour of this resolution of the Security Council because Canadians believe profoundly in the United Nations; Canadians support the rule of international law; and, Canadians understand the need for collective security. Now is the time to vote.

In endorsing this resolution, Canada will join the international community in sending President Hussein a clear message that the time has come to take the United Nations directive seriously. The international community will also be giving him, and this I believe is an important consideration, a very clear signal of a "pause of goodwill", during which time he is encouraged and, indeed, invited to release the hostages and to withdraw his forces from Kuwait.

As President Gorbachev of the Soviet Union stated yesterday: "The fate of Iraq is now in the hands of (President Hussein) and time is expiring". Peace is jeopardized, not by the resolution being discussed at the Security Council of the United Nations this afternoon, but by the actions taken by Iraq during the last four months. Peace would be fatally undermined if nations like Canada failed to take appropriate measures and the United Nations was weakened and diminished.

• (1120 )

Although Kuwait is distinct from Canada, geographically, Canadian interests are directly engaged in the conflict there.

The Iraqi invasion of Kuwait is a blatant contravention of the system of international law that Canadians among many others have painstakingly helped to create since the Second World War. In fact, no country has a greater interest than Canada in the promotion, the defence and the respect of the rule of law.

The objective of that law, in part, is to ensure the security of smaller countries in face of larger neighbours, and to provide the means to settle disputes peacefully.

The invasion of Kuwait puts the concept of collective security, as provided for in the United Nations Charter, to a decisive test. Article 1 of the Charter reads, in part, as follows:

The Purposes of the United Nations are to maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace—

Those words were incorporated right into the Charter of the United Nations.

Today's UN resolution is not just the culmination of diplomatic activity over the past four months. It is also in some important ways the realization of diplomatic aspirations held by many since the founding of the international organization.

With the end of the Cold War, the international community has the opportunity at last to transform the potential of the United Nations into performance. The visionaries who created the United Nations were idealists, but they were not dreamers.

They were determined: "to make certain," as Mr. Pearson wrote in 1945, "that never again should an aggressor be permitted to strike down one nation after another before the peace-loving nations of the world organize and take concerted action against it".

Let me repeat what Mr. Pearson wrote: "never again should an aggressor be permitted to strike down one nation after another before the peace-loving nations of the world organize and take concerted action against it".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: What Mr. Pearson wrote was true in 1945, and it is no less valid in 1990. He understood—indeed those who brought the United Nations together understood—that the United Nations could only be effective if everyone recognized and accepted that security was indivisible. During the 40 years of the Cold War, the world allowed itself—sometimes in dramatic ways—to forget that important lesson. We have had to send young sailors, soldiers, airmen and women into active service in the Persian Gulf. I know that all members of the House will join with me today in saluting again the courage and the dedication of these brave young Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The United Nations was prevented by the Cold War from responding to other acts of aggression over the years. But that situation has now changed, in very dramatic and remarkable ways. Witness the extraordinary co-operation between the Soviet Union and the United States in this and other important areas around the world, to witness the progressive and the dynamic attitude of President Gorbachev and contrast that in similarly explosive situations in the past with the attitudes of his predecessors.

This is a unique time in international affairs. Because of that, the situation has now changed. With the end of the Cold War, the United Nations has the opportunity again to act collectively in the defence of the security of its members. The United Nations is acting with prudence and care and it is precisely because of its moderation that the United Nations today deserves Canada's support.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: What is at stake, Mr. Speaker, is not just the future of Kuwait but also, in many important ways, the future of the United Nations. We know what happened to the League of Nations when it stood by as Mussolini invaded Ethiopia. It was reduced to impotence and to scorn. Men and women around the world who believed in liberty and freedom paid an enormous price as the effectiveness of the League disintegrated.

This cannot and must not be allowed to happen to the increasing and effective moral authority that the United Nations is now bringing in a dozen different ways to questions around the world. This cannot happen. What happened to the League cannot and must not ever be allowed to happen to the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the lessons of the past must be learned.

Any weakening of the UN, would engender an escalation of military spending for self-defence around the world and a proliferation of ever more dangerous and destructive arms—in short, the creation of a much more dangerous world.

And we know that Iraq, which is already working on weapons of mass destruction and on the means of delivering them over long distances, would become even more uncontrollable.

Canadian interests in Kuwait and the region go beyond the present and potential military dangers and the preservation of the principle of collective security.

The inalienable human rights of millions of people have been, and are still being, callously overridden by Iraq and countless atrocities have been committed against innocent people.

And the economic impacts of the Gulf crisis have been serious on the people of the energy-poor, heavily indebted countries of the third world and on the reconstruction of the newly liberated countries of Eastern Europe which need additional assistance from countries like Canada and other industrialized countries, assistance that is necessarily fragmented as a result of the entirely unusual circumstances in the Gulf.

So Canadian interests are very much engaged in this issue. Nor is the challenge to those interests and to our basic human values ever likely to be more clear or the need to join in a collective response more compelling. In its contempt for international opinion. the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait is one of the most brazen acts of aggression of our age.

Iraq has inflicted death and destruction on its small neighbour, plundered that country, detained foreigners, including Canadians, against their will and given guest workers, many penniless, the choice of braving the desert in August or starving to death.

Since he first used force to occupy Kuwait in August, he has threatened to invade Saudi Arabia, to attack Israel with chemical and biological weapons, to sponsor terrorism against those who resist his aggression and to destroy the oil fields of the Arabian Peninsula.

And this from a man who started a war with another of his neighbours, Iran, that lasted eight years and cost close to a million lives—almost an entire generation wiped out as a result of an act of aggression. This from a man who used poison gas in that war, including against his own citizens.

• (1130)

[English]

What is at stake in the Gulf are the foundations of peace and the norm of civilization. The international community must prevail. It is giving diplomacy every chance to work as it must.

As a member of the United Nations Security Council, Canada has worked hard to help draft and pass a series of principled step-by-step resolutions designed to persuade Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait.

We have helped the United Nations design and implement economic sanctions against Iraq that are the most stringent ever adopted. We have ourselves respected those sanctions scrupulously. Indeed, I think that I indicated earlier to the House that the first implication of the international application of sanctions occurred at the Port of Vancouver where Canada immediately interrupted a possible shipment that would have violated even inadvertently the first orders that emanated from the Security Council.

We have dispatched three warships and a squadron of CF-18 fighter aircraft and approximately 1,700 personnel to resist Iraqi aggression and to enforce the United Nations sanctions.

In the many discussions I have had with President Bush on this subject, I have consistently counselled both restraint in securing Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait and the need to work at all times within the authority of the United Nations Charter.

Indeed, the New York Times reported in August—I believe on its front page—an important disagreement that took place in respect of an interpretation of article 51 where Canada, through our distinguished ambassador, Yves Fortier, led the fight in the Security Council to insist that the suggestion by the United States that any concept of unilateral action at that point in time must be resisted and that the solidarity that this had engendered at the United Nations must be respected.

I believe that that action taken by the Government of Canada on the instructions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador Fortier resulted in the solidarity we know today. It was consistent with the finest traditions of Canadian diplomacy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: That has been my consistent message as well in discussions with President Gorbachev, former Prime Minister Thatcher, President Mitterrand, Prime Minister Andreotti, Chancellor Kohl and other leaders.

It was also the message conveyed by Mr. Clark in the past few days in his most recent discussions with President Mubarak of Egypt, President Ozal of Turkey, King Hussein of Jordan and Prime Minister Shamir of Israel.

The entire Canadian policy in this regard, Mr. Speaker, has been designed with a peaceful solution in mind: support for the United Nations, implementation of sanctions in Canada itself, increased consultations with world leaders exploring all conceivable avenues toward a peaceful solution, deployment of military support to seek to enforce United Nations sanctions and unrelenting diplomatic efforts to secure the release of all Canadians being illegally held in Iraq.

In our discussions with world leaders, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence, and I have found a remarkable consensus that the best solution to the crisis in the Gulf is indeed the one that Canada has articulated consistently at the United Nations, namely, a peaceful one.

However, we have also found that a very strong consensus exists to the effect that if peaceful means do not work, recourse would have to be added to other necessary means. While the UN sanctions are undoubtedly being felt by the Iraqi and Kuwaiti people, we have found no widespread confidence that they are sufficient to bring about the desired result: namely, to persuade President Hussein to withdraw his forces from Kuwait.

The situation Canada faces is clear. I can tell you that Canada will stand with the overwhelming majority of the world community, including all of our partners in the Security Council, in giving Saddam Hussein an opportunity to reflect carefully on the consequences of his action and a reasonable timetable to withdraw from Kuwait, but withdraw from Kuwait he must.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: President Hussein, I very much regret to say, appears to be quite prepared to see his people endure hardship indefinitely so he can hang on to Kuwait. We see no contradiction between continuing to apply pressure through economic sanctions, the action of the United Nations, in other words, giving diplomacy a chance and giving President Hussein a period of time to withdraw from Kuwait.

[Translation]

While the Security Council was passing repeated resolutions ordering Iraq to abandon its conquest of Kuwait, President Hussein formally annexed that country, plundered its wealth, brutalized its people, and tried to erase its very identity.

His response to the world community's repeated urgent demands that he withdraw his forces from Kuwait was to send another 250,000 soldiers to that unfortunate country. And to try to protect himself from harm he has detained thousands of foreigners and, cynically, has used many as human shields at strategic locations. Meanwhile, the suffering of the Kuwait people continues!

And the risk persists of an accidental launch of full-scale war in the most volatile region in the world, with consequences that could engulf everyone.

President Hussein is a man of limited acquaintance with the world outside his own borders. From the beginning he appears to have underestimated what the international reaction would be to his attack on Kuwait.

It seems to take a pretty clear and fothright message Mr. Speaker, to persuade him that times have changed, that the will of the world community will not be thwarted and that he will, one way or another, have to leave Kuwait.

[English]

Short of the use of force itself, today's UN Security Council resolution is the strongest possible message the international community can send to him.

Members of this House understand at least as well as anyone that we Canadians are a peaceful people.

In Canada, our national day is a time for picnics and family, not for displays of military might. But we Canadians have also learned the lessons of history. We know that not everyone shares our respect for international law and for the norms of civilized international behaviour.

As Mr. Pearson pointed out so eloquently: "We have also learned the consequences of appeasement".

We know that if Iraq profits from its aggression, the whole idea of collective security will be fatally undermined and the world will become a much more dangerous place. This cannot be allowed to happen.

The object of the exercise at the United Nations today is peace. Although opposition parties have expressed some concerns, some of which I can understand, I hope all members of the House will support the United Nations resolution today in the interests of international solidarity and in the face of a serious threat to world peace.

• (1140)

The Toronto Star pointed out in its lead editorial this morning, and I quote:

> For Canada to vote against such a resolution would be to send the wrong signal to Saddam at a critical stage of this psychological warfare.
> It would also break faith with an unprecedented consensus that has emerged on this issue between east and west, Arabs and non-Arabs.

I think The Star has made two very important points. The UN's quite unprecedented achievements need now to be sustained by a solid indication of international support. What gives rise to war, Mr. Speaker, is the collapse of international order, and the collapse of international order comes about when member states allow international law to be violated and the United Nations to be ignored. The integrity of the United Nations and its charter is now at stake, and that integrity must be preserved.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We hope for the sake of all concerned that President Hussein heeds the United Nations message and withdraws peacefully. That is Canada's policy. That is Canada's objective at the Security Council today, and that has been the objective of our policy from the very beginning.

We strongly urge President Hussein to do so in the interests of his own people, his own nation, and those of world peace. The choice is entirely his to make. We genuinely hope he reflects carefully and that he chooses wisely.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great honour to follow the Prime Minister in this debate. I agree with many of the things that the Prime Minister said in this House. I agree, for example, with what he said about the invasion of Kuwait being a blatant contravention of international law. We on this side of the House agree very strongly with this.

The Prime Minister opened his remarks by saying we must have a collective security and now is the time to vote. Mr. Speaker, what is it we are voting for? Are we voting for the resolution which will be voted upon in the United Nations this afternoon, or are we coming back to this House to vote on the resolution on the floor of this House? I remind the Prime Minister that first and foremost we must vote on the resolution before us in this House. If the Prime Minister would like to send a very strong message to the United Nations to show that we all, in the Canadian tradition, support what the United Nations is doing, his party should have no difficulty supporting the Liberal amendment.

The Prime Minister was not here yesterday. I will just remind him what the Liberal amendment is. It is adding to the end of the government motion, after the word "its" substituting the following:

> "current efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions adopted as of 28 November 1990, and that this support shall not be interpreted as approval of the use of Canadian Forces for offensive action without further consultation with and approval by this House."

This is something which the Prime Minister promised us before. Now he is backing away from his promise. As the resolution reads, government representatives are interpreting it differently.

I was here until one o'clock this morning hearing the speeches. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs said on the floor of this House that subsequent resolutions means only resolutions passed to this point. I went to the Concise Oxford Dictionary and looked up the meaning of subsequent. The meaning of subsequent is "of later time or date". In other words, the resolution would read:

> That this House, noting that the Government of Iraq has not complied with the United Nations Security Council resolutions concerning the invasion of Kuwait and the detention of third country nationals, supports the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660—

To that point we agree. It would continue:

> —and subsequent resolutions.

In other words, the UN can pass resolutions next month or during the summer when this House is not sitting. We know that this Prime Minister will not recall Parliament when we ask the Prime Minister to do it, as we did in the Oka crisis and as we did in the Gulf crisis. We asked day in and day out and Canadians asked: "Please recall Parliament and let us debate it first". The Prime Minister did not recall Parliament. That is why we cannot support such a resolution, because we on this side of the House and Canadians cannot trust this Prime Minister or his government.

"Subsequent resolutions", his own Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, meant only previous resolutions. This morning the Prime Minister said that that includes the motion that will be voted on today. Yesterday there was a different interpretation. Are we to trust this government when this government wants us to vote on this?

If the government wants to send a strong message to the United Nations, let it support our amendment. Then it will send a strong message. There is time to negotiate approval and support for that amendment.

What we heard today is a sabre rattling, gun toting, grenade throwing, Rambo Prime Minister. He talks about collective security, and the only way he sees collective security is with arms. What about using diplomacy? What about giving sanctions more time to work?

The Prime Minister himself said there are signs that sanctions are working. Why do we not give those sanctions more time? How long did it take for the sanctions to take effect in South Africa and in other parts of the world? Here the government is putting a time line.

The resolution at the United Nations has a time line. I believe it is January 15. What happens when that time line is up? What happens then? Is it war? If it is war, what kind of war? Nuclear? Chemical warfare? Is this what the government wants Canadians to get into?

The Prime Minister correctly said that when Iran and Iraq went to war a million lives were lost. What a tragedy: one million lives between two countries. How many lives are going to be sacrificed when over 20 countries get involved in war, with chemical warfare and the potential of nuclear warfare? Is that what the Prime Minister wants to commit Canadians to?

The Prime Minister said that the United Nations is acting with prudence and care and deserves our support. Yes, it deserves our support to allow sanctions more time to work. It deserves our support to allow for diplomacy. This party congratulates our ambassador, Yves Fortier. He is an excellent ambassador who knows how to negotiate with other countries through diplomacy, but let us give him more time to do this. Let us not put a time line on it.

What if the diplomacy works in, let us say, February, March or at the end of 1991? Are we limited to this January 15 time line and we go to war? What we heard from the Prime Minister today is a little scary.

This is probably one of the most important debates this House will face for a very long time. In fact, the implications of this debate will stay long after we are gone. We are not debating a simple motion to support or oppose sanctioned military aggression in the Gulf, as the Prime Minister tried to convince us. What we are debating is the future of thousands and potentially millions of people around the world. We are debating the end of the cold war in the context of the new international order. We are debating whether peaceful persuasion and the dollar spent in that persuasion is preferable to offensive military action that far surpasses anything that anyone in this House can conceive.

The purpose of the motion we are debating today is to give our government the go-ahead to vote in favour of a Security Council motion that carries with it an ultimatum. In other words, there will be no more room for negotiation. The die will have been cast, and there will be no turning back. I think it is important to all of us in this House to understand what happens to the role of the Security Council once this motion is passed.

The motion, to begin with, was put forward by the United States. We know that. We do not need a lesson in the motives of the American president. Yes, Mr. Bush wants Hussein out, and he wants him out now, and we agree with that.

The Middle East is and has been since 1940 of critical interest to the United States. The State Department in the 1940s described the Middle East as being a stupendous source of strategic power and one of the greatest material prizes in world history. Eisenhower himself referred to it as the most strategically important area in the world. But, let there be no misunderstanding: my party also condemns the action of Hussein and calls on him to withdraw Iraqi troops from Kuwait immediately.

The sanctions that are currently in place are strictly a United Nations operation under the supervision of the United Nations 661 committee. Douglas Scott, President of the Markland group, and other disarmament spokesmen confirm that a military action as put forth in this motion and as supported by the Prime Minister, would have no UN supervision.

In fact, the United States has made it very clear that it would not allow a committee such as the one that supervised the sanctions to operate. What this means is that essentially the war would be fought by the U.S. and its allies, with no direction from the UN. It means that the responsibility of dealing with Iraq would be turned over to a group of countries beyond UN control.

If one were to look at how the 661 committee works, one would appreciate the degree of control the committee exerts. Responsible for the supervision of humanitarian supplies of food stuffs and medicine, the committee also directs the way in which aircraft and ships are inspected on the way into the Gulf. It monitors very closely legislation and regulations enacted by member countries in complying with the sanctions. Countries with inadequate legislation or regulations are required to respond directly to this committee.

The UN charter, however, does allow for supervision of military action by a military staff committee. Just as recent as last week, I understand, the Soviet Union was hesitant in supporting the resolution unless there was such a committee. This shows that there is a will to pursue courses of action other than by military force.

Unfortunately, the United States has shown, on more than one occasion, that it is able to circumvent quite deliberately any action that it does not consider conducive to U.S. self-interest. This will for peaceful alternatives is further exemplified by at least two working papers that I have, which I can table, that were circulated at the United Nations. From what I understand, neither paper was found worthy of discussion because the United States took exception to them. Yet, both these papers called for dealing with the issue within a peaceful framework that would compliment the sanctions and allow for discussion and movement that could lead, with the right type of encouragement, to a peaceful resolution through diplomacy as the Prime Minister said.

I want to draw to the attention of the House the specific reasons that my colleagues on this side of the House oppose the motion put forth by the government. The Liberal Party has stated on many occasions that it supports all the resolutions that have been put forth to date at the Security Council.

However we cannot support under any circumstances a blank cheque to the government, as is the case in this motion, and I have already mentioned the controversial interpretation by government representatives themselves.

We also cannot support a deadline such as is indicated in the draft resolution to be debated at the United Nations this afternoon. Our party does not want a time line put into that resolution. If that time line were removed, then we certainly would consider it.

We believe that we have not given peace a chance to work. I would like to remind this House that we are not the only ones who feel this way. We are in the company of former U.S. advisers, Schlesinger and Brzezinski, who was here at the Soviet Union conference for three days. We are in the company of the United Nations Association of Canada. We are in the company of 65 per cent of Canadians who believe that the sanctions need more time. But, does this Prime Minister listen to Canadians? Oh, no.

We are also in the company of several Security Council members who are not quite decided on their decision on the vote. From what I understand, an affirmative vote is necessary by 10 of the 15 members and so far four countries are opposed and five others are wavering.

I urge this government to reflect on our country's influence on members of the Security Council. Over the last few days I had my office speak to various people at the UN. We have been told quite explicitly that Canada does not seem to appreciate how crucial our vote will be on the motion; that were we to abstain it would encourage other member countries to vote according to their will, versus voting under pressure from the United States.

The Security Council is not some independent body that exists somewhere in space making decisions. It is made up of individual countries. I truly believe that we would have a consensus at the United Nations, albeit a different one from that which was envisioned. It would not be a move that was unsupportive of the UN, because a majority of members would be in agreement.

These are not only my words. I have had calls from my constituents. I had a call from a daughter whose father is a hostage in Kuwait. His wife and daughter are my constituents. The hostage had to be smuggled into a hospital to have an operation because he had a tumour on his stomach. This is when it hits home. I had calls from other constituents who have asked me to pass on these words, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister: "Stop your sabre rattling".

After listening to my constituents on this issue, I would suggest to the government that we take a step back, that we put down our sabres and swords, that we shed this paranoid mentality that is not in keeping with our own, and that we begin by promoting within a peaceful framework action that we would support upon the withdrawal of Iraq forces.

We should begin by talking about timetables for the withdrawal of the multinational forces; about support in setting up a democratic government in Kuwait, because there is not one now; about the convening of an international peace conference, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been promoting, to resolve the Palestinian issue.

If all diplomatic initiatives fail and if the longer time for sanctions to work fails, then and only then would we really have credibility in supporting the military option. We have not explored all diplomatic channels. We have not given sanctions time to work. We are not being fair to the Canadians who voted us into this House to go the military option right now.

I will close with these words. The Prime Minister said that the late Lester B. Pearson would be rolling over in his grave if he heard what I said. I ask the Prime Minister if Lester B. Pearson was standing in his place, what option would he choose? Would he recommend the diplomatic channel and the sanction channel, or would he support the sabre-rattling approach of our Prime Minister?

• (1200 )

The answer is very clear. The late Lester B. Pearson is with us, smiling. At least some Canadians have not forgotten what he stood for and what the United Nations is standing for; that is, to resolve issues peacefully, without war.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion before us, which is asking this House to support the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions.

I remind the House that we are not here to debate whether the aggression of Saddam Hussein is unacceptable. It is unacceptable. We are not here to debate whether the actions that have been taken either in the past or in the present by Saddam Hussein are insupportable nationally and internationally. They are insupportable.

We are not here to debate whether economic sanctions is a route that we should go. This House has already passed that resolution. This party has already supported that resolution.

We are here and are asked to support a resolution which is basically a blank cheque for war. We are asked to support any resolution, not specific resolutions. It has been decades since Canada has been at war. Instead, we have paid the role of peacekeeper, of mediator, of a bridge between east and west, north and south.

While our record has not always been perfect, our commitment to the principles of dialogue, negotiation and peaceful solutions has served us well in the international community.

The government's motion represents a sharp and historic move away from the traditional role of peacekeeper. It represents a move to military solutions and to participation in war.

My party takes a back seat to no one in our condemnation of Saddam Hussein. My party is not willing to discard the principles which have served this country so well. Canada must look at peaceful options and solutions to a crisis in the Gulf.

Canadians, as the Prime Minister himself has said, are a peaceful people. We cannot and must not move hastily into a war. Therefore my party cannot support the government's motion. I want to cite two major reasons for this. First, by supporting the draft UN resolution, I draw your attention to the words "use all necessary means".

We would be signalling, by supporting this motion, support for the use of military force as a means to resolve the conflict by an artificial deadline, a deadline which I remind the Prime Minister his own Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had some great difficulty with.

This is not the time for Canadians to go against their conscience. It is the time for Canadians to stand up for peace.

My party believes that such an option as proposed by this motion is premature. We are saying, give sanctions a chance. Give diplomacy a chance. Patience and common sense are crucial at this time.

Second, any Canadian participation in the use of military force would not, given the wording of the government's motion, require the involvement and consent of this Parliament. Once again, it would allow closed door, back room, old style decision making. We were asked to give consent to anything that was passed behind these doors, without the Canadians being included in this debate and fully aware of all of the ramifications of the actions which would be taken.

[Translation]

This would be a logical extension of the government's actions last summer, when the Prime Minister, with total disregard for public opinion and the democratic process, decided to send troops to the Persian Gulf without consulting Parliament.

Mrs. Gibeau: Read the papers!

Ms. McLaughlin: Only last week, our troops participated in military exercises that went well beyond their mandate as defined by Parliament and well beyond the parameters of the UN resolutions endorsed by this Parliament.

[English]

My party believes that Canadians must be consulted. They must be given all of the information and much greater discussion must take place in this House. It must agree on any change in our status in the Persian Gulf.

The government is asking for a blank cheque and we are saying no. We reject this motion. We reject it because it is misguided and because it is wrong.

Let us look at the options with which we are confronted.

[Translation]

The invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein on August 2 and the occupation of that country constitute a flagrant violation of international law. Such action is unacceptable and shocking to all people who believe in freedom.

This contempt for human rights is not an isolated incident. Saddam Hussein does not have a good record on human rights. In fact, he has one of the worst. He even used chemical weapons against his own people. I am sure everyone in this House will agree that Iraq must withdraw from Kuwait.

[English]

We have no difference, therefore, on the final goal. The question and the point on which our approaches differ is what is the best response to Hussein's actions? What is the best, most rational and least costly route to achieve our goals? Is it economic sanctions and international isolation, or is it war?

The government suggests that economic sanctions are not working but it gives us no evidence to support that argument. We, on the contrary, have reason to believe that sanctions are working. Several witnesses appearing before the Standing Committee on International Affairs have argued that sanctions are effective. German hostages just released from Iraq tell us that the effects of sanctions are beginning to show. An American admiral has argued that the embargo is working. A former director of the CIA says he believes that the embargo will work.

I remind the House that Iraq relies on imports for over 80 per cent of its basic materials. It is dependent on the sale of oil for 95 per cent of its export earnings. Sanctions are supported world-wide. Iraq is totally isolated. They are feeling the effects now. Given four, six or eight months, those effects may well be impossible to bear for Saddam Hussein.

How can the government say that sanctions will not work. They can work. What is needed is patience, strength and resolve. We must give sanctions a chance.

[Translation]

I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, that the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the use of sanctions is highly inconsistent. When he talked about South Africa, the Secretary of State was very much in favour of sanctions. He said they were effective. He argued that we had to be patient. He was sure that if we were prepared to wait, the sanctions would produce results.

So I have a question for the Prime Minister: Why South Africa and not Iraq?

[English]

Sanctions and international pressure forced South Africa out of Namibia. The United Nations played a peaceful and meaningful role in restoring independence to that country. Let that example guide us in our new post-cold war era of international relations.

• (1210)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government argued that we must resort to force because it is the only language Saddam Hussein understands. However, we cannot be absolutely sure that Saddam Hussein is impervious to other arguments if we do not keep conciliation and peace on the agenda. We must be absolutely sure.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we must look at the implications of war. We must consider them directly and head on. Let there be no mistake. The cost of war would be high. Hundreds of thousands of lives may be lost, many of them civilian, and it is clear that Canadian men and women, including those hostages still in Iraq, would be among the casualties. We are talking about another generation of young people, of lives full of promise and potential, ended.

There is a good reason why the rapidly growing anti-war movement in the United States is being led by Vietnam veterans. They know the reality. They have been there. They are saying: "Don't do it again". It is time to listen to them.

No one believes that a war would be short, that a war would be contained just between Iraq and Kuwait. There is a real chance of a war in the Middle East escalating into a conflict which encompasses the entire Middle East. The horrors of chemical weapons, of nuclear weapons, and the use of those in that region is not outside the realm of possibility.

A war in the Gulf will destroy lives, will devastate nations. We must do everything we can to avoid it.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the House that if the New Democratic Party wanted to wait months for sanctions to work that that is our decision. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is our decision.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: It is one that we counsel this government to follow because by waiting months we may prevent a war that lasts for years and we may prevent pain that lasts a lifetime.

[Translation]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that voting against this motion does not in any way mean we reject the resolutions adopted by the UN so far. What we reject is the resolution drafted by the United States. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that an increasing number of Americans is against this motion.

[English]

What we are saying, Mr. Speaker, to the Canadian government, to the Prime Minister, is that he must go to the United Nations, to the Security Council and ask them to hold the course on sanctions, to let sanctions work and to commit again that Canada will do its fair share to ensure that those economic sanctions are implemented.

Mr. Speaker, the government will surely say that Canada must be tough and we must be strong. I agree. But to be tough sometimes means trying to bring others around to your view than just giving in to theirs.

Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, to be strong means to be patient and to show resolve. To be strong means searching until exhaustion for peaceful solutions. To be strong means seeking dialogue when others seek destruction.

Our amendment to the government's motion underlines the view that the Canadian government must speak for Canadians by demonstrating a strong commitment to peace. In every decision it makes in this crisis it must consult the people of Canada or it will not be supported by the people of Canada.

It has been said that the road to war is a wide one and the path to peace is often narrow and difficult to find. Let us offer the world some hope. Let Canada be a voice of calm. Let Canada be a voice of reason. Let Canada be a voice for peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment. With regard to the issue of war, when it comes down to the reconciliation of some rather major decisions that have to be made, it is never easy, there is never a right answer and no one in his or her right mind goes against the idea of peace. Having said that, on October 23 a motion was put to this House:

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the Security Council—

Having embodied here the condemnation of Iraq for the invasion of Kuwait, I would like to know why the New Democratic Party did not support the condemnation of Iraq by voting for this particular motion on October 23, 1990.

I would like the Leader of the New Democratic Party to give us her reconciliation on this whole motion. Indeed, it was a difficult one even for our party. We put forward a motion and by changing some of the wording, we accepted it because the discussion of any kind of peace initiative or any kind of discussion about war is a very serious and difficult one for any party. I ask the hon. member to please respond.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Western Arctic for her comments. As a member from the north, I share the north with the hon. member for Western Arctic, and I think we have some understanding about the threats of living very close to a superpower, as we do in the north. I believe the member for Western Arctic pointed that out in her own comments.

I appreciate her comments, in terms of the motion that she refers to. We have always been unequivocal in condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. Once again, the government brought forth motions to this House that were opened-ended and that allowed for going beyond the specifics. That is what this government wants again with this motion before us today. One would not even buy a house without knowing what is in it, but this government wants to agree to any kind of resolution, no matter what it is, no matter what is proposed, if it is in the United Nations.

I would have thought a party which prides itself on business would want to make sure that it was being full and open with this House and with the Canadian public about what it is asking the public to agree to and what it is asking this House of Commons to agree to. We do not need open-ended resolutions; we need this government to stand up in front of the public of Canada, to be accountable for its actions, and to tell us what evidence it has that economic sanctions are not working because it has never once in this House been able to tell anyone what evidence it has that economic sanctions are not working.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest and with care to the comments of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. This is indeed a difficult debate for all parliamentarians. It is a difficult debate for Canadians and people all over the world who love peace, strive for peace, and want to see a world where we do not have madmen like Saddam Hussein who take over countries, trample on people's sovereign rights, their human rights, maim, kill, and have no respect for international law. It is a very complex issue and I know that the resolution that is before us today, the one from the government, obviously is too open-ended. It is flawed, but that is typical of the type of resolutions that this government always puts forward on serious matters .The government did the same thing on the resolution about sending troops over to the Persian Gulf. It cannot seem to get it right.

I want to ask the Leader of the New Democratic Party, what is the position of her party. I have looked at the proposed amendment that has been put forward. It talks about allowing sanctions to work. Under what circumstances and what conditions would her party be able to support other efforts, other than sanctions? I am talking about the possible use of force. Does she foresee any circumstances where the possible use of force would be something that should be considered and would be supported by her party?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, clearly we do not know what is going to happen in the future. The first step we have to take is to make sure that we have done everything. I think that the Liberal Party is in agreement, that we cannot accept an open-ended resolution until we have shown that everything else has been done before we take an offensive action. I think we should be clear here that what is being discussed in the Middle East is not a defensive action by the United States, Canada and other countries, but an offensive action which can lead to disastrous consequences.

Therefore, we are saying very clearly that we need to allow time for economic sanctions to work. It is not just the New Democratic Party that has said this. Gwynne Dyer, when he gave his testimony before the international affairs committee, other experts, other military analysts have said that it takes six months to a year before we can really see whether the economic sanctions are working. We must do that. We must give those sanctions a chance.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think the member is right in the sense that the sanctions are the way to go, in the sense that time must be given to see that sanctions work. What we are facing in real terms is whether or not it is appropriate to send a message ultimately to somebody who has committed an act of aggression, a country that has committed an act of aggression against another country, that we are not prepared to wait forever.

The passage of a UN resolution that provides power to an international force does not mean that the power gets executed in the next two minutes, or the next five minutes, or the next five days, or even the next five months. However, there is a message in it.

Surely, the New Democratic Party agrees with the message that in no way, at no time, can the country of Iraq be rewarded for having committed the act of aggression. Surely, we as a world community with all of our experience that tracks back to the League of Nations and the United Nations have to say that we prefer a world community for the future, for our children and our grandchildren, where the world operates together under

United Nations sanction and we as a world community prefer to say to any country we will not tolerate aggression and if pushed to the wall, we are willing to back up our resolutions with whatever force has to be there. We cannot simply deal in world terms with rhetoric.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know whether there was a question but if the hon. member for Yukon would like to rebut.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, if economic sanctions were not a strong message, why did this government propose them? Economic sanctions are a strong message. This government and our own party have been proposing for years that economic sanctions in South Africa are a strong message.

Economic sanctions are a strong message.

We do not support aggression, but we believe we have to take all steps before we do anything else. I remind the hon. member that this resolution would give agreement to any resolution that might be made, without specifying what would be in that resolution. That is unacceptable.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that remain, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into this debate.

All of us recently experienced the Remembrance Day ceremonies. I know, as I have been a member in this House now for a little over 10 years, the Remembrance Day ceremonies are always a special time of tribute to our veterans, to those Canadians who did serve to protect our country and our interests, and to those who gave up their lives in that last war.

The first unique thing about this ceremony this year as I was attending those Remembrance Day services is that it was conducted by a young woman who was the minister but who was also a member of Canada's reserves.

In that audience were several other young people who were members of the reserves of the Canadian Armed Forces. What was unique about this particular service was that these young people, even though we were there remembering past wars and victims, I was there with young people who may well be called upon by their country to serve in an action that all of us were looking at each night on our television screens.

What intrigued me was to hear the attitude of these young people, the concerns for their families and country, and about the implications of what may well happen in that part of the world. It did add, I thought, a very unique dimension and a very touching dimension to those services this last Remembrance Day.

The other comment that I want to mention is that I have always enjoyed reading novels of a historical nature. One of the things that seems to come to mind when we look at history is, of course, that perspective of hindsight that somehow takes war and glamourizes it. It somehow separates it from us in a certain way. We look at the spectacular and successful actions—all of the events that go on in a war—but we are left with a sense of distance.

Yet, today we find ourselves in a very unique position in that with the television communications, particularly, and with our print media, what can happen so many miles away from us can have an instantaneous impact on our nation.

Somebody living in the community of Peace River will feel a very significant effect.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, just on a brief point of order, I feel that for those of us in the House here—in fact, Canadians across the country watching this—it looks like a replay of the Grey Cup and watching the CFL time killers in action.

As this House knows, there were a number of members who wished to speak on this motion last night. Mr. Speaker, you well know. You were in the chair. However, when unanimous consent was sought just before one o'clock to ignore the clock and allow the last speakers to finish, the hon. Minister of National Defence denied unanimous consent.

I suspect that Canadians do not appreciate that either.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 12.30 p.m., pursuant to Order made Wednesday, November 28, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

• (1230 )

The question is on the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

• (1300)

The next question is on the amendment of Mr. Brewin. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just wanted to inquire as to whether the House would be favourably disposed to applying the same vote, in other words the vote of the previous motion, to this motion in an effort to assist everyone. It is a suggestion which I offer to members of Parliament.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I heard a no from the other side. I was not sure whether or not the member simply wanted to change their vote or whether he wanted all of us to go through the process of voting again. That could make a difference. I think there was at least one member on our side who came in late and would want to be recorded through subsequent votes. There may be two or three tag-ends to pick up, if that is agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to facilitate, knowing that we do take a lot of time to vote when in effect the numbers perhaps do not change too much. Since we are getting to a very changed House, we will have to be a little more careful.

If it is only two or three members who are affected, I certainly think it might facilitate the vote to have the agreement that was called upon. Then some members could go on and register their vote another way.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard what seems to be a reasonable suggestion by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

• (1310 )

The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West, on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, rather than suggest that we apply the vote from the previous vote, I was going to suggest that we apply it in reverse. There might be a predisposition to apply the vote from the previous motion in reverse.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has made a suggestion to the House. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: No.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CANADA POST

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, our mail presently goes to the Persian Gulf via a depot in Halifax. In order to send mail to that depot, Canadian people have to pay the cost of the mail.

I have spoken to the Minister of National Defence and written to the minister in charge of the Post Office to see if during the Christmas season parcels, care packages, presents, letters and cards could not be sent free of charge to the depot in Halifax.

This is one way for Canada to say "Thank you" to the men and women who serve in the Gulf and who are there through our government's policies, perhaps not by choice, and in very dangerous times.

I call on the minister in charge of Canada Post to ask Canada Post to stop putting profits before service in this particular area and allow the mail in Canada to go free of charge to Halifax and on to the Gulf during the next month. In fact, it should go free all the time to our men and women who are serving in the Gulf.

NORTHERN TELECOM CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to inform my colleagues of the outstanding achievement of a company which employs many people in my constituency.

On October 31, 1990 one of the largest employers in my riding, Northern Telecom Canada Limited of Bramalea, Ontario was honoured with a Gold 1990 Canada Award for Business Excellence in the category of outstanding quality.

I can say without reservation that Northern Telecom is an impressive operation, conscious of producing an outstanding product, while maintaining an excellent working environment for its employees. With this winning combination, I am confident that Northern Telecom Canada Limited will continue to be successful and will remain a respected member of the community of Bramalea. Again, congratulations Northern Telecom.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday in this House the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was asked about the future of the core area initiative in Winnipeg. He replied that he would do what was best for Winnipeg.

We found out subsequently that best means eliminating the core area initiative, cutting back on projects in the inner city and leaving the 100,000 people who live there in need of federal moneys but without any support.

It is hard to believe that now, at the last moment, he has finally discovered that he does not like North Portage, that he does not like the Forks, he does not like the core, but somehow up until this time he could not find a way of speaking about it.

The minister said that he needs a public evaluation before he continues. If he needs a public evaluation, he should have thought about it months ago because people in Winnipeg have been asking for the renewal for many weeks now. Instead, the minister should commit himself in Winnipeg to the renewal of the core and to a commitment to improve the conditions of Winnipeg's inner city.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the government an editorial which appeared yesterday in the Winnipeg Free Press. The editorial correctly points out the need for the federal government to maintain national health care standards. The editorial also points out that for the last 10 years Liberal and Tory governments have gradually reduced the federal share of funding for Canada's health care system.

The reduction started when the Liberal's new leader was Minister of Finance. He started the erosion of our health care system and the Conservatives were only too eager to follow his lead.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of the vision of Tommy Douglas that Canada has one of the best health care systems anywhere. I find it disgraceful that the federal Conservatives and Liberals still yearn for an American style system. It is obvious that Canada's health care system is not safe under either the Conservatives or the Liberals.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada's veterans are supporting our armed forces in the Gulf in a very heart-warming way. In particular, I am talking about members of the Alberta command of the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada.

Recently Command President Mr. Cecil Burke handed over a cheque for $120,000 to the Base Commander, Canadian Forces Base, Edmonton. The money will be used to buy televisions, video-cassette recorders and satellite dish antennae for the enjoyment of our forces personnel in the Gulf.

Mr. Burke said: "Most of us have an idea of what they are going through over there". I congratulate members of Canada's oldest veterans organization for rallying round those whose turn it is now to wear the uniform of Canada in a far-away land.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN-FRANÇOIS BOUCHARD

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, allow me to pay tribute to an eight-year-old boy called Jean-François Bouchard. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Jean-Paul Bouchard of my riding. The reason for this tribute is the following. On October 28, Jean-François took part in a Halloween skating event. Everyone had a great time until Jean-François fell and had most of one finger cut off. The strength, courage and, let us say the word, bravery displayed by this young boy were impressive. This is why I wanted to draw special attention to it.

Mr. Speaker, small children have a way of teaching us adults singular lessons of logic and positive thinking. This young boy has quite a future ahead of him. I am sure of that.

TAX REFORM

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the tax reform implemented in 1988 is having positive results. The 1988 tax statistics indicate that low-income Canadians do benefit from the reform. That same year, the average after tax income rose by 8.6 per cent. The number of Canadians over age 65 who do not pay any tax has increased by more than 40 per cent and now stands at 290,000.

The income tax reform has made the system more progressive and more equitable. The sales tax reform is an additional stage in that process. High-income Canadians will be paying a larger share of their income through the sales tax, whereas families with an income of $30,000 or less will be better off than they are now.

All things considered, the tax reform combined with other important measures taken by the government to boost the Canadian economy will make the tax system more equitable, improve competitiveness and create more jobs.

SOCIALIST AWARDS

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, fellow Canadians, it is time once again for the weekly socialist awards of excellence. This week's nominees all hail from that hotbed of socialism, Ontario, where 30 per cent of the people voted NDP and got a lousy government.

The nominees are NDP MPP Tony Silipo who after being elected to the legislature was found guilty by the Law Society for misconduct in his handling of forged documents; MPP Tony Rizzo who admitted that he was involved in receiving free work from a contractor whose applications Mr. Rizzo always voted in favour of, as well as his union-busting tactics; Bob White, erstwhile head of the CAW, whose support of the NDP with union funds—many of whom I might add vote Liberal—is on par with the big Tory corporate donors, will stop at nothing to fulfil his own personal political goals.

The envelope please. The winner is Bob White who, in a great display of looking out for the little guy, has accepted his pay-off as a director of that bastion of the working class, the Toronto Skydome.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the environment is everyone's concern but it is of special concern to our next generation.

Grade six students at Westmount School in Moose Jaw have written to advise me that they have studied the effects of acid rain. One student writes: "We have discovered that acid rain causes fish, plants and animals to die, lakes to be ruined and animal reproduction difficulties".

Another writes: "It is very important to stop acid rain because Canadian lakes are very sensitive to acid rain and we share 25 per cent of the world's fresh water supply".

The government should heed the pleas of these students. They are speaking on behalf of students right across the country. The government should ensure that a national acid rain program which places a cap on emissions and sets national standards will be included in the upcoming Green Plan.

Certainly the fact that the three western provinces and the two territories are not now included in any plan leaves over one-half of Canada's environment unprotected.

I say well done to the students at Westmount School. Let us all hope that the government is listening.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

M. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Next week, Mr. Speaker, Canada will play an important role in the GATT negotiations in Brussels. It was Prime Minister Mulroney who, at the outset of this critical round four years ago, insisted that agriculture be put on the negotiation agenda. Last year the industrialized nations paid out something like $250 billion in farm subsidies, yet a good many agricultural producers throughout the world are still hard-pressed, except perhaps in Europe where the EEC is thwarting progress. The international agricultural trade system does not work, and that spells disaster for some Canadian farmers. We and our agricultural producers simply cannot accept a failure next week, and certainly not the status quo.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice visited Winnipeg last weekend and commented on the David Milgaard case.

Milgaard has spent more than 20 years in prison for murder, but there is serious doubt that he committed the crime. For many months we have pressed the justice minister to make a decision in the case. On Winnipeg television she said: "In the third week in September I was advised the file was ready for me but that they," being department officials, "had received communication from Milgaard's counsel that he wished to make more argument".

Where does the justice minister get this stuff? She is dead wrong. Milgaard's counsel, David Asper, said in the same broadcast: "We completed our submission during the summer". By the way, that was confirmed in a September 10 letter from Asper to the Department of Justice.

The minister had better get a grip on her department. Someone is feeding her a line. It puts justice under a cloud and makes her look like a fool.

SEXIST PUBLICITY

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): In his movie entitled "Jesus of Montréal", Mr. Speaker, Denys Arcand offers a satire of the advertising industry and the way this industry exploits the physical attributes of women to sell their wares. Unfortunately, as any other good satire, Denys Arcand's is a fairly accurate reflection of the truth.

Mr. Speaker, who among us has not noticed the degrading representation of women by our major advertising agencies and their customers? Is it necessary to use a woman's body to sell beer or chewing gum? All advertising agencies are well aware that by trying to sell their wares that way, they are selling sex. I suggest this is an unhealthy if not dangerous attitude to cultivate in a society where violence against women is definitely on the rise.

PENSION PLANS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, six years ago the government amended the Canada and Quebec pension plans to bring them into line with the equality provisions in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The government imposed equality at the same time on all private sector pension plans it regulates, yet it has failed to eliminate inequities and injustices in the pension plans for its own employees.

Survivors of Public Service pensions still get only a 50 per cent pension, compared to the 60 per cent the government imposes on other funds. Part-time employees are left out of the pension plan, contributing further to the poverty of women.

The government is withholding from Public Service employees changes that are their right under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It is holding these changes in reserve to sugar coat the bitter bill it plans to deliver when it deindexes the pensions Public Service employees have paid for over many years.

When will the government treat its own employees with the same pension equality it imposes on all other employers?

CENTRAL MORTAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my most heartfelt appreciation and gratitude to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and its responsible minister, Hon. Allan Redway, for the financial support my constituents of La Prairie, on the south shore of Montreal, have received from the corporation which, through its grants, has made it possible since my election in 1984 to build approximately 200 low-rental housing units for senior citizens.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of an agreement on social housing, reached in 1986 by the Quebec government and the Government of Canada I will have the honour to officially open on December 1 the Manoir de Brossard, a complex of 61 low-rental housing units for senior citizens.

This opening is the concrete result of the joint efforts of the CMHC, the Quebec Housing Corporation, the Brossard Municipal Housing Bureau and myself to provide our senior citizens with decent housing.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the CMHC and my minister for their tremendous contributions.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, just last week this government fed Canadians the line that it needed money to pay for its action in the Gulf. Yet every Canadian knows that its greatest overspending costs were due to its bad judgment in estimating the costs of its high interest rate policies and bringing in the GST, all policies for which Canadian taxpayers have to pay.

Now after cutting funding for programs for people, Finance Minister Michael Wilson is so insensitive that he spent $250,000 of Canadian taxpayers' money to peddle government propaganda to the business community. The minister's video titled, "Where Do Your Taxpayer Dollars Go?", should really have been called "Tax Lies and Videotape".

MINING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in the current environmental debate, there is one major stakeholder whose efforts to apply the principles of sustainable development often go unnoticed.

Industry is concerned about sustainable development and the environmental challenge before us. In particular today, I wish to commend the Canadian mining industry.

It is a little known fact that Canadians are leading the way in sustainable mining. Under the leadership of the Mining Association of Canada, our mining sector has produced for itself a Guide for Environmental Practice.

Canadian mining companies are committed to sound environmental practices at home and abroad. The mining sector is committed to responsible product stewardship. The mining community is very aware of environmental problems and is eager to participate in vital debate begun with the work of the Brundtland report.

As a major stakeholder, a provider of wealth for our country, the Canadian mining sector has a valuable contribution to make for environmentally sustainable economic development.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and is about Canada's involvement in the crisis in the Persian Gulf. On Monday, the Minister for International Trade, speaking on behalf of the government about the sanctions against Iraq said in this House:

> —the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quite prepared to make available to the House, or to the Standing Committee on External Affairs, the full information on how effective the sanctions policy appears to be.

Yesterday, when speaking in this House, the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave no such information and no such evidence. All he did was say, in effect, that the sanctions were not working and today in the House the Prime Minister said the same thing.

Will the Prime Minister give us the evidence promised by the Minister for International Trade that the sanctions are not working? This evidence is important because it affects how Canadians look at the risk some Canadians are under in the Persian Gulf. Why will the Prime Minister not give us the evidence promised on behalf of this government? Why will he not give us that evidence today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first let me just correct a misstatement by my hon. friend in regard to my statement this morning in the House. What I said was: "While the UN sanctions are undoubtedly being felt by the Iraqi and Kuwaiti people, we have found no wide-spread confidence that they are sufficient to bring about the desired result to namely persuade President Hussein to withdraw his forces from Kuwait". I think that is an important distinction that my hon. friend would want to bear in mind.

As to any information that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have available regarding the results of the sanction policy, I am sure that, immediately upon his return from New York, he would be happy to provide this to my hon. friend.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the time to provide that evidence was during the debate which has just concluded. Canadians will want to know why the government did not have enough confidence in its own policy to provide that evidence before now. Canadians need that evidence before the vote is taken in the United Nations on the resolution in question.

Yesterday, the immediate past chairman of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, Admiral William Crowe, said in testimony before a United States Senate committee, when speaking about the sanctions against Iraq and how they are working: "I counsel patience, war is not neat, it is not tidy, it is a mess". That is what Admiral Crowe said.

Is it possible that the reason the government has not given us the evidence it claims it has about how the sanctions are working is because it knows all the evidence is of the kind provided by Admiral Crowe, that the sanctions are working and they need more time to work and the time has not yet arrived, nor is it near, for offensive action? Is that not the fact?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it really is quite a shameful suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition, to say nothing of the fact that I find passing strange the manner in which some days the Liberal Party loves the Americans and most days, they do not. When they find an American who says something with which they agree, they are actively quoting him.

The issue before the House is the issue we addressed this morning, support for the United Nations.

Mr. Harvard: We support the United Nations.

Mr. Mulroney: My friend says "We support the United Nations". The United Nations has passed 10 resolutions requesting that they withdraw from Kuwait. This will be the eleventh resolution for which the United Nations is seeking support.

Mr. Pearson said in 1945: "Never again should an aggressor be permitted to strike down one nation after another before the peace loving nations of the world organize and take concerted action against it." The United Nations is seeking the support of peace-loving nations to take concerted action against it, and Canada is going to provide that support.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, today the Prime Minister says that he is a great supporter of the United Nations, and so is his government. These words are strange in light of the fact that a few days ago the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that they were ready to get involved in offensive action against Iraq unilaterally whether the UN approved it or not. Those are not the words of somebody who puts his primary faith in the United Nations.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Conservative Senator Gérald Beaudoin, the constitutional expert, said that the government would not have to call back Parliament if it were to decide in favour of armed intervention against Iraq. Mr. Speaker, this statement contradicts a government motion adopted by this House on October 23.

I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister: Will he repudiate today the statements made by Senator Beaudoin and will he announce his intention to respect his commitment to call back Parliament before Canadian troops are involved in a military offensive in the Persian Gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not read the senator's statement, but my hon. friend can hardly expect me to start commenting on all the statements being made in the Senate, because we would be here for quite some time. As for the second part of his question, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have, on various occasions, dealt with this point satisfactorily. However, the Leader of the Opposition—inadvertently, I expect—misquoted what I said. In fact, he said, suggesting that he was quoting me verbatim:

[English]

—"the Prime Minister said that we are ready to get involved to get in an offensive action against Iraq unilaterally whether the United Nations approved or not". I never made any such statement.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns the government's non-tabling of requested sanctions documentation.

The Prime Minister's answers to the hon. House leader's questions a few moments ago are ringing in my ears. They echo almost exactly the answer we got to the same question in this House on Monday of this week when the Minister for International Trade responded: "I am quite sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quite prepared to make available to the House the full information on the effect of sanctions policies". Canadians accept an embargo against Iraq, but not an embargo against providing Canadians vital information concerning sanctions. We requested information. We did not get it.

Why has the government refused to provide this vital information concerning sanctions against Iraq?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is not refusing to provide information. I have already indicated to my hon. friend that when the question was asked, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is responsible for this, was in Jordan meeting with King Hussein and in Israel meeting with Prime Minister Shamir. He then flew back, spoke at a meeting here in Ottawa, spoke in the House, and is now speaking before the Security Council at the United Nations.

I indicated to my hon. friend that when the information is made available to me, presumably immediately upon my right hon. friend's return, we will be happy to provide my hon. friend with all of the information that we have.

The issue before the House yesterday, today and tomorrow in respect of Iraq is going to be whether this party, this government and this House supports the United Nations in what it is seeking to do. We will provide full support, as we will provide my hon. friend with all of the information available to us.

We seek peace in the region, but peace in the region will come through firm and unwavering support for the resolutions of the UN Security Council.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Prime Minister. Canada has supported and this party has supported the imposition of UN sanctions against Iraq as an effective method of forcing Iraq out of Kuwait. Other nations, such as Colombia, have proposed other peace-making solutions to the Middle East crisis to the UN Security Council. What evidence can the government give us today that Canada has pursued other peaceful resolutions to the Middle East crisis prior to supporting the UN resolution before the Security Council today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that in co-operation with a number of other nations, Canada has been working privately, and I hope with some effect, to assist in what we hope will be a peaceful resolution of this very important matter. This has been done at the United Nations directly with the Secretary General. It has been done through a number of our important alliances and in other initiatives around the world. We hope that will contribute in a beneficial way.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today a resolution was passed in this House, not supported by this party, which basically gave blanket support to any resolution that the United Nations might pass, because it is not clear what will be contained in subsequent UN resolutions. It simply says the Security Council resolution and all subsequent relevant resolutions, but no specifics.

Given the fact that there are no specifics attached to what resolutions this government has just supported, if the United States were to decide to invade Iraq after January 15, which is the deadline given in the UN resolution, does this government resolution mean today that the Prime Minister has given George Bush his approval and that he can have Canadian support for an attack of Iraq after January 15?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend seriously would not want me to answer that kind of canard. I wonder why she devised the hypothetical question with Mr. Bush in mind. Perhaps she missed the statement by Soviet President Gorbachev this week who delivered an ultimatum to Iraq warning it to withdraw from Kuwait or face the worst consequences. Gorbachev is reported to have told the Iraqi Foreign Minister, Mr. Aziz: "If Iraq really wanted a settlement in the entire region and is interested in avoiding the worst, it must now openly pull out of Kuwait and release hostages".

• (1430)

President Gorbachev concluded: "The President of Iraq must weigh everything once more. The fate of Iraq is in the hands of its leaders, and time is expiring."

President Gorbachev is expressing a pretty universally held sentiment, with the possible exception of a few people in the NDP.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister then: What did we vote on this morning?

What does he mean by the kind of sanctions that will be effective January 15? I ask the Prime Minister again: In this UN resolution, what is his understanding of exactly what will occur after January 15 if Saddam Hussein has not withdrawn from Kuwait by that time?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is in some difficulty. That is a very hypothetical question. Within the rules, it is out of order.

I would ask the hon. member to perhaps rephrase her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, we were asked to vote this morning on a resolution that said in effect that we would support any resolution, not specified, that the United Nations would pass.

What does the Prime Minister anticipate those other resolutions would be?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the motion refers to the resolution that is being debated at the United Nations today. That is the position.

That is why President Gorbachev indicated publicly in Paris that it was imperative that the United Nations receive unanimous support, if at all possible, for the resolution that was going to be voted today, because he did not want the United Nations to go the route of the League of Nations, which disintegrated and was unable to provide the strong international leadership that the world needs.

The United Nations asked for Canada's support in the defence of universal rights. That was granted today by the Government of Canada, and I hope eventually by members of my hon. friend's party.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is well aware of what the UN resolution says and, I assume, what his own resolution says.

It asks this House to give a blank cheque to vote for any resolution that the UN might give.

I have a question on another very serious subject related to the issue in the Middle East.

[Translation]

Everyone is this country is delighted that seven Canadian hostages were able to leave Iraq, but we are concerned about the fate of the remaining hostages. I want to ask the Prime Minister to tell the House what his government intends to do to ensure that the remaining Canadian hostages will also be able to go home.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my comments this morning I pointed out that one of the cornerstones of the government's foreign policy in this area was freeing the hostages. The government has embarked on a series of initiatives and is working very hard to help the hostages and their families.

It is also important to point out that President Gorbachev asked Foreign Minister Aziz in Moscow about 48 hours ago to proceed immediately. He asked Iraq to proceed immediately with the release of all hostages held in Iraq.

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, the Government of Quebec approved a federal-provincial agreement on impact studies for the Great Whale project. The Quebec environment minister said very clearly that the agreement did not include infrastructures. On October 18, in reply to a question here in the House, the federal environment minister said, and I quote: "With my Quebec counterpart we are having a discussion of the terms of reference which will cover the infrastructures". This is my question: Who is telling the truth?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to make it very clear to this House that there is in fact no agreement between the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada on this issue. There is a response by the Government of Quebec to a proposal made by the Government of Canada on November 20.

I think it is perfectly reasonable, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member would not ask us to respond to that counter-proposal until the Minister of the Environment, who is meeting in Victoria with his provincial counterparts, meeting by the way to discuss very important issues, including consulting with them on the green plan, has an opportunity to examine the document and to respond at the appropriate time.

Because he asked a question before, I want to assure him, as the Minister of the Environment has done on numerous occasions, that there will be an environmental assessment of both the infrastructure and the project itself and that this environmental assessment will be a public process.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): What a tangled web we weave. I have a document dated July 6 which sets out the principles of an agreement reached between the two Ministers of the Environment. That agreement specifically excludes the infrastructures. The agreement is in French:

[Translation]

"Quebec and Canada have agreed to submit the Great Whale complex to an environmental assessment. For the purposes of this joint assessment, the complex excludes access infrastructures."

[English]

Does the government deny that the agreement sent from Quebec last night contains the exclusion that I have just cited? Does the government deny that the agreement was arrived at by the federal Minister of the Environment at the end of June? Does the government deny that that clause is in complete contradiction of the principles that the minister has stated? Does the government deny that the minister's public statements are simply not borne out by his private action?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, who I believe is a member of the legal profession, must surely understand that there is a very major distinction between the word "agreement" which he chooses to use—and I may say he probably does so for his own political advantage—and the question of a proposal. There have been a series of proposals and counter-proposals back and forth between the two governments. What we have today is a response by the Government of Quebec to the latest proposal which we put on the table on November 20. We will be responding at the appropriate time.

CITIZEN'S FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the Spicer commission. It seems the Prime Minister does not intend to fill the seat left vacant by Mrs. Thérèse Paquet-Sévigny, thus diminishing the contribution of women and francophones to the future of this country.

Mr. Speaker, we are sorry to hear the Prime Minister did not appoint someone else, and that I want to ask him whether he is prepared to acknowledge that the Commission is merely a smoke-screen and that he has failed miserably in his task to keep this country together and united.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my hon. friend, who usually shows a special interest in important questions concerning national unity, should make such a suggestion.

First of all, regarding the claim that I had decided not to proceed with a new appointment, I simply want to say to my hon. friend that I am having consultations on the membership of the commission. We have suffered a slight setback. Why? Because an exceptional woman, who was posted at the United Nations, agreed to sit on the Commission and subsequently was told that her acceptance might have an impact on administrative decisions at the UN. In the circumstances, she had to withdraw. There is nothing dishonourable about that. There is no negative reflection, either on her or the government. The seats on the commission will be filled, and I am sure the Spicer commission will continue its work and will end up gathering tremendous support for Canada.

• (1440 )

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Spicer commission, from what reports we get from the press, has no work mandate. It has no work plan. Its members are part time. The Prime Minister tells us he is hesitating to name an additional or additional members to that commission.

Given the importance of this commission to the future of this country, is the Prime Minister prepared today to tell this House that he will name a replacement for the person that left the commission, Madam Paquet-Sévigny? Will he show us today by his efforts that he will do everything to make a success of this commission and appoint people to the commission who will be full time and will work in the interests of Canadians and the future of the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend has such little faith in the capacity of these people to do very good job for Canada. I fail to understand as well why he is so negative in regard to the manner in which the commission has begun its work.

It took some four months before the composition of Quebec's Bélanger-Campeau commission was completed. Indeed, the assembly had to be reconvened to provide for the admission of additional members.

Why would my hon. friend be alarmed at the fact that one member of the Spicer Commission had to resign for reasons that I have explained and conclude therefrom that it will not be effective?

I tell my hon. friend that the Spicer commission will make an effective and I believe durable contribution to the well-being of Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday Canada's environment took a serious back-room beating from Premier Bourassa and the Quebec Liberals. Their unilateral decision to proceed with the $600 million infrastructure of the Great Whale project is both a threat and an insult.

Since this is part of the largest industrial project ever conceived in the history of North America, will the Prime Minister demonstrate that he believes what he said about the environment when he spoke before the United Nations and assure this House that there will be no federal permits or authorization given on the infrastructure until the entire project has been given a full public environmental assessment and review? Yes or no?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I explained just a moment ago to my hon. friend opposite, the Government of Quebec has made a proposal to the Government of Canada which will certainly be considered by the Minister of the Environment, as the hon. member would wish, on his return from these very important meetings in Victoria.

With respect specifically to the question of infrastructure and the question of environmental assessments, I think there are two or three questions which have been asked by the Canadian public and I think they should be answered.

One of these questions is: Will there be a full environmental assessment in which the federal government will participate on both the question of the infrastructure and the question of the project? And the answer to that is yes.

The second question which I think has been asked is whether or not the federal government will issue any permits to those areas which fall into its jurisdiction with respect to the infrastructure until the EARP process has been applied. And the answer to that question is no.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is again for the Prime Minister.

The Great Whale project has been on the drawing boards since the 1970s. There have been years of opportunity to evaluate Quebec Hydro's secret environmental impact studies publicly.

Would the Prime Minister confirm the simple fact that there has been a political deal, a roll of the dice deal, made between his office, himself and Premier Bourassa to cover up the truly horrific impacts of this project which stands to be an ecological Auschwitz?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not so certain that question is worthy of an answer, but the answer is a simple no.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Since the Government of Quebec has now taken the lead and cancelled its value added tax on books, and since the Minister of National Revenue indicated as recently as yesterday that he would cancel this goods and services tax on books in all probability after it becomes law, if it does come into law, will he today take Quebec's excellent lead and will he, in International Literacy Year, cancel the goods and services tax on all books and learning materials now?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should get his facts straight before putting a question of that nature.

Yesterday I made several comments to the Canadian Tax Foundation. When asked about the Quebec situation on books, I said: "We can't start fiddling around with the legislation. It would send out a confusing message. In other words, there will be no changes in the legislation before it is passed".

I went on to say what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had said in the past, that once the legislation is implemented we will monitor its effects on the economy, on society, and on specific sectors, and could possibly in future make adjustments. But there will be no adjustments prior to January 1, and the tax will be implemented.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, we will let Canadians decide who has his facts straight.

[Translation]

My supplementay is directed to the Prime Minister. Taxing books and other learning materials amounts to encouraging illiteracy. The 5 to 7 million illiterate Canadians who cost in excess of $10 billion a year to the treasury are often among our poorest fellow citizens. What does the Prime Minister intend to do to help these people learn to read and get them out of this vicious circle of poverty?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this government is aware of the importance of cultural industries and cultural sectors as a whole, whether related to publishing, cinema, sound recording or theatre. In most sectors the government has established programs to enable the cultural community to progress to the benefit of all Canadians, and we are pursuing our efforts, Mr. Speaker, including in the publishing field.

HEALTH

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister has said that he had to cut health care research to reduce the deficit. Canadians do not accept that. The minister will never convince Canadians that he had no option.

Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare explain to Canadians why he chose—and this is the point—to single out health care research for such harsh treatment?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at the harsh treatment that is referred to by the hon. member. Since this government came to office, displacing the old Liberal government and its record on research in Canada, NHRDP has increased by some 55 per cent, some $10 million.

In his own province of Quebec, since the Liberals were thrown out, NHRDP grants went from $4.769 million to $7.696 million in the first 11 months of this year.

That is a record on research which speaks for itself. The hon. member can talk about research. This government has funded it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): That is not the question, Mr. Speaker. We never said he cut 100 per cent of the program. Indeed the minister himself confirmed that he did cut this program. So I am asking him today why he chose to cut the health care research program, and will he agree to re-instate the full budget for that research program?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, let me be a bit more specific even about the hon. member's riding. He will be aware of the fact that on October 17, I wrote to the hon. member to inform him that so far this year $2.9 million had been put into his own constituency by NHRDP.

• (1450)

We can contrast this government's record in his constituency with his vote on Bill C-22, where the position of the Liberal Party was to block research in dealing with the whole area of medicine. Its record has been one of disgrace.

I believe that at any fair comparison between the record of the Liberals on medical research and the record of this government, it will show that while they talk about it they talk a good fight, but they oppose it when it comes to voting.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I just want to take him back to the answer he gave to a question by my leader. As I heard him and as I think the House heard him, he said that the government's view of the motion which was passed this morning was that, in terms of subsequent resolutions to today, the only UN resolution that was covered was the resolution which will be coming before the Security Council today. That is what he said. That was ably assisted, I may say, by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Will the Prime Minister therefore agree that the government has no House approval for the commitment of Canadian forces to any offensive action against Iraq?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer that I gave to the Leader of the NDP is the policy of the government in regard to the question that was raised by her.

With regard to the broader question, which was the subject of debate this morning, I refer my hon. friend to a statement that he made in the House on October 25, when he said: "The NDP position is that until all has failed, the United Nations must get the complete unqualified support of this government, this Parliament, and this country".

That is what the United Nations got this morning, and the NDP was not there.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, that is exactly why the Prime Minister's approval rating is where it is in the country today.

I asked him a very straightforward question. He could have clarified the understanding that his government got. Let me try once more in a slightly different way.

Will the Prime Minister make a commitment today to this House and to the country that before his government commits Canadian forces to offensive action against Iraq, he will come back to this House and seek its approval?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in response, I think, to a question from the Leader of the Liberal Party yesterday or the day before yesterday.

I indicated that we had come to the House on September 24 or September 25, for a full debate, that we came to the House yesterday and today for a full debate, and that at any time circumstances warranted we would, of course, come before the House of Commons for a full debate.

BÉLANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations is not in this House, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Since we now know from press that the Leader of the Liberal Party is going to appear before the Bélanger-Campeau commission—and perhaps I appreciate the fact that because the Prime Minister is Prime Minister he would not want to appear before the Bélanger-Campeau commission—does the Prime Minister or the government intend to have the so-called Quebec lieutenant or someone else representing the federal government appear before this commission to give the federal message to that commission?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that indeed there are press reports to the effect the Leader of the Liberal Party is planning an appearance before the provincial commission.

The Progressive Conservative national caucus is represented full time at all commission hearings by the hon. member for Outremont. He participates very actively on a daily basis, not only in questioning witnesses but in putting out the federalist position that is defended actively by members of the Progressive Conservative Party.

I do not know of the intentions of any other members of this House to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau commission. However, I am sure it would be an enlivening and enriching experience if the hon. member from Annapolis Valley—Hants decided to attend.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for that answer. Who knows what might happen in this interesting world we live in?

Since the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel is also a member of the Bélanger–Campeau commission and still represents, I think, the Liberal Party, that does not presuppose or pre-empt the leader.

If there has not been a decision made, I wonder seriously if a representative of the federal government, not a member of that large commission, will make its pitch to that commission with all the implications and consequential fall-outs therefrom.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Willowdale.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I invite you to listen to these words from Hansard of October 15, 1981:

> —many home owners, many farmers and small businessmen were literally kicked in the teeth—Why is it Canada must have interest rates that are 3 to 4 percentage points higher than comparable rates in the United States?

These are the words of the member who today is the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: If an interest rate spread of 3 to 4 points was wrong then, why isn't an interest rate spread of 4 to 5 points worse now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that when I said that interest rates were in the order of 21.5 per cent, a good deal different. If you reverse the first two numbers, you might get the interest rate today. It is 12.1 per cent. I think things are fundamentally different than when I made that statement.

Let's be honest with each other. Interest rates are high today. We would like to get them down. We are trying to get them down. We brought them down from a bank rate of 14.05 per cent to today when the bank rate is a little over 12.25 per cent. We have had a significant drop in interest rates.

I have observed in this House on a number of occasions the inflationary pressures which are there that are causing us to exercise some caution.

Our intent is to reflect the weakness in the economy in a continuing reduction in interest costs. That will be to the benefit of the small businessmen and the farmers whom my hon. friend quoted just now.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in response, I can do no better than to quote from the same Hansard the minister's own words. He said then:

> —the arrogance of that answer to people who have been—suffering for a long time under the policies of this government, is just incredible.

Since the leopard has changed his spots and is now the champion of high interest rates, since the minister admits that the GST will increase inflation significantly, and since his own interest rate calculations have been so far off, my question is: Will interest rates go up between now and March 31?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can see from the hon. member that the whole Peterson family has taken up acting.

Some hon. members: Encore, encore.

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the hon. member for Etobicoke North, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I said that Mexico and the United States had agreed that energy would not be on the table in the trade negotiations.

In the absence of the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs claimed that my information was incorrect. By now the minister has informed himself that both the Mexican Minister of Commerce and the United States Secretary of the Treasury have stated that Mexican oil is not on the table.

• (1500)

Can the minister explain why Canada should have ceded more sovereignty over energy than Mexico, or does the government now intend to negotiate a trilateral agreement which will restore full Canadian sovereignty in our energy industry?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, we have full sovereignty over our energy industry. Those claims are silly. If the hon. member would look back to an agreement that the Liberal Party signed in 1973 with 23 other countries in this world called the International Energy Agency, it promised to share energy resources during short periods of time. There is nothing different in the trade agreement with the United States than with the International Energy Agency agreement that was signed by the Liberals quite some time ago, absolutely nothing.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A refugee claimant received a letter, which is not on letterhead, which says, "With regard to an immigration matter, kindly contact my office at your earliest convenience," at such and such an address. Presumably, this is the hon. minister's department but no one would know that. When he got to the office, he was advised that he would be deported from the country.

He subsequently received from the same office a piece of paper, handwritten, which says the following: "Report for removal to immigration at Holiday Inn". Is this the treatment that your department is giving to refugee claimants in this country?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question through the Chair. The hon. minister may wish to respond.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has difficulty with a refugee case, as many members of this House do from time to time, I am quite prepared to take a look at it. I think there are many hon. members on all sides of this House who know that I do deal with all those cases on an urgent basis.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of Dr. Michael Woods, Minister of Health and Social Welfare of Ireland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

BÉLANGER–CAMPEAU COMMISSION—ALLEGED PRIVATE MEETINGS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order before the Prime Minister takes the floor, since it concerns his reply in the House. When the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier asked a question about the Prime Minister's presentation before the Bélanger–Campeau commission, the Prime Minister made it clear to the House, following a suggestion I made, that he was having private meetings with Mr. Bélanger and Mr. Campeau about Quebec's constitutional future, either within or outside Canada. I would like to ask him the following question, Mr. Speaker: Why was he not prepared to reveal the whole truth in response to the excellent question put by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier? Why is he having private meetings, without having—

[English]

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Friesen: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is using a point of order to carry on Question Period. If she wishes, on another occasion, to continue debate then, of course, that is open to her but it is not a proper use of a point of order. If there is a need for the hon. member to withdraw, I will look at the "blues" and consider it.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): This being Thursday, before I ask the usual question as to the work that the government will propose to the House, I wonder if members would agree with me that we should adopt a motion of thanks and congratulations, and offer our sincere thanks to the three members of this House, Messrs. Axworthy, Corbett and Robinson, who, in my view, did a very good humanitarian job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, having said that, I wonder if the minister could tell us what the business of the House is for tomorrow and next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will be calling Bill C-40, the report stage of the Broadcasting Act.

Tomorrow morning I would like to call for second reading of Bill C-88, the European Bank for Reconstruction. Perhaps if we can engage in some discussions for progress, since it is a relatively non-controversial piece of legislation, we could, upon conclusion of that, call for report stage and hopefully, third reading of Bill C-79, amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act.

On Monday, I will be calling the Broadcasting Act back for completion of report stage. If our previous discussions turn out to be accurate in terms of the progress we might make, hopefully we will complete the Broadcasting Act on Tuesday, December 4.

I will be engaging with my homologues on the other side in terms of further work for the remainder of next week.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given the Prime Minister's response to my question today and the response I got on Monday to the same question, that the Secretary of State seemingly without difficulty could table the requested documentation regarding sanctions in Iraq, I feel that there is no need for delay. I would ask that the documentation be tabled forthwith.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as was pointed out, the hon. member asked this question yesterday and again today. She got an answer. She did not approve of the answer and then is bootlegging it as a point of order to make her political point again.

She has an opportunity during Question Period. Why is that not sufficient to make her point. Why must she bootleg with specious points of orders—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rose on a point of order and, of course, one has to listen to the point before one rules on it. I am not at all sure that it is a point of order. Certainly, the hon. government House leader has indicated his disapproval of the use of a point of order to carry on a debate. However, I do want hon. members to know that before I can decide whether it is appropriate or not, I usually have to hear at least a little bit of it. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I may agree with you that it is not what I would call a very strict point of order, but it is a point of fact that the government has offered these documents, has not come forth with the proof that these sanctions are working. The member is only asking that the government put up or shut up. That is all.

Mr. Speaker: But we have just finished Question Period and those questions were put and they may well be put again.

EXPANSION OF NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among many of our colleagues on all sides of this House. I would like to ask for consent to move the following motion, which is seconded by the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas. I move that:

> Whereas the National Hockey League is considering expansion and whereas this House is of the opinion that any future expansion of the NHL would benefit from the inclusion of Canadian teams, therefore, that this House supports the efforts of Ottawa and Hamilton in their bids to obtain National Hockey League franchises.

• (1510 )

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 27, consideration of Bill C–40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motion No. 17 of Mr. Waddell (p. 15801); and Motion No. 30 of Mrs. Finestone (p. 15801).

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to speak today to Bill C–40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, as reported with amendments from a legislative committee.

Although this bill encompasses several positive steps, it needs further revision. The motion before us today addresses one of the fundamental flaws of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, as you have indicated, we are resuming debate on motions which include the excellent motion of the hon. member for Mount Royal which is before us for discussion. The motion reflects the deep dissatisfaction within the substance of Bill C–40. This bill drops the CBC's 1968 mandated role to foster Canadian national unity. Specifically it reads:

> —to contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity.

For the first time in Canadian broadcasting history, the national role of the CBC was reaffirmed and legally bound to resist threats to unity. I have read the rationale for removing this fundamental clause but I simply cannot agree with it.

I was all the more concerned when the independent member for Shefford, Quebec, spoke to this motion on Tuesday. I guess the Bloc Quebecois separatist position matches quite well with its desire to see the CBC robbed of its longstanding mandate.

The CBC as a national institution must be there for all Canadians and must continue to represent the views of all.

As for the clause itself, there has been no indication whatsoever that the concerns of the government and the bill are founded in fact. Specifically, there is no threat that the CBC will be an instrument of the state. The intention and the effect are for the CBC to be an instrument of the people, of society, of the Canadian nation, not—and I cannot stress this enough—the government or the state.

The government's reasoning is clearly suspect in this regard. One only has to read the remarks of the CBC's long-time president, Pierre Juneau, to realize there is no threat to the objectivity of the CBC or to any part of its continued effective broadcasting in this country. Monsieur Juneau has gone on record as saying that the national unity phrase had not caused any problems during his tenure at the CBC.

The CRTC has concurred with this position. The simple fact is that the clause in question has never precluded the effectiveness of the CBC in fulfilling its over-all mandate.

The CBC has historically been a unifying force in this country and should continue to be given this responsibility as a central aspect of its mandate. Removing this aspect from the CBC's purview would be a significant detriment to the corporation and the country. It amounts to the disembowelment of the CBC as a national institution.

Sixty years ago Prime Minister R. B. Bennett said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as he helped to found it, would be an instrument of national consciousness and unity. He said that it was needed to bring the country together in those difficult times. He recognized that Canada's autonomy and independence hinged on the control of our communications system. Has really that much changed over the intervening years? I do not think so. The need is still as great as ever for a national institution to act as a unifying force.

I would argue that they are needed now more than ever before in our Canadian history. We need the CBC to act as a bulwark against the various decentralizing forces that bombard Canada from all its corners, from inside and outside this country, even from within this very House of Commons, from within this Parliament of Canada.

Canadians have diverse backgrounds and lives and so it is particularly important for federal institutions like the CBC to act as a unifying force, pulling Canadians together through the promotion of our common interests and perspectives.

National radio programs such as Morningside, As It Happens. Sunday Morning, Cross Country Check–Up; as well as television shows like The National, The Journal; documentaries like Patrick Watson's The Struggle for Democracy, Ken Dryden's Home Game, and even Hockey Night in Canada provide a unifying influence on Canadians.

I am sure that this would continue at least in the short term without the national unity mandate specifically spelled out. But the focus might change. Over time the CBC could lose its effectiveness as a pro–Canadian force.

Some more cynical analysts have said that this bill in its present form could be the government's first step toward privatization of our beloved Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Any move in this direction would be tragic. The vast majority of Canadians believe that they have an incredible service at their disposal and would shun any move toward changing the 60–year mandate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

It is incumbent upon us here today to make a stand with these initial signs of erosion. The Mulroney government has already cut the CBC's budget with abandon and disregard. We have seen this time and time again. We cannot also allow them to take away the fundamental mandate of the CBC through this flawed legislation.

It is clear that this bill must have changes made. The amendments we consider today, therefore, must be accepted in order to make broadcasting law in this country reflect the needs of this nation.

Broadcasting provides a unique opportunity to bind us together. It must not be ignored or tossed aside, especially at this time in the country's history when Canada is being pulled apart from many sides.

It is particularly ironic to me that the Prime Minister of Canada has named Keith Spicer to head a Citizens' forum intended to promote national unity, but he supports a broadcast bill that so fundamentally contradicts his expressed concern about national unity.

If the government is as eager to promote unity as it would like Canadians to believe, it can start by amending Bill C–40 and not so easily dispense with the essential mandate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In conclusion, this act is so fundamentally flawed that it cannot, and must not, go through without amendment. As written, Bill C–40 precludes the CBC the opportunity to explore the vision of being an agency of national consciousness and of contributing the vital component, the national sounding board, for our common thoughts, interests and ideals.

This is a tragedy that must be corrected by those of us assembled here in this House of Commons. Therefore, I urge the government to support this critical amendment and to re–establish more substantial support for the CBC.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this very important debate. It is a debate, I feel, which proposes to alter the very foundation of the Canadian broadcasting system.

I am deeply concerned by most aspects of this destructive bill, but what disturbs me most is the clause which would remove from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the mandate to contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity.

• (1520 )

The promotion of national unity has been a principle of the CBC since its foundation. If there ever was a time to eliminate this principle, this is the worst possible time.

Almost 60 years ago, Prime Minister R. B. Bennett said that the CBC would be an instrument of national consciousness and unity. I believe that the CBC has fulfilled that mandate and that to deny it the means and the will to continue doing so is a tragic mistake.

The CBC has acted as a unifying force throughout its existence. For many, if not all of us here today, the CBC and Radio–Canada played a major role in our lives as we grew up and continues to do so today. Before television and in many cases beyond, the radio was the best source of popular entertainment and information to be had by Canadians. There was an immediacy about radio, a sense of participation and presence that was lacking even in newspapers, and was highly valued.

Television is the dominant medium in the world today and the CBC has demonstrated its ability to stay at the forefront with innovative programming and bold initiatives such as the all news channel Newsworld. But while doing so, it has not neglected radio. Any fan of Morningside, or As It Happens, or any number of other fine programs can attest to this.

CBC programming, both radio and television, serves to bring Canadians together, to teach us about each other. We are a small population scattered over a huge expanse of territory, and the challenge of communication is a major one. The CBC has played a vital role in ensuring that Canadians communicate with one another, that they feel connected to one another. This is especially true of Canadians living in the outlying and isolated areas of Canada. For them in particular the CBC is and always has been a strong and badly needed link to their fellow Canadians and to the world. For the bulk of the Canadian population densely clustered along the 49th parallel and the Great Lakes, the CBC serves to acquaint them with the other Canadian experience.

If not for the powerful voice of CBC many Canadians would be more familiar with the United States than they would be with their own country. To allow this to happen would be to weaken the bonds and the potential of this nation. To do what we can to familiarize Canadians with their own culture with their fellow citizens, is not to promote "intolerable propaganda" as the Minister of Communications would have us believe, it is to provide Canadians with the opportunity to learn about each other, an opportunity they would not otherwise have.

The Prime Minister has stated that everything we have accomplished as a country can be traced back to our sense of national purpose, to our national unity. That is the very essence of the reason why national unity must remain a part of the CBC's mandate. It is not there to force the CBC and Radio–Canada to act as a propaganda machine for the state. If that were the result of the mandate surely this government, with its low standing in the polls, would want to keep it. It is not there to force the CBC to relay the news with a state or even a Canadian bias. Rather, the mandate to promote national unity is vital in an intangible way.

A sense of national purpose is badly lacking in Canada today and national unity seems very fragile. If the mandate to promote unity has been some kind of iron fist wielded by CBC, I have yet to see the results. That does not mean that eliminating the mandate is a trivial or meaningless action, one that should hardly cause a ripple. Indeed, we need that mandate more than ever. It can do no harm and it could be of great help. Canada is becoming more and more decentralized, economically, socially, culturally, linguistically, regionally, and even spiritually. We are pulling apart at the seams. The CBC has the potential to serve as a bulwark against these decentralizing forces but only if we allow it the means and the will to do so, and only if we have the willingness to listen and to learn.

A mandate to promote national unity: Those are not empty words but a statement of purpose and the articulation of a dream. We are a nation built on dreams. Many Canadians are descendants of those who came from across the sea seeking a better life.

The national railway which allowed westward expansion was born in the imagination of a few men. For a nation such as this, a statement of purpose such as the promotion of national unity by CBC is not only necessary, it is natural.

We desperately need a sense of unity. We need a sense of national purpose. We need a sense that there is something worth fighting for. What kind of message does the elimination of the national unity mandate send to Canadians? It is a terribly negative message, and this is the worst of all possible times for the federal government to be issuing negative messages.

Most of us in this House believe that Canada is worth fighting for, and I believe that most Canadians feel that way too. In the fight, we need a purpose. We need rallying cries. To gut our national broadcasting institution of its mandate to promote Canadians unity is to tell Canadians that the dream is dead.

In saying these things, I speak from the heart. There are other aspects of the government's proposal to eliminate the national unity mandate, and indeed aspects of the entire bill which disturb me in a more concrete way. I fear that there is an underlying message in Bill C–40, and that is the end of the CBC as a government funded institution.

Since 1984, this government has cut the CBC's parliamentary grants by over $240 million, including severe reductions to its high–tech equipment. The government does not seem dedicated or even interested in developing the CBC's great potential. That is what the government did to passenger rail in Canada. It killed it bit by bit.

I am afraid that is what is happening to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The presence of the federal government in rural Canada and in the regions is decreasing. Post offices are closing. Military bases have been scaled down or closed, such as CFB Summerside in my province of Prince Edward Island.

The government's obsession with the free market is causing it to sell off Crown corporations such as Air Canada and Petro–Canada. The government's presence in the areas of transportation and natural resources allowed Canadians some measure of control over the forces which affect their lives.

The same is true of communications. Given this track record, and given the contents and the tone of Bill C–40, I cannot help but suspect that the government intends to gradually abandon the CBC. Canadians in smaller and more remote population areas such as Prince Edward Island fear that their local stations, CBC Charlottetown, for example, will be among the first to go.

Rumours to that effect have been circulating for some time now, and with Bill C–40, they grow stronger. The people of Charlottetown and of P.E.I. for one would like this government to promise that they will not lose their publicly funded CBC, which has served them well for so long.

To vote for the passage of Bill C–40 is to condone and to assist the government's plans for the CBC, none of which are good. If we have any remaining doubt about the government's attitude toward this most Canadian of institutions, we need only to think of its intention to eliminate the promotion of national unity from the CBC mandate. That says it all.

This aspect alone of Bill C–40 is a tacit admission by the federal government that it believes Canadian unity to be a dead dream. So far as it is concerned, the fabric of this country has been torn beyond repair.

Either that, or this government does not believe that Canada is in need of unifying symbols, statements or ideals. I strongly disagree with both of these. I believe that by sending such a negative message to Canadians, the federal government is abandoning its responsibility to do everything within its power to keep this country together and to make it strong.

"To contribute to the development of national unity and to provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity." Those words do not pose any threat to the freedom of the media. They have not had that effect in the past, and they will not have it in the future. What they have done is represent what we value most about the CBC, which is that it provides us with a mirror reflecting back both the good and the bad, allowing Canadians to continue to examine and re–evaluate ourselves and our nation, and to ponder what Canada is and what it can be.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to speak, however briefly, to Bill C–40, an Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication. I am glad to see the Minister of Communications is here today to listen to the most fundamental aspect of this legislation which concerns Canada's national unity. I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for Mount Royal on her excellent work on this bill and on what she did to clarify for Canadians the national unity aspect that forms the nucleus of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's mandate in Canada.

Today, I will make my comments in French, and I do so for a very specific reason. Although my last name is LeBlanc, French is not my mother tongue, but I went to Quebec in the early 80s, when the national unity question was a subject of lively debate, especially in the province of Quebec. I was there as a student, to learn French, in an environment where this fundamental question that goes to the heart of our nation was very topical indeed.

I must say that my experience during those four years was a very valuable one, especially from a cultural point of view, because of the friendships I made and also because I was able to learn and understand a little more about the culture, values and principles of a society in this country that is very proud of what it has accomplished during the past three or four centuries, and which at that time was intent on discovering its identity.

I had an opportunity, since this was another critical period in our history, to see things from the perspective of a student at Laval University in Quebec City. I often watched CBC television to know what was going on across the country, and I saw that in Quebec as well, there was this yearning for an identity. Even out there, I realized there was, nevertheless, a national presence, a national government that recognized the aspirations of people in that part of Canada but at the same time did not intend to give way to these divided factions. It met them head–on and used the means at its disposal to tell Quebecers: Your future is in Canada.

This message has failed to come across since 1984. This government's statements and the messages and signals it sends are increasingly lacking in substance. One of the most discouraging indications of this lack of leadership, this failure to express our national identity, is the clauses we find in Bill C–40 before the House today. The purpose of the motion before the House today is to try and reverse this trend.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that if we believe in this country, we, as Canadians make an effort to reverse these trends and start speaking out to say that our country is Canada. We must defend our values and take pride in them.

If we start diluting the legislation that defines the mandate of our national broadcasting institution by saying that French and English are represented by two different communities or that national unity is no longer an important part of the mandate of our national television network, we are sending a message that the national government and our national institutions have lost the will and the courage to defend our country.

It is even more regrettable today, in 1990, when we look at other parts of the world and realize what we have here in Canada, compared with the situation in other countries around us.

Since I was elected, Mr. Speaker, I had a chance to visit Canada from coast to coast, not just Quebec and Western Canada but also the North. Every visit, every trip fills me with wonder at the splendour and riches of this country, and I ask myself what we can contribute to the world. We cannot help, however, if we are beset by internal divisions, if we are afraid to speak with a national voice and if we let ourselves be torn in so many directions. We cannot contribute effectively, for instance, toward resolving conflicts in the Middle East or help draft resolutions or rebuild a new world in the Soviet Union or elsewhere, as in the Third World, for instance.

I repeat, I am convinced that one area where Canada has a very important contribution to make is the environment. However, if we are distracted by internal divisions and are afraid to speak out, and if our government fails to give us any leadership in this field, we will be unable to make that contribution. The twenty–first century, which was to be Canada's century, will pass us by, and that would be regrettable for us here in Canada and even more so for people in other countries throughout the world.

These considerations go straight to the heart of the motions before the House today which are a particular concern of my colleague, who worked so hard to improve this bill in committee.

Mr. Speaker, one of our great Canadian philosophers was Marshall McLuhan, who had so much to say and contributed to our thinking about the media and communications in what he called the global village. McLuhan said: The medium is the message. He said the world had become a global village, mostly because of television. Television has caused the world to shrink and thus made it possible for us to express common values. However, television can also be a source of division, separation and discord inside a country.

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would like to say that Canada should stop acting like a young man who is perfectly healthy but all of a sudden decides to throw in the towel because life is no longer worthwhile and the challenges are too great. That is the general impression given by our national malaise. In fact, it is not a bad simile: this dynamic young man, who all of sudden feels that the challenges and opportunities of the future are just too much of a responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, they are not too much for us. What we need is time and a government that is prepared to pursue every avenue, to show leadership and to take a strong position in all areas, and that will start by improving the mandate we give our national telecommunications institution, which is why we are here today.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this subject on which I am very far from being a specialist, but I have become very concerned about it quite recently, partly from an experience I had last week, which I will mention.

The point of this amendment is that we should restore the principle that part of the CBC's mandate is to contribute to national unity as well a shared national consciousness or identity. It is very unfortunate that the government has undertaken to take out from the original mandate prior to the bill the duty to promote national unity.

If the objection is that it would be government propaganda, there are ways to deal with that so long as the duty is clearly defined because the government is only one of the governments in Canada. Unity does not mean uniformity, that everybody thinks the same, that everybody speaks the same language, that everybody wears the same clothes or supports the same hockey team. Unity means—especially in a country like Canada—unity of diverse groups that find how we can fit together and enrich each other. In other words, a very important part of a national broadcasting corporation should be to help the different regions and the different groups in Canada to know each other by letting them participate. That should be part of the duty and it should be clearly stated under the obligation to promote national unity.

The reason I want to speak on this is that last weekend I happened to have two interesting but somewhat distressing conversations. One was with an old friend in rural Ontario. He is an anglo. Frankly, he is not very sympathetic with francophones in Ontario, or in Quebec, and he gave me some of his reasons why.

I was a little alarmed at the distance between him and me on that subject because I felt he did not know a great deal about what actually goes on in Quebec, about how the people live in Quebec in the most simple ordinary sense.

This person is a retired trade unionist from the factory in which I used to work where I was the secretary at one time and he the union president. He is a man of social responsibility. But what he does not know about the French people of Canada, especially in Quebec, limits his sympathy, and he is worried about national unity. He gets quite upset in saying that he would fight to stop anyone from splitting Canada in two. He means it. He does not intend to be hostile. He thinks that there are some hostile people over there. That was Saturday evening.

On Sunday evening I was speaking with another old friend in Montreal, again a manual worker and a person with a good deal of education and self-education. Unfortunately for me he is bilingual. He is francophone but fortunately much more bilingual than I. He was shocked at how little I know about what is going on recently in Quebec regarding certain briefs to the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and so on.

We see each other several times a year. I live in Toronto and in Ottawa. My background is in Winnipeg and central Ontario, except for a very few years in Quebec. He feels that my understanding of him is very limited. He describes himself, and rightly so, as a federalist. He is aware of a separatist tide in Quebec, and he is very worried about it. He does not want our country split. He is distressed that I know so little, in his opinion, of the things in Quebec that matter to him.

Personally my situation is rather comical. I am in the middle between my anglophone friend in rural Ontario and my francophone friend in Montreal. I do not mean to blame any institution or any action, but the point is that we need the kind of institution that can explain the south to the north, the north to the south, Quebec to Ontario, Ontario to Quebec, francophones to anglophones, Chinese, Ukrainians, Italians, Japanese Canadians, the black people in Canada, or whomever. We have many groups in Canada that have their own characteristics and can be unaware of others and can be misunderstood by others. The CBC has been one of the main channels, in my experience, for enabling us to learn more about each other. We need more of that rather than less of that.

I am very sorry that over the past five years the CBC's operating budget has been cut every year. In 1984–85 it was $943.3 million. I will not go through all the years, but it goes down year by year to $812.5 million in 1989–90. In other words, there has been $130 million cut out of its budget. Part of the programming that has been deleted because of those cuts is the regional programming, telling the north about the south, the south about the north, and the east about the west.

I am luckier than many Ontarians. I have been able to visit the maritimes sometimes and the west coast sometimes. For the most part, I do not know the maritimes. I have a son in Newfoundland, but I only see a little bit of Newfoundland when I visit there.

The programs on the CBC are very valuable. It is unfortunate that many of those very Canadian programs—and by that I do not mean uniformly Canadian; I mean Newfoundland, Vancouver, Yukon, northern Ontario, the Eastern Townships of Quebec, or many other groups—have been cut back. It is very unfortunate that CBC has been, by the budget cuts, pressured to abandon its goal of 95 per cent Canadian content in prime time.

Prime time is pretty important, especially for our children as they are growing up; in my case our grandchildren. They have to have the chance to watch these Canadian content programs when they should not be in bed or at school.

There is nothing we can do today, in this bill, about the budget cuts, but we can at least, if the government will see the point, restore the principle that the CBC has a duty to promote national unity. We have heard a great deal during the past year or two about the need for national unity.

It is very unfortunate and strange, and for some people it is very offensive, that at the time the Prime Minister speaks about national unity his government is demolishing, piece by piece, slice by slice, budget cut by budget cut, and now with legislative changes, one of the main instruments of national unity created by the Canadian people.

Whether the government is planning to sell off the CBC in whole or in part, I do not know of course. It has done that with many other groups created by the Canadian taxpayers and labour, often sold at a ridiculously small price. What its plans are for the CBC, it has not told us yet. It should not take out of the law this duty to promote national unity, or else the Prime Minister will have to be seen by Canadian people as not meaning what he says when he talks about national unity.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to rise in the House today to address Bill C–40 respecting broadcasting and amendments to certain acts.

I would like to direct my comments to the whole issue of national unity. I come from an area that represents a mosaic of Canadians. First Canadians are in the majority in the area that I represent, and basically these people have their own languages and their own cultures. This a reflection of Canada and what Canada is all about.

Bill C–40 drops the CBC's 1968 mandated role to contribute to the development of national unity and to provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity. My feeling is that the removal of the national unity reference was recommended by both the Caplan–Sauvageau report in 1986 and the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture in 1987.

The standing committee had been concerned that this clause might interfere with CBC's ability to ensure that its programming reflect and interpret as fully, as fairly and as accurately as possible Canada's cultural, social, political, economic, linguistic and regional reality and diversity.

Former CBC President Pierre Juneau told the standing committee that the phrase national unity had not caused any problems during his years at the CBC. The CRTC noted that its interpretation of the term never precluded a free political discussion from all points of view.

Coming from the Northwest Territories and from an area that is highly represented by a multiplicity of factors which lead to a very diverse population of languages and cultures, my feeling is that the systematic dismantling of the CBC will have serious effects on the quality of our lives as Canadians.

Local news broadcasts may have to be cancelled. Some regional radio stations will have to close. Commercials will have to be reintroduced on CBC radio. The current level of regional programming cannot be maintained. This is particularly serious in the north because we depend on information which is critical to our safety, such as on the weather and flying conditions.

Liberal members of Parliament believe that because our country is so vast we need a sufficiently funded CBC in order for the whole country to have access to this service.

The CBC unites our country. It is precisely because the CBC is a public network that it can offer wholly Canadian programming. By destroying the CBC, the government is destroying an important part of Canadian culture. Canadians have moulded the CBC over the past 50 years into the quality Canadian programming of today. What justification does the government have for reversing all this in one fall swoop?

If we are to preserve our identity as a nation, we need to invest in our cultural institutions. I believe the government, by cutting funding to the CBC, is ensuring that our children will grow up with less than a true sense of what it is to be Canadian and what Canada is all about.

We know that many Canadians share our concern about the impacts the cuts will have on the CBC and on Canadians. It is essential that we tell the government loudly and clearly that it is not acceptable to destroy and erode the public broadcasting program of Canada.

I feel so strongly about the CBC and the role it plays in educating Canadians about Canadians that I wrote to Patrick Watson and Gérard Veilleux in February to ask why they do not provide the Newsworld service and if they would provide the news world service to the Northwest Territories.

We were hosting a major leadership forum which focused on national issues, issues of national importance and ones which particularly referred to issues of aboriginal populations across Canada. There was much reference to Arctic sovereignty. There was reference to the whole issue of self-government.

These are things that Canadians want to know about. It would be important for the whole nation to have seen this, and this is what I wrote to Mr. Watson and Mr. Veilleux. In part I wrote:

> Sovereignty is important to all Canadians but it is the residents of the Arctic who have maintained the north's sovereignty through traditional use and occupancy of the land and water. What political development means with or without the Meech Lake Accord is unique to the two territories. Environment issues in the Arctic are different than those in other areas. Energy is equally important. The north has the resources to make Canada energy self-sufficient. I could go on but my point is that the forum this weekend will be dealing with many profound problems that would be extremely educational and interesting for all Canadians.

I want to provide this House with at least part of the response I received from these two very honourable gentlemen, because it indicates the belief of CBC management with respect to the role that CBC plays in national unity. It is important for me to share this with the House. Mr. Veilleux wrote: "The CBC fully recognizes the importance of bringing concerns of northern Canadians to the attention of the whole country. Indeed, with respect to Newsworld in particular, every weekend we broadcast Focus North from Yellowknife and Mayda from Whitehorse. Regularly throughout the week we have inserts from Yellowknife into our prime time Calgary program This Country".

He continued: "In closing, I wish to stress that the advent of Newsworld has heralded a dramatic increase in the coverage of the political agenda of Canada. It has also brought an unprecedented level of regional coverage to all parts of the country. What is more, the region that has benefited most from our formats and our editorial imperative to show Canadians other parts of Canada is the north. Never before have northern concerns been so presented so frequently and so directly, and without being filtered through a central and southern Canadian perspective".

As well, former CBC President Pierre Juneau, to whom I referred to in a previous statement, told the standing committee that the phrase national unity had not caused any problems during his years at CBC.

I must say there has been a devastating impact, though, because when we talk about national unity we talk about the strength of that national unity in terms of what languages and what cultures there are in a country.

In the area that I come from I guess the expression of national unity comes from the majority of people who live there. This particular bill respecting broadcasting refers to this. Page 6 of the bill indicates that programming which reflects aboriginal cultures of Canada should be provided within the Canadian broadcasting system as resources become available for the purpose. This is the statement of commitment within the body of this bill. I have here a couple of press releases from the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation. In one of these press releases, a lady by the name of Blandina Makik, Executive Producer of Children's Programming in Iqaluit, in the Northwest Territories, calls the $600,000 cut to the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation spiritual genocide. She states that the cuts are expected to be felt in cultural, educational, news and current affairs programs, broadcast in Inuktitut to homes where many of the older Inuit do not speak English. Essentially, the reference is to a unilingual group.

• (1600)

The other thing which is quite devastating for this particular area is that in the $600,000 cut was included a very, very important program called The Super Shmoo series, which had a funding of $215,000. The native communications programs were cut back and this does not do anything for national unity. It does not give the complete expression of language and culture of all regions of Canada.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that Canada is a cultural mosaic, and we are more influenced than any other nation by our vast geography and vast wilderness and by our environment. Part of what has helped to build our country, from east to west and to the north is our infrastructure, such as the public broadcasting system. We have enforced a sense of Canadianism in ourselves through the CBC, which helps define a sense of our own identity as a nation. So now, more at this time in history than any other time, we need this institution of national unity to speak to one another.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon)—The Environment; the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso (Mr. LeBlanc)—Scotia Synfuels Project; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Proud)—Goods and Services Tax.

The hon. member for St. Boniface.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to be able to speak to this legislation today. Frankly, if we want to be serious about national unity, and I believe that every single Canadian in his or her own way wants to be, we have to think very seriously about our national institutions. One of these is communications, and certainly we have to think equally seriously about the importance of restoring the national unity clause.

Many of us are particularly preoccupied with what is happening in the country today. We recognize the great conflicts and the great pressures in the country. When we think about national unity, surely we need to acknowledge that every single man and woman needs to feel as if they can get what is their fair share from this country. Canadians, whether of aboriginal ancestry, French, English, or other ancestry, needs to feel as if they belong and they count. The five to seven million functionally illiterate Canadians need to believe that they can improve their lot and participate more fully in Canadian society. Every poor Canadian of the more than five million poor in this country needs to believe as well that he or she will break out of this vicious circle of poverty.

Until all of our regions, whether in the great north or in the western provinces, Ontario, Quebec or the Atlantic provinces feels that it will be treated fairly, that there are mechanisms in place that will help it to communicate, help it to work out its differences, we will not have the kind of strong united country that we want.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the government to stop dismantling what we have built, what unites us, to stop destroying the institutions that give us a chance to talk and get to know one another.

[English]

Let us look at some of the decisions that have been taken.

[Translation]

I believe that some of the decisions that have been made did not contribute anything at all to make Canada a strong and united country. Consider for instance the cut-backs at VIA Rail where more than 2,700 employees have been laid off, or the Air Canada privatization deal not long after that which was the end of the line for over 2,900 men and women. I am sure you remember the sale of Route Canada by the CN and that you are aware of the fact that nearly 2,000 men and women have been are still suffering because the government does not seem to be able to do anything to help them.

With respect to the privatization of Petro-Canada, we can see now that we had just the right organization which, had the government been willing to act, could have met the energy needs of all Canadians. Why did the government fail to come up with a policy. After all, we have had six years to achieve energy self-sufficiency.

Just looking at the number of bankruptcies, which are now at an all-time high, is enough to realize that the country is being torn apart and falling down. The government-created recession, a fact admitted by the ministers involved, is certainly not going to help strengthen national unity. Some of the CBC cut-backs—my colleague has just referred to them—have been driving Canadians even further apart, and this is true from one end of the country to the other.

[English]

What we really need to do is start listening to the people again. If we were to ask Canadians whether or not they want this government and this Parliament to make a sincere and profound commitment to national unity, we would get an unequivocal yes. People would be telling us to do everything in our power to make sure that the country is able to bounce back, that it is able to become much more united and much stronger than it has ever been.

We need to start listening to Canadians, to its five million poor, most of whom are women, many of whom are seniors, about one million of whom are children. We need to start talking to and listening to the functionally illiterate Canadians, who number between five million and seven million, and who feel sometimes as if they will never be able to break out of this difficulty that they are experiencing. Disabled Canadians often feel marginalized. We are talking about 3.3 million Canadians. We have to start listening to all of them in all regions of Canada from each and every single province and each of our two territories.

The removal of this particular clause is another blow, another kick, another shot, if you like, at Canada. It will damage the concept of national unity, which is so precious and so essential to a nation such as ours, particularly one as large and complex and so vast that many, many Canadians do not understand it nearly as well as they should or could.

I ask the government to consider the restoration of the national unity clause. We need to admit that we need information about ourselves. We know too little about each other, and because we know so little, we often misunderstand each other.

Let me complete my address by simply using an analogy. If a family is going to be strong and united, it needs good information within that family. We need open communications. We need to know each other so that we can reach out to each other.

[Translation]

The members of a strong and united family talk to each other. We need to have open and honest exchanges that will make it easier to understand one another, to work and play together and contribute to our unity. I believe the same is true of a country like ours. Without sound information about other Canadians from the various regions and without open communication lines we will not go very far.

[English]

With those particular comments, I will ask the government to ensure that it looks at this particular clause, that it makes sure that the tools that we, as Canadians, need to build a stronger more united country are, in fact, given to us. I believe most of us would agree that until every single man, woman and child in this great nation, whether he or she is aboriginal, French, English or of other ancestry, no matter where he or she lives, feels he or she belongs, is able to understand each other, we are going to continue to have serious difficulties.

I sincerely believe that we must have open lines of communication and sound information that will enable us to know each other better. Without these communication networks we stand to lose a lot. We even stand to lose everything.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, broadcasting, whether it is television or radio, brings Canada and the world into our living rooms. It brings in a world of news, sports, entertainment and public affairs. Broadcasting is a key medium which unites us by reflecting Canada to our fellow Canadians at a time when unifying the country is more critical than ever before, given the deep divisions and racial intolerance that are dividing so many communities.

Given these realities, Liberals believe that Bill C–40 moves away from the strong national broadcasting system that Canada has always held as part of this elusive Canadian identity, letting us share a common purpose. For this reason, we believe the government is wrong to weaken the CBC in its proposed broadcasting legislation.

With the passage of Bill C–40, the CBC will no longer be required to contribute to the development of national unity. It will be dropped from its mandate, just when the government should be doing everything in its power to give each and every Canadian a true sense of belonging and participation. For us on this side of the House, our goal for Canada is developing a national personality, building a sense of national unity and a national consciousness. We believe we need a strong national institution like the CBC to weave all of the regions and all of the diverse participants of Canada into a united nation that is working in the interests of all Canadians.

Just last spring we in the rural communities across this country lost a valuable resource in the agricultural community. We lost George Price, one of CBC radio's last farm reporters. His position had been cut. I strongly disagree with this decision. We already miss George Price.

He has been an excellent agri–food industry reporter. However, even though George Price is no longer with us, what is more important is the CBC has eliminated his position. The farmers of Canada who have relied on this information service for input on agricultural issues will have a grave loss. Farmers do not have the time to catch regularly scheduled newscasts but they always listened to George Price and his program while driving their tractors or their combines in the fields.

Yet, in the response from the CBC when I wrote about this they pointed out that farmers get up–to–the–minute information from computers, fax machines, wire services, all news television and a variety of other sources, as well as CBC radio. The did not see CBC radio as a loss.

I have to point out that I am not only a member of this House, but I am also a farmer. Certainly we have some of the services I have just listed in our homes, but we do not have them on our tractors and our combines, other than the radio. George Price's program was something we never missed, whether we were on the tractor, the combine or in our homes. He was one of the few reporters who was factual, he was on the job and he kept the other elements of the news media honest. George Price was a very conscientious person who always gave an unbiased account of what was happening.

I have to compare this with some of the headlines over the last few weeks. Some of that was instituted in the House of Commons, when the minister of trade chastised the Minister of Agriculture for giving the farmers $8.8 billion in subsidies, which was a concocted figure. We had a headline saying, "Lavish farm subsidies milking consumers", and of course the poor reporter did not know if that was a factual figure.

George Price would never have let them get away with that.

Another one from the Montreal Gazette: "Farmers being dragged kicking and screaming into the 1990s." This is an account of a report put together by the Canadian Consumers' Association. They say that Canadians paid double the average world price for milk because of restrictions that protect the domestic dairy industry from cheaper imports.

That reporter, and obviously the newspaper, did not realize that input costs are higher here in Canada. They seem to think the farmers are getting the extra indirect subsidies.

Even The Globe and Mail, November 19: "The policy panel" by a former Deputy Minister of Finance of this government and also a former president of a bank, compared the $2.7 billion subsidies to marketing boards as an indirect subsidy from the consumers to the producer.

He did not stop to realize that input costs here in Canada are 25 to 30 per cent higher than they are in the United States. I countered to him that perhaps we could look at the interest rates. This is a former bank president. Interest rates are higher in Canada than in the United States.

I have to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it necessarily follows that Canadian milk prices are higher than they are in the United States and so are Canadian interest rates, are the banks not being subsidized by the consumers and small businesses and big business.

Let's follow that theory through and be fair and honest. If George Price was there again, they would never have gotten away with it.

To top it all, here we have some massive cuts in CBC's budget. Yet, this government funded the Canadian Consumers' Association with $790,000 to come out with a report as inaccurate as this, obviously displaying a double standard.

Other businesses in society must have a profit to survive. Agriculture is no different. If it does not have that profit, then the whole industry is going down the tubes. I can never remember a time, even back into the 1930s when I first remember going to town with my dad for supplies, when things were as tough as they are out there at the present time, and this government is completely insensitive.

Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that this country is going to hold this government accountable not only for the cuts it made to the CBC but for what is going to happen five years down the road. We know what is happening in Russia at the present time. There are food shortages there.

Their system of corporate farming did not survive, and it is not going to survive here in Canada. If George Price was still in the CBC, he would be reminding the government and the people of Canada that the farmers, too, deserve an income that is commensurate with the rest of that of society or they are not going to survive.

When I look at what has been happening here with this government, it does not really seem to care about any of our national institutions. It simply wants to promote the world trade at the cost of those institutions in Canada that served us well over the years. It has ignored the reasons behind the need for the Canadian Wheat Board when it was brought in by a Conservative government back in the 1930s.

It has ignored why the Canadian Dairy Commission was brought into being. It has ignored the reasons why the Egg Marketing Agency, the Broiler Marketing Agency and the Turkey Marketing Agency were brought into being. It forgot the chicken and egg wars. It forgot the other things that happened in history that brought about the creation of these institutions.

Institutions were always accurately reported by George Price, not like the garbage that we have been hearing in last six weeks from the concerted media attack on these institutions that have served this country so well. I have to wonder who is orchestrating these attacks, because the Minister of Agriculture has been very quiet on the whole issue.

As a matter of fact, in a meeting last week in Winnipeg, one of the senior officials of Canada Agriculture in charge of policy stated that perhaps the consumers should be setting the price of milk. What is going to happen if they are going to insist on setting the price of milk? Will they set the price or our input costs too? Are they going to set the price of what you have to purchase as a consumer?

I think not. I want an explanation from the Minister of Agriculture as to why he is letting one of his officials state these types of policies that are surely going to establish a double standard. Or, is he going to move to the corporate farms? I think this House deserves an explanation from the Minister of Agriculture and from that official.

This Conservative government since 1984 has cut CBC's parliamentary grants by over $240 million, which includes severe reductions to our high-tech equipment. Certainly, the CBC should be made a vehicle for promoting Canadian unity, more so than the other institutions that we have in society. It must remain that way as a safeguard against various decentralizing forces at work in this nation. I want to reiterate that such a drastic cut to the position such as George Price held is not acceptable to this side of the House. I urge strongly to have that taken into consideration and have it reinstated as quickly as possible.

• (1620)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the record shows that I follow several speakers from this side of the House who have expressed profound concern for the future of the Canadian broadcasting system.

Let the record also show that the Conservatives, on the other side of the House, have not taken part in this debate. That includes the hon. Minister of Communications who sits at his desk and refuses to come to the defense of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I say shame on the Minister of Communications. I say shame on the whole lot of you.

We are here today involved in what I would describe as a very strange debate. It is strange because it deals with a clause in Bill C–40, this broadcast bill, that will take away the national unity mandate from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It seems that only in Canada can we have this kind of occurrence. We have a cherished and treasured public broadcasting system which has done a tremendous job for more than half a century. It has been as important to this country as the railway that was built from coast to coast well over a century ago.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has played an absolutely crucial and indispensable role in the development of Canada. It was a noble idea from the beginning and it is still a noble idea. A public broadcast corporation like the CBC reflects the country and ties us together. After all, this is a huge sparsely–populated country. The CBC reflects Canada. It tells us about our woes, our dreams, our controversies and our hurts. The CBC reflects most everything that is Canada.

We now come to this clause in Bill C–40. If it goes through—and Tories are pretty good at ramming things through—it will remove the national unity mandate from the CBC, as if it were some kind of disease. The argument that this government has put forward with respect to taking away the national unity mandate is that it is concerned about turning the corporation into some kind of propaganda machine. It would not want to have the CBC behaving as if it were some kind of a propaganda outlet.

I worked at the CBC for 18 years. I think that I know something about the corporation. I can assure you that if you leave the national unity mandate with the CBC, it is not going to be in any way in the future a propaganda machine.

Let us get an understanding of the CBC because I think this is where the Tories go wrong. They do not understand the function of the CBC. They do not understand the kind of work the CBC does. The CBC is much more than just a news disseminating agency. If the CBC was just gathering, writing, editing and delivering the news, perhaps I could question the national unity mandate because reporters are an independent–minded people, they really do not care about politics. They are concerned about delivering the news, good or bad.

The CBC is so much more than that. It is a national broadcasting institution that ties the entire country together and reflects the Canadian story. That takes resources. It is an enormous job and I think it is the responsibility of the government to say to the corporation that part of its job is national unity, not by twisting the news or concocting some kind of silly political story, but by doing the job. It takes a lot of resources and an enormous amount of commitment to carry out the national unity task. That is why the government should be standing behind the CBC and telling the CBC that it is a force for national unity.

Let me use an analogy, Mr. Speaker. If we did not have a CBC television or radio outlet in the province of Manitoba, could one not make the argument that that is not good for national unity? I would suggest to you that if the national public broadcast system ignored one of the provinces, I do not think it would be very good for national unity. I think it would be right and proper for the government to tell the CBC that it wants an outlet in the province of Manitoba for it to do the job that the CBC is charged to do.

When it comes to the matter of national unity, if the CBC is charged with that mandate it can then turn to the government to say that it needs resources to do its job. It might mean more news editors, producers, and directors in the province of British Columbia. It might even mean needing more entertainment programs. Whatever it is, it is all part and parcel of this job in the name of national unity.

Let us forget about the nonsense of propaganda. We are not talking about propaganda, we are talking about the corporation doing its job. When the CBC does a good job, be it news, entertainment, current affairs, Hymn Sing, it is all under the aegis of doing it for Canada, and therefore doing it for national unity.

By taking the national unity mandate away from the CBC, it sends a very bad signal. It sends a signal to certain people in the country who would like to Balkanize, break up and separate the country into two countries. I do not think that is the responsibility of parliamentarians and certainly is not the responsibility of the federal government charged with operating a healthy CBC.

Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have left?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): One minute.

Mr. Harvard: Perhaps I should not be very surprised by this proposal on the part of the government because this Conservative government does not have faith in public institutions anyway. Ironically, if the CBC were privately owned I would not be surprised if it had a mandate with respect to national unity, and we would not have this clause at all.

• (1630)

We would not have this clause in the bill because then the Tories on that side of the House would say: "Ah well, they know what they are doing. If they need a national unity clause, so be it". But they do not have any faith in this public broadcast system. It is a darn, darn shame. It is a terrible shame.

Let me just finish by saying this: The Conservatives and this government like to spread the rumour that Canadians have lost faith in their institutions, and that includes the CBC. Not true. There was a recent survey in western Canada which shows once and for all that Canadians do have great faith in their institutions. It is just this government that spreads a lot of bad news which is not factual.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I detected that my colleague is only half way through his speech. Is there unanimous consent for him to carry on?

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: There are three or four of us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): At report stage we all have 10 minutes. There are several speakers. The next speaker for the party is the hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I could have listened for days to my hon. colleague on his speech about the CBC. He is a distinguished broadcaster who certainly knows not just a lot about broadcasting, but about national unity.

I have the great occasion recently on a trip to western Canada to sit with him many afternoons, along with some distinguished western Canadians, to discuss issues such as national unity. It truly is too bad that we did not have unanimous consent of the House so that the House could benefit from his wisdom and experience.

I want to get right to the meat of the matter in dealing with the motion that is before us in Bill C-40, the broadcasting act. I grew up way down east. Anybody who listens to me in the House knows that I am very proud of where I come from. I am proud that I am a Canadian from Atlantic Canada. But when I was growing up there was a saying that my father used to quote often. It was: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it".

I have looked at the amendments being proposed here in Bill C-40. I cannot believe that a minister of the Crown and a government that claims to govern for all of Canada—not for just a part of it—would have the gall to remove a clause from a Crown corporation like CBC, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Radio-Canada, which is a piece of national infrastructure. It is a piece of Canadiana.

Sure, there are a lot of things that should be improved in the broadcast bill. We have heard much debate on it. We probably will hear more before the day is over. But for the minister to propose to take out what I consider to be motherhood just blows me over. The minister indicated that he wants to take out the clause, and I will read it:

> Perhaps the CBC 1968 mandated role "to contribute to the development of national unity and provide for continuing expression of Canadian identity".

The minister found that so objectionable that he had to put a clause in the bill to remove it. He was quoted by the Toronto Globe and Mail on September 12, 1990, as saying that he found that 22-year old national unity mandate as intolerable interference because the CBC was maintaining this political valve artificially.

I think that is a bunch of hogwash. We are in a situation in this country because of the activity of this government since 1984, when it assumed power and told the Canadian public that it was fit to govern, that it would create great economic prosperity and wealth across this country, but most of all, that it could keep this country together.

Since 1984 we have seen this government on the front benches opposite not only wreak economic devastation from coast to coast to coast in this country, but to dismantle the—the minister is over there and I would hope that he would listen. He is a member of this government, as is the Minister of Communications.

What this government has done has systematically dismantled the national infrastructure of this country. Every instrument of national unity has been subject to attack, a battering, assault and battery by this government.

I cannot believe the Minister of Communications can sit there and read through his press clippings. No wonder he cannot look most of us in the face. I do not know what he thinks the mandate of the CBC should be. Should the mandate of the CBC be just a commercial endeavour? Should the mandate of the CBC be just to report the news as it is seen in Montreal and in Toronto? Well, I am a Canadian and I happen to come from the east coast of this country and I believe in this country.

Mr. Lewis: That's their problem.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The Minister of Transport says that is my problem.

An hon. member: That's their problem.

Mr. MacDonald: If it is anybody's problem, it is your problem because you guys do not like what you hear most days from this side of the House because you cannot stand to hear the truth the way it is spoken on this side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I want to get into this thing about the national unity clause. I do not know if the minister really has a firm commitment to national unity in this country. He has under his ministry responsibility for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

He is from the province of Quebec, a province that currently is expressing some great reservations about the merit of staying in this country. It has established a commission of the provincial government to look at options as to whether or not they should stay in this country.

We hear all kinds of talk from the official opposition in Quebec City about sovereignty, or sovereignty association, and one of the main implements and instruments of national unity as mandated by statute is the CBC to promote Canadian unity. At this time in our history when the country is just about to fly apart, the Minister of Communications comes forward and is absolutely determined to remove the mandate of the CBC, one of the few remaining pieces of national infrastructure, threads of national unity. He wants to strip the mandate to promote Canada and understanding between Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I started off by saying that when I grew up my father told me that if it ain't broke, don't fix it. So I cannot quite get it through my head why this minister, when he is coming in with this bill which tampers with a whole lot of things with the Broadcast Act, felt so determined that he had to remove the mandate for national unity. I have read a lot of his statements and statements from people in the broadcast industry.

More important, I have listened to Canadians. I have listened to Canadians in the west, in Ontario, in Quebec, and in Atlantic Canada. Canadians are starting to wonder if this government really wants this country to stay together. Canadians are starting to wonder if ministers like the Minister of Communications really believes that this country is worth saving, really believes that this country can survive, or if what they are doing is trying to adjust the statutes of this country to a reality that they see, a reality of a country that is no longer together. Maybe it is a reality of a country unfortunately split along linguistic lines or geographic lines, but probably linguistic.

I am going to stay here to hear the minister. would like to hear a rousing defence of national unity, a strong federalist speech from this minister, dealing with communications and the role of the CBC and cultural institutions that come under his mandate, and promoting and preserving national unity in this country.

As well I hope everybody who is watching television stays tuned to the debate. I would like to know if this minister has given up on the concept of a strong federal country called Canada or if he has already thrown in the towel and is simply trying to adjust the current legislation on the federal books to reflect his view that there is more than one Canada, that there are two Canadas here.

The motion that has been put forward is one that everybody in this House should support. There comes a time when partisanship in this House has to give way to national good. In this particular case the amendment put forward reinstates into the Broadcasting Act that it be imperative that the CBC promote national unity. That is something that each and every individual in this House, male and female, east, west, central Canadian, French or English, should see as imperative these days when our country is being faced with such tugs and strains to the fabric of unity. I would hope that the ministers would review the program of systematic destruction of the fabric of national unity in this country and see that what this minister has proposed in Bill C–40, particularly this motion which we are debating now, is not only regressive but it is destructive, and see the danger that this particular clause causes and talk to the minister, before he gets up, and tell the minister that we need a speech of unity from him. What we do not need from this minister is more gobbledegook and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I cannot see why you would be so surprised, Mr. Speaker, because this is after all a debate that concerns all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to rise on this debate and, in particular, speak to the issue about which I think every Canadian should be thinking around this time of the year, Christmastime.

We are probably at a very critical time in the history of our country and we need leadership on a national level to help keep this country together. I happen to believe that as Canadians and, in particular, as parliamentarians too little is being said in this national Canadian Parliament about the values that we share together. One of those values is the capacity to communicate in our two official languages and the capacity to communicate by the instrument that links this country from coast to coast.

One of the reasons that I fear for the future of this country is because Canadians spend too little time communicating and speaking together. How many French Canadians know the names of Barbara Frum and Peter Mansbridge? How many English Canadians know the names of Denise Bombardier and Simon Durivage? If we are going to keep this country together, it is clear that we need instruments like the CBC to promote national unity. Marcel Masse, is that such a dirty word, to promote national unity?

I ask that because the minister has not had the courage to speak in the House to this issue, nor has his Prime Minister. At a time when the very future of this country is at stake, surely we can expect leadership on the national level to address these questions.

Quebecers have a right to ask themselves the question: is there anybody in this country who cares about whether they belong to Canada or not? That is the question that is being asked right now in the Bélanger–Campeau commission. Whatever the outcome of that commission, they are examining their future in a serious, constructive, and complete way. I am sorry to say that the same cannot be said of our Prime Minister and the pathetic effort called the Spicer commission with commissioners working possibly two days a month, maybe two days a week, commissioners who do not have a mandate, and posts that are being left empty, a Prime Minister who is not even prepared to speak publicly to the Bélanger–Campeau commission about the future that Quebec might still have within a country called Canada.

[Translation]

And the Minister of Communications stands there, looking unconcerned. That does not concenr him that he is depriving us of one of the instruments of Canadian unity. If he wants to do away with Canada, he should say so. If we still want Canada after Meech, Mr. Speaker, we must be able to communicate with one another and, at least, instruments such as the CBC will ensure we can do jsut that. I am not referring to Clyde Wells's language, which I suggest is not so much a form of communicaton as a form of excommunication. I prefer to have language—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point to the role of national unity that can be played by instruments like the CBC and Radio–Canada. I am not suggesting that there be journalistic gerrymandering. I worked as a journalist and heaven forbid that the government should tell journalists how to write. When Le Point and the CBC, in the weeks leading up to the Meech debate, developed a joint program where they explored the lives and reactions of Canadians, the very different views of the process leading up to the constitutional reform known as Meech Lake, it was clear that programs of that nature finally gave Canadians a chance to see how the other half felt.

How many English Canadians really understand why Quebec feels rejected, why Quebec is prepared, and possibly in the very near future, to give up on the country of Canada? We do not understand it, because even in our pan–Canadian news network called Newsworld we cannot hear the news in French. We can get the nightly news from Japan, but we do not have a French Canadian network through the Newsworld channel in the way that we should have.

[Translation]

One third of all Canadians are denied the right to listen to news in their own language. That is absolutely ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. During the Liberal leadership race, the leaders debate, in Montreal, had to be translated back into English to be broadcasted in the province of Quebec. You call that national broadcasting? That is ridiculous! Instead of using this bill to strenghten our means of communications, the minister is using it to deprive us of one of the last instruments at our disposal to precisely touch the hearts of the Canadian people and more particularly in these times that of the people of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only the issue of the Canadian unity clause, but also the fact that the minister is not prepared to protect Radio Canada International, nor to specifically mention the parliamentary channel.

[English]

It is not only the issue related to the national unity objectives of the CBC, but also the fact that the Minister of Communications is not prepared to outline in law a mandate for the parliamentary channel. Surely, if there is one way that we are going to keep this country talking together, it is by virtue of channels like this parliamentary channel that permits Canadians from coast to coast to hear the laws of the land in both official languages.

Not only is the Minister of Communications giving up on Canadian unity, throwing in the towel on the capacity of Radio–Canada to act as an instrument of national unity, but he is further cutting back on Canada's view internationally by refusing to reinforce the role of Radio Canada International.

We know that there are cuts and that the other shoe is about to drop. We will see fewer and fewer Canadian messages being sent out to the world. Neither is he prepared to protect the parliamentary channel. Northern Services also was a portion of the CBC that should be protected by legislation, and he is unprepared to act.

If there is one thing that we are going to be able to do, it is going to be by communicating through the mass media. I hate to say it but Marshall McLuhan was right: the medium is the message. The medium that is the message of a very power nature today is the medium of television. It is clear that both radio and television in the CBC have a very important role to play in educating and teaching Canadians about one another.

[Translation]

And the role the CBC plays, Mr. Speaker, as a link between the people in Western Canada and in Eastern Canada, is a capital one that should be mentionned in the bill. I do not understand why the minister refuses to answer. Maybe he is too busy with his own cable tax which will cost millions of dollars to the people of Quebec, whose language he did not protect. He did not protect the French language when he imposed the same base tax rate to the people who never watch English television. The minister, who talks so much of protection, missed the point in his own bill.

[English]

I am pleading with the minister to reconsider his position, to re-assert the capacity of the CBC to act as an instrument of national unity, and to make sure that the mandate of the CBC includes the notion of embracing not only our two cultural and linguistic groups that founded this country but also the one-third of Canadians who claim neither English nor French as their mother tongue. That must continue to be the respected and deserved mandate of the CBC.

• (1650)

[Translation]

I hope that, if he wants to have a say about the future of Canada, the minister is at least prepared to safeguard our means of communicating with one another in both official languages.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. We can give her extra time if we have unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We do not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is not that I do not enjoy hearing the hon. member for Hamilton East, but our time this afternoon is running very short and I want to have an opportunity to speak to Bill C-40 and the amendment before us today put forward by the hon. member for Mount Royal concerning reinstating the mandate of CBC to have a national unity role. In fact, Motion No. 17 indicates that the CBC should contribute to national unity, shared national consciousness, and identity.

The fact that we are debating this issue in this year, 1990, is really remarkable. It is simply unbelievable that any government, especially this government, would be bringing forward this Bill C-40 which would take away the responsibility of the CBC to play a national unity role.

In my opinion the CBC has a unique position in this country. We have the ability of CBC radio and television, but especially radio, to nip into every community right across this country, whether it is the outports of Newfoundland or the forestry communities of British Columbia or on the prairies or in Ontario or whatever. CBC radio has a special role and ability, whether it is This Country in the Mornings or the Gzowski Show, whether it is Cross Country Check-Up on Sunday afternoon, whether it is the As It Happens program at 6.30 in the evening, or a number of newscasts. There is practically no other instrument that knits this country together the way that CBC radio and CBC television do.

To take away this mandate of national unity from the CBC is really remarkable at a time when we have separatists sitting in the House of Commons, after going through the Meech Lake fiasco and after seeing a government that carries with it something like 14 per cent or 15 per cent support in the national public opinion polls.

It is incredible, when we have the Bélanger-Campeau Commission looking at what role Quebec will play in the future of Canada, when similar commissions are being set up by other provinces and now that the Prime Minister has established the Citizens' Forum on the Future of Canada, that this government would be removing national unity as one of the mandates of the CBC. This is unbelievable. I would certainly hope that the Minister of Communications would agree. Regardless of what his previous thoughts were about Canada or even what they are now, surely the Prime Minister should put his foot down.

I was appalled and surprised today, when the former Conservative member from Nova Scotia put a question to the Prime Minister on whether he or the senior minister in his cabinet responsible for federal-provincial relations was going to make a presentation before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, that the Prime Minister looked dumbfounded. When a commission in Quebec is looking at the role of Quebec in the future of this country, surely the Prime Minister should go before that commission and put before it the federalist national view of this government with regard to unity, to a federal role for the Government of Canada, and to a national unity scheme to ensure that Quebec plays a vital role and that we are a united country.

I could not believe that he had no response. He fobbed it off by saying that there was a member from the caucus on the commission. It simply makes one wonder where this government really stands when it comes to national unity. I hope that the members of the Tory caucus will vote with their heads, their minds, their conscience, and their heart for Canada.

Surely this country and what it has done for each and every one of us is far more important than the Tory Party, the Liberal Party, the NDP, or any other party in this country. I would hope that the Tory members would vote with their conscience and with their hearts for Canada when this resolution comes before them sometime next week.

I want to speak as well about the unique role that I see for the CBC in this country, not only in national unity but in informing us of what is going on. Not very often do I have the opportunity to listen to programs like This Country in the Morning, but sometimes in the summertime and at times when the House is not sitting I do. It seems to me that it gives us a unique capsule of the problems of various parts of the country, what the people are thinking, and what the issues are. Private radio and television cannot do that. It is not something that can be done easily, but CBC radio has a unique capacity.

People who are posted abroad in Latin America, or I suppose in the Persian Gulf, and certainly our Armed Forces in Lahr and Baden-Baden in Germany tell me that being able to receive CBC Radio Canada International keeps them in touch with a feeling for not only their section of the country they come from but for the entire country.

I believe that CBC radio has a very special mandate to bind the country together in that way, to keep us informed and to keep us feeling concerned about our fellow citizens. Likewise, in regions of the country such as northern Ontario, which represents 88 per cent of the land mass, we have two broadcasting studios: one in Sudbury and one in Thunder Bay.

Surprisingly CBC radio, which has covered most of northern Ontario only for the past few years, does a tremendous job of keeping us informed even in the regions. The area is so vast that its role is really very well carried out. It keeps us advised. If you live in Sudbury you do not hear much about Sault Ste. Marie except through CBC radio; likewise across the entire north. I think CBC radio does a tremendous service.

Another area I want to touch on relates to the cuts in CBC. This government, in its wisdom or lack of wisdom, has cut CBC's budget by some $240 million since 1984. This is really shameful when we look at its national unity role, the role to inform Canadians. CBC radio has a special role for one area of our country which is perhaps more important than any other, and that is its role in rural Canada.

Rural Canada is suffering in every sector of the country, but in no area of public life does CBC play a more important role than in agriculture because it is so diverse. We do not have one country when it comes to agriculture; we have about five. One important role that CBC Radio has carried through the years was the agriculture and resources representative on Parliament Hill.

It was done for many years by George Price. It was a terribly ungracious way that CBC advised him that he was not only being retired, but that his position was being dumped.

The agriculture committee of the House of Commons fought that decision. We got some commitments that the service would be continued. It has not. The government has failed—

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROTECTION FOR WHISTLE BLOWERS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider providing legislated protection to all environmental "whistle-blowers".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on M-149, which is a motion in my name, asking that the House and the government consider providing legislative protection for whistle blowing.

For many who are listening and watching, they probably do not know what such a motion is about. I would hope after I have covered the waterfront for 20 minutes, they will have a better idea of why it is so important that this Parliament and this country have whistle blowing legislation.

It is just as important as access to information or as having an environmental auditor. Without whistle blowing legislation, we will continue to see an awful lot of environmental offences continue without being reported to the appropriate authorities or being made public.

The intention of whistle blowing legislation is to protect the whistle blower, those who either phone the RCMP, Environment Canada or a local newspaper, or who make an environmental problem public.

It is to protect the environment and taxpayers from crime, losses from crime, criminal activity, and illegal and improper activities related to the environment. It is desperately needed not only to protect those workers, both public and private sector, but it is needed to protect the environment.

Many people fear job loss should they blow the whistle on their employer. They fear pay cuts, law suits, harassment and intimidation for reporting either on their industry or employer, even if they are just a member of the general public reporting on an environmental problem that they see occurring in, around or near their community.

The purpose of the legislation would be to encourage those who witness or are aware of illegal activity that significantly impairs the environment to report it and make it public. I am glad to see the minister of health listening to this most interesting debate, because he would know that within the medical and health field, whistle blowing is practically built within the system.

If there are problems with drugs or a certain kind of health care, the whistle is blown on them internally within the medical or health care system so that those problems can be dealt with quickly prior to the health or welfare of individuals who might be in the hospital or in the health care system being negatively impacted.

However, in the years that I have served in this House, I have witnessed many public and private sector whistle blowers who had been singled out and punished. I suppose more members of the opposition receive brown envelopes than do government members. Quite often, I find members of the opposition, including myself, know of things before some ministers do. That seems to be the nature of some kinds of negative policy decisions, that the opposition is made aware of them quickly, before they can be implemented.

Those who are punished, particularly those where there is a negative political impact or where the corporate masters are embarrassed or forced to clean up, quite often the political or corporate master will take some kind of singling out or punishment against those who have reported.

I have attended many meetings with trade unionists in recent months and years. For example just two weeks ago I attended the Canadian Labour Congress environment conference in Edmonton where there was extensive consideration for the need for whistle blowing legislation. Workers who witnessed, for example, spills at pulp mills, either intentional or accidental, at nuclear facilities, whether it was intention or accidental, or at other industrial sites, have found that many of their co-workers from the shop floor who have reported illegal activities that they have seen, or accidents that could endanger the environment, are singled out or red circled, or other kinds of punitive action are taken against them by their employers. There is a widespread fear for an individual's job when he or she reports on offences. Despite that, many trade unions are setting up special committees that go ahead and whistle blow anyway.

Offences that are criminal, for example, where the teller in a bank reports on a robbery, generally the manager or someone else within the banking system lauds that kind of whistle blowing. Quite often they are given a raise in pay and are seen as heroes in the community. The recent wave of white collar crime that we have seen both here and in the United States indicates how much stronger the whistle blowing legislation hotline tip system needs to be if we are to root out the degree of white collar crime that has been unleashed upon us within financial institutions and in other areas of our society.

Whistle blowing legislation is necessary to turn around the prevailing fear of punishment in order to make whistle blowing a right and respected duty. In some cases, it should provide for fine splitting, something we find in some areas of federal legislation already. There needs to be that kind of encouragement in areas where there are particularly nasty forms of environmental degradation going on. Where the courts ultimately bring a fine against those who have been perpetrating the offence, the fine should be split with those who have been involved with blowing the whistle.

Whistle blowing legislation is necessary to halt environmental degradation. I recall the former Liberal Minister of the Environment in this province of Ontario who, after there had been 13 spills in a one-week period on the St. Clair River, described that as industrial incontinence but did not proceed to lay charges or to levy the kinds of fines that would be necessary to stop that kind of industrial incontinence.

I recall the former federal Minister of the Environment telling me that some 80 per cent of the toxic and hazardous waste produced on a daily basis in this country is improperly or illegally disposed of. It is dumped in rivers, dumped in sewers, dumped on farmers fields and it requires whistle blowing legislation to start getting these kinds of activities reported so that kind of future problem can be disposed of before it occurs. I see the minister of forests is here. He is a big supporter of whistle blowing legislation. I hope he takes it to cabinet this week and we see it back here fairly soon.

In the forestry sector, we need some whistle blowing, mostly whistle blowing about what the minister is not doing. I recall that Dr. Rankin from the University of Victoria Law School did an assessment and an evaluation of class one and class two waste management permits in British Columbia last year. He found that fully, three-quarters of the waste management permits in some areas of the province in some categories had been in significant non-compliance for more than a year.

At the federal level, we found from the Auditor General that there has been a 240 per cent increase in non-compliance among mining companies, as an example, since the Conservatives came to office. I do not think the government understands how strongly Canadians feel about protecting the environment and stopping that kind of improper use of our environment.

The Auditor General found that most of the mines audited in this country were non-compliance with the federal legislation that they were operating under. The majority of the mines or workers at all or most of these sites know that there is improper activity going on. The drivers of the trucks that are hauling and dumping toxic waste out into some farmer's field in British Columbia or in Prince Edward Island tonight know what they are doing. The environment is being destroyed in many areas of Canada by what is described as insignificant increment; a spill here, a dump there, a fire here, some radiation there, an oil spill here and some acid mine drainage there. Whistle blowers legislation to encourage and protect workers and citizens for reporting environmental accidents and hazards is a fundamental piece of legislation that must be passed by this House.

It is federal policy within the NDP. It is the only party that has the kind of process to set policy prior to getting into government. I certainly hope and expect that we will have a chance to perhaps bring in this kind of legislation. If the Green Plan had any real guts—I suppose we may not see the Green Plan now in 1990 according to the latest rumours around here—but if it had any real guts, whistle blowing legislation would be a centrepiece, just as an environmental auditor general would be a centrepiece, and major amendments to access to information and environmental liaison centres would be similar centrepieces in the legislation.

• (1710)

The chances are low. The reason I say that is we can measure it under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, which is the direct responsibility of the present Minister of the Environment. The Auditor General found that since the legislation became law more than two years ago, there have only been three prosecutions in the whole of Canada, three prosecutions and three convictions under the most important and broadest based environmental legislation in the whole country. The prevailing philosophy of this government in a big business is that the environment is free, and one externalizes waste to increase one's profit.

There is no Green Plan either coming or existing under the Tories in my view. What we are seeing is an environmental and ecological brown-out. We are seeing immunity from prosecution, Order in Council exemptions for special friends, such as the Alcan Kemano II project in British Columbia, special laws on liability, such as the ones put in place for the Atomic Energy Control Board. Let me give a direct example on the government's mythical war on pollution and protection of the environment.

There was a discretionary immunity memo leaked some time ago that I made public. We know now that fisheries contamination from industrial pollution and toxins from B.C. pulp mills is far worse than ever expected. On the front page of today's Vancouver Sun the headline is, "Six mill areas cited. Dioxins spark expanded bans". We see that areas as much as five times the size of the area already closed have been restricted. Affected are the waters around the Fletcher Challenge's Crofton mill near Duncan, the Fletcher Challenge mill near Campbell River, the MacMillan Bloedel mill at Power River on the Sunshine Coast, the MacMillan Bloedel mill near Nanaimo, the Canadian Forest Products mill near Gold River and the Eurocan mill near Kitimat.

Already 1 per cent of the fisheries in British Columbia are closed because of environmental pollution from pulp mills. That is shellfish, it is crab, prawn, shrimps and now it is starting to move into the fish populations. It is truly incredible. The question of compensation for fishermen has not been addressed. The prosecution of companies and agencies involved has not been addressed. The matter of ruined native fisheries has not been addressed and matter of public health has not been addressed.

The only reason the government finally acted on November 23, 1989 was because a former federal public servant by the name of Otto Langer wrote a memo of November 15, 1989 which outlined the inconsistent application of the Fisheries Act, which was leaked to the press, embarrassed the government into taking some action, band-aid actions, after the fact actions, too little too late action, but with whistle blowing legislation the public would not have to wait for a situation to reach crisis proportions economically, ecologically and environmentally and then hope that someone leaks the information to trigger a response.

On the inconsistent application of the Fisheries Act as a case in point, I am not talking about a rare isolated example. What Mr. Langer revealed is that the issue is one of continuous non-compliance, for example, involving 19 years of the Department of the Environment environmental protection never charging anyone despite the knowledge that the pulp mills were totally out of compliance with the pulp and paper effluent regulations. It is an issue of chronic non-compliance. "Senior management and conservative legal opinion has recently created new classes of immunity for certain polluters or those that destroy habitat". This led to examples of abandoning court cases when clear "others beyond our influence did not want the trials to continue". In other words, forget prosecuting the big polluters.

The leaked memo continues on the top of page 4 and I quote again:

> The impact of creating the above classes of immunity have far reaching consequences for the morale of our staff and ultimately the future of the fishery resource and associated environment—A continuation of this philosophy will result in a wholesale loss of fish habitat and a continued degradation of water quality.

If repeated violators are not being dealt with, what kind of an environment are we going to be left with? Just yesterday in The Toronto Star there was a very good article called "The Mythical War on Pollution" which said the following:

> —since 1970, Ottawa's enforcement of federal environmental laws has ranged from timid to non-existent.
> The evidence of that 20-year regulatory failure is overwhelming. Internal Environment Canada reports and memos confirm that many of Canada's worst polluters in 1970 are still the worst today.
> Among the most notorious are Canada's pulp and paper mills. Almost half are still breaking the Fisheries Act regulations each day they operate.

I am blowing the whistle today but is the minister of fisheries going to go out and charge any of these hundreds of polluters who are violating federal law? Well, we will find out tomorrow morning but you and I both know the answer, Mr. Speaker. This government is granting immunity to prosecution to hundreds of corporations in this country who are breaking the law at this very moment.

The article goes on:

> From 1985 through 1988, the average Fisheries Act fine was $4,100. Only 56 convictions were registered during those 48 months and a minority of the prosecutions were initiated by Environment Canada. What happened to the public policy?

The paper goes on to conclude that there is an interim immunity from prosecution.

> Each secret deal Ottawa made with these companies triggered demands from competitors that they get the same break.
> This pattern is reflected in a Statistics Canada analysis of capital expenditures by Canadian manufacturers between 1985 and 1989. Of a total capital investment of $25 billion, 96 per cent was spent on expansion and modernization. A mere 2 per cent was spent directly on pollution abatement and most of that money was federal and provincial anti-pollution grants.

That is a pretty telling story about what is going on and what is not going on.

Let us look now for a moment at what the Auditor General has found. I think I can demonstrate why workers want it, why the public wants it, why the environment deserves it, why federal public servants need it, and why we need to stop companies from breaking the law.

In 1984 and 1985 he looked at 13 departments and in 1985 he reported it to the President of the Treasury Board. In February, 1987, the President of the Treasury Board sent out a policy circular called "Losses of Money Suffered by Her Majesty and Offences and other Illegal Acts against the Crown".

In 1988 the Auditor General took another look and this is what he said that most of the six departments examined had not established the procedures required by Treasury Board for reporting all suspected cases of fraud and other offences to the RCMP, the deputy attorney general and the Treasury Board and for reporting all proven cases to Parliament.

I quote from section 19.10:

> We are concerned about the tendency by some departments to not always report cases to the RCMP.

Well, what is going on, Mr. Speaker? Illegal activity is found in 13 departments by the Auditor General. He goes to the President of the Treasury Board, who then circulates it. Five years later the Auditor General goes back and looks at half those departments again and finds the illegal activity is still going on and it is not being reported to the RCMP.

Obviously we need whistle-blowing legislation. My colleagues in British Columbia have introduced a bill to protect no-pollution informants. It is Bill M 208.

Let us take a look at the evidence of the Auditor General again when he appeared on December 12 of last year before the public accounts committee in his discussions about the need for a hot line. On the hotline idea, he said: "The first principle it needs to clear is that the government bears the primary responsibility for preventing and detecting waste, mismanagement, and fraud in government, not my office".

That is the auditor general. He said they audited the government's fraud reporting practices in 1984. "We reported serious deficiencies. Departments continue to express concerns that individuals would be reluctant to report for fear of reprisal".

Mr. Speaker, my legislation is a proposed way to protect those individuals who fear reprisals for reporting to the RCMP. I go on and quote:

> The absence of reports of significant frauds in the Canadian government raises another question. Is it the case that fewer frauds are detected and reported in Canada, or is there actually a lower level of malfeasance in the Canadian government.
> One of the objectives of the hotline is to provide a more effective line of defence against fraud and to provide information to answer the question of extent of fraud against the government.
> This is an important question and needs to be discussed. Most frauds are, in general, not discovered by audits but rather by tips or by accident. We receive many brown envelopes. Most are anonymous. It takes tremendous courage to report serious wrongdoing. I believe that such people should be protected and assisted. We cannot expect people to come forward when they are subject not only to possible reprisal from powerful institutions but to derision as a tattle-tale. The hotline procedure we propose would fully protect such people, by not taking their names and by conducting audits in such a manner that they would not be identified.
> Even if a hotline is not established, the question of adequate protection of whistle-blowers remains. There are clearly doubts as to whether the existing protections are adequate. Perhaps specific legislation protecting the identity of callers is needed.

• (1720)

This is precisely it, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General has identified it throughout the Government of Canada and I have identified it in every environmental department in the country. Corporations are wildly in violation of the law, from coast to coast. The environment is the big loser and health is the big loser. The fishing grounds in British Columbia have just been closed again today, with encirclements five times the size they were at the last closure.

Let me conclude with a couple of other remarks of the Auditor General, and I quote from his evidence before the committee:

> The United States has an extensive system of hotlines—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate and to follow my esteemed colleague, the hon. member for Skeena, who has once again given evidence as to why he has a widely recognized expertise in chronic effluent. I am pleased to speak on this motion, proposed by the member for Skeena. The motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider providing legislated protection to all environmental "whistle-blowers".

I would like to start by reminding my hon. colleagues that the government has, in fact, seen fit to provide such protection under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The matter was discussed before this House. Members of the committee that was struck to carry out the clause-by-clause review of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, then known as Bill C-74, heard submissions and arguments both for and against this point. It is obviously an issue about which there are different points of view, and there was debate before the committee. There was also debate on other clauses of the bill designed to encourage public participation in enforcement of federal environmental statutes.

For example, the clause which gave the right to individuals to oblige the minister to investigate alleged violations of the act did, in fact, give rise to considerable debate for and against the question. Some briefs showed a fear of increased public participation. They were against giving individuals the right to require the Minister of the Environment to investigate alleged offences under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act as well as the right to receive a report of the investigation.

Some briefs did not support whistle blower protection and others wanted such protection, across the board, for every offence under the proposed act. Some of those who opposed further public participation in the implementation and enforcement of federal environmental law believed that the government was running the risk of creating a highly politicized climate of confrontation which, in fact, could jeopardize the pursuit of environmental objectives. Others saw the public participation and public rights sections of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act as devices for ensuring the public's help in enforcement and for reinforcing the public's belief that the government was committed to protecting the environment.

The House of Commons, doing clause-by-clause review of Bill C-74, decided to promote further public participation. This review reduced the number of individuals who may require the Minister of the Environment to investigate alleged offences against the proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act from 12 down to two. Section 108, Section 109, and Section 110 of the act outline the requirements.

> 108. (1) Any two persons resident in Canada who are not less than 18 years of age and who are of the opinion that an offence has been committed under this act may apply to the minister for an investigation of the alleged offence.
> (2) An application for an investigation shall be accompanied by a solemn or statutory declaration.
> A) Stating the names and addresses of the applicants;
> B) Stating the nature of the alleged offence and the name of each person alleged to be involved in its commission; and
> C) Containing a concise statement of the evidence supporting the allegations of the applicants.

Section 109 goes on to continue to spell out these requirements:

> 109. (1) On receipt of an application under Section 108, the minister shall acknowledge receipt of the application and investigate all matters that the minister considers necessary for a determination of the facts relating to the alleged offence.

Clearly this is designed to ensure that the minister has in his or her hands all of the facts relating to the case. It continues:

> (2) Within ninety days after receiving an application under Section 108, the minister shall report to the applicants on the progress of the investigation and the action, if any, that the minister proposes to take.

(3) The minister may discontinue an investigation where the minister is of the opinion that the alleged offence does not require further investigation.

(4) Where an investigation is discontinued, the minister shall

A) Prepare a report in writing describing the information obtained during the investigation and stating the reasons for its discontinuation; and

B) Send a copy of the report to the applicants and to any person whose conduct was investigated.

110. At any stage of an investigation under Section 109, the minister may, in addition to or in lieu of continuing the investigation, send any records, returns or evidence to the Attorney General of Canada for consideration of whether an offence has been or is about to be committed against this act and for such action as the Attorney General of Canada may wish to take.

In addition, it also decided in favour of experimental so–called whistle blower protection. The committee limited the right of individuals to request anonymity solely when they report the unauthorized release of a regulated substance under Part II of the act governing toxic substances, or a release of regulated emissions, effluents and wastes under Part IV of the act governing federal departments, agencies, commissions, boards, works, undertakings, as well as federal lands and federal Crown corporations.

Accordingly, in Part II of the act governing toxic substances, section 37 requires that an individual who has knowledge of an authorized release or of the likelihood of an unauthorized release must report this information to a designated inspector or to any other person designated by regulation as empowered to receive the report.

That section also provides for voluntary reports from individuals who are not required under law to transmit their information but who in the interests of environmental protection may choose to do so. A person not required to report may request that his or her identity remain confidential. Once an individual makes this request, no person may release or cause to be released the identity of the informant or any information or detail likely to reveal that identity. I quote:

37. (1) Where a person has knowledge of the occurrence or reasonable likelihood of a release into the environment of a substance specified in the list of toxic substances in Schedule I, but the person is not required to report the matter under this act, the person may report any information relating to the release or likely release to an inspector or to any person to whom a report may be made under Section 36.

I believe that my time is close to expiring. I will simply wrap up by saying that I am sure over time the government will consider many types of measures. One of those might be the extension of whistle blower provisions. If this is studied, I am sure the government will find the most appropriate way of using such protection, keeping in mind, of course, the rights of the accused and other important factors.

• (1730)

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak out in favour of this motion. Canadians are becoming increasingly serious about their responsibility for the environment, both as individuals and as employees.

[English]

If we truly want to create a system where every individual can be a guardian of the environment, the kind of legislation proposed in the motion is absolutely essential. Individuals want to take responsibility in the workplace as well as in their personal lives. Fortunately, more and more businesses are also recognizing the importance of being guardians of the environment and are recognizing that doing things in an environmentally friendly way also makes good sense economically and for their increased productivity and efficiency as businesses.

Others are putting their heads in the sand, pretending that this concern about the environment is a new thing and it is going to go away, if only they ignore it. Sooner or later, the world will get back to more important things and leave them alone to pollute our air, water and soil.

However, that is not what is going to happen because people are fundamentally realizing that the environmental problems they face now are a question of their own personal health and safety, that if we do not act urgently on such problems as ozone depletion and global warming, we will not have air to breathe and we will not have clean water to drink, and that the time horizon for that is sooner, rather than later. So people do want to take their individual responsibility very seriously.

They know that in their place of work perhaps effluents are being put into rivers, lakes and oceans, damaging the ability of life on earth to survive in the future. They know that chemicals are being used and not disposed of safely. They know that their own personal health and safety as employees is at risk in their workplace. They want to protect that, but just as important, they want to protect the environment that they are going to leave to their children.

The hon. member opposite who was speaking quoted the provisions in the current legislation. One of the things I noticed is that it obliges reporting on behalf of individuals who are aware of existing pollution or potential pollution, but it provides no protection.

It is much more than a question of simply keeping confidential the identity of an individual who has made a complaint or made a report. It requires a very positive legislative provision which protects that individual from retaliation, and gives them a complete mechanism if they have been retaliated against. That ensures that they, in their interest to do a public duty in protecting the environment by lodging a complaint, will not suffer the loss of their job, lose employment opportunities or suffer the retribution and wrath of their employer.

We have to take this motion seriously because the ability of government to enforce environmental legislation is limited by the resources available, by the number of people who can be hired by a government at any particular time to go into virtually every small factory, shop and plant in this country, and determine how environmentally sound their practices are. I do not think any of us want to see a situation where only through an army of inspectors and enforcers can we achieve a cleaner and safer world.

The cost of that would be horrendous. But the cost of not dealing with this problem is also horrendous. I go back to one particular experience when I was on municipal council. It had to do with a very small amount of copper sulphate spread on the parking lot of a high technology company in the west end of this region. That is a standard way of disposing of some chemicals for some companies. It leaked into the water and literally put out of commission for many days the sewage treatment plant so that for close to a week raw sewage was going into the Ottawa River, simply because of one careless act by one careless business, and at a public cost for those few days of $3 million dollars to put that sewage treatment plant back into condition.

If we want to avoid these things without a massive bureaucracy that will go into every workplace across Canada, the best way to do it is to give the people working in those plants with those employers the ability to draw attention to problems that occur so that they can be dealt with and solved before they create this kind of horrendous damage and public expense.

Many employers are starting to realize this and are putting into place a mechanism whereby their employees are free to bring these problems or suggestions to the attention of management or suggestions as to how they could use less resources to dispose of waste more safely and generally create a more environmentally friendly workplace and a more environmentally friendly corporate citizen. However, many other companies are not doing that. Employees who dared to make a report or to talk to a senior manager about damaging practices would lose their job and benefits very quickly. People are not prepared to fulfil their social responsibility if that is the cost. If it is a social responsibility, it is a social obligation to protect them when they fulfil that duty.

I have seen what happens to people when they come forward and complain of wrongdoing in their place of employment, whether it is theft by other employees or whether it is fairly rampant fraud within an employment situation. Despite the best will at the political level to protect them and to protect their jobs once they return to their work unit, other forces take over and it becomes impossible to protect them, except through legislation.

We see this happen when there are complaints, even in the Public Service, possibly and particularly in the Public Service when there are complaints of violations of human rights or complaints of harassment. We still have not put in place a system whereby somebody can make that kind of complaint against systemic discrimination and have it dealt with without suffering the consequences of having made a complaint.

I have known and I continue to hear from people who are without a job because they dared to complain against their employer. I met with one as recently as this morning. I have met with people who have taken up to 10 years to get justice against a complaint of harassment, sexual, racial or religious.

We cannot allow that to happen in the environmental area. We cannot allow people who are trying to carry out a responsibility to society and to the future of the world to be punished for it.

Within the Public Service generally there has been a call for a long time for whistle blowing and, as my hon. colleague who introduced the motion said, the support of the Auditor General is very strong for a system that would allow employees to bring to the attention of management, or of politicians, complaints about theft from government, fraud in government, complaints about anything that is not being done according to government policy and is being done to the detriment of the public. I think that is good legislation.

We want to create responsible, independent thinkers in our public service and in the private sector, but in our public service particularly because we are the largest employer in the country. We want to make it not only a right but a responsibility of every employee to take their environmental responsibility seriously without fear of retaliation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

• (1740 )

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the motion proposed by my colleague, "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider providing legislated protection to all environmental 'whistle-blowers'," is a most interesting proposition.

I am very pleased to make some comments on this matter. Whistle blower protection provisions to protect the identity of informants of suspected or apparent violations are fairly new in federal legislation. At least three federal statutes provide limited protection to individuals who bring complaints or participate in proceedings or other enforcement activities. These are the Labour Code, the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

In the Canada Labour Code, employees are protected from employers engaging in unfair practices such as harassment, firing or suspension when employees exercise their rights under the code. For example, to lay a complaint, disclose information about employer violations of the code, or testifying or otherwise participating in proceedings under the code. If the Canada Labour Code board judges that unfair practices have indeed taken place, the board can make corrective orders or direct that compensation be paid. The protection is limited, however, to employers' unfair practices and does not extend to concealing the employer's identity at his or her request.

One section of the labour code that does allow an employer's identity to remain undisclosed is clause 146 (4) of the code. It provides that a person who provides information to a safety officer in relation to inspections will have his or her identity concealed. Disclosure is not compellable before any court or other tribunal. Violations of section 146 are punishable on summary conviction.

I quote clause 146.(4):

> No person to whom information obtained pursuant to section 144 is communicated in confidence
> a) shall divulge the name of the informant to any person, except for the purposes of this part; or
> b) in competent or compellable to divulge the name of the informant before any court or other tribunal.

There is additional protection as well. The Canadian Human Rights Act, for example, provides in section 59 that no person shall threaten, intimidate or discriminate against an individual because he or she made a complaint, gave evidence or assisted in any way in a proceeding under the act. The penalty for contravention of this section by an employer is a fine of up to $50,000, and for any other party, a fine of up to $5,000.

Again, I quote from section 59 of the act:

> No person shall threaten, intimidate or discriminate against an individual because that individual has made a complaint or given evidence or assisted in any way in respect of the initiation or prosecution of a complaint or other proceeding under this part, or because that individual proposes to do so.

Also, there is the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. It is unique among federal environmental statutes in that it provides the right to request anonymity for those who provide information to enforcement authorities in certain situation. These circumstances are limited to reports of an unauthorized release or of a likely release of a toxic substance to the environment, where the individual is not legally bound by the statute to make a report and does so voluntarily.

There are similar provisions for persons reporting unauthorized releases of effluents, emissions or wastes by federal departments, boards, commissions, agencies, federal Crown corporations and federal works or undertakings on federal lands. If the informant is an employee of the federal entity, there is an added benefit. The employee making the report cannot be disciplined, dismissed or harassed for having done so.

More specifically, subsections 37 (2) and (3) and 58 (2) and (3), provide that there a person making such a report requests to remain anonymous, his or her identity shall not be released unless he or she authorizes the release in writing. Subsections 37 (4) and 58 (4) provide that no employee shall be disciplined, dismissed or harassed for making a report to a CEPA inspector.

It is fair to say that most managers would certainly prefer to learn about a release of a toxic substance at their facility from an employee rather than from a visiting CEPA inspector. For this reason, managers are advised to encourage their staff to report to them any release or suspected release or conditions that are likely to result in release.

The government is satisfied with the operation of these existing provisions. While extending the current protection to all environmental whistle blowers may seem attractive in some cases, there are important considerations to ponder.

For example, when my colleague refers to protection for all environmental whistle blowers in his motion, I wonder if he means all informants who report alleged environmental offences. Under the Constitution Act, 1982, the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over local works and undertakings, except for navigation, railways, canals, telecommunication companies, broadcasters, banks, aircraft, airports, commercial air services, interprovincial ferries, trucking and other transport. All other works come under provincial jurisdiction. This is repeated in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Since provinces have jurisdiction, it is provincial law which governs the right of employees in the work place. We have a practical problem here, because to legislate this protection for matters that are dealt with in provincial law would require intensive study by the Department of Justice to determine even if such a thing was constitutionally possible.

In addition, decisions of Canada's high courts are tending to erode some of the previous traditional claims to protection of personal identity made by informants of criminal offences. The courts must weigh the right of the accused to face his or her accuser against the benefits of receiving tips or other evidence of criminal offences that enforcement agencies may not otherwise have been able to receive.

While more than one community has pointed to the success afforded by Crime Stoppers or other programs where informants are paid for information leading to successful convictions and guaranteed that their identity will be protected, it is true that a person who reports a Criminal Code offence under the Crime Stoppers program still has no legislated protection under that program against harassment or loss of employment, if he or she has made a complaint against an employer or against a fellow worker.

There appears to be a growing trend, however, in other jurisdictions such as British Columbia and the United States to look more extensively at whistle blower protection, but there are problems with this. In their paper for the recent book, Law Reform for Sustainable Development in British Columbia, two lawyers published a short discussion of the problem of whistle blower protection in British Columbia for reports of suspected or apparent environmental violations. They defined whistle blowers as employees who disclose employer violations of environmental laws to their management, union, government, or the media.

The authors of this paper note that given current resources for law enforcement employees can be an adjunct of enforcement, but it is important to note that this can happen only if they report offences without jeopardizing their livelihood. The authors do not deal, however, with the protection of identity but with legislative provisions that would protect any employee's entitlement to his or her job. There is also the argument that there is a possibility of whistle blowing legislation being used as a means to harass employers by disgruntled employees.

Whistle blower provisions in statutes of various provinces seem to lean more toward job protection than protection of an informant's identity. The statutes of other countries such as the United States and court decisions related to the interpretation of these statutes are interesting. We must study all these things very carefully and very soberly.

We would certainly agree that my colleague has brought to the government some food for future thought.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I understand that you are very attentive on this matter of whistle blowing, because I know that when you played for the Edmonton Eskimos, immediately the whistle blew, you relaxed and stopped tackling.

• (1750 )

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say, since the hon. member raised the topic, that we did win a few games then. In fact we won a few Grey Cups then too.

Mr. Waddell: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. The Eskimos have need of you. I will not speak for Mr. Don Getty. He can speak for himself.

An hon. member: He may have been hit a few too many times.

Mr. Waddell: "He may have been hit a few too many times", my colleague says, but not you, Mr. Speaker.

Anyway, I want to address whistle blowing. I heard the parliamentary secretary speak. I thought she was nit-picking a bit. This is not a radical motion. The member for Skeena, as I understand it, has phrased the motion so that the government can consider providing—that is not acting on it tomorrow—whistle blowing legislation. He is trying to push the government along in this matter. The parliamentary secretary admitted, did she not, that there are some precedents for this sort of legislation.

As the member for Skeena pointed out, the environment is the No. 1 issue in Canada. It is crucial that we protect and save the great Canadian environment. We have an environment crisis in Canada and in the world. We have to do something about it. Ask high school students in this country, and they will tell you that right out front. They will even say to the member for Skeena: "You are not radical enough. Get moving on this matter".

I point out too that the parliamentary secretary brings forth that old chestnut in Canada: "It is our Constitution. Maybe it is a provincial matter". I can just hear them in the provincial House if they brought forth similar legislation: "Well, that is a federal matter". It falls through the cracks.

We have to look at the environment differently. We cannot regionalize it or provincialize it. It really is a national matter, indeed an international matter. The member for Chambly, our member from Quebec, who likes to talk about Quebec having a lot of control over constitutional matters has always said consistently that he thought environment should be a national matter. Let us approach it as if it were a national matter and deal it with it that way.

The member for Skeena, in his motion, wants the government to consider legislation for protecting people who blow the whistle on environmental offences. The problem is clear. Oftentimes in the woods, chemical factories, pulp mills, tar sands in northern Alberta, and so on an environmental illegality happens. It is convenient to get rid of the slush; it is convenient to do this, even though the people or the company really should not be doing this.

If an employee such as a wood worker, pulp worker, chemical worker, or oil worker sees this and his conscience bothers him because he knows that it is against the law, immoral and unethical to pollute the environment, he wants to tell. The only way we can ever find out what is going on is when this employee tells, but, if he tells, he is liable to lose his job and his wife, family and so on suffer, and he suffers. We have to try to find ways of protecting him so that he is not singled out and punished.

I tell the member for Skeena quite directly as justice critic of our party that I have some concerns about the motion, because we do have a principle in Canada that you have a right to face your accuser. We have to be very careful that we do not have neighbourhood committees spying on people, employees spying on other employees who can report things, and then not having to face the persons they accuse. We have to think about that principle. It is a problem, but I think we can get around it. We can deal with it in a just way, especially when it comes to the environment. We might have to restrict it when we get to a bill.

However, the member for Skeena is simply asking for a motion. He is simply pushing the government, which I and other members of the House support.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your allowing me a few minutes—

Mr. Waddell: Only three minutes!

Mr. Della Noce: Five!

Mr. Fontaine: —to deal with this motion whose purpose is to provide protection to all "whistle-blowers".

When dealing with Bill C-74 currently known as the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the House of Commons and the Legislative Committee considered providing this protection. During their clause by clause review of Bill C-74, the members heard many representations concerning this. Of course, some of them could not be accepted, in view of our legislative system and the distribution of responsibilities and powers between the various levels of government.

Providing legislative protection to all environmental "whistle-blowers" was one of the proposals which all committee members involved in the review of Bill C-74 supported. Their discussion resulted in the provisions of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which guarantees the anonimity which my hon. friend suggested in his motion.

Allow me to explain to you what already exists under federal legislation. This protection is provided twice in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the first time under Part II which deals with toxic substances, and the second time, under Part IV which deals with federal departments, agencies, Crown corporations, works, undertakings and lands.

First of all, under Section 37 of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, any person who has knowledge of the unauthorized release into the environment of a toxic substance may report any information relating to the release to an inspector or any person designated by regulation to whom a report may be made. Moreover, a person making such a report may request that his or her identity not be released. He or she may also request that any information that could reasonably reveal his or her identity be kept confidential. Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote the relevant section:

37. (1) Where a person has knowledge of the occurence or reasonable likelihood of a release into the environment of a substance specified in the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I, but the person is not required to report the matter under this Act, the person may report any information relating to the release or likely release to an inspector or to any person to whom a report may be made under section 36.

(2) A person making a report under subsection (1) may request that the person's identity and any information that could reasonably reveal the identity not be released.

(3) Where a person makes a request under subsection (2), no person shall release or cause to be released the identity of the person making the request or any information that could reasonably be expected to reveal the identity, unless the person making the request authorizes the release in writing.

(4) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament, no employee of a department, board, commission or agency of the Government of Canada, or of a corporation named in Schedule C to the Financial Administration Act or of a federal regulatory body shall be disciplined, dismissed or harassed for making a report under subsection (1).

To conclude quickly, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the motion moved by the hon. member could normally be justified within a legislative framework which would not protect individual "whistle-blowers" against possible prosecution.

Under Bill C-74, our present legislation however, any Canadian citizen could report to the proper authorities any act detrimental to the environment without fear of prosecution. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that our current legislation is adequate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that this follow-up to an earlier question should follow this debate on environmental issues. That, of course, is at the heart of the question which I wish to follow up.

In April of this past year, a cross river barge project was established in the city of Windsor against the objections the various downriver communities in the area, which make up part of my constituency.

In a series of questions with the government, I raised the possibility of what I consider to be the necessity of an environmental assessment review proceeding taking place with respect to this new barge, because this barge service was not just a service to provide transportation across the river. It was specifically a service designed to take dangerous goods from one side of the Detroit River to the other. It was to be devoted exclusively to such dangerous goods.

Since the question was originally raised in a series of questions in January, April and May of 1990, we have been able to get access under Access to Information to the file which is kept in the Department of Transport with respect to this project.

On the basis of the material in that file, which has been released to us, I have to make a number of charges with respect to the government's treatment of this whole question.

First, I charge that this government deliberately covered up the fact that this barge project was proceeding forward and was being given considerable attention by various departments of government, was of considerable importance and was recognized to be of such by the people of the city of Windsor and the downriver communities. Yet at no stage did the government of this country see fit to tell the people of Windsor and Essex county that this barge proposal was being revived.

Despite the fact that in the information which has been provided to us under Access to Information there were September 1989 meetings which took place specifically on the issue. It was reported that this barge proposal had been revived and was being considered in detailed meetings at the very highest levels within ministries here in Ottawa.

Yet, as I say, at no time was any information on this subject provided to the people of the city of Windsor and the county of Essex.

I raised a question in the House on January 26, 1990 with the Minister of Transport about this subject. The Minister of Transport, at that stage, said to me that this was simply a possibility. He said to me that the question was premature. This despite the fact the files now show that this government and the minister's own department had been for a period of at least four months considering in detail the question of whether this barge should go forward.

• (1805)

I also have to say that the file shows quite clearly that the government suppressed information with respect to barge operations on the Detroit River. In particular, they refused to tell people in our community that there had been seven accidents in the previous period of less than seven years with respect to other barge operations taking place, barge operations that did not exclusively handle dangerous goods.

I also have to charge on the basis of the files which I have seen that the government did not at any stage undertake a serious environmental review of this barge proposal. This is despite the fact that the Minister of National Revenue stood up in the House and said that such a serious review would take place.

I raised this question on May 7, 1990 with the Minister of the Environment asking him why the government, despite concerns expressed by the community, had rejected public environmental assessment hearings on this Windsor barge. The minister did not respond to the question and did not provide us with any justification for the cover-up and the suppression of information, which had clearly taken place with respect to this question.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the government is familiar with the proposal made by Barge Transport Incorporated of Detroit, which plans to load tanker trucks carrying hazardous substances on barges, to cross the Detroit River in the Windsor area. An initial plan was examined in 1987. If the company had followed through, the plan would have been subject to the environmental assessment review process, since it concerned federal land.

However, the company withdrew its initial plan and, after considering other possibilities, has now proposed another plan that does not involve federal land. Nevertheless, because of concerns raised by members of the local community, a thorough review was made of the new plan to determine, without going through the environmental assessment review process, whether any federal requirements or regulations applied. After wide-ranging consultations by senior officials from various federal departments, it was concluded that the plan was well within all regulatory and other requirements concerning health, safety and transportation of hazardous materials as defined by the Canadian Coast Guard, which is responsible for ships' safety. The federal government will carry out inspections and a take samples as required, to ensure compliance with the emergency order on imports and exports of contaminated fuel, issued under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the CEPA regulations on imports and exports of hazardous wastes are expected to come into force by early 1991. They will authorize the federal government to control future imports and exports of hazardous wastes.

From the risk point of view, the planned barge transport compares with the way in which any other product, like oil, for instance, is shipped on the Great Lakes. At the present time, a number of companies are transporting hazardous materials by barge in international waters, and they have excellent safety standards.

This plan offers an effective alternative to transportation over land. It helps reduce truck traffic on the Bluewater Bridge in Sarnia and in surrounding communities like Wallaceburg and Chatham.

• (1810)

The crossing by ferryboat would replace road transportation on roughly 400 km, reducing the risk of road accidents, hence spillage of dangerous goods.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise once again on a question I asked the Minister of National Revenue on November 8.

The question concerned veterans and other Canadians who have been told that a beeper which summons emergency health services does not fall under medical devices in the goods and services tax schedule. This would make it tax exempt if it did so.

The Department of Veterans Affairs must consider this instrument to be an essential service as it pays for the device under the Blue Cross. I asked the minister for his justification of taxing such a device which can mean the difference between life and death. The answer was rather confusing. He said that the Royal Canadian Legion is considered to be a charitable organization for the purposes of GST and therefore would not be obligated to pay or to collect the GST. This did not, in any way, answer the question. I was concerned with a device that is used by veterans and many other Canadians, and which is not distributed through the Royal Canadian Legion. Perhaps the minister was not listening and thought I was requiring about something else. I cannot be sure.

I rise today hoping to get a response and at this time I hope the response is pertinent to the issue. Following my question, I wrote a letter to the minister regarding the Health Line beeper. At this time I would like to briefly outline the contents of the letter to provide the House with some background on this very worth-while life-saving device.

The Health Line beeper is a portable device which allows the user to summon emergency health services by tapping the device. The message is relayed to a 24-hour monitoring centre and services are dispatched. This service is used primarily by elderly and/or chronically ill persons.

A constituent of mine, Cathy Collard, is the manager of Health Line Services in Charlottetown. She inquired whether the device would be tax exempt under the proposed goods and services tax. On her behalf I contacted officials within the minister's department who stated that since the device is not listed under "medical devices" in the goods and services tax schedule, it would not be tax exempt.

For chronically ill and elderly people, the possession of a Health Line beeper could mean the difference between life and death. I would like to stress that it is not a luxury item and I fail to understand why it is not considered a medical device for the purposes of taxation.

The personal emergency beeper is needed most by those who may live alone or who are left alone during the day. This service, without any argument, can be a life-saving service. It allows one to cope alone and with dignity despite age or illness. With one simple push of a button in a moment of need, the urgently needed assistance is on its way.

I am appalled that this government could even consider not making such a device tax exempt. Is this government so cold that it will not listen to Canadians for any reason, proving how insensitive it is to the concerns of Canadians. All I am asking is that a device that quite often means the difference between life and death be tax exempt.

At this time we are going through a full-blown, made-in-Canada recession. Everywhere you turn people are feeling the crunch. This is a time when we must help those people who need us most. I am referring to those people who need and deserve their independence and without an emergency beeper would not be able to do so.

I must stress that this government must start listening to the concerns of all Canadians and help those in need. It is time that this government began to realize that a price cannot be placed on human life. At this time, I would like to stress that I am quite aware that under certain circumstances devices such as this will in fact be considered as medical devices and, therefore, will be zero rated for the purpose of GST. However, as I checked into the matter with officials from the departments of Finance and National Revenue, as well as the GST hotline, I was told repeatedly that the health line beeper does not fall under that category.

• (1815)

I am also aware that communication devices, other than a device for use with telegraph or telephone apparatus, will be zero rated when specifically designed to assist an individual in coping with or treating an illness or chronic abnormal physical state. I must point out once again that I have been told by GST officials that this health beeper does not fall under this category.

I ask the parliamentary secretary tonight and hopefully he will do everything in his power to ensure that this device will be given all consideration and that it should be tax exempt.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague went through his question dated November 8, 1990, on page 15327 of Hansard where the minister answered his question. He said today that he was pleased that he was advised, but he did not mention that this government took its responsibility and the minister answered his letter which he had today.

I refer him to the second paragraph where the minister said: "I am pleased to advise you that in certain circumstances these devices will in fact be considered as medical devices and therefore will be zero rated for the purpose of the GST", which my hon. friend mentioned, but he did not say it was from the letter of the minister.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, I will go on. I wish to answer in greater detail to the question raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough on the exemption from the proposed Goods and Services Tax, of beepers used to communicate with emergency services.

Even without any additional information on the use of the devices the hon. member is referring to, I am quite sure these communication devices will be exempted. In some cases, the devices will be exempted for GST purposes, as the minister indicated in his letter.

The regulations established by the Department of Finance stipulates the conditions under which such communication devices, used for medical purposes, can be exempted from the GST. For example, communication devices, other than those used with phones and telegraph apparatus, will be exempted if they are specially designed to help sick or chronically-ill people. Consequently, beepers designed for this purpose will be GST-free. Moreover, breathing apparatus which can be used at home will also be exempted if especially designed to help the sick or the chronically-ill. It should be noted that beepers designed for use with telephones or telegraphs will be taxable.

Our government is committed to make health care readily accessible to all Canadians. To that end we have granted generous tax rebates on medical services, prescription drugs and medical devices. Under the proposed legislation most medical services will be tax exempt. This category also includes products or services whose cost is paid or reimbursed by a provincial government pursuant to a plan established through provincial legislation for the supply of health care services to all provincial residents covered under that insurance.

• (1820)

The tax on prescription drugs and medical devices will be removed. The prescription drugs listed in the various annexes of the Food and Drugs Act, the Food and Drugs Regulations and the Narcotic Control Act, other than drugs available without prescription, will no longer be taxable. The legislation provides that some medical devices will not be taxable if they are prescribed by a physician.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I return once again to a subject I have raised numerous times in this House and which I raised on November 20 as a question to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It has to do with the Scotia Synfuels Project, the project to create a refinery or converting a new technology for making petroleum distillates out of coal and heavy oil in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

It is a project which has widespread support in the region. It is a major economic development project for Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia. It is ideally suited for the economy of the area, particularly in the fact that it finds a clean use for Cape Breton coal which is known to be of a high sulphur content and therefore difficult to use, particularly because of the hydrocarbons it emits.

The Scotia Synfuels Project is a technology which has been in development for many years and is at a point now where it is nearly commercially viable and would be commercially viable with the assistance that is normally available through this federal government's programs had the Department of Industry Science and Technology, and particularly the minister, seen fit to exercise a little bit of creativity and take a risk on a project that is ideal for our region.

I must say the people of eastern Nova Scotia still cannot believe that the minister, after all the noises that have been made by the government, turned down their request for tax credits.

The reasons stated by the minister on November 20 for turning down the application for tax credits under the Cape Breton tax credit program were as he said in the House. What the promoters of the project requested was first that they wanted to have a $200 million Cape Breton tax credit. They wanted to have more. They also wanted to have a loan guarantee and an interest buy-down. That was not possible because of the fact there was no private sector money guarantee.

This is precisely the point. What the promoters had been asking the federal government for years, and particularly during the period of time when they had put in for the Cape Breton tax credit, was an indication from the federal government that if the tax credit would be forthcoming, they would be going on the private money markets to obtain the private sector funding that would be forthcoming, they believed, under current product prices for the petroleum products they were going to produce.

Therefore, what was being asked for by the company was simply an assurance by the federal government that those moneys would be available so that they could go out and get the private sector money. Unfortunately, this government was unwilling to even give them that undertaking and aborted the project in midstream.

What the minister is saying is not correct. There would have been major sources of private sector money involved and indeed the nature of the tax credit program is such that the government would be paying tax credits only after the project was in place and making money.

On top of that, the project had a potential to generate sizeable revenues for the government.

I want to put on the record some of the questions that were raised about this particular project. First of all, the project investment was $470 million. All of this would have to be raised from private investors and private financial institutions. They were requesting standard Cape Breton investment tax credits for 45 per cent of the capital cost of this project. They would reduce the $800 million of corporate taxes, which would be payable from earnings over the project's life, by approximately $200 million; that is to say, the government would realize a net gain in tax revenues of $600 million over the life of the project. This means that each $1 of the investment tax credit would generate $4 of new tax revenue. Of course they were requesting interest rate buy-downs. These are standard interest rate subsidies which have been offered by this government. This is a subsidy which the government has applied in other places, as well as the loan guarantees.

I compare the project to the Hibernia project, which we on this side of the House have supported strongly and have encouraged the government in achieving. That project was going to provide direct financial assistance in excess of some $1 billion or 25 per cent of construction costs, 40 per cent of construction costs to a maximum of $1.6 billion and other assistance, for a total federal contribution of $3.175 billion on this project.

With the private sector investment that would have been forthcoming under the Scotia Synfuels project and could still be forthcoming, if the minister would sit down with the principals and arrange some form of financial assistance and some terms which the principals would need to meet in order to receive this assistance, I believe this project would still be feasible. I call upon the minister and this government to continue to meet with the principals and assist this project.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the governement must tell the truth to the people of Cape Breton. In economic matters, it would be indecent to give anyone false hopes.

During the ten years that the study of the Scotia Synfuels Project lasted, the federal government spent some $2 million on top of the $4 million from the private sector. Although all those reviews and studies have demonstrated that the project technology can be developed, other detailed engineering studies are necessary to ensure the prescribed volume and quality of synthetic fuel. As indicated, over the last ten years representatives of the federal and provincial governments met several times with the promoter in a effort to bring the project into being.

Since 1984, the government has spent $1.5 billion to develop the Cape Breton economy. I could mention for exemple the modernization of Sysco, the financing of DEVCO and the development of the new Louisana Pacific plant in Port Hawkesbury. Two weeks ago, the department agreed to provide a $24.5 million financial help to projects of Kelly Rock Limited and Point Tupper Properties under the Cape Breton investment tax credit program, while awaiting for environmental impact studies for the two projects. Together, these two projects will create directly 138 new jobs.

Some say that Synfuels is a better project than Hibernia. These projects are completely different as to size, technology and performance. From the very beginning, Hibernia has received of the private sector's financial support and offered tremendous opportunities, in terms of downstream and other benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso will perhaps want to reflect on the comments of the project's promoter, Mr. Gillespie, who said, as quoted in The Chronicle Herald of April 1, 1986: "Accoring to a study completed last July the Synfuels project is feasable from a technical point of view, but not a financial one". Without a strong support from the private sector, Canadian taxpayers were asked to carry most of the project's risks. I don't think this is right, considering that the business community is not ready to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bill McKnight (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks today on the second reading of Bill C–88 by concentrating on why this new institution, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development or EBRD has been created; by outlining Canada's interest in central and eastern Europe; and by discussing our reasons for seeking membership in EBRD. I will then address briefly the mandate of EBRD, and Canada's financial contribution to the bank.

The countries of central and eastern Europe are undergoing political, economic, and social changes of historic importance. The political and social ferment in these countries, combined with their acute economic problems, present risk and opportunities. These developments are potentially destabilizing, but also create the potential for a prosperous, freer and more integrated European and North Atlantic community. The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development can play a central role in permitting central and eastern Europe to reach its potential.

The concept of the EBRD originated from a French proposal that was quickly endorsed at a meeting of the European community in Paris in November 1989. Canada quickly endorsed this principle of a broad based bank to provide a focus for world–wide financial assistance to central and eastern Europe, in support of the process of political and economic change then beginning in that region.

Widespread interest in this initiative quickly developed beyond the confines of Europe. A large number of interested countries, including the U.S.S.R. and all other central and eastern European countries except Albania, conducted the negotiations on the bank's articles of agreement through a highly compressed series of negotiating meetings. Indeed, the unprecedented speed with which the establishment of this bank was negotiated is the clearest sign of the international community's commitment to support reform in central and eastern Europe.

This process culminated in the representatives of potential member countries signing the bank's Articles of Agreement, entitled Agreement Establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Schedule–Section 2 of the bill), in Paris on May 29, 1990.

While backward in modern technology and burdened by the cumbersome and unproductive structures of the communist system, the countries of central and eastern Europe have a generally well–educated workforce, a good scientific base, and considerable technical skills. With strong and imaginative political leadership and support from the industrial world, many of these countries may be able to transform their economies and societies relatively quickly, thus enabling them to enter the European–North Atlantic community as active and self–reliant partners.

Mr. Speaker, it is the government's view that enhanced economic co–operation and integration among the countries of central and eastern Europe, and more broadly, will be vital to the process of structural adjustment that they require and would reduce the likelihood of regional conflict.

• (1010 )

The EBRD can assist this process through the provision of financing and technical advice for the steady and systematic introduction of private ownership and market forces into these economies.

Canada has a vital stake in Europe. More than half of our population trace their ancestry to Europe. Some 15 per cent of Canadians have direct ties with eastern and central Europe. Moreover, Canada's future peace and prosperity is intertwined with the peace and prosperity of Europe. As a consequence, Canada is deeply involved in the affairs of Europe through our participation in NATO, the Conference on Security and Co–operation in Europe and other multilateral forums, as well as our strong bilateral ties in both eastern and western Europe.

As a nation with broad political, economic, and security interests in Europe, we need to build on our traditional relations and to influence the evolution of Europe in ways conducive to our interests. This means, especially, expanding our political, social, economic and commercial relations with the countries of central and eastern Europe. That process is already under way, as demonstrated by the discussions on European peace and security that the Prime Minister is attending in Paris this week. We must also seek both bilateral and multilateral links with the region. One key vehicle will be the EBRD.

From a commercial perspective, economic liberalization in eastern and central Europe will generate increasing trade and investment opportunities for all, including Canadian business. The bank itself will assist Canadians to be aware of and to finance business with central and eastern European countries.

The EBRD is loosely modelled on the existing regional development banks in Latin America, Asia, Africa and the Caribbean. However, unlike these banks, the EBRD has a distinctive political mandate to support the transition to the market–based economies through the particular encouragement of private enterprise in those countries of central and eastern Europe adopting both political and economic reforms. The contracting parties of the EBRD have used the articles of agreement to state their commitment to democracy, the rule of law, respect for human rights and market economics. I would refer members to the preamble to the Articles of Agreement, which is Schedule 2 of the proposed legislation.

The bank is to be European in character, but broadly international in membership. Its membership will include the 12 member states of the European community; the European Economic Commission, the European Investment Bank, the countries of central and eastern Europe including the U.S.S.R., and other European and non–European countries that are also members of the International Monetary Fund. A list of signatories who intend to become members is included in the annexes to the Articles of Agreement.

The main objective of the bank is to promote the development of the private sector by focusing on those countries undergoing economic liberalization and democratization. To do so, it will need to co–ordinate its work closely with existing institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and World Bank. In order to establish a mechanism for selecting those countries eligible to borrow and to ward against possible backsliding on reforms, the Articles of Agreement provide for an annual review of the bank's lending strategy in each borrowing country. This review, which was proposed by Canada during the negotiations, should ensure that only those countries consistently applying the principles of democracy, pluralism and market economics continue to be eligible for borrowing.

The bank's central task is to build a vibrant private sector in countries that have been dominated for the past 45 years by inefficient state planning and almost total state ownership. The articles specify that at least 60 per cent of bank funding will be targeted toward lending and equity participation in private sector enterprises. Lending to the public sector will be aimed at assisting in the transition toward greater competitiveness and eventual possible privatization of public sector firms. There may also be limited lending for infrastructure projects required to support the free market economy.

I would also note that, for the first time in the articles of agreement of any such international institution, direct reference has been made to the bank's role in promoting environmentally sound and sustainable development. The Government of Canada attaches special importance to this element of the European Bank's objectives.

The initial capital base of the bank will be 10 billion ECU, or approximately $16 billion Canadian. Of that amount, 30 per cent of which must be actually paid–in, or deposited by members with the bank. The remaining capital is callable, that is, capital that is not paid–in but for which the members are liable should the bank encounter financial difficulty.

As in the case of the other development banks, the EBRD will be able to borrow further funds in capital markets at attractive rates of interest on the basis of the callable capital in convertible currency of its most creditworthy members. This will enable the bank to lend almost triple the level of funds represented by its paid–in capital. Thus, the establishment of this bank will create a multiplier effect. Every dollar that member governments provide to the institution will catalyze an additional $2 in investment capital for central and eastern Europe.

All powers of the bank are to be vested in the board of governors, which in turn will delegate responsibility for the bank's management and policy development to the board of directors. The Minister of Finance will be the Canadian governor for the EBRD. Canada will have one of 23 seats on the board of the bank.

Canada was present at all the negotiating sessions for the EBRD and has been an active participant in the key political, financial, and technical discussions to ensure that Canadian interests are fully represented. Based on the negotiations among the 42 founding signatories to the articles of agreement, it is proposed that Canada initially purchase a share of 3.4 per cent of the capital of the bank. Such a share would make Canada the eighth largest shareholder after the United States, the other G–7 countries, and the U.S.S.R.

Canada has elected to pay its subscription during this initial period of capitalization in U.S. dollars, just as we make subscription payments to the other development banks, such as the World Bank, in U.S. dollars. A share of 3.4 per cent would entail a paid–in investment not exceeding U.S. $120 million in respect to Canada's initial subscription of shares. The total callable portion of our share would be up to U.S. $280 million. Thus, Canada's total financial commitment, actual and potential, to central and eastern Europe through the EBRD will be some U.S. $400 million, or approximately $460 million Canadian at current exchange rates. Support of this magnitude is a powerful indication of the government's commitment to political and economic change in eastern Europe.

Although the EBRD will only become operational once the process of ratification by members is completed, there are clear indications that the international business community is eager to co–operate with the bank in developing a vibrant private sector in eastern Europe. Within Canada, government officials have already detected a strong interest in the EBRD on the part of banks, business people, the legal community, academics, and many others. I am confident that Canadians will use the resources of the EBRD to seek out a range of business opportunities in support of the economic transformation of eastern Europe.

Madam Speaker, the shares we are proposing to purchase in the EBRD are an investment, not just in the narrow accounting sense, but in a much broader sense: an investment in democracy and pluralism, an investment in economic freedom, and, above all, an investment in the people of central and eastern Europe. We are establishing an institution that will build productive assets and let the people of central and eastern Europe help themselves to grow and prosper.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, I must emphasize that for Canada to be a founding member of the bank, legislation allowing for the communication to the bank of our ratification of the agreement must be in place as soon as possible and certainly before the end of this year.
